112. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of his 12-year-old daughter, evidence that the victim had been previously assaulted by another relative was properly excluded in the punishment phase after the victim described the impact of the assault, including three attempted suicides, in part because the prior assault did not fit into any of the exceptions under Tex. R. Evid. 412; it was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Delapaz v. State, 297 S.W.3d 824, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7510 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 24 2009).

113. In a criminal prosecution for possession of cocaine, the trial court abused its discretion during the punishment phase of trial by allowing the State to prove defendant's previous convictions through judgments and a fingerprint expert; defendant was aware of the previous convictions, due to notices filed by the State pursuant Tex. Code Crim.

Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 and Tex. R. Evid. 404. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8218 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 17 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Motions for New Trial

114. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court rendered his decision to testify involuntary by misstating the law concerning the admissibility of his prior convictions because he did not raise the complaint in the trial court; even if defendant had preserved error, he failed to show that the trial court's alleged misstatement rendered his decision not to testify involuntary because the record indicated that his counsel had already counseled him as to the issues involved in deciding whether to testify and that defendant had further discussions with his counsel after the trial court's alleged misstatements. Stokes v. State, 221 S.W.3d 101, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11341 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : Registration

115. In defendant's indecent exposure case, trial court was within its discretion in admitting defendant's 2005 conviction for failure to register as a sex offender because defendant contradicted the only other witness called to the stand with direct knowledge of the incident -- the complainant; those circumstances heightened the State's need to impeach defendant's credibility. The State did not go into any detail about the underlying crime, and the trial court instructed the jury not to consider the evidence for purposes other than impeachment. Tristan v. State, 393 S.W.3d 806, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8895, 2012 WL 5285673 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 25 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : Evidence

116. Trial court erred by admitting impeachment evidence of prior possession offenses that defendant had pleaded guilty to under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.45 because he was not convicted of the two possession offenses, as neither the indictment nor the plea bargain was part of the record, and the judgment referred only to defendant's conviction of illegal investment; the trial court also failed to determine whether the probative value of admitting the two possession offenses as impeachment evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect to defendant as required under Tex. R. Evid. 609; defendant was harmed by the error under Tex. R. App. P. 44 because: (1) during cross-examination, defendant admitted to the two possession offenses as part of his plea bargain; (2) defendant's credibility was crucial to his defense that the sergeant was mistaken as to the identity of the seller; and (3) in closing arguments the State emphasized the impeachment evidence. Lopez v. State, 230 S.W.3d 875, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5695 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

117. Defendant did not preserve error as to a probative/prejudicial argument under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because during the evidentiary hearing, he did not address that issue. Yanez v. State, 187 S.W.3d 724, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1289 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

118. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault, the State gave notice of its intention to use evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant and the trial court admitted the evidence. Because defendant did not object on the ground that the State's notice was untimely, the issue was not preserved for review. Foxworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2005).

119. Contention of defendant upon being convicted of felony theft, that the trial court erred in allowing the State to impeach him with proof of prior convictions when he had not been given notice pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(f), could not be entered on appeal, because defendant failed to object when the prosecutor inquired into his prior convictions and, thus, he failed to preserve error as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Geuder v. State, 76 S.W.3d

133, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 2312 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2002), vacated by 115 S.W.3d 11, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 305 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

120. Defendant failed to preserve his objections to the admission of his prior convictions that occurred in 1999 because he specifically objected only to a 1981 conviction, he did not obtain a running objection, and he did not request a hearing outside the jury's presence. Blount v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4534 (Tex. App. Waco June 6 2012).

121. Even if the trial court erred by admitting defendant's 1981 convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609, the error was harmless because the State offered evidence of defendant's lengthy and varied criminal history by questioning him about his prior convictions that occurred in 1999, 2000, 2002, 2004, and 2005. Blount v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4534 (Tex. App. Waco June 6 2012).

122. Where defendant did not testify or provide evidence of what his testimony would have been, he did not preserve an argument under Tex. R. Evid. 609 that the trial court erroneously held he would be subject to impeachment with prior felony convictions if he chose to testify. Thompson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6459, 2011 WL 3585978 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 16 2011).

123. Defendant failed to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) as to evidence of prior convictions that were more than 10 years old because his motion in limine objecting under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) preserved no error, he did not obtain an adverse ruling on the remoteness issue, he did not object at trial, and he opened the door to the evidence by mentioning his criminal history. Nobles v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2605, 2010 WL 1491858 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 14 2010).

124. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant preserved the issue of whether theft convictions were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 when he objected upon their introduction; however, he failed to preserve the issue in relation to an aggravated assault conviction since no objection was made when the evidence was introduced. Roach v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6764 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2007).

125. Defendant's argument that the trial court erred by admitting a prior burglary conviction into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) was rejected because defendant failed to preserve the argument for appellate review, as he did not present his argument to the trial court. Rule 609(b) did not apply because the prior conviction was admitted to show intent, not to impeach defendant's testimony; defendant did not testify. Boone v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4424 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 6 2007).

126. In a case of aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant could not challenge the propriety of the trial court's ruling that the State could impeach him with prior convictions because he did not testify. Hector v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3653 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 2 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

127. Defendant failed to preserve his argument that dismissed offenses under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.45 should not have been used to impeach him because they were not final convictions as required by Tex. R. Evid. 609 because defendant did not make a timely objection thereto as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33. Lopez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4036 (Tex. App. Eastland May 24 2007).

128. In a case involving assault-family violence, an error under Tex. R. Evid. 609 was not preserved for appellate review where defendant did not offer evidence of a prior conviction of a witness, nor did he argue that Tex. R. Evid. 609 violated his constitutional rights. Atkinson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1348 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 22 2007).

129. During defendant's murder trial, the State questioned him about two extraneous offenses and defense counsel did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403, Tex. R. Evid. 404, or Tex. R. Evid. 609 regarding either offense; in accordance with Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant could not raise these issues on appeal. Cotton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5445 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 27 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

130. Defendant waived a complaint under Tex. R. Evid. 609 regarding the admission of prior crimes impeachment evidence because it did not comport with his objection at trial under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Pearson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5690, 2012 WL 2899766 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 17 2012).

131. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), because defendant did not testify during the guilt phase of the trial, he failed to preserve any error regarding the trial court's ruling on his pretrial motion to testify free from impeachment in that phase of the trial. Nkrumah Lamumba Valier v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8947, 2011 WL 5428861 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2011).

132. Defendant failed to preserve a complaint that impeachment with a prior burglary conviction violated Tex. R. Evid. 609 because defendant did not timely object and did not object on the grounds urged appeal, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33; counsel was not ineffective in failing to object because the record was not clear as to whether defendant satisfactorily completed probation or even what type of punishment was actually assessed. Campbell v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1707 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 6 2008).

133. Defendant's objection to the admissibility of a remote conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609 was properly preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33 because defendant's objection was timely and stated the specific ground of objection; under Tex. R. Evid 103 defendant was not required to object to the admission of the evidence at the time that evidence was offered before the jury during cross-examination because the trial court ruled on the objection outside the presence of the jury. Grant v. State, 247 S.W.3d 360, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1135 (Tex. App. Austin 2008).

134. In a case involving an objection to the admission of theft convictions introduced under Tex. R. Evid. 609, although defendant's argument on appeal used the more specific balancing language, it comported with his general remoteness objection before the trial court; therefore, it was subject to appellate review. Roach v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6764 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

135. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the State to introduce testimony about defendant's criminal record during the guilt-innocence phase of his trial because the State was authorized under Tex. R. Evid. 806 to impeach defendant's hearsay testimony; the two witnesses' testimony was hearsay, as they were statements of defendant made out of court to prove that defendant had purchased the laptop from a friend. The Theus factors also weighed in favor of admission, as all of defendant's prior convictions but one involved crimes of moral turpitude or theft, defendant's otherwise remote convictions were followed by additional convictions, and had the jury believed the witnesses' hearsay statements it likely would have acquitted defendant. Schmidt v. State, 373 S.W.3d

856, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5657, 2012 WL 2888213 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 16 2012).

136. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to allow defendant to impeach a confidential informant under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) with his remote prior conviction for misdemeanor forgery because the Theus factors weighed against admission, and therefore defendant did not establish that the probative value of the conviction substantially outweighed the prejudicial effect of the conviction. The court found that: (1) the past crime was not recent and the informant did not show a propensity for running afoul of the law, as he had no intervening convictions after his forgery conviction; (2) the informant was not the only witness who testified regarding the attempted drug transaction and his testimony was corroborated by that of two police officers; and (3) defendant's only witness did not contradict the informant's account of events. Duarte v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 599, 2012 WL 252142 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 26 2012).

137. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to permit defendant to question the victim and the eyewitness about whether they were under the influence of marijuana or alcohol at the time of the offense under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because both testified that they were not drunk or impaired during the robbery and defendant did not present any contradictory evidence. Woodard v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2897, 2009 WL 1124385 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 28 2009).

138. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's prior conviction for forgery pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609 because (1) the crime of forgery involved deception which was a factor that weighed in favor of admissibility; (2) the forgery offense was within the 10-year time limit in the rule and showed defendant's propensity to run afoul of the law; (3) defendant's prior forgery conviction was dissimilar to the aggravated assault offense for which defendant was on trial, which was a factor that favored admissibility; and (4) the State needed the opportunity to impeach defendant's credibility since defendant's credibility was important. Clark v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6498 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 15 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Witnesses

139. Because more than 10 years had passed since a complaining witness's release from confinement and defendant did not point to evidence of any specific facts and circumstances that would merit admitting her convictions, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in deciding not to admit her prior criminal history for impeachment purposes. Kirvin v. State, 394 S.W.3d 550, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3661, 2011 WL 1818420 (Tex. App. Dallas May 13 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

140. Record did not establish harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 and Tex. R. Evid. 103(d) from the trial court's failure to conduct a pretrial hearing to determine the admissibility of impeachment evidence because defendant elected not to testify; the jury, therefore, was not exposed to the allegedly prejudicial evidence; any possible harm flowing from the refusal to conduct a hearing was wholly speculative. Yanez v. State, 187 S.W.3d 724, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1289 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

141. In a felony aggregate theft case, the State's failure to give defendant timely notice of its intent to use his prior convictions to impeach him did not affect his substantial rights; admission was harmless considering the overwhelming evidence, and that defendant was aware that the State planned to impeach him with his prior convictions when he took the stand. Geuder v. State, 142 S.W.3d 372, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

142. Where defendant was charged with unlawful possession of illegal drugs, and the evidence of defendant's prior conviction, introduced by the State, established not only the earlier charges against defendant, but also confirmed on its face that she satisfactorily completed probation, the admission of defendant's prior conviction for impeachment purposes over her objection was harmful error in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 609(c)(2); neither defendant, nor her character witnesses, directly or indirectly presented a false picture that defendant had no prior charges or convictions where the State's case against defendant consisted of circumstantial evidence in attempting to establish her knowledge of the drugs, and the evidence that she had previously been convicted of virtually the same offense for which she was on trial was highly prejudicial. James v. State, 102 S.W.3d 162, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 181 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

143. Even if it was error to admit defendant's assault-family violence misdemeanor conviction in an aggravated robbery trial, the error was harmless because the issue on the charged offense was whether the item defendant brandished was a deadly weapon, and the prior offense did not involve the use of a per se deadly weapon. Meadows v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 289, 2014 WL 84207 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 9 2014).

144. Although the appellate court assumed without deciding that defendant's complaints about the admission of three 1981 convictions were preserved and that the trial court erred in admitting the evidence, the appellate court overruled the issue because it had a fair assurance that the admission of the convictions did not influence the jury or had but a slight effect. Blount v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1648, 2012 WL 662306 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 29 2012).

145. Trial court erred under Tex. R. Evid. 609(c)(2) by admitting evidence of defendant's prior domestic violence conviction; however, the error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt, Tex. R. App. P. 44.2, as the record contained sufficient evidence of guilt of the offense in this case, the jury charge contained a proper limiting instruction regarding the jury's consideration of extraneous offenses, the State spent very little time on the improper evidence and did not delve into its details, and finally, the trial court probated defendant's sentence. Turney v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6419 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 11 2011).

146. Even though the trial court erred by admitting evidence of defendant's three prior drug convictions that occurred 12 years before the instant crime under Tex. R. Evid. 609, the error was harmless because: (1) the State did not emphasize defendant's criminal history during closing arguments; (2) the drug convictions lacked similarity to the instant aggravated assault charge; (3) the trial court instructed the jury that they were only to consider the prior convictions when determining the weight to give defendant's testimony; and (4) there was strong physical evidence supporting defendant's conviction and testimony of three eyewitnesses. Mares v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6844, 2010 WL 3294244 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 19 2010).

147. In defendant's drug case, assuming the trial court abused its discretion by allowing the State to ask a witness questions concerning whether defendant paid for the motel room and questions about defendant's prior convictions, any harm arising from the error was cured when defendant later testified that he paid for the motel room--the very same conclusion implicit in the witness's testimony--and when evidence of defendant's convictions was admitted without objection during his testimony. Davis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 450 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 26 2010).

148. Even if the trial court erred in admitting evidence of appellant's prior convictions in his drug possession trial, the error was harmless because appellant presented no evidence bearing on the question of his guilt or innocence, and the State presented the testimony of the two officers who chased appellant when he fled, and the officer who, when appellant was apprehended, found the small can containing methamphetamine in appellant's back pocket. Greenlee v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3951 (Tex. App. Tyler May 23 2007).

149. Under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), a 17-year-old felony conviction for credit card abuse should not have been admitted in a drug trial to impeach defendant because the prior conviction, with no intervening convictions, happened so long ago that it had little, if any, probative value on the issue of defendant's current credibility. The admission was prejudicial under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because credibility was critical to the defense that defendant did not intentionally or knowingly possess the drugs and because the prosecutor emphasized the prior conviction during closing argument. Battles v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3117 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 20 2006).

150. Under Tex. R. Evid. 609, a 17-year-old felony conviction for credit card abuse should not have been admitted in a drug trial to impeach defendant because the prior conviction, with no intervening convictions, happened so long ago that it had little, if any, probative value on the issue of defendant's current credibility; the admission was prejudicial under Tex. R. App. P. 44 because credibility was critical to the defense that defendant did not intentionally or knowingly possess the drugs and because the prosecutor emphasized the prior conviction during closing argument. Battles v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3117 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 20 2006).

151. Because defendant did not testify, the impact any erroneous impeachment might have had in light of the record as a whole was not affirmatively demonstrated in the appellate record; thus, any possible harm flowing from the trial court's refusal to conduct a pretrial hearing on impeachment by a prior conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609 was wholly speculative. Yanez v. State, 199 S.W.3d 293, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10540 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Substantial Evidence : General Overview

152. Despite an initial misidentification of a driver who fled the scene of a residential burglary, there was sufficient evidence to convict defendant of burglary of a habitation where an officer later positively identified defendant due to a tattoo, an owner stated that he loaned defendant a truck, and the truck was later abandoned with items inside; moreover, the trial court was not permitted to consider the fact that the owner, the first person mistakenly identified, had previous convictions for burglary of a habitation. Britt v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4982 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 8 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Review : Specific Claims : Evidentiary Errors

153. Texas prisoner who was convicted of robbery under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 29.02 was not entitled to habeas relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254 on his claim that the trial court committed reversible error by allowing the prosecutor to question him about a prior felony conviction during the guilt-innocence portion of the proceeding; the prisoner's trial was not rendered fundamentally unfair because the evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Caldwell v. Thaler, 770 F. Supp. 2d 849, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9117 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 31 2011).

Evidence : Hearsay : Credibility of Declarants : Impeachment Evidence

154. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant had previously been convicted of failure to register as a sex offender under Tex. R. Evid. 609 and 806 during his trial on charges of sexual assault and aggravated sexual assault because: (1) the prior crime involved deception since defendant, by failing to register, concealed the address at which he resided; (2) one of the charged offenses occurred only five years after the past crime; (3) the admission of the prior conviction informed the jury that defendant had been determined to be a sex offender so there was some potential for the jury to perceive a pattern of past conduct; and (4) defendant's testimony and credibility were critical to his defense because no other witnesses could dispute the detective's account of his interview of defendant and the meaning of a drawing admitted into evidence. Theragood v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7141, 2011 WL 3848840 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2011).

155. In an intoxication manslaughter case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow evidence that another occupant of defendant's watercraft, who defendant claimed was driving at the time of the accident, had a previous conviction for manslaughter; because there was no evidence regarding the date on which the other occupant was released from confinement, and because his manslaughter conviction was more than 10 years old, the trial judge could properly exclude it under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b). Morris v. State, 214 S.W.3d 159, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 278 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

Evidence : Hearsay : Rule Components

156. Where defendant was convicted of intoxication manslaughter and intoxication assault, the trial court abused its discretion by allowing defendant's prior felony convictions to be introduced to impeach his credibility, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609, where the convictions were improperly admitted as hearsay, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 806, when they were not in fact hearsay as defined by Tex. R. Evid. 801(d). Enriquez v. State, 56 S.W.3d 596, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 5450 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2001).

Evidence : Inferences & Presumptions : Presumptions : Rebuttal of Presumptions

157. Defendant failed to rebut the presumption that his trial counsel's conduct was strategic in not requesting a Theus analysis or jury instruction about the legality of the initial traffic stop. The record was silent regarding these matters and provided no explanation of the motivation behind counsel's actions. Mcchristian v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9256, 2010 WL 4677774 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 18 2010).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Curative Admissibility

158. Defendant opened the door to his prior theft-by-check conviction because he testified that he was not a thief; that left a false impression with the jury, and the State was allowed to correct the false impression. Martinez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8655 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 7 2014).

159. District court did not abuse its discretion in finding that defendant had opened the door to details of his prior convictions when he testified that it was "character assassination" to suggest that he had used a knife on the victim and placed a pillow over her head. Based on that and other testimony, it would not have been outside the zone of reasonable disagreement for the district court to find that defendant was attempting to establish himself as a law-abiding citizen who did not use weapons on people. Marshall v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3553, 2014 WL 1365659 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 3 2014).

160. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the State to impeach defendant because defendant opened the door to the State's questions about the prior assault allegation, as he made the blanket statement on direct examination that he had never been arrested before, that he did not get into trouble, and that the instant case was the first problem he had had, implying that he had never had any interactions with the police before. Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13623, 2013 WL 5948124 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 5 2013).

161. At defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting his misdemeanors during cross-examination. Defendant had volunteered information about his prior criminal record and left a false impression about his misdemeanors by making them sound like traffic tickets instead of convictions for drug possession and unlawful carrying of a weapon. Wash. v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9198 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 25 2013).

162. In a trial for serious bodily injury under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02, a 30-year-old prior assault conviction was properly admitted to impeach defendant's claim not to be a violent person because defendant opened the door for impeachment for purposes of exceptions to both Tex. R. Evid. 609 and Tex. R. Evid. 608. Grant v. State, 247 S.W.3d 360, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1135 (Tex. App. Austin 2008).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

163. Where defendant was charged with unlawful possession of illegal drugs, and the evidence of defendant's prior conviction, introduced by the State, established not only the earlier charges against defendant, but also confirmed on its face that she satisfactorily completed probation, the admission of defendant's prior conviction for impeachment purposes over her objection was harmful error in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 609(c)(2); neither defendant, nor her character witnesses, directly or indirectly presented a false picture that defendant had no prior charges or convictions where the State's case against defendant consisted of circumstantial evidence in attempting to establish her knowledge of the drugs, and the evidence that she had previously been convicted of virtually the same offense for which she was on trial was highly prejudicial. James v. State, 102 S.W.3d 162, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 181 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : General Overview

164. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault, the State gave notice of its intention to use evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant and the trial court admitted the evidence. Because defendant did not object on the ground that the State's notice was untimely, the issue was not preserved for review. Foxworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Weight & Sufficiency

165. Evidence was legally and factually sufficient to support defendant's conviction for harassment of a public servant in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.11(a)(2) where the jury could rationally have believed the police officer truthfully stated that defendant spit directly in his face and could rationally have inferred from defendant's belligerence that he intended to cause his saliva to come into contact with the officer, and where the jury could rationally have rejected the contrary testimony, none of which proved that the incident could not have happened the way the officers testified it did. Moreover, in addition to having a relationship with defendant, defendant's girlfriend had a felony conviction for assault on a public servant and had also previously been arrested for assault with family violence, and the jury could have taken her felony conviction into account in assessing her credibility, and the jury also could have given more weight to the officers' testimony after determining that the girlfriend and a neighbor were not in as good a position to notice defendant if he did spit. Smith v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2287, 2010 WL 1236410 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 31 2010).

166. Sole evidence before the trial court was that a victim was released from prison on the most recent felony offense in 1990 and successfully completed his 10-year parole term; thus, the evidence established that more than 10 years had elapsed since the victim's release from the confinement imposed for his convictions and either the date of the offense or the date of trial; therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion on grounds that the victim's convictions were inadmissible to impeach his credibility as (1) the convictions were too remote in time under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b); and (2) defendant did not present sufficient proof that the nature of the victim's prior felonies (two burglaries and one aggravated assault) were relevant to the facts or credibility of the witness; however, even if the evidence of the victim's prior convictions were introduced and his credibility compromised, sufficient other evidence existed such that reasonable minds could convict defendant. Yanez v. State, 199 S.W.3d 293, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10540 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

167. Defendant convicted of aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child failed to preserve appellate review of his objection to the admissibility of his prior conviction for failure to register as a sex offender as impeachment evidence, because he did not testify and it was impossible to determine whether the probative value of his testimony would have exceeded its prejudicial effect. Marett v. State, 415 S.W.3d 514, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12592, 2013 WL 5583601 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 10 2013).

168. At defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it refused to allow the defense to cross examine a witness regarding his criminal history; more than 10 years had elapsed since his conviction for aggravated assault involving a firearm. Because defendant failed to show that the probative value of the conviction substantially outweighed its prejudicial effect, the evidence of the conviction was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b). Henson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 974, 2013 WL 396015 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 31 2013).

169. Where defendant did not challenge the trial court's ruling that the probative value of evidence of witness's juvenile adjudication of attempted capital murder was substantially outweighed by the danger of undue prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court upheld the trial court's ruling excluding the evidence on that ground. Marsh v. State, 343 S.W.3d 158, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4390 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 10 2011).

170. Under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and 609, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the State to ask defendant about his prior arrests after he opened the door with his testimony or in determining that the probative value of such evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

171. In defendant's assault on a public servant case, the court properly admitted evidence of his prior arrests because the extraneous-arrest evidence was probative of both how well a character witness knew defendant and the foundation for her characterization of him, the trial court gave a limiting instruction, the extraneous arrests took up only four pages in the 564-page record, the question of whether defendant was threatening the officers was directly related to his intent, and the State did not have other evidence with which to rebut the witness's characterization of defendant's character. Morales v. State, 293 S.W.3d 901, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6241 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

172. In defendant's trial for aggravated assault, when the State elicited evidence of defendant's prior conviction for aggravated assault, a proper objection should have been made under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and Tex. R. Evid. 403, not Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the evidence was not elicited from defendant, but from another witness. Moore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6354 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 9 2007).

173. In an aggravated robbery trial, defendant failed to demonstrate that the probative value of the complainant's previous eight misdemeanor prostitution convictions outweighed the prejudicial effect of the excluded evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). The trial court had ruled that the complainant's felony conviction for possession of a controlled substance and her most recent misdemeanor conviction for prostitution were admissible. Hill v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8263 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 6 2005).

174. In a dispute over conservatorship of a child after termination of parental rights, Tex. R. Evid. 609 did not preclude the admission of evidence regarding the grandmother's history of drug convictions because the evidence was not offered for purposes of impeachment, and the grandmother's evidence of improved behavior did not render the admission of her convictions unfairly prejudicial relative to their probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Taylor v. Texas Dept of Protective & Regulatory Servs., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1967 (Mar. 10, 2005).

175. In an assault case, a victim's alleged unreported assaults against defendant were not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because there were no felony convictions or crimes of moral turpitude; moreover, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because, even if the evidence had some bearing on the victim's motivation to fabricate, the danger was high that it would have confused the jury. Mumphrey v. State, 155 S.W.3d 651, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 370 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

176. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court improperly permitted the State to elicit testimony about the details of defendant's prior conviction and his strategy of self-defense as the State's delving into the details of the prior shooting was prejudicial because it forced defendant to defend himself against charges that were not the subject of the present suit, implied that he was a violent man, and suggested that the current offense was in conformity with that character. Further, there was little, if any, probative value gained from the admission of the evidence. Arebalo v. State, 143 S.W.3d 402, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7157 (Tex. App. Austin 2004).

177. In a drug possession trial, the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the admission of evidence that defendant possessed fictitious driver's licenses and credit cards. The error was harmless, however, because the State did not spend much time during the guilt-innocence phase of the trial developing testimony concerning defendant's possession of the fictitious credit cards and driver's licenses. Moreover, the record contained ample evidence supporting defendant's guilt. Owen v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4144 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 6 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

178. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence during sentencing of defendant's nonadjudicated conduct under this rule. Winstead v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8577 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 7 2014).

179. Defendant's counsel was ineffective for opening the door to allow the State to introduce evidence of his prior convictions of sexual assault and sexual assault of a child by asking defendant's ex-girlfriend whether defendant was a violent person and she responded that he was not; therefore, on cross-examination the State was permitted to ask the ex-girlfriend whether she knew that defendant had pleaded guilty to two prior sexual assaults, allowing prejudicial and otherwise inadmissible evidence to be presented before the jury, which could not be considered sound trial strategy. The court held that defendant was prejudiced because the credibility of defendant's testimony was a key component of his defense strategy, given that he claimed he was trying to get away from the victim and had no intention of hurting anyone; although the trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction as to how it could consider the prior convictions, the instruction specifically allowed the jury to consider the convictions for the sole purpose of determining defendant's character for violence. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6365, 2013 WL 2301989 (Tex. App. Eastland May 23 2013).

180. Defendant failed to preserve his objections to the admission of his prior convictions that occurred in 1999 because he specifically objected only to a 1981 conviction, he did not obtain a running objection, and he did not request a hearing outside the jury's presence. Blount v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4534 (Tex. App. Waco June 6 2012).

181. Even if the trial court erred by admitting defendant's 1981 convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609, the error was harmless because the State offered evidence of defendant's lengthy and varied criminal history by questioning him about his prior convictions that occurred in 1999, 2000, 2002, 2004, and 2005. Blount v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4534 (Tex. App. Waco June 6 2012).

182. In defendant's trial on for possession of methamphetamine in the amount of one gram or more but less than four grams under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. §§ 481.102(6) and 481.115(a), the trial court committed reversible error in allowing the State to introduce evidence of defendant's prior drug offense convictions because the convictions occurred more than 10 years earlier and were remote under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) and because the State failed to prove that the probative value of the evidence substantially outweighed its prejudicial effect; further, the error affected defendant's substantial rights. Because the convictions were almost identical to defendant's present charge, a clear danger existed that the improper admission of similar offenses led the jury to convict based on past conduct rather than the facts of the charged offense; in addition, the jury received no limiting instructions regarding the evidence, and rather than instructing the jury on this evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609, the trial court erroneously instructed the jury on prior crimes evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Thus, the jury was never properly instructed on how to use the evidence of defendant's prior convictions. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5517, 2011 WL 2860106 (Tex. App. Dallas July 20 2011).

183. Evidence of prior crimes was not improperly admitted as impeachment evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609 where defendant did not testify. Hernandez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 851, 2010 WL 391850 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 5 2010).

184. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing defendant from cross-examining the complainant under Tex. R. Evid. 609 about her previous false allegations of sexual assault. The evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show the complainant's bias against defendant and her possible motive to testify falsely against him. Hammer v. State, 296 S.W.3d 555, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 513 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

185. Court did not err by not allowing defendant to cross-examine the victim about her prior sexual experience because the evidence that defendant sought to introduce through the declarant relating to the victim's sexual activity with her boyfriend did not relate to the charged sexual contact offenses, but was offered to impeach the victim's credibility relating to her accusation two years later that defendant also sexually assaulted her. The declarant's forensic interview contained inadmissible hearsay and, as the trial court noted, the victim's conduct discussed in that interview was not at all similar to the charged offenses. Fugate v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6266 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18, 2008).

186. In defendant's trial for aggravated assault, when the State elicited evidence of defendant's prior conviction for aggravated assault, a proper objection should have been made under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and Tex. R. Evid. 403, not Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the evidence was not elicited from defendant, but from another witness. Moore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6354 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 9 2007).

187. Defendant failed to preserve his argument that dismissed offenses under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.45 should not have been used to impeach him because they were not final convictions as required by Tex. R. Evid. 609 because defendant did not make a timely objection thereto as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33. Lopez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4036 (Tex. App. Eastland May 24 2007).

188. Evidence of defendant's prior conviction was not offered to attack his credibility pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609, but to rebut his testimony that the complainant's injuries resulted from accidental causes rather than an assault, Tex. R. Evid. 404; because defendant did not demonstrate that the prior conviction was not relevant for that purpose, the complaint that the conviction was more than 10 years old presented nothing for the appellate court's review. Carranza v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10137 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 28 2006).

189. In a murder trial, defendant was properly precluded from inquiring about a witness's juvenile probation because there was not a causal connection between the probation and the allegations against defendant. Patterson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6141 (Tex. App. Dallas July 18 2006).

190. During defendant's murder trial, the State questioned him about two extraneous offenses and defense counsel did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403, Tex. R. Evid. 404, or Tex. R. Evid. 609 regarding either offense; in accordance with Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant could not raise these issues on appeal. Cotton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5445 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 27 2006).

191. In a resisting arrest case, counsel was ineffective where, inter alia, counsel failed to investigate or interview defendant in detail about his criminal history or his prior contacts with the arresting officer; failed to seek discovery from the State; failed to file and obtain rulings on a motion in limine to require the State to raise extraneous matters outside the presence of the jury; failed to prepare defendant to testify; failed to object to evidence of inadmissible extraneous matters during the guilt phase; invited evidence of unadjudicated arrests during the punishment phase; and failed to object to failure of the punishment-phase charge to include a reasonable doubt instruction. Walker v. State, 195 S.W.3d 250, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1381 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

192. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err by allowing defendant's own testimony to be admitted regarding a prior conviction as none of defendant's testimony was false, and the trial court's decision to admit this testimony for impeachment purposes was reasonable. The evidence showed that the prior conviction was well within the 10-year period provided by Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), the instant offense and the prior offense were the same, and defendant's testimony and his credibility as a witness were very important as he and the complainant were the only witnesses. Berry v. State, 179 S.W.3d 175, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8732 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

193. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault, the State gave notice of its intention to use evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant and the trial court admitted the evidence. Because defendant did not object on the ground that the State's notice was untimely, the issue was not preserved for review. Foxworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2005).

194. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense during the guilt/innocence phase without advance notice from the State because the record did not show that advance notice was required under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 609(f) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07. Although defendant's motion asserted that he requested notice from the State, there was no evidence of that request. Arp v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4535 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 15 2005).

195. Defendant alleged the trial court erred in admitting a written confession to a prior charge of sexual assault that had allegedly taken place years before, as this confession was more prejudicial than it was probative. Nevertheless, the remoteness concerns of Tex. R. Evid. 609 did not apply to evidence of extraneous crimes or bad acts introduced at the punishment phase under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a). Green v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9787 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 4 2004).

196. In a drug possession trial, the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the admission of evidence that defendant possessed fictitious driver's licenses and credit cards. The error was harmless, however, because the State did not spend much time during the guilt-innocence phase of the trial developing testimony concerning defendant's possession of the fictitious credit cards and driver's licenses. Moreover, the record contained ample evidence supporting defendant's guilt. Owen v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4144 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 6 2004).

197. Trial court abused its discretion in allowing the State to impeach defendant, who was charged with murder, with his 16-year-old convictions for aggravated rape and a crime against nature because crimes of violence had a higher prejudicial potential than impeachment value, defendant's testimony was critical to his claim of self-defense, the State's ability to use defendant's recent theft convictions to impeach him drastically lessened its need to use the aggravated rape and crime against nature convictions and defendant did not open the door to the admission of these convictions by claiming that he had not been in trouble before. Jackson v. State, 11 S.W.3d 336, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 9471 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 1999).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

198. Because defendant presented no evidence showing the relevance of the witness's prior misdemeanor conviction or the circumstances surrounding his alleged dismissal from the sheriff's department, the trial court did not err by limiting her cross-examination of him. Sheffield v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12789, 2013 WL 5638878 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 15 2013).

199. In a robbery trial, the court did not have to admit evidence of the complainant's prior conviction for misdemeanor assault against defendant's nephew; contrary to defendant's argument, the two-year-old conviction was not relevant to show that the complainant ran from his apartment because he feared a physical confrontation. The court noted that the evidence would properly have been excluded for impeachment purposes because it was not a felony or a crime involving moral turpitude. Allison v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4055 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : General Overview

200. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault and solicitation of a minor, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit evidence showing that the complainant had knowledge of sexual matters before these alleged events occurred because the evidence was hearsay and subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 609 and 613. Landers v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2982, 2011 WL 1496154 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 19 2011).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Rape Shield Laws

201. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of his 12-year-old daughter, evidence that the victim had been previously assaulted by another relative was properly excluded in the punishment phase after the victim described the impact of the assault, including three attempted suicides, in part because the prior assault did not fit into any of the exceptions under Tex. R. Evid. 412; it was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Delapaz v. State, 297 S.W.3d 824, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7510 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 24 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : General Overview

202. Introduction of affidavit by a police investigator that referred to defendant's prior violations of a protective order did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the evidence was not offered to impeach defendant's, or any witness's, credibility. Moreover, defendant failed to preserve his argument for appellate review. Sadarangani v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3198 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 20 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by, modified by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5367 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 21, 2006).

203. Introduction of affidavit by a police investigator that referred to defendant's prior violations of a protective order did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the evidence was not offered to impeach defendant's, or any witness's, credibility. Sadarangani v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3198 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 20 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by, modified by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5367 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 21, 2006).

204. In a dispute over conservatorship of a child after termination of parental rights, Tex. R. Evid. 609 did not preclude the admission of evidence regarding the grandmother's history of drug convictions because the evidence was not offered for purposes of impeachment, and the grandmother's evidence of improved behavior did not render the admission of her convictions unfairly prejudicial relative to their probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Taylor v. Texas Dept of Protective & Regulatory Servs., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1967 (Mar. 10, 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : General Overview

205. Because defendant's trial objection, that evidence was irrelevant and prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, was different from defendant's appeal objection, that evidence was being used to improperly impeach a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 609, defendant waived error. Bedwell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3248 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 13 2006).

206. Because defendant's trial objection, that evidence was irrelevant and prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, was different from defendant's appeal objection, that evidence was being used to improperly impeach a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 609, defendant waived error. Bedwell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3248 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 13 2006).

207. Tex. R. Evid. 608 and Tex. R. Evid. 609 prohibit inquiry by the prosecution into witness' pending criminal charges. Tenny v. Cockrell, 420 F. Supp. 2d 617, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29750 (W.D. Tex. 2004), aff'd 416 F.3d 404, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 13470 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : General Overview

208. No err by admitting the State's exhibit, which was a redacted plea of guilty and judicial confession for giving a false and fictitious name to police, because lying to a police officer involved moral turpitude (dishonesty); defendant did not object to the judicial confession, but only the other plea papers, the jury heard, without objection, that defendant had confessed to committing an offense. Harris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10620, 2012 WL 6674479 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 21 2012).

209. In defendant's sexual assault case, evidence was improperly excluded because it was admissible to impeach the complainant's credibility. The evidence in the records not only addressed the complainant's mental state but directly addressed her inability to separate fantasy from reality; the therapist's notes raised the possibility that the complainant had not been abused by defendant but had created the event in her mind or confused an actual event with fantasy. State v. Moreno, 297 S.W.3d 512, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7642 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

210. Court properly limited cross-examination of a witness because defendant's attempt to use an instance during an officer's career in which he wrote "phantom" warning citations was nothing more than an instance of wrongdoing in his life and was not shown to bear on his general reputation for truthfulness. There was nothing which revealed that the act of wrongdoing created a bias on the part of the officer against defendant or caused the officer to have a motive to testify untruthfully. McMillon v. State, 294 S.W.3d 198, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

211. In a domestic assault case arising in 2004, a trial court did not err by limiting the cross-examination of a victim regarding a pending assault against her from 2006 because there was no showing of bias due to that prosecution since the victim's story regarding the 2004 incident had not changed, and it was corroborated by an officer at the scene; moreover, it was improper to show the victim's bad character for untruthfulness under Tex. R. Evid. 609. McCrory v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4200 (Tex. App. Dallas May 30 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : Specific Instances

212. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to allow him to cross-examine the officer about specific acts of misconduct allegedly showing he was violent and not credible with citizens in the community because no charges were brought against the officer for any of the alleged misconduct and it was not shown that those events were connected to the officer defendant was tried for, namely shooting the officer. Castillo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2034, 2013 WL 781776 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 1 2013).

213. Trial court did not err during defendant's trial for the Class A misdemeanor offense of assault causing bodily injury in excluding evidence of a prior criminal mischief charge against the complainant at a hearing on a motion in limine where defendant's attorney admitted not only that the criminal mischief case against the complainant was "obviously quite old," but also that the case had been dismissed. Sullivan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1394 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2008).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bias, Motive & Prejudice

214. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence about several criminal matters involving the State's witness because there was no deal between the State and the witness that could influence her testimony. There was no evidence to suggest that her decision to testify against defendant was implicated by the State's decision to seek the minimal punishment she received for resisting arrest, and the witness testified that she did not know about a theft charge filed against her until defendant raised the matter at his trial. Dial v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8288, 2012 WL 4511311 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 2 2012).

215. Evidence was properly excluded that a State witness was subject to influence by his arrest for family violence because defendant failed to show the required relationship between the family violence charge and the testimony. The witness testified on voir dire that the prosecutors on the two cases were not the same and that he did not have a deal with the State to give favorable testimony. Turner v. State, 413 S.W.3d 442, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6619 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 9 2012).

216. In a domestic assault case arising in 2004, a trial court did not err by limiting the cross-examination of a victim regarding a pending assault against her from 2006 because there was no showing of bias due to that prosecution since the victim's story regarding the 2004 incident had not changed, and it was corroborated by an officer at the scene; moreover, it was improper to show the victim's bad character for untruthfulness under Tex. R. Evid. 609. McCrory v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4200 (Tex. App. Dallas May 30 2007).

217. An exception applies to Tex. R. Evid. 609 when a witness makes statements concerning his criminal past which created a false impression with the jury as to the extent of either his prior (1) arrests, (2) convictions, (3) charges or (4) "trouble" with the police. Anaya v. State, 988 S.W.2d 823, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 988 (Tex. App. Amarillo 1999).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : General Overview

218. Defendant opened the door to his prior theft-by-check conviction because he testified that he was not a thief; that left a false impression with the jury, and the State was allowed to correct the false impression. Martinez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8655 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 7 2014).

219. It was proper not to admit a complainant's indictment for impeachment purposes because only evidence of the conviction itself is admissible under this rule to impeach a witness; the details of the conviction are generally inadmissible for the purpose of impeachment. Pena v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6487 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2014).

220. At defendant's trial for aggravated assault on a public servant and evading arrest with a motor vehicle, the trial court's refusal to guarantee that he could testify free from impeachment of prior convictions did not deprive him of his rights to due process and to present a complete defense as he did not have a constitutional right to testify free from impeachment. Since defendant never testified and was never impeached, a conclusion of harmful error was speculative. Aguilar v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10897 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 28 2013).

221. Because defendant presented no evidence that the victim's prior conviction involved deception, he did not show that his trial counsel erred in the objection he offered to the trial court regarding impeachment. Charles v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10545 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 22 2013).

222. Appellant claimed the trial court erred in not permitting him to impeach the victim with her juvenile criminal convictions, but in light of counsel's statement that he would not inquire about the conviction, the court agreed that appellant waived the issue. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7721 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

223. Even if a court erred during defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child in admitting evidence of his prior DWI conviction pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), the error was harmless because the State's questioning of defendant about the prior DWI conviction comprised less than two full pages of the reporter's record, which contained nine volumes of testimony. Pearson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6467, 2012 WL 3765000 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 7 2012).

224. Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) did not apply, as the specific instance of misconduct at issue was not that of the witness, but of appellant, the person for whose reputation he vouched. Ethridge v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3110, 2012 WL 1379648 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 18 2012).

225. Tex. R. Evid. 609 governs attempts to prove actual convictions of the witness testifying at the time, and not specific instances of conduct of the defendant asked as have you heard questions to rebut an attempt to bolster the defendant's character through a third-party witness. Ethridge v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3110, 2012 WL 1379648 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 18 2012).

226. Victim referred to herself as a "bitch/whore" on her MySpace page, and this statement did not fall within any of the exceptions listed in Tex. R. Evid. 412(b); the admission was not necessary to rebut or explain evidence, the statement did not concern the history between the victim and appellant, the statement did not go to the issue of consent, the statement was not constitutionally required to be admitted, and the statement was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because it did not concern anything about the victim being convicted of a crime, and as the court did not see how the statement was necessary to show bias or motive, the trial court's decision to exclude the statement was not outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Dale v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3127, 2012 WL 1382446 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 18 2012).

227. In an assault case, defendant testified he was on parole and had been to prison numerous times; the jury could discredit his testimony that he did not strike the victim, because it was impeached by his prior convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). King v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1910, 2012 WL 745424 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 8 2012).

228. Trial court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to evidence that defendant was on parole at the time of trial for a prior felony conviction; in eliciting the testimony, the State sought to show that defendant was biased as a witness and had a motive to testify falsely to avoid being convicted for a parole violation. Mcgough v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 776, 2012 WL 273885 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 31 2012).

229. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), because defendant did not testify during the guilt phase of the trial, he failed to preserve any error regarding the trial court's ruling on his pretrial motion to testify free from impeachment in that phase of the trial. Nkrumah Lamumba Valier v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8947, 2011 WL 5428861 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2011).

230. Tex. R. Evid. 609 was not mentioned at trial as a basis for excluding evidence, and this ground was not preserved for review. Nichols v. State, 349 S.W.3d 612, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7253 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 6 2011).

231. Court was to presume that the test under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) was performed, and to the extent that appellant suggested the trial court erred in failing to inform the parties that it undertook the test, he was mistaken. Chitwood v. State, 350 S.W.3d 746, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7301 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 6 2011).

232. Even assuming counsel was deficient for failing to adequately impeach, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609, 613, two witnesses, appellant did not show that counsel's alleged deficiency so compromised the proper functioning of the process. Garcia v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4663, 2011 WL 2463049 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 16 2011).

233. Because appellant failed to object to the reliability of an expert's methodology by requesting a hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 609, plus appellant did not object to the admissibility of the testimony when it was proffered, appellant did not preserve the issue for appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Jones v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7357, 2010 WL 3448010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 31 2010).

234. Cross-examiner must still show the relevance of the vulnerable status or other alleged source of bias to the witness's testimony and it is not enough to say that all witnesses who may, coincidentally, be on probation, have pending charges, be in the country illegally, or have some other vulnerable status are automatically subject to cross-examination with that status regardless of its lack of relevance to the testimony of that witness; thus, to the extent that Maxwell v. State, 48 S.W.3d 196 (Tex. Crim. App. 2001), is inconsistent with Carpenter v. State, 979 S.W.2d 633 (Tex. Crim. App. 1998), the court overrules it. Irby v. State, 327 S.W.3d 138, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 725 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

235. Probationary status, pending charges, unadjudicated crimes, or other bad acts may be admissible to show motive or bias if the proponent makes a logical connection between the base fact and the witness's testimony; otherwise, it is irrelevant. Irby v. State, 327 S.W.3d 138, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 725 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

236. Texas has an important interest in protecting the anonymity of juvenile offenders and under Tex. R. Evid. 609(d), Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 51.13(b), that anonymity is explicitly protected, and to hold that any juvenile who happens to be on probation at the time that he also is the victim of a crime or a witness in a criminal proceeding automatically loses that privacy protection is not required by the constitution or by common sense; Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974), is not a blunderbuss that decimates all other evidentiary statutes, rules, and relevance requirements in matters of witness impeachment, and it is a rapier that targets only a specific mode of impeachment--bias and motive--when the cross-examiner can show a logical connection between the evidence suggesting bias or motive and the witness's testimony. The court therefore rejects the absolutist position that a probationer, particularly a probationer whose guilt has not yet been adjudicated, is always in a vulnerable relationship with the State and that mere status is always automatically relevant to show a witness's possible bias and motive to testify favorably for the State as inconsistent with Texas and United States Supreme Court precedent. Irby v. State, 327 S.W.3d 138, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 725 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

237. Any evidence showing that the juvenile victim had a motive to make up this story was relevant and admissible for impeachment purposes, but the court agreed with the trial court and court of appeals that appellant failed to make a logical connection between the victim's testimony concerning his sexual encounters with appellant and his entirely separate probationary status, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding this impeachment evidence because it was irrelevant. Irby v. State, 327 S.W.3d 138, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 725 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : Admissibility

238. In a prosecution of defendant for aggravated sexual assault of a child less than 14 years old, the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the probative value of admitting evidence that defendant was previously convicted of indecent exposure outweighed its prejudicial effect. Therefore, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence of the prior conviction pursuant to this rule. Smith v. State, 439 S.W.3d 451, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7108 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 30 2014).

239. Court did not err by admitting only the judgment and sentence against a witness and not allowing defendant to question him on the details of a theft conviction because the jury heard testimony to rebut the witness's testimony that the theft conviction "was a business deal gone bad," and defendant did not show how the additional information was necessary to correct any false impression. Smith v. State, 436 S.W.3d 353, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5717 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 29 2014).

240. District court did not abuse its discretion in finding that defendant had opened the door to details of his prior convictions when he testified that it was "character assassination" to suggest that he had used a knife on the victim and placed a pillow over her head. Based on that and other testimony, it would not have been outside the zone of reasonable disagreement for the district court to find that defendant was attempting to establish himself as a law-abiding citizen who did not use weapons on people. Marshall v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3553, 2014 WL 1365659 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 3 2014).

241. Record did not establish that trial court would have excluded defendant's prior conviction of aggravated assault if requested to weigh the Theus factors because it was a crime of violence, defendant was convicted only three years before committing the present offense, there was no risk of the jury convicting defendant of aggravated sexual assault of a child based on any pattern of committing the same or similar offense and defendant was the only witness who directly refuted the State's evidence. Medrano v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 241, 2014 WL 259819 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 9 2014).

242. Failing to register as a sex offender bears on the defendant's character for truthfulness, as to register, a defendant has to disclose statutorily required information. Vasquez v. State, 417 S.W.3d 728, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14137, 2013 WL 6070495 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 19 2013).

243. By failing to register, defendant concealed information to the public, and thus this factor favored admission. Vasquez v. State, 417 S.W.3d 728, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14137, 2013 WL 6070495 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 19 2013).

244. Defendant was convicted of failing to comply as a sex offender in 2001 and 2005, and the trial in this case took place in 2012, such that the relative recency of the 2005 favored admission. Vasquez v. State, 417 S.W.3d 728, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14137, 2013 WL 6070495 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 19 2013).

245. Because the crimes at issue were identical, this factor favored admission. Vasquez v. State, 417 S.W.3d 728, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14137, 2013 WL 6070495 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 19 2013).

246. Defendant was the sole witness in his defense and thus his credibility was an important issue in the case, and thus factors four and five favored admission. Vasquez v. State, 417 S.W.3d 728, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14137, 2013 WL 6070495 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 19 2013).

247. Had counsel objected, it would not have been an abuse of discretion for the trial court to have ruled that defendant's 2005 conviction of failing to register as a sex offender was admissible. Vasquez v. State, 417 S.W.3d 728, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14137, 2013 WL 6070495 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 19 2013).

248. Prior conviction was admissible for impeachment purposes, and the same evidence was also admissible as substantive evidence rebutting defendant's theory of defense, as he testified that he was unaware that he was required to register, and the State would have been able to rebut his theory with evidence of his prior convictions for the same offense. Vasquez v. State, 417 S.W.3d 728, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14137, 2013 WL 6070495 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 19 2013).

249. At defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation, the trial court was not required to give an instruction in the jury charge limiting the use of defendant's prior convictions for impeachment purposes only because defendant never requested a limiting instruction at the time the evidence was introduced. Reyes v. State, 422 S.W.3d 18, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13573, 2013 WL 5872738 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 31 2013).

250. Defendant convicted of aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child failed to preserve appellate review of his objection to the admissibility of his prior conviction for failure to register as a sex offender as impeachment evidence, because he did not testify and it was impossible to determine whether the probative value of his testimony would have exceeded its prejudicial effect. Marett v. State, 415 S.W.3d 514, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12592, 2013 WL 5583601 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 10 2013).

251. Trial court did not err in refusing defendant's request to offer impeachment evidence during cross-examination of a police detective regarding the criminal history of one of the State's witnesses because the detective's answer to the prosecutor's question did not suggest that the witness's 2008 arrest was his first, or that the witness was a law abiding citizen, and the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the detective's testimony did not open the door to cross-examination about the witness's entire criminal history. Randle v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12325, 2013 WL 5522003 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 3 2013).

252. At defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting his misdemeanors during cross-examination. Defendant had volunteered information about his prior criminal record and left a false impression about his misdemeanors by making them sound like traffic tickets instead of convictions for drug possession and unlawful carrying of a weapon. Wash. v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9198 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 25 2013).

253. There was no abuse of discretion in a trial court's keeping defendant from cross-examining one of the State's witnesses about the circumstances of the crime that resulted in her being placed on community supervision because while defendant was permitted to establish that the witness had been convicted of a felony offense, he could not inquire as to the circumstances surrounding the offense. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in precluding defendant from pursuing inadmissible evidence. Griffith v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8942 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 19 2013).

254. Appellant was released from prison for a murder conviction in 2008, and therefore his prior conviction fell well within the 10-year range. Wise v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8446 (Tex. App. Eastland July 11 2013).

255. Appellant's testimony left the false impression that a person passed away, when in fact appellant had murdered him, and evidence of the conviction removed that false impression and was relevant to the determination of appellant's insanity defense and his credibility; thus, the probative value of the evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect and the evidence was admissible. Wise v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8446 (Tex. App. Eastland July 11 2013).

256. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the prosecuting attorney to impeach defendant with a prior conviction for failing to identify by giving false or fictitious information where the record reflected that, when cross-examined, defendant admitted to having the prior conviction. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in allowing examination regarding the conviction because he explained on re-direct that he was simply slow in providing his identification, but defendant's explanation did not change the nature of his conviction. Mozeke v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7986, 2013 WL 3326828 (Tex. App. Dallas June 27 2013).

257. Court did not err in prohibiting defendant from cross-examining two State witnesses regarding criminal charges that were pending against them when they testified; defendant failed to show how identifying their pending charges would have tended to show that their testimony might be biased in an unrelated prosecution of defendant for murder. Johnson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4467 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

258. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of appellant's two prior felony convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because there was no similarity between convictions for possession of a controlled substance and aggravated sexual assault of a child, and because the State had an escalated need to impeach appellant's credibility as he was the only witness capable of denying the allegations of sexual assault. Mireles v. State, 413 S.W.3d 98, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3730 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 27 2013).

259. Appellant claimed the trial court erred in admitting evidence of extraneous offenses, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), but by testifying on direct that none of the allegations against him were true and that he was not investigated or convicted of prostitution, being a terrorist, or theft, other than a certain conviction, appellant created a false impression abut his criminal history, and thus under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), the State was entitled to impeach appellant with the complained-of evidence. Rowshan v. State, 445 S.W.3d 294, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2987, 2013 WL 1164404 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 21 2013).

260. Once appellant took the stand, he was subject to the same rules as other witnesses, the record did not show that appellant was forced to testify, and his claim that he would not have been exposed to the State's cross-examination but for counsel's deficiencies was unsupported, given that (1) he made the ultimate decision to testify, and (2) when he took the stand, he opened the door to impeachment by prior convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609; the court could not say that it was counsel's deficiencies that exposed appellant to cross-examination concerning his prior convictions, and the court did not find an abuse of discretion on the trial court's part in denying his motion for a new trial. Sincere v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2341 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 7 2013).

261. Prior convictions were four felony convictions involving crimes of moral turpitude, and appellant testified he was still on parole, even thought he conviction dates were over 10 years ago; as the record was silent as to appellant's release, the court assumed the trial court found the time limit of Rule 609 satisfied, and the probative value of the evidence outweighed the prejudice, and thus his prior convictions were admissible for impeachment purposes. Sincere v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2341 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 7 2013).

262. Court erred by admitting defendant's prior felony conviction for possession of MDMA because it was for possession of cocaine, which had little impeachment value, and it happened 9 years before the instant case. However, the error was harmless because defendant admitted to knowingly possessing steroids for personal use and MDMA with the intent to deliver it. Flores v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1809 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 26 2013).

263. Trial court could have found that appellant's volunteered statement that he did not do things "like that" and that he was a professional truck driver gave the jury the impression that, because of potential consequences to his livelihood, he would not have left the scene of an accident, and with his claims of law-abiding behavior, he opened the door to later cross-examination, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609, concerning his three misdemeanor convictions for failing to comply with the duty to stop and provide information after hitting or damaging an unattended vehicle under Tex. Transp. Code Ann. § 550.024. Jenkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1432, 2013 WL 530973 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 13 2013).

264. Court agreed that the prosecutor's follow-up questions were not maneuvering or prompting for an assertion that could be used as an avenue for impeachment, and the prosecutor did not exceed the scope of the invitation to clarify appellant's volunteered statement, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609. Jenkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1432, 2013 WL 530973 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 13 2013).

265. Defendant's forgery conviction was a felony conviction admissible for impeachment purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), and he conceded the admissibility of his four prior convictions for burglary of a vehicle; therefore trial counsel was not ineffective for introducing those convictions to the jury in an effort to appear open. Rahe v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1025, 2013 WL 440557 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 5 2013).

266. Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence concerning the officer's prior drug arrest because, at no time during direct examination did the officer make any statements concerning his past conduct that suggested he had never been arrested, charged, or convicted of any offense nor did he create a false impression of law abiding behavior. Sheppard v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10638, 2012 WL 6698963 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 21 2012).

267. No err by admitting the State's exhibit, which was a redacted plea of guilty and judicial confession for giving a false and fictitious name to police, because lying to a police officer involved moral turpitude (dishonesty); defendant did not object to the judicial confession, but only the other plea papers, the jury heard, without objection, that defendant had confessed to committing an offense. Harris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10620, 2012 WL 6674479 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 21 2012).

268. Given the impression appellant gave the jury, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the State to impeach his testimony by asking him questions concerning having tested positive for methamphetamine and by calling a certain rebuttal witness. Blaylock v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9086 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 1 2012).

269. In defendant's indecent exposure case, trial court was within its discretion in admitting defendant's 2005 conviction for failure to register as a sex offender because defendant contradicted the only other witness called to the stand with direct knowledge of the incident -- the complainant; those circumstances heightened the State's need to impeach defendant's credibility. The State did not go into any detail about the underlying crime, and the trial court instructed the jury not to consider the evidence for purposes other than impeachment. Tristan v. State, 393 S.W.3d 806, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8895, 2012 WL 5285673 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 25 2012).

270. Appellant failed to meet his burden of proof as to ineffective assistance of counsel, given that (1) there was not testimony from counsel concerning his strategy, (2) had a limiting instruction been given, it would have kept the jury from considering previous offenses for non-credibility issues, but the lack of a statement from counsel lessened the effectiveness of the State's theory in this regard, (3) while an error affecting a single aspect of a trial might undermine the entire result, it was not clear that was what happened here, (4) counsel filed relevant motions and examined witnesses, and (5) appellant did not show that counsel's failure to permit or obtain a limiting instruction rendered his representation ineffective. Simmons v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7178, 2012 WL 3629864 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 22 2012).

271. Even if appellant met the first prong of the ineffective assistance test, appellant did not show the absence of a limiting instruction affected the trial's outcome, given that (1) the key to the trial was witness credibility, (2) the jury still could have considered appellant's prior offenses to impeach his credibility, even had a limiting instruction been given, (3) the absence of the instruction permitted the jury to consider those offenses for any purpose, but the court did not see how that changed the outcome in any harmful way, and (4) the prior offenses did not show character conformity, and thus the absence of the limiting instruction did not have a discernible effect on the trial's outcome. Simmons v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7178, 2012 WL 3629864 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 22 2012).

272. With regard to defendant's 2003 felony theft conviction, all of the Theus factors favored admission of this conviction for impeachment purposes, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of his 2003 conviction. Horton v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1973, 2014 WL 689732 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 20 2014).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : Inadmissibility

273. Court acted within its discretion by excluding the victim's remote felony drug convictions, because most of the previous convictions were over twenty-five years old and an intervening gap of approximately twenty years occurred between the four earliest convictions and the three latest convictions, and the information that defendant sought to introduce pertaining to the victim's remote drug convictions was cumulative of information presented to the jury. Jones-Jackson v. State, 443 S.W.3d 400, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9249 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 21 2014).

274. Court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's contention that the State had opened the door to making the victim's remote drug convictions admissible, because neither the prosecutor's questioning nor the victim's answers conveyed that the two convictions were the only offenses committed by the victim since they did not speak to offenses committed prior to 2003. Jones-Jackson v. State, 443 S.W.3d 400, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9249 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 21 2014).

275. Counsel's failure to investigate the criminal background of a child sexual assault victim's mother did not render his performance deficient; the evidence of the mother's theft conviction would likely have been inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) due to the fact that it occurred more than 10 years before the start of defendant's trial. Sonnier v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8987 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 14 2014).

276. Court did not err by prohibiting defense counsel from asking a witness about his earlier convictions because the witness responded truthfully and responsively, and in accordance with the parties' prior agreement, to the State's questioning regarding his prior criminal history; the witness followed the court's explicit instructions to answer questions only about the three specified prior convictions. Turner v. State, 443 S.W.3d 328, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8641 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 7 2014).

277. Record did not show that defendant objected in the trial court that evidence should not have been admitted because the convictions were too remote, and instead she raised this argument for the first time on appeal;

because defendant's trial court objection did not comport with her argument on appeal, nothing was preserved for review. Harris v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5282 (Tex. App. Waco May 15 2014).

278. There was no indication that the trial court understood defendant's general objection to constitute a challenge to the remoteness of her convictions, and thus her objection was not apparent from context, and nothing was preserved for review. Harris v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5282 (Tex. App. Waco May 15 2014).

279. Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence of the witness's prior theft convictions because the convictions occurred twenty-one and nineteen years prior to trial and the witness's credibility was not critical. Enriquez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2898, 2014 WL 1010174 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 13 2014).

280. Because defendant presented no evidence showing the relevance of the witness's prior misdemeanor conviction or the circumstances surrounding his alleged dismissal from the sheriff's department, the trial court did not err by limiting her cross-examination of him. Sheffield v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12789, 2013 WL 5638878 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 15 2013).

281. Trial court erred under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) in admitting defendant's prior conviction for DUI during his trial for murder; the record suggested that the DUI conviction was not a felony offense and DUI was not a crime involving moral turpitude. Leyba v. State, 416 S.W.3d 563, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10067, 2013 WL 4070770 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 13 2013).

282. Assuming without deciding that appellant was released when paroled, nothing showed the date of this, and thus he could not show that the prior conviction was prima facie inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Garcia v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2868, 2013 WL 1149288 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 20 2013).

283. Appellant claimed counsel was deficient for bringing up prior convictions on direct examination, because had counsel waited, the State would have been limited under Tex. R. Evid. 609 to routine impeachment evidence, but absent an explanation in the record regarding counsel's reasons for inquiring about the prior convictions on direct examination, the court presumed that counsel exercised reasonable judgment. Garcia v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2868, 2013 WL 1149288 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 20 2013).

284. At defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it refused to allow the defense to cross examine a witness regarding his criminal history; more than 10 years had elapsed since his conviction for aggravated assault involving a firearm. Because defendant failed to show that the probative value of the conviction substantially outweighed its prejudicial effect, the evidence of the conviction was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b). Henson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 974, 2013 WL 396015 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 31 2013).

285. Because defendant's two prior felony convictions were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609, but defense counsel opened the door for the State to cross-examine defendant's about those convictions by questioning defendant about his convictions, defense counsel was ineffective under U.S. Const. amend. VI; Tex. Const. art. I, § 10. Vasquez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8496, 2012 WL 4826966 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 11 2012).

286. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence about several criminal matters involving the State's witness because there was no deal between the State and the witness that could influence her testimony. There was no evidence to suggest that her decision to testify against defendant was implicated by the State's decision to seek the minimal punishment she received for resisting arrest, and the witness testified that she did not know about a theft charge filed against her until defendant raised the matter at his trial. Dial

v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8288, 2012 WL 4511311 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 2 2012).

287. Denying defendant the right to impeach a witness at his trial for the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle with a remote and successfully completed deferred adjudication probation did not deny defendant his right of confrontation, because the witness's testimony did not create a false impression and he was not convicted of any offense to allow for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). Parker v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7992, 2012 WL 4121133 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 20 2012).

288. Appellant had the burden to establish that the trial court abused its discretion and thus he had to show that the probative value of the evidence did not substantially outweigh its prejudicial effect, but he did not attempt to do so, and thus it did not matter whether or not the conviction fell outside the 10-year window, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(b). Chitwood v. State, 350 S.W.3d 746, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7301 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 6 2011).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : General Overview

289. Defendant never testified and thus the court did not need to address the merits of his claim that the trial court erred in denying his motion to testify without being subject to impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). Jones v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3926, 2010 WL 2089659 (Tex. App. Dallas May 26 2010).

290. Reliance on Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) was misplaced because defendant did not claim that the witness he sought to impeach had been convicted of any crime arising out of the alleged conduct of using a fictitious name to receive government benefits. Hernandez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3012, 2010 WL 1632627 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 23 2010).

291. In defendant's drug case, assuming the trial court abused its discretion by allowing the State to ask a witness questions concerning whether defendant paid for the motel room and questions about defendant's prior convictions, any harm arising from the error was cured when defendant later testified that he paid for the motel room--the very same conclusion implicit in the witness's testimony--and when evidence of defendant's convictions was admitted without objection during his testimony. Davis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 450 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 26 2010).

292. Defendant did not object to impeachment testimony for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609 or the prosecutor's argument regarding that evidence, such that he did not preserve these complaints for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Hudson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8108, 2009 WL 3347466 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 20 2009).

293. Even if the court assumed that defendant's counsel might have successfully objected under Tex. R. Evid. 609(c), the court did not have a record of counsel's reasons for not having done so, plus the challenged conduct was not of such a nature that the court could find that no competent attorney would have engaged in it; counsel might have decided not to emphasize the testimony by objecting before the jury and due to the lack of evidence reflecting counsel's reasons, the court could not find counsel's performance deficient. Hudson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8108, 2009 WL 3347466 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 20 2009).

294. In a case in which defendant was convicted of murder, defendant did not prove by a preponderance of the evidence that his trial counsel's representation was deficient where, although he claimed that trial counsel did not call witnesses who would have supported his contention that his cousin killed the victim, it could not be said that counsel was ineffective for failing to attempt to introduce evidence that was inadmissible because: (1) neither the witnesses nor the proffered testimony attacked the cousin's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, nor did their testimony establish he had been convicted of a crime within the parameters of Tex. R. Evid. 609; and (2) as to testimony by defendant's grandmother and uncle about what the cousin's father told them, that evidence was clearly hearsay, and defendant did not demonstrate on the record any exception that would have permitted the admission of those statements. Moreover, defendant did not establish that, but for his counsel's failure to call the witnesses, there was a reasonable probability the result of the proceeding would have been different because there were three eyewitnesses to the murder, one of whom had no relationship to anyone other than the victim, and therefore no motive to lie, and his testimony was corroborated by the other two eyewitnesses. Aquino v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7391, 2009 WL 3030749 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 23 2009).

295. Although the State was correct in that a witness could be cross-examined on any matter relevant to any issue in the case, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 611(b), defendant's possession of cocaine was a specific act and was inadmissible for the purpose of impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and the trial court erred by admitting this evidence; at the time of trial, defendant had not been convicted of any crime arising out of his possession of cocaine, and therefore Tex. R. Evid. 609 did not apply. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

296. In defendant's assault on a public servant case, the court properly admitted evidence of his prior arrests because the extraneous-arrest evidence was probative of both how well a character witness knew defendant and the foundation for her characterization of him, the trial court gave a limiting instruction, the extraneous arrests took up only four pages in the 564-page record, the question of whether defendant was threatening the officers was directly related to his intent, and the State did not have other evidence with which to rebut the witness's characterization of defendant's character. Morales v. State, 293 S.W.3d 901, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6241 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

297. In a case involving possession of heroin, a trial court did not err by overruling objections made to prior felony convictions from 1978 and 1988 because prior convictions introduced during the punishment phase of a trial were not subject to the remoteness limitation in Tex. R. Evid. 609(b). Therefore, defendant's sentence was properly enhanced, and a sentence of 16 years and 7 months was proper. Eisenmenger v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2009 WL 988658 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 14 2009).

298. Defendant's only objection was on the basis of relevance, plus he failed to object to certain questions and testimony on recross-examination, such that defendant, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A), failed to preserve error on his claim that the State improperly impeached defendant's witness under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a), (b), 609(f). Scott v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 131, 2009 WL 51035 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 8 2009).

299. In a civil case adopted daughters brought against their adoptive father and mother for damages related to sexual abuse, the father and mother argued that the trial court should not have admitted evidence of the father's conviction, but the court did not address this argument because error has not been properly preserved for review, given that (1) the trial court's ruling on their motion in limine did not preserve the error for review, (2) the mother and father's failure to object on the record, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103(a), and obtain an adverse ruling waived the error, and (3) although they moved for a mistrial, because there was no timely objection made on the record and no request for the jury to disregard, error was not preserved for appeal; when the father and mother objected to the use of the conviction to impeach the father's testimony, it had already been admitted into evidence without objection, and because they failed to pursue an adverse ruling after evidence of the conviction was initially admitted, they waived any complaint regarding the admission of the evidence and preserved nothing for appellate review. K.H. v. Doe, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8636 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 18 2008).

300. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609, defendant contended that trial counsel provided ineffective assistance by having her admit to her deferred-adjudication probation at the guilt/innocence stage of trial, but the State claimed that counsel's actions might have been in support of an application for probation; however, the court was left to speculate given that there was no record indicating counsel's reasoning and the court was not able to determine whether defendant prove ineffective assistance. Ramos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6942 (Tex. App. El Paso

301. In a trial for child sexual assault, evidence of a 1982 drug conviction was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because probative force of the evidence relating to the prior conviction substantially outweighed its prejudicial effect. Sirois v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 24 2008).

302. In an aggravated robbery case, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence of the victim's prior convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609, because the victim testified that she was uncertain of whether she was convicted of domestic assault, there was no documentary evidence, and two other convictions to which she admitted were too remote. Medley v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2460 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 3 2008).

303. Defendant failed to preserve error regarding his pretrial motion to testify free from impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because he did not testify at trial. Long v. State, 245 S.W.3d 563, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7896 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

304. Defendant's argument that the trial court erred by admitting a prior burglary conviction into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) was rejected because defendant failed to preserve the argument for appellate review, as he did not present his argument to the trial court. Rule 609(b) did not apply because the prior conviction was admitted to show intent, not to impeach defendant's testimony; defendant did not testify. Boone v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4424 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 6 2007).

305. Although defendant argued that the trial court abused its discretion when it refused to allow defendant to testify free from impeachment with prior convictions, the court did not need to address the point because defendant never testified, and thus error was not preserved. Clark v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1676 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 6 2007).

306. In an indecency with a child case, a court properly restricted defendant's cross-examination of the victim's mother regarding benefits from a crime victims' compensation fund intended to show that she sought financial gain as a consequence of the incident because the proffered evidence was only marginally probative on the issue of bias or motive, and the mother was effectively impeached because she was incarcerated at the time of trial serving a sentence for forgery and had given custody of her children to a relative. Hoover v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1549 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 27 2007).

307. In a case involving assault-family violence, an error under Tex. R. Evid. 609 was not preserved for appellate review where defendant did not offer evidence of a prior conviction of a witness, nor did he argue that Tex. R. Evid. 609 violated his constitutional rights. Atkinson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1348 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 22 2007).

308. State conceded that the impeachment value of defendant's conviction under a Michigan assault law was less than had the crime been one of deception and that the similarity between the assault and the current charge of robbery under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 29.02 weighed in defendant's favor, but defendant conceded that the importance of defendant's testimony was crucial to the case, and defendant did not testify; the court found no abuse of discretion in the trial court's overruling defendant's motion to testify free from impeachment by prior conviction. Herrera v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 910 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 7 2007).

309. Because the conduct underlying defendant's public lewdness conviction, deviate sexual intercourse, violated accepted social behavior and offended society at large, public lewdness, as defined by the Texas Penal Code, constituted a crime of moral turpitude and could be used to impeach defendant's credibility. Escobedo v. State, 202

310. During voir dire in defendant's trial for possession of methamphetamine enhanced by two prior felonies, the court abused its discretion by prohibiting defense counsel from asking a potential juror if he would automatically disbelieve a convicted felon; counsel's question was a proper commitment question; under the rules of evidence, a juror has a right to disbelieve a convicted felon. Tijerina v. State, 202 S.W.3d 299, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6073 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

311. Because defendant did not testify, and nothing showed that the decision not to testify was motivated by the trial court's preliminary ruling, defendant waived any complaint about the trial court's in limine rulings regarding the use of defendant's prior probated felony conviction for impeachment purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 609; because defendant did not testify, the prior conviction was never offered, and thus any possible harm from the rulings would have been speculative. Leal v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4088 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 11 2006).

312. In defendant's drug case, the court properly admitted his prior conviction for possession of drugs for impeachment purposes where the prior offense occurred six years earlier, the fact that defendant's probation for the prior conviction was revoked because he failed a urinanalysis demonstrated that defendant had a propensity for running afoul of the law, and defendant's credibility was a critical issue in that his testimony at trial differed greatly from the officer's testimony at trial. Miller v. State, 196 S.W.3d 256, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3818 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

313. In a case of aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant could not challenge the propriety of the trial court's ruling that the State could impeach him with prior convictions because he did not testify. Hector v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3653 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 2 2006).

314. Even if a witness's testimony that the victim was "very nice" could have been considered a false impression regarding the victim's criminal history, the witness's testimony did not invoke exceptions to Tex. R. Evid. 609, and the trial court did not err in excluding evidence regarding the victim's criminal history. Reyes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3649 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 27 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4160 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 16, 2006).

315. Court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, given that (1) trial counsel presented the most viable defense available concerning misidentification and by impeaching credibility, (2) the jury was free to believe the State's identification of defendant as the seller of the drugs in question, (3) it was reasonable trial strategy for defendant not to have testified because at least one of defendant's prior felony convictions would have been used by the State under Tex. R. Evid. 609 to impeach defendant's testimony, and (4) the court was not free to speculate as to the reasons for and possible harm from the various acts alleged; the court noted that defendant was free to file a petition for discretionary review under Tex. R. App. P. 66 raising error by the court in a direct appeal. Barnes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3702 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 26 2006).

316. Because the victim's prior conviction was not a felony, the court had to determine, under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), whether the conviction for violating a protective order was a crime of moral turpitude and if so, if the probative value of the evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect. Rincon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2758 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 5 2006).

317. Trial court did not err in refusing to allow defendant to impeach the victim under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a); the record was unclear as to the underlying act to support the victim's conviction of violation of a protective order, and thus defendant failed to establish the proper predicate under Tex. R. Evid. 609, and defendant also failed to meet the burden under the rule because defendant did not argue at trial how the probative value of the victim's conviction outweighed its prejudicial effect. Rincon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2758 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 5 2006).

318. While the trial court's ruling accurately reflected the general limits placed on impeachment, the court found that defendant's wife, the victim, opened the door to impeachment evidence concerning her earlier plea in a domestic violence case because her testimony left a false impression concerning her past criminal history, and thus, the trial court's reliance on the general rule concerning remote evidence was misplaced in this case, and the trial court abused its discretion; the wife's denial was directly relevant to the offense charged of family violence and the defense raised to that charge, and the State was free to offer extrinsic evidence rebutting her statement. Winegarner v. State, 188 S.W.3d 379, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2163 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

319. It is clear that forgery and debit card abuse are crimes involving deception, for purposes of impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609, and these offenses go to one's truthfulness and credibility. Denman v. State, 193 S.W.3d 129, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2003 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

320. Delivery of cocaine is not a crime of violence, but that is not to say that drug trafficking holds no impeachment value for purposes of impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609; while the court declined to decide whether the delivery of drugs is a crime of moral turpitude, it found that it certainly implicates one's credibility and candor on the witness stand. Denman v. State, 193 S.W.3d 129, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2003 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

321. Court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on the claim that counsel admitted into evidence defendant's prior felony convictions, because the trial court would have admitted the convictions under the test for determining under Tex. R. Evid. 609 whether a prior conviction's probative value outweighed its prejudicial effect; all factors favored admissibility regarding defendant's conviction of debit card abuse and forgery, and four out of five factors favored admissibility regarding defendant's conviction of delivery of cocaine. Denman v. State, 193 S.W.3d 129, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2003 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

322. In defendant's murder case, a court abused its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's prior voluntary manslaughter conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because voluntary manslaughter was an offense involving violence, and did not involve deception, the prior offense and the charged offense were similar, defendant's testimony was critical to his claim of self-defense, and the State also had impeachment evidence of a prior conviction of forgery, which was a crime involving deception and moral turpitude and was better suited for impeachment purposes. High v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 877 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 2 2006).

323. In an aggravated robbery trial, defendant failed to demonstrate that the probative value of the complainant's previous eight misdemeanor prostitution convictions outweighed the prejudicial effect of the excluded evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). The trial court had ruled that the complainant's felony conviction for possession of a controlled substance and her most recent misdemeanor conviction for prostitution were admissible. Hill v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8263 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 6 2005).

324. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), the State was entitled to cross-examine defendant on his prior arrests and convictions for impeachment purposes because he opened the door to his criminal history when he gave misleading responses to his counsel's inquiry into his problems with the law in that he implied that his criminal history consisted only of minor traffic offenses and a justifiable assault on an animal control officer. The trial court could have reasonably concluded that defendant left a false impression with the jury with respect to the extent of his trouble with the law. Martinez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7748 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 22 2005).

325. In connection with defendant's trial for indecency with a child, because defense counsel's questions to defendant's mother inquired about his character for moral and safe relations with small children and young girls, not his general character, the State's questions related to defendant's prior robbery conviction were not relevant for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) and were not proper impeachment questions. However, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because evidence of the robbery conviction was properly admitted later during defendant's testimony and on cross-examination, it did not appear that defendant was forced to take the stand to explain the robbery conviction, and once defendant took the stand, the State could have impeached defendant's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) by introducing evidence of the robbery conviction. Reeders v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7682 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 14 2005).

326. Trial court erred in admitting the 1989 drug conviction into evidence because the appellate court could not find facts or circumstances suggesting that the probative value of the prior conviction substantially outweighed its prejudicial effect, nor could the appellate court conclude that it was "within the zone of reasonableness" to find that the importance of impeaching defendant substantially outweighed the prejudicial effect of the evidence, however, the erroneous admission of the 1989 conviction was harmless, because considering the nature of the evidence supporting the verdict, the two brief references to the 1989 conviction could not have caused more than a slight influence on the jury in light of the other, more prejudicial evidence against defendant. Hankins v. State, 180 S.W.3d 177, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6465 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

327. Trial court did not err in permitting the State to impeach, under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), defendant's testimony with felony convictions that were over 10 years old for credit card abuse under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 32.31 and burglary; defendant acknowledged more recent convictions of theft, a crime of moral turpitude, and thus there was evidence of a lack of reformation, which made the inquiry under Rule 609(a) proper, and the older convictions were crimes of deception and the factors weighed in favor of admission for impeachment purposes. LaHood v. State, 171 S.W.3d 613, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6258 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

328. Defendant did not object to the lack of notice or adequacy of notice, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), Tex. R. Evid. 609(f), Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 38.37, § 3, and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g), when the evidence in question was offered, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1); thus, defendant did not preserve this aspect of defendant's first issue for appellate review. Bronaugh v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4455 (Tex. App. Waco June 8 2005).

329. Trial court did not err in permitting the State to cross-examine defendant regarding a prior conviction for misdemeanor assault on defendant's wife because the conviction was a crime of moral turpitude under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a); although certain factors favored admission and others favored exclusion, because the admission fell within the zone of reasonable disagreement, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence, and even if there was error, it was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the admission of the prior conviction had at most only a slight influence on the jury's verdict, given the overwhelming evidence of defendant's guilt of the current crime of murder under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02(b). Mendez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3521 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 10 2005).

330. Mere age of a grandmother's convictions did not render the convictions unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting the state family department to impeach the grandmother with her inconsistent prior testimony, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609, claiming that she had successfully completed probation; the grandmother's involvement with drugs and her criminal convictions were relevant to several of the factors used to evaluate the best interests of the child pursuant to Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 103.002, and requiring the grandmother to read prior testimony line-by-line was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1 in the face of other evidence regarding the child's best interests. Taylor v. Tex. Dep't of Protective & Regulatory Servs., 160 S.W.3d 641, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1793 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

331. Tex. R. Evid. 609 is not a categorical limitation on the introduction of convictions for any purpose; rather, it applies only to convictions offered for purposes of impeachment. Taylor v. Tex. Dep't of Protective & Regulatory Servs., 160 S.W.3d 641, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1793 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

332. Court denied the State of Texas's motion for rehearing after overturning defendant's conviction on the ground that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because there was no sound trial strategy by defense counsel for failing to object to evidence of defendant's prior arrests for unadjudicated offenses. Defendant did not create a false impression pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) by any of his testimony on direct examination or by any volunteered statement on cross-examination. Hall v. State, 161 S.W.3d 142, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1742 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

333. When a defendant voluntarily testifies as to his prior criminal record without any prompting or maneuvering on the part of the State's attorney and in so doing he leaves a false impression with the jury, the State is allowed to correct that false impression by introducing evidence of the defendant's prior criminal record. Hall v. State, 161 S.W.3d 142, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1742 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

334. In an assault case, a victim's alleged unreported assaults against defendant were not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because there were no felony convictions or crimes of moral turpitude; moreover, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because, even if the evidence had some bearing on the victim's motivation to fabricate, the danger was high that it would have confused the jury. Mumphrey v. State, 155 S.W.3d 651, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 370 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

335. In an indecency with a child by contact case, the trial court did not improperly grant the State's motion in limine and required defense counsel to approach the bench before asking the victim whether she had ever lied to a police officer or school officer as whether the child victim had ever been in trouble for marijuana possession was the type of evidence which was not allowed by the evidentiary rules. Dinsmore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11624 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 23 2004).

336. Trial court did not err by denying defendant the right to impeach a witness, from whom defendant had borrowed a truck used in a robbery and murder, with a felony conviction from Mexico under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) because defendant never offered any documents or testimony establishing the existence of a felony conviction, nor did he request a continuance to obtain proof. Sierra v. State, 157 S.W.3d 52, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11374 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

337. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of a prior conviction of defendant's under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) in connection with defendant's trial for aggravated assault in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02(b)(2); the trial court analyzed the admissibility of the prior conviction in light of the relevant factors and thus there was no abuse of discretion. Brown v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9479 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 28 2004).

338. Where defendant plead guilty to forgery and was sentenced to 19 years incarceration, the trial court had not acted improperly in considering convictions more than 10 years old to enhance his punishment where Tex. Pen. Code Ann. § 12.42 (Vernon 2003) did not impose a time limit on the use of prior convictions for the purpose of enhancing a defendant's punishment and counsel was not ineffective for having failed to object to the use of the prior convictions for enhancement purposes. Austin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8114 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 2 2004).

339. Defendant's convictions were reversed and remanded because defendant received ineffective assistance of counsel when trial counsel introduced two prior convictions to the jury that were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609, there was no sound trial strategy for introducing the prior convictions to the jury, and it was reasonable to conclude that trial counsel's error undermined confidence in the outcome; defendant's trial counsel introduced both convictions to the jury, despite the fact that more than 10-years had elapsed since the date of each conviction, trial counsel admitted rendering ineffective assistance in representing defendant, and acknowledged that he should have objected to the admission of evidence regarding the prior convictions and that he should have moved to suppress defendant's oral statements to the police investigator regarding the convictions. Elliott v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7710 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 26 2004).

340. Defendant's conviction for robbery was proper where, although the questioning and testimony regarding defendant's juvenile record was clearly inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(d), the evidence indicated that allowing the testimony was part of his counsel's sound trial strategy. Bufford v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7801 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 26 2004).

341. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court improperly permitted the State to elicit testimony about the details of defendant's prior conviction and his strategy of self-defense as the State's delving into the details of the prior shooting was prejudicial because it forced defendant to defend himself against charges that were not the subject of the present suit, implied that he was a violent man, and suggested that the current offense was in conformity with that character. Further, there was little, if any, probative value gained from the admission of the evidence. Arebalo v. State, 143 S.W.3d 402, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7157 (Tex. App. Austin 2004).

342. Borrower's bank fraud conviction was admissible because his credibility as a witness was at issue in his action against a holder of a note; the borrower alleged that the holder charged him usurious interest based upon a conversation he had regarding a demand letter, thus placing his credibility squarely at issue. Oyster Creek Fin. Corp. v. Richwood Invs. II, Inc., 176 S.W.3d 307, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7269 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

343. Trial court's decision to admit defendant's records of prior theft convictions was not an abuse of discretion because the State was free to introduce evidence of the convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609, as defendant's prior theft convictions involved moral turpitude, and although defendant admitted to the prior convictions, she opened the door to further exposure when she maintained she did not commit the thefts. Ramirez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5977 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2004).

344. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in considering a NCIC report to determine whether defendant's prior conviction was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609, and although the prior conviction and the charged offense were not similar, defendant's testimony and his credibility were both important to the case, and from the record it was apparent that the trial court engaged in the balancing test required under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) and properly allowed the impeachment testimony. Gay v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5448 (Tex. App. Dallas June 18 2004).

345. Habeas corpus petitioner, who was convicted of capital murder, failed to establish that trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by refusing to object to the State's impeachment by use of three misdemeanor convictions, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), because substantial impeachment evidence had already been admitted and the petitioner had opened the door to the use of his misdemeanor convictions. Morrow v. Dretke, 99 Fed. Appx. 505, 2004 U.S. App. LEXIS 10009 (5th Cir. Tex. 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 543 U.S. 944, 125 S. Ct. 359, 160 L. Ed. 2d 257, 2004 U.S. LEXIS 6989, 73 U.S.L.W. 3246 (2004).

346. In a felony aggregate theft case, the State's failure to give defendant timely notice of its intent to use his prior convictions to impeach him did not affect his substantial rights; admission was harmless considering the overwhelming evidence, and that defendant was aware that the State planned to impeach him with his prior convictions when he took the stand. Geuder v. State, 142 S.W.3d 372, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

347. Issue on appeal concerned whether the trial court erred in allowing into evidence defendant's prior juvenile delinquency adjudications; the State argued that evidence of an assault and reckless injury to an elderly individual was admissible to correct the false impression left by defendant's direct testimony that he had never been in a violent altercation before this incident. The appellate court held he did not open the door by having left a false impression because the question concerned his relationship with others involved in this altercation. Carter v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3073 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 6, 2004).

348. Convictions for sexual assault and forgery more than 10 years old were subject to the standard of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) and were not automatically unusable to impeach even though they were more than 10 years old, because the witness had a subsequent conviction for indecent exposure that was considered a crime of moral turpitude that vitiated the remoteness of the two other convictions. Woodall v. State, 77 S.W.3d 388, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3087 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

349. Whether or not to admit remote convictions is within the trial courts' discretion and depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. Woodall v. State, 77 S.W.3d 388, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3087 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

350. Under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), where more than 10 years have elapsed, a prior conviction will not be remote where the witness' lack of reformation is shown by evidence of an intervening conviction for a felony or a misdemeanor crime of moral turpitude. Woodall v. State, 77 S.W.3d 388, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3087 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

351. Evidence of lack of reformation of witnesses by subsequent felony and certain misdemeanor convictions can cause prior convictions to fall outside the general rule of Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), and make them not subject to the objection of remoteness. Woodall v. State, 77 S.W.3d 388, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3087 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

352. Moral turpitude is defined as including acts that are base, vile, or depraved. Woodall v. State, 77 S.W.3d 388, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3087 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

353. Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) is not applicable to impeach a complainant's conviction where she was discharged from probation less than 10 years before defendant's trial. Craig v. State, 82 S.W.3d 451, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 2542 (Tex. App. Austin 2002).

354. Contention of defendant upon being convicted of felony theft, that the trial court erred in allowing the State to impeach him with proof of prior convictions when he had not been given notice pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(f), could not be entered on appeal, because defendant failed to object when the prosecutor inquired into his prior convictions and, thus, he failed to preserve error as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Geuder v. State, 76 S.W.3d 133, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 2312 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2002), vacated by 115 S.W.3d 11, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 305 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003).

355. An exception applies to Tex. R. Evid. 609 when a witness makes statements concerning his criminal past which created a false impression with the jury as to the extent of either his prior (1) arrests, (2) convictions, (3) charges or (4) "trouble" with the police. Anaya v. State, 988 S.W.2d 823, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 988 (Tex. App. Amarillo 1999).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : Admissibility

356. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the State to introduce testimony about defendant's criminal record during the guilt-innocence phase of his trial because the State was authorized under Tex. R. Evid. 806 to impeach defendant's hearsay testimony; the two witnesses' testimony was hearsay, as they were statements of defendant made out of court to prove that defendant had purchased the laptop from a friend. The Theus factors also weighed in favor of admission, as all of defendant's prior convictions but one involved crimes of moral turpitude or theft, defendant's otherwise remote convictions were followed by additional convictions, and had the jury believed the witnesses' hearsay statements it likely would have acquitted defendant. Schmidt v. State, 373 S.W.3d 856, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5657, 2012 WL 2888213 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 16 2012).

357. It was possible that counsel employed a strategy to introduce testimony of appellant's prior convictions to lessen the impact, given the State's notice of its intent to impeach appellant and the trial court's ruling that denied appellant's motions in limine on the subject; given the silent record, appellant did not rebut the presumption of reasonable representation. Miles v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4929, 2012 WL 2356478 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 21 2012).

358. Record was silent as to the reasons behind trial counsel's strategy for not obtaining a ruling on the motion to permit defendant to testify free from impeachment by prior criminal convictions; defendant did not meet his burden of demonstrating that his counsel was deficient. West v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3612, 2012 WL 1606239 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 8 2012).

359. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, although evidence of appellant's prior convictions might have had a tenancy to suggest an outcome on a basis that was improper based on the convictions' prejudicial nature, that was true of all evidence of appellant's prior convictions; Tex. R. Evid. 609 explicitly provides for impeachment with prior convictions for felonies and crimes of moral turpitude, the court presumed that the jury following the instruction to consider the prior convictions only for purposes of impeachment, nothing showed these instructions were disregarded, and the trial court did try to mitigate any improper influence. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

360. Appellant claimed that evidence was unnecessarily cumulative as the State could have used only certain convictions and not others; however, Tex. R. Evid. 609 places no restriction on the number of previous convictions that may be used to impeach a witness's credibility, and arguably, the number of previous convictions corresponds to the level of impeachment of the witness's credibility: the more previous convictions, the greater the impeachment. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

361. Counsel objected to evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and counsel said he was not objecting under Tex. R. Evid. 609; thus, appellant did not preserve for review his Rule 609 issue, the case law factors that guided the balancing test under Rule 609 were not applicable, and the court only considered the Tex. R. Evid. 403 issue based on the factors that had to be considered in a Rule 403 balancing test. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

362. Appellant's convictions for possession of a controlled substance were felony offense convictions, and a misdemeanor family violence assault conviction was a crime of moral turpitude, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), plus burglary of a motor vehicle was a crime of deception; the trial court could have found, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, that these convictions were probative of credibility of appellant. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

363. Driver had been convicted in 2003 of theft, a crime that involved moral turpitude, and evading arrest, but the issue of the driver's use of ordinary care concerning a 2009 car accident and his possible dishonesty concerning what vehicle he saw pass him were not similar to the 2003 offenses, and this case was not a "he said, she said" type of case; the trial court performed a balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), and the court found no abuse of discretion by the trial court in its action of finding the evidence more prejudicial than probative and in excluding this evidence. Cortez v. Wyche, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3565, 2012 WL 1555909 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 3 2012).

364. Given that appellant would have been trying to impeach the informant with evidence of a prior conviction of a felony, appellant had the burden to show that a conviction existed and meet other requirements under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Moffett v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3242 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 25 2012).

365. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's prior burglary convictions into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) because: (1) burglary had been found to be a crime of deception; (2) although the record did not establish what year the first two convictions occurred, the third burglary conviction occurred on August 20, 2008; and (3) defendant's testimony and credibility were of significance, as his entire defense that he was an innocent bystander to the robbery depended on his testimony. Medina v. State, 367 S.W.3d 470, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2932, 2012 WL 1293035 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 17 2012).

366. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's prior unauthorized use of a motor vehicle conviction during his robbery trial because: (1) the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle had been found to be a crime of deception; (2) although the prior conviction was several years old, it was not too remote to be considered and demonstrated a propensity for running afoul of the law; and (3) defendant's testimony and the credibility of that testimony were of significance, as his entire defense that he was an innocent bystander to the robbery depended on his testimony. Medina v. State, 367 S.W.3d 470, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2932, 2012 WL 1293035 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 17 2012).

367. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's prior robbery conviction during his robbery trial because: (1) although the conviction was several years old, it was not remote and demonstrated a propensity for running afoul of the law; and (2) defendant's testimony and credibility were of enormous significance, as his entire defense that he was an innocent bystander to the robbery depended on his testimony. Medina v. State, 367 S.W.3d 470, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2932, 2012 WL 1293035 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 17 2012).

368. In an inmate's personal injury suit against the county, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence exhibits reflecting his prior felony convictions for robbery under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the inmate's credibility was at issue and he had been released from confinement for the robbery convictions less than ten years before the trial in the personal injury case. Howard v. Tarrant County, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2063, 2012 WL 858590 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 15 2012).

369. Trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the State's use defendant's prior convictions for impeachment purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the convictions were listed in the county jail book-in, book-out record that defendant introduced into evidence while acting as his own counsel, and therefore he opened the door to an inquiry by the State. Matlock v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1120, 2012 WL 426613 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 8 2012).

370. Defendant failed to prove that defense counsel was ineffective during a trial for robbery by eliciting testimony about his prior theft case, because the trial court would have acted within its discretion to admit the prior conviction for purposes of impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Theft was a crime of moral turpitude involving elements of deception; therefore, it had a high impeachment value and it fell within the ten-year restriction of Tex. R. Evid. 609. Huerta v. State, 359 S.W.3d 887, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 852, 2012 WL 311677 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 2 2012).

371. In a case in which defendant was convicted of two counts of theft less than $ 1,500, the trial court had not abused its discretion in permitting the State to impeach defendant with nine prior convictions pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) where: (1) defendant's five prior convictions for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, two prior theft convictions, and one prior burglary of a motor vehicle conviction all had strong impeachment value because they were crimes that involved deception; (2) although only one of defendant's prior convictions was relatively recent, the number of prior convictions demonstrated his propensity for lawlessness; and (3) defendant was the only witness in his defense, and because of his testimony, the State needed the opportunity to impeach his credibility. Parker v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9612, 2011 WL 6091248 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 7 2011).

372. Appellant had the burden to show that a witness had been convicted of a felony or a crime involving moral turpitude, either through her or by establishing the convictions by public record, under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). Woodard v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8836, 2011 WL 5319907 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 3 2011).

373. Appellant objected to the exclusion of the misdemeanor convictions on the grounds that they were crimes of moral turpitude, and he did not object on Confrontation Clause grounds, and thus that argument was waived. Woodard v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8836, 2011 WL 5319907 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 3 2011).

374. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of the witness's 1997 conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the witness's 2010 felony conviction for possession of a controlled substance removed the taint of remoteness from the witness's 1997 conviction and, inter alia, the State had a need to impeach the witness's credibility in order to rehabilitate the officers' credibility. Nelson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8512, 2011 WL 5116467 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 27 2011).

375. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of defendant's prior convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the convictions were felonies or crimes of moral turpitude for which defendant was convicted within the last 10 years, and he did not identify what the prejudicial effect of his prior convictions was or how it outweighed their probative value. Than v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8515, 2011 WL 5116469 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 27 2011).

376. Defendant did not show that counsel rendered ineffective assistance of counsel when he did not object to the admission of his prior convictions used for impeachment where trial counsel was not ineffective for not making a meritless objection and he failed to show that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different. Matlock v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8496, 2011 WL 5115877 (Tex. App. Tyler Oct. 26 2011).

377. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant had previously been convicted of failure to register as a sex offender under Tex. R. Evid. 609 and 806 during his trial on charges of sexual assault and aggravated sexual assault because: (1) the prior crime involved deception since defendant, by failing to register, concealed the address at which he resided; (2) one of the charged offenses occurred only five years after the past crime; (3) the admission of the prior conviction informed the jury that defendant had been determined to be a sex offender so there was some potential for the jury to perceive a pattern of past conduct; and (4) defendant's testimony and credibility were critical to his defense because no other witnesses could dispute the detective's account of his interview of defendant and the meaning of a drawing admitted into evidence. Theragood v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7141, 2011 WL 3848840 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2011).

378. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by failing to rule--in advance of defendant's taking the stand--that defendant would be allowed to testify free from impeachment with his prior felony conviction; defendant conceded that his testimony was important and his credibility was likewise important. Byrd v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6994, 2011 WL 3925565 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 24 2011).

379. Witnesses' prior convictions did not render their testimony inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) where defense counsel was not prevented from impeaching their credibility with the convictions. Reyna v. State, 2011 Tex.

App. LEXIS 6062, 2011 WL 3366383 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 4 2011).

380. Defendant's prior offense was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because it was a felony; for forgery, which was a crime of deception and of relatively high impeachment value; approximately five years had passed since the offense; the previous conviction and the current case were not similar; and the credibility of defendant's testimony was critical to his current case. Phelps v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4983, 2011 WL 2582810 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 29 2011).

381. Appellant's prior convictions were for theft, which was a crime of deception, and thus this weighed in favor of admission of appellant's convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). Hayes v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2987, 2011 WL 1581409 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 21 2011).

382. Appellant's theft convictions in 2001 and 2007 were recent, and his criminal record showed that he has a propensity for, and a history of, running afoul of the law, such that this favored admission of appellant's prior convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). Hayes v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2987, 2011 WL 1581409 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 21 2011).

383. Appellant's prior convictions were for theft and the present offense was robbery, and although theft was necessarily included in the alleged elements of the greater offense of robbery, the indictment alleged "in the course of committing theft," and thus the robbery offense required an additional element of bodily injury or the threat of imminent bodily injury or death; for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), this factor was neutral and weighed neither in favor of nor against admission of appellant's prior convictions. Hayes v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2987, 2011 WL 1581409 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 21 2011).

384. Appellant's testimony and his credibility were important because his theory pitted his testimony and the lack of certain evidence against the complainant's testimony; this weighed in favor of admission of appellant's prior convictions. Hayes v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2987, 2011 WL 1581409 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 21 2011).

385. Damage to a witness's credibility that appellant wanted, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), was inflicted by the witness's own testimony, and jail records were cumulative on the issue of whether she had been jailed; the trial court did not err in excluding jail records and the custodian's testimony for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Calvin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3091, 2011 WL 1562138 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 21 2011).

386. Even if the court found that purported discrepancy in the number of jailings of a witness made evidence non-cumulative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and justified admitting the records evidence to impeach the witness under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), its exclusion was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because there was no showing that appellant's constitutional rights were denied, and the exclusion of the records did not influence the jury or had more than a slight effect. Calvin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3091, 2011 WL 1562138 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 21 2011).

387. Even if trial counsel's failure to raise a more specific objection under Tex. R. Evid. 609 was deficient performance, defendant did not establish that but for trial counsel's failure to raise such an objection, the result of the proceeding would have been different; given the overwhelming evidence supporting defendant's guilt, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for new trial. Hargrove v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2517 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 6 2011).

388. Although defendant's refusal of a breath or blood test was properly admitted pursuant to Tex. Transp. Code Ann. § 724.061, an instruction that the jury could consider the refusal as evidence was an improper comment on the weight of evidence in violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. §§ 36.14, 38.04, 38.05. The trial court's error was harmless because there was other substantial evidence that defendant had been driving while intoxicated, and under Tex. R. Evid. 609, two prior convictions negatively impacted his claim that he was not intoxicated. Huckabay v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1918, 2011 WL 915083 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 16 2011).

389. Texas prisoner who was convicted of robbery under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 29.02 was not entitled to habeas relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254 on his claim that the trial court committed reversible error by allowing the prosecutor to question him about a prior felony conviction during the guilt-innocence portion of the proceeding; the prisoner's trial was not rendered fundamentally unfair because the evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Caldwell v. Thaler, 770 F. Supp. 2d 849, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9117 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 31 2011).

390. Because misdemeanor assault of a spouse was a crime of moral turpitude and less than 10 years have elapsed since appellant's conviction, such evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) and counsel was not required to object. Zamora v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10246, 2010 WL 5541706 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 30 2010).

391. In a case where defendant was convicted of two counts of aggravated sexual assault, based on the trial strategy of arguing that the sex was consensual, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the evidence of extraneous offenses during the State's case and in eliciting testimony from defendant regarding previous convictions for burglary of a habitation under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 30.02, delivery of a simulated drug under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 482.002, failure to identify to a police officer, and assaults causing bodily injury upon female victims because that evidence would have been brought out during cross-examination of defendant. Douglas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9086, 2010 WL 4638778 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 17 2010).

392. Even though the trial court erred by admitting evidence of defendant's three prior drug convictions that occurred 12 years before the instant crime under Tex. R. Evid. 609, the error was harmless because: (1) the State did not emphasize defendant's criminal history during closing arguments; (2) the drug convictions lacked similarity to the instant aggravated assault charge; (3) the trial court instructed the jury that they were only to consider the prior convictions when determining the weight to give defendant's testimony; and (4) there was strong physical evidence supporting defendant's conviction and testimony of three eyewitnesses. Mares v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6844, 2010 WL 3294244 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 19 2010).

393. Appellant failed to establish ineffective assistance of counsel based on his trial counsel's questioning of appellant about prior convictions for possession of a controlled substance and for theft because the State would not have been precluded from introducing the convictions into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609 as, inter alia, the theft conviction involved a crime of moral turpitude and the past crimes were recently committed. Scope v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6824, 2010 WL 3220627 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 12 2010).

394. It was proper for the trial court to exclude evidence because under Tex. R. Evid. 608, a witness's credibility could not be attacked by offering extrinsic evidence concerning specific prior instances of conduct, other than a conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609, which was not applicable, and thus there was no abuse of discretion. Gonzales v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4783, 2010 WL 2543908 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 24 2010).

395. More than 10 years had elapsed from the date of each of the State's witness's prior criminal convictions and it was reasonable for the trial court to find that more than 10 years had also elapsed from the date of the witness's release from the confinements that had been imposed; therefore, those convictions, if admissible, were admissible only under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b). Walker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4766, 2010 WL 2533774 (Tex. App.

Beaumont June 23 2010).

396. Even if the court found that the trial court erred in excluding the prior convictions of a State's witness under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), appellant did not show harm for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); a deputy's testimony in appellant's felony driving while intoxicated trial was consistent with the witness's account of what he saw, plus appellant admitted that he had been driving and he stipulated that his intoxilyzer test showed a blood alcohol level of 0.123. Walker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4766, 2010 WL 2533774 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 23 2010).

397. Appellant claimed that the trial court did not conduct the required balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), but a record of such a test was not necessary, as the court could presume that the trial court conducted the test. Walker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4766, 2010 WL 2533774 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 23 2010).

398. Trial court's refusal to allow the evidence of the State's witness's prior criminal convictions implied that the trial court rejected the interest of justice exception in Tex. R. Evid. 609(b). Walker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4766, 2010 WL 2533774 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 23 2010).

399. Other than the fact that the State's witness's burglary convictions were crimes of moral turpitude, appellant did not show that the convictions would be probative regarding the witness's testimony about what he had seen in an incident involving an intoxicated driver, plus there was strong evidence from other witnesses that corroborated the witness's account; given the remoteness of the witness's prior convictions and the corroborating evidence in this felony driving while intoxicated case, appellant failed to show that the probative value of admitting the convictions substantially outweighed the prejudicial effect of doing so under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), and the trial court did not abuse its discretion. Walker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4766, 2010 WL 2533774 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 23 2010).

400. Although evidence of a witness's prior convictions was admissible for impeachment purposes, the fact that he had prior convictions did not render his testimony inherently unreliable and legally insufficient to support defendant's conviction for aggravated assault; the trial court could have considered the convictions and still found the witness's testimony credible, and given that a reasonable trier of fact could have found that defendant assaulted the victim with a deadly weapon, the evidence was legally sufficient to support defendant's conviction. Keyo Kershun Kingsley v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2309, 2010 WL 1241310 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 25 2010).

401. Court had no record explaining counsel's thought processes and trial strategy in not objecting under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) to the admission of testimony about defendant's father's prior convictions, and it was defendant's burden to overcome the presumption that the challenged action might have been considered sound strategy; because the record did not show deficient performance, defendant failed to meet the first prong of the test for ineffective assistance. Victor v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2060, 2010 WL 1077292 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 24 2010).

402. Court properly allowed impeachment of defendant with the offense of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle and the life sentence imposed for that conviction because evidence was presented that defendant was convicted of the offense of delivery of cocaine in 2005 and burglary of a building with intent to commit theft in 1992. Those two intervening felonies removed the taint of remoteness from the 1982 conviction; the State's need to impeach defendant's credibility was great because his testimony contradicted much of the police officers's testimony. Thomas v. State, 312 S.W.3d 732, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8056 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 15 2009).

403. Defense made no objection as to two felonies, the State offered evidence of these convictions, and defendant did not object or raise a Tex. R. Evid. 403 complaint; thus, he had not preserved that complaint for appellate review, and to the extent that his remoteness objection encompassed these two felonies, they were less than 10 years old and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609. John v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4853, 2009 WL 1815650 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 25 2009).

404. Trial court's ruling implicitly suggested a probative/prejudicial determination and defendant's 1999 and 2003 felony convictions were sufficient to insulate 1993 offenses from a remoteness objection; applying the proper test, the could held that the evidence of defendant's 1993 convictions was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609. John v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4853, 2009 WL 1815650 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 25 2009).

405. Defendant admitted that he had been previously convicted of criminal conduct, including two felony convictions for which he had served two years' imprisonment; the court noted that one could impeach witness credibility with evidence of a conviction for felony or crime of moral turpitude under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). Walker v. State, 291 S.W.3d 114, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4863 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 23 2009).

406. In a felony assault case, the court properly allowed use of defendant's prior unauthorized use of a motor vehicle convictions for impeachment because they were crimes involving deception, the evidence showed a lack of reformation, and defendant's testimony and credibility were not as critical as they would have been if he had been the only defense witness. Gore v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4518, 2009 WL 1688196 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 18 2009).

407. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court properly admitted evidence of defendant's prior convictions for aggravated assault and possession of cocaine because the State was limited to asking about the date and nature of the convictions, the trial court instructed the jury to consider only the convictions for the purpose of weighing defendant's credibility, thereby reducing any prejudicial effect, and the credibility of the complainants and defendant were critical issues. Voss v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4200, 2009 WL 1635208 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 11 2009).

408. Of the five factors, only one weighed against admissibility; thus, the court could not find that the trial court's ruling that a prior sexual assault conviction was admissible was outside the zone of reasonable disagreement so as to have been a clear abuse of discretion. Gonzalez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 879, 2009 WL 311448 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 10 2009).

409. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), sexual assault of a child is not a crime that would ordinarily bear heavily against a witness's veracity; in this case, the first factor, impeachment value, weighs against admissibility because assault is not a crime of deception. Gonzalez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 879, 2009 WL 311448 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 10 2009).

410. Texas Court of Criminal Appeals has stated only that the impeachment value of crimes involving deception was higher than crimes that involve violence; it did not hold that the impeachment value of offenses involving moral turpitude was greater than that of a violent crime. Gonzalez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 879, 2009 WL 311448 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 10 2009).

411. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), defendant committed the charged offense less than a year after completing his two-year prison term for the prior conviction and he showed a propensity for running afoul of the law, and thus this factor weighed in favor of admission of a prior conviction. Gonzalez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 879, 2009 WL 311448 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 10 2009).

412. For purposes of admissibility of a prior conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), the third factor, similarity between the past crimes and current offense, weighed slightly in favor of admission; although both the past and current crimes involve sexual offenses, the prior offense involved a female closer to defendant's age at the time, and conversely, this case involved defendant's 10-year-old daughter; the factual differences in the offenses would have created little danger that the jury would misuse the information to convict defendant based on a past pattern of behavior rather than the facts of the charged offense. Gonzalez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 879, 2009 WL 311448 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 10 2009).

413. For purposes of admissibility of a prior conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), the fourth and fifth factors, the importance of the defendant's testimony and his credibility, favored admissibility; defendant claimed he did not commit the offenses and his daughter fabricated the allegations against him because she was angry at him, and under these circumstances, his credibility was a crucial factor in the case for aggravated sexual assault and the State's need to impeach his testimony was great. Gonzalez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 879, 2009 WL 311448 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 10 2009).

414. In a kidnapping case, defendant's 1992 convictions for burglary and robbery were properly admitted for impeachment purposes because the offenses of burglary and robbery were deceptive in nature, and because the prior offenses were relatively dissimilar to the instant charge, there was a reduced tendency on the part of the jury to associate those offenses with a propensity to commit the instant offense. Furthermore, because defendant was the only defense witness who could testify to certain aspects of the incident at the ballpark and the believability of his version was critically important to whether he committed the offense, the State's need for the impeachment evidence was significant. Evans v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 150, 2009 WL 57036 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 9 2009).

415. In defendant's murder case, the court properly excluded evidence of the victim's mother's additional assault charges because the State did not ask if it was the mother's only assault, but instead asked if it was the assault for which she was on probation. By accurately answering the specific question by the State, the mother did not create a false impression for the jury, and did not "open the door" for the defense to ask about the other assaults. Contreras v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 91, 2009 WL 50601 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 8 2009).

416. Although defendant complained that the trial court erred in allowing the State to question defendant on arrests of which the State had knowledge but did not notify defendant pursuant to a properly filed request, defendant opened the door to the questions by the State in this area when he testified that he had no other brushes with the law. Lucas v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8976 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 3 2008).

417. State conceded that the details of a California offense were not admissible for the purpose of impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609, but while the State argued that the details were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to prove identity, the court disagreed, because under the Rule 404(b) analysis, the State adduced no evidence that the details of the California offenses were so similar to the instant case as to have indicated a modus operandi, and thus, it was error to admit the detail to show conformity of character; however, the error, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), did not have a substantial or injurious effect in determining the verdict, given that (1) the trial court properly admitted the convictions themselves under Tex. R. Evid. 609, (2) the improperly admitted evidence was the detail that the victims of defendant's prior rapes in California were Hispanic, but other evidence at trial indicated that defendant targeted Hispanic women, (3) the evidence that the prior rapes involved Hispanic women was not important to the State's case, and (4) the State presented DNA evidence placing defendant at the victim's apartment where the rape occurred, and thus ample other evidence existed on which the jury could have found defendant guilty of aggravated sexual assault. Jabari v. State, 273 S.W.3d 745, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8814 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2008).

418. Defendant's objections to the admission of his juvenile adjudications based on the lack of a judicial signature, the reliability of the adjudications, and their remoteness, based on Tex. R. Evid. 609, were misplaced because Rule 609 only applied to convictions admitted for impeachment, not convictions admitted during the punishment phase of a trial. His juvenile adjudications were properly admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07. Avendano v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5832 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31, 2008).

419. For there to be a conviction, there must ordinarily be a judgment of guilt for the crime in question; therefore, a trial court should not have allowed the State to impeach defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 609 with offenses that had been dismissed after being admitted and applied during sentencing in a prior case, pursuant to Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.45. Lopez v. State, 253 S.W.3d 680, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 642 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

420. Even if the trial court had erred in admitting impeachment evidence of a 30-year-old assault conviction for impeachment purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 609, the record did not establish harm because the jury, which found defendant not guilty on a charge of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon but guilty of serious bodily injury, was not likely influenced by the evidence regarding a 1976 stabbing incident; the evidence was uncontroverted that defendant hit the complainant, who suffered a broken jaw. Grant v. State, 247 S.W.3d 360, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1135 (Tex. App. Austin 2008).

421. During defendant's trial for aggravated assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02, the trial court did not err in denying his Theus motion and admitting evidence of his prior convictions pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609 where the specific facts and circumstances supported a finding that the probative value of defendant's prior convictions substantially outweighed their prejudicial effect; all of the Theus factors favored admission of defendant's theft convictions, and, in regard to his robbery convictions, the first Theus factor regarding the impeachment value of the prior crime was the only factor that might have favored exclusion, but defendant had testified that he was not a violent man, and his robbery convictions might have been probative not simply to assess his credibility but also to respond to his testimony. Davis v. State, 259 S.W.3d 778, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8749 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

422. In a criminal prosecution for possession of cocaine, the trial court abused its discretion during the punishment phase of trial by allowing the State to prove defendant's previous convictions through judgments and a fingerprint expert; defendant was aware of the previous convictions, due to notices filed by the State pursuant Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 and Tex. R. Evid. 404. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8218 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 17 2007).

423. Counsel was not ineffective for permitting the jury to hear evidence of defendant's prior convictions that were inadmissible under Theus because defendant's prior theft convictions, prior felony drug convictions, and his conviction for lying to the police were likely admissible; because it also appeared that defendant's candor before the jury concerning his prior convictions was a strategic attempt to appear open and honest, and to lessen the impact of any impeachment on the issue, it could not be concluded that counsel provided ineffective assistance with regard to the introduction of those convictions. Martin v. State, 265 S.W.3d 435, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7652 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

424. Theft convictions were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because four out of the five factors enumerated in the case of Theus v. State, 845 S.W.2d 874, 880 (Tex. Crim. App. 1992), were satisfied; the theft convictions were crimes of moral turpitude, they were dissimilar to the charged offense of driving while intoxicated, and defendant's credibility was important since he was the only defense witness. Roach v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6764 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2007).

425. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant preserved the issue of whether theft convictions were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 when he objected upon their introduction; however, he failed to preserve the issue in relation to an aggravated assault conviction since no objection was made when the evidence was introduced. Roach v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6764 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2007).

426. In a case involving an objection to the admission of theft convictions introduced under Tex. R. Evid. 609, although defendant's argument on appeal used the more specific balancing language, it comported with his general remoteness objection before the trial court; therefore, it was subject to appellate review. Roach v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6764 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2007).

427. Trial court properly permitted the State to impeach an offender with his prior convictions for drug-related offenses, robbery, and manslaughter under Tex. R. Evid. 609; although some of the convictions were more than 10 years old, the offender's intervening 1999 conviction for possession of a controlled substance was not remote, and it indicated that the offender had not reformed his conduct and had a propensity for running afoul of the law; the prior convictions were dissimilar to instant sexual assault charge and thus raised little chance of prejudice; moreover, the offender's testimony and credibility were crucial elements at trial since he was the only witness during his case-in-chief. Adkins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6589 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 16 2007).

428. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's prior conviction for forgery pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609 because (1) the crime of forgery involved deception which was a factor that weighed in favor of admissibility; (2) the forgery offense was within the 10-year time limit in the rule and showed defendant's propensity to run afoul of the law; (3) defendant's prior forgery conviction was dissimilar to the aggravated assault offense for which defendant was on trial, which was a factor that favored admissibility; and (4) the State needed the opportunity to impeach defendant's credibility since defendant's credibility was important. Clark v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6498 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 15 2007).

429. Although evidence of a husband's convictions were inadmissible in divorce proceedings, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609, the husband waived the alleged errors, and the error was harmless, because the trial court was already aware of the prior convictions, for which the husband was serving time in prison. Malekzadeh v. Malekzadeh, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5178 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 3 2007).

430. Where defendant was charged with assault with injury and family violence, the trial court did not err in weighing the Moore factors and excluding the evidence of the complaining witness's criminal history under Tex. R. Evid. 609; while the complainant's prior convictions for forgery and theft by check were crimes involving moral turpitude that had impeachment value, the complainant's credibility was not dispositive of defendant's claim of self-defense or challenge to his identification. Thompson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4498 (Tex. App. Austin June 8 2007).

431. In a case involving burglary of a building, a trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting convictions for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, burglary of a building, and credit card abuse for impeachment purposes where the burglary conviction satisfied four of the five elements in a test to determine admissibility, and the other convictions satisfied all five elements; inter alia, the convictions were for deception or moral turpitude offenses, they were within the 10-year period, defendant was the only witness to testify on his behalf, and one of the offenses was similar. Mixon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4310 (Tex. App. El Paso May 31 2007).

432. Although defendant's sentences in 18 of the 20 cases were completed more than 10 years before his trial for the instant offense and under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) were too remote, even a conviction too remote under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) could be admitted if the court determined, in the interest of justice, that its probative value substantially outweighed its prejudicial effect. Greenlee v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3951 (Tex. App. Tyler May 23 2007).

433. Where defendant was accused in a probation revocation hearing of sexually assaulting his five-year-old daughter, and defendant's expert psychologist testified, after examining defendant and studying his file, that he could find no psychological explanation for why defendant would commit indecency with a child, the State did not use its cross-examination of the psychologist to improperly impeach defendant with prior offenses in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the defendant's criminal history was directly relevant to challenging several of the psychologist's underlying findings leading to his ultimate conclusion. Galindo v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3903 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 22 2007).

434. For purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant did not preserve for review the claim that the trial court erred in admitting evidence of a prior conviction for the purpose of impeachment; defendant did not make a timely and specific objection at the time the evidence was offered, and although there was a hearing outside the presence of the jury on defendant's pretrial motion to testify free from impeachment with prior convictions, that motion did not argue that the State was to be precluded from impeaching defendant with this particular past conviction. Timms v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3400 (Tex. App. Dallas May 3 2007).

435. In a father's termination case, evidence of father's prior sexual assault was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 and the 1998 conviction fell within the 10-year provision under the Rule; the father testified the victim was 14 years old and such inappropriate behaivor was entitled to be considered in determining endangering conduct under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 161.001(1). In re G.C.F., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2680 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 5 2007).

436. Evidence of an expunged record may not be elicited from the witness or any other witness, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 55.03(1) and Tex. R. Evid. 609(a); the evidence concerning an expunged record may not be established by public record under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). Aguirre v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 354 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 19 2007).

437. For evidence to be admissible for purposes of impeachment, Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) requires evidence of a conviction; pendency of an appeal renders evidence of a conviction inadmissible. Aguirre v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 354 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 19 2007).

438. Trial court did not err in refusing to allow defendant to impeach a jailhouse informant under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) because the evidence of the informant's prior conviction was inadmissible given that it had been expunged and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 55.03(1) prohibited the use of expunged records for any purpose, and the evidence could not be elicited from anyone, nor could the evidence be established by public record, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 55.04(1), and thus the evidence could not be adduced from any competent source; moreover, Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) required a conviction, and because the conviction was expunged, the circumstances of the conviction were unknown and defendant failed to establish its admissibility, and even if the exclusion of the evidence was error, it was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because of the other evidence with which the trial court permitted defendant to impeach the informant. Aguirre v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 354 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 19 2007).

439. Trial counsel was not ineffective for introducing defendant's four remote felony convictions and one remote misdemeanor convictions into evidence during his sexual assault trial; in introducing the prior convictions counsel may have been attempting to convince the jury that, despite defendant's criminal history, he had never been convicted of a crime that was sexual in nature or involved a child. Smith v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 254 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 11 2007).

440. In a criminal prosecution for attempted burglary of a habitation, the State was permitted to impeach defendant with a prior theft conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609; considering the fact that defendant's credibility was at issue, all but one of the Theus factors weighed in favor of admissiblity; the similarity between the past crime and the offense being prosecuted was the only factor that leaned against admission of the prior theft conviction. Burks v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10371 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 1 2006).

441. Trial court did not err when it allowed the State to impeach defendant's testimony, under Tex. R. Evid. 609, with evidence that defendant was convicted of possession of a deadly weapon in a penal institution; the court found that (1) the root of the prior offense was not dishonesty, so that factor was weighed neutrally, (2) the prior conviction was not fresh or ancient, so that factor was also weighed neutrally, (3) the similarity of the prior conviction and the present offense of murder under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02(b)(2) weighed against admission, if slightly, but (4) the importance of defendant's testimony and credibility weighed in favor of admission, given that no other evidence established defendant's self-defense claim or lack of intent, and thus the trial court's decision was not outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Tamez v. State, 205 S.W.3d 32, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7961 (Tex. App. Tyler 2006), aff'd, 344 Fed. Appx. 897, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 20231 (5th Cir. 2009), cert. denied, 130 S. Ct. 1523, 176 L. Ed. 2d 127, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 1489 (U.S. 2010).

442. Appellate court rejected defendant's claim that his Sixth Amendment right to counsel was violated based on his claim that his counsel was ineffective in allowing evidence of his prior convictions to be admitted because defendant did not allege ineffective assistance of counsel in his motion for new trial and there was no record reflecting his attorney's trial strategy with regard to his prior convictions; therefore the appellate court could not conclude that counsel's performance fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. Coleman v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6689 (Tex. App. Austin July 28 2006).

443. At defendant's criminal trial for DWI with a child passenger, counsel was not ineffective for asking the defendant about a prior forgery conviction on direct examination; defendant's prior conviction was less than ten years old, and thus admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Cossio v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6608 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 27 2006).

444. Possession of marijuana and possession of a prohibited weapon are neither crimes of deception, nor crimes of violence, for purposes of impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Castro v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5890 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 6 2006).

445. Trial court did not err, in defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, in admitting prior convictions of possession of marijuana and possession of a prohibited weapon under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) because the factors regarding whether the value of the evidence outweighed the prejudicial effect favored admission; the court found that (1) the prior crimes were not crimes of violence, (2) given the three prior convictions, defendant had shown a propensity for running afoul of the law, (3) the charged crimes were not similar to the prior convictions, and (4) the credibility of the minor victims and defendant's credibility were critical issues in the case because there was no physical evidence that tied defendant to the crimes. Castro v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5890 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 6 2006).

446. Defendant was convicted in 1992 of possession of a prohibited weapon, in 1998 of possession of marijuana, and in 1999 for unlawfully carrying a weapon, and the last two convictions were evidence of defendant's lack of reformation, such that the court analyzed the introduction of the 1992 and 1998 convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a)'s "outweighs" test, not Tex. R. Evid. 609(b)'s "substantially outweighs" test, for purposes of impeachment in defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child. Castro v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5890 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 6 2006).

447. During defendant's murder trial, the State questioned him about two extraneous offenses and defense counsel did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403, Tex. R. Evid. 404, or Tex. R. Evid. 609 regarding either offense; in accordance with Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant could not raise these issues on appeal. Cotton v. State, 2006 Tex.

App. LEXIS 5445 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 27 2006).

448. Trial court properly permitted the State to impeach defendant with a prior felony conviction for robbery under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) because: (1) defendant was released from confinement for the robbery conviction only a short time before his arrests on the possession offenses; (2) the crimes of robbery and possession of cocaine were dissimilar; and (3) defendant relied on his own testimony to support his defense and his credibility was important to the case. Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5032 (Tex. App. Dallas June 13 2006).

449. Defendant's objection to the prior convictions contained in his "pen packet," which included burglary of a building, burglary of a vehicle, and an unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, lacked merit because unauthorized use of a motor vehicle is a crime involving deception, and the impeachment value of crimes of deception was higher than crimes that involved violence, the latter of which had a higher potential for prejudice, and because the issue of the importance of defendant's testimony and credibility were critical by the very nature of the defense that was placed before the jury; as to the temporal proximity factor, all of the offenses listed in the pen packet fell within the 10 year period proscribed by Tex. R. Evid. 609 making them, therefore, admissible. Baca v. State, 223 S.W.3d 478, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4424 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

450. In a robbery trial, the admission of prior robbery convictions for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609 fell within the zone of reasonable disagreement; although the similarity of the past and current crimes weighed against admission, the prior convictions were less than ten years old and the State had a significant need to impeach defendant's testimony, given that credibility was important to his defense. Berry v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2863 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 11 2006).

451. Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) requires that the trial court determine whether the probative value of admitting evidence of prior convictions outweighs its prejudicial effect to a party, and Tex. R. Evid. 609(f) requires timely notice of the State's intended use of evidence of prior convictions to provide the defendant a fair opportunity to contest the use of such evidence, but the phrase "fair opportunity" does not specify at what point in the proceedings the decision as to admissibility is to be made; there is not authority holding that a "fair opportunity" means an opportunity exclusively during a pretrial hearing and not during a hearing outside the presence of the jury during a trial on the merits; thus, the trial court's denial of defendant's motion for a pretrial hearing on his Tex. R. Evid. 609 motion was neither an abuse of discretion nor reversible error. Yanez v. State, 199 S.W.3d 293, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10540 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

452. Because defendant did not testify, the impact any erroneous impeachment might have had in light of the record as a whole was not affirmatively demonstrated in the appellate record; thus, any possible harm flowing from the trial court's refusal to conduct a pretrial hearing on impeachment by a prior conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609 was wholly speculative. Yanez v. State, 199 S.W.3d 293, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10540 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : Inadmissibility

453. Counsel did not claim to want to cross-examine a witness about a potential bias, no offer of proof was made, plus counsel's complaint was different than the one made on appeal, as counsel asked to visit the witness's criminal matters, and the trial court denied the request because convictions were not involved, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), and thus appellant waived complaints under Tex. R. Evid. 611 and the Sixth Amendment concerning the limitations on the cross-examination of the witness, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A); even absent waiver, the court would have overruled the claims, given that (1) there was no causal connection between the witness's deferred adjudication and his testimony, and (2) nothing showed the existence or expectation of a deal in the deferred adjudication case. Mcburnett v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5300, 2012 WL 2583407 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 5 2012).

454. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to allow defendant to impeach a confidential informant under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) with his remote prior conviction for misdemeanor forgery because the Theus factors weighed against admission, and therefore defendant did not establish that the probative value of the conviction substantially outweighed the prejudicial effect of the conviction. The court found that: (1) the past crime was not recent and the informant did not show a propensity for running afoul of the law, as he had no intervening convictions after his forgery conviction; (2) the informant was not the only witness who testified regarding the attempted drug transaction and his testimony was corroborated by that of two police officers; and (3) defendant's only witness did not contradict the informant's account of events. Duarte v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 599, 2012 WL 252142 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 26 2012).

455. Witness's 1996 offense of indecent exposure was a crime of moral turpitude because of the intent to arouse or gratify sexual desire. Woodard v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8836, 2011 WL 5319907 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 3 2011).

456. Even assuming a witness's 1998 offense of illegal operation of a sexually-oriented business also amounted to a crime of moral turpitude, nothing indicated that the witness's prior convictions, including one for indecent exposure, would have had much impeachment value, and the trial court could have found that their probative value was outweighed by any prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), and thus the trial court did not err in excluding those convictions; appellant did not impeach the witness with a felony conviction, even though the trial court ruled it admissible, and he failed to show how the misdemeanor convictions established bias as claimed. Woodard v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8836, 2011 WL 5319907 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 3 2011).

457. Trial court erred under Tex. R. Evid. 609(c)(2) by admitting evidence of defendant's prior domestic violence conviction; however, the error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt, Tex. R. App. P. 44.2, as the record contained sufficient evidence of guilt of the offense in this case, the jury charge contained a proper limiting instruction regarding the jury's consideration of extraneous offenses, the State spent very little time on the improper evidence and did not delve into its details, and finally, the trial court probated defendant's sentence. Turney v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6419 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 11 2011).

458. Defendant was not prevented from showing that the victim and other family members were biased and had a motive to testify against him because there was animosity between the victim's family and defendant, but, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and 609, the trial court did not err in not admitting evidence indicating that the victim's mother had been arrested for possession of marihuana and had been placed on deferred adjudication community supervision. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

459. Because more than 10 years had passed since a complaining witness's release from confinement and defendant did not point to evidence of any specific facts and circumstances that would merit admitting her convictions, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in deciding not to admit her prior criminal history for impeachment purposes. Kirvin v. State, 394 S.W.3d 550, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3661, 2011 WL 1818420 (Tex. App. Dallas May 13 2011).

460. Court did not err in prohibiting defendant from cross-examining the complainant about a conviction for misdemeanor assault involving dating violence, because the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), when the conviction was for a misdemeanor, and defendant had not cited a case in which a misdemeanor assault against a man was held to be a crime of moral turpitude. Chambliss v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1354, 2011 WL 665323 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 24 2011).

461. Trial court did not err by excluding impeachment evidence that the victim had been convicted of the misdemeanor offense of interference with an emergency telephone call under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 42.062 because it did not represent a crime of moral turpitude as required by Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). Urtado v. State, 333 S.W.3d 418, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1251 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 16 2011).

462. Defendant received ineffective assistance of counsel, because defense counsel introduced inadmissible prior felony convictions during defendant's direct examination, and since the record did not indicate that the State sought to introduce defendant's prior convictions during the guilt/innocence phase of the trial, there was no possible benefit to have been gained by defense counsel "fronting" this issue to the jury at that stage of the trial. Lemons v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1393, 2011 WL 908275 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 16 2011).

463. Under Tex. R. Evid. 609, the trial court did not err by excluding the witness's prior sexual assault conviction as it was remote, had little bearing on his credibility, and was highly prejudicial. Mitchell v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 160, 2011 WL 192650 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 12 2011).

464. Appellant never argued to the trial court that a prior conviction was inadmissible for purposes of impeachment because the conviction occurred over 10 years earlier, and his general impeachment objection was insufficient to inform the trial court that he was objecting on grounds of remoteness, plus the trial court never considered this issue when it ruled on appellant's objection; thus, this issue was not preserved for review. Jones v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7357, 2010 WL 3448010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 31 2010).

465. In an assault on a member of his household enhanced by a previous family violence assault conviction case, although two prior drug convictions were more than 10 years old, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting them into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) because the impeachment value of the remote drug offenses was not high, especially in light of his other previous convictions and the strength of the State's evidence against him, and defendant could not have been substantially harmed by the prosecutor's questioning him about those prior drug convictions. Mckinney v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5992, 2010 WL 2952083 (Tex. App. Dallas July 29 2010).

466. Defendant failed to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) as to evidence of prior convictions that were more than 10 years old because his motion in limine objecting under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) preserved no error, he did not obtain an adverse ruling on the remoteness issue, he did not object at trial, and he opened the door to the evidence by mentioning his criminal history. Nobles v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2605, 2010 WL 1491858 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 14 2010).

467. Trial court erroneously admitted a 1993 judgment convicting defendant of misdemeanor assault where the judgment was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it had no relevance apart from proof of character conformity. Moreover, evidence of the conviction was not available for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the record contained no evidence that the victim of the assault was female, and there was thus no proof that it was a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude. Tello v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8401, 2009 WL 3518006 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 30 2009).

468. Regardless of whether a crime involved moral turpitude, it was not admissible to impeach a witness's credibility because it was not a conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Nelson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7796, 2009 WL 3191909 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 7 2009).

469. Victim's previous sexual assault did not fit within any of the enumerated exceptions under Tex. R. Evid. 412, given that (1) the prior assault was not necessary to rebut evidence offered by the State, (2) the prior assault did not involve defendant and he failed to show in what way the previous assault showed the victim's bias, if any, (3) the previous assault was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 nor constitutionally required to be admitted, and (4) because the previous assault was not probative, that value, if any, was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(3), such that the victim's previous sexual assault and counseling was inadmissible under Rule 412. Woods v. State, 301 S.W.3d 327, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 10 2009).

470. Defendant's juvenile adjudication might not have been admissible, given that Tex. R. Evid. 609 provided that such adjudications were inadmissible, no one claimed that the adjudication was admissible under the Texas Family Code or the Texas Juvenile Justice Code or that it was required to be admitted under the constitution, plus an order of adjudication was not a conviction of a crime under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 51.13(a) and an adjudication that a child engaged in conduct that constituted a felony offense was a final felony conviction only for the purpose of penalizing repeat and habitual felony offenders under § 51.13(d); however, the record did not contain evidence from counsel's perspective as to why she did not object and the court had to presume that counsel proceeded deliberately as part of sound trial strategy, and thus defendant did not prove ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to object when the State impeached defendant with a juvenile adjudication. Adair v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3286 (Tex. App. Tyler May 7 2008).

471. Trial court did not err during defendant's trial for the Class A misdemeanor offense of assault causing bodily injury in excluding evidence of a prior criminal mischief charge against the complainant at a hearing on a motion in limine where defendant's attorney admitted not only that the criminal mischief case against the complainant was "obviously quite old," but also that the case had been dismissed. Sullivan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1394 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2008).

472. In a murder trial, defendant was not entitled to impeach a witness by asking whether the witness signed certain checks drawn on defendant's checking account. The evidence was not admissible as impeachment for a crime under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because there was no evidence that the witness had ever been convicted or even arrested for an offense involving the checks. Perry v. State, 236 S.W.3d 859, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7942 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

473. Defense counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to inadmissible impeachment evidence consisting of defendant's prior convictions because on direct examination, defendant preemptively admitted to numerous prior convictions in an attempt to minimize any damage. Andrews v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7217 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 5 2007).

474. Trial court erred by admitting impeachment evidence of prior possession offenses that defendant had pleaded guilty to under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.45 because he was not convicted of the two possession offenses, as neither the indictment nor the plea bargain was part of the record, and the judgment referred only to defendant's conviction of illegal investment; the trial court also failed to determine whether the probative value of admitting the two possession offenses as impeachment evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect to defendant as required under Tex. R. Evid. 609; defendant was harmed by the error under Tex. R. App. P. 44 because: (1) during cross-examination, defendant admitted to the two possession offenses as part of his plea bargain; (2) defendant's credibility was crucial to his defense that the sergeant was mistaken as to the identity of the seller; and (3) in closing arguments the State emphasized the impeachment evidence. Lopez v. State, 230 S.W.3d 875, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5695 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

475. For evidence to be admissible for purposes of impeachment, Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) requires evidence of a conviction; pendency of an appeal renders evidence of a conviction inadmissible. Aguirre v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 354 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 19 2007).

476. In an intoxication manslaughter case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow evidence that another occupant of defendant's watercraft, who defendant claimed was driving at the time of the accident, had a previous conviction for manslaughter; because there was no evidence regarding the date on which the other occupant was released from confinement, and because his manslaughter conviction was more than 10 years old, the trial judge could properly exclude it under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b). Morris v. State, 214 S.W.3d 159, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 278 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

477. Evidence of defendant's prior conviction was not offered to attack his credibility pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609, but to rebut his testimony that the complainant's injuries resulted from accidental causes rather than an assault, Tex. R. Evid. 404; because defendant did not demonstrate that the prior conviction was not relevant for that purpose, the complaint that the conviction was more than 10 years old presented nothing for the appellate court's review. Carranza v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10137 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 28 2006).

478. Despite an initial misidentification of a driver who fled the scene of a residential burglary, there was sufficient evidence to convict defendant of burglary of a habitation where an officer later positively identified defendant due to a tattoo, an owner stated that he loaned defendant a truck, and the truck was later abandoned with items inside; moreover, the trial court was not permitted to consider the fact that the owner, the first person mistakenly identified, had previous convictions for burglary of a habitation. Britt v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4982 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 8 2006).

479. Under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), a 17-year-old felony conviction for credit card abuse should not have been admitted in a drug trial to impeach defendant because the prior conviction, with no intervening convictions, happened so long ago that it had little, if any, probative value on the issue of defendant's current credibility. The admission was prejudicial under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because credibility was critical to the defense that defendant did not intentionally or knowingly possess the drugs and because the prosecutor emphasized the prior conviction during closing argument. Battles v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3117 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 20 2006).

480. Because an employee's request for relief from a contempt order based on an injunction was still pending before an appellate court at the time of trial, the contempt judgment against the employee was not final and therefore was inadmissible against the employee under Tex. R. Evid. 609(e); ultimately, the appellate court had determined that the trial court's injunction order was not clear and the court rejected appellees' attempt to parse the contempt proceedings and circumvent the final disposition of the contempt judgment, and therefore the trial court erred in admitting such evidence of contempt and the employee's resulting incarceration, as this information was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, and this error probably resulted in an improper judgment under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a) and was prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because evidence of the contempt proceeding presented the jury with a clear indication of the judge's opinion, and it was too great of a risk that the evidence irreparably influenced the jury's decision. Houston v. Millennium Ins. Agency, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3156 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 20 2006).

481. Introduction of affidavit by a police investigator that referred to defendant's prior violations of a protective order did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the evidence was not offered to impeach defendant's, or any witness's, credibility. Moreover, defendant failed to preserve his argument for appellate review. Sadarangani v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3198 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 20 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by, modified by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5367 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 21, 2006).

482. Under Tex. R. Evid. 609, a 17-year-old felony conviction for credit card abuse should not have been admitted in a drug trial to impeach defendant because the prior conviction, with no intervening convictions, happened so long ago that it had little, if any, probative value on the issue of defendant's current credibility; the admission was prejudicial under Tex. R. App. P. 44 because credibility was critical to the defense that defendant did not intentionally or knowingly possess the drugs and because the prosecutor emphasized the prior conviction during closing argument. Battles v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3117 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 20 2006).

483. Because an employee's request for relief from a contempt order based on an injunction was still pending before an appellate court at the time of trial, the contempt judgment against the employee was not final and therefore was inadmissible against the employee under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Houston v. Millennium Ins. Agency, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3156 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 20 2006).

484. Introduction of affidavit by a police investigator that referred to defendant's prior violations of a protective order did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the evidence was not offered to impeach defendant's, or any witness's, credibility. Sadarangani v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3198 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 20 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by, modified by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5367 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 21, 2006).

485. Sole evidence before the trial court was that a victim was released from prison on the most recent felony offense in 1990 and successfully completed his 10-year parole term; thus, the evidence established that more than 10 years had elapsed since the victim's release from the confinement imposed for his convictions and either the date of the offense or the date of trial; therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion on grounds that the victim's convictions were inadmissible to impeach his credibility as (1) the convictions were too remote in time under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b); and (2) defendant did not present sufficient proof that the nature of the victim's prior felonies (two burglaries and one aggravated assault) were relevant to the facts or credibility of the witness; however, even if the evidence of the victim's prior convictions were introduced and his credibility compromised, sufficient other evidence existed such that reasonable minds could convict defendant. Yanez v. State, 199 S.W.3d 293, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10540 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Juvenile Adjudications

486. In a trial for improper sexual activity with a minor in the custody of the Texas Youth Commission, defendant was not entitled to cross-examine the victim regarding his juvenile record. The prosecution was not a juvenile proceeding, the victim was not a party, and the use of the juvenile record for general impeachment of the minor's credibility was not constitutionally required. Brookins v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9765, 2011 WL 6357786 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 14 2011).

487. In a trial for improper sexual activity with a minor in the custody of the Texas Youth Commission, defendant was not entitled to cross-examine the victim regarding his juvenile record. The prosecution was not a juvenile proceeding, the victim was not a party, and the use of the juvenile record for general impeachment of the minor's credibility was not constitutionally required. Brookins v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9764, 2011 WL 6382531 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 14 2011).

488. Texas has an important interest in protecting the anonymity of juvenile offenders and under Tex. R. Evid. 609(d), Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 51.13(b), that anonymity is explicitly protected, and to hold that any juvenile who happens to be on probation at the time that he also is the victim of a crime or a witness in a criminal proceeding automatically loses that privacy protection is not required by the constitution or by common sense; Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974), is not a blunderbuss that decimates all other evidentiary statutes, rules, and relevance requirements in matters of witness impeachment, and it is a rapier that targets only a specific mode of impeachment--bias and motive--when the cross-examiner can show a logical connection between the evidence suggesting bias or motive and the witness's testimony. The court therefore rejects the absolutist position that a probationer, particularly a probationer whose guilt has not yet been adjudicated, is always in a vulnerable relationship with the State and that mere status is always automatically relevant to show a witness's possible bias and motive to testify favorably for the State as inconsistent with Texas and United States Supreme Court precedent.

Irby v. State, 327 S.W.3d 138, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 725 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

489. Any evidence showing that the juvenile victim had a motive to make up this story was relevant and admissible for impeachment purposes, but the court agreed with the trial court and court of appeals that appellant failed to make a logical connection between the victim's testimony concerning his sexual encounters with appellant and his entirely separate probationary status, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding this impeachment evidence because it was irrelevant. Irby v. State, 327 S.W.3d 138, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 725 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

490. In a sexual assault case, the court did not violate defendant's rights under the Confrontation Clause by denying his request to cross-examine the juvenile victim regarding his status on deferred adjudication probation because there was no indication that a motion to revoke the victim's probation was pending either when he made the allegations against defendant or at the time of trial; thus, defendant did not show that the victim's deferred adjudication status placed him in a "vulnerable relationship" with the State. Irby v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 4544 (Tex. App. Dallas June 20 2008).

491. In defendant's sexual assault on a child case, because the victims were juveniles, if they had committed theft, shoplifting, or truancy as defendant alleged, those offenses would have resulted in juvenile adjudications inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609; therefore, the district court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow defendant to ask questions related to those offenses. Hatter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4516 (Tex. App. Austin May 26 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Conduct

492. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the State to impeach defendant because defendant opened the door to the State's questions about the prior assault allegation, as he made the blanket statement on direct examination that he had never been arrested before, that he did not get into trouble, and that the instant case was the first problem he had had, implying that he had never had any interactions with the police before. Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13623, 2013 WL 5948124 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 5 2013).

493. Defendant was not entitled to attack the arresting officer's credibility by showing that he was under investigation for violating the Occupations Code, a specific instance of misconduct, and therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that defendant did not establish a Brady violation. Smith v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9194 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 25 2013).

494. Defendant was not prevented from showing that the victim and other family members were biased and had a motive to testify against him because there was animosity between the victim's family and defendant, but, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and 609, the trial court did not err in not admitting evidence indicating that the victim's mother had been arrested for possession of marihuana and had been placed on deferred adjudication community supervision. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

495. Under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and 609, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the State to ask defendant about his prior arrests after he opened the door with his testimony or in determining that the probative value of such evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

496. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault and solicitation of a minor, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit evidence showing that the complainant had knowledge of sexual matters before these alleged events occurred because the evidence was hearsay and subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 609 and 613.

Landers v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2982, 2011 WL 1496154 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 19 2011).

497. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to permit defendant to question the victim and the eyewitness about whether they were under the influence of marijuana or alcohol at the time of the offense under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because both testified that they were not drunk or impaired during the robbery and defendant did not present any contradictory evidence. Woodard v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2897, 2009 WL 1124385 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 28 2009).

498. Court did not err by not allowing defendant to cross-examine the victim about her prior sexual experience because the evidence that defendant sought to introduce through the declarant relating to the victim's sexual activity with her boyfriend did not relate to the charged sexual contact offenses, but was offered to impeach the victim's credibility relating to her accusation two years later that defendant also sexually assaulted her. The declarant's forensic interview contained inadmissible hearsay and, as the trial court noted, the victim's conduct discussed in that interview was not at all similar to the charged offenses. Fugate v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6266 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18, 2008).

499. In a case of driving while intoxicated, the trial court did not err in allowing the State to cross-examine a defense witness regarding a conviction for a crime of moral turpitude that occurred more than ten years earlier; an exception to Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) was applicable because the State presented evidence that the witness had not reformed. Alvarado v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8696 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 9 2006).

500. In a criminal trial for drug possession, defendant was not entitled to a mistrial for after a State's witness testified regarding an extraneous offense; the trial court's instruction to disregard cured any prejudice to defendant. Coleman v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8133 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 14 2006).

501. In a resisting arrest case, counsel was ineffective where, inter alia, counsel failed to investigate or interview defendant in detail about his criminal history or his prior contacts with the arresting officer; failed to seek discovery from the State; failed to file and obtain rulings on a motion in limine to require the State to raise extraneous matters outside the presence of the jury; failed to prepare defendant to testify; failed to object to evidence of inadmissible extraneous matters during the guilt phase; invited evidence of unadjudicated arrests during the punishment phase; and failed to object to failure of the punishment-phase charge to include a reasonable doubt instruction. Walker v. State, 195 S.W.3d 250, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1381 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

502. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in failing to conduct a pretrial hearing to determine the admissibility of impeachment evidence. Yanez v. State, 187 S.W.3d 724, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1289 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

503. Record did not establish harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 and Tex. R. Evid. 103(d) from the trial court's failure to conduct a pretrial hearing to determine the admissibility of impeachment evidence because defendant elected not to testify; the jury, therefore, was not exposed to the allegedly prejudicial evidence; any possible harm flowing from the refusal to conduct a hearing was wholly speculative. Yanez v. State, 187 S.W.3d 724, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1289 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

504. Trial court did not err by disallowing defendant's impeachment of an attempted-murder victim through the victim's prior felony convictions because more than 10 years had elapsed since the victim's release from the confinement imposed for his convictions. Yanez v. State, 187 S.W.3d 724, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1289 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

505. Defendant did not preserve error as to a probative/prejudicial argument under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because during the evidentiary hearing, he did not address that issue. Yanez v. State, 187 S.W.3d 724, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1289 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

506. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated robbery, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence regarding defendant's prior conviction; defendant testified he had spent thirteen years in prison; therefore, he opened the door to the evidence regarding the length of the sentence he received for the previous conviction. Simon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1209 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 15 2006).

507. Because defendant did not object at trial that a conviction was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609, nothing was preserved for review. Adams v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1020 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 9 2006).

508. Prior convictions that formed the basis for defendant's objections were the subject matter of the State's questions, and thus defendant's ground for objection of improper character impeachment was apparent from those questions; however, defendant waited to object until after the witness answered both questions, and the failure to make a timely objection at trial waived any error for review. Adams v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1020 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 9 2006).

509. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err by allowing defendant's own testimony to be admitted regarding a prior conviction as none of defendant's testimony was false, and the trial court's decision to admit this testimony for impeachment purposes was reasonable. The evidence showed that the prior conviction was well within the 10-year period provided by Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), the instant offense and the prior offense were the same, and defendant's testimony and his credibility as a witness were very important as he and the complainant were the only witnesses. Berry v. State, 179 S.W.3d 175, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8732 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

510. Trial court's error in permitting the State to ask defendant whether he had been arrested more than twenty times was harmless because it did not have a substantial or injurious effect on the jury's verdict and did not affect defendant's substantial rights, as the State reminded the jury that defendant had a prior conviction for felony driving while intoxicated and theft, but it did not address defendant's other prior arrests, and the jury was instructed that all persons were presumed to be innocent and the fact that defendant had been arrested, confined, or indicted for or otherwise charged gave rise to no inference of guilt. West v. State, 169 S.W.3d 275, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4114 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

511. In a robbery trial, the court did not have to admit evidence of the complainant's prior conviction for misdemeanor assault against defendant's nephew; contrary to defendant's argument, the two-year-old conviction was not relevant to show that the complainant ran from his apartment because he feared a physical confrontation. The court noted that the evidence would properly have been excluded for impeachment purposes because it was not a felony or a crime involving moral turpitude. Allison v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4055 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2005).

512. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant failed to show that his trial counsel was ineffective in eliciting testimony from him concerning extraneous offenses; defendant was unable to rebut the presumption that counsel made a reasonable strategic decision, the extraneous offenses were arguably admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609, and defendant did not show a reasonable probability that the result would otherwise have been different. Perez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1918 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 14 2005).

513. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in prohibiting defendant from impeaching the victim's credibility with a misdemeanor as the victim had already admitted under oath that he had had trouble with the police in the past. Kerr

v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1081 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 10 2005).

514. Appellate court affirmed defendant's conviction possession of a controlled substance, namely cocaine, weighing more than four grams and less than 200 grams, with intent to deliver as defendant failed to show that prior convictions used to impeach him that his attorney failed to object to would have been inadmissible due to remoteness. Pittman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 653 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2005).

515. In a trial for possession of cocaine, two prior felony cocaine convictions were properly admitted for impeachment purposes. The evidence was more probative than prejudicial because 10 years had not elapsed since defendant's release and he was the only witness. Gage v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 531 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 26 2005).

516. Court denied the State of Texas's motion for rehearing after overturning defendant's conviction on the ground that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because there was no sound trial strategy by defense counsel for failing to object to evidence of defendant's prior arrests for unadjudicated offenses. Defendant did not create a false impression pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) by any of his testimony on direct examination or by any volunteered statement on cross-examination. Hall v. State, 161 S.W.3d 142, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1742 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

517. When a defendant voluntarily testifies as to his prior criminal record without any prompting or maneuvering on the part of the State's attorney and in so doing he leaves a false impression with the jury, the State is allowed to correct that false impression by introducing evidence of the defendant's prior criminal record. Hall v. State, 161 S.W.3d 142, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1742 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

518. Court did not err in sustaining the State's objection to the impeachment of its witness with convictions for a prior theft from 1987, a prior driving while intoxicated from 1990, and a failure to identify in 1990. Because the witness had completed deferred adjudication for the theft, it was not a conviction for purposes of impeachment, and the other convictions were more than 10 years old. Pendley v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10526 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 24 2004).

519. In an aggravated assault case, defense counsel was not ineffective for eliciting testimony from defendant regarding two non-final prior convictions, evidence of which would have been inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(e), because counsel could reasonably have thought the testimony would make a self-defense claim more believable. Robertson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10130 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 10 2004), reversed by 187 S.W.3d 475, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 576 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

520. In a retaliation case, a court properly refused to allow impeachment of the victim with his prior theft convictions where they were more than 10 years old, the victim had no further diffculties with the law, and the probative value did not outweigh the danger of prejudice. Moore v. State, 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

521. Although no limiting instruction or an instruction regarding the burden of proof for extraneous acts was given or requested, the record on direct appeal did not establish that trial counsel's failure to request such instruction constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. Woods v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5564 (Tex. App. Eastland June 24 2004).

522. Habeas corpus petitioner, who was convicted of capital murder, failed to establish that trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by refusing to object to the State's impeachment by use of three misdemeanor convictions, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), because substantial impeachment evidence had already been admitted and the petitioner had opened the door to the use of his misdemeanor convictions. Morrow v. Dretke, 99 Fed. Appx. 505, 2004 U.S. App. LEXIS 10009 (5th Cir. Tex. 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 543 U.S. 944, 125 S. Ct. 359, 160 L. Ed. 2d 257, 2004 U.S. LEXIS 6989, 73 U.S.L.W. 3246 (2004).

523. On a charge of unlawful possession of a firearm, the trial court properly did not allow defendant to impeach the State's witness by explaining that the witness testified to the same effect in an earlier trial arising from the same events and that the prior jury found that defendant did assault the witness. The testimony was consistent, did not show bias, and did not involve the witness's own prior crime. Macias v. State, 136 S.W.3d 702, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4193 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

524. In a case involving drug possession, evidence of defendant's two prior drug convictions were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the theory of the defense rested entirely on defendant's credibility, despite the fact that the crimes occurred eight or nine years prior to the charged offense, and the offenses did not involve deception. Wooten v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4147 (Tex. App. Dallas May 6 2004).

525. Two citations for petty theft 13 or 14 years before trial, viewed alone, without any intervening convictions, had little bearing on the victim's present credibility; moreover, at least five other witnesses testified to defendant's threats against the victim, and thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the danger of unfair prejudice outweighed the probative value of the convictions. Moore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3017 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Waco July 21, 2004), substituted opinion at 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

526. In a criminal prosecution for possession of marijuana, the trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion in limine regarding the admission of his prior felony conviction of possession and distribution of cocaine. The prior felony conviction was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609, because the 10-year limit had not expired. Swaggerty v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2010 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2004).

527. Defendant's claim that the trial court erred by denying his motion to exclude evidence of his prior lengthy criminal history lacked merit, as he suggested no reason that such cross-examination would have been improper under Tex. R. Evid. 609, and his argument that allowing such impeachment deprived him of a fair and impartial trial pursuant to Tex. Const. art. I, § 10 also was not supported. Cochran v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1916 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 27 2004).

528. Although defense counsel's introduction of impeaching testimony ahead of the State might have supported defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel where impeachment by the State would have been improper under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) and (b), it was possible that it was important for the jury to know that the witness did not otherwise have a criminal record of any sort, that her single arrest was more than 11 years ago, and that the arrest was for possession of an item her then-boyfriend had in their house. Counsel therefore had a valid tactical reason for introducing the impeaching evidence, thereby defeating the ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Owen v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1556 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 18 2004).

529. In a resisting arrest case, although defendant's previous conviction for interference with the duties of a public servant was neither a felony nor a crime of moral turpitude and was thus not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), a court properly admitted the conviction to correct a false impression left by defendant where defendant's self-serving remarks about respect for police placed his attitude toward public servants into issue and were thus properly subject to impeachment to refute that false representation with contrary evidence. Paita v. State, 125 S.W.3d 708, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10432 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003).

530. In an aggravated robbery case, defense counsel was not ineffective in failing to object to the state's use of defendant's juvenile record for impeachment; although Tex. R. Evid. 609(d) provides that evidence of a juvenile adjudication generally is not admissible to impeach a witness, defendant opened the door to the admission of such evidence when he volunteered during cross-examination that he had never been in trouble before. Andrews v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9955 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 20 2003).

531. Pursuant to Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02(c), defendant was convicted of murdering the victim, defendant's infant son, and trial counsel's decision to elicit testimony regarding defendant's prior juvenile adjudication could not be considered reasonable trial strategy, as it was otherwise inadmissible as impeachment evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609 and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(i), and constituted deficient representation; however, because defendant failed to affirmatively show that the jury's consideration of a juvenile drug possession charge led the jury to assess the maximum punishment under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.32(a), in defendant's murder case, defendant could not establish that defendant was prejudiced, and thus, trial counsel's representation was not ineffective. Chapa v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 2091 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 12 2003).

532. Where defendant objected to the admission of the prior DWI convictions alleged in the indictment for felony driving while intoxicated, because they occurred more than 10 years before the instant offense, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04 and Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.09 together defined the offense of felony driving while intoxicated; a prior intoxication-related conviction used to raise the offense to a felony under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.09, is not an element of that offense, as Tex. Penal Code Ann § 49.09 does not describe the forbidden conduct, the required culpability, any required result, nor does it create an exception to the offense, as described in Tex. Penal Code § 1.07; Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.09 is more akin to a rule of admissibility, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), as opposed to an element of the offense. Weaver v. State, 87 S.W.3d 557, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 151 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002), cert denied, 538 U.S. 911, 123 S. Ct. 1491, 155 L. Ed. 2d 234, 2003 U.S. LEXIS 2056 (2003).

533. Convictions for sexual assault and forgery more than 10 years old were subject to the standard of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) and were not automatically unusable to impeach even though they were more than 10 years old, because the witness had a subsequent conviction for indecent exposure that was considered a crime of moral turpitude that vitiated the remoteness of the two other convictions. Woodall v. State, 77 S.W.3d 388, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3087 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

534. Under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), where more than 10 years have elapsed, a prior conviction will not be remote where the witness' lack of reformation is shown by evidence of an intervening conviction for a felony or a misdemeanor crime of moral turpitude. Woodall v. State, 77 S.W.3d 388, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3087 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

535. Evidence of lack of reformation of witnesses by subsequent felony and certain misdemeanor convictions can cause prior convictions to fall outside the general rule of Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), and make them not subject to the objection of remoteness. Woodall v. State, 77 S.W.3d 388, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3087 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

536. Moral turpitude is defined as including acts that are base, vile, or depraved. Woodall v. State, 77 S.W.3d 388, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3087 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

537. Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) is not applicable to impeach a complainant's conviction where she was discharged from probation less than 10 years before defendant's trial. Craig v. State, 82 S.W.3d 451, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 2542 (Tex. App. Austin 2002).

538. Where defendant was convicted of intoxication manslaughter and intoxication assault, the trial court abused its discretion by allowing defendant's prior felony convictions to be introduced to impeach his credibility, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609, where the convictions were improperly admitted as hearsay, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 806, when they were not in fact hearsay as defined by Tex. R. Evid. 801(d). Enriquez v. State, 56 S.W.3d 596, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 5450 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2001).

539. An exception applies to Tex. R. Evid. 609 when a witness makes statements concerning his criminal past which created a false impression with the jury as to the extent of either his prior (1) arrests, (2) convictions, (3) charges or (4) "trouble" with the police. Anaya v. State, 988 S.W.2d 823, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 988 (Tex. App. Amarillo 1999).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Inconsistent Statements

540. Because defendant testified to now knowing who was breaking into his car, the victim's prior criminal history and general reputation would have had no bearing on the reasonableness of defendant's actions, in defendant's murder trial, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion by not admitting this evidence; in any event, given that defendant was allowed to testify that the victim was a drug addict and had tried to sell him stolen car stereos, the exclusion of this evidence would have been harmless in any event. Freeman v. State, 230 S.W.3d 392, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3965 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : Involuntary Termination : General Overview

541. In a termination of parental rights proceeding arising from the death of a sibling, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 609 when the trial court admitted evidence of the parent's prior criminal convictions, some of which were more than 10 years old. Murray v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 294 S.W.3d 360, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6372 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 13 2009).

Immigration Law : Duties & Rights of Aliens : Discrimination

542. Illegal immigrant status of defendant driver should not have been admitted in a wrongful death and survival action stemming from a multi-fatality vehicular accident. The driver's immigration conviction did not meet the criteria of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). TXI Transp. Co. v. Hughes, 306 S.W.3d 230, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 212, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 431 (Tex. 2010).

Torts : Transportation Torts : General Overview

543. Illegal immigrant status of defendant driver should not have been admitted in a wrongful death and survival action stemming from a multi-fatality vehicular accident. The driver's immigration conviction did not meet the criteria of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). TXI Transp. Co. v. Hughes, 306 S.W.3d 230, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 212, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 431 (Tex. 2010).

Comment to 1998 change This is prior Rule of Criminal Evidence 615.

Pre-March 1, 1998 Comment This is a new rule, thus causing renumbering of former Rule 610 to 611.

While the rule forecloses inquiry into the religious beliefs or opinions of a witness for the purpose of showing that his character for truthfulness is affected by their nature, an inquiry for the purpose of showing interest or bias because of them is not within the prohibition. Thus disclosure of affiliation with a church which is a party to the litigation would be allowable under the rule.

TX - Texas Local, State & Federal Court Rules > STATE RULES > TEXAS RULES OF EVIDENCE > ARTICLE VI. WITNESSES

Rule 611 Mode and Order of Examining Witnesses and Presenting Evidence

(a) Control by the Court; Purposes.--The court should exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of examining witnesses and presenting evidence so as to:

(1)make those procedures effective for determining the truth;

(2)avoid wasting time; and

(3)protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

(b) Scope of Cross-Examination.--A witness may be cross-examined on any relevant matter, including credibility.

(c) Leading Questions.--Leading questions should not be used on direct examination except as necessary to develop the witness's testimony. Ordinarily, the court should allow leading questions:

(1)on cross-examination; and

(2)when a party calls a hostile witness, an adverse party, or a witness identified with an adverse party.

COMMENT

PUBLICATION REFERENCES. --See Texas Civil Trial Guide, Unit 20, Presentation of Evidence; Texas Litigation Guide, Ch. 120A, Presentation of Proof.

Pre-March 1, 1998 Comment This is former Rule 610; the number has been changed and the rule amended to permit leading questions in order to develop the testimony of the witness.

The purpose of the amendment is to permit, in the court's discretion, the use of leading questions on preliminary or introductory matters, refreshing memory, questions to ignorant or illiterate persons or children, all as permitted by prior Texas practice and the common law.

The rule also conforms to tradition in making the use of leading questions on cross-examination a matter of right. The purpose of the qualification "ordinarily" is to furnish a basis for denying the use of leading questions when the cross-examination is cross-examination in form only and not in fact, as for example the "cross-examination" of a party by his own counsel after being called by the opponent (savoring more of re-direct) or of an insured defendant who proves to be friendly to the plaintiff.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Administrative Law : Agency Adjudication : Hearings : Right to Hearing : Due Process

1. Where a sexually oriented business operator's request for a location exemption was denied, the operator was deprived of procedural due process during a hearing because an administrative law judge refused to allow the operator to re-examine witnesses after the board members had asked questions of those witnesses. City of Arlington v. Centerfolds, Inc., 232 S.W.3d 238, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4705 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Disclosures : Sanctions

2. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow damage evidence in a condemnation case under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 because the evidence in question was not disclosed under Tex. R. Civ. P. 194; there was no good cause shown due to counsel's inadvertence, and an owner would have been prejudiced thereby; moreover, cross-examination on this issue was properly excluded since it was not relevant to the case. Harris County v. Inter Nos, Ltd., 199 S.W.3d 363, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3849 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Civil Procedure : Trials : Bench Trials

3. On appeal of the final decree of divorce, the former wife claimed that the trial court improperly limited her cross-examination of her husband; she asserted that the trial court should have compelled him to respond to her questions regarding her contribution of funds to improve his separate property. The Court of Appeals of Texas found no error, because Tex. R. Evid. 611(a) permitted the trial court to exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses; the manner and scope of cross-examination was within the sound discretion of the trial court. Jackson v. Jackson, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2896 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 28 2009).

Civil Procedure : Judgments : Preclusion & Effect of Judgments : Estoppel : Collateral Estoppel

4. In a civil commitment proceeding, defense counsel's cross-examination of the subject inmate was not improperly limited because the inmate sought to collaterally attack the inmate's prior criminal convictions. In re Ramirez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12917, 2013 WL 5658597 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 17 2013).

Civil Procedure : Remedies : Damages : Compensatory Damages

5. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow damage evidence in a condemnation case under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 because the evidence in question was not disclosed under Tex. R. Civ. P. 194; there was no good cause shown due to counsel's inadvertence, and an owner would have been prejudiced thereby; moreover, cross-examination on this issue was properly excluded since it was not relevant to the case. Harris County v. Inter Nos, Ltd., 199 S.W.3d 363, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3849 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review

6. In an easement dispute, a fee segregation issue and a challenge to limits on cross-examination under Tex. R. Evid. 611 were not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 because they were not raised below; moreover, the record showed that thorough cross-examination had been permitted. Ferrara v. Moore, 318 S.W.3d 487, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5929 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 28 2010).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Reversible Errors

7. There was no reversible error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1 by a trial court's admission of evidence of appellate attorney's fees through an expert or re-direct and cross-examination because under Tex. R. Evid. 611, the trial court had control of the court and the scope of cross-examination and the direct examination included evidence of the expert's qualifications so that it was not totally unrelated. Tricon Tool & Supply, Inc. v. Thumann, 226 S.W.3d 494, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9953 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Civil Rights Law : Prisoner Rights : Access to Courts

8. In a termination of parental rights, the court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 611 by conducting the hearing with the incarcerated father appearing by telephone. In the Interest of D.S., 333 S.W.3d 379, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 495 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 25 2011).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Freedoms : Freedom of Religion : General Overview

9. In a delivery of a controlled substance case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in directing defendant to move his Bible to a place less visible than on top of counsel table because, by doing so, the trial court was acting within its inherent authority to conduct orderly, impartial trial proceedings under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a). Because the record did not demonstrate how the trial court's order interfered with defendant's free exercise of religion at all, much less "substantially," his complaint failed. Alexander v. State, 282 S.W.3d 143, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1712 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 11 2009).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Confrontation

10. Although a driver had the right under U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1 and Tex. Const. art. I, § 19 to cross-examine the officer who arrested him for driving while intoxicated after he was involved in an auto accident, the administrative law judge (ALJ) who suspended his driver's license was within her discretion to limit questioning on relevancy grounds pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 because the record showed that when the officer was asked by the ALJ if he had taken the driver's driving and possible culpability in causing the accident into consideration for probable cause to arrest him, the officer responded negatively. Because the officer did not take the fault of the accident into consideration in determining probable cause for intoxication, the issue was irrelevant. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Burrer, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3534 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 11 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

11. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by explaining to the State how to present rebuttal evidence where the comments about the admissibility of the State's rebuttal witness were made outside the presence of the jury, and they did not indicate that any assistance was given to the State; the judge was presented with an admissibility question under Tex. R. Evid. 613 and made a decision which left defendant with the choice of returning to the stand to preclude the testimony of the State's witness or remaining silent and relying on his original statement. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

12. Trial court did not impermissibly limit defendant's right to cross-examine witnesses as to alternative theories of how a child-sexual-assault complainant might have been injured because cross-examination was not limited regarding personal hygiene or tight-fitting clothes, but only as to buying or wearing revealing clothes. Cordero v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2834, 2012 WL 1248064 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 11 2012).

13. Under Tex. R. Evid. 611, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the State to lead the victim, a minor with certain special education needs, on particular aspects of her testimony regarding the offense of aggravated sexual assault. Lopez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 676, 2012 WL 256103 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 26 2012).

14. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the child's testimony regarding penetration was elicited by leading questions under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c). The rule against leading questions is somewhat relaxed in cases dealing with child witnesses. Acevedo v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10586 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 13 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Suppression of Evidence

15. Assistance of counsel was not rendered ineffective by a failure to object to hearsay and leading questions at a suppression hearing. The Texas Rules of Evidence, with the exception of privileges, did not apply to suppression hearings. Piper v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7601 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 25 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

16. Counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to 41 object to leading questions where defendant did not specifically identify any of the questions. Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2064, 2013 WL 765711 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 28 2013).

17. Defense counsel's failure to object to the prosecutor's questions to a reluctant child witness did not constitute ineffective assistance in defendant's trial for aggravated assault of the child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021; questions regarding previous accusations elicited cumulative evidence that included defendant's videotaped confession, and the State was permitted to ask leading questions and to impeach the child with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c) and 607. Brambila v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5959, 2009 WL 2356674 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 28 2009).

18. Failure to object to leading questions was not ineffective assistance of counsel because even if the questions were improper under Tex. R. Evid. 611, counsel may have had a reasonable, strategic decision for not objecting. Carey v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9052 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 16 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Confrontation

19. Trial court did not violate the Confrontation Clauses in discontinuing defendant's initial cross-examination of his mother during his murder trial because, after at least four hours in one day, the 73-year-old witness was tired, shaky, and not feeling well, and the trial court allowed defendant to resume the cross-examination when his mother returned five days later. Williams v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4251 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 11 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Fair Trial

20. Defendant failed to preserve for review, as required under Tex. R. App. P. 33, his claims that the trial court abandoned its role as a neutral arbiter and thereby denied defendant his right to a fair trial, as he failed to show that he was prejudiced and that the fundamental error doctrine applied under Tex. R. Evid. 103; the trial court was permitted to question a witness to clarify defendant's misstatement of the witness's testimony, it was permitted to intervene under Tex. R. Evid. 611 by asking the State for objections to defendant's questioning; the trial court's insistence that defendant ask a witness relevant questions did not translate into an indication of the judge's views about defendant's guilt or innocence. Bogany v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10074 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 20 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Testify

21. Court did not deny defendant the right to testify by improperly cutting short defendant's testimony because the trial court made multiple attempts to ensure that defendant acted in a nondisruptive fashion and in accordance with the procedural and evidentiary requirements of the forum; defendant ultimately proved that he would not do so, and (after fair warning and after holding him in contempt) the court ended his testimony. Allen v. State, 232 S.W.3d 776, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6098 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : General Overview

22. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a detective to testify in a narrative form because the testimony served to explain why he had reached the conclusion that the child victim's account of the sexual abuse was plausible, and defendant lodged no objection concerning the detective's qualifications to provide his opinion on the topic, nor did he object that the detective's opinion on the question was irrelevant. Romero v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5735, 2010 WL 2854307 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 21 2010).

23. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by explaining to the State how to present rebuttal evidence where the comments about the admissibility of the State's rebuttal witness were made outside the presence of the jury, and they did not indicate that any assistance was given to the State; the judge was presented with an admissibility question under Tex. R. Evid. 613 and made a decision which left defendant with the choice of returning to the stand to preclude the testimony of the State's witness or remaining silent and relying on his original statement. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Cross-Examination

24. Where defendant was convicted of DWI, he was not harmed by the trial court's refusal to allow him to cross-examine an officer about a specific act of dishonesty. Evidence that the officer intentionally withheld testimony about his failing to report a weapon discharge would not have achieved defendant's specific goal of proving that the officer lied about defendant's reckless driving; a video of defendant's stop strongly supported a finding that he was intoxicated. Tollett v. State, 422 S.W.3d 886, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1216, 2014 WL 462275 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 4 2014).

25. Trial court did not impermissibly restrict appellant's right to cross-examine the State's psychologist about his rate of error during proceedings to commit him as a sexually violent predator because it could have reasonably concluded that the jury would have been confused. In re Alexander, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12077, 2013 WL

5425557 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 26 2013).

26. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine an officer about the confidential informant because the disallowed questions were not relevant to the issue of defendant's guilt or innocence, as the State did not rely on events related to obtaining the search warrant in proving defendant's guilt. Nwaogu v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4588, 2013 WL 1490489 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 11 2013).

27. Even though the trial court erred by limiting defendant's cross-examination of a detective, the error was harmless because she was able to establish that the confidential informant (CI) was compensated for his services with the police department, and her cross-examination revealed that detectives failed to search the inside of his shoes and underwear. The recordings failed to indicate that the CI obtained controlled substances from his shoes, his underwear, or any source other than defendant. Bussey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 3 2012).

28. In a driving while intoxicated case, even if defendant should have been allowed to ask the arresting officer about his own driving record, refusing to allow the question was harmless because defendant had already successfully cross-examined the officer about some of the details of his two prior traffic accidents. Bridges v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9104, 2011 WL 5557534 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 16 2011).

29. In a driving while intoxicated case, a court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence from a safety manual that the horizontal gaze nystagmus test was only 77% accurate in predicting intoxication because the court expressed concern about opening the door for the percentages of all tests, how different studies resulted in different statistics, and whether the manual defendant had was the same edition the officer used in training. The trial court was properly concerned with the effective presentation of the evidence, confusion of the issues, and undue delay, so it restricted defendant's cross-examination into the specific statistics. Sedeno v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8984 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 25 2008).

30. Trial court did not violate the Confrontation Clauses in discontinuing defendant's initial cross-examination of his mother during his murder trial because, after at least four hours in one day, the 73-year-old witness was tired, shaky, and not feeling well, and the trial court allowed defendant to resume the cross-examination when his mother returned five days later. Williams v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4251 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 11 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Judicial Discretion

31. In a delivery of a controlled substance case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in directing defendant to move his Bible to a place less visible than on top of counsel table because, by doing so, the trial court was acting within its inherent authority to conduct orderly, impartial trial proceedings under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a). Because the record did not demonstrate how the trial court's order interfered with defendant's free exercise of religion at all, much less "substantially," his complaint failed. Alexander v. State, 282 S.W.3d 143, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1712 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 11 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Credibility

32. Court properly limited cross-examination of a witness because defendant's attempt to use an instance during an officer's career in which he wrote "phantom" warning citations was nothing more than an instance of wrongdoing in his life and was not shown to bear on his general reputation for truthfulness. There was nothing which revealed that the act of wrongdoing created a bias on the part of the officer against defendant or caused the officer to have a motive to testify untruthfully. McMillon v. State, 294 S.W.3d 198, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Alternatives : Probation : General Overview

33. In a drug case, questions posed to defendant regarding the amount of money found in his house did not exceed the scope of Tex. R. Evid. 611(b); the line of questioning tested defendant's credibility concerning the amount of money he made dealing drugs, and it bore on his suitability for community supervision. Quiroz v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5995 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 7 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Evidence

34. Trial court had the discretion to allow the prosecutor to read portions of an admitted exhibit into evidence at the punishment phase of trial. Bustamante v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10002 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 4 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : Civil Commitments

35. In a civil commitment proceeding, defense counsel's cross-examination of the subject inmate was not improperly limited because the inmate sought to collaterally attack the inmate's prior criminal convictions. In re Ramirez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12917, 2013 WL 5658597 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 17 2013).

36. In a civil commitment proceeding, defense counsel's cross-examination of an expert was not improperly limited because counsel sought to elicit information that did not make the existence of any fact of consequence to the determination of whether an inmate was a sexually violent predator more or less probable. In re Ramirez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12917, 2013 WL 5658597 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 17 2013).

37. Trial court did not impermissibly restrict appellant's right to cross-examine the State's psychologist about his rate of error during proceedings to commit him as a sexually violent predator because it could have reasonably concluded that the jury would have been confused. In re Alexander, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12077, 2013 WL 5425557 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 26 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

38. Defendant failed to preserve error for review where counsel cited Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 611 as the basis for the objection to the testimony of the victim's parents at sentencing. It was unclear from the record which part of Rule 611 was the basis of the objection, and the issue on appeal was different from the objection at trial. Foust v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 12 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 4 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

39. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the trial court erred by refusing to allow defense counsel to impeach the victim regarding his social networking history pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 611(b) because defendant's offer of proof did not include a summary of the proposed testimony. Barnett v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5516, 2012 WL 2832557 (Tex. App. El Paso July 11 2012).

40. Defendant failed to preserve for review his contention that the trial court erred when it allegedly failed to issue a ruling on the admissibility of impeachment evidence pertaining to the medical examiner who conducted the victim's autopsy because defendant failed to point out where in the record: (1) he asked the trial court to rule on the issue; (2) the trial court refused to rule on the request; and (3) defendant subsequently lodged an objection to that failure to rule. Coe v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4169, 2012 WL 1899179 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24

41. By failing to object and obtain an adverse ruling each time a prosecutor asked a leading question during a motion to suppress hearing, defendant failed, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) to preserve for review his issue under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c). Wise v. State, 223 S.W.3d 548, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 345 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

42. Because defendant failed to object to the relevance of his jailhouse tattoos, as opposed to an alleged gang affiliation, and failed to object to the State's continued questioning about his tattoos, testimony concerning his tattoos was admitted into evidence without objection. While defendant failed to obtain an adverse ruling in the first place, even if he had, he would have waived the objection by failing to either interpose it each time the evidence in question was offered or seek a running objection. Shipley v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2868, 2014 WL 1004498 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 14 2014).

43. Allegation that a trial court erred in a theft case by allowing rebuttal testimony was not preserved for review because no objection was made before the trial court. Hopkins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2861 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 9 2008).

44. Defendant failed to preserve for review, as required under Tex. R. App. P. 33, his claims that the trial court abandoned its role as a neutral arbiter and thereby denied defendant his right to a fair trial, as he failed to show that he was prejudiced and that the fundamental error doctrine applied under Tex. R. Evid. 103; the trial court was permitted to question a witness to clarify defendant's misstatement of the witness's testimony, it was permitted to intervene under Tex. R. Evid. 611 by asking the State for objections to defendant's questioning; the trial court's insistence that defendant ask a witness relevant questions did not translate into an indication of the judge's views about defendant's guilt or innocence. Bogany v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10074 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 20 2007).

45. Although the State asked a six-year-old sexual assault complainant numerous leading questions, defendant's trial counsel had objected only once, and because the one question objected to was not a leading question, the trial court did not err in overruling the objection; by not objecting to each leading question, defendant had not preserved his complaint for appellate review in accordance with Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1) and Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Embree v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7772 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 30 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : General Overview

46. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's argumentative objection to the State's questions concerning defendant's failure to subpoena two witnesses because reasonable persons could disagree concerning whether the objection was a comment on the evidence. Pardee v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6823, 2012 WL 3516485 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

47. No harm resulted, even if the prosecution was improperly permitted to treat witnesses as hostile, because defendant did not identify any leading questions that allegedly constituted testimony or improper impeachment. Howard v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3051, 2014 WL 2619087 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 20 2014).

48. In a driving while intoxicated case, even if defendant should have been allowed to ask the arresting officer about his own driving record, refusing to allow the question was harmless because defendant had already successfully cross-examined the officer about some of the details of his two prior traffic accidents. Bridges v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9104, 2011 WL 5557534 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 16 2011).

49. In defendant's assault case, although the trial court should have allowed defendant to ask a witness leading questions, the error was harmless. Defendant was not prevented from making inquiry into any of the areas he asserted that he wanted to explore, and he was able to establish through a detective that inconsistencies existed between the victim's testimony at trial and statements she made to officers. Weiss v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9453, 2009 WL 4757379 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 10 2009).

50. Any error arising from the officer's initial answers to leading questions by the prosecutor was harmless because the prosecutor later elicited, without objection, similar responses from the officer. Cooley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1625, 2009 WL 566466 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 5 2009).

51. Officer was called by the State to establish its case-in-chief as the State's lead investigator because (1) he served as the evidence custodian at the scene of the crime through whom the State admitted most of the physical evidence; (2) he obtained the warrants; (3) he arrested defendant; (4) he assisted in the collection of defendant's blood for DNA testing; and (5) he interrogated defendant and obtained his confession; thus, the officer was identified with the State and was hostile to defendant, but defendant failed to show how any particular subject matter of questioning was denied him through other means of examination than through leading questions; furthermore, under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2, any error in failing to allow defendant to question the officer (or indeed a second officer) using leading questions pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 611(c) was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt because (1) defendant could have used other means to question the officer; and (2) the State's case against defendant was strong, even with the damaging potential of the use of leading questions, because a glove was found at the crime scene with the victim's blood on the outside and defendant's DNA on the inside. Davis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2269 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 23 2007).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Visual Formats

52. In a driving while intoxicated case, the trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 611 by prohibiting the publication of videotape evidence to the jury in a timely manner, a decision preordained by the trial court's policy without reference to the facts and circumstances of the case. Packer v. State, 442 S.W.3d 375, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6210, 2011 WL 3484804 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 10 2011).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Judicial Intervention in Trials : Comments by Judges : General Overview

53. Trial court's conduct did not express to the jury an opinion on the weight of the evidence because both sides objected frequently to the other's questions, the trial court had to specifically admonish both sides to refrain from making side bar comments, the trial court sustained a number of defendant's objections, and it appeared that the trial court was attempting to control two aggressive lawyers. Hall v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4954, 2009 WL 1871681 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2009).

54. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by explaining to the State how to present rebuttal evidence where the comments about the admissibility of the State's rebuttal witness were made outside the presence of the jury, and they did not indicate that any assistance was given to the State; the judge was presented with an admissibility question under Tex. R. Evid. 613 and made a decision which left defendant with the choice of returning to the stand to preclude the testimony of the State's witness or remaining silent and relying on his original statement. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Judicial Intervention in Trials : Comments by Judges : Limitations

55. Trial court's comments to defendant in a jury's presence, if erroneous, did not constitute fundamental error because (1) the trial court warned defendant repeatedly to conform to a question and answer format instead of responding to questions in a narrative, story-telling manner; (2) the trial court's remarks were not a comment on the weight of defendant's evidence or testimony, under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.05, because the trial court made no reference, either directly or indirectly, to defendant's guilt or innocence; and (3) the trial court was attempting to expedite and maintain control over the trial, and exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of defendant's testimony and the presentation of evidence, under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a). Stribling v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5610 (Tex. App. Tyler July 18 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Judicial Intervention in Trials : Interrogation of Witnesses

56. Trial court's comments during a bench trial of a contract case, which included stating that certain matters were not relevant, did not reflect judicial bias and were a proper exercise of discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a) to maintain control over and expedite the trial proceedings; moreover, no harm was shown under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a). Allstar Nat'l Ins. Agency v. Johnson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6132, 2010 WL 2991058 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 29 2010).

57. Trial court's comments that defense counsel was repetitious and had gone beyond the scope of permitted questioning in a sexual assault case did not deny defendant a fair trial by an impartial jury and constituted a reasonable exercise of control over interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence to avoid needless consumption of time under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a)(2). Lorenzo v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5555, 2010 WL 2788757 (Tex. App. Austin July 14 2010).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : General Overview

58. Defendant failed to preserve error for review where counsel cited Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 611 as the basis for the objection to the testimony of the victim's parents at sentencing. It was unclear from the record which part of Rule 611 was the basis of the objection, and the issue on appeal was different from the objection at trial. Foust v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 12 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 4 2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Objections

59. Trial court granted defendant a running objection as to hearsay and he did not specifically object on the basis that the repeated details of the offenses were cumulative of other evidence, or unduly repetitive, and he has waived that objection, Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1); Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a); there was no abuse of discretion under the circumstances in the trial court's exercise of control over the manner in which the trial was conducted, Tex. R. Evid. 611(a). In re Adame, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4847, 2013 WL 3853386 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 18 2013).

60. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's argumentative objection to the State's questions concerning defendant's failure to subpoena two witnesses because reasonable persons could disagree concerning whether the objection was a comment on the evidence. Pardee v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6823, 2012 WL 3516485 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2012).

61. Defense counsel's failure to object to the prosecutor's questions to a reluctant child witness did not constitute ineffective assistance in defendant's trial for aggravated assault of the child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021; questions regarding previous accusations elicited cumulative evidence that included defendant's videotaped confession, and the State was permitted to ask leading questions and to impeach the child with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c) and 607. Brambila v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5959, 2009 WL 2356674 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 28 2009).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Offers of Proof

62. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the trial court erred by refusing to allow defense counsel to impeach the victim regarding his social networking history pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 611(b) because defendant's offer of proof did not include a summary of the proposed testimony. Barnett v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5516, 2012 WL 2832557 (Tex. App. El Paso July 11 2012).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

63. In a civil commitment proceeding, defense counsel's cross-examination of an expert was not improperly limited because counsel sought to elicit information that did not make the existence of any fact of consequence to the determination of whether an inmate was a sexually violent predator more or less probable. In re Ramirez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12917, 2013 WL 5658597 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 17 2013).

64. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine an officer about the confidential informant because the disallowed questions were not relevant to the issue of defendant's guilt or innocence, as the State did not rely on events related to obtaining the search warrant in proving defendant's guilt. Nwaogu v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4588, 2013 WL 1490489 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 11 2013).

65. Although a driver had the right under U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1 and Tex. Const. art. I, § 19 to cross-examine the officer who arrested him for driving while intoxicated after he was involved in an auto accident, the administrative law judge (ALJ) who suspended his driver's license was within her discretion to limit questioning on relevancy grounds pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 because the record showed that when the officer was asked by the ALJ if he had taken the driver's driving and possible culpability in causing the accident into consideration for probable cause to arrest him, the officer responded negatively. Because the officer did not take the fault of the accident into consideration in determining probable cause for intoxication, the issue was irrelevant. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Burrer, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3534 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 11 2005).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Sobriety Tests

66. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, defendant's right to present a defense was violated by a pretrial ruling that prohibited cross-examination of State experts on the general topic of the possible fallibility of the particular breath testing machine; the accuracy and reliability of the machine was clearly a matter relevant to an issue in the case under Tex. R. Evid. 611(b). Woodall v. State, 216 S.W.3d 530, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1304 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : General Overview

67. Defendant failed to preserve for review his contention that the trial court erred when it allegedly failed to issue a ruling on the admissibility of impeachment evidence pertaining to the medical examiner who conducted the victim's autopsy because defendant failed to point out where in the record: (1) he asked the trial court to rule on the issue; (2) the trial court refused to rule on the request; and (3) defendant subsequently lodged an objection to that failure to rule. Coe v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4169, 2012 WL 1899179 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2012).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : General Overview

68. Court properly limited cross-examination of a witness because defendant's attempt to use an instance during an officer's career in which he wrote "phantom" warning citations was nothing more than an instance of wrongdoing in his life and was not shown to bear on his general reputation for truthfulness. There was nothing which revealed that the act of wrongdoing created a bias on the part of the officer against defendant or caused the officer to have a motive to testify untruthfully. McMillon v. State, 294 S.W.3d 198, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : Specific Instances

69. Where defendant was convicted of DWI, he was not harmed by the trial court's refusal to allow him to cross-examine an officer about a specific act of dishonesty. Evidence that the officer intentionally withheld testimony about his failing to report a weapon discharge would not have achieved defendant's specific goal of proving that the officer lied about defendant's reckless driving; a video of defendant's stop strongly supported a finding that he was intoxicated. Tollett v. State, 422 S.W.3d 886, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1216, 2014 WL 462275 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 4 2014).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bias, Motive & Prejudice

70. After defendant was convicted of injury to a child, the trial court did not err in allowing the State's cross-examination of an expert witness during the punishment hearing because the State's cross-examination was an obvious attempt to show the witness's bias and impeach the witness's credibility under Tex. R. Evid. 611(b). Mauldin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2620, 2010 WL 1486959 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 15 2010).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Mental Incapacity

71. Absent some history of memory or perception problems such as delusions or some evidence of the potential side effects of a medication or the disabilities associated with a mental health condition that reflect on a witness's memory or perception, a trial court abuses its discretion by admitting mental health information for impeachment purposes. Torres v. Danny's Serv. Co., 266 S.W.3d 485, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5271 (Tex. App. Eastland 2008).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : One's Own Witnesses : Application : Hostility

72. Record was silent as to trial counsel's reasons for not objecting to the State's request to treat a witness as a hostile witness under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a), (c), but counsel might have had reasons for not doing so, and any of these reasons might explain a strategic motive behind this claimed instance of ineffective assistance and the court could not sustain defendant's point of error on this issue; to the extent that defendant's complaint might have encompassed a claim that counsel was ineffective by not objection to the State's attempt to impeach its own witness under Tex. R. Evid. 607, such was expressly permitted under the Rules and would not support a finding of ineffectiveness. Bryant v. State, 282 S.W.3d 156, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1737 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 13 2009).

73. Trial court did not err in permitting the State to treat a witness in punishment as hostile, ask him leading questions, and impeach him with a prior statement because: (1) under Tex. R. Evid. 607, a witness's credibility could be attacked by any party; (2) Tex. R. Evid. 611 allowed a hostile witness to be interrogated by leading questions; and (3) there was no showing that the primary purpose of the use of the prior statement was to admit evidence otherwise inadmissible, or that the trial court misused the evidence in assessing punishment. Huggins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9550 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 5 2007).

74. Where the State's witness, who had previously worked for defendant and who testified under a grant of immunity, expressed difficulty recalling relevant facts and answered several questions with gestures rather than spoken responses, the trial court did not err in allowing the State to attack the credibility of its witness because under Tex. R. Evid. 607, the witness could be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness; also, because the witness was a hostile witness, under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c), the trial court properly allowed the State to interrogate the witness using leading questions. Huggins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7495 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 12 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : General Overview

75. In a termination of parental rights case, appellant mother failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion when it orally stated time limits for each side's expert witness examinations under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a) but did not enforce any limit against her. Appellant never objected to the time limits during the expert examinations, and she never advised the trial court that she was unable to present any specific expert witness testimony due to the time limits. In re Z.C.J., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6937 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 22 2012).

76. Appellant claimed that the trial court's statements were comments to the jury that the witness was not believable, but the record showed that the questions were designed to clarify what the witness was saying, and at worst, the trial court used its authority to try to meet Tex. R. Evid. 611, and the court viewed the trial court's actions as making the witness's interrogation more effective; the trial court did not convey its opinion to the jury of any fact issue, and the court overruled appellant's claim of a violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.05. Thomas v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 809, 2012 WL 280578 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 31 2012).

77. Trial court's conduct did not express to the jury an opinion on the weight of the evidence because both sides objected frequently to the other's questions, the trial court had to specifically admonish both sides to refrain from making side bar comments, the trial court sustained a number of defendant's objections, and it appeared that the trial court was attempting to control two aggressive lawyers. Hall v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4954, 2009 WL 1871681 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2009).

78. Defendant argued that by allowing defendant's counsel to conduct the direct examination in a hearing to replace him, the trial court abdicated its responsibility under Tex. R. Evid. 611, but the court found that despite a tone of exasperation and possibly hostility in counsel's direct examination of defendant, it gave defendant a fair opportunity to tell the trial court why he thought he was entitled to new counsel, and the conflict defendant described arose from a conflict between defendant and counsel over trial strategy, not from counsel's representation of an adverse interest; if personality conflicts and disagreements over strategy and tactics warranted appointment of new counsel, a trial court's granting of a motion to replace counsel would be almost automatic, inevitably causing delay and obstructing orderly procedure, there was no authority for defendant's argument that the trial court should have appointed special counsel for the limited purpose of assisting him in showing cause for a change of counsel, and defendant's Sixth Amendment rights were not violated. Bates v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3118 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 30 2008).

79. Court did not deny defendant the right to testify by improperly cutting short defendant's testimony because the trial court made multiple attempts to ensure that defendant acted in a nondisruptive fashion and in accordance with the procedural and evidentiary requirements of the forum; defendant ultimately proved that he would not do so, and (after fair warning and after holding him in contempt) the court ended his testimony. Allen v. State, 232 S.W.3d 776, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6098 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

80. In a divorce proceeding, the husband's argument that the trial judge acted as an advocate for the wife and conspired with counsel to give custody of the children to the wife was rejected because it was found that the exchanges between the trial judge, counsel for the wife, and the husband were an attempt to manage what was apparently a contentious interchange. Thomas v. Robert, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1149 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 15 2007).

81. Court acknowledged the trial court's concern that conducting a hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 412 did not alleviate the emotional impact on the victim of answering questions from the accused regarding her past sexual conduct; however, Tex. R. Evid. 412 acts primarily as an evidentiary shield, preventing the defendant from shifting the focus of trial from his conduct to the character of the victim, and to the extent it is shown that a witness is uniquely vulnerable or needs protection from specific acts of intimidation, the trial court has discretion to fashion a remedy that both protects the witness and ensures adequate confrontation, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 611(a). LaPointe v. State, 196 S.W.3d 831, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

82. Trial court's restrictions on a witness's testimony were within its discretion where the court was avoiding needless consumption of time because defendant was asking questions about what the witness did not consider to be a violation of the restrictive covenants at issue in the case, whether the witness had protested the value assigned to his own property for property tax purposes, and whether individuals could enforce deed restrictions; those lines of questioning were either irrelevant to the legal question of whether defendant had violated the applicable deed restrictions or improperly called for a legal conclusion. Daniels v. Balcones Woods Club, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 957 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2006).

83. Because the prosecutor's question to a witness in no way suggested a particular answer, the court rejected defendant's claim that the trial court erred in allowing a leading question by the State during direct examination. Alexander v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10298 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 7, 2005).

84. Appellant did not establish that the trial court abused its discretion in permitting leading questions under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c). Watson v. Michael Haskins Photography, Inc., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9838 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 23 2005).

85. Defense counsel's initial objection under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c) was sustained and the trial court cautioned the State regarding leading questions; it was not an abuse of discretion to allow relaxed questioning of a child witness, who was emotionally distraught during questioning. Hernandez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6021 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 28 2005).

86. Although a driver had the right under U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1 and Tex. Const. art. I, § 19 to cross-examine the officer who arrested him for driving while intoxicated after he was involved in an auto accident, the administrative law judge (ALJ) who suspended his driver's license was within her discretion to limit questioning on relevancy grounds pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 because the record showed that when the officer was asked by the ALJ if he had taken the driver's driving and possible culpability in causing the accident into consideration for probable cause to arrest him, the officer responded negatively. Because the officer did not take the fault of the accident into consideration in determining probable cause for intoxication, the issue was irrelevant. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Burrer, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3534 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 11 2005).

87. Defendant's conviction for felony securities fraud was proper where his assertion that the State attempted to shift the burden of proof was unfounded pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 611(b). The State's questions on cross-examination were relevant to defendant's credibility, specifically, his testimony refuting that of the State's witnesses. Caron v. State, 162 S.W.3d 614, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1030 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

88. Trial court's decision to exclude the complainant's videotaped statements was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 611 where the complainant admitted unequivocally that her prior accusations of sexual abuse by her uncles were false. The trial court has sole discretion regarding the admissibility of evidence. McMillin v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 438 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 21 2005).

89. Defendant failed to preserve error for review where counsel cited Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 611 as the basis for the objection to the testimony of the victim's parents at sentencing. It was unclear from the record which part of Rule 611 was the basis of the objection, and the issue on appeal was different from the objection at trial. Foust v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 12 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 4 2005).

90. Witness was called by defendant, and it was clear that the State was permitted to ask leading questions pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 611(b), not Tex. R. Evid. 611(c); defendant presented no authority nor any relevant case law to support her implicit contention that the witness's status as an "adverse witness" necessarily prohibited the trial court from permitting the State to ask leading questions under Rule 611(b), and defendant elicited the same substantive testimony from the witness during her direct and redirect examination of the witness that she complained was introduced by the State through improper questioning, such that defendant failed to show how she was unduly prejudiced by the State's leading questions. Baltazar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4421 (Tex. App. El Paso May 13 2004).

91. Although defendant argued that the trial court's erroneous interpretation of Tex. R. Evid. 611(c) crippled her attempt to impeach a witness through police officer testimony, defendant did not call one detective as an adverse or hostile witness, nothing in his testimony indicated that he should have been treated as such, and defendant was not unduly prejudiced by the trial court's rulings concerning his testimony; there was no abuse of discretion in denying defendant's request to treat another detective as an adverse witness where by rephrasing the objected-to questions, defendant introduced the evidence she sought to elicit from the detective's testimony, including testimony concerning inconsistencies between a witness's testimony and her statement as read into the record, such that defendant failed to show any harm or that she was unduly prejudiced by the trial court's rulings concerning leading questions posed to the officers or the detectives. Baltazar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4421 (Tex. App. El Paso May 13 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Cross-Examination : General Overview

92. Court did not abuse its discretion by not allowing the patient's counsel to pose certain questions, because counsel provided an extensive cross-examination of the doctor concerning his opinion that the patient had a behavioral abnormality that made him likely to commit a predatory act of sexual violence, and courts were allowed discretion to control testimony to avoid confusing the jury. In re Romo, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13495 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2013).

93. Appellant did not preserve for review his claim regarding the limitation on an expert's testimony and the cross-examination of the victim, given that he did not make an offer of proof as to what questions he would have asked and the testimony he would have elicited, he did not summarize what the evidence would have shown, and counsel's comments of inconsistencies indicating the victim was not able to hold a memory did not amount to a formal offer of proof or an informal bill, as they did not reveal the substance of the evidence; the court could not conduct a proper harm analysis. Covarrubias v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1434, 2013 WL 557177 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 13 2013).

94. Ex-husband did not argue and the record did not show that the trial court abused its discretion in exercising its function regarding testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a). Goad v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6349 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 6 2010).

95. In an easement dispute, a fee segregation issue and a challenge to limits on cross-examination under Tex. R. Evid. 611 were not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 because they were not raised below; moreover, the record showed that thorough cross-examination had been permitted. Ferrara v. Moore, 318 S.W.3d 487, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5929 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 28 2010).

96. Although the State was correct in that a witness could be cross-examined on any matter relevant to any issue in the case, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 611(b), defendant's possession of cocaine was a specific act and was inadmissible for the purpose of impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and the trial court erred by admitting this evidence; at the time of trial, defendant had not been convicted of any crime arising out of his possession of cocaine, and therefore Tex. R. Evid. 609 did not apply. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

97. On appeal of the final decree of divorce, the former wife claimed that the trial court improperly limited her cross-examination of her husband; she asserted that the trial court should have compelled him to respond to her questions regarding her contribution of funds to improve his separate property. The Court of Appeals of Texas found no error, because Tex. R. Evid. 611(a) permitted the trial court to exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses; the manner and scope of cross-examination was within the sound discretion of the trial court. Jackson v. Jackson, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2896 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 28 2009).

98. In a driving while intoxicated case, a court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence from a safety manual that the horizontal gaze nystagmus test was only 77% accurate in predicting intoxication because the court expressed concern about opening the door for the percentages of all tests, how different studies resulted in different statistics, and whether the manual defendant had was the same edition the officer used in training. The trial court was properly concerned with the effective presentation of the evidence, confusion of the issues, and undue delay, so it restricted defendant's cross-examination into the specific statistics. Sedeno v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8984 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 25 2008).

99. Court read the State's cross-examination about the lack of corroborating evidence as an attack on defendant's credibility, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 607, not as an attempt to shift the burden of proof at trial; defendant admitted that his credibility was critical to his defense and the State's questioning was not improper, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 607, 611(b). Rogers v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6571 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 28, 2008).

100. Where a sexually oriented business operator's request for a location exemption was denied, the operator was deprived of procedural due process during a hearing because an administrative law judge refused to allow the operator to re-examine witnesses after the board members had asked questions of those witnesses. City of Arlington v. Centerfolds, Inc., 232 S.W.3d 238, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4705 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Cross-Examination : Scope

101. Because defendant failed to object to the relevance of his jailhouse tattoos, as opposed to an alleged gang affiliation, and failed to object to the State's continued questioning about his tattoos, testimony concerning his tattoos was admitted into evidence without objection. While defendant failed to obtain an adverse ruling in the first place, even if he had, he would have waived the objection by failing to either interpose it each time the evidence in question was offered or seek a running objection. Shipley v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2868, 2014 WL 1004498 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 14 2014).

102. Because information that revealed that the bias or interest of the State's medical expert was before the jury and the excluded information would not have added significantly to the inmate's ability to impeach his credibility, the trial court's ruling did not unduly restrict the inmate's cross-examination of the State's expert. In re Smith, 422 S.W.3d 802, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 667, 2014 WL 333374 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

103. Because information that revealed that the bias or interest of the State's medical expert was before the jury and the excluded information would not have added significantly to the inmate's ability to impeach his credibility, the trial court's ruling did not unduly restrict the inmate's cross-examination of the State's expert. In re Smith, 422

S.W.3d 802, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 667, 2014 WL 333374 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

104. Question about which defendant complained was relevant to show his credibility, and the State was free to try to discredit his testimony by showing it was untrue, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's objection. Stroner v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 41, 2014 WL 31218 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 3 2014).

105. In a case in which defendant was convicted of indecency with a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by limiting defendant's cross-examination of the victim's mother. Evidence that a male friend died of a drug overdose while in the mother's home was irrelevant to whether the mother had any ill feeling, bias, motive, interest, or animus that would lead her to fabricate allegations against defendant. Utkov v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8147, 2012 WL 4470910 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 26 2012).

106. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a sexually violent predator commitment proceeding by restricting the sex offender's cross-examination of one of the State's expert witnesses where the expert provided an extensive psychological analysis that fully explained the basis for his opinion that the sex offender had a behavioral abnormality that made him likely to commit a predatory act of sexual violence because the offer of proof demonstrated that the expert had a valid explanation for giving more consideration to some data in the records over other, contradictory data. Moreover, at the conclusion of the offer of proof, the trial court advised the sex offender's counsel that counsel would be allowed to ask why the expert had rejected the sex offender's assertion that he had not committed the prior crimes, but counsel chose not to do so. In re Commitment of Hinchey, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7582, 2012 WL 3853186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 6 2012).

107. Any error in limiting the cross-examination of an accomplice on a forfeiture issue was rendered harmless by his later admission that his property had been taken by the State, plus the jury had many reasons to doubt his credibility, including that the jury was aware the accomplice might have had an interest in testifying for the State. Lopez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7231, 2012 WL 3731731 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 29 2012).

108. Counsel did not claim to want to cross-examine a witness about a potential bias, no offer of proof was made, plus counsel's complaint was different than the one made on appeal, as counsel asked to visit the witness's criminal matters, and the trial court denied the request because convictions were not involved, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), and thus appellant waived complaints under Tex. R. Evid. 611 and the Sixth Amendment concerning the limitations on the cross-examination of the witness, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A); even absent waiver, the court would have overruled the claims, given that (1) there was no causal connection between the witness's deferred adjudication and his testimony, and (2) nothing showed the existence or expectation of a deal in the deferred adjudication case. Mcburnett v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5300, 2012 WL 2583407 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 5 2012).

109. Trial court permitted defendant's counsel to conduct a thorough cross-examination of the State's expert at trial; considering the extensive cross-examination regarding matters relating to defendant's records, and the discretion allowed trial courts to control the testimony, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by limiting further development to include the subject of shoplifting, Tex. R. Evid. 611. In re Campbell, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5125, 2012 WL 2451620 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 28 2012).

110. Even though the trial court erred by limiting defendant's cross-examination of a detective, the error was harmless because she was able to establish that the confidential informant (CI) was compensated for his services with the police department, and her cross-examination revealed that detectives failed to search the inside of his shoes and underwear. The recordings failed to indicate that the CI obtained controlled substances from his shoes, his underwear, or any source other than defendant. Bussey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 3 2012).

111. Defense counsel pursued a subject in a backdoor effort to introduce evidence of appellant's acquittal, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion by restricting the cross-examination under Tex. R. Evid. 611(b); appellant did not present anything other than her acquittal that would have raised double jeopardy issues, and thus testimony concerning her acquittal was not relevant. Bussey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1505, 2012 WL 626316 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 3 2012).

112. Fact that no cocaine was found on appellant or in her house would have been relevant to assessing whether she possessed cocaine on an earlier point in time, but although the court found that matters concerning the search and arrest warrant were relevant, limiting the scope of cross-examination of a detective, while error, did not contribute to appellant's conviction or punishment, given that (1) the detective's testimony was cumulative to a certain extent, (2) much of his testimony was corroborated by recordings that were admitted into evidence, (3) appellant did not introduce evidence that contradicted the detective's testimony, (4) appellant was allowed to fully cross-examine the detective, except for search warrant testimony, and (5) the State presented a strong case. Bussey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1505, 2012 WL 626316 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 3 2012).

113. Even if defendant's civil suit against the police might have raised an inference of bias that would make it the subject of cross-examination in a criminal trial under Tex. R. Evid. 611(b), defendant failed to show that the exclusion of the evidence about the pending civil case affected defendant's substantial rights. Van Goffney v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5334, 2011 WL 2731850 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 13 2011).

114. In a drug trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 611(b) in limiting defendant's cross-examination of a detective as to (1) payments made to an informant who was admittedly in the country illegally, (2) whether or not those payments were reported to the Internal Revenue Service, and (3) whether or not the detective sought or received permission from federal authorities to have the informant in the country working as an agent of law enforcement. Perez-gonzalez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3045, 2010 WL 1645062 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 26 2010).

115. After defendant was convicted of injury to a child, the trial court did not err in allowing the State's cross-examination of an expert witness during the punishment hearing because the State's cross-examination was an obvious attempt to show the witness's bias and impeach the witness's credibility under Tex. R. Evid. 611(b). Mauldin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2620, 2010 WL 1486959 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 15 2010).

116. In a drug case, questions posed to defendant regarding the amount of money found in his house did not exceed the scope of Tex. R. Evid. 611(b); the line of questioning tested defendant's credibility concerning the amount of money he made dealing drugs, and it bore on his suitability for community supervision. Quiroz v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5995 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 7 2008).

117. Absent some history of memory or perception problems such as delusions or some evidence of the potential side effects of a medication or the disabilities associated with a mental health condition that reflect on a witness's memory or perception, a trial court abuses its discretion by admitting mental health information for impeachment purposes. Torres v. Danny's Serv. Co., 266 S.W.3d 485, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5271 (Tex. App. Eastland 2008).

118. Although defendant claimed that counsel was ineffective for failing to object to extraneous offense evidence elicited by the State from defendant's wife, the testimony in question was elicited on redirect examination after defense counsel questioned the wife on cross-examination as to whether she had called police with allegations of assault by defendant, and the court noted that, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 611(b), the evidence elicited likely was admissible, and failure to object to admissible testimony did not constitute ineffective assistance; counsel's actions were part of a reasonable trial strategy to show that defendant's wife was biased, that a strategy did not work did not mean counsel was ineffective, and because the record was silent as to why counsel failed to object, the court had to presume that counsel's actions were reasonably based on sound trial strategy. Mathews v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5349 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 5 2007).

119. In a divorce proceeding, where a husband alleged that counsel was not allowed sufficient time to cross examine the wife in order to rebut false testimony regarding the issue of passports and the wife's travel to India, a fair reading of the record did not disclose the denial of the vital right of cross examination. Thomas v. Robert, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1149 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 15 2007).

120. Because a county attorney served as a charged individual's attorney in a prior case being used by the State to enhance the individual's potential punishment, pursuant to Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.42(d), for driving while intoxicated, and the attorney possessed confidential information as a result of the prior representation, the court granted mandamus relief and found that disqualification of the attorney was proper; if the individual chose to testify, the attorney was free to cross-examine the individual about alcohol use and abuse under Tex. R. Evid. 611(b), the individual's due process rights would have been violated if there was no disqualification, and mandamus relief under Tex. Gov't Code Ann. § 22.221(b) was appropriate as an appeal was not an adequate remedy, given that (1) if convicted and given a sentence enhancement or a sentence over nine years in jail, the individual would have been ineligible for release on bond under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 44.04(b), and (2) the individual was not entitled to bond pending the determination of a post-conviction application for habeas corpus relief under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 11.07, § 5. In re Goodman, 210 S.W.3d 805, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10815 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

121. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow damage evidence in a condemnation case under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 because the evidence in question was not disclosed under Tex. R. Civ. P. 194; there was no good cause shown due to counsel's inadvertence, and an owner would have been prejudiced thereby; moreover, cross-examination on this issue was properly excluded since it was not relevant to the case. Harris County v. Inter Nos, Ltd., 199 S.W.3d 363, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3849 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Direct Examination

122. Attorney's testimony during redirect examination about his legal assistant's qualifications was not unrelated to the matters testified about on direct and cross-examination, plus the lenders had the chance to cross-examine the attorney on the qualifications of the legal assistant, but did not do so; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting the attorney's testimony, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 611(b), in connection with the issue of attorney fees under the Uniform Declaratory Judgment Act. Jarvis v. K&e re One, Llc, 390 S.W.3d 631, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9927, 2012 WL 5987385 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 30 2012).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Leading Questions

123. Record did not suggest that the State's leading questions supplied the child complainant with a false memory, in connection with defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault. Torres v. State, 424 S.W.3d 245, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1900, 2014 WL 685844 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 20 2014).

124. Defendant's aggravated robbery with a deadly weapon conviction was appropriate, in part because the prosecutor's question was not a leading question under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c). The prosecutor did not suggest the desired answer, instruct the witness how to answer, or put words into her mouth. Hernandez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9499, 2012 WL 5520422 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 15 2012).

125. At the punishment phase of defendant's trial for unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony from defendant's sister about her removal from her home to foster care after she wrote a letter describing defendant's sexual abuse. While the State did ask the witness some leading questions, her answer regarding the identity of her attacker was not in response to a leading question; therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing some leading questions under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c). Ajvazi v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8900, 2012 WL 5293346 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 26 2012).

126. As to certain complaints of leading questions, although the court did not consider the rulings to be outside the zone of reasonable disagreement given the fact that a child witness was involved, even if the court found that the questions were impermissibly leading, the errors were not harmful, as one question did not relate directly to any element of the offenses, and the victim did not follow the lead of the prosecutor. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7721 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

127. Appellant could not have been harmed by any of the other testimony that was elicited by questions challenged on appeal as leading, and the cross-examination of the child victim mooted most of the objections; under the circumstances of examining the victim about the subjects of compelling prostitution and sexual abuse, the court did not find that the rulings overruling leading question objections were an abuse of discretion, and even if the trial court had erred, appellant was not harmed because the same information was introduced either through cross-examination or without objection. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7721 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

128. Under Tex. R. Evid. 611, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the State to lead the victim, a minor with certain special education needs, on particular aspects of her testimony regarding the offense of aggravated sexual assault. Lopez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 676, 2012 WL 256103 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 26 2012).

129. In defendant's murder trial after he shot an unarmed man following a drunken argument at a strip club, the prosecutor did not ask impermissible leading questions of its witnesses because leading questions were those that suggested the answer to the witness and asking a witness how much larger defendant was than the victim was not a question that suggested how the witness was to answer. Vasquez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3227, 2011 WL 1640244 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 28 2011).

130. In defendant's assault case, although the trial court should have allowed defendant to ask a witness leading questions, the error was harmless. Defendant was not prevented from making inquiry into any of the areas he asserted that he wanted to explore, and he was able to establish through a detective that inconsistencies existed between the victim's testimony at trial and statements she made to officers. Weiss v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9453, 2009 WL 4757379 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 10 2009).

131. In a case where a witness was with defendant and the others when the victim was murder, the State's question about whether the witness killed the victim was not a leading question because, although it only required a "yes" or "no" answer, it did not suggest an answer. Saenz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2254 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 2 2009).

132. Any error arising from the officer's initial answers to leading questions by the prosecutor was harmless because the prosecutor later elicited, without objection, similar responses from the officer. Cooley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1625, 2009 WL 566466 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 5 2009).

133. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the court did not err by permitting the State to ask leading questions during its direct examination of the nine-year-old victim because the victim had to be reminded more than once to speak louder, she appeared to be very reluctant to testify about the events in front of a courtroom full of people, she was having trouble remembering the events that had occurred over a year before trial, and she was eventually overcome with emotion during direct examination. Defendant was able to cross-examine her and much the same testimony was elicited again during that cross-examination. Padilla v. State, 278 S.W.3d 98, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 722 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 5 2009).

134. In a sexual assault case, defendant was not entitled to relief regarding the prosecutor's use of leading questions of the child victim because the only complained-of question was never answered, and there was no request for a jury instruction to disregard the question. Defendant obtained all the relief requested. Mendoza v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9006 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 4 2008).

135. Trial court did not err in permitting the State to treat a witness in punishment as hostile, ask him leading questions, and impeach him with a prior statement because: (1) under Tex. R. Evid. 607, a witness's credibility could be attacked by any party; (2) Tex. R. Evid. 611 allowed a hostile witness to be interrogated by leading questions; and (3) there was no showing that the primary purpose of the use of the prior statement was to admit evidence otherwise inadmissible, or that the trial court misused the evidence in assessing punishment. Huggins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9550 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 5 2007).

136. Where the State's witness, who had previously worked for defendant and who testified under a grant of immunity, expressed difficulty recalling relevant facts and answered several questions with gestures rather than spoken responses, the trial court did not err in allowing the State to attack the credibility of its witness because under Tex. R. Evid. 607, the witness could be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness; also, because the witness was a hostile witness, under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c), the trial court properly allowed the State to interrogate the witness using leading questions. Huggins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7495 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 12 2007).

137. Officer was called by the State to establish its case-in-chief as the State's lead investigator because (1) he served as the evidence custodian at the scene of the crime through whom the State admitted most of the physical evidence; (2) he obtained the warrants; (3) he arrested defendant; (4) he assisted in the collection of defendant's blood for DNA testing; and (5) he interrogated defendant and obtained his confession; thus, the officer was identified with the State and was hostile to defendant, but defendant failed to show how any particular subject matter of questioning was denied him through other means of examination than through leading questions; furthermore, under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2, any error in failing to allow defendant to question the officer (or indeed a second officer) using leading questions pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 611(c) was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt because (1) defendant could have used other means to question the officer; and (2) the State's case against defendant was strong, even with the damaging potential of the use of leading questions, because a glove was found at the crime scene with the victim's blood on the outside and defendant's DNA on the inside. Davis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2269 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 23 2007).

138. In a failure to stop case, the court did not prevent defendant from explaining the statements she made to police after her arrest by repeatedly sustaining the prosecutor's objections to leading questions because each question that was disallowed by the court required defendant to confirm or deny statements of her lawyer; the court did not prevent the questions from being asked; the court instructed counsel to rephrase the question. Martinez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 927 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 8 2007).

139. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the child's testimony regarding penetration was elicited by leading questions under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c). The rule against leading questions is somewhat relaxed in cases dealing with child witnesses. Acevedo v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10586 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 13 2006).

140. Although the State asked a six-year-old sexual assault complainant numerous leading questions, defendant's trial counsel had objected only once, and because the one question objected to was not a leading question, the trial court did not err in overruling the objection; by not objecting to each leading question, defendant had not preserved his complaint for appellate review in accordance with Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1) and Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Embree v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7772 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 30 2006).

141. Assuming without deciding that the trial court erred in overruling defendant's leading question objection, the error was cured when the prosecutor elicited the same testimony without objection, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1), a moment later. Caudle v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3199 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 20 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : General Overview

142. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a sexually violent predator commitment proceeding by restricting the sex offender's cross-examination of one of the State's expert witnesses where the expert provided an extensive psychological analysis that fully explained the basis for his opinion that the sex offender had a behavioral abnormality that made him likely to commit a predatory act of sexual violence because the offer of proof demonstrated that the expert had a valid explanation for giving more consideration to some data in the records over other, contradictory data. Moreover, at the conclusion of the offer of proof, the trial court advised the sex offender's counsel that counsel would be allowed to ask why the expert had rejected the sex offender's assertion that he had not committed the prior crimes, but counsel chose not to do so. In re Commitment of Hinchey, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7582, 2012 WL 3853186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 6 2012).

143. In a condemnation action, the trial court was permitted to limit each side to one expert witness in accordance with its authority under Tex. R. Evid. 611 to control the presentation of evidence. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding additional testimony from two more expert witnesses offered by the state on the issue of compensation due the landowner for the condemned property. State v. Gaylor Inv. Trust P'ship, 322 S.W.3d 814, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7114 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 31 2010).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Admissibility

144. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a detective to testify in a narrative form because the testimony served to explain why he had reached the conclusion that the child victim's account of the sexual abuse was plausible, and defendant lodged no objection concerning the detective's qualifications to provide his opinion on the topic, nor did he object that the detective's opinion on the question was irrelevant. Romero v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5735, 2010 WL 2854307 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 21 2010).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : General Overview

145. Trial court's restrictions on a witness's testimony were within its discretion where the court was avoiding needless consumption of time because defendant was asking questions about what the witness did not consider to be a violation of the restrictive covenants at issue in the case, whether the witness had protested the value assigned to his own property for property tax purposes, and whether individuals could enforce deed restrictions; those lines of questioning were either irrelevant to the legal question of whether defendant had violated the applicable deed restrictions or improperly called for a legal conclusion. Daniels v. Balcones Woods Club, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 957 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Presentation of Evidence

146. Because information that revealed that the bias or interest of the State's medical expert was before the jury and the excluded information would not have added significantly to the inmate's ability to impeach his credibility, the trial court's ruling did not unduly restrict the inmate's cross-examination of the State's expert. In re Smith, 422 S.W.3d 802, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 667, 2014 WL 333374 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

147. Defendant, who was deaf, had no basis for his contention that the denial of his motion to control the pace of the questions and answers of the witnesses at trial constituted a denial of his right to counsel. The trial court exercised reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogation of the witnesses and the presentation of the evidence at trial. In re Chappell, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 668, 2014 WL 346090 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

148. Because information that revealed that the bias or interest of the State's medical expert was before the jury and the excluded information would not have added significantly to the inmate's ability to impeach his credibility, the trial court's ruling did not unduly restrict the inmate's cross-examination of the State's expert. In re Smith, 422 S.W.3d 802, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 667, 2014 WL 333374 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

149. Defendant, who was deaf, had no basis for his contention that the denial of his motion to control the pace of the questions and answers of the witnesses at trial constituted a denial of his right to counsel. The trial court exercised reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogation of the witnesses and the presentation of the evidence at trial. In re Chappell, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 668, 2014 WL 346090 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

150. Trial court granted defendant a running objection as to hearsay and he did not specifically object on the basis that the repeated details of the offenses were cumulative of other evidence, or unduly repetitive, and he has waived that objection, Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1); Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a); there was no abuse of discretion under the circumstances in the trial court's exercise of control over the manner in which the trial was conducted, Tex. R. Evid. 611(a). In re Adame, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4847, 2013 WL 3853386 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 18 2013).

151. Court did not err by not allowing defendant further direct examination of a witness because the record showed the jury heard testimony that the witness evaluated defendant and provided a competency report. Additionally, the witness testified that her testing of defendant pertained to "neurocognitive abilities or deficits" and she testified that another witness did not have the same training that she had respecting testing. Smith v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8848, 2012 WL 5238280 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 24 2012).

152. In a termination of parental rights case, appellant mother failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion when it orally stated time limits for each side's expert witness examinations under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a) but did not enforce any limit against her. Appellant never objected to the time limits during the expert examinations, and she never advised the trial court that she was unable to present any specific expert witness testimony due to the time limits. In re Z.C.J., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6937 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 22 2012).

153. Trial court's comments during a bench trial of a contract case, which included stating that certain matters were not relevant, did not reflect judicial bias and were a proper exercise of discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a) to maintain control over and expedite the trial proceedings; moreover, no harm was shown under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a). Allstar Nat'l Ins. Agency v. Johnson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6132, 2010 WL 2991058 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 29 2010).

154. Trial court's comments that defense counsel was repetitious and had gone beyond the scope of permitted questioning in a sexual assault case did not deny defendant a fair trial by an impartial jury and constituted a reasonable exercise of control over interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence to avoid needless consumption of time under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a)(2). Lorenzo v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5555, 2010 WL 2788757 (Tex. App. Austin July 14 2010).

155. Trial court judge's comment to the victim after he testified, that he was "pretty brave" and that he could go sit with his parents if he wanted to, was part of a larger effort to make the child, who was in elementary school, comfortable in the courtroom, and the court could not find that the comment was implied approval of the State's argument or indicated disbelief in the defense's position; the trial judge's conversation with the child before and after his testimony was meant to assist him and ease his apprehensions, the trial judge maintained an impartial attitude and did not abandon his role as neutral adjudicator, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 611(a), and the statement was not improper under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.05. Villarreal v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2947, 2010 WL 1618649 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 22 2010).

156. Comment made by the trial judge to a child witness following her testimony was not indicative of bias and did not otherwise taint defendant's presumption of innocence, and he was required to object; his failure to do so precluded review of the issue on appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), but even if preserved, the court still found no error because the trial judge was trying to ease the child's apprehensions and did not abandon his role as neutral adjudicator for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 611(a). Villarreal v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2947, 2010 WL 1618649 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 22 2010).

157. Allegation that a trial court erred in a theft case by allowing rebuttal testimony was not preserved for review because no objection was made before the trial court. Hopkins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2861 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 9 2008).

158. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in endeavoring to confine the pro se litigants to the relevant issues and to maintain civility in the courtroom. Chambers v. Pruitt, 241 S.W.3d 679, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9631 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

159. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 611, a trial court did not abuse its discretion in setting a time limitation on a mother's testimony in a proceeding in which a father sought to be appointed sole managing conservator of the parties' child where the trial court allowed the mother over two-and-one-half hours to present her testimony even though she had requested one-half of a day; because the mother represented herself, she testified by narration as opposed to question and answer format, and the trial court noted that two-and-one-half hours of narrative monolog was essentially equivalent to one-half day of question and answer testimony. In re M.A.S., 233 S.W.3d 915, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7540 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

160. Trial court's comments to defendant in a jury's presence, if erroneous, did not constitute fundamental error because (1) the trial court warned defendant repeatedly to conform to a question and answer format instead of responding to questions in a narrative, story-telling manner; (2) the trial court's remarks were not a comment on the weight of defendant's evidence or testimony, under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.05, because the trial court made no reference, either directly or indirectly, to defendant's guilt or innocence; and (3) the trial court was attempting to expedite and maintain control over the trial, and exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of defendant's testimony and the presentation of evidence, under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a). Stribling v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5610 (Tex. App. Tyler July 18 2007).

161. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a child custody modification hearing by limiting a mother's testimony to two and one-half hours, presented as narrative monologue rather than question-and-answer testimony, since the two were essentially equivalent. In re M.A.S., 222 S.W.3d 854, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2937 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

162. There was no reversible error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1 by a trial court's admission of evidence of appellate attorney's fees through an expert or re-direct and cross-examination because under Tex. R. Evid. 611, the trial court had control of the court and the scope of cross-examination and the direct examination included evidence of the expert's qualifications so that it was not totally unrelated. Tricon Tool & Supply, Inc. v. Thumann, 226 S.W.3d 494, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9953 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Family Law : Child Custody : Procedures

163. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 611, a trial court did not abuse its discretion in setting a time limitation on a mother's testimony in a proceeding in which a father sought to be appointed sole managing conservator of the parties' child where the trial court allowed the mother over two-and-one-half hours to present her testimony even though she had requested one-half of a day; because the mother represented herself, she testified by narration as opposed to question and answer format, and the trial court noted that two-and-one-half hours of narrative monolog was essentially equivalent to one-half day of question and answer testimony. In re M.A.S., 233 S.W.3d 915, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7540 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

164. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a child custody modification hearing by limiting a mother's testimony to two and one-half hours, presented as narrative monologue rather than question-and-answer testimony, since the two were essentially equivalent. In re M.A.S., 222 S.W.3d 854, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2937 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : Involuntary Termination : General Overview

165. In a termination of parental rights, the court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 611 by conducting the hearing with the incarcerated father appearing by telephone. In the Interest of D.S., 333 S.W.3d 379, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 495 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 25 2011).

Governments : Courts : Authority to Adjudicate

166. In a condemnation action, the trial court was permitted to limit each side to one expert witness in accordance with its authority under Tex. R. Evid. 611 to control the presentation of evidence. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding additional testimony from two more expert witnesses offered by the state on the issue of compensation due the landowner for the condemned property. State v. Gaylor Inv. Trust P'ship, 322 S.W.3d 814, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7114 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 31 2010).

THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH August 16, 2020

Rule 612 Writing Used to Refresh a Witness's Memory

(a) Scope.--This rule gives an adverse party certain options when a witness uses a writing to refresh memory:

(1)while testifying;

(2)before testifying, in civil cases, if the court decides that justice requires the party to have those options; or

(3)before testifying, in criminal cases.

(b) Adverse Party's Options; Deleting Unrelated Matter.--An adverse party is entitled to have the writing produced at the hearing, to inspect it, to cross-examine the witness about it, and to introduce in evidence any portion that relates to the witness's testimony. If the producing party claims that the writing includes unrelated matter, the court must examine the writing in camera, delete any unrelated portion, and order that the rest be delivered to the adverse party. Any portion deleted over objection must be preserved for the record.

(c) Failure to Produce or Deliver the Writing.--If a writing is not produced or is not delivered as ordered, the court may issue any appropriate order. But if the prosecution does not comply in a criminal case, the court must strike the witness's testimony or - if justice so requires - declare a mistrial.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Privileged Matters : Attorney-Client Privilege

1. Chemical company was entitled to conditional mandamus relief when a trial court ordered the company to produce a confidential research memorandum prepared by an attorney from a law firm that had represented the company in a failed real estate transaction; although a limited partnership claimed that the trial court had discretion to order production of a writing used to refresh memory for the purpose of testifying and Tex. R. Evid. 612 generally dealt with writings used to refresh recollection, the memorandum also was privileged, and Tex. R. Evid. 503 rather than Tex. R. Evid. 612 described the circumstances under which a document subject to the attorney-client privilege was subject to disclosure; the company did not waive the privilege on the ground that the memorandum established that the company possessed a certain document on an earlier date than admitted by the company through its witnesses and in the company's discovery responses because the witness testified that he did not recall whether he had a copy of the document when he helped draft a certain document and the company amended the relevant discovery response to reflect that its counsel possessed the document in question ten days before the date of an initial research memorandum; thus, the memorandum was consistent with the discovery responses. In re Chevron Phillips Chem. Co. LP, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 25 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : General Overview

2. While the trial court erred by failing to allow defense counsel to inspect the report used by a testifying officer during the pretrial suppression hearing to refresh her memory under Tex. R. Evid. 612, and while the order sealing the report was also error, those errors were harmless because the document contained nothing that defendant could have used at trial to impeach the officer or the State's case. Davis v. State, 93 S.W.3d 664, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8652 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : Admission of Evidence

3. Where defendant claimed that the trial court violated Tex. R. Evid. 612 during his murder trial by denying him the opportunity to inspect a report that a detective used in preparation for his testimony, it was unclear what right he was denied by not having access to the full report; defendant failed to object to any problem associated with receiving the outline instead of the full report; as a result, defendant waived any error. Lane v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8912 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 17 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

4. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to admit into evidence a standardized field sobriety test scoring sheet because the officer testified that, although the document was in his possession while testifying, he did not use it to refresh his testimony. Thomas v. State, 336 S.W.3d 703, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9558 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 30 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

5. Although defendant should have been permitted to refresh a witness' memory with phone records as to the time of a call, the trial court's exclusion of her testimony was harmless error because the time of the call was not pertinent. Sibley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6266, 2009 WL 2461273 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 12 2009).

Evidence : Documentary Evidence : Writings : General Overview

6. Trial court did not err by denying defendant's request to review the contents of the file of the police department's sex-offender registrar under Tex. R. Evid. 612 because no one asked the witness if or when she used the entire file in order to refresh her memory. Mata v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6939, 2013 WL 2639190 (Tex. App. Waco June 6 2013).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Recorded Recollection : Criminal Trials

7. During a criminal trial, defendant requested that the State produce the witness's written statement prior to cross-examining the witness; the trial court denied defendant's request because the witness testified that he did not use the statement to refresh his memory in accordance with Tex. R. Evid. 612; however, the statement should have been made available to defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 615 for impeachment purposes. Patterson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 943 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 7 2008).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Recorded Recollection : Recollection Refreshed

8. In a mother's termination of parental rights case, the court properly denied her motion to review a therapist's notes because the testimony of other witnesses was consistent with the testimony of the therapist, the court noted that because the therapist reviewed her notes before testifying, it had the discretion to deny access to them, and the notes were cumulative of testimony that had already been presented. In the Interest of H.L.B., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9004 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 23 2013).

9. Trial court did not err by denying defendant's request to review the contents of the file of the police department's sex-offender registrar under Tex. R. Evid. 612 because no one asked the witness if or when she used the entire file in order to refresh her memory. Mata v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6939, 2013 WL 2639190 (Tex. App. Waco June 6 2013).

10. Because there was no evidence to establish that a witness used a list to refresh his memory during or before his testimony, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit the list under Tex. R. Evid. 612. Mcfatridge v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2620 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 6 2011).

11. Although defendant should have been permitted to refresh a witness' memory with phone records as to the time of a call, the trial court's exclusion of her testimony was harmless error because the time of the call was not pertinent. Sibley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6266, 2009 WL 2461273 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 12 2009).

12. In defendant's assault case, the court properly allowed an officer to testify about the incident because the officer did not say that his testimony was based on another officer's report, nor did he quote or read from that officer's report or testify to any conclusions made by the other officer; rather, the officer refreshed his memory about his personal observations by reviewing the other officer's report, then testified from his own memory of those observations. Thrower v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2590 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 10 2008).

13. Where defendant claimed that the trial court violated Tex. R. Evid. 612 during his murder trial by denying him the opportunity to inspect a report that a detective used in preparation for his testimony, it was unclear what right he was denied by not having access to the full report; defendant failed to object to any problem associated with receiving the outline instead of the full report; as a result, defendant waived any error. Lane v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8912 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 17 2006).

Evidence : Privileges : Attorney-Client Privilege : Scope

14. Mandamus relief was granted to an attorney in a discovery dispute; since unredacted billing invoices and testimony revealing an attorney's first bankruptcy consultation delved into the substance of the communications between the attorney and the corporation on a specific topic, it was privileged from disclosure under Fla. Stat. § 90.502 and Fla. R. Bar 4-1.6(a). Tex. R. Evid. 612 did not operate to waive the attorney-client privilege under Florida law, and the attorney was unable to unilaterally waive the privilege by reviewing an invoice during a break at a deposition; moreover, the privilege could not have been used offensively because the attorney, the corporation, and its successor were parties to an underlying suit, and they were not seeking affirmative relief from the party seeking the documents. In re McIntyre, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7524, 2012 WL 3793159 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2012).

18. Debtor testified without objection that statements shown to him were his statements, and he answered questions about the documents before his counsel objected; the objection was not timely for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103 and Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), plus the records were offered to refresh the debtor's recollection and impeach his credibility for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 612, credibility could be attacked by any party under Tex. R. Evid. 607, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the debtor's testimony in this regard. Ainsworth v. Cach, Llc, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2798 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 10 2012).

19. Court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to refresh the memory of a defense witness under Tex. R. Evid. 612; although defendant argued that the witness gave a written statement to police and that the statement would have refreshed the witness's memory, no such statement was in evidence and there was no evidence that such a statement would have refreshed the witness's memory, and the record did not give counsel's reason for not attempting to refresh the witness's memory, such that defendant failed to establish ineffective assistance of counsel. James v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 298 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 17 2007).

20. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by permitting the mother in a paternity and support action to testify about her health care expenses or by permitting her to refer to summaries of medical expenses to refresh her memory during her testimony. In re J.C.K., 143 S.W.3d 131, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4338 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

21. While the trial court erred by failing to allow defense counsel to inspect the report used by a testifying officer during the pretrial suppression hearing to refresh her memory under Tex. R. Evid. 612, and while the order sealing the report was also error, those errors were harmless because the document contained nothing that defendant could have used at trial to impeach the officer or the State's case. Davis v. State, 93 S.W.3d 664, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8652 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2002).

Evidence : Testimony : Refreshing Recollection : Memory Aids : Writings

22. Appellant testified that he had reviewed his statement many times in the years before trial and as recently as one week prior to trial, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that appellant used the statement, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 612, in order to refresh his memory before he testified. Arrellano v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8653, 2012 WL 4903044 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 17 2012).

23. Key distinction between Tex. R. Evid. 612 and Tex. R. Evid. 615 is that Tex. R. Evid. 612 requires the production of any writing used to refresh a witness's memory, while Tex. R. Evid. 615 requires only the production of "statements" as defined in Rule 615, and a writing used to refresh a witness's memory may not meet the definition of statement contained in Rule 615, yet Tex. R. Evid. 612 still requires the writing to be produced because of the witness's use of it; similarly, a witness may not use a statement to refresh his or her memory before testifying, however, Tex. R. Evid. 615 still requires that the statement be produced, and accordingly, although the general purpose for both rules is to provide material which may be used to impeach a witness, the rules are applicable to different types of materials. Arrellano v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8653, 2012 WL 4903044 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 17 2012).

24. Based on the testimony, the trial court could have found that appellant used his statement to refresh his memory before trial, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in ordering the production of the statement under Tex. R. Evid. 612. Arrellano v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8653, 2012 WL 4903044 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 17 2012).

25. Although defendant, who was convicted of felony driving while intoxicated, contended he was denied his right of confrontation because the trial court failed to require the State to provide a copy of a writing a witness used to refresh his recollection, this issue was overruled. The trial court could reasonably determine that the witness did not use the printout for the purpose of refreshing his recollection about the facts of the case. Goains v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7875, 2011 WL 4537892 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 28 2011).

26. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to admit into evidence a standardized field sobriety test scoring sheet because the officer testified that, although the document was in his possession while testifying, he did not use it to refresh his testimony. Thomas v. State, 336 S.W.3d 703, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9558 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 30 2010).

27. Exclusion of the investigator's report did not contribute to defendant's punishment and was harmless, because the trial court disclosed the investigator's handwritten notes to defendant that the investigator used to aid in her testimony for trial, the investigative report was sealed upon declaring it to be inadmissible, and the investigative report had no impeachment value, when the evidence in the investigative report was consistent with and did not contradict the investigator's trial testimony. Rocha v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5963, 2010 WL 2949967 (Tex. App. El Paso July 28 2010).

28. Evidence was sufficient to support defendant's conviction of racing under Tex. Transp. Code Ann. § 545.420(b)(2)(A) because the officer testified that defendant, driving a van, and another vehicle were traveling at approximately one hundred miles per hour, one behind the other, and maintaining close proximity to one another; based on his experience and his observations, the officer concluded the two vehicles were trying to outdistance or outgain one another; that is, they were racing. Tex. R. Evid. 612 permitted the officer to use his report to refresh his memory in testifying to the events surrounding defendant's apprehension and arrest. Perez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2556, 2009 WL 1017706 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 15 2009).

29. Attorney used a summary to refresh his recollection about the total amount of attorney fees, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 612; the attorney did not testify about any matter contained in the document other than the actual calculation of the total fees and the court did not find that the trial court erred in allowing the use of this document, plus the employer did not show how the error resulted in the rendition of an improper verdict because the jury could have used the attorney's testimony about the number of hours worked and the billing rate to make its own calculation. Arthur J. Gallagher & Co. v. Dieterich, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5639 (Tex. App. Dallas July 29 2008).

30. Because Tex. R. Evid. 612 encompasses only those portions of a document relating to a witness' testimony, the trial court did not err by excluding an article written by a defense expert, which was used by the expert at trial to refresh his memory, in the absence of a showing that the article was relevant in its entirety. Allen v. Scott, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 572 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 25 2008).

31. For purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), an ex-husband did not object to the trial court's statement that offering bank records as evidence to corroborate the ex-wife's testimony as to the amount of proceeds received from selling inherited property in Louisiana, which was separate property under Tex. Const. art. XVI, § 15, and Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 3.001(2), was not necessary, and the record showed that the ex-husband had a copy of the records under Tex. R. Evid. 612; he argued for the first time on appeal that the trial court erred in stating that it had no need for the records, and because the ex-husband did not preserve any other objection at trial, the court understood this argument to be a challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence, which in a non-jury case could be made for the first time on appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33. Huval v. Huval, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4903 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 21 2007).

32. Although a trial court erred by failing to admit a mother's written, sworn statement to police after she used it to refresh her recollection under Tex. R. Evid. 612, the error was harmless based on the mother's admission regarding her inconsistent statements, the corroborating evidence, and the nature of sexual assault disclosures by children. Donnell v. State, 191 S.W.3d 864, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2970 (Tex. App. Waco 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Refreshing Recollection : Refreshing Before Testimony

33. Because a detective did not refer to the recorded statement of the victim's boyfriend during trial, and never indicated he utilized the statement to refresh his memory before testifying, Tex. R. Evid. 612 was not applicable, and defendant was not entitled to invoke its benefits to inspect and admit the statement into evidence. Golston v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5251, 2012 WL 2479591 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 29 2012).

34. Exclusion of the investigator's report did not contribute to defendant's punishment and was harmless, because the trial court disclosed the investigator's handwritten notes to defendant that the investigator used to aid in her testimony for trial, the investigative report was sealed upon declaring it to be inadmissible, and the investigative report had no impeachment value, when the evidence in the investigative report was consistent with and did not contradict the investigator's trial testimony. Rocha v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5963, 2010 WL 2949967 (Tex. App. El Paso July 28 2010).

35. Although a witness said that she reviewed a document prior to trial, there was no evidence of specifically when she reviewed it or whether she used it to refresh her memory under Tex. R. Evid. 612 and defense counsel did not ask if the witness relied on the evidence to form her opinions under Tex. R. Evid. 705, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defense counsel's request for the document or in failing to require the State to produce the document for in camera inspection. Love v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8952, 2009 WL 3930900 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 19 2009).

36. Although defendant's argument based on Tex. R. Evid. 612 ultimately failed because defendant never established that a witness used the document to refresh her memory, defendant also failed to make an offer of proof concerning the document, and without the inclusion of the document in the record, the court could not determine whether the trial court committed harmful error by refusing to allow the defense to review the document. Love v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8952, 2009 WL 3930900 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 19 2009).

37. Even if the transcript given to a witness fell under the protection of the work product privilege, privileged documents had to be produced for inspection when used by a witness on the stand to refresh her memory under Tex. R. Evid. 612. Love v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8952, 2009 WL 3930900 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 19 2009).

38. Even assuming the trial court abused its discretion by excluding the written statements of a witness that defendant apparently sought to introduce as prior inconsistent statements under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), defendant was not harmed by the error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); under Tex. R. Evid. 612, the court found that (1) the witness's testimony was crucial to the prosecution and was not cumulative, (2) defendant's own testimony directly contradicted the witness's testimony, (3) defendant was permitted to cross-examine the witness about the discrepancies between the statements and the trial testimony, and (5) defendant highlighted those discrepancies during closing argument. Mooring v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3601 (Tex. App. Waco May 9 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Refreshing Recollection : Refreshing During Testimony

39. Because a detective did not refer to the recorded statement of the victim's boyfriend during trial, and never indicated he utilized the statement to refresh his memory before testifying, Tex. R. Evid. 612 was not applicable, and defendant was not entitled to invoke its benefits to inspect and admit the statement into evidence. Golston v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5251, 2012 WL 2479591 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 29 2012).

40. In defendant's assault case, the court properly allowed an officer to testify about the incident because the officer did not say that his testimony was based on another officer's report, nor did he quote or read from that officer's report or testify to any conclusions made by the other officer; rather, the officer refreshed his memory about his personal observations by reviewing the other officer's report, then testified from his own memory of those observations. Thrower v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2590 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 10 2008).

Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : Involuntary Termination : Procedure

41. In a mother's termination of parental rights case, the court properly denied her motion to review a therapist's notes because the testimony of other witnesses was consistent with the testimony of the therapist, the court noted that because the therapist reviewed her notes before testifying, it had the discretion to deny access to them, and the notes were cumulative of testimony that had already been presented. In the Interest of H.L.B., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9004 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 23 2013).

Transportation Law : Private Vehicles : Traffic Regulation : Speed Limits : Drag Racing

42. Evidence was sufficient to support defendant's conviction of racing under Tex. Transp. Code Ann. § 545.420(b)(2)(A) because the officer testified that defendant, driving a van, and another vehicle were traveling at approximately one hundred miles per hour, one behind the other, and maintaining close proximity to one another; based on his experience and his observations, the officer concluded the two vehicles were trying to outdistance or outgain one another; that is, they were racing. Tex. R. Evid. 612 permitted the officer to use his report to refresh his memory in testifying to the events surrounding defendant's apprehension and arrest. Perez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2556, 2009 WL 1017706 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 15 2009).

Tex. Evid. R. 613

THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH August 16, 2020

Rule 613 Witness's Prior Statement and Bias or Interest

(a) Witness's Prior Inconsistent Statement.

(1) Foundation Requirement.--When examining a witness about the witness's prior inconsistent statement - whether oral or written - a party must first tell the witness:

(A)the contents of the statement;

(B)the time and place of the statement; and

(C)the person to whom the witness made the statement.

(2) Need Not Show Written Statement.--If the witness's prior inconsistent statement is written, a party need not show it to the witness before inquiring about it, but must, upon request, show it to opposing counsel.

(3) Opportunity to Explain or Deny.--A witness must be given the opportunity to explain or deny the prior inconsistent statement.

(4) Extrinsic Evidence.--Extrinsic evidence of a witness's prior inconsistent statement is not admissible unless the witness is first examined about the statement and fails to unequivocally admit making the statement.

(5) Opposing Party's Statement.--This subdivision (a) does not apply to an opposing party's statement under Rule 801(e)(2).

(b) Witness's Bias or Interest.

(1) Witness's Bias or Interest.--When examining a witness about the witness's bias or interest, a party must first tell the witness the circumstances or statements that tend to show the witness's bias or interest. If examining a witness about a statement - whether oral or written - to prove the witness's bias or interest, a party must tell the witness:

(A)the contents of the statement;

(B)the time and place of the statement; and

(C)the person to whom the statement was made.

(2) Need Not Show Written Statement.--If a party uses a written statement to prove the witness's bias or interest, a party need not show the statement to the witness before inquiring about it, but must, upon request, show it to opposing counsel.

(3) Opportunity to Explain or Deny.--A witness must be given the opportunity to explain or deny the circumstances or statements that tend to show the witness's bias or interest. And the witness's proponent may present evidence to rebut the charge of bias or interest.

(4) Extrinsic Evidence.--Extrinsic evidence of a witness's bias or interest is not admissible unless the witness is first examined about the bias or interest and fails to unequivocally admit it.

(c) Witness's Prior Consistent Statement.--Unless Rule 801(e)(1)(B) provides otherwise, a witness's prior consistent statement is not admissible if offered solely to enhance the witness's credibility.

Pre-March 1, 1998 Comment This is former Rule 612; the number has changed and the comma after "interest" in subdivision (b) has been deleted.

Comment to 2015 Restyling: The amended rule retains the requirement that a witness be given an opportunity to explain or deny (a) a prior inconsistent statement or (b) the circumstances or a statement showing the witness's bias or interest, but this requirement is not imposed on the examining attorney. A witness may have to wait until redirect examination to explain a prior inconsistent statement or the circumstances or a statement that shows bias. But the impeaching attorney still is not permitted to introduce extrinsic evidence of the witness's prior inconsistent statement or bias unless the witness has first been examined about the statement or bias and has failed to unequivocally admit it. All other changes to the rule are intended to be stylistic only.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Methods : Expert Witness Discovery

1. Trial court abused its discretion in ordering discovery of a nonparty expert witness's personal financial documents, and expert reports and correspondence from other unrelated cases, without first requiring some evidence of the witness's bias; although plaintiffs argued that they showed the expert's potential for bias through his denial of any bias in favor of defendants and his deposition testimony in which he admitted deriving a significant portion of his income from medical consulting work for litigation, the appellate court concluded that, at most, the expert's deposition testimony showed that he received a significant amount of income from litigation consultation and that the suggestion that the expert had a particular bias in favor of defendants was raised by counsel's questions and argument, not by any evidence. In re Makris, 217 S.W.3d 521, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8561 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

2. Simple denial of bias cannot logically equate to evidence of bias under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b); if that were true, essentially all experts, except those who frankly concede a bias, would be subjected to discovery of their personal documents in a fishing expedition to search for evidence of bias. In re Makris, 217 S.W.3d 521, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8561 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Relevance

3. Writ of mandamus was granted because ordering the expert witness to give deposition testimony regarding his litigation-related income for the years 2002, 2003 and 2004, and the percentage of the total income that was litigation-related would not materially benefit the dispute resolution process in the case in view of the information already available to the parties and the trial court concerning the expert, Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.4; the expert had disclosed his hourly rate, his time spent working on the case, and the fact he testified almost exclusively for defendants, and since the information sought to be protected would be disclosed before any appeal would be available, relators lacked an adequate legal remedy. In re Weir, 166 S.W.3d 861, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4689 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Harmless Error Rule

4. Although the trial court excluded the email from evidence, the error, if any, did not restrict the mother from cross-examining and impeaching the father with the inconsistent statement he made in the email, nor did the trial court prohibit the mother from offering her own testimony about the frequency of her telephone calls to the children and the limits or restrictions the father placed on those communications; the mother could not establish that the error, if any, caused the rendition of an improper judgment. In the Interest of C.B. & J., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6396, 2012 WL 3139866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 2 2012).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Confrontation

5. In an intoxication manslaughter case, the trial court did not err by prohibiting cross-examination of an officer on the scene regarding the internal investigation against him because other witnesses identified defendant as the driver, two other officers testified that they smelled alcohol on defendant's breath, and other evidence introduced at trial showed that defendant was intoxicated that night. Mole v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2838, 2009 WL

1099433 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 23 2009).

6. In a murder trial, there was no violation of the Confrontation Clause when the State introduced an accomplice's out-of-court statement incriminating defendant because it was offered to impeach other out-of-court statements by the accomplice, introduced in the defense's case in chief, which tended to exonerate defendant; the introduction of the exonerating statements triggered Tex. R. Evid. 806; the State was then allowed to use Tex. R. Evid. 806, together with Tex. R. Evid. 613, to impeach the accomplice. Hernandez v. State, 219 S.W.3d 6, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11300 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

7. In a capital murder case, defendant's right to cross-examination under the Sixth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. VI, and Tex. R. Evid. 613 was not violated by the exclusion of evidence on the conduct of the victim's friends toward a witness because defendant did not show that the victim's friends had attempted to influence the witness's testimony. Toluao v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6751 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 18 2005).

8. Where a videotape was allowed into evidence for the purposes of impeachment only and was redacted to show only those portions of the interview that contradicted the victim's trial testimony, and both defendants were allowed to cross examine defendant when she testified at trial, there was no confrontation clause violation. Moreno v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4091 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 26 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Domestic Assault

9. In a trial for family assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) in excluding evidence that the complainant, defendant's wife, opened and used a checking account for a year before the assault because defendant failed to demonstrate a nexus or logical connection between the separate checking account and the complainant's alleged plan to divorce him and her potential motive to testify against him Smith v. State, 352 S.W.3d 55, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4624 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 16 2011).

10. In a domestic violence case under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.01, defendant should have been permitted to introduce testimony from a witness that the complainant said that the assault was an accident, in order to impeach the complainant's out-of-court accusations; however, the error in excluding that evidence was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44 because the excluded testimony was repetitious of the version of the incident testified to by defendant and defendant's parent, and it was inconsistent with the physical evidence. Sohail v. State, 264 S.W.3d 251, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1236 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : General Overview

11. Defendant was entitled to a new trial for the murder of her stepfather because of new evidence, specifically, information from defendant's former boyfriend about her outcry 30 years earlier regarding sexual abuse by the stepfather; the outcry evidence rebutted the State's claim of recent fabrication. Carsner v. State, 415 S.W.3d 507, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12563, 2013 WL 5561653 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 9 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Witness Tampering

12. Evidence of defendant's alleged witness tampering--phone calls offering the witness money not to testify--was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) in a trial for burglary. Defendant's complaint about the reliability of the evidence went to weight, not admissibility, and extrinsic evidence of the alleged telephone calls was not admitted until after defendant denied making them. Livingston v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9054, 2011 WL 5535332 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 15 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

13. In trial for a grandfather's indecent touching of his granddaughter, the State was properly allowed to impeach the grandmother, who testified at trial that child complained of touching on her leg, with a caseworker's testimony about the grandmother's prior statement. Green v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8523 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 23 2004).

14. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by explaining to the State how to present rebuttal evidence where the comments about the admissibility of the State's rebuttal witness were made outside the presence of the jury, and they did not indicate that any assistance was given to the State; the judge was presented with an admissibility question under Tex. R. Evid. 613 and made a decision which left defendant with the choice of returning to the stand to preclude the testimony of the State's witness or remaining silent and relying on his original statement. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

15. In defendant's sexual assault case, a witness's testimony regarding defendant's statement to him was properly admitted where it was clearly not hearsay and thus its admission, even though erroneously described by the trial judge as occurring under Tex. R. Evid 613, was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2)(A) and did not violate defendant's constitutional rights. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Adults : Elements

16. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of his wife, who recanted in her trial testimony, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in allowing the State to impeach the victim with a prior inconsistent statement about how she broke her nose six months before the charged assault; the statements were offered as prior inconsistent statements to challenge the victim's credibility, as permitted by Tex. R. Evid. 613. Davis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 352 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 18 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

17. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant's right to confront his accuser was not violated by preventing defendant from cross-examining a witness, the complainant's older sister, about a similar outcry she made years before her outcry against defendant. To the extent defendant suggested on appeal that he intended to use the excluded evidence in an attempt to establish that the mother coached her children to say defendant had sexually molested them, a purpose that arguably could have been permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) to establish motive or bias, defendant's argument did not comport with the objection at trial and accordingly was waived under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Palmer v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3156 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 29 2010).

18. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, defendant was entitled under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 613(b) to impeach the complainant by presenting evidence that the complainant threatened to falsely accuse neighbors of molestation, even though the threats occurred after the charged offense. The complainant testified to becoming angry when defendant took back a gift, and, the very next day, the complainant accused defendant of molestation. Billodeau v. State, 277 S.W.3d 34, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 232 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : General Overview

19. In a trial for defendant's aggravated assault of a former romantic partner, the trial court properly excluded evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 613, of the victim's prior inconsistent statement regarding a pending driving while intoxicated charge because defendant did not point to any inconsistent trial testimony. Padilla v. State, 254 S.W.3d 585, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2719 (Tex. App. Eastland 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Brady Materials : General Overview

20. In a driving while intoxicated prosecution, a new trial should not have been granted on the basis that the State failed to disclose that at the time of trial, there was an ongoing investigation by the Texas Attorney General into a detaining officer's alleged possession and promotion of child pornography; the existence of the investigation was not impeachment evidence, absent any basis for inferring that the officer was aware of the investigation. State v. Moore, 240 S.W.3d 324, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6153 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Sentencing

21. Defendant failed to show that his trial counsel was ineffective during sentencing because counsel properly withdrew an objection to the prosecutor's playing recordings of defendant's jailhouse conversations as the recordings were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), because the recordings were played after defendant denied, disputed, or equivocated about making a prior inconsistent statement. Gallegos v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2111 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 26 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

22. Trial counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to request limiting instructions regarding impeachment by defendant's prior inconsistent statement because the statement was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2)(A); Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) did not apply. Peace v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7700 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 20 2005).

23. Because defendant did not point to evidence in the record showing that counsel's failure to object to not laying a proper predicate for impeachment evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) and failure to request a limiting instruction regarding all the impeachment testimony of two officers were not part of a legitimate trial strategy, including not bringing further attention to prior statements regarding defendant's hitting the victim, he did not rebut the presumption that counsel acted reasonably. Therefore, defendant's ineffective assistance of counsel claim failed because he failed to show that counsel's performance was deficient. Watkins v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6188 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 4 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Confrontation

24. Where the defendant was charged with indecency with a child by contact and aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not violate his confrontation rights by limiting cross-examination of the child's father concerning domestic assault and a protective order; the same evidence was admitted through other witnesses; defendant had an ample opportunity to develop his defensive theory that the father was the true perpetrator. Rodriguez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6933 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 4 2006).

25. Trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding a child sexual assault victim's relationships with two different boys and her actions and comments involving two cousins did not deprive defendant of his constitutional right to a fair trial where the trial court could have determined, based on the chronology of the events, that they did not explain the State's medical evidence regarding the time of the penetration of the victim's hymen, and, although the trial court excluded the equivocal testimony of the victim's mother about the victim's veracity, the victim's aunt was allowed to testify that she had a bad reputation for being untruthful, and the victim herself admitted lying to defendant, her father, about her report card. Accordingly, the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the matters had, at best, marginal relevance to the victim's alleged motive to testify falsely against defendant, that they would have unduly harassed the victim and confused the issues, and that the danger of unfair prejudice from the evidence would have outweighed its probative value. Pogue v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7819 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : General Overview

26. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by explaining to the State how to present rebuttal evidence where the comments about the admissibility of the State's rebuttal witness were made outside the presence of the jury, and they did not indicate that any assistance was given to the State; the judge was presented with an admissibility question under Tex. R. Evid. 613 and made a decision which left defendant with the choice of returning to the stand to preclude the testimony of the State's witness or remaining silent and relying on his original statement. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Cross-Examination

27. In an armed robbery case, the trial court properly refused to recall the store manager for cross-examination because his testimony that he was mad when defendant hit him, but did not hold a grudge, was not inconsistent with his testimony during the bill of exception that he chased after defendant in spite of store policy because he was mad; further, evidence of any bias was already before the jury. Ramos v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 113, 2014 WL 50812 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 7 2014).

28. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's aggravated assault trial when it refused to allow defense counsel to cross-examine the complainant regarding her alleged dislike of defendant's mother, which defendant claimed would have revealed her bias against him, because defendant failed to establish the logical nexus between the complainant's testimony and her potential motive to testify against him. Reynolds v. State, 371 S.W.3d 511, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4144, 2012 WL 1881410 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 24 2012).

29. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(3), 608(a), 613 by denying defendant the opportunity to cross-examine a witness about whether the witness was untruthful to the judge that presided over the witness's guilty plea to an assault charge. Reyes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2359, 2010 WL 1254543 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 1 2010).

30. In defendant's attempted capital murder case, the court's decision to limit the cross-examination of an officer was proper because whether the officer might have invoked his Garrity rights was only a marginally relevant issue and did not necessarily indicate that he had a reason to provide false testimony. Walker v. State, 300 S.W.3d 836, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7763 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 1 2009).

31. In an indecency with a child case, a court properly restricted defendant's cross-examination of the victim's mother regarding benefits from a crime victims' compensation fund intended to show that she sought financial gain as a consequence of the incident because the proffered evidence was only marginally probative on the issue of bias or motive, and the mother was effectively impeached because she was incarcerated at the time of trial serving a sentence for forgery and had given custody of her children to a relative. Hoover v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1549 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 27 2007).

32. In a criminal trial for driving while intoxicated, the court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b). The issues defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hasty or jump to conclusions at the crime scene. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

33. In a criminal trial for driving while intoxicated, the court properly refused to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b). The issues defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hastily or jump to conclusions at the crime scene. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

34. In a capital murder case, defendant's right to cross-examination under the Sixth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. VI, and Tex. R. Evid. 613 was not violated by the exclusion of evidence on the conduct of the victim's friends toward a witness because defendant did not show that the victim's friends had attempted to influence the witness's testimony. Toluao v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6751 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 18 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Videotaped Testimony

35. Where a videotape was allowed into evidence for the purposes of impeachment only and was redacted to show only those portions of the interview that contradicted the victim's trial testimony, and both defendants were allowed to cross examine defendant when she testified at trial, there was no confrontation clause violation. Moreno v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4091 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 26 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Impeachment

36. Detective's testimony regarding the inmate's cousin's original statement was not admissible as substantive evidence, but was admissible as non-hearsay offered as extrinsic evidence for impeachment purposes; however, there was no prejudice sufficient to meet Strickland because there was not a reasonable probability that a limiting instruction would have changed the outcome of the case. There was ample evidence of the inmate's guilt as she repeatedly changed her story and offered inconsistent explanations of how the victim's injuries transpired, the victim's injuries did not appear to be a result of an accident and could not have been caused by a bump on the table, and there was evidence that the inmate was the only adult present in the apartment when the injury occurred. Bridges v. Thaler, 419 Fed. Appx. 511, 2011 U.S. App. LEXIS 5973 (5th Cir. Tex. Mar. 23 2011).

37. During a capital murder trial, the State admitted an unauthenticated letter, written by a third party and sent to defendant at the county jail for the purpose of impeaching defendant's trial court testimony that she never had sex with another woman; the letter was not relevant to anything at issue, was not proper impeachment, and the trial court erred in admitting the letter. Abdygapparova v. State, 243 S.W.3d 191, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8205 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

38. Trial counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to request limiting instructions regarding impeachment by defendant's prior inconsistent statement because the statement was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2)(A); Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) did not apply. Peace v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7700 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 20 2005).

39. In a capital murder case, defendant's right to cross-examination under the Sixth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. VI, and Tex. R. Evid. 613 was not violated by the exclusion of evidence on the conduct of the victim's friends toward a witness because defendant did not show that the victim's friends had attempted to influence the witness's testimony. Toluao v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6751 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 18 2005).

40. Because defendant did not point to evidence in the record showing that counsel's failure to object to not laying a proper predicate for impeachment evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) and failure to request a limiting instruction regarding all the impeachment testimony of two officers were not part of a legitimate trial strategy, including not bringing further attention to prior statements regarding defendant's hitting the victim, he did not rebut the presumption that counsel acted reasonably. Therefore, defendant's ineffective assistance of counsel claim failed because he failed to show that counsel's performance was deficient. Watkins v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6188 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 4 2005).

41. Where the State had already established on direct examination that the complainant was serving a deferred adjudication probation during one point in her relationship with defendant, any further inquiry would not have made the existence of any fact of consequence to the determination of defendant's alleged offense more or less probable than it was without the evidence, and such testimony was not relevant to any bias, motive, or interest to help the State, making it an impermissible method of impeachment; accordingly, the trial court was within its discretion to limit the question posed by defendant's counsel on cross-examination. Crook v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3485 (Tex. App. Dallas May 6 2005).

42. In an assault case, a court did not err in refusing to admit a handwritten document as impeachment evidence because the trial court reasonably could have determined that defendant was offering the entire statement as a prior inconsistent statement, but only the victim's prior inconsistent statements could be used to impeach her, and several of the statements did not have any tendency to show the victim's bias or motive. Oveal v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1837 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 10 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 164 S.W.3d 735, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3517 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

43. In an assault case, a trial court's refusal to replay a videotape regarding a statement made by a victim was not an abuse of discretion because the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 613 were not satisfied; because the officer on the stand at the time did not make any statement on the tape regarding witnesses to the assault, there was no prior inconsistent statement. Mumphrey v. State, 155 S.W.3d 651, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 370 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

44. In a murder case, the trial court did not err by disallowing defendant's attempt to impeach her step-daughter (who was in the vehicle with her at the time of the crime) with prior inconsistent statements as defendant had not laid the proper predicate to a question by asking the step-daughter if she had told a witness that the attorneys had given her an instruction to get her story straight. Therefore, the question was an improper attempt to impeach step-daughter. Harris v. State, 152 S.W.3d 786, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11298 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

45. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, a court did not err in excluding a hearsay conversation with social services for impeachment purposes where defendant did not present the victim with or give her the opportunity to explain the statement on the tape. Further, the tape itself did not contain a statement by the victim or even a statement by someone who had herself talked to the victim, but by an unknown caller reporting a statement by the caller's child. Holmes v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10661 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 30 2004).

46. Trial court did not err in admitting defendant's girlfiend's out-of-court statement to a police officer as a prior inconsistent statement where the officer testified that the girlfriend had told him that she had not seen defendant for the few days surrounding the offense but at trial, she testified that he had been with her at the time of the robbery. Butler v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10576 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2004).

47. During the punishment phase of a criminal prosecution for possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver or manufacture, the trial court did not err by allowing testimony from a witness about an alleged plot by defendant to kill police officers, and where defendant denied the existence of any such plan, the State was permitted to impeach defendant by using a rebuttal witness to testify to his prior oral inconsistent statement. Revill

v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5654 (Tex. App. Tyler June 23 2004).

48. Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) permits impeachment by a prior inconsistent statement provided that the witness has not already "unequivocally admitted" the inconsistencies between the prior statement and his trial testimony; therefore, a habeas corpus petitioner, who was convicted of capital murder, was not denied effective assistance of counsel by his counsel's failure to object to the State's use of a tape-recorded conversation, which was used to demonstrate inconsistencies between the petitioner's trial testimony and his prior statements to law enforcement officials. Morrow v. Dretke, 99 Fed. Appx. 505, 2004 U.S. App. LEXIS 10009 (5th Cir. Tex. 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 543 U.S. 944, 125 S. Ct. 359, 160 L. Ed. 2d 257, 2004 U.S. LEXIS 6989, 73 U.S.L.W. 3246 (2004).

49. In a criminal appeal, the court would not review defendant's argument that a witness was called by the State solely for the purpose of impeachment; defendant's objection at trial, that the proper foundation for impeachment was not laid under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), did not comport with his argument on appeal. Medina v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3717 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 29 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Curative Instructions

50. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant did not preserve for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) a claim of improper bolstering of a witness in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 613(c)because the trial court admonished the prosecutor in response to defense counsel's objection, defendant did not request an instruction to disregard, and such an instruction would have cured any error. Pruitt v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3314 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 29 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Limiting Instructions

51. Prior statements of two of the State's witnesses were not prior inconsistent statements within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) but rather were used merely to refresh the witnesses' memories. Defendant was not entitled to a limiting instruction. Cantu v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1639, 2012 WL 664939 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 1 2012).

52. Although the trial court erred by denying a limiting instruction because the witnesses' prior statements did not fall within any hearsay exception and so were admissible for impeachment purposes only, the error was harmless. Absent from the inconsistent statements, the record contained other evidence from which the jury could have inferred that defendant did not act in self-defense, and the trial court's charge instructed the jury that a witness's prior inconsistent statement could only be considered for impeachment purposes to asses the witness's credibility. Arnold v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9768 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 31 2008).

53. In an assault on a public servant case, after defendant blamed a correctional officer for a bump on her head, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a trooper's testimony regarding defendant's initial arrest, including a high-speed pursuit and the fact that she was placed on the ground because (1) it was contradictory to statements made by defendant; (2) it showed a bias against law enforcement officials because it illustrated a pattern of false accusations; and (3) it was prefaced with a specific limiting instruction that the evidence was being offered solely for passing upon defendant's credibility. Long v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2250 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 22 2007).

54. Because defendant did not point to evidence in the record showing that counsel's failure to object to not laying a proper predicate for impeachment evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) and failure to request a limiting instruction regarding all the impeachment testimony of two officers were not part of a legitimate trial strategy, including not bringing further attention to prior statements regarding defendant's hitting the victim, he did not rebut the presumption that counsel acted reasonably. Therefore, defendant's ineffective assistance of counsel claim failed because he failed to show that counsel's performance was deficient. Watkins v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6188 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 4 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : Registration

55. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding testimony that a police officer did not return a witness's call in order to impeach testimony that the department was willing to work with sex offenders and do whatever it took to get them registered, because the officer admitted that once or twice she did not return the witness's calls. Kelley v. State, 429 S.W.3d 865, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4458, 2014 WL 1632253 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 24 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Briefs

56. Because defendant did not object in the trial court to the exclusion of the victim's prior inconsistent statements based on Tex. R. Evid. 613, he did not preserve the error for appellate review; he also failed to provide any argument or authority concerning his constitutional claims regarding the point, and therefore the issue was inadequately briefed. Billodeau v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4462 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 7 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

57. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant did not preserve for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) a claim of improper bolstering of a witness in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 613(c)because the trial court admonished the prosecutor in response to defense counsel's objection, defendant did not request an instruction to disregard, and such an instruction would have cured any error. Pruitt v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3314 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 29 2005).

58. Because the trial court sustained both of defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) objections, nothing was preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Defendant received the relief he requested--a limiting instruction--on his first objection to the testimony and requested no relief after the trial court sustained his running objection. Coleman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2855 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 14 2005).

59. Defendant argued that the trial court improperly restricted his attempts to impeach a witness's testimony with a prior statement in which he said he saw the victim in the hallway with a shotgun just before he heard the fatal shot. The State properly responded that the witness's prior written statement was not in the record, and thus defendant had failed to preserve his complaint by making an offer of proof. Lindsey v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11139 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 8 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

60. Because defendant failed to explain to the trial court that evidence was admissible as inconsistent statements, he failed to preserve error regarding inconsistent statements or this rule. Pena v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6487 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2014).

61. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court abused its discretion by excluding the victim's diary because defense counsel failed to make any suggestion that the diary was admissible as impeachment evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 613, as a general assertion that the diary was not hearsay was insufficient to make the trial court aware of a Rule 613 argument. Fletcher v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5429,

2012 WL 2783298 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 10 2012).

62. Defendant's contention that the trial court erred by limiting the scope of cross-examination of the child victim and refusing to admit into evidence two affidavits signed by the victim was not preserved for appellate review because defendant failed to make either a formal bill of exceptions or request permission to make an informal offer of proof and therefore the court had no idea what the victim would have testified to and whether she would have denied making the statements in the affidavits. Duke v. State, 365 S.W.3d 722, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2376, 2012 WL 1005069 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 27 2012).

63. During defendant's murder trial, he objected to a police officer's videotaped interview with a witness on Confrontation Clause grounds; on appeal, he claimed the trial court violated Tex. R. Evid. 613 by admitting the recording; because the objection at trial did not comport with the complaint on appeal, the error was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33. Brandon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8903 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 8 2007).

64. Because defendant did not object in the trial court to the exclusion of the victim's prior inconsistent statements based on Tex. R. Evid. 613, he did not preserve the error for appellate review; he also failed to provide any argument or authority concerning his constitutional claims regarding the point, and therefore the issue was inadequately briefed. Billodeau v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4462 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 7 2007).

65. Court properly denied the defense the opportunity to question the complaining witness regarding a possible motive for her claims of sexual abuse where defendant had not argued that he was relying on Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) as a basis for eliciting testimony from the complainant that her sister had made allegations of sexual abuse and that, as a result of those allegations, the sisters went to live with their father. Melchor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2958 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 13 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

66. In a child sexual assault case, a defendant failed to preserve for review his contention that interruption of his cross-examination of the victim regarding another "young person" with whom she had been involved violated his right to confrontation under U.S. Const. amend. VI and Tex. R. Evid. 613. Nor did he make an offer of proof or obtain a ruling from the trial court on his objection. Watson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4202, 2012 WL 1871626 (Tex. App. Waco May 23 2012).

67. Where a hearsay statement under Tex. R. Evid. 802 was admitted for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 613, the reviewing court did not address defendant's arguments that it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to allow the State to impeach its own witness and that the error was compounded by the court's failure to give a limiting instruction. Defendant did not object to the admission on Rule 403 grounds and did not request a limiting instruction. Galvan v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3197 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 20 2006).

68. Where a hearsay statement under Tex. R. Evid. 802 was admitted for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 613, it was not error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to allow the State to impeach its own witness and the error was not compounded by the court's failure to give a limiting instruction. Defendant did not object to the admission on Rule 403 grounds and did not request a limiting instruction. Galvan v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3197 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 20 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Jury Instructions

69. Where a hearsay statement under Tex. R. Evid. 802 was admitted for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 613, the reviewing court did not address defendant's arguments that it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to allow the State to impeach its own witness and that the error was compounded by the court's failure to give a limiting instruction. Defendant did not object to the admission on Rule 403 grounds and did not request a limiting instruction. Galvan v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3197 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 20 2006).

70. Where a hearsay statement under Tex. R. Evid. 802 was admitted for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 613, it was not error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to allow the State to impeach its own witness and the error was not compounded by the court's failure to give a limiting instruction. Defendant did not object to the admission on Rule 403 grounds and did not request a limiting instruction. Galvan v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3197 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 20 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

71. Defendant's contention that the trial court erred by limiting the scope of cross-examination of the child victim and refusing to admit into evidence two affidavits signed by the victim was not preserved for appellate review because defendant failed to make either a formal bill of exceptions or request permission to make an informal offer of proof and therefore the court had no idea what the victim would have testified to and whether she would have denied making the statements in the affidavits. Duke v. State, 365 S.W.3d 722, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2376, 2012 WL 1005069 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 27 2012).

72. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant's right to confront his accuser was not violated by preventing defendant from cross-examining a witness, the complainant's older sister, about a similar outcry she made years before her outcry against defendant. To the extent defendant suggested on appeal that he intended to use the excluded evidence in an attempt to establish that the mother coached her children to say defendant had sexually molested them, a purpose that arguably could have been permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) to establish motive or bias, defendant's argument did not comport with the objection at trial and accordingly was waived under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Palmer v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3156 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 29 2010).

73. In a case alleging aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, a challenge based on Tex. R. Evid. 613 was not heard on appeal because this issue was not raised before the trial court. Hernandez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6815 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 23 2007).

74. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant preserved error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 regarding the admission of a videotaped interview of complainant because defense counsel objected at trial to the State's proffer of the videotape as a prior consistent statement. Tovar v. State, 221 S.W.3d 185, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6440 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : General Overview

75. In a criminal appeal, the court would not review defendant's argument that a witness was called by the State solely for the purpose of impeachment; defendant's objection at trial, that the proper foundation for impeachment was not laid under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), did not comport with his argument on appeal. Medina v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3717 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 29 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

76. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding a statement the child victim made to her grandmother as not inconsistent with the victim's trial testimony because it was not unreasonable for the trial court to conclude that making a "mistake" could have meant one thing to the victim during cross-examination but meant an entirely different thing when she was speaking with her grandmother. Trevino v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9981 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 9 2013).

77. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of two witnesses concerning the child victim's prior sexual history because the victim's statement, when read in context, referred only to digital penetration of her vagina, and therefore neither of the witnesses' testimony would have contradicted the victim's statement about defendant's digital penetration. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8246, 2012 WL 4497999 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 28 2012).

78. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's request to admit a forensic interviewer's testimony regarding her January 2005 interview with one of the victims under Tex. R. Evid. 613 because her testimony that the victim had stated that her brother had touched her inappropriately was not inconsistent with the victim's statements in October 2005 and at trial that defendant touched her sexually. Wagner v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2423 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : New Trial

79. In a driving while intoxicated prosecution, a new trial should not have been granted on the basis that the State failed to disclose that at the time of trial, there was an ongoing investigation by the Texas Attorney General into a detaining officer's alleged possession and promotion of child pornography; the existence of the investigation was not impeachment evidence, absent any basis for inferring that the officer was aware of the investigation. State v. Moore, 240 S.W.3d 324, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6153 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

80. In a case where defendant was convicted of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 31.07(a), assuming arguendo that the trial court erred by admitting extrinsic evidence of the complainant's prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 613, any error in its admission was harmless because the same evidence was properly admitted when an officer testified that the complainant reported to him that defendant had taken the truck without permission on the day in question. Cration v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10344 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 11 2003).

81. Defendant's assignment of error, concerning his attempt to impeach an accomplice witness with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 613, was overruled because defendant did show how he was harmed when the appellate court was convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that no impeachment using the accomplice's statement would have altered the outcome of the trial, and defense counsel made no offer of proof detailing the questions he wanted to ask or the specific inconsistent statements he wanted to use for impeachment pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 103 and Tex. R. App. P. 33.2. Ferguson v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9005 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 19 2002).

82. Defendant's assignment of error, concerning his attempt to impeach an accomplice witness with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 613, was overruled because defendant did show how he was harmed when the appellate court was convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that no impeachment using the accomplice's statement would have altered the outcome of the trial, and defense counsel made no offer of proof detailing the questions he wanted to ask or the specific inconsistent statements he wanted to use for impeachment pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 103 and Tex. R. App. P. 33.2. Ferguson v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9005 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 19 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

83. Defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated was proper. Moreover, even if the 911 call was inadmissible defendant was not harmed by its admission; there was ample evidence in the record other than the 911 call tending to show that defendant was driving while intoxicated, including the detailed testimony of the arresting officer who had observed numerous signs that defendant was intoxicated. Condarco v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10741 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 27 2013).

84. Even assuming that defendant had preserved for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred by allowing the State to question him about testimony he gave in a prior trial, the error was was not of constitutional dimension. During the State's questioning, defendant explained to the jury that he misunderstood a question asked during his previous testimony and that he had not intended to lie under oath when he answered it; on re-direct examination, defendant again explained that he had not intended to lie under oath but that he had simply misunderstood the question; in light of the evidence explaining his prior incorrect answer, the error, if any, of allowing the State to impeach defendant's credibility had but a slight effect, and was therefore harmless. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6738, 2010 WL 3279386 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2010).

85. In a domestic violence case under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.01, defendant should have been permitted to introduce testimony from a witness that the complainant said that the assault was an accident, in order to impeach the complainant's out-of-court accusations; however, the error in excluding that evidence was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44 because the excluded testimony was repetitious of the version of the incident testified to by defendant and defendant's parent, and it was inconsistent with the physical evidence. Sohail v. State, 264 S.W.3d 251, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1236 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Cognizable Issues : Ineffective Assistance

86. Detective's testimony regarding the inmate's cousin's original statement was not admissible as substantive evidence, but was admissible as non-hearsay offered as extrinsic evidence for impeachment purposes; however, there was no prejudice sufficient to meet Strickland because there was not a reasonable probability that a limiting instruction would have changed the outcome of the case. There was ample evidence of the inmate's guilt as she repeatedly changed her story and offered inconsistent explanations of how the victim's injuries transpired, the victim's injuries did not appear to be a result of an accident and could not have been caused by a bump on the table, and there was evidence that the inmate was the only adult present in the apartment when the injury occurred. Bridges v. Thaler, 419 Fed. Appx. 511, 2011 U.S. App. LEXIS 5973 (5th Cir. Tex. Mar. 23 2011).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Recordings

87. At defendant's trial for kidnapping and murder, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding a video-recorded witness statement. Because no attempt was made to introduce any inconsistent statement from the video recording, defendant failed to lay the proper predicate to admit the statement into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Gamez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6774, 2012 WL 3329200 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 15 2012).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Visual Formats

88. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant preserved error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 regarding the admission of a videotaped interview of complainant because defense counsel objected at trial to the State's proffer of the videotape as a prior consistent statement. Tovar v. State, 221 S.W.3d 185, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6440 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Evidence : Documentary Evidence : Completeness

89. There was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 613 when the trial court admitted the transcript of a witness's grand jury testimony under the rule of optional completeness, Tex. R. Evid. 107, even though the witness unequivocally admitted to making the prior inconsistent statements raised by defendant during cross-examination. The witness's illiteracy necessitated that both attorneys read the prior testimony aloud to the witness, which could have caused confusion for the jury concerning the substance of the prior testimony. Green v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 651, 2009 WL 223366 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 30 2009).

Evidence : Hearsay : Credibility of Declarants : General Overview

90. Defendant tried to admit a statement by the complainant, who did not testify during defendant's trial for assult, to impeach the complainant's credibility; however, defendant did not specifiy under what rule he sought to have the statement admitted. The trial court determined that defendant was seeking to have the entire testimony admitted, but that statements attributed to a third party were inadmissible, making the entire document inadmissible. Oveal v. State, 164 S.W.3d 735, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3517 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1917, 164 L. Ed. 2d 671, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 3612, 74 U.S.L.W. 3617 (U.S. 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Credibility of Declarants : Impeachment Evidence

91. Modification of a divorce decree concerning the father's parental rights and duties was proper pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) where the father's due process rights were not violated when the district court refused to permit the father to impeach the mother because the father did not lay a proper predicate to impeach the mother with the alleged prior inconsistent testimony. In re Z.A.T., 193 S.W.3d 197, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2783 (Tex. App. Waco 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : General Overview

92. In an aggravated robbery case, although a foundation was lacking for admission of an accomplice's statement as a prior inconsistent statement under this rule or as an exception to the hearsay rule under Tex. R. Evid. 803, its admission into evidence did not constitute reversible error because a detective had already testified in detail regarding the contents of the statement. Romero v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2999 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 1 2004).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Recorded Recollection : Criminal Trials

93. Where a videotape was allowed into evidence for the purposes of impeachment only and was redacted to show only those portions of the interview that contradicted the victim's trial testimony, and both defendants were allowed to cross examine defendant when she testified at trial, there was no confrontation clause violation. Moreno v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4091 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 26 2005).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Statements of Child Abuse

94. In a case involving sexual assault of a child, a trial court did not err by excluding a police officer's testimony about what the victim told her father; even if the outcry exception exempted the statement the victim made to her father, there was an additional level of hearsay since the testimony at trial was from a police officer; the evidence could not have been used for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) unless defendant first confronted the victim and her father with the alleged inconsistent statements and afforded them an opportunity to admit or deny the statements. Carter v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5394 (Tex. App. Dallas July 22 2008).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Prior Statements by Witnesses : General Overview

95. During defendant's murder trial, he objected to a police officer's videotaped interview with a witness on Confrontation Clause grounds; on appeal, he claimed the trial court violated Tex. R. Evid. 613 by admitting the recording; because the objection at trial did not comport with the complaint on appeal, the error was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33. Brandon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8903 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 8 2007).

96. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in requiring defendant to first establish a prior inconsistent statement for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) before attempting to introduce audio taped statements of the victim in an attempt to impeach the victim; defendant failed to cite any authority to support the claim that audio recordings of a witness prior to trial could be used to impeach a different witness at trial. Rincon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2758 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 5 2006).

97. When the State has statements and prior sworn testimony of a sequence of events, even in light of its suspicion that the witness might testify differently, it may still assume that the witness will testify truthfully and that prior sworn testimony was also truthful, and the State is then entitled to determine the final content of the witness's testimony, and if necessary, to impeach such a witness with previous testimony and statements made by that witness to police. Parson v. State, 193 S.W.3d 116, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1901 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

98. Court rejected defendant's contention that the State committed error by pursuing questioning of defendant's wife, the victim, concerning her prior statements, after she was advised of her Fifth Amendment rights; the wife did not invoke that right, it was not shown in the record that the State's sole motivation in calling the wife was for impeachment, and error was not shown. Parson v. State, 193 S.W.3d 116, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1901 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

99. Trial court properly denied the admission of a statement claimed to be a prior inconsistent statement of a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) because defendant had questioned the witness about prior statements she gave to police, and she acknowledged that she made the statements. Because she admitted making the statements, extrinsic evidence of the statements was not admissible. Batteas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 16 2006).

100. Trial court properly exluded testimony concerning a prior demeanor of a witness in defendant's first trial that ended in a mistrial because the plain language of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) allows the presentation of a prior inconsistent statement, whether oral or written, and the witness's prior demeanor was not a prior statement. Batteas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 16 2006).

101. Testimony by a physician of what the child victim said was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 613, and although prior consistent statements were generally not admissible unless they fell under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(1)(B), the physician's testimony fell within that exception because it was consistent with the child's testimony and was offered to rebut an implied charge of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive; furthermore, any error in the admission of the evidence was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the child testified to the abuse and other witnesses testified about the child's change in behavior. Patterson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5260 (Tex. App. Austin July 8 2005).

102. Because the trial court sustained both of defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) objections, nothing was preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Defendant received the relief he requested--a limiting instruction--on his first objection to the testimony and requested no relief after the trial court sustained his running objection. Coleman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2855 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 14 2005).

103. Trial court's decision to exclude videotaped statements by the complainant was proper because the complainant unequivocally admitted that her prior accusations were false. Extrinsic evidence of her prior inconsistent statement was thus inadmissible. McMillin v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 438 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 21 2005).

104. Trial court did not err in admitting defendant's girlfiend's out-of-court statement to a police officer as a prior inconsistent statement where the officer testified that the girlfriend had told him that she had not seen defendant for the few days surrounding the offense but at trial, she testified that he had been with her at the time of the robbery. Butler v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10576 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2004).

105. In defendant's sexual assault case, a witness's testimony regarding defendant's statement to him was properly admitted where it was clearly not hearsay and thus its admission, even though erroneously described by the trial judge as occurring under Tex. R. Evid 613, was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2)(A) and did not violate defendant's constitutional rights. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

106. In an aggravated robbery case, although a foundation was lacking for admission of an accomplice's statement as a prior inconsistent statement under this rule or as an exception to the hearsay rule under Tex. R. Evid. 803, its admission into evidence did not constitute reversible error because a detective had already testified in detail regarding the contents of the statement. Romero v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2999 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 1 2004).

107. Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) prohibits extrinsic evidence of an inconsistent statement unless denied by a witness. Ferguson v. State, 97 S.W.3d 293, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 148 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2003).

108. Defendant's assignment of error, concerning his attempt to impeach an accomplice witness with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 613, was overruled because defendant did show how he was harmed when the appellate court was convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that no impeachment using the accomplice's statement would have altered the outcome of the trial, and defense counsel made no offer of proof detailing the questions he wanted to ask or the specific inconsistent statements he wanted to use for impeachment pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 103 and Tex. R. App. P. 33.2. Ferguson v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9005 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 19 2002).

109. Defendant's assignment of error, concerning his attempt to impeach an accomplice witness with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 613, was overruled because defendant did show how he was harmed when the appellate court was convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that no impeachment using the accomplice's statement would have altered the outcome of the trial, and defense counsel made no offer of proof detailing the questions he wanted to ask or the specific inconsistent statements he wanted to use for impeachment pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 103 and Tex. R. App. P. 33.2. Ferguson v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9005 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 19 2002).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Prior Statements by Witnesses : Consistent Statements

110. Defendant was entitled to a new trial for the murder of her stepfather because of new evidence, specifically, information from defendant's former boyfriend about her outcry 30 years earlier regarding sexual abuse by the stepfather; the outcry evidence rebutted the State's claim of recent fabrication. Carsner v. State, 415 S.W.3d 507, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12563, 2013 WL 5561653 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 9 2013).

111. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(c), a bolstering objection is appropriately made to a prior consistent statement introduced after the witness's in-court trial testimony. West v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5354 (Tex. App. Austin July 18 2008).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Prior Statements by Witnesses : Inconsistent Statements

112. Record supported the trial court's conclusion that the victim's prior statements were not admissible under this rule because it could have reasonably determined that defendant offered the victim's testimony for the primary purpose of eliciting her recorded conversation with the officer, which was otherwise inadmissible hearsay. Mury v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12662, 2013 WL 5856337 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 11 2013).

113. Although the trial court erred by denying a limiting instruction because the witnesses' prior statements did not fall within any hearsay exception and so were admissible for impeachment purposes only, the error was harmless. Absent from the inconsistent statements, the record contained other evidence from which the jury could have inferred that defendant did not act in self-defense, and the trial court's charge instructed the jury that a witness's prior inconsistent statement could only be considered for impeachment purposes to asses the witness's credibility. Arnold v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9768 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 31 2008).

114. In defendant's drug case, the court did not err by admitting a videotape of a witness's interrogation by police because it was introduced to "rebut the witness's claims that the police threatened and coerced her into falsely stating that defendant was at the parking lot in order to conduct the drug deal." Kennedy v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3424 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 8 2008).

115. In a child sexual abuse case, defendant could not question the investigating officer about prior inconsistent statements that the victim allegedly had made to the officer who initially took her statement and to a caseworker; this multiple hearsay was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 805 because even if the victim's statements had been admissible under the prior inconsistent statement rule, which would have passed the first level of hearsay, defendant offered no explanation of how the contents of a report by the officer who initially took the victim's statement or the investigating officer's testimony based on that report fell within any hearsay exception. Segura v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1303 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 21 2008).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Statements by Party Opponents : General Overview

116. Trial court did not err by admitting the witness's testimony that defendant urged her to say that the victim assaulted her so that defendant could assert the affirmative defense of defense of a third person because the statements were made by defendant and offered against him. Thus, they constituted an admission of a party opponent and did not implicate the prior inconsistent statement rule. Stairhime v. State, 439 S.W.3d 499, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7905 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 22 2014).

117. In defendant's sexual assault case, a witness's testimony regarding defendant's statement to him was properly admitted where it was clearly not hearsay and thus its admission, even though erroneously described by the trial judge as occurring under Tex. R. Evid 613, was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2)(A) and did not violate defendant's constitutional rights. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

Evidence : Hearsay : Hearsay Within Hearsay

118. In a child sexual abuse case, defendant could not question the investigating officer about prior inconsistent statements that the victim allegedly had made to the officer who initially took her statement and to a caseworker;

this multiple hearsay was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 805 because even if the victim's statements had been admissible under the prior inconsistent statement rule, which would have passed the first level of hearsay, defendant offered no explanation of how the contents of a report by the officer who initially took the victim's statement or the investigating officer's testimony based on that report fell within any hearsay exception. Segura v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1303 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 21 2008).

119. In a criminal prosecution for burglary of a habitation with intent to commit aggravated assault, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit the complainant's handwritten statement as impeachment evidence where the document was double hearsay not within any exception. Oveal v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6148 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 13 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11050 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 9, 2004).

Evidence : Hearsay : Rule Components

120. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, a court did not err in excluding a hearsay conversation with social services for impeachment purposes where defendant did not present the victim with or give her the opportunity to explain the statement on the tape. Further, the tape itself did not contain a statement by the victim or even a statement by someone who had herself talked to the victim, but by an unknown caller reporting a statement by the caller's child. Holmes v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10661 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 30 2004).

121. IIn a murder case, a court properly allowed the State to impeach a witness with his prior inconsistent grand jury statement where he was shown a copy of his grand jury testimony and he acknowledged that he had previously testified that, during a telephone conversation, defendant told him that "they are here." The State used the brother's prior statements for the limited purpose of attacking his credibility because of his inconsistent statements, and not to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Bolton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5584 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 24 2004).

Evidence : Hearsay : Rule Components : Truth of Matter Asserted

122. Any error by the court in considering an officer's testimony concerning statements made to him by a witness was harmless because, assuming that the trial court considered the complained-of testimony for the truth of the matter asserted, there was overwhelming evidence of defendant's guilt that was properly introduced. Three eyewitnesses identified defendant as the gunman, and a vehicle matching the description of the vehicle driven by the gunman was found in close proximity of defendant's residence. In re E.S., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6690, 2009 WL 2623352 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 26 2009).

123. Trial court's decision to allow a sheriff's office investigator to testify to statements that an assault/domestic violence victim made to her as extrinsic evidence of the victim's prior inconsistent statements was not an abuse of discretion where the victim unequivocally admitted making statements to the investigator, but when confronted with her prior statements, her answers in large part were not responsive and the trial court had to admonish her during her testimony for offering explanations rather than answers. The testimony of the investigator could have been admitted for the purpose of showing what the victim said rather than the truth of the matter stated, and defendant did not demonstrate that the testimony of the investigator was more probative than prejudicial. Sharp v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3216 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 20 2006).

124. Trial court's decision to allow a sheriff's office investigator to testify to statements that an assault/domestic violence victim made to her as extrinsic evidence of the victim's prior inconsistent statements was not an abuse of discretion where the victim unequivocally admitted making statements to the investigator, but when confronted with her prior statements, her answers in large part were not responsive. The testimony of the investigator could have been admitted for the purpose of showing what the victim said rather than the truth of the matter stated, and defendant did not demonstrate that the testimony of the investigator was more probative than prejudicial. Sharp v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3216 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 20 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

125. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant did not preserve for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) a claim of improper bolstering of a witness in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 613(c)because the trial court admonished the prosecutor in response to defense counsel's objection, defendant did not request an instruction to disregard, and such an instruction would have cured any error. Pruitt v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3314 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 29 2005).

126. Trial court did not err in admitting defendant's girlfiend's out-of-court statement to a police officer as a prior inconsistent statement where the officer testified that the girlfriend had told him that she had not seen defendant for the few days surrounding the offense but at trial, she testified that he had been with her at the time of the robbery. Butler v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10576 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2004).

127. In a case where defendant was convicted of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 31.07(a), assuming arguendo that the trial court erred by admitting extrinsic evidence of the complainant's prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 613, any error in its admission was harmless because the same evidence was properly admitted when an officer testified that the complainant reported to him that defendant had taken the truck without permission on the day in question. Cration v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10344 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 11 2003).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Judicial Intervention in Trials : Comments by Judges : General Overview

128. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by explaining to the State how to present rebuttal evidence where the comments about the admissibility of the State's rebuttal witness were made outside the presence of the jury, and they did not indicate that any assistance was given to the State; the judge was presented with an admissibility question under Tex. R. Evid. 613 and made a decision which left defendant with the choice of returning to the stand to preclude the testimony of the State's witness or remaining silent and relying on his original statement. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : General Overview

129. Even if the appellate court assumed that defendant's reliance on Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) was sufficient to preserve his constitutional claim, because he did not object on the basis of USCS Const. Amend. 6 at trial, he did not preserve the issue for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, but the evidence in question did not demonstrate that the complainant had a bias or motive to testify against him. Rice v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10033 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 1 2005).

130. Because the trial court sustained both of defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) objections, nothing was preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Defendant received the relief he requested--a limiting instruction--on his first objection to the testimony and requested no relief after the trial court sustained his running objection. Coleman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2855 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 14 2005).

131. Defendant argued that the trial court improperly restricted his attempts to impeach a witness's testimony with a prior statement in which he said he saw the victim in the hallway with a shotgun just before he heard the fatal shot. The State properly responded that the witness's prior written statement was not in the record, and thus defendant had failed to preserve his complaint by making an offer of proof. Lindsey v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11139 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 8 2004).

132. In a criminal trial, where defendant claimed that the trial court erred in excluding a handwritten note allegedly written by an assistant district attorney, defendant failed to preserve his argument that the note was admissible as impeachment evidence where defendant did not offer the note as evidence at trial. Oveal v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6148 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 13 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11050 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 9, 2004).

133. In a criminal appeal, the court would not review defendant's argument that a witness was called by the State solely for the purpose of impeachment; defendant's objection at trial, that the proper foundation for impeachment was not laid under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), did not comport with his argument on appeal. Medina v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3717 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 29 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Offers of Proof

134. In a child sexual assault case, a defendant failed to preserve for review his contention that interruption of his cross-examination of the victim regarding another "young person" with whom she had been involved violated his right to confrontation under U.S. Const. amend. VI and Tex. R. Evid. 613. Nor did he make an offer of proof or obtain a ruling from the trial court on his objection. Watson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4202, 2012 WL 1871626 (Tex. App. Waco May 23 2012).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Rulings on Evidence

135. Where a murder victim's best friend unequivocally admitted to writing checks to herself out of a trust account set up for the victim's family during the time that the victim was missing, and defendant offered no explanation about how the physical checks would have shown more interest or bias than that to which the best friend had already admitted, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit into evidence a defense exhibit consisting of several of the checks. White v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2224 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 23 2006).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

136. Appellate court found that it would not be outside the zone of reasonable disagreement for the trial court to resolve the Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis in favor of allowing the State to elicit the prior inconsistent statements, because the witness was one of the two alleged victims in the case, the issue of the witness's credibility was crucial to both the State and defendant, the State was surprised by the witness's unfavorable testimony, and the elicited favorable testimony, although limited, would support a finding that the State did not call the witness for the primary purpose of eliciting otherwise inadmissible evidence. Polston v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6126, 2011 WL 3435389 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 5 2011).

137. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding text messages and voicemail messages offered for impeachment of the child victim's mother because the probative value of the evidence was minimal, as it did not directly refute any element of the charged offense, which was established by the victim's testimony, and none of the messages concerned the sexual abuse. The evidence was also cumulative of other evidence admitted at trial, as defense counsel cross-examined the victim's mother regarding her marriage to defendant, and the testimony of the victim and her brother corroborated the turbulent nature of the mother's marriage to defendant. Smith v. State, 340 S.W.3d 41, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1739 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 10 2011).

138. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 613 and the balancing test in Tex. R. Evid. 403, the State had proper reasons to call defendant's father as a witness in a murder case and to point out that the account he gave to the police and to another witness were diametrically opposed. Westbrook v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1443, 2011 WL 686396 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 28 2011).

139. In a case in which defendant was convicted of theft from a person, there was no merit in defendant's claim that the trial court did not require the State to follow the proper procedure in admitting his accomplice's prior inconsistent statement for impeachment purposes where the trial court did not permit the predicate requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) to be violated because extrinsic evidence of the accomplice's statement to a detective was not offered before the jury, and, furthermore, the trial court took the extra step of instructing the jury that it could only consider the prior statements for impeachment purposes. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the accomplice's version of the events was critical to defendant's prosecution, because the probative value of impeaching the accomplice's potentially untrue testimony was not substantially outweighed by the potential misuse by the jury of his previous statement to the detective, and because the trial court expressly determined that there was no evidence that the State anticipated that the accomplice's trial testimony would be inconsistent with his statements to the detective or that the State called the accomplice as a witness in bad faith. Cervantes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1149, 2010 WL 548503 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 18 2010).

140. In defendant's felony murder case, the court properly excluded evidence that the trooper used the word "psychotic" in his accident report to impeach his trial testimony because the trooper could not properly testify as an expert or lay witness that defendant was psychotic, and therefore, the label had no probative value as primary evidence. Additionally, there was a strong tendency of the evidence to suggest decision on an improper basis, the tendency of the evidence to confuse or distract the jury from the main issues, and the tendency of the evidence to be given undue weight by the jury. Fisher-Riza v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9769, 2009 WL 4358622 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

141. Trial court's decision to allow a sheriff's office investigator to testify to statements that an assault/domestic violence victim made to her as extrinsic evidence of the victim's prior inconsistent statements was not an abuse of discretion where the victim unequivocally admitted making statements to the investigator, but when confronted with her prior statements, her answers in large part were not responsive and the trial court had to admonish her during her testimony for offering explanations rather than answers. The testimony of the investigator could have been admitted for the purpose of showing what the victim said rather than the truth of the matter stated, and defendant did not demonstrate that the testimony of the investigator was more probative than prejudicial. Sharp v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3216 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 20 2006).

142. Trial court's decision to allow a sheriff's office investigator to testify to statements that an assault/domestic violence victim made to her as extrinsic evidence of the victim's prior inconsistent statements was not an abuse of discretion where the victim unequivocally admitted making statements to the investigator, but when confronted with her prior statements, her answers in large part were not responsive. The testimony of the investigator could have been admitted for the purpose of showing what the victim said rather than the truth of the matter stated, and defendant did not demonstrate that the testimony of the investigator was more probative than prejudicial. Sharp v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3216 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 20 2006).

143. Trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding a child sexual assault victim's relationships with two different boys and her actions and comments involving two cousins did not deprive defendant of his constitutional right to a fair trial where the trial court could have determined, based on the chronology of the events, that they did not explain the State's medical evidence regarding the time of the penetration of the victim's hymen, and, although the trial court excluded the equivocal testimony of the victim's mother about the victim's veracity, the victim's aunt was allowed to testify that she had a bad reputation for being untruthful, and the victim herself admitted lying to defendant, her father, about her report card. Accordingly, the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the matters had, at best, marginal relevance to the victim's alleged motive to testify falsely against defendant, that they would have unduly harassed the victim and confused the issues, and that the danger of unfair prejudice from the evidence would have outweighed its probative value. Pogue v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7819 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

144. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing defendant from cross-examining the complainant about her previous false allegations of sexual assault. The evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) to show the complainant's bias against defendant and her possible motive to testify falsely against him. Hammer v. State, 296 S.W.3d 555, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 513 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

145. During the punishment phase of a criminal prosecution for possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver or manufacture, the trial court did not err by allowing testimony from a witness about an alleged plot by defendant to kill police officers, and where defendant denied the existence of any such plan, the State was permitted to impeach defendant by using a rebuttal witness to testify to his prior oral inconsistent statement. Revill v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5654 (Tex. App. Tyler June 23 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

146. During a capital murder trial, the State admitted an unauthenticated letter, written by a third party and sent to defendant at the county jail for the purpose of impeaching defendant's trial court testimony that she never had sex with another woman; the letter was not relevant to anything at issue, was not proper impeachment, and the trial court erred in admitting the letter. Abdygapparova v. State, 243 S.W.3d 191, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8205 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

147. Trial court erred by admitting into evidence a letter that was written to her while she was in jail because the letter was not relevant to defendant's capital murder trial, as the letter, sent to defendant by a man, living in another state and whom she had never met, outlining his sexual desires and fantasies with defendant and other women, did not tend to make anything as to defendant, much less her sexual orientation or whether she committed sexual assault, any more or less probable; in addition, because the statement was not defendant's own statement, the trial court erred by admitting it under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Abdygapparova v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5806 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 25 2007).

148. Where the State had already established on direct examination that the complainant was serving a deferred adjudication probation during one point in her relationship with defendant, any further inquiry would not have made the existence of any fact of consequence to the determination of defendant's alleged offense more or less probable than it was without the evidence, and such testimony was not relevant to any bias, motive, or interest to help the State, making it an impermissible method of impeachment; accordingly, the trial court was within its discretion to limit the question posed by defendant's counsel on cross-examination. Crook v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3485 (Tex. App. Dallas May 6 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : General Overview

149. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault and solicitation of a minor, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit evidence of a conversation showing that the complainant had knowledge of sexual matters before these alleged events occurred because the evidence was hearsay and subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid.

608, 609 and 613. Landers v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2982, 2011 WL 1496154 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 19 2011).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Rape Shield Laws

150. Trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding a child sexual assault victim's relationships with two different boys and her actions and comments involving two cousins did not deprive defendant of his constitutional right to a fair trial where the trial court could have determined, based on the chronology of the events, that they did not explain the State's medical evidence regarding the time of the penetration of the victim's hymen, and, although the trial court excluded the equivocal testimony of the victim's mother about the victim's veracity, the victim's aunt was allowed to testify that she had a bad reputation for being untruthful, and the victim herself admitted lying to defendant, her father, about her report card. Accordingly, the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the matters had, at best, marginal relevance to the victim's alleged motive to testify falsely against defendant, that they would have unduly harassed the victim and confused the issues, and that the danger of unfair prejudice from the evidence would have outweighed its probative value. Pogue v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7819 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : General Overview

151. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in requiring defendant to first establish a prior inconsistent statement for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) before attempting to introduce audio taped statements of the victim in an attempt to impeach the victim; defendant failed to cite any authority to support the claim that audio recordings of a witness prior to trial could be used to impeach a different witness at trial. Rincon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2758 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 5 2006).

152. Modification of a divorce decree concerning the father's parental rights and duties was proper pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) where the father's due process rights were not violated when the district court refused to permit the father to impeach the mother because the father did not lay a proper predicate to impeach the mother with the alleged prior inconsistent testimony. In re Z.A.T., 193 S.W.3d 197, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2783 (Tex. App. Waco 2006).

153. Where a murder victim's best friend unequivocally admitted to writing checks to herself out of a trust account set up for the victim's family during the time that the victim was missing, and defendant offered no explanation about how the physical checks would have shown more interest or bias than that to which the best friend had already admitted, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit into evidence a defense exhibit consisting of several of the checks. White v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2224 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 23 2006).

154. Where the prosecutor provided defendant's daughter with a copy of her prior statement and asked her if she had made the statement about the victim's disappearance and only after she denied any recollection of the entire statement did the prosecutor call an investigator to prove its content; therefore, the prosecution laid the proper predicate under Tex. R. Evid. 613 for the admission of the statement. Voisin v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5104 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2005).

155. Writ of mandamus was granted because ordering the expert witness to give deposition testimony regarding his litigation-related income for the years 2002, 2003 and 2004, and the percentage of the total income that was litigation-related would not materially benefit the dispute resolution process in the case in view of the information already available to the parties and the trial court concerning the expert, Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.4; the expert had disclosed his hourly rate, his time spent working on the case, and the fact he testified almost exclusively for defendants, and since the information sought to be protected would be disclosed before any appeal would be available, relators lacked an adequate legal remedy. In re Weir, 166 S.W.3d 861, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4689 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

156. Trial court did not err under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) in refusing to allow defendant to offer certain testimony at the punishment phase; the testimony was not proper impeachment testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) because the victim was not questioned about a particular statement during the guilt/innocence phase and did not testify during the punishment phase, and furthermore, the testimony was not relevant because evidence that the victim might have been abused by someone other than defendant was not helpful to the jury in determining an appropriate sentence for defendant. Alvarez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4075 (Tex. App. Dallas May 26 2005).

157. Trial court did not err in excluding two exhibits, and although defendant claimed that the exclusion of the exhibits impaired defendant's right to cross-examine the victim, defendant did not explain how this was true in that the trial court allowed defendant to fully question the victim regarding the exhibits; defendant cited no portions of the exhibits that referred to any facts in the case, supported a conspiratorial fabrication regarding the victim's allegations, or could not have been brought to the jury's attention through questions addressed to the victim, and defendant's predicate for introducing the exhibits failed to establish either that they had any relevance to issues in the case or were otherwise admissible, for example, under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Ford v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4046 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2005).

158. Witness told counsel that defendant did not consent to a search, but the witness later said at trial that the witness did not remember; the trial court could have found that the witness's lack of memory was real so there was nothing to impeach under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), and the trial court could have concluded, under Tex. R. Evid. 403, that the danger of misuse of counsel's testimony for substantive purposes outweighed the impeachment value of the testimony, and even if the trial court erred in excluding counsel's testimony, such error did not affect defendant's substantial rights under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because defendant's questioning raised the possibility of the witness's credibility and the testimony would have simply bolstered evidence already in front of the jury. Sanchez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2176 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 24 2005).

159. Defendant did not obtain an adverse ruling on an objection to using alleged bad acts to impeach, and thus defendant failed to preserve error; even had error been preserved, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the questions on the grounds that it was an attempt to show the witness's bias towards defendant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 613(b). Martinez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1822 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 10 2005).

160. In an assault case, a trial court's refusal to replay a videotape regarding a statement made by a victim was not an abuse of discretion because the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 613 were not satisfied; because the officer on the stand at the time did not make any statement on the tape regarding witnesses to the assault, there was no prior inconsistent statement. Mumphrey v. State, 155 S.W.3d 651, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 370 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

161. Defendant preserved for review, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), an evidentiary issue under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) because defendant's counsel raised the issue of bias before the trial court. Means v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11728 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 30 2004).

162. Trial court did not err in preventing defendant's cross-examination of a State's witness, which defendant claimed was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b); cross-examination of a child protective services report was properly prevented because nothing ever showed that the allegations therein were untrue, and facts did not support the contention that the allegations could have related to bias or motive by the witness to testify untruthfully against defendant. Means v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11728 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 30 2004).

163. In a manufacturing defect case brought against a tire company, the court rejected the tire company's argument that plaintiffs were improperly permitted to elicit testimony about other incidents and lawsuits from several defense witnesses; under the well-established law governing cross-examination, an expert witness may be cross-examined regarding the number of times he has testified in lawsuits, payments for such testifying, and related questions. The complained-of questioning was clearly for impeachment purposes to show interest or bias in the litigation; under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), such questioning was permissible. Cooper Tire & Rubber Co. v. Mendez, 155 S.W.3d 382, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9112 (Tex. App. El Paso 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 204 S.W.3d 797, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 555 (Tex. 2006).

164. In a criminal trial, where defendant claimed that the trial court erred in excluding a handwritten note allegedly written by an assistant district attorney, defendant failed to preserve his argument that the note was admissible as impeachment evidence where defendant did not offer the note as evidence at trial. Oveal v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6148 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 13 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11050 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 9, 2004).

165. In a criminal prosecution for burglary of a habitation with intent to commit aggravated assault, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit the complainant's handwritten statement as impeachment evidence where the document was double hearsay not within any exception. Oveal v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6148 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 13 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11050 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 9, 2004).

166. No specific connection existed between the witness' testimony and the animus alleged that disclosed an actual bias or motive; accordingly, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit the testimony. Whitmill v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4610 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 19 2004).

167. Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) permits impeachment by a prior inconsistent statement provided that the witness has not already "unequivocally admitted" the inconsistencies between the prior statement and his trial testimony; therefore, a habeas corpus petitioner, who was convicted of capital murder, was not denied effective assistance of counsel by his counsel's failure to object to the State's use of a tape-recorded conversation, which was used to demonstrate inconsistencies between the petitioner's trial testimony and his prior statements to law enforcement officials. Morrow v. Dretke, 99 Fed. Appx. 505, 2004 U.S. App. LEXIS 10009 (5th Cir. Tex. 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 543 U.S. 944, 125 S. Ct. 359, 160 L. Ed. 2d 257, 2004 U.S. LEXIS 6989, 73 U.S.L.W. 3246 (2004).

168. In a case where defendant was convicted of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 31.07(a), assuming arguendo that the trial court erred by admitting extrinsic evidence of the complainant's prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 613, any error in its admission was harmless because the same evidence was properly admitted when an officer testified that the complainant reported to him that defendant had taken the truck without permission on the day in question. Cration v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10344 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 11 2003).

169. Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) prohibits extrinsic evidence of an inconsistent statement unless denied by a witness. Ferguson v. State, 97 S.W.3d 293, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 148 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2003).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : General Overview

170. Defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated was proper. Moreover, even if the 911 call was inadmissible defendant was not harmed by its admission; there was ample evidence in the record other than the 911 call tending to show that defendant was driving while intoxicated, including the detailed testimony of the arresting officer who had observed numerous signs that defendant was intoxicated. Condarco v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10741 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 27 2013).

171. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court abused its discretion by excluding the victim's diary because defense counsel failed to make any suggestion that the diary was admissible as impeachment evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 613, as a general assertion that the diary was not hearsay was insufficient to make the trial court aware of a Rule 613 argument. Fletcher v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5429, 2012 WL 2783298 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 10 2012).

172. In defendant's felony murder case, the court properly excluded evidence that the trooper used the word "psychotic" in his accident report to impeach his trial testimony because the trooper could not properly testify as an expert or lay witness that defendant was psychotic, and therefore, the label had no probative value as primary evidence. Additionally, there was a strong tendency of the evidence to suggest decision on an improper basis, the tendency of the evidence to confuse or distract the jury from the main issues, and the tendency of the evidence to be given undue weight by the jury. Fisher-Riza v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9769, 2009 WL 4358622 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

173. No due process or confrontation violation was shown when defendant was not allowed to question a witness regarding his citizenship status, because defendant did not show and did not allege that the witness had been convicted of entering the United States unlawfully, the assertion that the witness's immigration status gave him a motive to testify falsely was not raised below and was not supported by the record, and counsel did not take the witness on voir dire or otherwise make a record as to whether the witness was or was not in the country lawfully. Shrader v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8777, 2009 WL 3806147 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 10 2009).

174. If the court construed defendant's complaint as arguing that the admission of the victim's medical records improperly bolstered her in-court testimony, the record did not indicate the State introduced the medical records for the sole purpose of enhancing the victim's credibility or the credibility of other evidence, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's bolstering objection. West v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8599 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 14 2008).

175. Defendant contended at trial that the victim voluntarily performed oral sex on him, that there was no penetration, and that the victim lied about having been assaulted; because appellant attacked the victim's credibility, the trial court did not err in determining that her prior consistent statement to a nurse was admissible, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(c), 801(e)(1)(B). West v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8599 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 14 2008).

176. Tex. R. Evid. 613(c) objection only applies to a witness's prior statement, not to in-court testimony, and a bolstering objection is appropriately made to a prior consistent statement introduced after the witness's in-court testimony; in this case, defendant complained that the victim's in-court testimony bolstered her earlier admitted hearing statements in a physical examination, but the court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the testimony. West v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8599 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 14 2008).

177. In a murder trial, the State was permitted to question the credibility of a witness based on the inconsistency between the testimony of that witness and the defendant; Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) did not prohibit such an inquiry. Cantu v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8738 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 11 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : General Overview

178. Appellant sought to introduce a disciplinary report to show an officer's lack of credibility, but appellant did not argue that the officer was untrustworthy based on bias, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), and Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) expressly prohibits the introduction of specific instances of conduct to attack a witness's credibility; given that appellant tried to impeach the officer's credibility with the report, the trial court did not err in limiting the cross-examination, and even though the trial court limited cross-examination because the report was not a public record, the court could affirm if the ruling was correct on any applicable theory. Baldez v. State, 386 S.W.3d 324, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5466, 2012 WL 2834043 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 11 2012).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : Opinion & Reputation

179. While petitioner state inmate argued his counsel was ineffective for not presenting additional witnesses to show the 9-year-old victim of his sexual assault was motivated to lie in retaliation for the inmate having disciplined the victim, nothing showed such testimony would have been admissible since, consistent with Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and a pre-trial order, defense counsel and defense witnesses were precluded from mentioning, directly or indirectly, any specific instance of conduct by the victim without first approaching the bench; under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), specific instances of conduct could be used to establish that a witness had specific bias, self-interest, or motive for testifying, and under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), specific acts of misconduct could also be used to establish a person's motive for performing an act, such as making a false allegation, but where credibility was concerned, a witness's general character for truthfulness could be shown only through reputation or opinion testimony under Rule 608(a). Mendez v. Quarterman, 625 F. Supp. 2d 415, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47543 (S.D. Tex. June 4 2009).

180. In a case involving assault against a public servant, the State did not err in recalling a deputy to the stand because defendant made no bolstering objection under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) or Tex. R. Evid. 613(c); moreover, there was no violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.02. At any rate, the deputy's testimony on recall did not duplicate that which was previously given. Reaves v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 28 2008).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : Specific Instances

181. Where defendant was convicted of DWI, he was not harmed by the trial court's refusal to allow him to impeach an officer with a specific act of dishonesty. Evidence that the officer intentionally withheld testimony about his failing to report a weapon discharge would not have proved that the officer lied about defendant's reckless driving; defendant did not explain how the excluded evidence would show that the officer had a motive or bias to falsely testify that defendant drove erratically. Tollett v. State, 422 S.W.3d 886, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1216, 2014 WL 462275 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 4 2014).

182. Where defendant was convicted of indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, he failed to prove that the trial court erred by ruling that a question concerning the witness' prior false allegation of abuse was improper under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b); the record failed to establish what the child victim alleged that was false or that her allegation would demonstrate bias for purposes of showing admissibility under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Pierson v. State, 398 S.W.3d 406, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4868 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 19 2013).

183. While petitioner state inmate argued his counsel was ineffective for not presenting additional witnesses to show the 9-year-old victim of his sexual assault was motivated to lie in retaliation for the inmate having disciplined the victim, nothing showed such testimony would have been admissible since, consistent with Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and a pre trial order, defense counsel and defense witnesses were precluded from mentioning, directly or indirectly, any specific instance of conduct by the victim without first approaching the bench; under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), specific instances of conduct could be used to establish that a witness had specific bias, self-interest, or motive for testifying, and under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), specific acts of misconduct could also be used to establish a person's motive for performing an act, such as making a false allegation, but where credibility was concerned, a witness's general character for truthfulness could be shown only through reputation or opinion testimony under Rule 608(a). Mendez v. Quarterman, 625 F. Supp. 2d 415, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47543 (S.D. Tex. June 4 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bias, Motive & Prejudice

184. At defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, he was not harmed by the trial court's exclusion of evidence of the victim's prior drug use or debt owed to his accomplice; as defendant did not explain how the victim's drug use translated into ill will, bias, or animus toward defendant, it was improper impeachment evidence. Richardson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1723, 2014 WL 645801 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 14 2014).

185. Where defendant was convicted of DWI, he was not harmed by the trial court's refusal to allow him to impeach an officer with a specific act of dishonesty. Evidence that the officer intentionally withheld testimony about his failing to report a weapon discharge would not have proved that the officer lied about defendant's reckless driving; defendant did not explain how the excluded evidence would show that the officer had a motive or bias to falsely testify that defendant drove erratically. Tollett v. State, 422 S.W.3d 886, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1216, 2014 WL 462275 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 4 2014).

186. Because information that revealed that the bias or interest of the State's medical expert was before the jury and the excluded information would not have added significantly to the inmate's ability to impeach his credibility, the trial court's ruling did not unduly restrict the inmate's cross-examination of the State's expert. In re Smith, 422 S.W.3d 802, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 667, 2014 WL 333374 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

187. Because information that revealed that the bias or interest of the State's medical expert was before the jury and the excluded information would not have added significantly to the inmate's ability to impeach his credibility, the trial court's ruling did not unduly restrict the inmate's cross-examination of the State's expert. In re Smith, 422 S.W.3d 802, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 667, 2014 WL 333374 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

188. In an armed robbery case, the trial court properly refused to recall the store manager for cross-examination because his testimony that he was mad when defendant hit him, but did not hold a grudge, was not inconsistent with his testimony during the bill of exception that he chased after defendant in spite of store policy because he was mad; further, evidence of any bias was already before the jury. Ramos v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 113, 2014 WL 50812 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 7 2014).

189. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow witnesses to be impeached by proof: (1) showing a bias or interest on the part of some other witness or information source, and (2) about which the witness had no personal knowledge. Estate of Muniz v. Ford Motor Co., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7158 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 12 2013).

190. At defendant's trial for assault on a family member, Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) permitted the admission of proof showing bias on the part of defendant's wife because they were involved in divorce proceedings in which she had a pecuniary interest; the trial court did not err in refusing to permit further cross-examination about the divorce. Baker v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6084 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 16 2013).

191. Where defendant was convicted of indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, he failed to prove that the trial court erred by ruling that a question concerning the witness' prior false allegation of abuse was improper under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b); the record failed to establish what the child victim alleged that was false or that her allegation would demonstrate bias for purposes of showing admissibility under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Pierson v. State, 398 S.W.3d 406, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4868 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 19 2013).

192. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence of the victim's mother's purported prior false accusations of sexual abuse, Tex. R. Evid. 613(b). Contrary to defendant's assertion, the proffered testimony did not show a bias against him or a motive to falsely accuse him; rather, it constituted an impermissible attack on the mother's credibility using specific instances of conduct. Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

193. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and 613, the trial court did not err in limiting defendant's cross-examination of the witness because defendant did not make a connection between defendant's pending felony case and status as a probationer that would have prompted the witness to falsely identify defendant in a photographic line-up. Oliva v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8940, 2011 WL 5428965 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2011).

194. Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence of bias, because the grandmother was not a witness at trial and Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) did not allow defendant to question the mother about the grandmother's actions in an attempt to show the grandmother's bias, interest or motive, and to the extent defendant argued the evidence of the mother's abuse when she was five years old was relevant to show bias or motive, he did not establish either ground through mother's testimony outside the jury's presence. Sturgeon v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8467, 2011 WL 5042087 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 25 2011).

195. Although appellant juvenile claimed that his Sixth Amendment rights were violated, as well as Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), when the trial court refused to allow appellant to question the victim about her sexual orientation, the issue was not preserved for review; appellant failed to make a record as to the questions he wanted to ask the victim and what her answers would have been or what appellant expected them to be. In re O.O.A., 358 S.W.3d 352, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7416 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 13 2011).

196. During defendant's trial for murder, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) in limiting defendant's cross-examination of a witness because the line of cross-examination sought by defendant did not demonstrate any bias or prejudice by the witness against defendant; the testimony elicited concerned a debt owed not to defendant, but to a co-defendant who had already pled guilty to murder. Requeno-portillo v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6898, 2011 WL 3820747 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 25 2011).

197. No violation of Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), 608(b) occurred where defense counsel was not prevented from impeaching a witness by use of extrinsic evidence to show bias or interest and counsel was allowed to cross-examine the witness concerning whether she entered into a plea agreement in exchange for her testimony. Reyna v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6062, 2011 WL 3366383 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 4 2011).

198. Defendant was not harmed by exclusion of certain evidence concerning a State witness, Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), as she had pursued opportunity to discredit the witness. Mitchell v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5682, 2011 WL 3047474 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 25 2011).

199. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding text messages and voicemail messages offered for impeachment of the child victim's mother because the probative value of the evidence was minimal, as it did not directly refute any element of the charged offense, which was established by the victim's testimony, and none of the messages concerned the sexual abuse. The evidence was also cumulative of other evidence admitted at trial, as defense counsel cross-examined the victim's mother regarding her marriage to defendant, and the testimony of the victim and her brother corroborated the turbulent nature of the mother's marriage to defendant. Smith v. State, 340 S.W.3d 41, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1739 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 10 2011).

200. In a health care liability action, while appellants claimed that the first physician was not qualified to render a reliable expert opinion under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351(r)(5)(C) because he served as a member of the Medical Board in the surgeon's termination request and was thus biased, any bias went to first physician's credibility under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) and did not disqualify him from rendering an expert opinion. Beaumont Spine Pain & Sports Med. Clinic, Inc. v. Swan, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 768, 2011 WL 379168 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 3 2011).

201. In defendant's trial for four counts of sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by refusing to admit evidence of specific instances of conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) to show that the victim's father had also been indicted for aggravated sexual assault of a child. Defendant failed to show how the offense made more probable the existence of any motive, bias, or interest on the part of the witness for purposes of admissibility under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b); in fact, the evidence posed a risk of confusing or misleading the jury. Harris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9999 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 16 2010).

202. Defendant failed to preserve for review his claim that a child sexual assault victim had bias or motive to lie under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) because he did not introduce at a hearing that occurred outside the presence of the jury the victim's prior outcry statement that she had made against another man. Littlepage v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9968 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 16 2010).

203. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's prior dismissed theft charge and his mother's involvement in obtaining that dismissal because the State did not offer the testimony as extraneous offense evidence to impeach defendant's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), but rather to show the mother's own bias in favor defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Mares v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6844, 2010 WL 3294244 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 19 2010).

204. Trial court did not err by refusing to permit defendant to impeach the deputy based on pending criminal charges that had been filed against the deputy because defendant failed to establish a causal connection between the pending charges and the deputy's testimony at trial. At trial, defendant argued, because the deputy's presentence investigation report had not been completed, the deputy had a motive to be biased toward the State; the argument was the equivalent of the mere existence of federal charges and failed to establish a nexus or causal connection indicating bias. Gilmore v. State, 323 S.W.3d 250, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6571 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2010).

205. Defendant failed to preserve for review his assertion that the trial court erred by not allowing evidence that the complainant had alleged, and testified about, virtually identical sexual abuse committed by her previous step-father, because defendant's arguments on appeal did not comport with his arguments at trial, and the alleged error did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict; defendant testified regarding his defensive theory that his disputes with the complainant's mother influenced the complainant to fabricate the allegations against him. Bullock v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8872, 2009 WL 3838861 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 18 2009).

206. Court was unable to say that the possible bias and motive of the victim, defendant's common law wife, as a result of an ongoing custody dispute was clear to the jury in defendant's assault trial or that defense counsel was afforded an opportunity for a thorough cross-examination of the victim, such that the trial court erred in limiting the cross-examination, for purposes of U.S. Const. amend. VI. Ryan v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5412 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 15 2009).

207. Defendant's assault case was based on the testimony of the victim, his common law wife, and the officer to whom the victim related the events and precluding defendant from showing the bias and motive of the only witness linking him to the offense hampered his defense; the excluded cross-examination was not cumulative, there was no other witness to the events to corroborate the victim's testimony, and defense counsel was not otherwise afforded an opportunity for a thorough and effective cross-examination, and because the victim's motive to lie or exaggerate in order to gain sole custody of their children was a critical issue for the defense, the court could not find that the trial court's error did not contribute to defendant's conviction, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(a). Ryan v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5412 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 15 2009).

208. In an intoxication manslaughter case, the trial court did not err by prohibiting cross-examination of an officer on the scene regarding the internal investigation against him because other witnesses identified defendant as the driver, two other officers testified that they smelled alcohol on defendant's breath, and other evidence introduced at trial showed that defendant was intoxicated that night. Mole v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2838, 2009 WL 1099433 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 23 2009).

209. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing defendant from cross-examining the complainant about her previous false allegations of sexual assault. The evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) to show the complainant's bias against defendant and her possible motive to testify falsely against him. Hammer v. State, 296 S.W.3d 555, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 513 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

210. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, defendant was entitled under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 613(b) to impeach the complainant by presenting evidence that the complainant threatened to falsely accuse neighbors of molestation, even though the threats occurred after the charged offense. The complainant testified to becoming angry when defendant took back a gift, and, the very next day, the complainant accused defendant of molestation. Billodeau v. State, 277 S.W.3d 34, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 232 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

211. Defendant did not comply with Tex. R. Evid. 613 and thus it was not error for the trial court to have excluded the evidence as per the rule; defendant first attempted to elicit the evidence through witnesses other than the victim before the victim even testified. Hudson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2965 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 19 2007).

212. In an indecency with a child case, a court properly restricted defendant's cross-examination of the victim's mother regarding benefits from a crime victims' compensation fund intended to show that she sought financial gain as a consequence of the incident because the proffered evidence was only marginally probative on the issue of bias or motive, and the mother was effectively impeached because she was incarcerated at the time of trial serving a sentence for forgery and had given custody of her children to a relative. Hoover v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1549 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 27 2007).

213. Where defendant complained of the trial court's exclusion of evidence that would show bais on the part of the detective in his murder case, the record showed that defendant cross-examined the detective extensively about the areas covered by the excluded testimony; defendant did not point to a bias or motive on the detective's part to lie on the stand; therefore, the excluded evidence did not limit his defense. White v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10117 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 22 2006).

214. Trial court abused its discretion in ordering discovery of a nonparty expert witness's personal financial documents, and expert reports and correspondence from other unrelated cases, without first requiring some evidence of the witness's bias; although plaintiffs argued that they showed the expert's potential for bias through his denial of any bias in favor of defendants and his deposition testimony in which he admitted deriving a significant portion of his income from medical consulting work for litigation, the appellate court concluded that, at most, the expert's deposition testimony showed that he received a significant amount of income from litigation consultation and that the suggestion that the expert had a particular bias in favor of defendants was raised by counsel's questions and argument, not by any evidence. In re Makris, 217 S.W.3d 521, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8561 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

215. Simple denial of bias cannot logically equate to evidence of bias under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b); if that were true, essentially all experts, except those who frankly concede a bias, would be subjected to discovery of their personal documents in a fishing expedition to search for evidence of bias. In re Makris, 217 S.W.3d 521, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8561 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

216. Where the defendant was charged with indecency with a child by contact and aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not violate his confrontation rights by limiting cross-examination of the child's father concerning domestic assault and a protective order; the same evidence was admitted through other witnesses; defendant had an ample opportunity to develop his defensive theory that the father was the true perpetrator. Rodriguez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6933 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 4 2006).

217. In a criminal trial for driving while intoxicated, the court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b). The issues defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hasty or jump to conclusions at the crime scene. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

218. In a criminal trial for driving while intoxicated, the court properly refused to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b). The issues defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hastily or jump to conclusions at the crime scene. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

219. Because another crime was not related to the instant crime, and because the commission of that offense had no bearing on the plea agreement reached with one person, testimony about the the other crime was not relevant to defendant's trial, and the trial court's ruling did not violate defendant's federal confrontation rights and the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it prohibited this testimony. Gongora v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2531 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 1 2006).

220. For purposes of U.S. Const. amend. VI and Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow defendant to question a witness about another charge because the testimony established that that crime was unrelated to the instant offense and the trial court's ruling did not prevent defendant from pursuing all relevant avenues of cross-examination with the witness; an unrelated offense for which there was no evidence demonstrating the witness's involvement was not relevant. Gongora v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2531 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 1 2006).

221. Even if the trial court abused its discretion when it refused to allow defendant to cross-examine a witness regarding certain statements, defendant was not harmed by this error for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2; allowing defendant to cross-examine the witness on one point would not have exposed any further motive, bias, or interest on another person's part. Gongora v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2531 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 1 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Conduct

222. At defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, he was not harmed by the trial court's exclusion of evidence of the victim's prior drug use or debt owed to his accomplice; as defendant did not explain how the victim's drug use translated into ill will, bias, or animus toward defendant, it was improper impeachment evidence. Richardson v.

State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1723, 2014 WL 645801 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 14 2014).

223. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine an accomplice on whether he committed offenses and did so as a member of a gang with defendant and the co-defendant because the accomplice was not charged with the offenses and there was no evidence presented to create a nexus between the other offenses and the accomplice's testimony. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9291 (Tex. App. Waco July 25 2013).

224. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence of the victim's mother's purported prior false accusations of sexual abuse, Tex. R. Evid. 613(b). Contrary to defendant's assertion, the proffered testimony did not show a bias against him or a motive to falsely accuse him; rather, it constituted an impermissible attack on the mother's credibility using specific instances of conduct. Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

225. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and 613, the trial court did not err in limiting defendant's cross-examination of the witness because defendant did not make a connection between defendant's pending felony case and status as a probationer that would have prompted the witness to falsely identify defendant in a photographic line-up. Oliva v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8940, 2011 WL 5428965 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2011).

226. In defendant's trial for four counts of sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by refusing to admit evidence of specific instances of conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) to show that the victim's father had also been indicted for aggravated sexual assault of a child. Defendant failed to show how the offense made more probable the existence of any motive, bias, or interest on the part of the witness for purposes of admissibility under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b); in fact, the evidence posed a risk of confusing or misleading the jury. Harris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9999 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 16 2010).

227. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's prior dismissed theft charge and his mother's involvement in obtaining that dismissal because the State did not offer the testimony as extraneous offense evidence to impeach defendant's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), but rather to show the mother's own bias in favor defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Mares v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6844, 2010 WL 3294244 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 19 2010).

228. Defendant failed to preserve for review his assertion that the trial court erred by not allowing evidence that the complainant had alleged, and testified about, virtually identical sexual abuse committed by her previous step-father, because defendant's arguments on appeal did not comport with his arguments at trial, and the alleged error did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict; defendant testified regarding his defensive theory that his disputes with the complainant's mother influenced the complainant to fabricate the allegations against him. Bullock v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8872, 2009 WL 3838861 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 18 2009).

229. IIn a murder case, a court properly allowed the State to impeach a witness with his prior inconsistent grand jury statement where he was shown a copy of his grand jury testimony and he acknowledged that he had previously testified that, during a telephone conversation, defendant told him that "they are here." The State used the brother's prior statements for the limited purpose of attacking his credibility because of his inconsistent statements, and not to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Bolton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5584 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 24 2004).

230. On a charge of unlawful possession of a firearm, the trial court properly did not allow defendant to impeach the State's witness by explaining that the witness testified to the same effect in an earlier trial arising from the same events and that the prior jury found that defendant did assault the witness. The testimony was consistent, did not show bias, and did not involve the witness's own prior crime. Macias v. State, 136 S.W.3d 702, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4193 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Inconsistent Statements

231. Trial court did not err by admitting the witness's testimony that defendant urged her to say that the victim assaulted her so that defendant could assert the affirmative defense of defense of a third person because the statements were made by defendant and offered against him. Thus, they constituted an admission of a party opponent and did not implicate the prior inconsistent statement rule. Stairhime v. State, 439 S.W.3d 499, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7905 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 22 2014).

232. There was no inconsistency between the witness's statements that she had done drugs the night of the incident and that she had not done drugs prior to trial and her alleged social media post announcing an intention to be completely sober for thirty days. Accordingly, it was not admissible as a prior inconsistent statement. Stairhime v. State, 439 S.W.3d 499, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7905 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 22 2014).

233. Defendant failed to lay the proper foundation for a prior inconsistent statement because he failed to inform the witness of the identity of the person to whom she had allegedly made the statement. Flowers v. State, 438 S.W.3d 96, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5899, 2014 WL 3953988 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 3 2014).

234. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the witness's prior inconsistent statements coupled with the limiting instruction to the jury, because the court gave the witness several opportunities to explain herself. Trevizo v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 652, 2014 WL 260591 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 22 2014).

235. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the witness's prior inconsistent statements coupled with the limiting instruction to the jury, because the court gave the witness several opportunities to explain herself. Trevizo v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 652, 2014 WL 260591 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 22 2014).

236. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding a statement the child victim made to her grandmother as not inconsistent with the victim's trial testimony because it was not unreasonable for the trial court to conclude that making a "mistake" could have meant one thing to the victim during cross-examination but meant an entirely different thing when she was speaking with her grandmother. Trevino v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9981 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 9 2013).

237. For the victim's testimony in her forensic interview to be admitted as a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), appellant had to establish that the victim's prior statements were inconsistent with her testimony at trial, but he failed to do so; appellant did not specifically identify parts of the interview testimony that was inconsistent with trial testimony, the proffer of inconsistencies in the interview was insufficient to establish that the statements on the tape were inconsistent with the trial testimony, and thus the trial court properly found that Rule 613 did not authorize admitting the videotape of the interview. Covarrubias v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1434, 2013 WL 557177 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 13 2013).

238. Trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) in not allowing the defense to impeach an assault victim's brother with police gang information cards; nothing in the cards reflected that the brother stated he was a member of a gang in 2009, or that he had been a gang member more recently than he testified at trial. Williams v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 839, 2013 WL 341900 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 30 2013).

239. Assuming without deciding that appellant preserved the issue for review, the court found his claim that a witness were not confronted with inconsistent statements to be without merit; the witness's admissions at trial concerning the prior statements were qualified and partial, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting his recorded statement. Garza v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10333 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 13 2012).

240. Assuming without deciding that appellant preserved the issue for review, the court addressed the merits of appellant's claim that a recorded statement was not admissible because the witness did not unequivocally admit to having given a prior inconsistent statement; the court found that the witness's admissions at trial concerning his prior statements were qualified and partial, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting his recorded statement. Garza v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10333 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 13 2012).

241. Court did not err when it admitted into evidence defendant's "jail book-in card" signed by defendant because the record showed that prior to the admission of the jail record into evidence, defendant was told the contents of the alleged inconsistent statement in the jail record, the person to whom it was made, and the time and place it was made. The record showed the inconsistent statement in question was being used to impeach defendant's denial that she failed to tell jail medical personnel about her seizures, and not "as primary evidence to prove guilt." Smith v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8848, 2012 WL 5238280 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 24 2012).

242. Even though the complainant's essay did have some prior consistent statements, appellant did not demonstrate that the essay was admitted for the sole purpose of bolstering the testimony of the complainant; the record supported the explanation that the essay was offered to describe how appellant became a suspect, and the trial court could have found this purpose and concluded that the essay was not offered just to enhance the credibility of the complainant, such that the decision to admit the essay was not an abuse of discretion on the trial court's part. Conteh v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8440, 2012 WL 4788386 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

243. Appellant did not say what bolstering theory was asserted at trial, and the court found the complainant's essay was not introduced as reputation evidence, such that appellant's objection did not appear to implicate Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) restrictions; the objection appeared to invoke Tex. R. Evid. 613(c), but that would not have excluded the essay either. Conteh v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8440, 2012 WL 4788386 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

244. Tex. R. Evid. 613(c) did not operate to exclude the complainant's essay, given that (1) the essay was not entirely consistent with the complainant's testimony at trial, (2) she affirmed in the essay that she had her mother's support, but at trial, she said otherwise, and (3) she disclaimed the essay statements, saying she forged new facts, and thus to the extent the essay contained any prior inconsistent statements, the bolstering objection would not apply. Conteh v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8440, 2012 WL 4788386 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

245. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of two witnesses concerning the child victim's prior sexual history because the victim's statement, when read in context, referred only to digital penetration of her vagina, and therefore neither of the witnesses' testimony would have contradicted the victim's statement about defendant's digital penetration. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8246, 2012 WL 4497999 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 28 2012).

246. In a products liability case, a witness could not be impeached under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) with an inconsistent document not prepared by him. Tidwell v. Terex Corp., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7724 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist.

Aug. 30 2012).

247. At defendant's trial for kidnapping and murder, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding a video-recorded witness statement. Because no attempt was made to introduce any inconsistent statement from the video recording, defendant failed to lay the proper predicate to admit the statement into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Gamez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6774, 2012 WL 3329200 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 15 2012).

248. Court did not need to consider a contention regarding application of "the rule" because there was one unmentioned ground that warranted the exclusion of a witness's testimony; appellant sought to impeach the victim's girlfriend's credibility with a prior inconsistent statement, but before extrinsic evidence of such was permissible, a witness had to be informed of the contents of the statement, to whom it was made and the time and place, and given the chance to deny or explain, under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), and this was not satisfied here, such that the trial court did not err in excluding the attempts to impeach in this manner. Arellano v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6885, 2012 WL 3536763 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 15 2012).

249. Although the trial court excluded the email from evidence, the error, if any, did not restrict the mother from cross-examining and impeaching the father with the inconsistent statement he made in the email, nor did the trial court prohibit the mother from offering her own testimony about the frequency of her telephone calls to the children and the limits or restrictions the father placed on those communications; the mother could not establish that the error, if any, caused the rendition of an improper judgment. In the Interest of C.B. & J., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6396, 2012 WL 3139866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 2 2012).

250. Requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) were met, given that the victim identified the statement, was allowed to read it, and she denied or did not recall parts of the statement that incriminated appellant. Lund v. State, 366 S.W.3d 848, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3406, 2012 WL 1503014 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 1 2012).

251. Trial court abused its discretion in admitting a statement for all purposes, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), but this did not equate with a harmful error finding under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), as the error had a slight effect, if any, on the jury; the testimony established the same major facts as those in the statement, and thus the error was harmless. Lund v. State, 366 S.W.3d 848, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3406, 2012 WL 1503014 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 1 2012).

252. State did not meet the predicate for admissibility as a recorded recollection because the victim did not vouch for the statement's accuracy and did not remember much of what was in the statement, plus parts were not in her handwriting, and thus a limiting instruction, advising the jury to consider the statement for testing the victim's credibility only for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), should have been granted. Lund v. State, 366 S.W.3d 848, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3406, 2012 WL 1503014 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 1 2012).

253. Witness made two prior inconsistent statements before trial, equivocated at trial to some extent and was somewhat inconsistent in her present recollection of past events went to the weight and credibility of her testimony, issues which, the appellate court may not re-evaluate. Taylor v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9943, 2011 WL 6304132 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 16 2011).

254. Defendant, as the proponent of the impeachment evidence, failed to establish any casual connection or logical relationship between the State witness's 1997 charge and his testimony at trial; the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding testimony regarding the witness's outstanding warrant. Bonner v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6862, 2011 WL 3795245 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 25 2011).

255. Complainant conceded that at the time of her statement, she was uncertain as to the authenticity of the weapon, and this was not evidence showing that the weapon was a toy gun, and even if the court considered the 911 call a prior inconsistent statement, the evidence was still insufficient to show that a deadly weapon was not used; no toy guns were ever recovered, and because the record did not show affirmative evidence that a deadly weapon was not used, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to submit a charge on robbery in this aggravated robbery case. Penaloza v. State, 349 S.W.3d 709, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6463 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 16 2011).

256. Appellate court found that it would not be outside the zone of reasonable disagreement for the trial court to resolve the Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis in favor of allowing the State to elicit the prior inconsistent statements, because the witness was one of the two alleged victims in the case, the issue of the witness's credibility was crucial to both the State and defendant, the State was surprised by the witness's unfavorable testimony, and the elicited favorable testimony, although limited, would support a finding that the State did not call the witness for the primary purpose of eliciting otherwise inadmissible evidence. Polston v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6126, 2011 WL 3435389 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 5 2011).

257. Recording of an interview with the victim appeared to have been introduced by the State in an attempt to impeach the victim's trial testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 613, but in general, if the only evidence of an essential fact was a prior inconsistent statement, the case failed for lack of proof; given the specificity of appellant's issue on appeal, the court did not address these issues under Tex. R. App. P. 47.1. Lamas v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6071, 2011 WL 3366399 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 4 2011).

258. Even assuming counsel was deficient for failing to adequately impeach, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609, 613, two witnesses, appellant did not show that counsel's alleged deficiency so compromised the proper functioning of the process. Garcia v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4663, 2011 WL 2463049 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 16 2011).

259. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault and solicitation of a minor, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit evidence of a conversation showing that the complainant had knowledge of sexual matters before these alleged events occurred because the evidence was hearsay and subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 609 and 613. Landers v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2982, 2011 WL 1496154 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 19 2011).

260. In a divorce proceeding, the trial court's finding that no informal marriage existed between the parties due to the impediment of appellee husband's prior marriage was not supported by sufficient evidence. After appellee testified that he obtained a marriage license before his prior marriage, appellant wife's counsel impeached his testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 613 by presenting excerpts from his earlier deposition in which he stated that he did not obtain a license. Nguyen v. Nguyen, 355 S.W.3d 82, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3221 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 24 2011).

261. Even assuming that defendant had preserved for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred by allowing the State to question him about testimony he gave in a prior trial, the error was was not of constitutional dimension. During the State's questioning, defendant explained to the jury that he misunderstood a question asked during his previous testimony and that he had not intended to lie under oath when he answered it; on re-direct examination, defendant again explained that he had not intended to lie under oath but that he had simply misunderstood the question; in light of the evidence explaining his prior incorrect answer, the error, if any, of allowing the State to impeach defendant's credibility had but a slight effect, and was therefore harmless. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6738, 2010 WL 3279386 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2010).

262. Stepdaughter's records from a mental health treatment facility were not prior inconsistent statements of the stepdaughter concerning prior sexual abuse by her biological father under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) because the records did not show that the records reflected statements by the stepdaughter, as both she and her mother gave information at intake, and it was unclear from the records who made the statements. Gonzalez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5663, 2010 WL 2817243 (Tex. App. Dallas July 20 2010).

263. Court could assume without deciding that defendant was correct that a videotape was not admissible as a prior consistent statement or prior inconsistent statement, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), 801(e)(1)(B), even though he failed to raise the latter objection at trial and raised the former with insufficient specificity because the videotape was still admissible (1) to rebut the suggestion that the police fed the witness his answers to their questions, and (2) to show that the witness was not parroting what the police told him; defendant did not object or seek a limiting instruction under Tex. R. Evid. 105(a), such that the jury was free to consider the tape's contents for any purposes, plus the videotape was admissible to clarify what the witness actually said, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 107. Franks v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3224, 2010 WL 1730032 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 28 2010).

264. In a case in which defendant was convicted of theft from a person, there was no merit in defendant's claim that the trial court did not require the State to follow the proper procedure in admitting his accomplice's prior inconsistent statement for impeachment purposes where the trial court did not permit the predicate requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) to be violated because extrinsic evidence of the accomplice's statement to a detective was not offered before the jury, and, furthermore, the trial court took the extra step of instructing the jury that it could only consider the prior statements for impeachment purposes. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the accomplice's version of the events was critical to defendant's prosecution, because the probative value of impeaching the accomplice's potentially untrue testimony was not substantially outweighed by the potential misuse by the jury of his previous statement to the detective, and because the trial court expressly determined that there was no evidence that the State anticipated that the accomplice's trial testimony would be inconsistent with his statements to the detective or that the State called the accomplice as a witness in bad faith. Cervantes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1149, 2010 WL 548503 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 18 2010).

265. There was no error in finding that a investigator's document was not a statement by defendant's son that could be used to impeach the son. Although Tex. R. Evid. 613 allowed impeachment with a prior inconsistent oral statement, defendant presented no evidence that his son had made one. Ward v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 590, 2010 WL 337139 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 29 2010).

266. In defendant's assault case, the court did not err by excluding the officer's report during cross-examination of the victim because the record showed that defendant failed to lay the proper predicate for impeachment with prior inconsistent statements. Weiss v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9453, 2009 WL 4757379 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 10 2009).

267. Witness testimony was properly admitted because, although the complainant finally recalled telling the witness that defendant's assault caused her pain, it was not before providing a set of evasive responses; the complainant was repeatedly given the opportunity to admit having made the prior statement but chose to provide equivocal responses instead. Babb v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9079, 2009 WL 4062299 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 25 2009).

268. Any error by the court in considering an officer's testimony concerning statements made to him by a witness was harmless because, assuming that the trial court considered the complained-of testimony for the truth of the matter asserted, there was overwhelming evidence of defendant's guilt that was properly introduced. Three eyewitnesses identified defendant as the gunman, and a vehicle matching the description of the vehicle driven by the gunman was found in close proximity of defendant's residence. In re E.S., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6690, 2009

WL 2623352 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 26 2009).

269. Although defendant argued that a written statement and grand jury testimony were admissible only under Tex. R. Evid. 613 and not under Tex. R. Evid. 803(5), the court disagreed; the witness had firsthand knowledge of the event, his statement was dated two weeks after the event, and the record supported a finding that the witness lacked a present recollection of the event at trial and his grand jury testimony was made close in time to the event, such that the trial court did not err in permitting the statement and grand jury testimony to be read into evidence under Rule 803(5), and because the statements were not offered for purposes of impeachment, the trial court did not err in failing to instruct the jury to consider the statements as such. Brown v. State, 333 S.W.3d 606, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2936 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 30 2009).

270. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's request to admit a forensic interviewer's testimony regarding her January 2005 interview with one of the victims under Tex. R. Evid. 613 because her testimony that the victim had stated that her brother had touched her inappropriately was not inconsistent with the victim's statements in October 2005 and at trial that defendant touched her sexually. Wagner v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2423 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

271. Defendant failed to show that his trial counsel was ineffective during sentencing because counsel properly withdrew an objection to the prosecutor's playing recordings of defendant's jailhouse conversations as the recordings were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), because the recordings were played after defendant denied, disputed, or equivocated about making a prior inconsistent statement. Gallegos v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2111 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 26 2009).

272. Court did not abuse its discretion by admitting an audiotape of a State's witness's conversation into evidence because, even though the prosecutor did not specifically ask the witness if she had made the contradictory statement at a certain place and time, she denied having made the statement, and she equivocated about making the prior inconsistent statement. Perez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1437, 2009 WL 1607811 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 26 2009).

273. Because defendant failed to respond to the State's relevance objection and because there was nothing in the record to show that a witness actually made any prior inconsistent statements, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(1)(A), to which Scott's hearsay exceptions under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), 803(8) would apply, the court could not say that the trial court abused its discretion by not allowing defendant to impeach the witness. Scott v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 131, 2009 WL 51035 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 8 2009).

274. Trial court was required to exclude defendant's statements to a detective unless the value of the statements as an explanation or support for the detective's expert opinion outweighed the danger that defendant's statements would be used for a purpose other than as an explanation of or support for the opinion, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 705(d); presuming that a citation to nothing more specific than "Chapter 6" was sufficient to meet the briefing requirements of Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h), the court did not agree that defendant's statements had any value to impeach the detective, and defendant admitted that the value of the statements was not as an explanation or support for the detective's opinion, but rather as substantive evidence to advance his own self-defense claim, a purpose Rule 705(d) aimed to prevent, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion by ruling defendant's hearsay statements inadmissible under Rule 705 or as impeachment evidence. Davis v. State, 268 S.W.3d 683, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6566 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

275. To the extent that defendant's proffer of testimony could have been construed as an offer of a prior inconsistent statement by the victim under Tex. R. Evid. 613, defendant did not lay the proper predicate to the admission of the testimony under Rule 613(a); by not confronting the victim first with her prior inconsistent statement, defendant did not give her an opportunity to explain the prior inconsistency and the vague and broad questions that defendant asked did not give the victim enough information to explain, deny, or admit her prior statement Poplin v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5451 (Tex. App. Dallas July 24 2008).

276. Defendant gave adequate notice of which statement was going to be used to impeach the complainant, as required by Tex. R. Evid. 613, where defense counsel described a prior inconsistent statement that the complainant had made in an application for a protective order sworn to in December of 2004, stating under oath that the complainant's child was defendant's biological child; defendant was not permitted to ask whether the complainant denied making the inconsistent statement because the trial court erroneously concluded that the question was improper impeachment on a collateral issue. Judge v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1810 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 13 2008).

277. Trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) in permitting the State to impeach a codefendant with prior inconsistent statements regarding the nature of defendant's participation in a murder where the codefendant equivocated during cross-examination about a prior statement that described defendant's role in the murder far differently from the description offered on direct examination. Rodriguez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1162 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 19 2008).

278. Inmate did not show that one witness was available to testify or that her testimony would have been favorable,and because the statement allegedly provided by this witness was not sworn or signed, it could not be said that she made the statement, but even if the court assumed the statement was so made, she did not state that she was available to testify at trial and the statement contained no information that would have established that defendant had been talking with a particular person; in any event, any such testimony would have been admissible only for purposes of impeachment if that person had testified to identifying the inmate as the perpetrator, and ineffective assistance had not been shown. Ex parte Ramirez, 280 S.W.3d 848, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1750 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

279. Because the court had no idea what a videotape recorded, the inmate failed to show that the videotape would have enabled him to impeach a witness and thus the inmate failed to show that he was prejudiced by counsel's failure to review the videotape or offer it into evidence. Ex parte Ramirez, 280 S.W.3d 848, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1750 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

280. Defendant's objection did not make reference to Tex. R. Evid. 613; the court was unable to say that the ground objection asserted on appeal was apparent from context, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 and Tex. R. Evid. 103, and thus the court overruled the issue and noted that it was uncertain that the exhibit was viewed by either counsel purely as impeachment evidence, and no mention was made of an instruction limiting its use by the jury to that purpose. Mendoza v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7679 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 24 2007).

281. In a case alleging aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, a challenge based on Tex. R. Evid. 613 was not heard on appeal because this issue was not raised before the trial court. Hernandez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6815 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 23 2007).

282. Trial court erred by admitting into evidence a letter that was written to her while she was in jail because the letter was not relevant to defendant's capital murder trial, as the letter, sent to defendant by a man, living in another state and whom she had never met, outlining his sexual desires and fantasies with defendant and other women, did not tend to make anything as to defendant, much less her sexual orientation or whether she committed sexual assault, any more or less probable; in addition, because the statement was not defendant's own statement, the trial court erred by admitting it under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Abdygapparova v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5806 (Tex. App.

San Antonio July 25 2007).

283. Assuming without deciding that the trial court erred in admitting the prior inconsistent statements of two witnesses, one of whom was defendant's sister, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613, defendant did not show harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2; whether or not one witness saw a man getting into a particular car, the State had already presented evidence that one of the accomplices had possession of that car on the day of the offense, and whether or not defendant admitted to his sister that he stole a credit card he gave her to use, the evidence showed that the card belonged to one of the victims in this aggravated robbery, and defendant gave his sister the card shortly thereafter. Kimble v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5092 (Tex. App. Dallas June 29 2007).

284. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child younger than 14 years of age, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), defendant did not show that a prior statement was inconsistent with anything the witness testified to at trial, and defendant sought to use the prior statement as a means of introducing evidence of specific instances of misconduct, including drug possession and lying, and that evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) for purposes of attacking the witness's credibility; even if error was committed, defendant suffered no harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because defendant attacked the witness's credibility through extensive cross-examination and the State did not depend on the witness or her credibility, as the case depended on the child victim's testimony. Wagner v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4480 (Tex. App. Eastland June 7 2007).

285. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a witness's statement for impeachment purposes because the testimony was equivocal and the record showed no harm. Freeman v. State, 230 S.W.3d 392, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3965 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

286. Even assuming the trial court abused its discretion by excluding the written statements of a witness that defendant apparently sought to introduce as prior inconsistent statements under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), defendant was not harmed by the error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); under Tex. R. Evid. 612, the court found that (1) the witness's testimony was crucial to the prosecution and was not cumulative, (2) defendant's own testimony directly contradicted the witness's testimony, (3) defendant was permitted to cross-examine the witness about the discrepancies between the statements and the trial testimony, and (5) defendant highlighted those discrepancies during closing argument. Mooring v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3601 (Tex. App. Waco May 9 2007).

287. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 40.001; the main purpose of the evidence was to impeach the testimony of defendant's stepdaughter's grandmother under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) and the evidence was cumulative because defendant was able to present the theory that the grandmother coached his stepdaughter to falsely accuse him of indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault, and given the jury's rejection of the significance of the impeachment evidence and the defensive theory during the trial, there was no basis for finding that a second jury would have probably reached a different result considering additional evidence with the same impeachment value. Diaz v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3425 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 3 2007).

288. Trial court did not err in excluding a witness's testimony because the witness was not the declarant; defendant failed to establish the proper predicate for impeachment and attempted to characterize the testimony as evidence of identification for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 801, but the court was not persuaded. Chapman v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3184 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 25 2007).

289. To the extent that defendant argued that a videotape was admissible to impeach the child victim's credibility, the argument was not asserted at trial and thus waived under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Shanta v. State, 2007 Tex. App.

LEXIS 2887 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 12 2007).

290. In an assault on a public servant case, after defendant blamed a correctional officer for a bump on her head, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a trooper's testimony regarding defendant's initial arrest, including a high-speed pursuit and the fact that she was placed on the ground because (1) it was contradictory to statements made by defendant; (2) it showed a bias against law enforcement officials because it illustrated a pattern of false accusations; and (3) it was prefaced with a specific limiting instruction that the evidence was being offered solely for passing upon defendant's credibility. Long v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2250 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 22 2007).

291. Appellate court overruled defendant's assertion that the district court erred in admitting evidence that he had previously hit one of the State's witnesses, because the witness's statement to the police that she ran away from the fight because defendant had already hit her once before was admitted for the purpose of impeaching the witness's trial testimony with a prior inconsistent statement. Carrillo v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1374 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 23 2007).

292. There was no reasonable probability that the jury's verdict would have been different if defense counsel had laid a proper predicate under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), and thus defendant did not meet the burden of establishing ineffective assistance of counsel. Guillory v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 649 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 31 2007).

293. In a sexual abuse case, a trial court did not err by denying defendant's bolstering objection under Tex. R. Evid. 613(c) because the testimony of a victim's friend did not amount to such since it corroborated the victim's story; moreover, the testimony was not offered as a prior consistent statement, but to show why the victim took certain actions. Luna v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 617 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 30 2007).

294. Court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel; the court assumed a strategic motive of counsel given the silent record, defendant failed to show that counsel's alleged failures to object were unreasonable and (1) it was reasonable for counsel to have found that certain evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 803(2), given that defendant's wife was extremely upset and nervous when talking to an officer about the incident, (2) counsel could have found that protective orders and testimony concerning defendant's wife's applying for the orders were not proof of extraneous offenses under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), given that they were issued in response to the same conduct that defendant was on trial for, (3) counsel could have found that defendant's wife's father's testimony opened the door to cross-examination regarding defendant's character by referencing specific examples of defendant's conduct for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 405, and (4) counsel might have believed that the wife's inconsistent statements were admissible to impeach her testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Romero v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10723 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 15 2006).

295. Trial court did not err in refusing to admit allegedly prior inconsistent statements of one of the victims; the victim's prior statements were not necessarily inconsistent, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a), with the victim's trial testimony and the victim admitted and explained that the prior statements might have omitted some details, such that the trial court did not err in excluding the testimony of the person to whom the victim first spoke. Walker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10554 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 6 2006).

296. Defendant preserved an evidentiary complaint concerning Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) with a bill of exceptions. Walker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10554 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 6 2006).

297. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, a witness's proposed testimony concerning the victim's prior allegations that she was sexually assaulted was properly excluded because defendant failed to inquire of the victim as to when she might have previously reported that she was sexually assaulted, where she made such a statement, or to whom she made such a statement. Miller v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9932 (Tex. App. Tyler Nov. 15 2006).

298. Evidence was factually sufficient to support defendant's conviction of capital murder, and although defendant claimed an accomplice lied and witness credibility was undermined when inconsistent statements were shown, it was not the court's province to substitute its assessment of witness credibility for the jury's assessment; defendant confessed to planning and participating in the underlying robbery and under the law of parties under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 7.02(b), defendant was guilty of the crime. Hatley v. State, 206 S.W.3d 710, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7573 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

299. It was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to exclude a witness statement, which defendant alleged was a prior inconsistent statement, because the witness admitted making the statement, and therefore its admission would have been improper under Tex. R. Evid. 613(a). De Los Santos v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7185 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 16 2006).

300. In an aggravated assault case, a court properly denied defendant's request to call a witness to impeach the victim with a prior inconsistent statement because he did not comply with Tex. R. Evid. 613 as he did not confront the victim with the prior inconsistent statement, nor did he summarize the contents of the prior inconsistent statements that she allegedly made. Madry v. State, 200 S.W.3d 766, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9204 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

301. Trial court's decision to allow a sheriff's office investigator to testify to statements that an assault/domestic violence victim made to her as extrinsic evidence of the victim's prior inconsistent statements was not an abuse of discretion where the victim unequivocally admitted making statements to the investigator, but when confronted with her prior statements, her answers in large part were not responsive and the trial court had to admonish her during her testimony for offering explanations rather than answers. The testimony of the investigator could have been admitted for the purpose of showing what the victim said rather than the truth of the matter stated, and defendant did not demonstrate that the testimony of the investigator was more probative than prejudicial. Sharp v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3216 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 20 2006).

302. Trial court's decision to allow a sheriff's office investigator to testify to statements that an assault/domestic violence victim made to her as extrinsic evidence of the victim's prior inconsistent statements was not an abuse of discretion where the victim unequivocally admitted making statements to the investigator, but when confronted with her prior statements, her answers in large part were not responsive. The testimony of the investigator could have been admitted for the purpose of showing what the victim said rather than the truth of the matter stated, and defendant did not demonstrate that the testimony of the investigator was more probative than prejudicial. Sharp v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3216 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 20 2006).

303. Witnesses' prior inconsistent statements were properly admitted for impeachment purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 613 because, contrary to defendant's argument, the prosecutor did not read the statements to the jury but rather questioned the witnesses about them. Blanton v. State, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2210 (Tex. Crim. App. June 30, 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : One's Own Witnesses : General Overview

304. Court did not abuse its discretion by admitting an audiotape of a State's witness's conversation into evidence because, even though the prosecutor did not specifically ask the witness if she had made the contradictory statement at a certain place and time, she denied having made the statement, and she equivocated about making the prior inconsistent statement. Perez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1437, 2009 WL 1607811 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 26 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : One's Own Witnesses : Limitations

305. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 613 and the balancing test in Tex. R. Evid. 403, the State had proper reasons to call defendant's father as a witness in a murder case and to point out that the account he gave to the police and to another witness were diametrically opposed. Westbrook v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1443, 2011 WL 686396 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 28 2011).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Rehabilitation

306. If the court construed defendant's complaint as arguing that the admission of the victim's medical records improperly bolstered her in-court testimony, the record did not indicate the State introduced the medical records for the sole purpose of enhancing the victim's credibility or the credibility of other evidence, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's bolstering objection. West v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8599 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 14 2008).

307. Defendant contended at trial that the victim voluntarily performed oral sex on him, that there was no penetration, and that the victim lied about having been assaulted; because appellant attacked the victim's credibility, the trial court did not err in determining that her prior consistent statement to a nurse was admissible, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(c), 801(e)(1)(B). West v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8599 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 14 2008).

308. Tex. R. Evid. 613(c) objection only applies to a witness's prior statement, not to in-court testimony, and a bolstering objection is appropriately made to a prior consistent statement introduced after the witness's in-court testimony; in this case, defendant complained that the victim's in-court testimony bolstered her earlier admitted hearing statements in a physical examination, but the court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the testimony. West v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8599 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 14 2008).

309. In a case involving assault against a public servant, the State did not err in recalling a deputy to the stand because defendant made no bolstering objection under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) or Tex. R. Evid. 613(c); moreover, there was no violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.02. At any rate, the deputy's testimony on recall did not duplicate that which was previously given. Reaves v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 28 2008).

310. Court did not need to decide whether certain questions were improper bolstering because even if the court assumed that the trial court erred in admitting the testimony, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the record showed significant evidence of defendant's guilt, including his signed confession, and defendant's girlfriend's testimony as to what parts of her statements were truthful did no more than reinforce her claim that those portions were true, and she was extensively cross-examined. Hobday v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 109 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 10 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : General Overview

311. Tex. R. Evid. 613 did not apply to exclude evidence of a videotaped discussion between the victim and a child abuse specialist. The evidence was admissible as a prior inconsistent statement and because it was a statement of the complaining witness herself, the predicate requirement did not apply. Willover v. State, 38 S.W.3d

672, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 8199 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2000), rev'd on other grounds by 70 S.W.3d 841, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 46 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Cross-Examination : General Overview

312. In defendant's attempted capital murder case, the court's decision to limit the cross-examination of an officer was proper because whether the officer might have invoked his Garrity rights was only a marginally relevant issue and did not necessarily indicate that he had a reason to provide false testimony. Walker v. State, 300 S.W.3d 836, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7763 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 1 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Cross-Examination : Scope

313. Because information that revealed that the bias or interest of the State's medical expert was before the jury and the excluded information would not have added significantly to the inmate's ability to impeach his credibility, the trial court's ruling did not unduly restrict the inmate's cross-examination of the State's expert. In re Smith, 422 S.W.3d 802, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 667, 2014 WL 333374 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

314. Because information that revealed that the bias or interest of the State's medical expert was before the jury and the excluded information would not have added significantly to the inmate's ability to impeach his credibility, the trial court's ruling did not unduly restrict the inmate's cross-examination of the State's expert. In re Smith, 422 S.W.3d 802, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 667, 2014 WL 333374 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

315. During defendant's trial for murder, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) in limiting defendant's cross-examination of a witness because the line of cross-examination sought by defendant did not demonstrate any bias or prejudice by the witness against defendant; the testimony elicited concerned a debt owed not to defendant, but to a co-defendant who had already pled guilty to murder. Requeno-portillo v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6898, 2011 WL 3820747 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 25 2011).

316. Where defense counsel laid the proper predicate for the use of defendant's wife's testimony to impeach a police officer's testimony regarding the description of the suspect, and the police officer did not unequivocally admit having made the prior statement, extrinsic evidence of his statement was admissible and it was error for the trial court to exclude defendant's wife's testimony on that point. Baldree v. State, 248 S.W.3d 224, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5057 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Sequestration

317. When appellant seaman tried his Jones Act and other maritime claims to a jury under 46 U.S.C.S. § 688, the key defense witness admitted on cross-examination that he had discussions about prior court testimony with defense counsel and the corporate representative; the trial judge addressed the situation to ascertain whether the letter and spirit of Tex. R. Civ. P. 267 had been adhered to. Because appellant failed to show that the witness's trial testimony differed from his deposition testimony, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the defense witness to testify notwithstanding the violation of the sequestration rule, Tex. R. Evid. 613. Gonzalez v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4777, 2010 WL 2543895 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 24 2010).

318. Even if counsel was deficient for failing to invoke Tex. R. Evid. 613, the court was unable to find that defendant was prejudice to such a degree that he was denied a fair trial; defendant failed to show that one witness's testimony coincided with the testimony of any later witnesses or that defendant was otherwise prejudiced. Agu v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1882 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 11 2008).

Family Law : Family Protection & Welfare : Cohabitants & Spouses : Abuse, Endangerment & Neglect

319. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of his wife, who recanted in her trial testimony, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in allowing the State to impeach the victim with a prior inconsistent statement about how she broke her nose six months before the charged assault; the statements were offered as prior inconsistent statements to challenge the victim's credibility, as permitted by Tex. R. Evid. 613. Davis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 352 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 18 2007).

Torts : Malpractice & Professional Liability : Healthcare Providers

320. In a health care liability action, while appellants claimed that the first physician was not qualified to render a reliable expert opinion under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351(r)(5)(C) because he served as a member of the Medical Board in the surgeon's termination request and was thus biased, any bias went to first physician's credibility under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) and did not disqualify him from rendering an expert opinion. Beaumont Spine Pain & Sports Med. Clinic, Inc. v. Swan, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 768, 2011 WL 379168 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 3 2011).

Rule 614 Excluding Witnesses

At a party's request, the court must order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear other witnesses' testimony. Or the court may do so on its own. But this rule does not authorize excluding:

(a) a party who is a natural person and, in civil cases, that person's spouse;

(b) after being designated as the party's representative by its attorney:

(1) in a civil case, an officer or employee of a party that is not a natural person; or

(2) in a criminal case, a defendant that is not a natural person;

(c) a person whose presence a party shows to be essential to presenting the party's claim or defense; or

(d) the victim in a criminal case, unless the court determines that the victim's testimony would be materially affected by hearing other testimony at the trial.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Trials : Closing Arguments : Improper Remarks

1. In a medical malpractice survivor action, defendant invoked Tex. R. Evid. 614 to keep family members out of the courtroom; during rebuttal arguments, plaintiff's counsel make an improper implication by arguing that defendant's invocation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 would keep a family member from being called to testify as a witness; however, the brief statement was harmless.

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Reversible Errors

2. Trial judge erred in refusing to exclude certain witnesses on the basis that they were court employees; however, absent a showing of harm by the mother, the judge's refusal to exclude certain witnesses was not reversible. In the Interest of H.M.S., 349 S.W.3d 250, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7321 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 7 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

3. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in allowing a doctor to testify in violation of a rule which provided for the exclusion of witnesses; the State explained that the doctor was designated as an expert witness and his presence was necessary during the testimony of the victim's mother so that he could explain why she did nothing after learning about the allegations. Robles v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13790, 2013 WL 5952141 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 7 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : Elements

4. In a trial for indecency with a child by contact, there was no error in allowing the victim's father to testify at punishment, even though he sat in the courtroom during the guilt/innocence phase of the trial, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614, because his victim-impact testimony was based on his personal observations and defendant did not claim that he was influenced by testimony from the witnesses during guilt/innocence. Tran v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1050, 2011 WL 532137 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 15 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : General Overview

5. Where the record was silent as to the reasons for counsel's actions, defendant could not show that he was denied effective assistance of counsel at the revocation hearing because his trial counsel did not request exclusion of witnesses from the proceeding by invoking Tex. R. Evid. 614. Counsel could have intentionally exposed defense witnesses to the testimony of State's witnesses to assist in the presentation of defendant's response to the State's case. Hill v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10043, 2010 WL 5140488 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 17 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

6. Because there was no evidence that counsel told defendant's parent that it was acceptable to listen to jury arguments at the guilt stage, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614, or that counsel knew that the parent had entered the courtroom, counsel was not ineffective in that regard. Casey v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7940 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 5 2007).

7. Trial counsel was not rendered ineffective by acceding to the wishes of defendant's family to remain in the courtroom and therefore withdrawing a request that witnesses be placed under a Tex. Evid. R. 614 exclusion. Wooten v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4296 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Judicial Discretion

8. Although the trial court is obligated to exclude witnesses from the courtroom during the testimony of other witnesses, the trial court's decision concerning a witness who has violated Tex. R. Evid. 614 is discretionary. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

9. If Tex. R. Evid. 614 is violated, the trial court may, taking into consideration all of the circumstances, allow the testimony of the potential witness, exclude the testimony, or hold the violator in contempt. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Opening Statements

10. Tex. R. Evid. 614 provides that at the request of a party, the trial court shall order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses; however, the rule does not apply to the exclusion of witnesses during voir dire, opening statements, or before there has been any testimony. Thus, the presence of an officer, who was also a witness in defendant's case, in the courtroom during opening statements prior to the commencement of any testimony did not violate Rule 614. Additionally, the content of the opening statements could not have influenced the officer's testimony and, thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the officer to testify. Hudson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 164 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 6 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Pretrial Publicity

11. At a pretrial hearing in a criminal prosecution for capital murder, appellant stated that he wanted to restrict the media's coverage of pretrial hearings so that witnesses who would later be placed under Tex. R. Evid. 614 would not have access to certain testimony via news reports on pretrial hearings. However, when appellant stated that he was willing to accept an alternative solution to his complaint about media reports on pretrial hearings, he waived the complaint for appellate review. Salinas v. State, 163 S.W.3d 734, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 741 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Presentation

12. Defendant's mother was properly disqualified from testifying based on her violation of the Rule because defendant told her about the events of the trial, even though she had been admonished under the Rule, and it had been explained to her that she could not discuss matters that occurred in the court proceedings with anyone. The mother's testimony was not crucial to the defense because the testimony of defendant's stepfather provided the same information to the jury. Bell v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12086, 2013 WL 5522245 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 26 2013).

13. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a bailiff who served for the jury to testify during the punishment phase of trial after Tex. R. Evid. 614 had been invoked. There was no evidence in the record that the bailiff's testimony was affected by having heard appellant's testimony. Young v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1615 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 19 2004), vacated by, opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4591 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20, 2004).

14. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing testimony from a witness who violated Tex. R. Evid. 614 if the person was not anticipated to be called as a witness; the witness lacked personal knowledge regarding the offense and had no connection to either the state's case-in-chief or the defendant's case-in-chief. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

15. Trial court did not err in allowing a witness to testify who had not been sequestered; there was no reason to believe he would be a witness at the time Tex. R. Evid. 614 was invoked. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Sequestration

16. Even assuming that defendant preserved error when the judge excused the officer from the Rule, he did not object when the State called the officer to testify. Defendant did not preserve the error for review. Wasserman v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8914 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

17. Court did not err in excluding a witness's testimony because the testimony was not crucial to the defense; the testimony showed that defendant was involved in a kidnapping and injury in some manner; even if her involvement was not until 2011 when the child was eight years old and not enrolled in school. Tanner v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8297 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2014).

18. Court erred by failing to sequester a witness because, while the State's proffered reason demonstrated the witness's potential role as an expert, it failed to demonstrate that the expert opinion necessitated her presence in the courtroom. Additionally, the witness was a fact-witness-she formed no additional expert opinions based on the child's trial testimony. Allen v. State, 436 S.W.3d 815, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6465, 2014 WL 2619438 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 13 2014).

19. Trial court's error in exempting a witness from the witness sequestration rule was harmless because the witness merely recalled the statements that the victim made during the interview, and the victim's trial testimony clearly established the elements of the offense, and was consistent, strong, and unwavering, even in the face of cross-examination. Allen v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6416, 2014 WL 2631979 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 13 2014).

20. Trial court's error in allowing the interviewer to remain in the courtroom in violation of this rule was harmless because her testimony was limited to the victim's statements during the interview and therefore the court could not say that she was influenced in her testimony by the testimony she heard. Allen v. State, 436 S.W.3d 827, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6462, 2014 WL 2619439 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 13 2014).

21. Trial court's error in allowing the interviewer to remain in the courtroom in violation of this rule was harmless because the court could not say that her testimony was influenced. Allen v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6460, 2014 WL 2632059 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 13 2014).

22. Trial court could have concluded that the brief holdover cell conversation did not influence witnesses' trial testimony, and defendant was not harmed by the violation of this section. Murray v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6201 (Tex. App. Dallas June 9 2014).

23. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in allowing a doctor to testify in violation of a rule which provided for the exclusion of witnesses; the State explained that the doctor was designated as an expert witness and his presence was necessary during the testimony of the victim's mother so that he could explain why she did nothing after learning about the allegations. Robles v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13790, 2013 WL 5952141 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 7 2013).

24. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial based on a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 because given the nature of the witnesses' testimony, concerning the records they were the custodians of, the prosecutor speaking to them in front of each other could not have influenced their testimony. Collazo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7775, 2013 WL 3279268 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 26 2013).

25. Court did not err by allowing a witness (the employer) who listened to trial testimony to testify in the State's rebuttal case because nothing in the record including the brief testimony of the employer gave any indication that the employer had any connection to the case-in-chief presented by either the State or the defense. Indeed, the scope of his relevant knowledge was limited to the substance of his testimony, and his testimony did not directly contradict that of the notary. Johnson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6268 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 21 2013).

26. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of two State witnesses because during the questioning to determine whether Tex. R. Evid. 614 had been violated the defense did not produce any evidence that the witnesses conferred about each other's testimony during a court break, nor was there any evidence that their testimony contradicted the testimony of a defense witness or that it corroborated each other's testimony. Derrick v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4843 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 17 2013).

27. Victim services coordinator should not have been permitted to testify, after she heard the testimony from other witnesses, about whether one of defendant's witnesses intended to testify. Despite the coordinator's presence in the courtroom, the State opted to question defendant about her witness's willingness to testify, and the coordinator's later testimony contradicted the testimony of both defendant and her witness. Mescher v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5706, 2012 WL 2981104 (Tex. App. Austin July 12 2012).

28. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to exclude the child sexual assault victim from the courtroom under Tex. R. Evid. 614 because defendant gave the court no basis for concluding that the testimony of the victim would be materially affected if she heard other testimony. Soria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3345, 2012 WL 1570969 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 27 2012).

29. Defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to the presence of the complainants at the punishment phase of trial did not comport with his appellate argument under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. arts. 36.06, 36.03 and Tex. R. Evid. 614, as required to preserve the issue. Reed v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1650, 2012 WL 662327 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 29 2012).

30. State contended a DVD contained essentially the same evidence about which appellant complained concerning a witness's testimony with regard to Tex. R. Evid. 614, but for purposes of this appeal, the court assumed without deciding that waiver did not occur. Townes v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1244, 2012 WL 566000 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 15 2012).

31. Witness's mother was the only one of the two sworn in who heard the instructions concerning Tex. R. Evid. 614 before the conversation, and the court found Rule 614 was violated because the witness and her mother talked to each other about the case without permission from the trial court; thus, the first prong of the harm test was met, as the parties conferred after the rule was invoked as to one of them. Townes v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1244, 2012 WL 566000 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 15 2012).

32. Under the second prong under Tex. R. Evid. 614, while the testimonies of a witness and her mother corroborated each other, their testimonies never changed from prior statements or statements made during the trial before the rule was violated; it did not appear that the short conversation that took place between the two influenced the other's testimony because the similarities existed prior to the violation, and thus the second prong was not met, and the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony because there was no evidence of harm or prejudice to appellant. Townes v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1244, 2012 WL 566000 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 15 2012).

33. Trial court's error in allowing the State's investigator to remain in the courtroom despite defendant's invocation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 did not affect defendant's substantial rights because the testimony the investigator offered after he was recalled as a witness was supported by recordings and documents. Norris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 108, 2012 WL 34453 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 4 2012).

34. Trial court did not err by disqualifying a defense witness for violating Tex. R. Evid. 614 because the record did not indicate that the defense consented to, procured, or otherwise had knowledge of the witness's presence in the courtroom, and the witness's testimony was not highly probative of the question of defendant's guilt, as the record did not indicate that his testimony was probative of whether defendant traveled to a particular city on a particular date to effectuate a drug sale or did so on other occasions. Sherber v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7648, 2011 WL 4389614 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 21 2011).

35. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial based on an alleged violation of the witness sequestration rule because the record did not establish that the rule had been violated, as the only person to claim that witnesses were violating the rule was defense counsel's assistant, who never personally identified the witnesses to the trial court, nor did he testified as to the specific subject of their discussion. Counsel never asked to question the witnesses to see if the rule had been violated. Milton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7592, 2011 WL 4361482 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 20 2011).

36. Instruction to the jury that two defense witnesses violated the witness rule in Tex. R. Evid. 614 was not fundamental error under Tex. R. Evid. 103(d) because the comment on the evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.05 only suggested that the witnesses might be untrustworthy rather than that defendant might be guilty. Powell v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2888, 2011 WL 1466876 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 15 2011).

37. In a case in which a trial court ordered the witnesses excluded from the courtroom pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 614, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing an investigator with the district attorney's office to testify where the investigator testified that although he had been in the courtroom listening to the testimony, the prosecutor had told him to leave the courtroom about the time defendant began to question the deputy medical examiner about a photograph of the investigator pointing to a spot on a tree, and where the investigator also testified that he did not hear the testimony. Moreover, no witness, other than the investigator, testified about the defect in the tree, and thus the investigator's testimony did not directly contradict or corroborate any other witness's testimony. Acevedo v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2047, 2011 WL 1044402 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 23 2011).

38. Testimony of defendant's brother about the sexual relations he had with the victim's mother did not include any sexual acts like the acts defendant performed on the victim, and the brother's testimony would not explain the victim's knowledge of those acts; thus, the trial court did not err in excluding the brother as a witness at trial because he was present in the courtroom for most of the trial, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614, and the excluded testimony was not crucial to the defense. Kalla v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1030, 2011 WL 489929 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 14 2011).

39. Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing a witness to remain in the courtroom because neither party re-called the witness during the guilt phase of the trial nor did they call him during the punishment phase. The witness did not testify as to the events and had no personal knowledge of the details of the collision; therefore, defendant failed to show that the witness's testimony contradicted the testimony of a witness from the opposing side or corroborated testimony of a witness he had conferred with or heard. Lester v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 315, 2011 WL 148118 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 13 2011).

40. Record contained no evidence that an investigator and a witness conferred about each other's testimony in any way that violated Tex. R. Evid. 614 and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.06 because the witness's testimony about a knife that defendant brought to her apartment was given before she went with the investigator to the sheriff's department so that she could attempt to locate a similar knife that could be offered as demonstrative evidence and because the witness's testimony that she located a similar knife did not corroborate any of the investigator's testimony. Andrews v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10192, 2010 WL 5541696 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 23 2010).

41. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the victim's mother to testify during the punishment phase of defendant's trial because it could have found no violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 or that any violation failed to injure defendant. Because the evidence was conflicting, it was unclear if an actual violation occurred, as an attorney testified he overhead the mother speaking with the victim about what she had testified about, but the mother denied doing so; although the mother's testimony about the family moving was the same as the victim's testimony, the attorney had testified that he heard a discussion about someone being thrown out of a house. Soto v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8709, 2010 WL 4273173 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 29 2010).

42. Trial court did not err by failing to strike or disallow certain testimony due to alleged violations of Tex. R. Evid. 614 because there was no evidence that the store owner, an investigator, and another witness actually heard the testimony of any other witnesses, and the store owner specifically stated that she did not discuss her own testimony with the witness or the investigator. Assuming that the store owner conferred with the witness and the investigator, the court concluded that neither the store owner's nor the investigator's testimony corroborated or contradicted the testimony of witnesses they actually heard. Urbina v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6728, 2010 WL 3279390 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2010).

43. Counsel was not ineffective for untimely invocation of "the Rule" because the record revealed that as an officer stepped down from the witness stand, she was asked to wait during an eighteen-minute break in the proceedings; however, there was no evidence that she and the next witness discussed either the case or the officer's testimony during the break. Molina v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6698, 2009 WL 2623364 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 26 2009).

44. Court properly disqualified a witness from testifying because the witness and defendant were aware of the witness's obligations under Tex. R. Evid. 614 as evidenced by the witness's acknowledgment of Rule 614 during her conversation with defendant; despite knowing Rule 614 precluded the witness and defendant from speaking about the trial, they discussed it anyway. Jimenez v. State, 307 S.W.3d 325, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4701 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 24 2009).

45. Trial court abused its discretion in granting defendant's motion for new trial, which alleged that she was entitled to a new trial in the interest of justice on the ground that the prosecutor had knowingly violated Tex. R. Evid. 614, known as "the Rule," because defendant failed to demonstrate that the Rule was violated or that her trial was not in accordance with the law. Although the public defender testified that, at some point during the trial of the case, she was in a work room waiting to talk to another prosecutor when the lead prosecutor in the case entered the work room and started talking to the toxicologist, a State's witness, in the presence of yet another State's witness, a nurse: (1) the record did not establish the substantive content of the conversation between the prosecutor and the toxicologist; (2) defendant had not shown that the prosecutor disclosed the name of a witness who testified about refrigeration-related issues or that she disclosed the names of any witnesses; (3) defendant failed to establish what, if anything, the nurse-witness who was present in the work room actually heard of the conversation between the prosecutor and the toxicologist; (4) it was undisputed that the nurse testified before the events in question and was not recalled to the stand, so her trial testimony could hardly have been influenced by the conversation between the prosecutor and the toxicologist, regardless of its content; and (5) the trial court's repeated explanations of the Rule expressly permitted witnesses to talk with the attorneys, and the Rule was not violated simply because the prosecutor spoke to the toxicologist. State v. Saylor, 319 S.W.3d 704, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2892 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 28 2009).

46. Trial court abused its discretion by granting defendant's motion because defendant failed to show that Rule 614 was violated or that her trial was not in accordance with the law, as neither the prosecutor nor the public defender who overheard the conversation could recall the conversation with any precision, but only that the prosecutor spoke with the toxicologist about whether defendant's blood sample could have been compromised by faulty refrigeration. The record did not establish the substantive content of the conversation, defendant did not establish that the prosecutor disclosed the name of the witness who testified about the refrigeration-related issues, and it was undisputed that the nurse testified before the events in question and was not recalled to the stand, so her trial testimony could not have been influenced by the conversation; Rule 614 was not violated simply because the prosecutor talked to the toxicologist. State v. Saylor, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2113 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 27 2009).

47. Court properly granted the State's request to sequeter a defense witness because the witness's proferred testimony was that defendant had passed out for an unknown reason while performing yard work over 18 months after the alleged offense occurred. Defendant contended that that testimony would have bolstered his claim that he suffered from a debilitating attack at the time of the alleged offense which prevented him from being aware that he was being pursued by police; even if that testimony was relevant to an issue before the jury, it was not "extraordinary" so as to be "crucial to the defense." Gomez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1700 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 5 2009).

48. Trial court did not err by permitting a witness to testify allegedly in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 because the witness's testimony did not corroborate the testimony he overheard; the witness did not testify with regard to the crime scene because he did not enter the victim's house but rather about him providing defendant a gun and his giving defendant and another man a ride to the victim's home. Mayfield v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9349 (Tex. App. Tyler Dec. 17 2008).

49. In defendant's murder case, the court's sequestration order was not violated by the presence of a State's witness during the testimony of another State's witness, a custodian of records, because the witness's testimony did not corroborate the custodian's testimony because the testimonies were unrelated; the custodian's testimony consisted of providing the admissibility foundation for the 911 call made by defendant, and the witness's testimony concerned his relationship with defendant and her plan to kill the victim. Cooper v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 19 2006).

50. Trial court properly admitted the testimony of two witnesses, the victim and his sister, who defendant claimed violated "the Rule," Tex. R. Evid. 614, where there was conflicting evidence, and what little testimony adduced at the hearing was inconsistent with the sister's. The two witnesses testified that they did not discuss the case, and the trial court evidently chose to believe them over defendant's witnesses who testified about what they thought they had overheard. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5903 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2006).

51. In a case of aggravated sexual assault of a child, because a witness who was present in the courtroom during the testimony of some of the other witnesses did not hear the testimony of two witnesses whose testimony she contradicted, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing her testimony. Hector v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3653 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 2 2006).

52. Testimony of defendant's court-appointed investigator was properly excluded after the investigator repeatedly violated the rule of sequestration of witness, Tex. R. Evid. 614, because the evidence showed that defendant or his counsel consented, procured, or otherwise had knowledge of the investigator's presence in the courtroom, and it was apparent from the record that defendant intended to call the investigator as a witness all along. Emenhiser v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2780 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 6 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6627 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 27, 2006).

53. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the proffered rebuttal testimony of defendant's father that a private conversation between the father and the victim of the charged sexual assault of a child never took place, as the victim claimed. Defendant could have reasonably expected to call his father to testify regarding some aspect of the confrontation between the victim and his family; in addition, the excluded testimony was not crucial to the defense as there were other participants in the confrontation who could have addressed the issue of whether the victim and defendant's family spoke together in private. Taylor v. State, 173 S.W.3d 851, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7440 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

54. Trial court properly granted exemption from the sequestration rule because the prosecution showed that the presence of the police officer who led the investigation of the case and assisted the prosecution in preparing the case was essential to the presentation of the State's case. Moreover, defendant failed to show harm from any error because the officer's testimony did not contradict or corroborate the testimony of the other witnesses; thus, the officer's hearing the preceding testimony did not materially affect his own testimony. Elizondo v. State, 2005 Tex.

App. LEXIS 3680 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 12 2005).

55. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing a second police officer to testify because there was no evidence of harm or prejudice from an alleged Tex. R. Evid. 614 violation. Although the officers met together with the prosecutor before the second day of trial, only portions of their testimony corroborated each other, and these portions were largely corroborated by the testimony of a defense witness. Mitchell v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3050 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 21 2005).

56. State's designating a witness as a "case agent" does not make a witness one whom the trial court may not exclude from the courtroom under Tex. R. Evid. 614; the government's designation of a "case agent" in the trial of a criminal case is permitted in federal courts by the federal counterpart of Rule 614, Fed. R. Evid. 615, but it is not permitted in the courts of the State of Texas. Neither the State nor a defendant who is a natural person may take away the court's authority to exclude one of its witnesses by simply designating the witness. Russell v. State, 155 S.W.3d 176, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 150 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

57. State's designating a witness, a police officer, as a "case agent" did not make the officer one whom the trial court may not exclude from the courtroom under Tex. R. Evid. 614; because the State did not meet its burden to show that the officer was a witness whose exclusion from the courtroom was not authorized by Rule 614, the trial court erred in permitting the officer to remain in the courtroom during the trial. However, the trial court's error did not affect defendant's substantial rights because there was no likelihood that the officer's denials that he told defendant that making a statement could help him and that he told defendant that the victim was an informant were influenced by his hearing the testimony of another officer and defendant. Russell v. State, 155 S.W.3d 176, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 150 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

58. In an assault on a public servant case, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.01(a)(1), (b)(1), no particular or extraordinary circumstances existed to warrant the defense witness's disqualification for violating the sequestration rule, Tex. R. Evid. 614; any nexus between defendant's defense that he did not know that he was running from the police or that he assaulted an officer and evidence of defendant's address at the time of the offense, which the witness would have testified to, was too tenuous for such evidence to be considered crucial. Johnson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 256 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 8 2004).

59. Although the trial court is obligated to exclude witnesses from the courtroom during the testimony of other witnesses, the trial court's decision concerning a witness who has violated Tex. R. Evid. 614 is discretionary. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

60. If Tex. R. Evid. 614 is violated, the trial court may, taking into consideration all of the circumstances, allow the testimony of the potential witness, exclude the testimony, or hold the violator in contempt. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

61. Appellate court performs a two-step analysis to ascertain whether a trial court has abused its discretion in allowing testimony by a witness who has violated Tex. R. Evid. 614; the first step of the analysis requires the trial court to determine what kind of witness was involved: a person who was not intended to be called to testify and who was not connected to the case-in-chief but who has, due to events during trial, become a necessary witness, or a person who had been sworn or listed as a witness in the case and either heard or discussed another's testimony. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

62. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing testimony from a witness who violated Tex. R. Evid. 614 if the person was not anticipated to be called as a witness; the witness lacked personal knowledge regarding the offense and had no connection to either the state's case-in-chief or the defendant's case-in-chief. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

63. Trial court did not err in allowing a witness to testify who had not been sequestered; there was no reason to believe he would be a witness at the time Tex. R. Evid. 614 was invoked. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

64. Trial court erred in determining that Tex. R. Evid. 614 did not apply to family members of the victim during defendant's murder trial; however, when these witnesses testified, there were no objections that the rule of sequestration had been violated. Hutchins v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8808 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 12 2002).

65. Party seeking an exemption under Tex R. Evid. 614 has the burden of showing that one of the enumerated sections is met; the Rule contains no express exception for investigators. Therefore, it was defendant's burden, as the party seeking exemption from the rule, to make a showing that the investigator fell under one of the express exceptions to the rule; trial counsel's argument fell under the third exception. Peters v. State, 997 S.W.2d 377, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 5950 (Tex. App. Beaumont 1999).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Victim Statements

66. In a trial for indecency with a child by contact, there was no error in allowing the victim's father to testify at punishment, even though he sat in the courtroom during the guilt/innocence phase of the trial, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614, because his victim-impact testimony was based on his personal observations and defendant did not claim that he was influenced by testimony from the witnesses during guilt/innocence. Tran v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1050, 2011 WL 532137 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 15 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Motions for New Trial

67. In a case involving the hindering of a secured creditor, appellant's motion for a new trial was sufficient to preserve an error alleging a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614, in the absence of evidence that appellant was aware of the violation of the rule at the time of the questionable testimony. However, a new trial was not appropriate because appellant's substantial rights were not affected; the witness testified during the punishment phase, and the testimony did not contradict or corroborate any other evidence. Thomison v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9789 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 29 2012).

68. Trial court abused its discretion in granting defendant's motion for new trial, which alleged that she was entitled to a new trial in the interest of justice on the ground that the prosecutor had knowingly violated Tex. R. Evid. 614, known as "the Rule," because defendant failed to demonstrate that the Rule was violated or that her trial was not in accordance with the law. Although the public defender testified that, at some point during the trial of the case, she was in a work room waiting to talk to another prosecutor when the lead prosecutor in the case entered the work room and started talking to the toxicologist, a State's witness, in the presence of yet another State's witness, a nurse: (1) the record did not establish the substantive content of the conversation between the prosecutor and the toxicologist; (2) defendant had not shown that the prosecutor disclosed the name of a witness who testified about refrigeration-related issues or that she disclosed the names of any witnesses; (3) defendant failed to establish what, if anything, the nurse-witness who was present in the work room actually heard of the conversation between the prosecutor and the toxicologist; (4) it was undisputed that the nurse testified before the events in question and was not recalled to the stand, so her trial testimony could hardly have been influenced by the conversation between the prosecutor and the toxicologist, regardless of its content; and (5) the trial court's repeated explanations of the Rule expressly permitted witnesses to talk with the attorneys, and the Rule was not violated simply because the prosecutor spoke to the toxicologist. State v. Saylor, 319 S.W.3d 704, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2892 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 28 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : General Overview

69. State's designating a witness, a police officer, as a "case agent" did not make the officer one whom the trial court may not exclude from the courtroom under Tex. R. Evid. 614; because the State did not meet its burden to show that the officer was a witness whose exclusion from the courtroom was not authorized by Rule 614, the trial court erred in permitting the officer to remain in the courtroom during the trial. However, the trial court's error did not affect defendant's substantial rights because there was no likelihood that the officer's denials that he told defendant that making a statement could help him and that he told defendant that the victim was an informant were influenced by his hearing the testimony of another officer and defendant. Russell v. State, 155 S.W.3d 176, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 150 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

70. Violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 may not be relied upon for reversal of the case unless it is shown that the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the violative testimony. Young v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1615 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 19 2004), vacated by, opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4591 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20, 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : Prosecutorial Misconduct

71. Murder defendant was not denied due process by the prosecutor's allegedly snide and unprofessional comments, including questioning a defense investigator on cross-examination about the investigator's presence in the courtroom during the testimony of other witnesses, in violation of the Tex. R. Evid. 614. Jimenez v. State, 240 S.W.3d 384, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7372 (Tex. App. Austin 2007), cert. denied, Olvera Jimenez v. Texas, 555 U.S. 892, 129 S. Ct. 213, 172 L. Ed. 2d 159, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 5766 (2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

72. Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) required a specific objection and a ruling from the trial judge to preserve error for appellate purposes; thus, by failing to object at the time the trial judge excluded all spectators from the courtroom on allegations that defendant's sister, who was not a witness and had been allowed to remain in the courtroom during the proceedings, relayed information about witness testimony to excluded witnesses outside the courtroom, defendant forfeited his right to present such a complaint on appeal. Rodriguez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2959 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 20 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

73. In a case involving the hindering of a secured creditor, appellant's motion for a new trial was sufficient to preserve an error alleging a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614, in the absence of evidence that appellant was aware of the violation of the rule at the time of the questionable testimony. However, a new trial was not appropriate because appellant's substantial rights were not affected; the witness testified during the punishment phase, and the testimony did not contradict or corroborate any other evidence. Thomison v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9789 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 29 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

74. Even assuming that defendant preserved error when the judge excused the officer from the Rule, he did not object when the State called the officer to testify. Defendant did not preserve the error for review. Wasserman v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8914 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

75. Defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to the presence of the complainants at the punishment phase of trial did not comport with his appellate argument under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. arts. 36.06, 36.03 and Tex. R. Evid. 614, as required to preserve the issue. Reed v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1650, 2012 WL 662327 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 29 2012).

76. In an assault case, defendant failed to preserve an issue relating to Tex. R. Evid. 614. Specifically, defendant did not make an objection based on Rule 614 until a witness had been dismissed, and this was untimely. Kelsey v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5741 (Tex. App. Dallas July 31 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : General Overview

77. At a pretrial hearing in a criminal prosecution for capital murder, appellant stated that he wanted to restrict the media's coverage of pretrial hearings so that witnesses who would later be placed under Tex. R. Evid. 614 would not have access to certain testimony via news reports on pretrial hearings. However, when appellant stated that he was willing to accept an alternative solution to his complaint about media reports on pretrial hearings, he waived the complaint for appellate review. Salinas v. State, 163 S.W.3d 734, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 741 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : General Overview

78. Where the court invoked Tex. R. Evid. 614 at the outset of defendant's trial for two counts of aggravated sexual assault, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it disqualified a defense witness who, when called to the stand during the punishment phase of the trial, admitted to the court that she had been present during the guilt-innocence phase. Longoria v. State, 148 S.W.3d 657, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9179 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

79. Although the complainant in a burglary case testified at the punishment phase after hearing the testimony of the two prior witnesses from the sheriff's department, those witnesses did not testify regarding any of the same facts as the complainant. Because his testimony did not corroborate that of either of the other witnesses, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the complainant's testimony during the punishment phase. Johnson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3410 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 15 2004).

80. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a bailiff who served for the jury to testify during the punishment phase of trial after Tex. R. Evid. 614 had been invoked. There was no evidence in the record that the bailiff's testimony was affected by having heard appellant's testimony. Young v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1615 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 19 2004), vacated by, opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4591 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20, 2004).

81. Violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 may not be relied upon for reversal of the case unless it is shown that the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the violative testimony. Young v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1615 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 19 2004), vacated by, opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4591 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20, 2004).

82. In an assault on a public servant case, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.01(a)(1), (b)(1), no particular or extraordinary circumstances existed to warrant the defense witness's disqualification for violating the sequestration rule, Tex. R. Evid. 614; any nexus between defendant's defense that he did not know that he was running from the police or that he assaulted an officer and evidence of defendant's address at the time of the offense, which the witness would have testified to, was too tenuous for such evidence to be considered crucial. Johnson v. State, 2004

Tex. App. LEXIS 256 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 8 2004).

83. Appellate court performs a two-step analysis to ascertain whether a trial court has abused its discretion in allowing testimony by a witness who has violated Tex. R. Evid. 614; the first step of the analysis requires the trial court to determine what kind of witness was involved: a person who was not intended to be called to testify and who was not connected to the case-in-chief but who has, due to events during trial, become a necessary witness, or a person who had been sworn or listed as a witness in the case and either heard or discussed another's testimony. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

84. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing testimony from a witness who violated Tex. R. Evid. 614 if the person was not anticipated to be called as a witness; the witness lacked personal knowledge regarding the offense and had no connection to either the state's case-in-chief or the defendant's case-in-chief. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

85. Trial court did not err in allowing a witness to testify who had not been sequestered; there was no reason to believe he would be a witness at the time Tex. R. Evid. 614 was invoked. Harris v. State, 122 S.W.3d 871, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9910 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

86. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of two State witnesses because during the questioning to determine whether Tex. R. Evid. 614 had been violated the defense did not produce any evidence that the witnesses conferred about each other's testimony during a court break, nor was there any evidence that their testimony contradicted the testimony of a defense witness or that it corroborated each other's testimony. Derrick v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4843 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 17 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Mistrial

87. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in failing to exclude a witness's testimony or grant defendant's motion for mistrial. Although the witness violated Tex. R. Evid. 614 by telling her sister about questions asked of her at trial, because the witness's sister did not testify, and because the record did not support defendant's assertion that he intended to call the sister to testify at trial, defendant was not harmed by the witness's violation of the rule. Utley v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 268, 2014 WL 97303 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 9 2014).

88. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial based on a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 because given the nature of the witnesses' testimony, concerning the records they were the custodians of, the prosecutor speaking to them in front of each other could not have influenced their testimony. Collazo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7775, 2013 WL 3279268 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 26 2013).

89. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial based on an alleged violation of the witness sequestration rule because the record did not establish that the rule had been violated, as the only person to claim that witnesses were violating the rule was defense counsel's assistant, who never personally identified the witnesses to the trial court, nor did he testified as to the specific subject of their discussion. Counsel never asked to question the witnesses to see if the rule had been violated. Milton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7592, 2011 WL 4361482 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 20 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : New Trial

90. Trial court abused its discretion by granting defendant's motion because defendant failed to show that Rule 614 was violated or that her trial was not in accordance with the law, as neither the prosecutor nor the public defender who overheard the conversation could recall the conversation with any precision, but only that the prosecutor spoke with the toxicologist about whether defendant's blood sample could have been compromised by faulty refrigeration. The record did not establish the substantive content of the conversation, defendant did not establish that the prosecutor disclosed the name of the witness who testified about the refrigeration-related issues, and it was undisputed that the nurse testified before the events in question and was not recalled to the stand, so her trial testimony could not have been influenced by the conversation; Rule 614 was not violated simply because the prosecutor talked to the toxicologist. State v. Saylor, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2113 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 27 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Witnesses

91. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to exclude the child sexual assault victim from the courtroom under Tex. R. Evid. 614 because defendant gave the court no basis for concluding that the testimony of the victim would be materially affected if she heard other testimony. Soria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3345, 2012 WL 1570969 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 27 2012).

92. Trial court did not err by disqualifying a defense witness for violating Tex. R. Evid. 614 because the record did not indicate that the defense consented to, procured, or otherwise had knowledge of the witness's presence in the courtroom, and the witness's testimony was not highly probative of the question of defendant's guilt, as the record did not indicate that his testimony was probative of whether defendant traveled to a particular city on a particular date to effectuate a drug sale or did so on other occasions. Sherber v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7648, 2011 WL 4389614 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 21 2011).

93. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the victim's mother to testify during the punishment phase of defendant's trial because it could have found no violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 or that any violation failed to injure defendant. Because the evidence was conflicting, it was unclear if an actual violation occurred, as an attorney testified he overhead the mother speaking with the victim about what she had testified about, but the mother denied doing so; although the mother's testimony about the family moving was the same as the victim's testimony, the attorney had testified that he heard a discussion about someone being thrown out of a house. Soto v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8709, 2010 WL 4273173 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 29 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

94. Trial court properly granted exemption from the sequestration rule because the prosecution showed that the presence of the police officer who led the investigation of the case and assisted the prosecution in preparing the case was essential to the presentation of the State's case. Moreover, defendant failed to show harm from any error because the officer's testimony did not contradict or corroborate the testimony of the other witnesses; thus, the officer's hearing the preceding testimony did not materially affect his own testimony. Elizondo v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3680 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 12 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

95. Trial court's error in exempting a witness from the witness sequestration rule was harmless because the witness merely recalled the statements that the victim made during the interview, and the victim's trial testimony clearly established the elements of the offense, and was consistent, strong, and unwavering, even in the face of cross-examination. Allen v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6416, 2014 WL 2631979 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 13 2014).

96. Trial court's error in allowing the interviewer to remain in the courtroom in violation of this rule was harmless because her testimony was limited to the victim's statements during the interview and therefore the court could not say that she was influenced in her testimony by the testimony she heard. Allen v. State, 436 S.W.3d 827, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6462, 2014 WL 2619439 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 13 2014).

97. Trial court's error in allowing the interviewer to remain in the courtroom in violation of this rule was harmless because the court could not say that her testimony was influenced. Allen v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6460, 2014 WL 2632059 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 13 2014).

98. Even if the court erred in allowing the witness to testify, the error, if any, did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict, because the record did not show that the witness was influenced by any testimony she may have heard from the State's other witnesses. Reed v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7131 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 12 2013).

99. Trial court's error in allowing the State's investigator to remain in the courtroom despite defendant's invocation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 did not affect defendant's substantial rights because the testimony the investigator offered after he was recalled as a witness was supported by recordings and documents. Norris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 108, 2012 WL 34453 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 4 2012).

100. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the State's investigator was allowed to remain in the courtroom during trial after the State invoked Tex. R. Evid. 614; defendant could not complain of the error on appeal, because defendant called the State's investigator as an adverse witness; defendant invited the error. Sharp v. State, 210 S.W.3d 835, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11033 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Rule Components : General Overview

101. It was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to exclude a witness's testimony who had violated Tex. R. Evid. 614 because his testimony was not crucial to the defense: (1) the witness's testimony and photographs about the mobile homes had little or no probative value as to the distance between the homes at the time of the offense because the witness was unable to testify about the appearance and location of the homes at the time of the offense, and no other witnesses offered such testimony; (2) the distance between homes had marginal evidentiary value because there was no evidence that the victim screamed or did anything else that would have alerted nearby neighbors; (3) photographs of defendant's scars and protruding stomach had little or no probative value as to his appearance at the time of the offense; and (4) the witness's testimony about an email he received from a camera manufacturer and his discussion with a retail store's employees was inadmissible hearsay to which no hearsay exception applied. Emenhiser v. State, 196 S.W.3d 915, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6627 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

102. Tex. R. Evid. 614 provides that at the request of a party, the trial court shall order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses; however, the rule does not apply to the exclusion of witnesses during voir dire, opening statements, or before there has been any testimony. Thus, the presence of an officer, who was also a witness in defendant's case, in the courtroom during opening statements prior to the commencement of any testimony did not violate Rule 614. Additionally, the content of the opening statements could not have influenced the officer's testimony and, thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the officer to testify. Hudson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 164 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 6 2005).

103. In an assault on a public servant case, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.01(a)(1), (b)(1), no particular or extraordinary circumstances existed to warrant the defense witness's disqualification for violating the sequestration rule, Tex. R. Evid. 614; any nexus between defendant's defense that he did not know that he was running from the police or that he assaulted an officer and evidence of defendant's address at the time of the offense, which the witness would have testified to, was too tenuous for such evidence to be considered crucial. Johnson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 256 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 8 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Judicial Intervention in Trials : Comments by Judges : Credibility of Witnesses

104. Instruction to the jury that two defense witnesses violated the witness rule in Tex. R. Evid. 614 was not fundamental error under Tex. R. Evid. 103(d) because the comment on the evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.05 only suggested that the witnesses might be untrustworthy rather than that defendant might be guilty. Powell v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2888, 2011 WL 1466876 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 15 2011).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Rulings on Evidence

105. Trial court properly admitted the testimony of two witnesses, the victim and his sister, who defendant claimed violated "the Rule," Tex. R. Evid. 614, where there was conflicting evidence, and what little testimony adduced at the hearing was inconsistent with the sister's. The two witnesses testified that they did not discuss the case, and the trial court evidently chose to believe them over defendant's witnesses who testified about what they thought they had overheard. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5903 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2006).

106. There was no error in allowing a witness to remain in the courtroom after the witness exclusion rule had been invoked during defendant's trial for sexual assault on a child. Hearing the alleged victim-child testify via closed-circuit television did not affect the witness's testimony. Barnes v. State, 165 S.W.3d 75, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2603 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : General Overview

107. Even if the court erred in allowing the witness to testify, the error, if any, did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict, because the record did not show that the witness was influenced by any testimony she may have heard from the State's other witnesses. Reed v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7131 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 12 2013).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Judicial Interrogation

108. Trial judge erred in refusing to exclude certain witnesses on the basis that they were court employees; however, absent a showing of harm by the mother, the judge's refusal to exclude certain witnesses was not reversible. In the Interest of H.M.S., 349 S.W.3d 250, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7321 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 7 2011).

109. Defendant's conviction for felony securities fraud was proper where the trial court did not err by exempting the State's expert witness from "the Rule," Tex. R. Evid. 614, because no fact-specific testimony was admitted. Even if the trial court had erred, any error was waived. Caron v. State, 162 S.W.3d 614, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1030 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

110. Where defendant did not object to the deputy's testimony based on Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.24, but rather his objection was that he was unduly surprised by the deputy's testimony because he was not on the witness list, and where despite defendant having invoked Tex. R. Evid. 614, the deputy had been sitting in the courtroom during trial, defendant presented nothing for review in this point of error. Young v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4591 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Presentation of Evidence

111. No certificate of appealability was warranted on petitioner death row inmate's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for not invoking Tex. R. Evid. 614 as to the murder victim's daughter being present in the courtroom, because it was not clear the daughter could have been excluded if a motion had been made, and, the state courts were not unreasonable in determining it was a reasonable strategical choice for defense counsel to forego attempting to exclude her in exchange for ensuring defendant's family could also remain, and further, it was not necessarily unreasonable to have assumed the daughter would not lose her composure, as she had attended all prior proceedings without incident. Mccarthy v. Thaler, 482 Fed. Appx. 898, 2012 U.S. App. LEXIS 14138 (5th Cir. Tex. 2012).

112. Mother could not show that trial counsel was ineffective for allowing a witness to remain in the courtroom after Tex. R. Evid. 614 had been invoked because the mother made conclusory that her attorney did not adequately review the witness's home study and there was no evidence in the record explaining counsel's reasons for allowing the witness to remain in the courtroom. The mother also failed to show that she was prejudiced, as she failed to allege how the outcome of the termination of parental rights trial would have been different if her counsel had required the witness to remain outside the courtroom during other witnesses' testimony. In re Z.D., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7161 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 25, 2008).

Evidence : Testimony : Sequestration

113. Defendant failed to show the court erred by allowing the investigator to testify at the punishment phase in violation of the rule, because the investigator was a category one witness; the investigator had no personal knowledge of the offense for which defendant was charged and his testimony was unnecessary to the State's case-in-chief. Pompa v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9079, 2014 WL 4049880 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

114. Assuming without deciding that the trial court abused its discretion in violation of the rule regarding exclusion of witnesses, defendants' substantial rights were not affected, as the jury had information concerning the photographs that were the subject of the testimony in question, and the photographs themselves were admitted into evidence, and thus the witness's testimony did not have a substantial effect on the assessment of punishment. Oliphant-Alston v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14562, 2013 WL 6198844 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 27 2013).

115. Court assumed without deciding that the two-part Webb v. State analysis applies to violations of the rule other than a witness's unauthorized presence in the courtroom during trial. Sponsler v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13812, 2013 WL 6002763 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 8 2013).

116. Witness violated the rule by speaking with another about the trial and her testimony, and as the trial court disqualified the witness based solely on the fact that the rule was violated, the court had to decide if the excluded testimony was crucial to the defense. Sponsler v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13812, 2013 WL 6002763 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 8 2013).

117. Witness's testimony was not highly probative of the question of defendant's guilt and thus the court did not find it was crucial to the defense, and the exclusion of his testimony for violating the rule was not an abuse of discretion. Sponsler v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13812, 2013 WL 6002763 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 8 2013).

118. During questioning to determine if Tex. R. Evid. 614 had been violated, the defense did not produce evidence that witnesses conferred about each other's testimony, and there was no evidence their testimony contradicted defense witnesses' testimony or that their testimony corroborated each other's, such that a violation of Rule 614 was not shown and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony. Lewis v. State, 402 S.W.3d 852, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6923 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2013).

119. Charitable organization's representative was not subject to Tex. R. Civ. P. 267(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 614 excluding her from the courtroom during the termination of parental rights trial because she was serving as the guardian ad litem and a guardian ad litem was entitled to appear at all hearings under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. §§ 107.002, 107.031(a). In the Interest of H.D.B.-M., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2057, 2013 WL 765699 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 28 2013).

120. No certificate of appealability was warranted on petitioner death row inmate's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for not invoking Tex. R. Evid. 614 as to the murder victim's daughter being present in the courtroom, because it was not clear the daughter could have been excluded if a motion had been made, and, the state courts were not unreasonable in determining it was a reasonable strategical choice for defense counsel to forego attempting to exclude her in exchange for ensuring defendant's family could also remain, and further, it was not necessarily unreasonable to have assumed the daughter would not lose her composure, as she had attended all prior proceedings without incident. Mccarthy v. Thaler, 482 Fed. Appx. 898, 2012 U.S. App. LEXIS 14138 (5th Cir. Tex. 2012).

121. State contended a DVD contained essentially the same evidence about which appellant complained concerning a witness's testimony with regard to Tex. R. Evid. 614, but for purposes of this appeal, the court assumed without deciding that waiver did not occur. Townes v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1244, 2012 WL 566000 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 15 2012).

122. Witness's mother was the only one of the two sworn in who heard the instructions concerning Tex. R. Evid. 614 before the conversation, and the court found Rule 614 was violated because the witness and her mother talked to each other about the case without permission from the trial court; thus, the first prong of the harm test was met, as the parties conferred after the rule was invoked as to one of them. Townes v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1244, 2012 WL 566000 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 15 2012).

123. Under the second prong under Tex. R. Evid. 614, while the testimonies of a witness and her mother corroborated each other, their testimonies never changed from prior statements or statements made during the trial before the rule was violated; it did not appear that the short conversation that took place between the two influenced the other's testimony because the similarities existed prior to the violation, and thus the second prong was not met, and the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony because there was no evidence of harm or prejudice to appellant. Townes v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1244, 2012 WL 566000 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 15 2012).

124. Testimony of defendant's brother about the sexual relations he had with the victim's mother did not include any sexual acts like the acts defendant performed on the victim, and the brother's testimony would not explain the victim's knowledge of those acts; thus, the trial court did not err in excluding the brother as a witness at trial because he was present in the courtroom for most of the trial, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614, and the excluded testimony was not crucial to the defense. Kalla v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1030, 2011 WL 489929 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 14 2011).

125. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by declining to excluded the victim's testimony based on the allegation that her conversation with the witness violated the rule against sequestration of witnesses, because the only issues to which both testified concerned defendant's nickname and the location of the Social Security cards that the victim took from the house where she was assaulted, and these facts did not bear upon defendant's guilt or innocence for the offenses of aggravated kidnapping and aggravated sexual assault. Ryan v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 676

(Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2011).

126. Where the record was silent as to the reasons for counsel's actions, defendant could not show that he was denied effective assistance of counsel at the revocation hearing because his trial counsel did not request exclusion of witnesses from the proceeding by invoking Tex. R. Evid. 614. Counsel could have intentionally exposed defense witnesses to the testimony of State's witnesses to assist in the presentation of defendant's response to the State's case. Hill v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10043, 2010 WL 5140488 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 17 2010).

127. Although defense counsel stated that he thought the State violated Rule 614, counsel did not obtain a ruling from the trial court, nor did counsel object to the trial court's failure to rule, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(2), and thus defendant's complaint was not properly preserved for appellate review; even if the issue had been preserved, the trial court did not err in admitting an officer's testimony because an explanation could have reasonably allowed the trial court to find that the officer did not confer with other witnesses on an issue that was relevant to defendant's guilt or innocence, and thus there was no violation of the rule. Grigsby v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7042, 2009 WL 2837641 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2009).

128. For purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), defendant's substantial rights were not affected because no violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 occurred. Grigsby v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7042, 2009 WL 2837641 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2009).

129. Defendant delayed making any claim of error regarding sequestration under Tex. R. Evid. 614 until after both sides had fully rested and closed their evidentiary cases, and this was too late to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; however, even if defendant had timely objected, there was no direct evidence to show that a witness was present in the courtroom and hearing the testimony given by other witnesses, plus the trial court's statement suggested that the trial court had not personally observed the witness in question in the audience during the testimony, and thus defendant was unable on the record to satisfy his burden under the first prong of the test. Bryant v. State, 282 S.W.3d 156, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1737 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 13 2009).

130. If the trial court concluded that a witness was in the procedural posture of a person not expected to testify, the ruling under Tex. R. Evid. 614 could be upheld on that basis as within the trial court's discretion, and if the witness had to be considered a listed or sworn witness, the court was unable to conclude that defendant's substantial rights were affected under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the witness testified regarding an air conditioner not being hooked up, but this issue was not central to the issues in defendant's capital murder trial, as the jury was instructed to find defendant guilty of such if he murdered the victim during the course of a robbery, not an arson, whether defendant committed an arson was a collateral matter, and the issue of whether defendant committed arson was not an important part of the trial. Horton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 643, 2009 WL 223104 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 30 2009).

131. Court did not err by permitting the victim to remain in the courtroom after her case-in-chief testimony and during defendant's testimony because she testified on rebuttal that she tried to push defendant out of the bed but did not kick him, and that testimony was in keeping with the victim's case-in-chief testimony and thus was not materially affected by having heard defendant testify. Scott v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9142 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 4 2008).

132. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing an investigator to testify because he had no connection with either party's case-in-chief and had no personal knowledge of the offense, and thus the court overruled defendant's claim that the trial court erred in allowing the investigator to testify as a rebuttal witness in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614; the investigator testified as a rebuttal witness only as to what transpired during a witness's meeting with prosecutors and the State was not made aware that it was going to call the investigator until after the witness's testimony claiming that he did not remember making the statement. Moffett v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6460 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 21, 2008), cert. denied, 130 S. Ct. 403, 175 L. Ed. 2d 276, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 7432 (2009).

133. Because the court determined that an investigator did not have personal knowledge of the offense, the court did not need to determine whether defendant was harmed under the second step of the analysis regarding whether the trial court erred in allowing a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614. Moffett v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6460 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 21, 2008), cert. denied, 130 S. Ct. 403, 175 L. Ed. 2d 276, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 7432 (2009).

134. In an assault case, defendant failed to preserve an issue relating to Tex. R. Evid. 614. Specifically, defendant did not make an objection based on Rule 614 until a witness had been dismissed, and this was untimely. Kelsey v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5741 (Tex. App. Dallas July 31 2008).

135. Defendant argued that a witness's violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 should not have prevented her from testifying and she should have been qualified to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, but the court overruled these points of error because the witness was not qualified to provide a professional opinion about the victim's wound and whether or not it appeared to be self-inflicted; although the witness had a degree in nursing, she had no specific training for looking at wounds or determining whether they were self-inflicted, and there was nothing establishing that the witness was qualified as an expert on self-inflicted wounds by her knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, such that it was not error for the trial court to exclude her testimony as an expert witness. Jones v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5819 (Tex. App. Austin July 30, 2008).

136. In a theft case, even though witnesses remained in the courtroom, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614, the evidence did not support a conclusion that these witnesses' presence during the presentation of other testimony resulted in an injury to defendant; two other witnesses testified about defendant leaving the store with the items, and no testimony was changed or influenced by hearing other witnesses. Hopkins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2861 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 9 2008).

137. Tex. R. Evid. 614 did not apply to the exclusion of witnesses during voir dire and before any testimony had begun; therefore, a witness's presence in the courtroom during voir dire prior to the commencement of any testimony did not violate the rule. Cockburn v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 196 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 10 2008).

138. In a dispute concerning a promissory note, the trial court properly admonished the witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 614 and Tex. R. Civ. P. 267 not to discuss the case while they were waiting to be called into the courtroom. Hayes v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8321 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 18 2007).

139. In a medical malpractice survivor action, defendant invoked Tex. R. Evid. 614 to keep family members out of the courtroom; during rebuttal arguments, plaintiff's counsel make an improper implication by arguing that defendant's invocation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 would keep a family member from being called to testify as a witness; however, the brief statement was harmless.

140. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly allowed the deceased victim's adult sister, who was a witness in the case, to remain in the courtroom because defendant did not account for the rights given to close relatives of a deceased victim under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.03. Furthermore, defendant did not demonstrate how, if at all, the witness was influenced in her testimony by the testimony she heard. Rivas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5623 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 12 2007).

141. Exclusion of testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 614 was proper because a witness was in the courtroom after the Rule was invoked, and the testimony in question was not crucial to the defense; the witness was going to testify that other people resided in a residence where a sexual assault occurred on a child, but this fact was undisputed. Delapaz v. State, 229 S.W.3d 795, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4614 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

142. Court rejected an inmate's claim in a petition for writ of habeas corpus that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to preserve testimony of a corroborating witness who was precluded from testifying after violating Tex. R. Evid. 614; the court found that (1) counsel failed to preserve the witness's testimony and thus, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103, the failure to make an offer of proof prevented the inmate from arguing on direct appeal that the trial court erred in precluding the witness from testifying, but (2) regardless of whether the failure resulted in deficient representation, the failure was not prejudicial because the trial court acted within its discretion in precluding the witness from testifying; although certain actions of the witness did not justify exclusion, the witness violated Tex. R. Evid. 614 when she spoke to the inmate on two separate occasions and the inmate necessarily had knowledge of the violations, and thus the inmate failed to prove prejudice in the ineffective assistance claim. David v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 3 2007).

143. Violations including the witness sitting in the courtroom during other testimony and asking another what happened were insufficient grounds to exclude the witness's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 614 because nothing suggested that the inmate or counsel consented, procured, or had knowledge of the violations. David v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 3 2007).

144. Because the trial court acted within its discretion in excluding a witness's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 614, the trial court could not have violated an inmate's right to call witnesses and the right to a fair trial when the trial court excluded the witness's testimony. David v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 3 2007).

145. Although the child victim went to lunch with her mother and an officer, her testimony could not have been influenced by the testimony of either of those witnesses because when the child was recalled, she again was unable to answer any questions about the circumstances of the offense; the court failed to see how the child's videotaped testimony, given two years earlier, could have been influenced by any violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 at trial. Mitchell v. State, 238 S.W.3d 405, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11090 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

146. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the State's investigator was allowed to remain in the courtroom during trial after the State invoked Tex. R. Evid. 614; defendant could not complain of the error on appeal, because defendant called the State's investigator as an adverse witness; defendant invited the error. Sharp v. State, 210 S.W.3d 835, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11033 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

147. It was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to exclude a witness's testimony who had violated Tex. R. Evid. 614 because his testimony was not crucial to the defense: (1) the witness's testimony and photographs about the mobile homes had little or no probative value as to the distance between the homes at the time of the offense because the witness was unable to testify about the appearance and location of the homes at the time of the offense, and no other witnesses offered such testimony; (2) the distance between homes had marginal evidentiary value because there was no evidence that the victim screamed or did anything else that would have alerted nearby neighbors; (3) photographs of defendant's scars and protruding stomach had little or no probative value as to his appearance at the time of the offense; and (4) the witness's testimony about an email he received from a camera manufacturer and his discussion with a retail store's employees was inadmissible hearsay to which no hearsay exception applied. Emenhiser v. State, 196 S.W.3d 915, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6627 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

148. Defendant argued that the complaining witness remained in the courtroom after testifying and, after hearing other testimony, answered the trial court's questions, but defendant admitted that the witness was never placed under the "rule," Tex. R. Evid. 614; because the trial court was never asked to exclude the witness, no error was shown pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33. Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4641 (Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2006).

149. Record failed to show, for defendant's ineffective assistance claim, that but for counsel's failure to invoke the "rule," Tex. R. Evid. 614, the outcome of the proceeding would have been different; the witness's response to the trial court's direct question was consistent with the witness's prior testimony, the record was silent as to counsel's strategy for the argument to the trial court or failure to invoke the rule, and the court refused to speculate and did not find the challenged conduct so outrageous that no competent attorney would have engaged in it. Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4641 (Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2006).

150. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial in allowing a detective to testify even though he had violated the witness sequestration rule by talking to another witness about that witness's testimony where the witnesses had not been admonished. Cortez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4265 (Tex. App. Eastland May 18 2006).

151. Trial court did not err in admitting the testimony of two key witnesses because, even if they violated the trial court's order, issued pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.06 after Tex. R. Evid. 614 had been invoked, by talking to one another, there was no evidence that defendant was harmed by the violation; there was no evidence that either witness's testimony was influenced by the other and they had very few details in common that would have raised doubts as to their truthfulness. Martinez v. State, 186 S.W.3d 59, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8678 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

152. In an aggravated assault case, Tex. R. Evid. 614 was not violated when a victim was allowed to rebut the testimony of a defense witness regarding a statement made after the incident, despite being present in the courtroom. The testimony of the victim was limited to rebuttal, the victim was required to hear the substance of the testimony before rebuttal was effective, and the testimony did not bear on defendant's guilt or innocence. Percival v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4363 (Tex. App. Tyler June 8 2005).

153. In an aggravated assault case, Tex. R. Evid. 614 was not violated when a rebuttal witness was allowed to testify about defendant's reputation for truth, veracity, and peacefulness because the witness had no connection with either party's case-in-chief; moreover, defendant failed to object to the testimony in a timely manner. Percival v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4363 (Tex. App. Tyler June 8 2005).

154. At a pretrial hearing in a criminal prosecution for capital murder, appellant stated that he wanted to restrict the media's coverage of pretrial hearings so that witnesses who would later be placed under Tex. R. Evid. 614 would not have access to certain testimony via news reports on pretrial hearings. However, when appellant stated that he was willing to accept an alternative solution to his complaint about media reports on pretrial hearings, he waived the complaint for appellate review. Salinas v. State, 163 S.W.3d 734, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 741 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

155. Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) required a specific objection and a ruling from the trial judge to preserve error for appellate purposes; thus, by failing to object at the time the trial judge excluded all spectators from the courtroom on allegations that defendant's sister, who was not a witness and had been allowed to remain in the courtroom during the proceedings, relayed information about witness testimony to excluded witnesses outside the courtroom, defendant forfeited his right to present such a complaint on appeal. Rodriguez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2959

(Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 20 2005).

156. There was no error in allowing a witness to remain in the courtroom after the witness exclusion rule had been invoked during defendant's trial for sexual assault on a child. Hearing the alleged victim-child testify via closed-circuit television did not affect the witness's testimony. Barnes v. State, 165 S.W.3d 75, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2603 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

157. State's designating a witness as a "case agent" does not make a witness one whom the trial court may not exclude from the courtroom under Tex. R. Evid. 614; the government's designation of a "case agent" in the trial of a criminal case is permitted in federal courts by the federal counterpart of Rule 614, Fed. R. Evid. 615, but it is not permitted in the courts of the State of Texas. Neither the State nor a defendant who is a natural person may take away the court's authority to exclude one of its witnesses by simply designating the witness. Russell v. State, 155 S.W.3d 176, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 150 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

158. State's designating a witness, a police officer, as a "case agent" did not make the officer one whom the trial court may not exclude from the courtroom under Tex. R. Evid. 614; because the State did not meet its burden to show that the officer was a witness whose exclusion from the courtroom was not authorized by Rule 614, the trial court erred in permitting the officer to remain in the courtroom during the trial. However, the trial court's error did not affect defendant's substantial rights because there was no likelihood that the officer's denials that he told defendant that making a statement could help him and that he told defendant that the victim was an informant were influenced by his hearing the testimony of another officer and defendant. Russell v. State, 155 S.W.3d 176, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 150 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

159. Tex. R. Evid. 614 provides that at the request of a party, the trial court shall order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses; however, the rule does not apply to the exclusion of witnesses during voir dire, opening statements, or before there has been any testimony. Thus, the presence of an officer, who was also a witness in defendant's case, in the courtroom during opening statements prior to the commencement of any testimony did not violate Rule 614. Additionally, the content of the opening statements could not have influenced the officer's testimony and, thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the officer to testify. Hudson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 164 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 6 2005).

160. Where the court invoked Tex. R. Evid. 614 at the outset of defendant's trial for two counts of aggravated sexual assault, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it disqualified a defense witness who, when called to the stand during the punishment phase of the trial, admitted to the court that she had been present during the guilt-innocence phase. Longoria v. State, 148 S.W.3d 657, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9179 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

161. Trial court did not err by abiding by Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 107.002(c)(4), (6) and allowing the guardian ad litem to be present during the course of a trial in an action to terminate a mother's parental rights. Under Tex. Gov't Code Ann. §311.026, the more specific provision of the Texas Family Code prevailed over the more general language of Tex. R. Evid. 614. In re K.C.P., 142 S.W.3d 574, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7102 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

162. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing a foster parent to testify even after she discussed her testimony with her daughter; Tex. R. Evid. 614 and Tex. R. Civ. P. 267 were not violated because it appeared that the trial court could have reasonably believed that the daughter only relayed to the foster parent the daughter's emotional response to questioning. In re C.J.B., 137 S.W.3d 814, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4365 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

163. Violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 may not be relied upon for reversal of the case unless it is shown that the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the violative testimony. Young v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1615 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 19 2004), vacated by, opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4591 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20, 2004).

164. In a case involving 13 counts of aggravated sexual assault and aggravated assault where witnesses were instructed not to discuss the case or their testimonies with others, a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 did not occur as defense counsel did not argue against the State's explanation that a witness did not hear any trial testimony when she was in the courtroom. Whisenant v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 2203 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 12 2003).

165. Where defending well-drilling businesses in a personal injury action invoked the sequestration rule under Tex. R. Evid. 614 and Tex. R. Civ. P. 267, but failed to insure that their witnesses either complied with the sequestration rule or were exempted from it, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it disqualified the expert's testimony of a witness for the businesses, despite the fact that the trial court had not given an admonishment to the witnesses placed under the rule that they were not to converse with each other or with any other person about the case other than the attorneys and that they are not to read any report of or comment upon the testimony in the case, as required by Tex. R. Civ. P. 267(d). Drilex Sys. v. Flores, 1 S.W.3d 112, 1999 Tex. LEXIS 103, 42 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1121 (Tex. 1999).

Family Law : Guardians : General Overview

166. Charitable organization's representative was not subject to Tex. R. Civ. P. 267(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 614 excluding her from the courtroom during the termination of parental rights trial because she was serving as the guardian ad litem and a guardian ad litem was entitled to appear at all hearings under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. §§ 107.002, 107.031(a). In the Interest of H.D.B.-M., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2057, 2013 WL 765699 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 28 2013).

Governments : Courts : Judges

167. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a bailiff who served for the jury to testify during the punishment phase of trial after Tex. R. Evid. 614 had been invoked. There was no evidence in the record that the bailiff's testimony was affected by having heard appellant's testimony. Young v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1615 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 19 2004), vacated by, opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4591 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20, 2004).

Legal Ethics : Client Relations : Effective Representation

168. Mother could not show that trial counsel was ineffective for allowing a witness to remain in the courtroom after Tex. R. Evid. 614 had been invoked because the mother made conclusory that her attorney did not adequately review the witness's home study and there was no evidence in the record explaining counsel's reasons for allowing the witness to remain in the courtroom. The mother also failed to show that she was prejudiced, as she failed to allege how the outcome of the termination of parental rights trial would have been different if her counsel had required the witness to remain outside the courtroom during other witnesses' testimony. In re Z.D., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7161 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 25, 2008).

Rule 615 Producing a Witness's Statement in Criminal Cases

(a) Motion to Produce.--After a witness other than the defendant testifies on direct examination, the court, on motion of a party who did not call the witness, must order an attorney for the state Page 2 or the defendant and the defendant's attorney to produce, for the examination and use of the moving party, any statement of the witness that:

(1)is in their possession;

(2)relates to the subject matter of the witness's testimony; and

(3)has not previously been produced.

(b) Producing the Entire Statement.--If the entire statement relates to the subject matter of the witness's testimony, the court must order that the statement be delivered to the moving party.

(c) Producing a Redacted Statement.--If the party who called the witness claims that the statement contains information that does not relate to the subject matter of the witness's testimony, the court must inspect the statement in camera. After excising any unrelated portions, the court must order delivery of the redacted statement to the moving party. If a party objects to an excision, the court must preserve the entire statement with the excised portion indicated, under seal, as part of the record.

(d) Recess to Examine a Statement.--If the court orders production of a witness's statement, the court, on request, must recess the proceedings to allow the moving party time to examine the statement and prepare for its use.

(e) Sanction for Failure to Produce or Deliver a Statement.--If the party who called the witness disobeys an order to produce or deliver a statement, the court must strike the witness's testimony from the record. If an attorney for the state disobeys the order, the court must declare a mistrial if justice so requires.

(f) "Statement" Defined.--As used in this rule, a witness's "statement" means:

(1)a written statement that the witness makes and signs, or otherwise adopts or approves;

(2)a substantially verbatim, contemporaneously recorded recital of the witness's oral statement that is contained in any recording or any transcription of a recording; or

(3)the witness's statement to a grand jury, however taken or recorded, or a transcription of such a statement.

COMMENT

Comment to 1998 change This is prior Texas Rule of Criminal Evidence 614.

Comment to 2015 Amendment The Michael Morton Act, codified at Texas Code of Criminal Procedure art. 39.14, affords defendants substantial pre-trial discovery, requiring the state, upon request from the defendant, to produce and permit the defendant to inspect and copy various items, including witness statements. In many instances, therefore, art. 39.14 eliminates the need, after the witness testifies on direct examination, for a defendant to request, and the court to order, production of a witness's statement.

But art. 39.14 does not entirely eliminate the need for in-trial discovery of witness statements. Art. 39.14 does not extend equivalent discovery rights to the prosecution, and so prosecutors will still need to use Rule 615 to obtain witness statements of defense witnesses. Moreover, some defendants may fail to exercise their discovery rights under art. 39.14 and so may wish to obtain a witness statement under Rule 615. In addition, the Michael Morton Act applies only to the prosecution of offenses committed after December 31, 2013. Defendants on trial for offenses committed before then have no right to pre-trial discovery of the witness statements of prosecution witnesses.

Consequently, Rule 615(a) has been amended to account for the changed pre-trial discovery regime introduced by the Michael Morton Act. If a party's adversary has already produced a witness's statement - whether through formal discovery under art. 39.14 or through more informal means - Rule 615(a) no longer gives a party the right to obtain, after the witness testifies on direct examination, a court order for production of the witness's statement. But if a party's adversary has not already produced a witness's statement, the party may still use Rule 615(a) to request and obtain a court order requiring production of the witness's statement after the witness finishes testifying on direct examination.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : General Overview

1. Trial court did not err by refusing to strike the testimony of two witnesses and grant a mistrial on the ground that the State failed to produce the witnesses' written statements after their direct examinations as required by Tex. R.

Evid. 615 because the evidence showed that at the time of trial the statements were not in the State's possession. Dancer v. State, 253 S.W.3d 368, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2406 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

2. As to certain witness testimony, the trial court noted that the State tendered more discovery material before trial than was required or requested, and pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 615, the State was not required to provide defendant with the witness's statement until after her testimony on direct. Freeman v. State, 230 S.W.3d 392, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3965 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

3. In a murder trial, defendant was not prejudiced by the State's untimely disclosure of the statement of a cellmate who claimed that defendant confessed to the murders. Because the cellmate's statement was material to a matter involved in the action, it was producible after the witness testified. Mendez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11216 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 16 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 553, 163 L. Ed. 2d 467, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 7926, 74 U.S.L.W. 3273 (U.S. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Government : Witness Statements

4. As the recording of a 911 call was not in the State's possession and the prosecutor stated that attempts to find the recording were not successful, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 615, the trial court did not err in denying appellant's mistrial motion. Smartt v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6834 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 5 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Tests

5. Defendant contended that he received ineffective assistance at trial because his trial counsel failed to file a motion for production of a victim's written statement to police; however, the record showed that defendant went to the police station after the robbery and spoke with a detective, but there was no evidence that he provided a written statement, and the record was silent as to why trial counsel did not request any written statements. Therefore, defendant failed to rebut the presumption that this decision was reasonable. Tucker v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8670 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 13 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : General Overview

6. Trial court was not required to disclose a prosecutor's notes relating to interviews with appellant's husband under Tex. R. Evid. 615 because the notes were not signed, adopted, or approved by the husband. Wilkerson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4252, 2012 WL 1940650 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 30 2012).

7. In a murder case, the State did not have the duty to provide a statement made by a witness to an employer because the State did not have the statement in question in its possession. Jones v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4136 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 26 2005).

8. In a murder case, an appellate court was unable to review whether or not a trial court erred by failing to order the production of a statement given to police by several witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 615(f)(1) because the report was not provided in the appellate record; the court was unable to determine if the report contained "statements" under the definition in Rule 615. Jones v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4136 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 26 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Presentation

9. In a murder trial, defendant was not prejudiced by the State's untimely disclosure of the statement of a cellmate who claimed that defendant confessed to the murders. Because the cellmate's statement was material to a matter involved in the action, it was producible after the witness testified. Mendez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11216 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 16 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 553, 163 L. Ed. 2d 467, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 7926, 74 U.S.L.W. 3273 (U.S. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Briefs

10. Given the uncertain state of the record, appellant, who was making an evidentiary challenge to the punishment phase of his capital murder trial, failed to support his claim that the trial court erred when it ordered the defense to turn over its investigator's notes to the prosecution, first because appellant did not make appropriate citations to the record in support of his argument if, indeed, the notes were in the record, Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h); otherwise, he procedurally defaulted error; in any event, the trial court's action might have been proper under Tex. R. Evid. 615, but the appellate court could not know whether the notes contained matters outside the scope of Tex. R. Evid. 615 without having the notes available to review; the absence of the notes also impeded the appellate court's ability to conduct an accurate harm analysis. Roberts v. State, 220 S.W.3d 521, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 429 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

11. Given the uncertain state of the record, appellant, who was making an evidentiary challenge to the punishment phase of his capital murder trial, failed to support his claim that the trial court erred when it ordered the defense to turn over its investigator's notes to the prosecution, first because appellant did not make appropriate citations to the record in support of his argument if, indeed, the notes were in the record, Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h); otherwise, he procedurally defaulted error; in any event, the trial court's action might have been proper under Tex. R. State, 220 S.W.3d 521, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 429 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

12. Time allotted for a self-representing defendant to review witness statements was not an abuse of discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 615; the trial judge gave defendant time to review the documents and defendant then cross-examined witnesses. Grant v. State, 255 S.W.3d 642, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8444 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

13. As the recording of a 911 call was not in the State's possession and the prosecutor stated that attempts to find the recording were not successful, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 615, the trial court did not err in denying appellant's mistrial motion. Smartt v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6834 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 5 2013).

14. Trial court was not required to disclose a prosecutor's notes relating to interviews with appellant's husband under Tex. R. Evid. 615 because the notes were not signed, adopted, or approved by the husband. Wilkerson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4252, 2012 WL 1940650 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 30 2012).

15. In a murder case, the State did not have the duty to provide a statement made by a witness to an employer because the State did not have the statement in question in its possession. Jones v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4136 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 26 2005).

16. In a murder case, an appellate court was unable to review whether or not a trial court erred by failing to order the production of a statement given to police by several witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 615(f)(1) because the report was not provided in the appellate record; the court was unable to determine if the report contained "statements" under the definition in Rule 615. Jones v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4136 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 26 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Contradiction

17. During a criminal trial, defendant requested that the State produce the witness's written statement prior to cross-examining the witness; the trial court denied defendant's request because the witness testified that he did not use the statement to refresh his memory in accordance with Tex. R. Evid. 612; however, the statement should have been made available to defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 615 for impeachment purposes. Patterson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 943 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 7 2008).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Inconsistent Statements

18. Key distinction between Tex. R. Evid. 612 and Tex. R. Evid. 615 is that Tex. R. Evid. 612 requires the production of any writing used to refresh a witness's memory, while Tex. R. Evid. 615 requires only the production of "statements" as defined in Rule 615, and a writing used to refresh a witness's memory may not meet the definition of statement contained in Rule 615, yet Tex. R. Evid. 612 still requires the writing to be produced because of the witness's use of it; similarly, a witness may not use a statement to refresh his or her memory before testifying, however, Tex. R. Evid. 615 still requires that the statement be produced, and accordingly, although the general purpose for both rules is to provide material which may be used to impeach a witness, the rules are applicable to different types of materials. Arrellano v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8653, 2012 WL 4903044 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 17 2012).

19. Defendant contended that he received ineffective assistance at trial because his trial counsel failed to file a motion for production of a victim's written statement to police; however, the record showed that defendant went to the police station after the robbery and spoke with a detective, but there was no evidence that he provided a written statement, and the record was silent as to why trial counsel did not request any written statements. Therefore, defendant failed to rebut the presumption that this decision was reasonable. Tucker v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8670 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 13 2008).

Rule 701 Opinion Testimony by Lay Witnesses

If a witness is not testifying as an expert, testimony in the form of an opinion is limited to one that is:

(a) rationally based on the witness's perception; and

(b) helpful to clearly understanding the witness's testimony or to determining a fact in issue.

1. Lay testimony from skilled witnesses with personal knowledge was sufficient under Tex. R. Evid. 701 to prove causation under Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. § 17.50(a)(2) in a construction defect case involving water damage and mold because these were not matters beyond the common understanding of laypersons. Horak v. Newman, 2009 Tex. 2. Statements in a proof of loss form relating to the date of hail damage were competent summary judgment evidence because they constituted admissions under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2). Even if the statements in the proof of loss form were not binding or conclusive, they were considered prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein; moreover, expert testimony was not required on the issue of whether hail occurred on a certain date and caused property damage. 5. Employer failed to preserve his claims of error for appeal regarding the trial court's admission of the employee's opinion testimony in the employee's age discrimination action because the employer failed to make a timely, specific objection at trial to the employee's testimony on the ground that it was speculation; even if the employer had raised a timely and proper objection, Tex. R. Evid. 701 provided that the opinion of a lay witness was admissible if based on his perceptions, and the comment in issue was rationally based on the employee's perception. Quality Dialysis, Inc. v. Adams, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4921 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 8 2006).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Harmless Error Rule

6. Even though the trial court erred by admitting the testimony of a trooper concerning the causation of the accident, as his testimony contained opinions and he did not qualify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the error was harmless because his conclusion that the bus driver was not at fault was cumulative of other evidence. The driver's other expert witness provided testimony consistent with the trooper's conclusions, testified in much greater detail, length, and depth than the trooper, and explained the methods he used and the calculations he made. Lopez-juarez v. Kelly, 348 S.W.3d 10, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6446 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Manufacture : General Overview

7. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 701 to an officer's opinion that people discovered inside a methamphetamine lab were generally involved in the manufacture of methamphetamine; the opinion was helpful to the jury in determining whether defendant was merely present or was a criminally responsible party. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

8. In a trial for manufacture of methamphetamine, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to an officer's testimony in connection with photographs showing defendant's burned and soiled hands; the officer's experience gave him the capability to testify that manufacturing methamphetamine often caused blisters and discoloration on the manufacturers' hands; it was not necessary to qualify the officer under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and, because the testimony was based on personal observations and was helpful to the jury, it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

9. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 701 to an officer's conclusion, based on odors emanating from a building, that methamphetamine was being produced; contrary to defendant's argument, the fact that a rational person could have reached that opinion did not make the opinion unhelpful to the jury. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Intent to Distribute : Elements

10. Narcotics detective was qualified to testify that defendant possessed the cocaine with intent to distribute because he had been a narcotics officer for almost eight years, worked undercover with confidential informants, had purchased narcotics many times, had attended a 40-hour class, annual continuing education, drug recognition schools, drug testing classes, drug buying classes and a few classes on courtroom testimony; the detective described cocaine, its packaging, amounts and prices, and described the cocaine found in the case and testified that a person in possession of a 100 grams of cocaine would be in possession with intent to distribute. Brooks v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6973 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 8 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Simple Possession : Elements

11. Testimony of two officers that a State exhibit was marijuana and was not cush (a then-legal synthetic substance) was properly offered as lay opinion because the testimony did not require significant expertise to interpret and was based on their perceptions. In re Z.R., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11097, 2013 WL 4680241 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 29 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : General Overview

12. In defendant's aggravated assault case, a court properly allowed a store manager to testify that he did not believe the collision was an accident where the manager saw how upset defendant became after being told he would have to pay to replace the tire, he witnessed the heated exchange between defendant and the other drivers, he knew that defendant quickly returned to the store even after being told his tire would not be ready until the next day, and heard no braking as defendant's truck came into the store at a high rate of speed. The opinion that the collision was not an accident was rationally based on those experiences. to be an expert on such matters. Chatham v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8327 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 16 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Custodial Interference

13. In an interference with child custody case, although a court erred by overruling defendant's objection to an officer's testimony regarding her guilt or innocence, the error was harmless because the evidence against defendant established that she violated the child custody modification order; defendant's own testimony established that her taking possession of the child on October 24 was contrary to the terms of the modification order. Lovell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6062 (Tex. App. Tyler July 12 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Kidnapping : General Overview

14. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 701, a police officer's testimony that a 14-year old girl did not fit the profile of a prostitute was admissible in an inmate's trial on charges of kidnapping where (1) the officer had extensive experience in the child exploitation unit; and (2) the inmate's attorney made an issue of whether the girl was a prostitute, thereby entitling the state to ask the officer's opinion on the issue, in light of his training, experience, and knowledge of the girl. Jordan v. Dretke, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31950 (N.D. Tex. May 22 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Robbery : Armed Robbery : General Overview

15. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court properly allowed an officer to testify about whether a rock or similar object was capable of causing serious bodily injury or death because, although the officer did not have any personal knowledge of the specific object that was used in the commission of the crime, he testified that he had been a police officer for approximately five-and-a-half years, and the officer saw the victim's wounds before they were treated. In re B. P. S., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6028 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 6 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Robbery : Armed Robbery : Elements

16. In an aggravated robbery case, where the victim testified that as a marine veteran, he had extensive experience with weapons and that defendant's pistol looked like a 9 millimeter, because defendant did not object to the testimony as impermissible expert testimony, he failed to preserve this issue for appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; furthermore, under Tex. R. Evid. 701, the victim was properly allowed to testify regarding defendant's gun. Pintor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9607 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 7 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Stalking : General Overview

17. In defendant's retaliation case, court erred by admitting an officer's testimony that he had no doubt that a threat was made to a witness by defendant because the officer stated a legal conclusion from the facts and thus expressed impermissible opinions on a mixed question of fact and law. Martin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7142 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 11 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : General Overview

18. In a murder trial, the testimony of a forensic anthropologist regarding the science of toolmark analysis was reliable, within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 705(c) and relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401; the expert opined that toolmarks on bone fragments found in defendant's yard were consistent with being made by either a hunting knife or a saw, that the bone fragments had characteristics consistent with being human, and that they showed no signs of healing, indicating that the cuts occurred at or near the time of death. Shepherd v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 133, 2011 WL 166893 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 11 2011).

19. In a trial for a "shaken-baby" murder, any error arising from the admission of an investigator's opinion on guilt was harmless. Although defendant objected to the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 during the prosecution's re-direct, the same question and answer had come in without objection during the defense's prior cross-examination. San Martin Adriano v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7140 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2005).

20. In a murder case, court did not err in allowing the investigating homicide officer to give his direct opinion that the State's two witnesses were telling the truth where defendant's trial counsel posed questions asking the officer if he thought the witnesses were credible witnesses based on their criminal contacts and asked if the officer thought that one was a credible witness because of her lies in her statement, counsel opened the door to the State's questions that directly commented on whether the officer believed the witnesses were truthful and credible witnesses. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7777 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 26 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Capital Murder : General Overview

21. In defendant's capital murder case, a court did not err by permitting a witness to speculate that defendant's accomplice could not have taken the money from the cash register where the witness based his testimony on his observations. He could see where both robbers were located in relationship to the complainant and the cash drawer, and based on those observations, the witness drew an inference that only defendant was in a position to reach the cash drawer and take the money. Webber v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 15 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Fleeing & Eluding : Elements

22. In a trial for evading arrest, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to an officer's opinion that defendant intended to flee. The reviewing court noted that opinion testimony regarding the mental state of an accused was not inadmissible per se, that rulings on the admissibility of lay opinion testimony were within the discretion of the trial court under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 704, and that counsel may have made a strategic decision not to object. Britt v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3148 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 26 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Money Laundering : General Overview

23. Police testimony was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and was not expert testimony because the officer testified about reasons for suspecting defendant and for arresting defendant on a charge of money laundering. Barrios v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9054 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 16 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Burglary & Criminal Trespass : Burglary : Elements

24. Burglary conviction was supported by lay testimony from officers that muddy footprints led from the victim's home to the apartment where defendant was discovered. The lay testimony was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Price v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4234, 2011 WL 2175196 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 2 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Destruction of Property : Elements

25. Where defendant used a car jack to strike the hood of the complainant's SUV, Tex. R. Evid. 701 permitted the arresting officer to testify that $1500 was the estimated cost of repairing the damage based on his years of experience with criminal mischief cases. Barnes v. State, 248 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4261 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Child Pornography : Elements

26. Officer was properly permitted to testify regarding the age of female subjects in printed images. The State did not offer the officer as an expert, and it appeared from the record that he was offering a lay opinion. Whiddon v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2074 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 27 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Indecent Exposure : Elements

27. In a trial for indecency with a child by exposure, defendant failed to preserve any error in allowing a witness to testify that she thought defendant was trying to arouse himself because an objection below to speculation did not comport with the argument on appeal under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Joseph v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9, 2011 WL 9802 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 4 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : General Overview

28. In a trial for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to an officer's testimony that he believed defendant was in possession of the missing vehicle, in part because that evidence might have been admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 704. Seat v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4322, 2011 WL 2306249 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 8 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : General Overview

29. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, walk-and-turn and one-leg tests were properly admitted, despite testimony that they were improperly performed. Testimony by the arresting officer concerning both tests was lay witness testimony governed by Tex. R. Evid 701 rather than Tex. R. Evid 702. Plouff v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 18 2005), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 192 S.W.3d 213, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

30. In a driving while impaired case, evidence of an officer's observations in a one-leg stand field sobriety test was governed by Tex. R. Evid. 701 as opinion testimony, but evidence concerning the guidelines and certification of the test were based on Tex. R. Evid. 702; further, a trial court's error in admitting the Rule 702 evidence was harmless because the officer admitted that there was a failure to follow the applicable guidelines. McRae v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5933 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 1 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 152 S.W.3d 739, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10805 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

31. In a prosecution for DWI, the arresting officer was properly allowed to testify that, in his opinion, defendant was intoxicated based on defendant's inability to perform the walk and turn test and the one leg stand test. A lay witness may give an opinion as to whether another person is intoxicated, and although a police officer may have specialized training, that does not preclude the officer from providing such lay opinion testimony. Oropeza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 24 2004).

32. Lay witness may give an opinion as to whether another person is intoxicated. Oropeza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 24 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence

33. Sufficient evidence demonstrated that defendant was intoxicated because an officer observed his erratic driving and pulled him over; initially, defendant refused to stop and then tried to flee; and defendant was agitated, had bloodshot eyes, and had a strong odor of alcohol on his breath; the reviewing court noted that even if the deputy was not qualified to testify as an expert, his statements were admissible as lay witness testimony. Jaritas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6864 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 3 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence

34. In a driving while intoxicated case, police officer testimony pertaining to the administration of the one-leg-stand and walk-and-turn tests was properly admitted as lay testimony because the officer did not use words that gave the testimony an aura of scientific validity that would subject it to the Kelly requirements; instead, the testimony consisted of the officer demonstrating the test for jurors and relaying an assessment of defendant's mental faculties and physical coordination. Gutierrez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7087, 2014 WL 2993787 (Tex. App. El Paso June 30 2014).

35. During defendant's trial for driving while intoxicated (DWI) in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, the testimony of an officer with the police department's DWI enforcement unit might have been improper under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 702 because, by repeatedly testifying that the walk-and-turn and one-leg stand sobriety tests provided "validated" or "scientifically validated" clues of impairment, the officer gave those tests an imprimatur of scientific accuracy that they had not been shown to possess and that, in any event, he was not shown qualified to confer. However, reversible error was not presented because the issue was not preserved for appeal, and because defendant's substantial rights were not affected, as there was substantial evidence of defendant's intoxication, including his admission that he had consumed four shots of tequila and the testimony of four witnesses describing his reckless driving, odor of alcoholic beverage, bloodshot eyes, slurred speech, and lack of balance. McIntosh v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 849 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 4 2010).

36. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, an officer was properly allowed to testify as to the administration of a one-leg stand test because the evidence related to nonscientific evidence and was admissible as lay opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701; the testimony was not subject to the criteria of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence

37. In a driving while intoxicated case, the court did not err by allowing the officer to testify that defendant failed the field sobriety tests because the officer's use of the word "failed" did not give his testimony an "aura of scientific reliability" or cloak it with unearned credibility; the majority of the officer's testimony consisted of a straightforward narrative of each field sobriety test, followed by a particular description of how defendant performed each test. The officer's observations were based on common knowledge and observations and did not, under the circumstances convert his lay witness testimony into expert testimony. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2051, 2009 WL 765490 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 25 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : Elements

38. Even if an officer was qualified as an expert in field sobriety testing, such expertise did not prevent him from testifying to his own "lay" observations of defendant's demeanor. Mccormick v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2654, 2014 WL 1022450 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 6 2014).

39. In a driving while intoxicated trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 602, in admitting lay opinion testimony concerning whether anyone else could have exited a burning vehicle, other than defendant. Taking into account that the witnesses were the only people present for the accident, other than the defendant, their rationally based perceptions put them in the best position to judge how likely the presence or non-presence of a second occupant would be. O'donoghue v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 15 2010).

40. In a driving while intoxicated case under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, the evidence was sufficient to sustain the conviction because the State proved that defendant was intoxicated through the lay opinion of a police officer, defendant's refusal to take a blood test, the results of a horizontal gaze nystagmus, and the fact that defendant did not have a brain injury or drug impairment issue; moreover, the presence of visual distractions was only relevant to tests given at night; defendant's test was given during daylight hours. Maldonado v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2910 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 23 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Arrests : Warrantless Arrest

41. Motion to suppress was properly denied under U.S. Const. amend. IV and the Texas Constitution because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that defendant voluntarily consented to a search of his person and the officer was legally authorized to make a warrantless arrest for defendant's illegal possession of marijuana under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.121 that occurred within the officer's presence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 1401. The officer was entitled to give testimony as a lay person under Tex. R. Evid. 701 as to his recognition that the substance was marijuana. Gossett v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5823, 2009 WL 4251169 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 30 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Search & Seizure : Warrantless Searches : Investigative Stops

42. In a driving while intoxicated case under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, the evidence was sufficient to sustain the conviction because the State proved that defendant was intoxicated through the lay opinion of a police officer, defendant's refusal to take a blood test, the results of a horizontal gaze nystagmus, and the fact that defendant did not have a brain injury or drug impairment issue; moreover, the presence of visual distractions was only relevant to tests given at night; defendant's test was given during daylight hours. Maldonado v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2910 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 23 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Interrogation : General Overview

43. Trial court did not err by admitting testimony from a detective that defendant showed signs of a guilty conscience during a police interrogation because, taking into account that the detective was asked what defendant's "blacking" or "blanking" comment meant to him as an investigator, and not what defendant was thinking when she said that she had "blanked" or "blacked" out, the detective's disputed testimony was not a speculative opinion, but it went instead to his rationally based perception of the interrogation, which provided a clearer understanding of the facts in issue. Brown v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 882, 2011 WL 382634 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 8 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : Expert Testimony : General Overview

44. In a possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver case, as the substance of an officer's testimony related to opinions, beliefs, or inferences drawn from his own experiences and observation, and as the testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701, the State was not required to disclose the officer as an expert under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 39.14(b); as such, the trial court did not err by admitting the officer's testimony that had not been disclosed in response to a discovery request. Cortez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4998 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 8 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Sentencing

45. Defendant's counsel was not ineffective during the punishment phase of defendant's aggravated assault trial for failing to object to a county case worker supervisor's opinion about defendant's character where the case worker's testimony was in compliance with Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) and Tex. R. Evid. 602 because it was rationally based on her perception and was helpful to a determination of a fact in issue-defendant's punishment. Ramirez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 368, 2009 WL 1567340 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 22 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

46. Defendant failed to show that his counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the victim's testimony that he thought defendant shoved him so he could not get his cell phone out of his pocket and that he though defendant would cut him with his pocket knife because the victim could testify about his opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and counsel may have believed that the victim's opinion would have been helpful to the determination of whether the victim felt threatened by defendant's actions. Barnett v. State, 344 S.W.3d 6, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4456 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 14 2011).

47. In a trial for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to an officer's testimony that he believed defendant was in possession of the missing vehicle, in part because that evidence might have been admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 704. Seat v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4322, 2011 WL 2306249 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 8 2011).

48. Although defendant argued that his counsel permitted a witness to testify as to his guilt without objection, given the fact that one such objection was overruled by the trial court, counsel could have chosen not to emphasize the matter further to the jury by additional objections, and, accordingly, it could not be said that the trial court abused its discretion in finding that defendant failed to prove by credible evidence that counsel's performance was deficient.

Moreover, the witness was a fact witness, and defendant did not argue that the testimony was not based on the perception of the witness and/or was not helpful to an understanding of a fact in issue. Ex Parte Eggert, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 858, 2010 WL 396321 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 4 2010).

49. Even though testimony concerning a child's truthfulness was not admissible in a sexual assault case either through lay or expert testimony, no ineffectiveness of counsel was shown based on a failure to object because there was only one witness from whom the State elicited an opinion about the child's truthfulness, and the State did not emphasize the testimony in its closing statement. Defendant did not show that, but for such omission, there was a reasonable probability that the result of the trial would have been different. Arcement v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1096, 2009 WL 383398 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 18 2009).

50. In a cocaine possession case, defendant's failure to object to an officer's testimony that drug dealers often carried many small bills waived the issue under Tex. R. App. P. 33, and counsel was not ineffective for failing to challenge the testimony as Tex. R. Evid. 702 expert testimony because it was admissible as Tex. R. Evid. 701 opinion testimony. Hayes v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 747 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 1 2008).

51. In a sexual assault case, defendant was unable to show that he received ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to object to the testimony of a social worker as unqualified expert testimony; the social worker could have testified about giving a victim information about a sexual assault examination as either a lay or expert witness. Benjamin v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2007).

52. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 701 to an officer's opinion that people discovered inside a methamphetamine lab were generally involved in the manufacture of methamphetamine; the opinion was helpful to the jury in determining whether defendant was merely present or was a criminally responsible party. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

53. In a trial for manufacture of methamphetamine, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to an officer's testimony in connection with photographs showing defendant's burned and soiled hands; the officer's experience gave him the capability to testify that manufacturing methamphetamine often caused blisters and discoloration on the manufacturers' hands; it was not necessary to qualify the officer under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and, because the testimony was based on personal observations and was helpful to the jury, it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

54. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 701 to an officer's conclusion, based on odors emanating from a building, that methamphetamine was being produced; contrary to defendant's argument, the fact that a rational person could have reached that opinion did not make the opinion unhelpful to the jury. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

55. Counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object, under Tex. R. Evid. 701, to opinion testimony regarding an officer's statement relating to whether he believed that defendant was telling to the truth; an objection to the testimony would properly have been overruled, given the context in which it was offered. Adelaja v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10379 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 5 2006).

56. Court rejected defendant's contention that his trial counsel fell below an objective standard of reasonable competence for failing to object to an officer's testimony that he did not believe defendant's version of events; under Tex. R. Evid. 704, a lay witness could offer an opinion on an ultimate issue. Adelaja v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4596 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 25 2006).

57. In a criminal trial for murder and aggravated assault, defense counsel were not deficient in failing to object to lay opinion testimony. The testimony that defendant intentionally ran over the victims with his truck was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the lay witness's opinion was rationally based on his own perception and was helpful in the determination of a fact in issue. Ex parte White, 160 S.W.3d 46, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1612 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004), dismissed by 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53075 (S.D. Tex. July 31, 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Province of Court & Jury : Credibility of Witnesses

58. Evidence was sufficient to convict defendant of illumination of aircraft by intense light, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 42.14, because being unable to see at night due to a bright light spotlighted on the aircraft certainly could impair a pilot's ability to control his aircraft, and the jury was free to believe or disbelieve the testimony regarding whether the pilot's ability to control the aircraft was impaired. Amspacher v. State, 311 S.W.3d 564, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9819 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 30 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : General Overview

59. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 701, a police officer's testimony that a 14-year old girl did not fit the profile of a prostitute was admissible in an inmate's trial on charges of kidnapping where (1) the officer had extensive experience in the child exploitation unit; and (2) the inmate's attorney made an issue of whether the girl was a prostitute, thereby entitling the state to ask the officer's opinion on the issue, in light of his training, experience, and knowledge of the girl. Jordan v. Dretke, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31950 (N.D. Tex. May 22 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Credibility

60. In an indecency with a child case, a court did not err in excluding the proposed testimony of a school psychologist that, in her opinion, the victim's videotaped statement was not truthful because no expert or lay witness was allowed to give an opinion that another witness was telling the truth. Workman v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2149 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2008).

61. In an indecency with a child case, a court did not err in excluding the proposed testimony of a school psychologist that, in her opinion, the victim used language that seemed unnatural for her because the point of that testimony was to suggest to the jury that the victim was not trustworthy because she either: (a) had been coached; or (b) rehearsed the videotaped statement; the testimony indirectly commented on the victim's truthfulness. Workman v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2149 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Self-Defense

62. Under Tex. R. Evid. 701, the State's lay witness was properly allowed to offer opinion testimony regarding whether it was necessary for defendant to use deadly force to protect his brother because the witness personally observed the fight and defendant's use of deadly force, and the testimony was helpful to the jury in determining a fact in issue. Garcia v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4424 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 9 2005).

63. In a prosecution for aggravated assault in which defendant claimed self-defense, the arresting officer was permitted to give opinion testimony that defendant had not been attacked. Ex parte Nailor, 149 S.W.3d 125, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 518 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Scienter : Specific Intent

64. In a murder trial, counsel was not ineffective in failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 704, to allegedly improper witness testimony concerning defendant's mental state because defendant did not establish that the trial court would have erred in overruling an objection to testimony from two eyewitnesses that defendant intentionally hit the victim with his van. Harris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2143, 2012 WL 952248 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 20 2012).

65. In a trial for evading arrest, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to an officer's opinion that defendant intended to flee. The reviewing court noted that opinion testimony regarding the mental state of an accused was not inadmissible per se, that rulings on the admissibility of lay opinion testimony were within the discretion of the trial court under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 704, and that counsel may have made a strategic decision not to object. Britt v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3148 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 26 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Alternatives : Probation : Eligibility

66. Under Tex. R. Evid. 701, a probation officer was qualified to give her opinion on defendant's suitability for probation; the probation officer interviewed defendant and the 13-year-old sexual assault victim while preparing her presentence investigation report; she therefore based her testimony not only on her general professional knowledge and experience but also on her personal knowledge and perceptions. Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Evidence

67. Defendant's counsel was not ineffective during the punishment phase of defendant's aggravated assault trial for failing to object to a county case worker supervisor's opinion about defendant's character where the case worker's testimony was in compliance with Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) and Tex. R. Evid. 602 because it was rationally based on her perception and was helpful to a determination of a fact in issue-defendant's punishment. Ramirez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 368, 2009 WL 1567340 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 22 2009).

68. Under Tex. R. Evid. 701, a probation officer was qualified to give her opinion on defendant's suitability for probation; the probation officer interviewed defendant and the 13-year-old sexual assault victim while preparing her presentence investigation report; she therefore based her testimony not only on her general professional knowledge and experience but also on her personal knowledge and perceptions. Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

69. In defendant's sexual assault case, because a witness did not recommend a specific punishment, but merely stated that she felt defendant should be punished, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the testimony. Flores v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7207 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 12 2004).

70. Where a trial court allowed the victim's mother and former counselor to each testify as to whether the proper punishment for defendant was probation or imprisonment, such issue was not preserved with respect to the testimony by the mother, as defendant failed to object thereto pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a); although Tex. Evid. R. 701 prohibits a witness from recommending a particular punishment to the jury, in the instant matter that sentencing phase was conducted by a trial judge, so the purpose of the rule to avoid jury confusion was not relevant, and the court found that any impact of the error was mitigated by effective cross-examination of the counselor, whereupon she indicated that she never thought probation was suitable for a sex offender and accordingly, her opinion was unrelated to the facts of the case. Rodriguez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3174 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 8 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Victim Statements

71. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, Tex. R. Evid. 701 permitted the victim to briefly testify as to the impact the attack had on her life, including that she had been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder and had moved out of state; the jury chose a mid-range sentence of ten years; the challenged testimony did not have a substantial effect on the sentencing determination. Leroy v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3626 (Tex. App. Dallas May 1 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

72. Defendant waived appellate review regarding an officer's testimony on the psychological and physiological effects of ecstasy, cocaine, and marijuana because at trial he objected on confrontation grounds, not on the basis put forward on appeal, that the State failed to establish the admissibility of the complained-of testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 701, 702, or 703. Nelson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6710 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 18 2005).

73. Defendant argued that trial court erred in allowing an investigator to opine that the State had narrowed its suspects down in a murder to two people--defendant and the accomplice witness; however, defendant waived this issue for appellate review because a hearsay objection was raised at trial, and defense counsel failed to raise the specific objection of opinion testimony. Palacios v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9912 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 10 2004).

74. Where a trial court allowed the victim's mother and former counselor to each testify as to whether the proper punishment for defendant was probation or imprisonment, such issue was not preserved with respect to the testimony by the mother, as defendant failed to object thereto pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a); although Tex. Evid. R. 701 prohibits a witness from recommending a particular punishment to the jury, in the instant matter that sentencing phase was conducted by a trial judge, so the purpose of the rule to avoid jury confusion was not relevant, and the court found that any impact of the error was mitigated by effective cross-examination of the counselor, whereupon she indicated that she never thought probation was suitable for a sex offender and accordingly, her opinion was unrelated to the facts of the case. Rodriguez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3174 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 8 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

75. Defendant failed to preserve an argument that opinion testimony was speculative because similar testimony was admitted without objection. Moreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6018, 2012 WL 3025932 (Tex. App. El Paso July 25 2012).

76. To the extent that defendant claimed that testimony violated Tex. R. Evid 701, defendant failed to object at trial on that basis; therefore, the issue was not preserved for appeal. Boone v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8665 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 19 2008).

77. Defendant waived his contention that the trial court erred by admitting the officer's testimony that, in his opinion, defendant intentionally or knowingly possessed marijuana because his objection "calls for speculation" could not have informed the trial court that defendant was challenging the admissibility of the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6303 (Tex. App. Dallas July 20 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

78. Defendant waived his contention that the trial court erred by admitting the officer's testimony that, in his opinion, defendant intentionally or knowingly possessed marijuana because his objection "calls for speculation" could not have informed the trial court that defendant was challenging the admissibility of the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6303 (Tex. App. Dallas July 20 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

79. In a murder trial, defendant waived any argument under Tex. R. Evid. 503, 701, 704 to allowing a State's witness to speculate regarding what defendant told his trial counsel. There were no objections on grounds relating to those rules, as required to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Young v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8022, 2009 WL 3295763 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 14 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

80. In a capital murder trial for the shooting death of a store clerk, the trial court erred by permitting an expert witness to provide a narrative interpretation of the videotaped recording of the incident. However, the testimony that defendant's waving to the gunman was consistent with his saying "come this way," did not have a substantial or injurious effect on the jury's verdict and did not affect his substantial rights; therefore, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P 44.2. Gonzales v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2518 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 30 2006).

81. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

82. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

83. Even if defendant's objections to the testimony at sentencing of the victim's parents raised proper grounds or were sufficiently specific under Tex. R. Evid. 701, defendant failed to show harm where the facts reflected significant bad acts by defendant. Defendant told a police officer that the victim was hanging onto her car as she backed up, she told the victim to get off the car, she quickly accelerated, and she swerved the car to knock the victim off the car. Moreover, a sentence of 30 years was well beyond the range of years where probation could be considered under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 42.12, § 4(d)(1). Foust v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 12 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 4 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

84. Trial court erred in allowing the detective in charge of defendant's murder and aggravated assault case to give her opinion on defendant's mental state in response to a question of why she obtained a warrant where the detective's interpretation and opinion regarding defendant's mental state were not an interpretation of her objective perception of events because she was not present at the scene at the time of the incident and had no personal knowledge concerning the event and the veracity of any witness. However, the trial court's error did not influence the jury or had but a slight effect because the detective stated what was obvious to the jury from all the testimony, which was that the shooting was not accidental or unintentional, and, setting aside the detective's testimony, there was compelling evidence of defendant's guilt. Saldana v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1709, 2011 WL 846095

(Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 10 2011).

85. In defendant's murder case, any error in allowing a police officer to testify regarding defendant's credibility was harmless because evidence of defendant's guilt was pervasive throughout the record. While defendant contended that the victim's death was a suicide, the State presented evidence that the victim was pregnant, she wanted to have her baby, and there was evidence that defendant had asked the victim to get an abortion and that she refused. Clark v. State, 305 S.W.3d 351, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 478 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 26 2010).

86. Regarding testimony by a jail employee that the wording and tone of voice used by defendant in his telephone conversation with his wife was "annoying," defendant failed to state an objection until after the question had already been answered; in light of the whole of the employee's testimony, the testimony that the wife was annoyed did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict. Conner v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1510 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 29 2008).

87. In an interference with child custody case, although a court erred by overruling defendant's objection to an officer's testimony regarding her guilt or innocence, the error was harmless because the evidence against defendant established that she violated the child custody modification order; defendant's own testimony established that her taking possession of the child on October 24 was contrary to the terms of the modification order. Lovell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6062 (Tex. App. Tyler July 12 2006).

88. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, Tex. R. Evid. 701 permitted the victim to briefly testify as to the impact the attack had on her life, including that she had been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder and had moved out of state; the jury chose a mid-range sentence of ten years; the challenged testimony did not have a substantial effect on the sentencing determination. Leroy v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3626 (Tex. App. Dallas May 1 2006).

Estate, Gift & Trust Law : Will Contests : Fraud

89. Niece's deposition testimony stating that signatures on a will "looked different" merely amounted to a conclusory assertion since it did not establish her familiarity with her aunt's signature; therefore, her testimony was not rationally based on her perception under Tex. R. Evid. 701; as such, there was not a scintilla of evidence of a forgery based on this evidence in a case where a will was prima facie valid under Tex. Prob. Code Ann. § 84(a). In re Estate of Price, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11043 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 20 2006).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Admissibility

90. In a driving while intoxicated case, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 701, in admitting a CD to assist the arresting officer in explaining the effects of alcohol on a person's eyes with and without increased nystagmus. The exhibit was not offered as substantive evidence of intoxication but rather as a tool to help the arresting police officer explain the horizontal gaze nystagmus test. Redfearn v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7018, 2010 WL 3377796 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 26 2010).

91. State was properly allowed to demonstrate its version of defendant's murder of her husband in order to illustrate the state's theory that the multiple stabbing was planned rather than defensive; Tex. R. Evid. 701 did not bar the demonstration because the state's witness who participated, a detective who viewed both the body and the scene, had personal knowledge of a great many of the details about which he testified, and he could reasonably infer the remaining details from those details he personally knew. Wright v. State, 178 S.W.3d 905, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9609 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Visual Formats

92. Even though the trial court erred by admitting into evidence an animation that purportedly reconstructed the events surrounding the shooting, because nothing in the record supported many of the details contained in the animation and the details were provided by nothing more than pure speculation on the creator's part, the error was harmless. The crux of the case against defendant was linking him to the conspiracy to get the informant, and two witness testified that defendant entered into an agreement with others to retaliate against an informant for giving police information that led to a friend's arrest; the animation did little to answer that question. Derrick v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4843 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 17 2013).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Present Sense Impression : General Overview

93. In a prosecution for driving while intoxicated, a law enforcement officer's observations of defendant, dictated on videotape, were not admissible because they were the functional equivalent of a police or offense report under Tex. R. Evid. 803(8)(B). The court noted that statements of opinion, whether of a lay witness or an expert, were not present sense impressions. Fischer v. State, 207 S.W.3d 846, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9432 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Public Records : Law Enforcement Reports

94. In a prosecution for driving while intoxicated, a law enforcement officer's observations of defendant, dictated on videotape, were not admissible because they were the functional equivalent of a police or offense report under Tex. R. Evid. 803(8)(B). The court noted that statements of opinion, whether of a lay witness or an expert, were not present sense impressions. Fischer v. State, 207 S.W.3d 846, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9432 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Statements by Party Opponents : General Overview

95. Statements in a proof of loss form relating to the date of hail damage were competent summary judgment evidence because they constituted admissions under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2). Even if the statements in the proof of loss form were not binding or conclusive, they were considered prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein; moreover, expert testimony was not required on the issue of whether hail occurred on a certain date and caused property damage. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Lynd Co., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3206, 2012 WL 1430541 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 25 2012).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

96. In defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver cocaine, one arresting officer had 10 years experience, two years of which the officer was on a neighborhood narcotics enforcement team where the officer had many encounters with drug dealers and users; the officer's testimony about aspects of drug dealing, combined the officer's actual knowledge and lay opinion about facts in issue, did not fall under expert testimony rule (Tex. R. Evid. 702), and was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 701. King v. State, 129 S.W.3d 680, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 697 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

97. In defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver cocaine, one arresting officer had 10 years experience, two years of which the officer was on a neighborhood narcotics enforcement team where the officer had many encounters with drug dealers and users; the officer's testimony combined the officer's actual knowledge, as well as the officer's lay opinion about facts in issue, did not fall under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 701, governing opinion testimony by lay witnesses. King v. State, 129 S.W.3d 680, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 697 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : General Overview

98. In a criminal trial for murder and aggravated assault, defense counsel were not deficient in failing to object to lay opinion testimony. The testimony that defendant intentionally ran over the victims with his truck was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the lay witness's opinion was rationally based on his own perception and was helpful in the determination of a fact in issue. Ex parte White, 160 S.W.3d 46, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1612 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004), dismissed by 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53075 (S.D. Tex. July 31, 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Objections

99. Even though testimony concerning a child's truthfulness was not admissible in a sexual assault case either through lay or expert testimony, no ineffectiveness of counsel was shown based on a failure to object because there was only one witness from whom the State elicited an opinion about the child's truthfulness, and the State did not emphasize the testimony in its closing statement. Defendant did not show that, but for such omission, there was a reasonable probability that the result of the trial would have been different. Arcement v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1096, 2009 WL 383398 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 18 2009).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

100. In a driving while intoxicated case, a trial court did not err by allowing a police officer to give an opinion about appellant's intent to fight at the time of his arrest; the officer was not speculating about appellant's inner thoughts, rather, the officer was drawing an inference from her own observations. The information was relevant, it did not describe an extraneous offense or bad act, the inclusion of the information was not so prejudicial that it should have been excluded on that ground, and it was presented alongside copious evidence that appellant was driving while intoxicated and attempting to flee from police. Link v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3350, 2012 WL 1495182 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 30 2012).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

101. In a driving while intoxicated case, a trial court did not err by allowing a police officer to give an opinion about appellant's intent to fight at the time of his arrest; the officer was not speculating about appellant's inner thoughts, rather, the officer was drawing an inference from her own observations. The information was relevant, it did not describe an extraneous offense or bad act, the inclusion of the information was not so prejudicial that it should have been excluded on that ground, and it was presented alongside copious evidence that appellant was driving while intoxicated and attempting to flee from police. Link v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3350, 2012 WL 1495182 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 30 2012).

102. Trial court did not err by allowing a lieutenant to testify about the decedent's wife's intent to steal the gun owner's gun from his desk at work because his statements were based on his investigation of the incident, which included the consideration of the totality of the circumstances. Richardson v. Crawford, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8150 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 12 2011).

103. Police officer was properly permitted to testify as to the number of intoxicated people he had encountered during his career as it was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to establish the basis for his opinion that appellant was intoxicated and was based on his personal perceptions as required by Tex. R. Evid. 701. Schmidt v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8795, 2010 WL 4354027 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 3 2010).

104. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to further question two of the State's witnesses about defendant's duty or authority as a peace officer because he had already established that neither witness had any law enforcement training or education, and therefore the questions failed to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid.

701 (personal perception or knowledge) and Tex. R. Evid. 401 (relevance requiring both materiality and probativeness). King v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8766 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2007).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Blood Alcohol

105. In a personal injury suit stemming from a collision between a motorist and a bicyclist, evidence of the bicyclist's intoxication was rebuttably presumed to be admissible because the bicyclist's vigilance, judgment, and reactions were at issue; no expert evidence was required as to causation; assessing the reliability of scientific methods was not a precondition to the admission of factual evidence of alcohol consumption, business records showing blood-alcohol levels, or non-expert opinions regarding intoxication. Ticknor v. Doolan, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6717 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 27 2006).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Sobriety Tests

106. In a driving while intoxicated case, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 701, in admitting a CD to assist the arresting officer in explaining the effects of alcohol on a person's eyes with and without increased nystagmus. The exhibit was not offered as substantive evidence of intoxication but rather as a tool to help the arresting police officer explain the horizontal gaze nystagmus test. Redfearn v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7018, 2010 WL 3377796 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 26 2010).

107. During defendant's trial for driving while intoxicated (DWI) in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, the testimony of an officer with the police department's DWI enforcement unit might have been improper under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 702 because, by repeatedly testifying that the walk-and-turn and one-leg stand sobriety tests provided "validated" or "scientifically validated" clues of impairment, the officer gave those tests an imprimatur of scientific accuracy that they had not been shown to possess and that, in any event, he was not shown qualified to confer. However, reversible error was not presented because the issue was not preserved for appeal, and because defendant's substantial rights were not affected, as there was substantial evidence of defendant's intoxication, including his admission that he had consumed four shots of tequila and the testimony of four witnesses describing his reckless driving, odor of alcoholic beverage, bloodshot eyes, slurred speech, and lack of balance. McIntosh v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 849 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 4 2010).

108. In defendant's driving while intoxicated case, the court properly allowed the arresting officer to testify regarding defendant's performance on the walk-and-turn and one-legged stand sobriety tests because the tests were grounded in the common knowledge that excessive alcohol consumption could cause problems with coordination, balance, and mental agility. Plouff v. State, 192 S.W.3d 213, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

109. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

110. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744

(Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

111. In a prosecution for DWI, the arresting officer was properly allowed to testify that, in his opinion, defendant was intoxicated based on defendant's inability to perform the walk and turn test and the one leg stand test. A lay witness may give an opinion as to whether another person is intoxicated, and although a police officer may have specialized training, that does not preclude the officer from providing such lay opinion testimony. Oropeza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 24 2004).

112. Where there was no indication in an officer's sworn report that his opinion of a driver's intoxication was based on his training and experience, his qualifications did not have to be established under Tex. R. Evid. 702; further, the walk-and-turn and one-leg stand tests were not based on a novel scientific theory and, under Tex. R. Evid. 701, a police officer was not required to be an expert to express an opinion as to whether the person he observed was intoxicated. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Struve, 79 S.W.3d 796, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4433 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2002).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : General Overview

113. Trial court's restrictions on a witness's testimony were within its discretion where the court was avoiding needless consumption of time because defendant was asking questions about what the witness did not consider to be a violation of the restrictive covenants at issue in the case, whether the witness had protested the value assigned to his own property for property tax purposes, and whether individuals could enforce deed restrictions; those lines of questioning were either irrelevant to the legal question of whether defendant had violated the applicable deed restrictions or improperly called for a legal conclusion. Daniels v. Balcones Woods Club, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 957 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : General Overview

114. Father and brother of an incapacitated adult testified in detail about the adult's cerebral palsy, his inability to feed or dress himself, and other limitations, and thus the father and brother were not required to provide expert testimony to establish that a person with these limitations required additional, basic care. Christus Health & Christus Health Gulf Coast v. Dorriety, 345 S.W.3d 104, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3755 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 19 2011).

115. In condemnation proceedings, an affidavit of the vice president of the corporate general partner of a limited partnership was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 701 regarding the valuation of the property to be take for a water line easement because his opinion was based on his expertise rather than his personal familiarity with the property and he was not timely disclosed as an expert. Reid Rd. Mun. Util. Dist. No. 2 v. Speedy Stop Food Stores, Ltd., 337 S.W.3d 846, 2011 Tex. LEXIS 190, 54 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 658 (Tex. 2011).

116. Exchange between the parties did not relieve the client of the burden to show causation via expert testimony in response to a summary judgment motion in the client's professional negligence lawsuit; to avoid summary judgment, the client had to submit competent causation evidence regardless of whether appellees requested discovery or an expert report, and none of the exhibits contained evidence of causation on the negligence claim. Mcinnis v. Mallia, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1634, 2011 WL 782229 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 8 2011).

117. Because a client proffered no expert testimony to establish that she would have prevailed in her underlying suit but for the asserted negligence, she provided no evidence to establish a causal link between the asserted negligence and her claimed injury, and appellees were properly granted summary judgment. Mcinnis v. Mallia, 2011

Tex. App. LEXIS 1634, 2011 WL 782229 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 8 2011).

118. To prove the reasonableness and necessity of medical services, a plaintiff had to either submit an affidavit or provide expert testimony; there was no evidence of appellee's medical expenses and the damage award was reversed. Tucker v. Tucker, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9272, 2010 WL 4705588 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2010).

119. In defendant's drug case, the trial court did not err in allowing a witness to testify as to what tanks were used for because the witness had worked for the business for 16 years at the time of the trial, and the witness testified that the tanks were used to store and move fertilizer and anhydrous ammonia. That was not scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge that was being offered to assist the trier of fact. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8078, 2009 WL 3335282 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 16 2009).

120. In a will contest alleging lack of testamentary capacity, affidavits of several doctors regarding a testatrix's soundness of mind were considered in granting summary judgment because mental soundness was within common knowledge and did not require proof by expert testimony. In re Estate of Mask, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5439 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 23 2008).

121. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a Tex. R. Evid. 705 hearing concerning a special agent's testimony because the trial court properly admitted the agent's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701; the State presented the agent as a lay witness to testify about the pimp subculture and to address the issue of cause, as placed into issue by defendant's cross-examination of the complainant; the questions contemplated drew directly from the agent's personal experience and familiarity with the pimping subculture, including its terms, many of which the complainant had used in her testimony, which the agent gained from interviewing both pimps and prostitutes; questioning the agent about what he learned from his experience assisted the fact-finder in determining a fact in issue, specifically defendant's utilizing the complainant as a prostitute for his personal profit. Richardson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4281 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 31 2007).

122. In a trial for child sexual assault, a licensed clinical psychologist was properly allowed to testify as a lay witness where her name was not on the expert list, despite defendant's argument that the psychologist testified in an expert manner under Tex. R. Evid. 702; the testimony that children did not talk about things that troubled them unless they felt safe was that of a lay witness because it satisfied the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 701 in part because the opinion was not based on a scientific theory and did not require significant expertise to interpret. Scott v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 473 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 25 2007).

123. In a dispute between insureds under a homeowners policy and their insurer concerning mold in the insureds' home, the insureds' claims failed on summary judgment because the insureds did not timely designate any expert to testify as to causation and lay testimony was insufficient. While the general causal relationship between water and mold might have been common knowledge, the causation issue in the instant case was not within the general experience and common sense of a lay person. Qualls v. State Farm Lloyds, 226 F.R.D. 551, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5049 (N.D. Tex. 2005).

124. In a proceeding to terminate parental rights, a caseworker was properly permitted to testify as a fact witness. Contrary to the father's assertion that she expressed the "collective opinion" of the agency, she did not voice an opinion, when asked, about what was in the best interest of the children. Rogers v. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 175 S.W.3d 370, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1327 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

125. In defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver cocaine, one arresting officer had 10 years experience, two years of which the officer was on a neighborhood narcotics enforcement team where the officer had many encounters with drug dealers and users; the officer's testimony about aspects of drug dealing, combined the officer's actual knowledge and lay opinion about facts in issue, did not fall under expert testimony rule (Tex. R. Evid. 702), and was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 701. King v. State, 129 S.W.3d 680, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 697 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

126. In defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver cocaine, one arresting officer had 10 years experience, two years of which the officer was on a neighborhood narcotics enforcement team where the officer had many encounters with drug dealers and users; the officer's testimony combined the officer's actual knowledge, as well as the officer's lay opinion about facts in issue, did not fall under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 701, governing opinion testimony by lay witnesses. King v. State, 129 S.W.3d 680, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 697 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

127. Police officer with relevant training or experience may qualify under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and 702 to give opinion testimony. Thrailkille v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8972 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 18 2002).

128. Where there was no indication in an officer's sworn report that his opinion of a driver's intoxication was based on his training and experience, his qualifications did not have to be established under Tex. R. Evid. 702; further, the walk-and-turn and one-leg stand tests were not based on a novel scientific theory and, under Tex. R. Evid. 701, a police officer was not required to be an expert to express an opinion as to whether the person he observed was intoxicated. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Struve, 79 S.W.3d 796, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4433 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2002).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Admissibility

129. Finding that respondent was a sexually violent predator was proper because it was not entirely clear from a fingerprint analyst's testimony or the offer of proof whether he personally perceived the events forming the basis of his opinions, or whether he obtained information regarding the events second hand; what was clear was that his testimony did not relate specifically to the prisons in which respondent. Therefore, the testimony did not meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 701; moreover, the same testimony defense counsel sought to elicit from the analyst regarding the prison conditions, defense counsel was able to ask without objection of a doctor and therefore, any error would be harmless. See Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a). In re Hill, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1881 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 28 2013).

130. Even though the trial court erred by admitting the testimony of a trooper concerning the causation of the accident, as his testimony contained opinions and he did not qualify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the error was harmless because his conclusion that the bus driver was not at fault was cumulative of other evidence. The driver's other expert witness provided testimony consistent with the trooper's conclusions, testified in much greater detail, length, and depth than the trooper, and explained the methods he used and the calculations he made. Lopez-juarez v. Kelly, 348 S.W.3d 10, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6446 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2011).

131. Party objected several times to witnesses giving non-expert opinions; the court noted that non-expert opinions are not per se inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701. In re B.N., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7275, 2010 WL 3434214 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 1 2010).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Criminal Trials

132. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of the victim's primary case physician as a lay witness, and therefore he did not have to be qualified as an expert to render an opinion about whether the victim was disabled, because the physician's testimony was based on his perception of the victim and his opinion was helpful to the jury in determining the factual issue of the victim's status as a disabled individual and did not require significant expertise to interpret. Edwards v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5677 (Tex. App. Austin May 29 2014).

133. In a sexual assault case, defendant was unable to show that he received ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to object to the testimony of a social worker as unqualified expert testimony; the social worker could have testified about giving a victim information about a sexual assault examination as either a lay or expert witness. Benjamin v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2007).

134. In a capital murder trial for the shooting death of a store clerk, the trial court erred by permitting an expert witness to provide a narrative interpretation of the videotaped recording of the incident. However, the testimony that defendant's waving to the gunman was consistent with his saying "come this way," did not have a substantial or injurious effect on the jury's verdict and did not affect his substantial rights; therefore, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P 44.2. Gonzales v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2518 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 30 2006).

135. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

136. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Helpfulness

137. Companies complained that a postal worker had not designated a liability expert to establish foreseeability in this premises liability case, but while such testimony might be helpful, it was not required when a layperson's common understanding and experience allowed him to determine the causal relationship, and the deposition testimony constituted some evidence of causation. Farrar v. Sabine Mgmt. Corp., 362 S.W.3d 694, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6276, 2011 WL 3524204 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 11 2011).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Qualifications

138. Deputy's testimony that the presence and degree of lividity indicated death had occurred over an hour before he first observed the victim's body was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because it was based on first-hand knowledge and under Tex. R. Evid. 702 based on his training and experience, which included his 11 years as a crime-scene investigator, during which he had amassed extensive training and experience; the classes conducted by physicians in the county medical examiner's office in which instruction was provided on the approximate times for lividity and rigor mortis to set in on a corpse; medical conferences he attended regularly in which information was provided on lividity as a beginning stage of decomposition; and the fact that he had seen hundreds of homicide victims. Thompson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1633, 2011 WL 782051 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 8 2011).

139. The burden of proving that a testifying expert possesses special knowledge as to the very matter upon which he proposes to give an opinion rests on the party offering the testimony. S & J Invs. v. Am. Star Energy & Minerals

Corp., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5078 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 8, 2008).

140. Narcotics detective was qualified to testify that defendant possessed the cocaine with intent to distribute because he had been a narcotics officer for almost eight years, worked undercover with confidential informants, had purchased narcotics many times, had attended a 40-hour class, annual continuing education, drug recognition schools, drug testing classes, drug buying classes and a few classes on courtroom testimony; the detective described cocaine, its packaging, amounts and prices, and described the cocaine found in the case and testified that a person in possession of a 100 grams of cocaine would be in possession with intent to distribute. Brooks v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6973 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 8 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : General Overview

141. Expert testimony was not necessary to establish causation in this case, and evidence of temporal proximity, along with other evidence tending to exclude other potential causes, could have established that the business's trucks caused the damage to the car wash concrete; the causal relationship between the occurrence (delivery trucks driving over the pavement) and the condition (damage to the pavement) could in principle be determined by a layman in this case. Raul Flores, Inc. v. Rodriguez, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3561, 2014 WL 1370344 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 3 2014).

142. While lay testimony could theoretically have established causation in this case, the actual testimony adduced at trial did not do so. Raul Flores, Inc. v. Rodriguez, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3561, 2014 WL 1370344 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 3 2014).

143. Court found no reversible error with respect to the exclusion of a witness's lay opinion testimony regarding causation; assuming that the causation opinion was admissible, there was no reversible error because the testimony would not constitute more than a scintilla of evidence supporting causation. Raul Flores, Inc. v. Rodriguez, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3561, 2014 WL 1370344 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 3 2014).

144. President of a debt collector company had the required management position relating to the profits of the business in order to testify as an owner. Hht Ltd. v. Nationwide Recovery Sys., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6717 (Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2013).

145. Appellants complained that one of the debt collector's witnesses, a vice president and 25-year employee of the collector, was not an expert about lost profits, but the witness was qualified to testify about profits, and in any event, the president was qualified to testify even though he was not an expert. Hht Ltd. v. Nationwide Recovery Sys., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6717 (Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2013).

146. Relatives assumed that a witness testified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and the lessor stood on its waiver argument only; nothing indicated that the witness testified as a lay witness under Tex. R. Evid. 701, and thus the court addressed the issue as presented. Qui Phloc Ho v. Macarthur Ranch, Llc, 395 S.W.3d 325, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1199, 2013 WL 458323 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 7 2013).

147. To the extent the trial court found that expert testimony was necessary in this breach of contract case, this was error; the record indicated that the cost of repairing the pool in question could be shown via bids and the homeowners' lay opinion based on estimates. Seasha Pools, Inc. v. Hardister, 391 S.W.3d 635, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10765, 2012 WL 6761528 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 28 2012).

148. Homeowner introduced written bids he obtained regarding replastering his pool and repairing a light fixture, and he testified he felt the bids were reasonable; the bids and the homeowner's lay testimony were competent evidence from which a factfinder could determine the cost of repairing the light fixture and pool. Seasha Pools, Inc. v. Hardister, 391 S.W.3d 635, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10765, 2012 WL 6761528 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 28 2012).

149. On appeal from his conviction for failing to stop at a clearly marked stop line while facing a red light, the appellate court determined that the municipal court did not err in overruling defendant's objections to questions that he claimed called for a conclusion of law or ultimate issue for the jury. The police officers testified based on their observations and experience in patrolling the same area where defendant was cited. Hassan v. State, 440 S.W.3d 684, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8853, 2012 WL 5288353 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 25 2012).

150. Meaning of "semipermanently" in a restrictive covenant was a legal question, for construction purposes either under the common law or under Tex. Prop. Code Ann. §§ 202.002, 202.003, and was not ordinarily an appropriate subject for the testimony of lay witnesses; still, a landowner's witness underscored the court's concerns with the construction of this word, as he testified that the covenant had no definite time frame for compliance. Wiese v. Heathlake Cmty. Ass'n, 384 S.W.3d 395, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2371, 2012 WL 1009531 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 27 2012).

151. Appellant's testimony, as lay testimony, that he believed he was partners with appellee was not evidence of a legal partnership by itself; although appellant raised other bases for his conclusion, the court could not consider evidence of other partnership factors in determining if the parties expressed their intent to be partners. Brown v. Keel, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1854, 2012 WL 760933 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 8 2012).

152. Appellant did not object to the evidence offered by witnesses in valuing an automated teller machine, front-end loader, or cost of repairs in his trial for theft and criminal mischief, and thus any objection related to hearsay and lay and expert opinions was waived under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Lee v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1441, 2012 WL 592192 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 23 2012).

153. Court believes that a juror, applying commonsense understanding, can tie the relationship of the vibrations of the earth caused by seismic testing with reasonable probability to the concurrent abrupt sanding of a water well; hence, although expert testimony is often helpful to the understanding of the effects of seismic testing and is often advised, when there has been convincing lay witness evidence presented, as in this case, it is not absolutely mandatory. Seitel Data, Ltd. v. Simmons, 362 S.W.3d 783, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1446, 175 Oil & Gas Rep. 775 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 24 2012).

154. Court believes that a juror, applying commonsense understanding, can tie the relationship of the vibrations of the earth caused by seismic testing with reasonable probability to the concurrent abrupt sanding of a water well; hence, although expert testimony is often helpful to the understanding of the effects of seismic testing and is often advised, when there has been convincing lay witness evidence presented, it is not absolutely mandatory. Seitel Data, Ltd. v. Simmons, 362 S.W.3d 782, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 347, 2012 WL 129766 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 18 2012).

155. Court did not need to decide whether appellant's objection preserved his Tex. R. Evid. 701 objection because even assuming the trial court erred in allowing the victim's mother's testimony, admission was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); although appellant objected to the mother's description of appellant, a few moments later she testified without objection that she believed the victim's allegations, and it was for the jury to judge witness credibility, and the mother's testimony about how appellant looked had little if any effect on how the jury judged witness credibility, and the court had fair assurance that the evidence did not influence the jury or had only but a slight effect. Cavazos v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10185, 2011 WL 6917580 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 29

156. Trial court did not err by allowing a lieutenant to testify about the decedent's wife's intent to steal the gun owner's gun from his desk at work because his statements were based on his investigation of the incident, which included the consideration of the totality of the circumstances. Richardson v. Crawford, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8150 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 12 2011).

157. Subject of how water traveled after being absorbed by the ground and how such affected the water table were subjects beyond the general understanding and common knowledge of lay witnesses, and the homeowners' evidence did not show a close connection between the filling of the pond and the problems the homeowners experienced on their lot; for purposes of their claims, including under Tex. Water Code Ann. § 11.086, the homeowners were required to present expert testimony to show that a fact issue existed regarding whether the construction of the pond was the cause in fact of the excessive water on their lot, and as they did not, summary judgment was proper for the developer. Palma v. Chribran Co., L.L.C., 327 S.W.3d 866, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8921 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 10 2010).

158. While laypersons certainly know that water flows downhill, whether water continues flowing downhill after being absorbed into the ground is not a matter that is apparent or within the common experience of laypersons, nor does a layperson's general experience and common knowledge extend to determining how water travels beneath the ground over the distance that is involved here, and finally, laypersons do not possess a general understanding of where the water tables are located under property nor how adding water to one end of the table might affect areas elsewhere; a homeowner's opinion on the causation of his water problems was not properly supported. Palma v. Chribran Co., L.L.C., 327 S.W.3d 866, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8921 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 10 2010).

159. Assuming, without deciding, that it was error to admit an officer's testimony under either Tex. R. Evid. 701 or 702, his testimony had a slight effect, if any, on the jury's verdict, and thus any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the purpose of the officer's testimony was to show the dangerous nature of the events that took place, and from photographs admitted, the jury could have inferred that the incident was extremely dangerous. The primary issue was whether appellant committed the offenses of criminal mischief, attempted escape, and resisting arrest, and the evidence from other sources showing appellant committed these offenses was overwhelming. Mccutchen v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7760, 2010 WL 3699987 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 22 2010).

160. Trial court did not err in failing to hold a Kelly-Daubert hearing regarding the admissibility of the standard, physical field sobriety tests that defendant performed because an officer's testimony regarding the walk-and-turn test and the one-leg stand test was lay testimony, not expert scientific or technical evidence. Johnson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5603, 2010 WL 2803015 (Tex. App. Eastland July 15 2010).

161. Corporation's employees who testified against appellant, a terminated employee, regarding allegedly improper financial conduct by appellant were fact witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 701 rather than expert witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 702, such that non-produced documents, which the testifying employees referred to, were not subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.6(a). Marin v. IESI TX Corp., 317 S.W.3d 314, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 981 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 11 2010).

162. Case law discussing Tex. R. Evid. 701 did not apply because defendant had not brought an issue under Rule 701 or pointed to anywhere in the record where he preserved this issue for appeal by making a Rule 701 objection. Martinez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8712, 2009 WL 3789880 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 11 2009).

163. After the investigating detective testified that defendant had worked at his relationship with the victim in a process called grooming, defendant agreed that he was grooming the victim; even if the trial court abused its discretion in admitting this evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 702, the admission of the evidence did not affect defendant's substantial rights in view of his acknowledgment that he was grooming the victim. Worthy v. State, 295 S.W.3d 685, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3672 (Tex. App. Eastland May 28 2009).

164. In this negligence/premises liability action, there was lay testimony providing direct evidence of the prompt onset of symptoms following electrocution, and under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1, the court accepted as true the contractor's assertion in his statement of facts that emergency personnel informed the contractor that he had suffered a heart attack, as this statement was not contradicted by the homeowners. Choice v. Gibbs, 222 S.W.3d 832, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2852 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

165. In defendant's driving while intoxicated case, the court properly allowed the arresting officer to testify regarding defendant's performance on the walk-and-turn and one-legged stand sobriety tests because the tests were grounded in the common knowledge that excessive alcohol consumption could cause problems with coordination, balance, and mental agility. Plouff v. State, 192 S.W.3d 213, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

166. Objection was made to opinion testimony as calling for a legal conclusion, and the trial court ruled on that objection; although the objection on appeal was somewhat different in that defendant claimed the testimony was a conclusion that should have been reached by the jury, the court found the objection not so different as to have precluded the court's consideration of the issue for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, and the court further found that error was not forfeited by defense counsel's mere restatement of the objectionable testimony. Lovell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2280 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 22 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6062 (Tex. App. Tyler July 12, 2006).

167. Witness was asked whether, based on the investigation, defendant violated the law of interference with child custody under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 25.03(a)(1), to which the witness agreed; because this was in substance, an opinion that defendant was guilty, the trial court should have sustained defendant's objection; however, the error did not affect defendant's substantial rights under Tex. R. App. P. 44, given that defendant and her ex-husband had a custody arrangement regarding their child and defendant deliberately took the child on a weekend that was not hers. Lovell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2280 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 22 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6062 (Tex. App. Tyler July 12, 2006).

168. Trial court's restrictions on a witness's testimony were within its discretion where the court was avoiding needless consumption of time because defendant was asking questions about what the witness did not consider to be a violation of the restrictive covenants at issue in the case, whether the witness had protested the value assigned to his own property for property tax purposes, and whether individuals could enforce deed restrictions; those lines of questioning were either irrelevant to the legal question of whether defendant had violated the applicable deed restrictions or improperly called for a legal conclusion. Daniels v. Balcones Woods Club, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 957 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2006).

169. Reasonable minds could have differed as to the causal nexus, whether the evidence proved the father's mental pain and anguish damages, and whether the daughter proved the amounts, reasonableness, and necessity of the father's past medical expenses, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 18.001(b), and thus the trial court erred in granting a judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Ferrer v. Guevara, 192 S.W.3d 39, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10010 (Tex. App. El Paso 2005).

170. In the fire and police retiree heath care fund's actuarial malpractice suit against its consulting firm after funding rate's for health care costs were increased, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the firm's objections to the affidavit testimony of the two witnesses (the firefighters union president and its chief collective bargaining negotiator) offered by the fund to establish causation as it was based on their speculative conclusions regarding what the city's negotiators, the city council, and the union members would have done if the firm had recommended a higher pre-funding rate. Bd. of Trs. of the Fire & Police Retiree Health Fund v. Towers, Perrin, Forster & Crosby, Inc., 191 S.W.3d 185, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9786 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

171. Police officer's perception of defendant's wife as a victim of family violence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and was not testimony of scientific or technical knowledge for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702; the statement was based on the officer's personal observations and experience as an officer working in the family violence division, the testimony suggested that the State was asking the officer to elaborate on events leading up to and executing the warrant for defendant's arrest, and in light of the overwhelming evidence of guilt, as well as the admission of similar testimony without objection, error, if any, was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Horta v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7151 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2005).

172. For purposes of defendant's conviction under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.124(a)(2), there was sufficient evidence affirmatively linking defendant to the red phosphorous and iodine, judicially noted to be precursors as defined in Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.002(22), and the State provided sufficient evidence to prove that the substances found were in fact red phosphorous and iodine, given that (1) items used in the manufacture of drugs were found during a search, (2) the house had a pungent smell, (3) defendant had stained fingertips common to such manufacturing, (4) testimony of a drug analyst, admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701, discussed the precursors, although the analyst did not test for them, and (5) officers testified that based on their experiences, they believed the chemicals to be red phosphorous and iodine. Miramontes v. State, 225 S.W.3d 132, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7160 (Tex. App. El Paso 2005).

173. Because a detective based opinion testimony on personal observations made while investigating, and the testimony was helpful to a determination of a fact in question, the detective's testimony was admissible as a lay opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Ortiz v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6721 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 18 2005).

174. Where a habitual marijuana user fell from a steel structure while working, he was permitted to give his lay opinion testimony at trial that he had normal use of his mental and physical faculties at the time of his injury. The jury was entitled to believe the employee's testimony, together with the testimony about the work activities the employee successfully completed prior to his fall. Am. Interstate Ins. Co. v. Hinson, 172 S.W.3d 108, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6350 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

175. Trial court properly granted a directed verdict in favor of an investment company in a wife's action to recover 30 percent of her deceased husband's IRA account because uncontradicted evidence in the form of testimony from the decedent's personal representative at the company established that the decedent filled out a new beneficiary designation form because the representative could not be sure that the decedent's daughters were in fact the beneficiaries of the IRA account. In re Estate of Falls, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6157 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 4 2005).

176. In a capital case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by prohibiting defendant from asking an arresting officer whether he thought defendant was upset because he did not intend for the accomplice to shoot the complainant as another officer had already told the jury what defendant said immediately after his arrest. The jury was just as capable of interpreting those statements as the arresting officer, rendering the utility of any opinion of his as to their meaning of slight or no usefulness. Ramirez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5631 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 21 2005).

177. Trial court properly admitted lay testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 to establish that the worth of a decedent's household furnishings because the record evidence established a basis for personal knowledge of the witnesses and a rational connection of that knowledge with the opinion. The decedent's fiance testified she was a frequent visitor in his home, was familiar with the furnishings, and that she owned comparable furnishings, and she estimated their worth based on an earlier professional evaluation of her own furniture and the quantity and quality of the decedent's furnishings. Sierad v. Barnett, 164 S.W.3d 471, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4161 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

178. In a dispute between insureds under a homeowners policy and their insurer concerning mold in the insureds' home, the insureds' claims failed on summary judgment because the insureds did not timely designate any expert to testify as to causation and lay testimony was insufficient. While the general causal relationship between water and mold might have been common knowledge, the causation issue in the instant case was not within the general experience and common sense of a lay person. Qualls v. State Farm Lloyds, 226 F.R.D. 551, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5049 (N.D. Tex. 2005).

179. Defendant opened the door to the question of why the child victim did not testify, and a detective's testimony regarding the competency of child witnesses was appropriate to clarify the issue pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 107; in addition, the testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because (1) the detective had personal experience with child witnesses and their ability or inability to testify, (2) the detective's testimony was based on inferences made as a result of the detective's personal experience and observations, and (3) common sense also dictated that a three-year-old child might not be fit to testify. Martinez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1822 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 10 2005).

180. Because the one-leg-stand and walk-and-turn field sobriety tests (FSTs) are grounded in the common knowledge that excessive alcohol consumption can cause problems with coordination, balance, and mental agility, a law enforcement officer's testimony about a defendant's coordination, balance, and mental agility problems during these FSTs is considered lay witness opinion testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701. McClain v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 760 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 1 2005).

181. Even if defendant's objections to the testimony at sentencing of the victim's parents raised proper grounds or were sufficiently specific under Tex. R. Evid. 701, defendant failed to show harm where the facts reflected significant bad acts by defendant. Defendant told a police officer that the victim was hanging onto her car as she backed up, she told the victim to get off the car, she quickly accelerated, and she swerved the car to knock the victim off the car. Moreover, a sentence of 30 years was well beyond the range of years where probation could be considered under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 42.12, § 4(d)(1). Foust v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 12 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 4 2005).

182. Defendant argued that trial court erred in allowing an investigator to opine that the State had narrowed its suspects down in a murder to two people--defendant and the accomplice witness; however, defendant waived this issue for appellate review because a hearsay objection was raised at trial, and defense counsel failed to raise the specific objection of opinion testimony. Palacios v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9912 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 10 2004).

183. In defendant's aggravated assault case, a court properly allowed a store manager to testify that he did not believe the collision was an accident where the manager saw how upset defendant became after being told he would have to pay to replace the tire, he witnessed the heated exchange between defendant and the other drivers, he knew that defendant quickly returned to the store even after being told his tire would not be ready until the next day, and heard no braking as defendant's truck came into the store at a high rate of speed. The opinion that the collision was not an accident was rationally based on those experiences. to be an expert on such matters. Chatham v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8327 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 16 2004).

184. In a murder case, court did not err in allowing the investigating homicide officer to give his direct opinion that the State's two witnesses were telling the truth where defendant's trial counsel posed questions asking the officer if he thought the witnesses were credible witnesses based on their criminal contacts and asked if the officer thought that one was a credible witness because of her lies in her statement, counsel opened the door to the State's questions that directly commented on whether the officer believed the witnesses were truthful and credible witnesses. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7777 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 26 2004).

185. In defendant's sexual assault case, because a witness did not recommend a specific punishment, but merely stated that she felt defendant should be punished, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the testimony. Flores v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7207 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 12 2004).

186. In defendant's retaliation case, court erred by admitting an officer's testimony that he had no doubt that a threat was made to a witness by defendant because the officer stated a legal conclusion from the facts and thus expressed impermissible opinions on a mixed question of fact and law. Martin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7142 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 11 2004).

187. In a criminal prosecution for the charge of driving while intoxicated, Tex. R. Evid. 701 permitted the trial court to admit lay opinion testimony from an eyewitness on the scene who saw defendant behaving as though he were intoxicated, and although the eyewitness did have law enforcement training, his opinion was not offered as expert testimony. Sloane v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6903 (Tex. App. Waco July 28 2004).

188. In a case involving the termination of parental rights, a licensed professional counselor was permitted to testify about the relationship of the parents as a lay witness where the permissible testimony included evidence that the parents' behavior was "childlike, argumentative, and verbally abusive," and that the parents used "humiliating words" toward each other. In re T.N., 142 S.W.3d 522, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6710 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

189. In a driver's suit for injuries sustained in a car accident with a company's employee, while the investigating officer was not an expert on accident reconstruction, his testimony was admissible as it was lay opinion based on his own observations and experiences as a police officer. Pilgrim's Pride Corp. v. Smoak, 134 S.W.3d 880, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4468 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

190. In defendant's capital murder case, a court did not err by permitting a witness to speculate that defendant's accomplice could not have taken the money from the cash register where the witness based his testimony on his observations. He could see where both robbers were located in relationship to the complainant and the cash drawer, and based on those observations, the witness drew an inference that only defendant was in a position to reach the cash drawer and take the money. Webber v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 15 2004).

191. In a prosecution for aggravated assault in which defendant claimed self-defense, the arresting officer was permitted to give opinion testimony that defendant had not been attacked. Ex parte Nailor, 149 S.W.3d 125, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 518 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

192. In a prosecution for DWI, the arresting officer was properly allowed to testify that, in his opinion, defendant was intoxicated based on defendant's inability to perform the walk and turn test and the one leg stand test. A lay witness may give an opinion as to whether another person is intoxicated, and although a police officer may have specialized training, that does not preclude the officer from providing such lay opinion testimony. Oropeza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 24 2004).

193. Lay witness may give an opinion as to whether another person is intoxicated. Oropeza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 24 2004).

194. In defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver cocaine, one arresting officer had 10 years experience, two years of which the officer was on a neighborhood narcotics enforcement team where the officer had many encounters with drug dealers and users; the officer's testimony about aspects of drug dealing, combined the officer's actual knowledge and lay opinion about facts in issue, did not fall under expert testimony rule (Tex. R. Evid. 702), and was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 701. King v. State, 129 S.W.3d 680, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 697 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

195. In defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver cocaine, one arresting officer had 10 years experience, two years of which the officer was on a neighborhood narcotics enforcement team where the officer had many encounters with drug dealers and users; the officer's testimony combined the officer's actual knowledge, as well as the officer's lay opinion about facts in issue, did not fall under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 701, governing opinion testimony by lay witnesses. King v. State, 129 S.W.3d 680, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 697 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

196. Where there was no indication in an officer's sworn report that his opinion of a driver's intoxication was based on his training and experience, his qualifications did not have to be established under Tex. R. Evid. 702; further, the walk-and-turn and one-leg stand tests were not based on a novel scientific theory and, under Tex. R. Evid. 701, a police officer was not required to be an expert to express an opinion as to whether the person he observed was intoxicated. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Struve, 79 S.W.3d 796, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4433 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2002).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Opinion Testimony : General Overview

197. Where homeowners alleged that neighbors and company owners caused rain water to flood their house, the evidence was legally sufficient to support the jury's verdict on the homeowners' Texas Water Code claims because the homeowners did not establish as a matter of law that any impounding of diffuse surface water created as a result of the neighbors' changes to their property caused the harm the homeowners suffered; there was testimony from multiple witnesses about what actually did happen with the diffuse surface water and floodwater. Michaelski v. Wright, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6864 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 26 2014).

198. Where homeowners alleged that neighbors and company owners caused rain water to flood their house, the evidence was legally sufficient to support the jury's verdict on the homeowners' Texas Water Code claims because the homeowners did not establish as a matter of law that any impounding of diffuse surface water created as a result of the neighbors' changes to their property caused the harm the homeowners suffered; there was testimony from multiple witnesses about what actually did happen with the diffuse surface water and floodwater. Michaelski v. Wright, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6864 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 26 2014).

199. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of the victim's primary case physician as a lay witness, and therefore he did not have to be qualified as an expert to render an opinion about whether the victim was disabled, because the physician's testimony was based on his perception of the victim and his opinion was helpful to the jury in determining the factual issue of the victim's status as a disabled individual and did not require significant expertise to interpret. Edwards v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5677 (Tex. App. Austin May 29 2014).

200. Record was silent as to why counsel did not object to handwriting testimony, but counsel might have believed that the State could have overcome an objection, given the rule, and thus an objection would have been futile, and an attorney was not ineffective for failing to make futile objections. Cantrell v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14332,

2013 WL 6178576 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 21 2013).

201. Appellant did not object to a question on the ground that it was improper opinion testimony, such that this issue was not preserved for review. Irving v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6443, 2013 WL 2297075 (Tex. App. Dallas May 23 2013).

202. Even if defendant's objection during the punishment phase was timely, and an investigator's opinion that defendant's child would be at further risk if around defendant was inadmissible, similar evidence was introduced during the guilt-innocence phase of the trial without objection; hence, defendant was not harmed by the admission of the investigator's opinion. Lomax v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5306 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 30 2013).

203. Appellant complained that the trial court erred in admitting lay witness testimony over his Tex. R. Evid. 701 objection, but the State claimed the issue was not preserved, and the issue was whether the objection was specific enough to have made the trial court aware of the complaint, unless grounds were apparent from context, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A); although the grounds were not apparent from appellant's final objection, his prior objections concerning invading the jury's province were coupled with arguments as to the form of the question and calling for an opinion and conclusion, and even if these were specific enough to preserve error, they failed to comport with the complaint on appeal that the testimony was based on hearsay and was not helpful, and thus that complaint was waived. Hurst v. State, 406 S.W.3d 617, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4282 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 4 2013).

204. Even if the court assumed error was preserved and it was error to admit the investigator's opinion, the error would have been harmless because the jury had the information from another source. Hurst v. State, 406 S.W.3d 617, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4282 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 4 2013).

205. Under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 107.002, a case worker supervisor's testimony was admissible opinion testimony that was not subject to a Daubert hearing; she testified that she interviewed the child, formed an opinion as to his best interest, found that it was in the child's best interests to terminate the parents' rights, and the child said he wanted to stay with his foster parents. In re R.L.A., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2745, 2013 WL 1092210 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 15 2013).

206. In this nuisance case, although some homeowners discussed a nearby sale, that only reflected their property value after the nuisance, instead of how much the value had changed, and the homeowners' bare conclusions did not provide evidence of the damage caused.

207. In this nuisance case, although one homeowner provided the most detail, his testimony was insufficient because he did not explain the factual basis behind his finding of a decrease in value.

208. In case law, the court stated that market value could be shown by asking a witness if he was familiar with the value of his property, and the court never before explained the interplay between that case and another opinion, in connection with the property owner rule; because the landowners might have relied on that case in presenting their evidence on diminution in property value, a remand was appropriate, and because liability was contested, the court remanded for a new trial on liability and damages.

209. Court agrees that Coastal Transp. Co. v. Crown Cent. Petroleum Corp. provides the appropriate standard for judging the adequacy of testimony offered under the Property Owner Rule, and because property owner testimony is the functional equivalent of expert testimony, it must be judged by the same standards, and thus, as with expert testimony, property valuations may not be based solely on a property owner's ipse dixit; an owner may not simply echo the phrase market value and state a number to substantiate his diminished value claim, he must provide the factual basis on which his opinion rests, and this burden is not onerous, particularly in light of the resources available today: evidence of price paid, nearby sales, tax valuations, appraisals, online resources, and any other relevant factors may be offered to support the claim, but the valuation must be substantiated, and a naked assertion of "market value" is not enough. Of course, the owner's testimony may be challenged on cross-examination or refuted with independent evidence, but even if unchallenged, the testimony must support a verdict, and conclusory or speculative statements do not.

210. In this nuisance case, none of the testimony provided evidence of diminished market value, and certain testimony was speculative and amounted to only a guess as to diminution in value, and such speculation would not support a judgment.

211. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a detective to express his belief about how individuals who abuse children target their victims. The witness had extensive practical experience and personal knowledge as a child abuse detective working on hundreds of cases; therefore, his lay opinion testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Guerrero v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8879, 2012 WL 5258700 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 25 2012).

212. During a juvenile's trial for indecency with a child, any error under the rule in admitting a detective's testimony did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict because the testimony was limited to providing a brief explanation for why the victim had difficulty testifying in court. In re L. M. M., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5717 (Tex. App. Austin July 11 2012).

213. In a suit for breach of an agreement to sell a business, the buyer was not required to present expert testimony on lost profits because the seller's deposition testimony, in which he stated the annual amount that a purchaser could expect to earn from operating the business, sufficiently supported the award under the property owner rule. Sharifi v. Steen Auto., Llc, 370 S.W.3d 126, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4775, 2012 WL 2149921 (Tex. App. Dallas June 14 2012).

214. Testimony was properly admitted on the diminished value of damaged steel coils. The steel company's owner could testify to value as a property owner under Tex. R. Evid. 701, and an expert marine surveyor's testimony on representative sampling was reliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702; further, the expert marine surveyor was not required under Tex. R. Evid. 703 to personally inspect every damaged coil. Custom Transit, L.P. v. Flatrolled Steel, Inc., 375 S.W.3d 337, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4739 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 14 2012).

215. Defendant's conviction for capital murder was proper because the detective's testimony was rationally based on events that he perceived during his investigation of the case, including his interrogation of defendant; the testimony was relevant to whether defendant committed the offense, and it did not expressly question defendant's or another witness's truthfulness or credibility. Because the detective's testimony was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 701, the trial court did not abuse its discretion. Cleary v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2348 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2012).

216. Had counsel objected that a witness was not qualified, the trial court could have considered if the victim's involvement put her in the position to express a helpful opinion to the jury, but the objection was not sufficiently specific and the issue was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A). Vallair v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7055, 2011 WL 3847418 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 31 2011).

217. For purposes of Tex. Lab. Code Ann. § 401.013(a)(2), the trial court could have found that a lay witness was competent to testify regarding the employee's physical and mental faculties during his shift and the minutes preceding his death, her testimony was relevant on the issue of whether he was intoxicated, and her testimony was not rendered irrelevant because she did not observe the employee at the exact minute of his death; the witness's testimony supported the findings that the employee was alert and possessed the normal use of his faculties at the time of his death. Dallas Nat'l Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4564, 2011 WL 2436505 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 16 2011).

218. Seller testified that he would not opine about the amount of retained accounts because he was not an accountant, and without more detail, the jury could not based damages on a demand letter, as opinion testimony on damages had to be supported by objective facts. U.S. Renal Care, Inc. v. Jaafar, 345 S.W.3d 600, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 30 2011).

219. Business owner was permitted to testify about the fair market value of the business if there is a basis for the knowledge, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by permitting the owner's testimony in this circumstance. Tyre v. Yawn, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1219, 2011 WL 662957 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 17 2011).

220. Trial court did not err by admitting testimony from a detective that defendant showed signs of a guilty conscience during a police interrogation because, taking into account that the detective was asked what defendant's "blacking" or "blanking" comment meant to him as an investigator, and not what defendant was thinking when she said that she had "blanked" or "blacked" out, the detective's disputed testimony was not a speculative opinion, but it went instead to his rationally based perception of the interrogation, which provided a clearer understanding of the facts in issue. Brown v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 882, 2011 WL 382634 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 8 2011).

221. Trial court did not err in admitting into evidence a statement to a trooper as to the speed that defendant believed he had been going at the time of a single car rollover accident. Given that defendant admitted several times he was driving the vehicle, the trial court reasonably could have inferred that he had a factual basis from which to estimate his speed at the time of the accident. Curran v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 935, 2011 WL 446191 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 8 2011).

222. In a case in which defendant was convicted of indecency with a child, although the testimony of a sheriff's office investigator that he saw no signs the complainant was dreaming or hallucinating could have been admissible as expert testimony, it was also admissible as lay testimony where the record demonstrated that the investigator had observed the complainant's forensic interview and could testify, based on life experience, that he had not seen any signs that the complainant was dreaming or hallucinating, because he had thus perceived the events of the interview and had formed an opinion that a reasonable person could draw from the facts. Furthermore, the testimony was helpful to demonstrate the complainant's forensic interview had been subjected to investigation and evaluation, and, consequently, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the investigator's lay testimony that he saw no signs that the complainant was dreaming or hallucinating. Gonzalez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 107, 2011 WL 47169 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 7 2011).

223. Witness's testimony amounted to no more than conjecture, contrary to Tex. R. Evid. 701. Blaine v. National-oilwell, L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9614, 2010 WL 4951779 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2010).

224. Walk-and-turn and one-leg-stand tests were not scientific evidence; the officer's testimony was lay witness testimony governed by Tex. R. Evid. 701, and while she described the tests and indicated what clues meant a person was intoxicated and how many clues appellant indicated, such did not cross the line into expert testimony, and the trial court did not err in allowing this testimony in appellant's driving while intoxicated trial. Horton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7296, 2010 WL 3433776 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2010).

225. Because an officer's testimony was lay witness testimony, and therefore the expert standard did apply, the trial court did not wrongfully place the burden of proof on appellant to show her weight at the time of her arrest for driving while intoxicated. Horton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7296, 2010 WL 3433776 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2010).

226. Trial court did not err in determining that causation in this negligence case could stand on the lay testimony of the injured motorist, who testified as to his dental problems, including lost teeth, suffered after the accident with the driver. Figueroa v. Davis, 318 S.W.3d 53, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2574 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 8 2010).

227. Although a driver claimed that the motorist's lay testimony fell short of proving causation, the court disagreed; the fact that the dental injury was not recorded until his second set of medical records in contrast to his testimony that his injury was immediate upon impact went to the weight of his testimony and the evidence was not insufficient because of it. Figueroa v. Davis, 318 S.W.3d 53, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2574 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 8 2010).

228. Witness's opinion was based on what he observed at the crime scene, and he also had specialized knowledge as a homicide detective; the evidence was admissible as opinion testimony by a lay witness and as expert testimony, under Tex. R. Evid. 701 & 702. Lowery v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1230, 2010 WL 610915 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 23 2010).

229. Although defendant argued that his counsel permitted a witness to testify as to his guilt without objection, given the fact that one such objection was overruled by the trial court, counsel could have chosen not to emphasize the matter further to the jury by additional objections, and, accordingly, it could not be said that the trial court abused its discretion in finding that defendant failed to prove by credible evidence that counsel's performance was deficient. Moreover, the witness was a fact witness, and defendant did not argue that the testimony was not based on the perception of the witness and/or was not helpful to an understanding of a fact in issue. Ex Parte Eggert, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 858, 2010 WL 396321 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 4 2010).

230. In defendant's murder case, any error in allowing a police officer to testify regarding defendant's credibility was harmless because evidence of defendant's guilt was pervasive throughout the record. While defendant contended that the victim's death was a suicide, the State presented evidence that the victim was pregnant, she wanted to have her baby, and there was evidence that defendant had asked the victim to get an abortion and that she refused. Clark v. State, 305 S.W.3d 351, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 478 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 26 2010).

231. In a personal injury case, with regard to the two medical record affidavits and the unsworn statements of one doctor, it had long been the rule of Texas that opinion testimony did not establish any material fact as a matter of law. Luna v. Torres, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6972, 2009 WL 2914395 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2009).

232. Layperson could reasonably determine that there was a causal link between the slick pool deck surface and the guest's fall and the jury finding was supported by legally sufficient evidence. Towers of Town Lake Condo. Ass'n v. Rouhani, 296 S.W.3d 290, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7033 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2009).

233. Motion to suppress was properly denied under U.S. Const. amend. IV and the Texas Constitution because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that defendant voluntarily consented to a search of his person and the officer was legally authorized to make a warrantless arrest for defendant's illegal possession of marijuana under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.121 that occurred within the officer's presence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 1401. The officer was entitled to give testimony as a lay person under Tex. R. Evid. 701 as to his recognition that the substance was marijuana. Gossett v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5823, 2009 WL 4251169

(Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 30 2009).

234. In an action for a deficiency judgment by a lender against a borrower in which the trial court found an offset, a new trial was required because the trial court erred in valuing the property as of the time of trial rather than as of the time of the foreclosure as required by Tex. Prop. Code Ann. § 51.003(b), (c), and also in admitting the testimony of the borrower's majority shareholder on the issue of valuation under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Cabot Capital Corp. v. USDR, Inc., 346 S.W.3d 634, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2957 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 30 2009).

235. Affidavits of a resident and his wife failed to give rise to the requisite issue of material fact that the owner should have foreseen that the resident would be robbed and stabbed on the premises; they did not establish the necessary expertise to qualify as experts, and as statements of opinion by lay, interested witnesses, their opinions were neither readily controvertible nor competent, for summary judgment purposes. Xiao Yu Zhong v. Sunblossom Gardens, LLC, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3010, 2009 WL 1162213 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2009).

236. In a driving while intoxicated case, the court did not err by allowing the officer to testify that defendant failed the field sobriety tests because the officer's use of the word "failed" did not give his testimony an "aura of scientific reliability" or cloak it with unearned credibility; the majority of the officer's testimony consisted of a straightforward narrative of each field sobriety test, followed by a particular description of how defendant performed each test. The officer's observations were based on common knowledge and observations and did not, under the circumstances convert his lay witness testimony into expert testimony. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2051, 2009 WL 765490 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 25 2009).

237. In defendant's murder case, an officer did not give improper opinion testimony because he testified that he personally spoke with the witness at the scene and interviewed; he stated that another witness's statement was consistent with that of the witness at the scene. The officer's testimony was based upon his personal observation and reasonable inferences from that observation, and was helpful in determining the events surrounding the complainant's death. Neal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1726, 2009 WL 585965 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 10 2009).

238. In proper instances, lay witnesses may express opinion testimony. Hawkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 16, 2009 WL 30255 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 7 2009).

239. Distinct line cannot be drawn between lay opinion and expert testimony because all perceptions are evaluated based on experiences, but as a general rule, observations which do not require significant expertise to interpret and which are not based on a scientific theory can be admitted as lay opinions if the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 701 are met, and this is true even when the witness has experience or training; additionally, even events not normally encountered by most people in everyday life do not necessarily require the testimony of an expert. Hawkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 16, 2009 WL 30255 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 7 2009).

240. Witness testified that the wounds on the victim were consistent with other defensive wounds he had observed, and the court found that this observation did not require significant expertise to interpret, did not rely on a scientific theory, and was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 as lay opinion testimony even though the witness had some technical training. Hawkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 16, 2009 WL 30255 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 7 2009).

241. Even if evidence admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 701 was inadmissible, it did not constitute reversible error for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because there was a qualified expert testifying that lacerations might have been defensive wounds and the witness testifying similarly that they were consistent with defensive wounds, and thus the court did not find that the addition of the testimony by the witness would have affected a substantial right of defendant. Hawkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 16, 2009 WL 30255 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 7 2009).

242. To the extent that defendant claimed that testimony violated Tex. R. Evid 701, defendant failed to object at trial on that basis; therefore, the issue was not preserved for appeal. Boone v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8665 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 19 2008).

243. Given the testimony regarding the size and shape of the knife and the manner in which defendant's friend used it, the evidence was sufficient to show that the knife was capable of causing death or serious bodily injury and was a deadly weapon under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1.07(a)(17)(B), for purposes of defendant's aggravated robbery conviction; while the knife was not introduced into evidence, there was no expert or lay opinion testimony, and there was no testimony concerning sharpness, the victim testified as to the size and shape of the knife, that defendant's friend stuck the knife to the back of the victim's neck, demanded his laptop, and asked whether it was worth the victim's life when he refused to surrender it, and the victim claimed he was scared to death and received a small scratch from the knife, although the victim did not believe he was intentionally cut. Williams v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8540 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 13 2008).

244. In an indecency with a child case, a court did not err in excluding the proposed testimony of a school psychologist that the victim gave a "rehearsed" statement because the psychologist admitted that she was not trained to look at a videotaped statement and determine whether a child was telling the truth. Workman v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2149 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2008).

245. In an indecency with a child case, a court did not err in excluding the proposed testimony of a school psychologist that, in her opinion, the victim's videotaped statement was not truthful because no expert or lay witness was allowed to give an opinion that another witness was telling the truth. Workman v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2149 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2008).

246. In an indecency with a child case, a court did not err in excluding the proposed testimony of a school psychologist that, in her opinion, the victim used language that seemed unnatural for her because the point of that testimony was to suggest to the jury that the victim was not trustworthy because she either: (a) had been coached; or (b) rehearsed the videotaped statement; the testimony indirectly commented on the victim's truthfulness. Workman v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2149 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2008).

247. In determining that the father had the right to determine the child's primary residence under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 101.016, the jurors, as the sole judges of the credibility of witnesses, was free to accept lay testimony over that of experts, when confronted with the conflicting evidence in this case; notwithstanding the testimony that the mother was better suited to determine the child's residence, there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding in the father's favor, as there were a number of witnesses who testified that the father was a loving and devoted parent, the jury also heard testimony that the father regretted not trying harder to stay in touch with his other children, that he recently made contact with them, and that he took a 10-week parenting course to improve his parenting skills, and the minor child was able to depend on the father for her physical and moral needs. Garcia v. Garcia, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5801 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 25 2007).

248. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a Tex. R. Evid. 705 hearing concerning a special agent's testimony because the trial court properly admitted the agent's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701; the State presented the agent as a lay witness to testify about the pimp subculture and to address the issue of cause, as placed into issue by defendant's cross-examination of the complainant; the questions contemplated drew directly from the agent's personal experience and familiarity with the pimping subculture, including its terms, many of which the complainant had used in her testimony, which the agent gained from interviewing both pimps and prostitutes; questioning the agent about what he learned from his experience assisted the fact-finder in determining a fact in issue, specifically defendant's utilizing the complainant as a prostitute for his personal profit. Richardson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4281 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 31 2007).

249. Psychologist, who testified during defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault on a child, testified as a lay witness because the psychologist's opinions were rationally based on the perception of the witness; a reasonable person could have the opinions expressed by spending a significant amount of time around children, and the psychologist's opinion was not based on scientific theory, but it was helpful and did not require significant expertise to interpret. Scott v. State, 222 S.W.3d 820, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2848 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

250. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 104, the trial court was entitled to admit a witness's lay opinion testimony at the preliminary hearing without the predicate of Tex. R. Evid. 701 being met. Denton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1706 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 7 2007).

251. In neighbors' action against a landowner seeking a declaration that they had a right to access a creek and a newly-formed lake on the landowner's property after a dam was built, the trial court did not err in admitting the affidavit testimony of a survey technician as his testimony about the average width of the creek was appropriate lay witness opinion evidence; it also was clear, positive, direct, otherwise credible and consistent, and it could have been readily controverted by the landowner. Hix v. Robertson, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9378 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 18 2006).

252. It was not an abuse of discretion to allow a probation officer to testify during the punishment phase of a trial that petitioner was not a "suitable" candidate for community supervision because suitability was a matter "relevant to sentencing" under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) when petitioner sought placement on community supervision under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 42.12, § 4; the probation officer not only based her testimony on her general professional knowledge and experience but also on her personal knowledge and perceptions of petitioner and the complainant during their interviews. Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

253. When a witness who is capable of being qualified as an expert testifies regarding events which he or she personally perceived, the evidence may be admissible as both Tex. R. Evid. 701 opinion testimony and Tex. R. Evid. 702 expert testimony. Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

254. Defendant waived his contention that the trial court erred by admitting the officer's testimony that, in his opinion, defendant intentionally or knowingly possessed marijuana because his objection "calls for speculation" could not have informed the trial court that defendant was challenging the admissibility of the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6303 (Tex. App. Dallas July 20 2006).

255. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, Tex. R. Evid. 701 permitted the victim to briefly testify as to the impact the attack had on her life, including that she had been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder and had moved out of state; the jury chose a mid-range sentence of ten years; the challenged testimony did not have a substantial effect on the sentencing determination. Leroy v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3626 (Tex. App. Dallas May 1 2006).

256. Defendant's convictions for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, possession of cocaine in an amount of less than one gram, and robbery, were appropriate because a police officer's testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 as the officer's opinion or inferences on impressions derived from his contact with defendant. Williams v. State, 191 S.W.3d 242, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1687 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

257. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, walk-and-turn and one-leg tests were properly admitted, despite testimony that they were improperly performed. Testimony by the arresting officer concerning both tests was lay witness testimony governed by Tex. R. Evid 701 rather than Tex. R. Evid 702. Plouff v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 18 2005), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 192 S.W.3d 213, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

258. In a trial for a "shaken-baby" murder, any error arising from the admission of an investigator's opinion on guilt was harmless. Although defendant objected to the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 during the prosecution's re-direct, the same question and answer had come in without objection during the defense's prior cross-examination. San Martin Adriano v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7140 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2005).

259. Defendant waived appellate review regarding an officer's testimony on the psychological and physiological effects of ecstasy, cocaine, and marijuana because at trial he objected on confrontation grounds, not on the basis put forward on appeal, that the State failed to establish the admissibility of the complained-of testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 701, 702, or 703. Nelson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6710 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 18 2005).

260. Under Tex. R. Evid. 701, the State's lay witness was properly allowed to offer opinion testimony regarding whether it was necessary for defendant to use deadly force to protect his brother because the witness personally observed the fight and defendant's use of deadly force, and the testimony was helpful to the jury in determining a fact in issue. Garcia v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4424 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 9 2005).

261. In a criminal trial for murder and aggravated assault, defense counsel were not deficient in failing to object to lay opinion testimony. The testimony that defendant intentionally ran over the victims with his truck was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the lay witness's opinion was rationally based on his own perception and was helpful in the determination of a fact in issue. Ex parte White, 160 S.W.3d 46, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1612 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004), dismissed by 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53075 (S.D. Tex. July 31, 2006).

262. In a driving while impaired case, evidence of an officer's observations in a one-leg stand field sobriety test was governed by Tex. R. Evid. 701 as opinion testimony, but evidence concerning the guidelines and certification of the test were based on Tex. R. Evid. 702; further, a trial court's error in admitting the Rule 702 evidence was harmless because the officer admitted that there was a failure to follow the applicable guidelines. McRae v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5933 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 1 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 152 S.W.3d 739, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10805 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

263. As appellant's issue did not comport with his trial objection, error, if any, was not properly preserved; from the context of appellant's objection, one could have found that he was complaining of a Tex. R. Evid. 602 violation, instead of Tex. R. Evid. 701 as argued on appeal. Boyd v. State, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 8661 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 22 2001).

264. Appellant did not properly preserve a bolstering issue, but did properly preserve the issues of a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 701 and hearsay for review, but the court did not reach the issues because evidence that appellant was in the area on the night of the murders came in through many witnesses without objection. Boyd v. State, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 8661 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 22 2001).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Opinion Testimony : Helpfulness

265. During defendant's trial for DWI, the court did not err by allowing a bar manager to render an opinion that defendant was intoxicated; the manager based his opinion on matters he observed and the substance of the opinion, if believed by the jury, was helpful to a determination of whether defendant was intoxicated. Cook v. State,

2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13189, 2013 WL 5782915 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 23 2013).

266. Counsel could not be deemed ineffective for failing to object to a witness's testimony as impermissible expert testimony or for not requesting a Daubert hearing, given that her testimony did not involve a scientific theory and she did not need significant expertise to determine from officers' actions that they believed what they seized from the house were drugs, plus the testimony was helpful to the jury in determining a fact issue, under Tex. R. Evid. 701(b), and thus it was within the trial court's discretion to consider the witness as a lay witness. In re R.L.A., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2745, 2013 WL 1092210 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 15 2013).

267. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a forensic interviewer's testimony as lay testimony because she testified that she had experience interviewing more than 5,000 children and her opinion was not based on a scientific theory but rather was helpful to the jury and did not require significant expertise to interpret. Guardado v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5514, 2012 WL 2832561 (Tex. App. El Paso July 11 2012).

268. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a witness for the State, who worked for the mental health and retardation rehabilitation center where the victim attended classes and received services, to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 701 that it was her opinion that the victim was incapable of fabricating the sexual acts she alleged defendant to have perpetrated on her, as the witness's testimony was based on her personal knowledge and experience with the victim. Based on the witness's experience with the victim, her opinion could have been helpful to the jury. Ashley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5020, 2012 WL 2369346 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 25 2012).

269. In a criminal solicitation of a minor for sexual assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting a police detective's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because he participated in the conversations and created the chat logs comprising the State's exhibit, his opinion could aid the jury in determining the veracity of the State's and defendant's chat log exhibits, and the detective did not testify as an expert witness. Pudasaini v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5582, 2011 WL 2905592 (Tex. App. Dallas July 21 2011).

270. Defendant failed to show that his counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the victim's testimony that he thought defendant shoved him so he could not get his cell phone out of his pocket and that he though defendant would cut him with his pocket knife because the victim could testify about his opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and counsel may have believed that the victim's opinion would have been helpful to the determination of whether the victim felt threatened by defendant's actions. Barnett v. State, 344 S.W.3d 6, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4456 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 14 2011).

271. Trial court did not err by allowing the State to elicit testimony that defendant, by implication, was a drug dealer because the officers' testimony regarding whether the amount of crack cocaine found on defendant could have been for sale was admissible as lay opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701, as both officers participated in the discovery of the crack cocaine found on defendant, and therefore their opinion was based on what they perceived at the scene of the traffic stop. In addition, their experience in narcotics gave them the capability to testify regarding whether the amount the crack cocaine found could have been for defendant's personal use or for sale; this observation did not require significant expertise to interpret, was not based on scientific theory, and could be readily understood by the jury. Smith v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8773, 2010 WL 4348300 (Tex. App. Tyler Nov. 3 2010).

272. In a case in which defendant was convicted of sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in allowing a community supervision officer to express an opinion that defendant was a continuing threat to society. Officer's conclusion was rational and helpful to the jury's determination of defendant's punishment. Segler v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1727, 2010 WL 864396 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 11 2010).

273. Officer testified as to what he observed upon entering the apartment that led him to conclude that the victim was performing oral sex on defendant, and such testimony was helpful to the jury's determination of a fact issue in defendant's aggravated sexual assault trial and was therefore admissible; even if the court assumed the complained-of response was inadmissible, the officer had previously given the same testimony without objection. Nelson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7796, 2009 WL 3191909 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 7 2009).

274. Testimony offered by an employee and his co-worker at trial was based on their personal experiences as drivers of both 18-wheelers and standard vehicles, and their opinions were based on their observations of road and riding conditions; because of their personal experiences, their testimony helped the trial court to better understand the facts in issue, such that the trial court properly admitted the testimony. Old Republic Ins. Co. v. Weeks, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4139, 2009 WL 1740820 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 11 2009).

275. Regarding testimony by a jail employee that the wording and tone of voice used by defendant in his telephone conversation with his wife was "annoying," defendant failed to state an objection until after the question had already been answered; in light of the whole of the employee's testimony, the testimony that the wife was annoyed did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict. Conner v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1510 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 29 2008).

276. Firefighter's opinion testimony that an ordinary person would probably not have known that a cliff side could have given way was admissible lay opinion testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the testimony was based on his personal observations and training, the testimony assisted the trier of fact in determining whether the condition alleged was open and obvious, which was the ultimate issue in the case, and it could not be said that the testimony was mere speculation. Kirwan v. City of Waco, 249 S.W.3d 544, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 152 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

277. Lay testimony on the value of furniture was admissible in a suit on a sworn account because the witness' statements were rationally based on his perceptions and helpful to a clear understanding of his testimony. Hartis v. Century Furniture Indus., 230 S.W.3d 723, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4997, 63 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. 2d (CBC) 282 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

278. Court overruled defendant's claim that a witness was not competent for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, when the witness was asked what he thought defendant meant by the statement to "keep quiet;" the witness observed defendant's anger toward the victim and heard defendant state he had a gun, and the witness received many phone calls from defendant around the time of the murder, and thus the witness's opinion was rationally based on familiarity with defendant and the witness's perception of events, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701; the witness's opinion also met the second prong of Tex. R. Evid. 701 in that it was helpful to the jury's determination of a central fact at issue, whether defendant was guilty of murder, and even if the trial court erred in admitting this testimony, it was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because the record contained substantial evidence inculpating defendant in the murder. Jones v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2853 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 12 2007).

279. Defendant's contention that the trial court erred by admitting the officer's testimony that, in his opinion, defendant intentionally or knowingly possessed marijuana was rejected because the trial court could have concluded that the State satisfied the perception requirement of Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the officer had personal knowledge of the events that formed the basis of his opinion, as he was the investigating and arresting officer; the trial court also could have properly found that the officer's opinion was helpful because the issue to be determined was whether the marijuana belonged to defendant or the driver, as neither admitted ownership. Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6303 (Tex. App. Dallas July 20 2006).

280. During defendant's trial for DWI, any error in excluding the lay-opinion testimony of defendant's stepfather was harmless; a video recording of defendant at the accident scene did not depict any particular condition or trait of his that the stepfather's testimony could have been helpful in explaining was his normal behavior rather than the result of intoxication. Brewer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1992, 2014 WL 709549 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 21 2014).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Opinion Testimony : Nonspecialized Knowledge

281. Counsel could not be deemed ineffective for failing to object to a witness's testimony as impermissible expert testimony or for not requesting a Daubert hearing, given that her testimony did not involve a scientific theory and she did not need significant expertise to determine from officers' actions that they believed what they seized from the house were drugs, plus the testimony was helpful to the jury in determining a fact issue, under Tex. R. Evid. 701(b), and thus it was within the trial court's discretion to consider the witness as a lay witness. In re R.L.A., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2745, 2013 WL 1092210 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 15 2013).

282. Property Owner Rule did not require the property owner to qualify as an expert; as the sole member of the LLC, the court could presume the partner as owner of the property was familiar with the property and its value. Corniello v. State Bank & Trust, 344 S.W.3d 601, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5023 (Tex. App. Dallas June 30 2011).

283. Although case law uses broken bones and lacerations as examples of injuries that logically result from car accidents and can be supported solely by lay testimony, the court believes that back and neck pain can also be within the experience and knowledge of laypersons as being caused by car accidents. Tex. DOT v. Banda, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10316, 2010 WL 5463857 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 22 2010).

284. Passenger's testimony about a car accident, the treatment received, and the incapacity and pain he had thereafter was legally sufficient to prove that the injuries he complained of were caused by the accident; his testimony supported at least part of the jury's award of past medical treatment, pain and suffering, and physical impairment. Tex. DOT v. Banda, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10316, 2010 WL 5463857 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 22 2010).

285. Probable duration of a passenger's injuries was not within the general experience and common knowledge of laypersons, and while a layperson's knowledge could link the passenger's injuries to the accident, a layperson could only speculate about how long a neck or back strain, bruised ribs, and a fractured toe took to heal or whether they were likely to heal at all; absent the required expert testimony, the jury lacked legally sufficient evidence on which to base its damage award, and because the court was unable to suggest an appropriate amount for a remittitur, the court remanded for a new trial on all issues, under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(b). Tex. DOT v. Banda, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10316, 2010 WL 5463857 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 22 2010).

286. Trial court did not err in finding that a detective's testimony was admissible as a lay opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701, given that he did not purport to possess any specialized knowledge or to be an expert in wound determination regarding fatal injuries to a cat, he testified based on his first-hand impressions, which were not based on scientific theory, and his testimony helped to provide a clearer understanding of what took place contemporaneously to the offense. Davis v. State, 313 S.W.3d 317, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

287. Lay testimony from skilled witnesses with personal knowledge was sufficient under Tex. R. Evid. 701 to prove causation under Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. § 17.50(a)(2) in a construction defect case involving water damage and mold because these were not matters beyond the common understanding of laypersons. Horak v. Newman, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5629 (Tex. App. Austin July 21 2009).

288. In an aggravated robbery case, where the victim testified that as a marine veteran, he had extensive experience with weapons and that defendant's pistol looked like a 9 millimeter, because defendant did not object to the testimony as impermissible expert testimony, he failed to preserve this issue for appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; furthermore, under Tex. R. Evid. 701, the victim was properly allowed to testify regarding defendant's gun. Pintor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9607 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 7 2006).

289. At the time of the deed transfers, the father was suffering from mental and physical problems; the court found the evidence supported a determination that the father was unduly influenced and that he lacked the mental capacity, for which expert testimony was not required and for which lay testimony was sufficient, to transfer title to the property in question. Decker v. Decker, 192 S.W.3d 648, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3023 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Opinion Testimony : Personal Perceptions

290. District court did not err by striking as conclusory the affidavit of a witness who had not seen an alleged puddle on the floor of a store before a customer slipped and fell but stated that streak marks from a mop showed it was large and dirty, which provided no evidence of how long the puddle had been there. Saenz v. Heb Grocery Co., L.P., 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8901 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

291. At defendant's trial for possession of cocaine with intent to deliver, a detective testified that defendant and two other people had responsibility for and possession of cocaine found in the hotel room; counsel was not ineffective for failure to object because the testimony was admissible as a lay opinion. The detective's personal knowledge of the matter formed the basis of his objective perception of events and his lay opinion testimony regarding the people in the motel room. Fletcher v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 940, 2014 WL 354508 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 30 2014).

292. Witness's testimony did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 701 because he did not testify as to defendant's mental state but instead expressed his perception of what was going to happen when defendant threatened him, and there was nothing speculative in the witness's testifying about his own belief, formed at the time of the crime, that defendant would shoot him, and this opinion was based on first-hand observations upon which the opinion could be rationally drawn. Higgs v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14550, 2013 WL 6198842 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 27 2013).

293. Officer testified regarding his inspection of the scene, and counsel could have found that the officer's testimony was admissible as a lay opinion regarding the scene, considering that defendant had not yet claimed self-defense, and counsel was not ineffective on the ground that he failed to object to this testimony. Williams v. State, 417 S.W.3d 162, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13978, 2013 WL 6028845 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 14 2013).

294. During defendant's trial for DWI, the court did not err by allowing a bar manager to render an opinion that defendant was intoxicated; the manager based his opinion on matters he observed and the substance of the opinion, if believed by the jury, was helpful to a determination of whether defendant was intoxicated. Cook v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13189, 2013 WL 5782915 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 23 2013).

295. Witness's testimony that he assumed he was in jail because of a shooting committed by defendant was within his personal knowledge, rationally based on his perception of events and experiences, including questioning of him by police about a firearm, was helpful to a clear understanding of his testimony. His testimony was therefore admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 602 and Tex. R. Evid. 701. Williams v. State, 402 S.W.3d 425, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7031 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 11 2013).

296. Regardless of the questions asked of the officer, he did not give answers that required medical expertise, and his answers related to circumstances such as having to fight an accused or vials being damaged, which amounted to testimony of a lay witness concerning what he observed; defendant was not harmed because the officer did not give expert testimony, regardless of whether the trial court erred in overruling the objection. Eckiss v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7371 (Tex. App. Dallas June 11 2013).

297. Witness testified as a lay person that by using crime scene measurements, photographs, statements, and an accident reconstruction software program, he created the animation, but nothing supported many of the details in the animation, which were provided by no more than pure speculation, and thus the trial court erred in admitting the animation, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, 701. Lewis v. State, 402 S.W.3d 852, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6923 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2013).

298. Finding error in the admission of computer generated animation under Tex. R. Evid. 602, 701 did not end the court's inquiry, as the court had to consider whether to disregard the error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the court found that appellant's substantial rights were not affected and the error was harmless, given that the animation did little to answer whether appellant agreed to retaliate against someone, and there was testimony to that effect. Lewis v. State, 402 S.W.3d 852, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6923 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2013).

299. During defendant's trial for possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver, the court did not err in admitting testimony from a police officer that 42 rocks of crack cocaine indicated that defendant was attempting to sell it for profit because the officer's testimony was admissible as opinion testimony; the officer's testimony was based on the officer's perception at the scene and from the lack of indicia that the crack cocaine was for personal use. Crawford v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 243, 2013 WL 150283 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 14 2013).

300. Question of whether hail fell on a particular location on a particular day, and whether it caused property damage, is not a matter solely within the scope of an expert's knowledge, and thus is not a matter that requires expert testimony; to the contrary, it is a matter of personal observation and common sense that is within the scope of lay testimony. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Lynd Co., 399 S.W.3d 206, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6770 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 15 2012).

301. Lay witness is competent to state based on personal observation and common sense whether hail fell on a particular location on a particular date, and to make a logical connection between the hail event and the property damage existing after the storm; while it may require an expert using scientific data to predict or plot the track of a hail storm or to estimate the dollar value of the property damage, it does not require expert knowledge to say, based on one's personal observation and recollection, whether a hail storm in fact damaged a particular property during a particular time period, and no authority is cited establishing that this type of causation issue must be guided solely by expert evidence. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Lynd Co., 399 S.W.3d 206, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6770 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 15 2012).

302. Issue was whether apartment complexes were damages by one hail storm or another, and this was a causation issue within the common knowledge and experience of a lay person. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Lynd Co., 399 S.W.3d 206, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6770 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 15 2012).

303. Although appellant claimed appellee's testimony was insufficient to support a finding of proximate cause because she was not an expert, the court disagreed; appellee's testimony was proper lay opinion testimony and was based on her experience and observations, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701. Marin v. Herron, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6484, 2012 WL 3205427 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 8 2012).

304. Court did not need to determine if a witness expressed an opinion on the ultimate issue because even if she did, appellant was not able to show deficient performance; the witness's testimony was based on her observations while investigating the family, and even if the witness's statement amounted to an opinion, the testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 704, and counsel's decision not to object was not error or deficient performance. Noland v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5911, 2012 WL 2989256 (Tex. App. Austin July 20 2012).

305. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a forensic interviewer's testimony as lay testimony because she testified that she had experience interviewing more than 5,000 children and her opinion was not based on a scientific theory but rather was helpful to the jury and did not require significant expertise to interpret. Guardado v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5514, 2012 WL 2832561 (Tex. App. El Paso July 11 2012).

306. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a witness for the State, who worked for the mental health and retardation rehabilitation center where the victim attended classes and received services, to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 701 that it was her opinion that the victim was incapable of fabricating the sexual acts she alleged defendant to have perpetrated on her, as the witness's testimony was based on her personal knowledge and experience with the victim. Based on the witness's experience with the victim, her opinion could have been helpful to the jury. Ashley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5020, 2012 WL 2369346 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 25 2012).

307. Exclusion of testimony did not result in reversible error, as there was no evidence that the witness had any first-hand knowledge, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, of appellant's health condition and the trial court did not err in sustaining the hearsay objection; although some of the proffered testimony was not hearsay and consisted of the witness's observations and inferences, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701, even that was cumulative, and thus the excluded testimony could not have added anything to the admitted evidence. Frangias v. State, 367 S.W.3d 806, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3065, 2012 WL 1356704 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 19 2012).

308. Victim's opinion was rationally based on her own perception, which was helpful for determining a fact in issue, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701, and thus counsel was not deficient for failing to object. Darnell v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1512, 2012 WL 626318 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 28 2012).

309. There was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 701 in allowing the State to ask defendant's wife, on cross-examination, whether she believed the complainants had someone else shoot them, just to get her husband in trouble. The trial court could have found that the question was grounded in the wife's objective perceptions and not on speculation about the complainants' state of mind and that this opinion was helpful to eliminate a possible alternative theory of the crime. Harris v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6794, 2011 WL 3717046 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 25 2011).

310. Trooper's opinion testimony did not qualify as lay opinion testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because it was not solely based on his perceptions of the accident scene . Lopez-juarez v. Kelly, 348 S.W.3d 10, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6446 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2011).

311. While an emergency medical technician (EMT) could testify as a lay witness as to what he observed at the scene of the accident, he could not testify as an expert as to causation; although in some cases a witness could be considered an expert as to medical causation based on special experience, this did not apply here given the EMT's limited experience with automobile accidents involving fatalities. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

312. In a criminal solicitation of a minor for sexual assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting a police detective's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because he participated in the conversations and created the chat logs comprising the State's exhibit, his opinion could aid the jury in determining the veracity of the State's and defendant's chat log exhibits, and the detective did not testify as an expert witness. Pudasaini v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5582, 2011 WL 2905592 (Tex. App. Dallas July 21 2011).

313. In a child sexual abuse case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a) in finding that a forensic interviewer who videotaped an interview with the victim testified as a lay witness under Tex. R. Evid. 701 by describing the events she personally observed. Because the witness did not testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, notice was not required under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 39.14(b), and there was no need to lay an expert predicate. Flood v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5409, 2011 WL 2732608 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 14 2011).

314. Trial court could reasonably conclude that the detective's impression that the victim had been beaten was rationally based on his personal observation of the body, and that this impression was helpful both to explain the officer's testimony regarding the subsequent course of the investigation and to assist the trier of fact in determining whether the child's injuries were the result of criminal conduct or an accident. Murray v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4201, 2011 WL 2162864 (Tex. App. Austin June 1 2011).

315. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting an officer's testimony because she was offered as both an expert and a lay witness with personal knowledge under Tex. R. Evid. 701, the trial court may have permitted her to testify as a lay witness, and appellants did not challenge the officer's testimony as a lay witness until they filed their reply brief. Kilgore Mech., Llc v. Shafiee, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3530, 2011 WL 1849095 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 12 2011).

316. In a product liability action, the trial court was within its discretion in admitting testimony from a tire manufacturer's timely designated witness; the trial court could have decided that any lay person could have answered the question "looking at these two tires, from your own personal observation, would you put them on your car," based on perceptions of sight and touch without the benefit of any specialized knowledge. Hathcock v. Hankook Tire Am. Corp., 330 S.W.3d 733, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10032 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 17 2010).

317. Trial court did not err in admitting an office's testimony regarding the field sobriety tests he performed on appellant; regarding the one-leg stand test and the walk-and-turn test, the officer's testimony was admissible as lay testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and he was not required to be qualified as an expert witness under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9405, 2010 WL 4840491 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 24 2010).

318. Trial court did not err by allowing the State to elicit testimony that defendant, by implication, was a drug dealer because the officers' testimony regarding whether the amount of crack cocaine found on defendant could have been for sale was admissible as lay opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701, as both officers participated in the discovery of the crack cocaine found on defendant, and therefore their opinion was based on what they perceived at the scene of the traffic stop. In addition, their experience in narcotics gave them the capability to testify regarding whether the amount the crack cocaine found could have been for defendant's personal use or for sale; this observation did not require significant expertise to interpret, was not based on scientific theory, and could be readily understood by the jury. Smith v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8773, 2010 WL 4348300 (Tex. App. Tyler Nov. 3 2010).

319. Police officer was properly permitted to testify as to the number of intoxicated people he had encountered during his career as it was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to establish the basis for his opinion that appellant was intoxicated and was based on his personal perceptions as required by Tex. R. Evid. 701. Schmidt v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8795, 2010 WL 4354027 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 3 2010).

320. Defense counsel did not object on the basis of qualifications or reliability and he did not ask to voir dire the witness or have the trial court conduct a Daubert/Kelly hearing, and thus appellant preserved no error for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; the court noted that a lay opinion could be offered under Tex. R. Evid. 701 if the opinion was rationally based on his perceptions and helpful to the understanding of the testimony. Livingston v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5512, 2010 WL 2783911 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 15 2010).

321. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing a detective to testify that the mark he saw on the victim's neck was consistent with and could have been caused by the barrel of a rifle; that testimony, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701, was rationally based on his perception and was helpful to an understanding of a fact in issue, whether a firearm was used in the aggravated robbery offense. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3126, 2010 WL 1713026 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 29 2010).

322. That a witness might have expressed an opinion regarding the purpose or nature of the victim's brother's conversation with the victim was of no moment; although the witness could not possess personal knowledge of the mental state of the brother, she had personal knowledge of facts from which an opinion regarding the purpose of his conversation could be drawn. Cockrell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3208, 2010 WL 1705538 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 28 2010).

323. Witness overheard a conversation between the child victim and her brother; given the circumstances, the trial court could have found that the witness's opinion regarding the emotional undercurrent of the conversation was rationally based on her hearing perception, and the witness's opinion was relevant to help the jury's credibility determination regarding prior testimony by the brother. Cockrell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3208, 2010 WL 1705538 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 28 2010).

324. Officer's testimony was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because he saw the victim lying by a pool of blood and the scene appeared staged; the officer spent several minutes describing the crime scene, including the blood spatter, and at the time of the objection, the officer's testimony was limited to his observations of crime scene. Quain v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9247, 2009 WL 4356239 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 3 2009).

325. Court did not err in determining that a trooper's description of defendant as "psychotic" was inadmissible as evidence of defendant's mental state because the trooper testified outside the presence of the jury that he used the word "psychotic" not due to personal knowledge about defendant's mental state, but instead based on "interviews with other people." Because the record showed that the trooper lacked firsthand knowledge, he was not qualified as a lay witness to testify that defendant was psychotic. Fisher-Riza v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9769, 2009 WL 4358622 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

326. In defendant's drug case, the trial court did not err in allowing a witness to testify as to what tanks were used for because the witness had worked for the business for 16 years at the time of the trial, and the witness testified that the tanks were used to store and move fertilizer and anhydrous ammonia. That was not scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge that was being offered to assist the trier of fact. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8078, 2009 WL 3335282 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 16 2009).

327. In defendant's drug case, evidence was admissible as a lay opinion because the record reflected that the witness actually withdrew the liquid from the tank and, based upon his previous experience and his own sense of sight and smell, knew the liquid to be anhydrous ammonia. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8078, 2009 WL 3335282 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 16 2009).

328. Court properly allowed a witness to testify as to the "sense" she had that a weapon was in the vehicle occupied by defendant on the evening prior to the robbery because the testimony was nothing more than the witness's opinion as to whether a weapon was present, rationally based upon her auditory perception. Davey Enriquez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5183 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 7 2009).

329. In a products liability case, portions of a husband's affidavit relating to the structural integrity of a portable picnic table were properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because he did not observe an accident that occurred; however, other portions of the affidavit were rationally based on his observations and experiences. Lyon v. Atico Int'l USA, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4823, 2009 WL 1800820 (Tex. App. Waco June 24 2009).

330. Testimony offered by an employee and his co-worker at trial was based on their personal experiences as drivers of both 18-wheelers and standard vehicles, and their opinions were based on their observations of road and riding conditions; because of their personal experiences, their testimony helped the trial court to better understand the facts in issue, such that the trial court properly admitted the testimony. Old Republic Ins. Co. v. Weeks, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4139, 2009 WL 1740820 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 11 2009).

331. In a driving while intoxicated case, testimony from defendant's mother on the issue of whether defendant was intoxicated was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the mother did not personally observe a traffic stop or defendant's interaction with an arresting officer; the mother did not acquire personal knowledge at the time of the event. Because the testimony was not relevant, defendant's argument that her due process right to present a complete defense was violated was not addressed. Hartin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2765, 2009 WL 1076799 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2009).

332. In a driving while intoxicated case, there was no error in excluding testimony from defendant's mother regarding why defendant refused to cooperate with an arresting officer due to the mother's lack of personal knowledge. Even though the mother had knowledge of some past events concerning defendant that might have explained defendant's behavior, the mother was not present for the arrest. Hartin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2765, 2009 WL 1076799 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2009).

333. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a police officer's testimony concerning the automobile accident into evidence because his testimony was rationally based on his perception of the scene of the wreck and was helpful to a clear understanding of his limited testimony; his opinion testimony was based on the premise that the skid marks, damage to the roadway, and debris field would all be arrayed in a consistent or predictable way around the situs of the wreck. To the extent that the officer's testimony may have crossed over into giving an opinion based on his specialized knowledge and therefore was expert testimony, any error was harmless, as he did not profess to have more training and experience than he had and his conclusions were reiterated by two experts. Brown v. State, 303 S.W.3d 310, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2166 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 31 2009).

334. Officer was properly allowed to testify about the purpose of altering a shotgun to create a sawed-off shotgun because she had dealt with sawed-off shotguns on the firing range and in the field when investigating crimes, and because of her personal observations on the firing range and in the field, she was qualified to offer a lay opinion on the result of altering a shotgun. The question sought an explanation of what would be accomplished by sawing off the barrel of a shotgun, and the question was specifically limited to the officer's experience. Shelton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1802, 2009 WL 672011 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 12 2009).

335. Trial court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to a police detective's testimony that he believed defendant was guilty of the offense; the detective looked at a video of the offense, still footage of the video, and blown up photos of the video, and interviewed the victim and defendant to support his opinion that he was convinced defendant was the person in the video, identity was an issue in the case and the detective's testimony was helpful for a determination of that issue, and the testimony clarified earlier testimony on cross examination that sometimes false confessions were made. Swinnie v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1262 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 20

336. In a cocaine possession case, defendant's failure to object to an officer's testimony that drug dealers often carried many small bills waived the issue under Tex. R. App. P. 33, and counsel was not ineffective for failing to challenge the testimony as Tex. R. Evid. 702 expert testimony because it was admissible as Tex. R. Evid. 701 opinion testimony. Hayes v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 747 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 1 2008).

337. Firefighter's opinion testimony that an ordinary person would probably not have known that a cliff side could have given way was admissible lay opinion testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the testimony was based on his personal observations and training, the testimony assisted the trier of fact in determining whether the condition alleged was open and obvious, which was the ultimate issue in the case, and it could not be said that the testimony was mere speculation. Kirwan v. City of Waco, 249 S.W.3d 544, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 152 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

338. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to further question two of the State's witnesses about defendant's duty or authority as a peace officer because he had already established that neither witness had any law enforcement training or education, and therefore the questions failed to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 701 (personal perception or knowledge) and Tex. R. Evid. 401 (relevance requiring both materiality and probativeness). King v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8766 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2007).

339. Nurse's affidavit describing a comatose person's condition was sufficient, with other summary judgment evidence, to raise a fact issue concerning incapacity; even assuming that the nurse was not qualified as an expert, she could offer testimony of her personal observations. Yancy v. United Surgical Ptnrs. Int'l, Inc., 236 S.W.3d 778, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 990, 51 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 63 (Tex. 2007).

340. Where defendant used a car jack to strike the hood of the complainant's SUV, Tex. R. Evid. 701 permitted the arresting officer to testify that $1500 was the estimated cost of repairing the damage based on his years of experience with criminal mischief cases. Barnes v. State, 248 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4261 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

341. Workers' compensation claimant's attorney testified that her time estimates about the work she performed on the claimant's case were based on her notes and her past experience in performing similar work; accordingly, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 701, the record contained a basis for the attorney's personal knowledge and a rational connection of that knowledge with her estimates, which allowed her to testify regarding the amount of time she spent on the claimant's case. Also, any alleged mistake made by the attorney in her calculations did not create an impermissible analytical gap between the data and the conclusions; thus, the evidence was legally sufficient to support the award of attorney's fees. Twin City Fire Ins. Co. v. Vega-Garcia, 223 S.W.3d 762, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3568 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

342. Nurse failed to satisfy the personal knowledge requirement under Tex. R. Evid. 602 in defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child younger than 14 years of age, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021; the nurse had no personal knowledge of the facts of the case, she did not personally observe any events involving the trial, she was not present during an examination of the trial, and she did not offer any opinions specifically related to the child, and thus the nurse's testimony was not admissible as a lay opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Flores v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2818 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 12 2007).

343. Court overruled defendant's claim that a witness was not competent for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, when the witness was asked what he thought defendant meant by the statement to "keep quiet;" the witness observed defendant's anger toward the victim and heard defendant state he had a gun, and the witness received many phone calls from defendant around the time of the murder, and thus the witness's opinion was rationally based on familiarity with defendant and the witness's perception of events, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701; the witness's opinion also met the second prong of Tex. R. Evid. 701 in that it was helpful to the jury's determination of a central fact at issue, whether defendant was guilty of murder, and even if the trial court erred in admitting this testimony, it was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because the record contained substantial evidence inculpating defendant in the murder. Jones v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2853 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 12 2007).

344. In a possession of a prohibited substance in a correctional facility case, defendant alleged that he gave false testimony at his cell mate's trial because he was coerced by gang members, but his cell mate did not testify that he had personal knowledge of the gang members at the correctional facility actually following the gang's rules to protect other gang members from prosecution; therefore, the cell mate's opinion testimony was not based on his perceptions; rather, the cell mate's opinion testimony was based on his speculative conclusions regarding what the gang members would have done to protect him from prosecution; accordingly, Tex. R. Evid. 701 was not met by the cell mate's testimony, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the State's objection to that testimony. Haggerty v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2130 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 20 2007).

345. Niece's deposition testimony stating that signatures on a will "looked different" merely amounted to a conclusory assertion since it did not establish her familiarity with her aunt's signature; therefore, her testimony was not rationally based on her perception under Tex. R. Evid. 701; as such, there was not a scintilla of evidence of a forgery based on this evidence in a case where a will was prima facie valid under Tex. Prob. Code Ann. § 84(a). In re Estate of Price, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11043 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 20 2006).

346. Defendant's contention that the trial court erred by admitting the officer's testimony that, in his opinion, defendant intentionally or knowingly possessed marijuana was rejected because the trial court could have concluded that the State satisfied the perception requirement of Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the officer had personal knowledge of the events that formed the basis of his opinion, as he was the investigating and arresting officer; the trial court also could have properly found that the officer's opinion was helpful because the issue to be determined was whether the marijuana belonged to defendant or the driver, as neither admitted ownership. Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6303 (Tex. App. Dallas July 20 2006).

347. Employer failed to preserve his claims of error for appeal regarding the trial court's admission of the employee's opinion testimony in the employee's age discrimination action because the employer failed to make a timely, specific objection at trial to the employee's testimony on the ground that it was speculation; even if the employer had raised a timely and proper objection, Tex. R. Evid. 701 provided that the opinion of a lay witness was admissible if based on his perceptions, and the comment in issue was rationally based on the employee's perception. Quality Dialysis, Inc. v. Adams, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4921 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 8 2006).

348. In a possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver case, as the substance of an officer's testimony related to opinions, beliefs, or inferences drawn from his own experiences and observation, and as the testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701, the State was not required to disclose the officer as an expert under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 39.14(b); as such, the trial court did not err by admitting the officer's testimony that had not been disclosed in response to a discovery request. Cortez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4998 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 8 2006).

349. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 701, a police officer's testimony that a 14-year old girl did not fit the profile of a prostitute was admissible in an inmate's trial on charges of kidnapping where (1) the officer had extensive experience in the child exploitation unit; and (2) the inmate's attorney made an issue of whether the girl was a prostitute, thereby entitling the state to ask the officer's opinion on the issue, in light of his training, experience, and knowledge of the girl. Jordan v. Dretke, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31950 (N.D. Tex. May 22 2006).

350. Court rejected defendant's claim that a witness's testimony expressed an opinion of defendant's state of mind as to whether defendant deliberately drove into the officer, in defendant's murder trial, as the witness was not asked whether defendant intended to strike the officer, but whether the swerve appeared to be a deliberate action, which called for a response based on the witness's observation of the vehicle's movements, and the trial court could have found the question was not an attempt to communicate defendant's actual mental state. Davis v. State, 223 S.W.3d 466, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3882 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

351. In a theft case, a court properly admitted the testimony of loss prevention officers regarding whether defendant intended to deprive the store of its property because they both saw defendant's actions in the store before, during, and after she exchanged the store's property for a gift card. Hines v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3256 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 13 2006).

352. In a theft case, a court properly admitted the testimony of loss prevention officers regarding whether defendant intended to deprive the store of its property because they both saw defendant's actions in the store before, during, and after she exchanged the store's property for a gift card. Hines v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3256 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 13 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Opinion Testimony : Rational Basis

353. Non-expert witness may offer opinion testimony when it was rationally based on his perception and helpful to a clear understanding of his testimony or the determination of a fact issue. City of San Antonio Bd. of Adjustment v. Reilly, 429 S.W.3d 707, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2988 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 19 2014).

354. In the course of an investigation, a supervisor reviewed documents, and her testimony in that regard was rationally based on the search she performed during her investigation, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701(a); as a reasonable person could have drawn the same conclusions and the testimony helped the jury in determining a fact in issue, the trial court had discretion to consider the witness as a lay witness as to the documents she had reviewed, and counsel was not deemed ineffective. In re R.L.A., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2745, 2013 WL 1092210 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 15 2013).

355. Exclusion of testimony did not result in reversible error, as there was no evidence that the witness had any first-hand knowledge, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, of appellant's health condition and the trial court did not err in sustaining the hearsay objection; although some of the proffered testimony was not hearsay and consisted of the witness's observations and inferences, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701, even that was cumulative, and thus the excluded testimony could not have added anything to the admitted evidence. Frangias v. State, 367 S.W.3d 806, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3065, 2012 WL 1356704 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 19 2012).

356. Portion of police officer's testimony that the complainant "had just had the crap beaten out of her" was admissible as a lay opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and, therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting this objected-to testimony. James v. State, 335 S.W.3d 719, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1004 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 10 2011).

357. Defense counsel did not object on the basis of qualifications or reliability and he did not ask to voir dire the witness or have the trial court conduct a Daubert/Kelly hearing, and thus appellant preserved no error for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; the court noted that a lay opinion could be offered under Tex. R. Evid. 701 if the opinion was rationally based on his perceptions and helpful to the understanding of the testimony. Livingston v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5512, 2010 WL 2783911 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 15 2010).

358. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing a detective to testify that the mark he saw on the victim's neck was consistent with and could have been caused by the barrel of a rifle; that testimony, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701, was rationally based on his perception and was helpful to an understanding of a fact in issue, whether a firearm was used in the aggravated robbery offense. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3126, 2010 WL 1713026 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 29 2010).

359. That a witness might have expressed an opinion regarding the purpose or nature of the victim's brother's conversation with the victim was of no moment; although the witness could not possess personal knowledge of the mental state of the brother, she had personal knowledge of facts from which an opinion regarding the purpose of his conversation could be drawn. Cockrell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3208, 2010 WL 1705538 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 28 2010).

360. Witness overheard a conversation between the child victim and her brother; given the circumstances, the trial court could have found that the witness's opinion regarding the emotional undercurrent of the conversation was rationally based on her hearing perception, and the witness's opinion was relevant to help the jury's credibility determination regarding prior testimony by the brother. Cockrell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3208, 2010 WL 1705538 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 28 2010).

361. Court did not err in determining that a trooper's description of defendant as "psychotic" was inadmissible as evidence of defendant's mental state because the trooper testified outside the presence of the jury that he used the word "psychotic" not due to personal knowledge about defendant's mental state, but instead based on "interviews with other people." Because the record showed that the trooper lacked firsthand knowledge, he was not qualified as a lay witness to testify that defendant was psychotic. Fisher-Riza v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9769, 2009 WL 4358622 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

362. In defendant's drug case, evidence was admissible as a lay opinion because the record reflected that the witness actually withdrew the liquid from the tank and, based upon his previous experience and his own sense of sight and smell, knew the liquid to be anhydrous ammonia. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8078, 2009 WL 3335282 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 16 2009).

363. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 in defendant's trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.11(a)(2); an officer made it clear that he was not testifying as an expert and he explained what he had learned about his chances of developing HIV or AIDS in the years following defendant's spitting in his face. Campbell v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5369, 2009 WL 2025344 (Tex. App. Dallas July 14 2009).

364. Court properly allowed a witness to testify as to the "sense" she had that a weapon was in the vehicle occupied by defendant on the evening prior to the robbery because the testimony was nothing more than the witness's opinion as to whether a weapon was present, rationally based upon her auditory perception. Davey Enriquez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5183 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 7 2009).

365. In a products liability case, portions of a husband's affidavit relating to the structural integrity of a portable picnic table were properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because he did not observe an accident that occurred; however, other portions of the affidavit were rationally based on his observations and experiences. Lyon v. Atico Int'l USA, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4823, 2009 WL 1800820 (Tex. App. Waco June 24 2009).

366. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a police officer's testimony concerning the automobile accident into evidence because his testimony was rationally based on his perception of the scene of the wreck and was helpful to a clear understanding of his limited testimony; his opinion testimony was based on the premise that the skid marks, damage to the roadway, and debris field would all be arrayed in a consistent or predictable way around the situs of the wreck. To the extent that the officer's testimony may have crossed over into giving an opinion based on his specialized knowledge and therefore was expert testimony, any error was harmless, as he did not profess to have more training and experience than he had and his conclusions were reiterated by two experts. Brown v. State, 303 S.W.3d 310, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2166 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 31 2009).

367. Lay testimony on the value of furniture was admissible in a suit on a sworn account because the witness' statements were rationally based on his perceptions and helpful to a clear understanding of his testimony. Hartis v. Century Furniture Indus., 230 S.W.3d 723, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4997, 63 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. 2d (CBC) 282 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Personal Knowledge

368. At defendant's trial for possession of cocaine with intent to deliver, a detective testified that defendant and two other people had responsibility for and possession of cocaine found in the hotel room; counsel was not ineffective for failure to object because the testimony was admissible as a lay opinion. The detective's personal knowledge of the matter formed the basis of his objective perception of events and his lay opinion testimony regarding the people in the motel room. Fletcher v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 940, 2014 WL 354508 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 30 2014).

369. In a case in which a trial court found that a mineral lienholder's decision to pump the contents of its rented frac tank back down the well that was the subject of the lien did not result in damages, although the lienholder and the contractor that had requested its services testified as lay witnesses, their testimony was admissible to establish the physical characteristics of the contents of the frac tank. Seven N. Holdings, L.P. v. Mathis & Sons, Inc., 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 835, 2014 WL 272462 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 24 2014).

370. In a case in which a trial court found that a mineral lienholder's decision to pump the contents of its rented frac tank back down the well that was the subject of the lien did not result in damages, although the lienholder and the contractor that had requested its services testified as lay witnesses, their testimony was admissible to establish the physical characteristics of the contents of the frac tank. Seven N. Holdings, L.P. v. Mathis & Sons, Inc., 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 835, 2014 WL 272462 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 24 2014).

371. Witness's testimony that he assumed he was in jail because of a shooting committed by defendant was within his personal knowledge, rationally based on his perception of events and experiences, including questioning of him by police about a firearm, was helpful to a clear understanding of his testimony. His testimony was therefore admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 602 and Tex. R. Evid. 701. Williams v. State, 402 S.W.3d 425, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7031 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 11 2013).

372. Even though the trial court erred by admitting into evidence an animation that purportedly reconstructed the events surrounding the shooting, because nothing in the record supported many of the details contained in the animation and the details were provided by nothing more than pure speculation on the creator's part, the error was harmless. The crux of the case against defendant was linking him to the conspiracy to get the informant, and two witness testified that defendant entered into an agreement with others to retaliate against an informant for giving police information that led to a friend's arrest; the animation did little to answer that question. Derrick v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4843 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 17 2013).

373. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a detective to express his belief about how individuals who abuse children target their victims. The witness had extensive practical experience and personal knowledge as a child abuse detective working on hundreds of cases; therefore, his lay opinion testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Guerrero v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8879, 2012 WL 5258700 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 25 2012).

374. At the punishment phase of a criminal mischief trial, it was proper to admit testimony from the new husband of defendant's ex-wife regarding defendant's attempt to hit his ex-wife with his car because, contrary to defendant's argument, there was evidence that the new husband had personal knowledge of the incident. Moreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6018, 2012 WL 3025932 (Tex. App. El Paso July 25 2012).

375. In a murder trial, a witness was not allowed to speculate as to whether defendant and the complainant were arguing because she stated that she saw and heard the two arguing about whether defendant was supposed to give the complainant some money for her daughter. The witness's uncertainty seemed to have been about whether defendant actually owed the money, not whether they were arguing about the debt. Benard v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3928, 2012 WL 1795131 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 16 2012).

376. Lender's officer was not qualified to testify as to the value of the property because he was not an expert, and he did not qualify under the Property Owner Rule because his opinion was based on sources of information other than his own personal knowledge and familiarity, which were required under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Preston Reserve, L.L.C. v. Compass Bank, 373 S.W.3d 652, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3151, 2012 WL 1564014 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 24 2012).

377. Trial court did not err in excluding the testimony of a tenant's general partner; the tenant's counsel, in his offer of proof, gave no explanation for the basis of the partner's opinions and whether he had personal knowledge on the cost of damages or repairs, nothing in the bill of exception indicated such personal knowledge, and the partner agreed several times that he lacked personal knowledge about the work done at the leased property. Lone Starr Multi-Theatres, Ltd. v. Max Interests, Ltd., 365 S.W.3d 688, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10210, 2011 WL 6938527 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 29 2011).

378. In condemnation proceedings, an affidavit of the vice president of the corporate general partner of a limited partnership was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 701 regarding the valuation of the property to be take for a water line easement because his opinion was based on his expertise rather than his personal familiarity with the property and he was not timely disclosed as an expert. Reid Rd. Mun. Util. Dist. No. 2 v. Speedy Stop Food Stores, Ltd., 337 S.W.3d 846, 2011 Tex. LEXIS 190, 54 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 658 (Tex. 2011).

379. Deputy's testimony that the presence and degree of lividity indicated death had occurred over an hour before he first observed the victim's body was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because it was based on first-hand knowledge and under Tex. R. Evid. 702 based on his training and experience, which included his 11 years as a crime-scene investigator, during which he had amassed extensive training and experience; the classes conducted by physicians in the county medical examiner's office in which instruction was provided on the approximate times for lividity and rigor mortis to set in on a corpse; medical conferences he attended regularly in which information was provided on lividity as a beginning stage of decomposition; and the fact that he had seen hundreds of homicide victims. Thompson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1633, 2011 WL 782051 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 8 2011).

380. Portion of police officer's testimony that the complainant "had just had the crap beaten out of her" was admissible as a lay opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and, therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting this objected-to testimony. James v. State, 335 S.W.3d 719, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1004 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 10 2011).

381. Trial court properly overruled defendant's objection to a witness's testimony that he believed the victim would be killed or at least taken to a place where he would not be found, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701. Kirven v. State, 293 S.W.3d 233, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3338 (Tex. App. Waco May 13 2009).

382. In a driving while intoxicated case, testimony from defendant's mother on the issue of whether defendant was intoxicated was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the mother did not personally observe a traffic stop or defendant's interaction with an arresting officer; the mother did not acquire personal knowledge at the time of the event. Because the testimony was not relevant, defendant's argument that her due process right to present a complete defense was violated was not addressed. Hartin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2765, 2009 WL 1076799 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2009).

383. In a driving while intoxicated case, there was no error in excluding testimony from defendant's mother regarding why defendant refused to cooperate with an arresting officer due to the mother's lack of personal knowledge. Even though the mother had knowledge of some past events concerning defendant that might have explained defendant's behavior, the mother was not present for the arrest. Hartin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2765, 2009 WL 1076799 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2009).

384. Officer was properly allowed to testify about the purpose of altering a shotgun to create a sawed-off shotgun because she had dealt with sawed-off shotguns on the firing range and in the field when investigating crimes, and because of her personal observations on the firing range and in the field, she was qualified to offer a lay opinion on the result of altering a shotgun. The question sought an explanation of what would be accomplished by sawing off the barrel of a shotgun, and the question was specifically limited to the officer's experience. Shelton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1802, 2009 WL 672011 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 12 2009).

385. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court properly allowed an officer to testify about whether a rock or similar object was capable of causing serious bodily injury or death because, although the officer did not have any personal knowledge of the specific object that was used in the commission of the crime, he testified that he had been a police officer for approximately five-and-a-half years, and the officer saw the victim's wounds before they were treated. In re B. P. S., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6028 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 6 2008).

386. In a possession of a prohibited substance in a correctional facility case, defendant alleged that he gave false testimony at his cell mate's trial because he was coerced by gang members, but his cell mate did not testify that he had personal knowledge of the gang members at the correctional facility actually following the gang's rules to protect other gang members from prosecution; therefore, the cell mate's opinion testimony was not based on his perceptions; rather, the cell mate's opinion testimony was based on his speculative conclusions regarding what the gang members would have done to protect him from prosecution; accordingly, Tex. R. Evid. 701 was not met by the cell mate's testimony, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the State's objection to that testimony. Haggerty v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2130 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 20 2007).

387. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, an officer was properly allowed to testify as to the administration of a one-leg stand test because the evidence related to nonscientific evidence and was admissible as lay opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701; the testimony was not subject to the criteria of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Ultimate Issue

388. Trial court erred in allowing the detective in charge of defendant's murder and aggravated assault case to give her opinion on defendant's mental state in response to a question of why she obtained a warrant where the detective's interpretation and opinion regarding defendant's mental state were not an interpretation of her objective perception of events because she was not present at the scene at the time of the incident and had no personal knowledge concerning the event and the veracity of any witness. However, the trial court's error did not influence the jury or had but a slight effect because the detective stated what was obvious to the jury from all the testimony, which was that the shooting was not accidental or unintentional, and, setting aside the detective's testimony, there was compelling evidence of defendant's guilt. Saldana v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1709, 2011 WL 846095 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 10 2011).

389. In a murder case involving a sudden passion defense, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 701, in allowing lay testimony that the witness had not seen anything that justified defendant pulling a gun on the victim; contrary to defendant's argument, the witness gave no opinion as to defendant's state of mind at the time that defendant fired several shots. Miller v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6511 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 10 2007).

390. In an interference with child custody case, although a court erred by overruling defendant's objection to an officer's testimony regarding her guilt or innocence, the error was harmless because the evidence against defendant established that she violated the child custody modification order; defendant's own testimony established that her taking possession of the child on October 24 was contrary to the terms of the modification order. Lovell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6062 (Tex. App. Tyler July 12 2006).

391. In a prosecution for aggravated assault in which defendant claimed self-defense, the arresting officer was permitted to give opinion testimony that defendant had not been attacked. Ex parte Nailor, 149 S.W.3d 125, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 518 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : General Overview

392. In a proceeding to terminate parental rights, a caseworker was properly permitted to testify as a fact witness. Contrary to the father's assertion that she expressed the "collective opinion" of the agency, she did not voice an opinion, when asked, about what was in the best interest of the children. Rogers v. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 175 S.W.3d 370, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1327 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

393. In a case involving the termination of parental rights, a licensed professional counselor was permitted to testify about the relationship of the parents as a lay witness where the permissible testimony included evidence that the parents' behavior was "childlike, argumentative, and verbally abusive," and that the parents used "humiliating words" toward each other. In re T.N., 142 S.W.3d 522, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6710 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

Pensions & Benefits Law : Governmental Employees : State Pensions

394. In the fire and police retiree heath care fund's actuarial malpractice suit against its consulting firm after funding rate's for health care costs were increased, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the firm's objections to the affidavit testimony of the two witnesses (the firefighters union president and its chief collective bargaining negotiator) offered by the fund to establish causation as it was based on their speculative conclusions regarding what the city's negotiators, the city council, and the union members would have done if the firm had recommended a higher pre-funding rate. Bd. of Trs. of the Fire & Police Retiree Health Fund v. Towers, Perrin, Forster & Crosby, Inc., 191 S.W.3d 185, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9786 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

Real Property Law : Financing : Mortgages & Other Security Instruments : Foreclosures : Deficiency Judgments

395. Lender's officer was not qualified to testify as to the value of the property because he was not an expert, and he did not qualify under the Property Owner Rule because his opinion was based on sources of information other than his own personal knowledge and familiarity, which were required under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Preston Reserve, L.L.C. v. Compass Bank, 373 S.W.3d 652, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3151, 2012 WL 1564014 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 24 2012).

Real Property Law : Property Valuation

396. In an action for a deficiency judgment by a lender against a borrower in which the trial court found an offset, a new trial was required because the trial court erred in valuing the property as of the time of trial rather than as of the time of the foreclosure as required by Tex. Prop. Code Ann. § 51.003(b), (c), and also in admitting the testimony of the borrower's majority shareholder on the issue of valuation under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Cabot Capital Corp. v. USDR, Inc., 346 S.W.3d 634, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2957 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 30 2009).

Real Property Law : Water Rights : General Overview

397. Where homeowners alleged that neighbors and company owners caused rain water to flood their house, the evidence was legally sufficient to support the jury's verdict on the homeowners' Texas Water Code claims because the homeowners did not establish as a matter of law that any impounding of diffuse surface water created as a result of the neighbors' changes to their property caused the harm the homeowners suffered; there was testimony from multiple witnesses about what actually did happen with the diffuse surface water and floodwater. Michaelski v. Wright, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6864 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 26 2014).

398. Where homeowners alleged that neighbors and company owners caused rain water to flood their house, the evidence was legally sufficient to support the jury's verdict on the homeowners' Texas Water Code claims because the homeowners did not establish as a matter of law that any impounding of diffuse surface water created as a result of the neighbors' changes to their property caused the harm the homeowners suffered; there was testimony from multiple witnesses about what actually did happen with the diffuse surface water and floodwater. Michaelski v. Wright, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6864 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 26 2014).

Real Property Law : Water Rights : Nonconsumptive Uses : Tests for Navigability

399. In neighbors' action against a landowner seeking a declaration that they had a right to access a creek and a newly-formed lake on the landowner's property after a dam was built, the trial court did not err in admitting the affidavit testimony of a survey technician as his testimony about the average width of the creek was appropriate lay witness opinion evidence; it also was clear, positive, direct, otherwise credible and consistent, and it could have been readily controverted by the landowner. Hix v. Robertson, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9378 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 18 2006).

Workers' Compensation & SSDI : Administrative Proceedings : Costs & Attorney Fees

400. Workers' compensation claimant's attorney testified that her time estimates about the work she performed on the claimant's case were based on her notes and her past experience in performing similar work; accordingly, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 701, the record contained a basis for the attorney's personal knowledge and a rational connection of that knowledge with her estimates, which allowed her to testify regarding the amount of time she spent on the claimant's case. Also, any alleged mistake made by the attorney in her calculations did not create an impermissible analytical gap between the data and the conclusions; thus, the evidence was legally sufficient to support the award of attorney's fees. Twin City Fire Ins. Co. v. Vega-Garcia, 223 S.W.3d 762, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3568 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

Workers' Compensation & SSDI : Compensability : Injuries : Intoxication

401. Where a habitual marijuana user fell from a steel structure while working, he was permitted to give his lay opinion testimony at trial that he had normal use of his mental and physical faculties at the time of his injury. The jury was entitled to believe the employee's testimony, together with the testimony about the work activities the employee successfully completed prior to his fall. Am. Interstate Ins. Co. v. Hinson, 172 S.W.3d 108, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6350 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

Tex. Evid. R. 702

THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH August 16, 2020

Rule 702 Testimony by Expert Witnesses

A witness who is qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify in the form of an opinion or otherwise if the expert's scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will help the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Business & Corporate Law : General Partnerships : Dissolution & Winding Up : Dissolution : Withdrawal

1. In a partnership dispute, a trial court did not err by awarding withdrawal damages because expert testimony was not required; the only two assets at the time of a partner's death were his capital contribution and two properties, and former Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 6132b-8.06 did not apply. Moreover, the jury could have reasonably relied upon testimony by a partner regarding the value of the properties. Sewing v. Bowman, 371 S.W.3d 321, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2438, 2012 WL 1065876 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 29 2012).

Civil Procedure : Judicial Officers : Judges : Discretion

2. Admission of expert testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702 lies within the sound discretion of a trial court and will not be set aside absent a showing of abuse of that discretion. Dziedzic v. Stephanou, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 7458 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 7 1999).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Disclosures : Mandatory Disclosures

3. Expert report submitted by a patient in his medical malpractice action arising out of a surgery that he claimed was performed on the wrong party of his body did not comply with Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351(a) where the patient had failed to establish that his expert was qualified to testify regarding the standard of care applicable to the condition involved in the underlying claim because: (1) information regarding the expert's peer review committee and director positions did not provide sufficient detail from which it could be determined that his experience on the committee and as a director was relevant to the standard of care applicable to hospital personnel in a surgical setting; (2) the expert's general reference to a three year internship/residency in surgery was not sufficient to establish that he had sufficient training and experience with regard to the procedures hospital personnel were required to follow during a surgical procedure eight years after his internship/residency ended; and (3) the patient had failed to show that the preoperative procedures hospital personnel were required to follow in a surgical setting were substantially developed in the expert's field of emergency room medicine; expert testimony was required because the nature of the patient's medical procedure and whether it resulted in the wrong part of the body being operated on were not within the common knowledge of a layperson, and, even under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, the patient was required to establish that the expert was qualified to testify regarding causation. Methodist Health Care Sys. of San Antonio, Ltd. v. Rangel, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10858 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 14 2005).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Methods : Expert Witness Discovery

4. In an action alleging nuisance, a trial court did not err by striking an untimely motion to designate an expert witness; the attempted designation was over a year after the original deadline and over two years after the filing of the suit. Moreover, there was no showing of good cause. Paselk v. Rabun, 293 S.W.3d 600, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4266 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 16 2009).

5. In a case involving a dispute over the termination of an oil and gas lease, expert testimony regarding damages was not excluded under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.6 because a good faith reason was given for a delay; the expert's calculations could not have been provided any earlier because those numbers derived from deposition testimony, and the calculations were merely updates of previously disclosed information. Even if there was an error in admitting the expert's testimony, it was not reversible error because there was other evidence to support the damage award. BP Am. Prod. Co. v. Marshall, 288 S.W.3d 430, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9778, 172 Oil & Gas Rep. 376 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2008).

6. Medical malpractice action was dismissed because an expert report filed by a plastic surgeon was insufficient since he was not able to testify about the standard of care for a pulmonologist in relation to the treatment of a burn patient; the expert report never stated that the area of pulmonology was substantially developed in the field of plastic and reconstructive surgery or that the expert had practical knowledge of what was usually done by a pulmonologist who also treated burn patients. Garcia v. Rodriguez, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7193 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 30 2007).

7. Tex. R. Civ. P. 192 prevails over Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.3(d)'s snap-back provision so long as the expert intends to testify at trial despite the inadvertent document production; that is, once privileged documents are disclosed to a testifying expert, and the party who designated the expert continues to rely upon that designation for trial, the documents may not be retrieved even if they were inadvertently produced. In re Christus Spohn Hosp. Kleberg, 222 S.W.3d 434, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 362, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 682 (Tex. 2007).

8. In a medical malpractice suit against two doctors, an internist and a cardiologist, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing a deceased patient's family from calling the internist's expert witness during their case in chief because: (1) the family should not have been prohibited from calling the internist's expert as a witness solely on the basis that he was the internist's expert; (2) the family's cross-designation of the expert was not deficient under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 or Tex. R. Civ. P. 195, as the cross-designations were reasonably prompt and included the information available to the family at the time; and (3) due to differences in qualifications and the potential for perceived bias involving testimony on controlling issues, the expert's testimony would have added substantial weight to the family's case and thus was not cumulative. Hooper v. Chittaluru, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2334 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 29, 2006).

9. In a disciplinary matter, where the Texas Commission for Lawyer Discipline properly designated an expert, and a lawyer was afforded several opportunities to depose the expert, the admission of his testimony was proper because the lawyer failed to notice the expert in a timely manner. Therefore, subjecting the Commission to sanctions in light of the untimely notice would not have been just. Onwuteaka v. Comm'n for Lawyer Discipline, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 351 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 20 2009).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Appellate Review : Standards of Review

11. Trial court properly granted manufacturers, suppliers, contractors, premises owners, and former employers' no-evidence summary judgment motion, Tex. R. Civ. P. 166a(i), because (1) although the former employees claimed that paints and other coating substances used in the construction of the power plants contained asbestos or silica, which was released into the air when the product was sprayed or when it was sanded or ground off the surface to which it had been applied, there was no expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and 705(c) that spraying, sanding, or grinding a liquid paint or coating produced friable asbestos fibers likely to cause asbestosis; and (2) although the type of silica that caused silicosis was crystalline silica, the evidence showed that the products in the employees' case contained amorphous silica and there was no evidence that amorphous silica caused silicosis or that grinding and sanding the paint and coatings released a form of silica that was capable of causing injury; thus, the employees never proved an exposure to a form of asbestos or silica that would cause injury and the employees failed to meet their initial burden of showing that they were exposed to asbestos and/or silica in a form that was capable of causing injury from manufacturers, suppliers, contractors, premises owners, and former employers' products. In re ROC Pretrial, 131 S.W.3d 129, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 315 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Burdens of Production & Proof : General Overview

12. Trial court did not err in excluding an insured's sole damages expert, and then granting insurers' no-evidence motion, where the expert's opinion was not based upon a reliable foundation and was irrelevant; in part, certain forecasts used by the expert as his basis for calculating business income loss were significantly flawed and the expert did not consider any causes, such as the economy, other than the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Wyndham Int'l, Inc. v. Ace Am. Ins. Co., 186 S.W.3d 682, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1921 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

13. Where the patient failed to establish causation testimony through expert testimony that linked his full thickness skin loss with the therapist's application of moist heat packs during physical therapy, the trial court did not err by granting the therapist summary judgment on both traditional and no evidence grounds. Reyes v. Jebo's, Inc., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3344 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 4 2005).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Evidence

14. Statements in a proof of loss form relating to the date of hail damage were competent summary judgment evidence because they constituted admissions under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2). Even if the statements in the proof of loss form were not binding or conclusive, they were considered prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein; moreover, expert testimony was not required on the issue of whether hail occurred on a certain date and caused property damage. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Lynd Co., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3206, 2012 WL 1430541 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 25 2012).

15. In a toxic tort case filed by several apartment complex residents, summary judgment was properly granted on the issue of personal injury because the expert testimony of two doctors did not sufficiently show causation; one doctor ultimately opined only that there was "a possibility" of a causal connection between the contaminant exposure alleged and the residents' claimed symptoms, and he conceded he had drawn no further conclusions because he had not evaluated the residents. A second doctor also stated during a deposition that he had not examined any of the residents subject to the trial court's summary judgment, and he was unable to file an affidavit to contradict deposition testimony merely to raise a fact issue for purposes of summary judgment; even if the affidavit was considered, it did no more than provide evidence that the type of mold found at the apartment complex was generally capable of causing health problems, it was not evidence of cause-in-fact of any specific resident's health complaints, and it was conclusory. Plunkett v. Conn. Gen. Life Ins. Co., 285 S.W.3d 106, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1405 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 27 2009).

16. Equipment maintenance company's no-evidence motion for summary judgment was properly granted pursuant to Tex. R. Civ. P. 166a on the TrackMobile equipment operator's negligence clam because the operator failed to present the required expert testimony about the proper inspection and maintenance of the TrackMobile and if the company's conduct met that standard of care; expert testimony was required as provided in Tex. R. Evid. 702 because a maintenance company's practices and procedures and industry standards with respect to the inspection and maintenance of a TrackMobile or other rail-car mover engine were not matters within a lay person's general knowledge. Simmons v. Briggs Equip. Trust, 221 S.W.3d 109, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5647 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Motions for Summary Judgment : General Overview

17. There is no authority to support an argument that normal expert reliability standards do not apply in a summary judgment proceeding. Therefore, an appellate court looked to these standards in assessing whether or not summary judgment should have been granted in a toxic tort case on the issues of property damage and personal injury. Plunkett v. Conn. Gen. Life Ins. Co., 285 S.W.3d 106, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1405 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 27 2009).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Opposition : Supporting Materials

18. On a no-evidence motion for summary judgment, an expert affidavit stating that a tenant's injury was caused by a particular dangerous condition of which the landlord knew or should have known should not have been stricken as conclusory because its conclusions were supported by scientific observations. Gillenwater v. Fort Brown Villas, III, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7145 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2007).

19. In a legal malpractice case, an expert affidavit was not found to be admissible where it failed to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Civ. P. 166a because it was not based on personal knowledge, it was unsworn, and it only indicated competency by allusion to another unsworn document. Twist v. Garcia, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7187 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 30 2007).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Standards : General Overview

20. In a case alleging improper ventilation of a building, summary judgment was properly granted in favor of a company, its owners, and its managers because the medical evidence offered by an injured party was stricken based on a failure to show causation; there was insufficient epidemiological data to support causation of neurotoxicity under the six applicable reliability factors analyzed by the trial court, and the evidence showed an "analytical gap" because the experts' experience and training, the diagnostic tests, and the medical literature that served as a basis for their medical opinions did not provide any evidence of causation. Feria v. Dynagraphics Co., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2366 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 15 2004).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Supporting Materials : General Overview

21. Trial court did not err in granting summary judgment to doctors in a medical malpractice suit where the court sustained the objections to the patient's expert's affidavit at the hearing because the expert's affidavit failed to state any knowledge that she possessed on the standard of care applicable to hospitals in cancer diagnosis. Shelton v. Sargent, 144 S.W.3d 113, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6116 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

22. Trial court did not err in granting summary judgment to doctors in a medical malpractice suit where the court sustained the objections to the patient's expert's affidavit at the hearing because while the affidavit opined that the radiologist should have retaken x-ray films of the hook wire localization and should have followed up with the other medical care providers on the negative pathology report, the record was devoid of any indication that the expert possessed any expertise or training in the field of radiology that would have qualified her to make those opinions. Shelton v. Sargent, 144 S.W.3d 113, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6116 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

23. Trial court did not err in granting summary judgment to doctors in a medical malpractice suit where the court had sustained the objections to the patient's expert's affidavit at the hearing where the expert failed to state facts or studies to support her conclusion that the patient would have avoided a mastectomy with a follow-up mammogram; thus, the affidavit lacked foundation and was conclusory. Shelton v. Sargent, 144 S.W.3d 113, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6116 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

24. Affidavits of expert witnesses offered in support of homeowners' motion against summary judgment in an action seeking losses for a house fire failed to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, 702, and 703, as the testimony was a pyramid of inferences lacking probative force because it was based on assumed facts that varied from the actual undisputed facts. Rayon v. Energy Specialties, Inc., 121 S.W.3d 7, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9160 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Supporting Materials : Affidavits

25. In a personal injury action in which appellee truck driver pleaded a claim for negligent hiring against appellant foreign corporation by alleging that it hired a Texas corporation to deliver products to Texas when appellant retained control over the Texas corporation and knew or should have known that the Texas corporation employed an incompetent driver, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling appellant's objection to an affidavit and expert report drafted by a transportation expert for appellee where appellant had neither assailed the expert's scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge nor challenged whether his testimony was relevant and based on a reliable foundation. Furthermore, although appellant pointed the reviewing court to authority pertaining to affidavits in a summary judgment context, it did not explain why expert reports tendered at a special appearance hearing should have been held to the same standard as an affidavit presented at a summary judgment hearing. Ltd. Logistics Servs. v. Villegas, 268 S.W.3d 141, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6536 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

26. Mental soundness was within common knowledge and did not require proof by expert testimony. In re Estate of Mask, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5439 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 23 2008).

27. Objection to an affidavit in support of summary judgment was properly overruled in a case involving business disparagement, tortious interference, and false advertising between competitors because the affiant was qualified to testify as an expert regarding the quality of materials used by one of the parties to manufacture utility bodies since he had been in the industry at issue for 36 years, and the average person was unfamiliar with the types and quality of such materials. A v. B, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3311 (Tex. App. 2007).

Civil Procedure : Trials : Judgment as Matter of Law : Judgments Notwithstanding Verdicts

28. In a valuation dispute relating to the taxation of furniture, fixtures, and equipment under Tex. Tax Code Ann. § 1.04(7), even if the testimony of an expert regarding market value was considered, a jury's findings were not supported by the evidence because they were outside of the range given by the experts; therefore, a judgment notwithstanding the verdict (JNOV) should have been granted; moreover, a no-evidence issue was preserved for review by the filing of a JNOV request. Harris County Appraisal Dist. v. Sigmor Corp., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2456 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 3 2008).

Civil Procedure : Trials : Jury Trials : Province of Court & Jury

29. In a case alleging fraud in relation to the sale of certain assets, an appellate court did not have to decide the evidentiary value of the actual sales price because other evidence in the record was sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict. The jury was free to accept a former husband's expert, who testified about value and criticized the underpinnings of another expert's opinions; a former wife and a company did not satisfy their burden of showing that the assets were worth more than a one million dollar sales price. Coates v. Coates, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1790, 2009 WL 679592 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 17 2009).

Civil Procedure : Remedies : Costs & Attorney Fees : Attorney Expenses & Fees : General Overview

30. In an action for breach of a maintenance contract, the evidence was sufficient to support an attorney fee award because the contractor's expert on fees demonstrated that he was qualified by knowledge, skill, experience, training, and education to provide specialized testimony to assist the jury in understanding the evidence regarding attorney fees. United Plaza-Midland, L.L.C. v. First Serv. Air Conditioning Contractors, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10027 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 20 2007).

Civil Procedure : Remedies : Damages : General Overview

31. Take nothing judgment was properly entered against a contractor because, even if a trial court incorrectly determined that the contractor was unable to assert his breach-of-implied-warranty cause of action, there was no evidence of damages since the contractor had not paid to replace a defective floor and did not show that he would do so in the future; moreover, he was unable to show that the cost of an expert witness was recoverable. Even if the contractor had attached evidence of payment to his motion or supporting brief, he did not present the evidence before judgment was rendered; moreover, he did not request the trial court to reopen the evidence, or grant a new trial based on newly discovered evidence. Hammer v. Wood, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6632, 2009 WL 2589432 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 25 2009).

32. Court erred by admitting an expert's report on damages to a home caused by water because the damage estimate wholly relied on another expert's report that should not have been admitted, and the expert had not checked to see if the prices he quoted in his report were usual and customary for Johnson County. State Farm Lloyds v. Blacklock, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7433 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 7 2005).

Civil Procedure : Remedies : Damages : Compensatory Damages

33. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence the testimony of the contractor's expert witness because his testimony did not include the criticized "as-release method" for calculating damages, but rather was limited to the valuation of the work the contractor performed; the expert's testimony regarding the calculation of the reasonable value of the work performed by the contractor was objectively verifiable and was based on unit pricing and quantities and utilized standard estimating techniques. Formosa Plastics Corp., USA v. Kajima Int'l, Inc., 216 S.W.3d 436, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11098 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

Civil Procedure : Remedies : Writs : General Overview

34. Motorists were not entitled to mandamus relief after the trial court limited testimony of their expert witness in a personal injury action brought against the motorists for damages arising from a collision between a motor vehicle and a motorcycle. The trial court's order circumscribed the expert's testimony but did not prevent the expert from testifying or prevent the motorists from presenting other evidence or testimony concerning the accident. In re Pena, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3663 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 12 2005).

Civil Procedure : Remedies : Writs : Common Law Writs : Mandamus

35. In a suit for personal injury and underinsured motorist coverage, the trial court excluded the testimony of a defense expert based on a determination that the expert's report did not meet the reliability requirements of this rule; because the insurance company had an adequate remedy by appeal, mandamus review was not available. In re Farmers Tex. County Mut. Ins. Co., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15350, 2013 WL 6730094 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 20 2013).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review

36. At the proceeding to commit appellant as a sexually violent predator, his counsel did not object that an expert's testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 02 because it commented on appellant's credibility; therefore, the alleged error was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. In re Commitment of Petrus, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4686, 2012 WL 2150336 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 14 2012).

37. Decedent's wife failed to preserve any error on the admission of the deputy's testimony because she affirmatively stated that she had no other objection to the report, and thereby waived her objection to the deputy's point-of-impact opinion in the police report based on Tex. R. Evid. 702; the deputy's testimony became cumulative of other evidence in the case. Austin v. Weems, 337 S.W.3d 415, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4166 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 24 2011).

38. In a dispute over the valuation of oil and gas interests, an objector preserved a complaint for review about the testimony of a professional appraiser because the argument was that the testimony was conclusory on its face. In this circumstance, the objector was challenging the legal sufficiency of the evidence, even in the absence of any objection to its admissibility. Averitt v. Caudle, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2284, 2009 WL 891034 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 2 2009).

39. In a products liability case, where a retailer failed to raise a scientific reliability challenge to an expert's testimony before a trial court, it was waived on review. However, a challenge that the testimony was speculative and conclusory could have been raised for the first time on appeal. Merrell v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 276 S.W.3d 117, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 414 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 23 2009).

40. In a divorce case, a former husband did not preserve an error relating to the admissibility of expert testimony because the record reflected that the husband lodged no admissibility objections to the testimony assessing the value of the estates, characterizing community assets and separate property, and assessing a former wife's reimbursement claims. As to his complaint about the weight given to the testimony, this was for the trier of fact to decide. Sharma v. Routh, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9737 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 31 2008).

41. In a case alleging breach of fiduciary duty, negligence, and negligence misrepresentation, a jury did not err in its calculation of the comparative responsibility of various underwriters because an expert's testimony was not speculative on the face of the record with regards to what would have been discussed had the underwriters contacted an insurance agency regarding a discrepancy in an insurance application, even though the testimony could have been clearer; preservation of this error was not an issue because no objection in the trial court was required to assert such an error. Moreover, to the extent that a few of the expert's statements indicated that he was not testifying as to what a person of ordinary prudence would do or not do under the same or similar circumstances as existed with respect to the underwriters, the jury, as factfinder, was free to disregard these statements. Underwriters at Lloyds Subscribing to Policy Nos. MDJ03/L075 & MDJ03/Z0165 v. Edmond & Stephens Ins. Agency, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9730 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 30 2008).

42. In a case alleging breach of fiduciary duty, negligence, and negligence misrepresentation, various underwriters preserved an error relating to an expert's qualifications by raising an objection in the trial court; however, the expert was not required to have experience underwriting under certain manuals and contracts. As to another error based on the expert's methodology, it was not preserved because no objection was made before the trial court. Underwriters at Lloyds Subscribing to Policy Nos. MDJ03/L075 & MDJ03/Z0165 v. Edmond & Stephens Ins.

Agency, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9730 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 30 2008).

43. In a case where a mother was seeking to regain property from her daughter, although the mother did not entirely waive her request for sanctions for failure to have a hearing or obtain a ruling, she waived any complaint concerning the designation of experts for failure to timely raise the issue before a trial court. Delahoussaye v. Kana, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 13 2008).

44. In a child custody proceeding, a father's complaint about an expert's testimony was not preserved for review because the father failed to object to the expert's testimony until after she testified on direct examination, and she had been cross-examined. In re D.C.M., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6774 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 9, 2008), overld in part, Tucker v. Thomas, 405 S.W.3d 694, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9991 (Tex. App.--Houston [14th Dist.] 2011, pet. granted).

45. In a case where an insurer was seeking to recover damages to a car, a driver failed to preserve error relating to a contention that unqualified expert testimony was presented in an attachment to an affidavit; no objection was lodged, and the filing of motions for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and a directed verdict did not preserve error either because the objection should have been lodged when the exhibit was offered into evidence. Adams v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 264 S.W.3d 424, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6486 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

46. Objection based on the qualifications of an expert witness and the foundation for such testimony was not made at trial; therefore, the issue was not preserved for appellate review. Halverson v. Podlewski, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8814 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 11 2006).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion

47. In a wrongful death and survival action filed by the decedent's daughters against the healthcare providers, the daughters' expert's opinions as to the negligence of the nursing home, because it failed to give an antibiotic that had been prescribed for a urinary tract infection, to maintain accurate information in nursing home records, and to communicate that information to hospital personnel upon transfer of a patient to the hospital, was based on the expert's experience as a director of a nursing home and additionally, in regards to the decedent's cause of death, the expert relied on the expert's medical training and general experience treating patients; thus, there was nothing to indicate that the expert's opinions required an expertise peculiar to the fields of cardiology or urology and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the expert to testify pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702. Cresthaven Nursing Residence v. Freeman, 134 S.W.3d 214, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1187 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2003).

48. Admission of expert testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702 lies within the sound discretion of a trial court and will not be set aside absent a showing of abuse of that discretion. Dziedzic v. Stephanou, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 7458 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 7 1999).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : De Novo Review

49. Trial court's determination regarding whether expert testimony is necessary to establish negligence should be reviewed de novo. FFE Transp. Servs. v. Fulgham, 154 S.W.3d 84, 2004 Tex. LEXIS 1422, 48 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 267, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17246 (Tex. 2004).

50. In determining whether expert testimony is reliable and, therefore, some evidence supporting the judgment, the appellate court must employ an almost de novo-like review and, like the trial court, look beyond the expert's bare testimony to determine the reliability of the theory underlying it. The court does not focus on the correctness of the expert's opinion, but on the reliability of the analysis the expert used in reaching his or her conclusions. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

51. In a medical negligence action, any error in excluding an expert's testimony as to when a patient developed a tumor was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a) because the excluded evidence would not have been sufficient to prove that the alleged failure to diagnose prevented the patient from considering treatment options other than radical mastectomy. Reyna v. Maldonado, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8694 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 20 2005).

52. In a product liability action against the manufacturer of a rifle barrel that exploded, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that testimony by a metallurgy expert, who also described himself as an "amateur gunsmith," was reliable as to opinions on gun design. Testimony as to defects in the steel was not proper from an engineering expert, but that testimony was cumulative and therefore the error was harmless. Olympic Arms, Inc. v. Green, 176 S.W.3d 567, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11825, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17247, 55 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. 2d (CBC) 575 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

53. Appellant waived his right to appeal issues raised by the qualifications and testimony of an expert witness because the appellant elicited the testimony at issue. Gill v. Slovak, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11544 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 22 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8876 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 27, 2005).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Harmless Error Rule

54. Any error by determining the drug test results were admissible was harmless, because the father's testimony was admitted without objection, when the content of the testimony was cumulative of the drug test results the father argued were inappropriately admitted. D.O.H. v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6685, 2011 WL 3684568 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 23 2011).

55. Even though the trial court erred by admitting the testimony of a trooper concerning the causation of the accident, as his testimony contained opinions and he did not qualify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the error was harmless because his conclusion that the bus driver was not at fault was cumulative of other evidence. The driver's other expert witness provided testimony consistent with the trooper's conclusions, testified in much greater detail, length, and depth than the trooper, and explained the methods he used and the calculations he made. Lopez-juarez v. Kelly, 348 S.W.3d 10, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6446 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2011).

56. Expert's testimony about duties that an attorney might owe to an opposing party was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because an attorney's duties were not within the jurors' understanding as laypersons; moreover, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1) because the jury was asked to decide whether the attorney had notice that he was paid from converted funds, not whether he had a duty to the rightful owner of the funds. Great Western Drilling, Ltd. v. Alexander, 305 S.W.3d 688, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7853 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 8 2009).

57. In a negligence case arising from a fire at a condominium complex, speculative testimony regarding the adequacy of plumbing work was irrelevant and inadmissible and no showing of expert qualifications was made under Tex. R. Evid. 702; however, the trial court's error in admitting the testimony was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44. Richmond Condos. v. Skipworth Commer. Plumbing, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5977 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 26 2007).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Reversible Errors

58. In a case involving a dispute over the termination of an oil and gas lease, expert testimony regarding damages was not excluded under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.6 because a good faith reason was given for a delay; the expert's calculations could not have been provided any earlier because those numbers derived from deposition testimony, and the calculations were merely updates of previously disclosed information. Even if there was an error in admitting the expert's testimony, it was not reversible error because there was other evidence to support the damage award. BP Am. Prod. Co. v. Marshall, 288 S.W.3d 430, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9778, 172 Oil & Gas Rep. 376 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2008).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Substantial Evidence : General Overview

59. When a challenge to an expert's testimony is restricted to the face of the record, and is not a challenge that requires a court to evaluate the underlying methodology, technique, or foundational data used by the expert, a legal sufficiency challenge can be lodged in the absence of any objection to the evidence. Coastal Transp. Co. v. Crown Cent. Petroleum Corp., 136 S.W.3d 227, 2004 Tex. LEXIS 441, 47 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 559 (Tex. 2004).

Civil Procedure : Eminent Domain Proceedings : Experts

60. Trial court did not err in a condemnation case in which the jury found the fair value of the property owner's land to be $250,000 in admitting the testimony of the State's expert appraiser where there were no gaps in the testimony of the appraiser or misapplication of legal rules such that her testimony could have been found to have been unreliable because the appraiser had formed her opinion by comparing the difference between the results of two methods of valuing the property: the cost approach, giving a value of $217,000, and the improved sales comparison approach that gave a value of $205,000. The property owner had not shown that the appraiser could not make valid comparisons for size, and the evidence permitted the conclusion that the owner's entire property was devoted to single-family use and that the applicable zoning ordinance would have allowed the existing use to continue. Williams v. State, 406 S.W.3d 273, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7405 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 19 2013).

61. Engineer's testimony about restrictions on construction across a pipeline easement and difficulties that the restrictions could cause in developing the remainder property was admissible because it was not based on speculative or hypothetical uses and did not focus on impaired vehicle access. Moreover, the owners' damages theory and the engineer's testimony did not focus on impaired vehicle access to the property, which would not have been compensable in a condemnation proceeding. Crosstex Dc Gathering Co., J.V. v. Button, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 683 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 24 2013).

62. In an eminent domain proceeding in which a land planner designated as an expert by the owner testified that the owner could not achieve full compliance with the town's zoning ordinances after the State's condemnation and that the owner would be required to demolish all of its buildings, the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the land planner's opinion about the allegedly required demolition of the owner's buildings because his opinion was impermissibly speculative and conjectural. Reversal was required because there was a reasonable probability that the inadmissible evidence that characterized the demolition of the owner's buildings as a certainty, rather than a market-affecting factor, improperly influenced the jury's verdict on remainder damages. State v. Little Elm Plaza, Ltd., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8880 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 25 2012).

63. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in an inverse condemnation proceeding by allowing testimony from a billboard owner's expert regarding the income method of valuation for the billboards at issue because the income method was not an impermissible method of valuation, and the expert's income method was not improperly based on advertising revenue. Because the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the expert's testimony regarding the income method, the State's argument that the evidence was legally insufficient without both the income method and the sales comparison method necessarily failed. State v. Clear Channel Outdoor, 462 S.W.3d

68, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8111, 2012 WL 4465338 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 27 2012).

64. Expert's testimony in a condemnation case, opining that the damage to the remainder property was the loss of the entire income-producing value of two buildings, was reliable because it was based on a proper measure of damages in stating that a buyer would place no value on two buildings because their close proximity to the highway after the taking meant that they would be nonconforming under a city zoning ordinance if annexed. State v. Ledrec, Inc., 366 S.W.3d 305, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2895 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 12 2012).

65. In a condemnation case, the landowner's appraisal expert provided competent evidence of the diminution in value to the remainder by considering comparable sales from two counties. He was not required to determine whether the parties to comparable sales subjectively believed that a pipeline easement affected the sales price, and any gap between the comparable sales data and his conclusions went to the weight of his testimony rather than its reliability. Lasalle Pipeline, Lp v. Donnell Lands, L.P., 336 S.W.3d 306, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9892 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2010).

66. In an action arising from the State's partial taking of owners' property for use in a highway project, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the State's pretrial motion to exclude the expert testimony of the owners' designated real estate appraiser where his testimony was relevant because the market value of the whole property prior to the taking was a fact of consequence to the determination of the disputed element of the measure of damages. Moreover, the owners met their burden to show that the appraiser's expert testimony was reliable because he provided data of comparable sales with a variety of possible uses for the property and also testified that he performed a feasibility study on the possible uses for the property considering such factors as the impervious cover limitations, and although the State's experts provided conflicting testimony of the property's highest and best use as an office building and the property's market value based on four different land sales with a different unit of comparison, it was for the jury to resolve the conflicting evidence of the experts to determine the market value of the whole property prior to the taking. State v. Petropoulos, 346 S.W.3d 619, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3021 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 28 2009).

Commercial Law (UCC) : Sales (Article 2) : Form, Formation & Readjustment : General Overview

67. In a breach of contract action arising from the sale of large machine tools, the buyer's general manager was properly allowed to testify as an expert witness on damages because he had specialized knowledge that would assist a jury in understanding that issue. Toshiba Mach. Co. v. SPM Flow Control, Inc., 180 S.W.3d 761, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9478 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

Commercial Law (UCC) : Sales (Article 2) : Remedies : General Overview

68. In a breach of contract action arising from the sale of large machine tools, the buyer's general manager was properly allowed to testify as an expert witness on damages because he had specialized knowledge that would assist a jury in understanding that issue. Toshiba Mach. Co. v. SPM Flow Control, Inc., 180 S.W.3d 761, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9478 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

Commercial Law (UCC) : Sales (Article 2) : Warranties : Express Warranties

69. In a trial for breach of a warranty on roofing materials, plaintiff's expert was qualified, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, to testify as to the cost of the installation of the foam roof, even if he had never prepared specifications for a new roof or a re-roof or monitored the installation of a foam roof; those qualifications related to installation, not cost. Carlisle Corp. v. Medical City Dallas, Ltd., 196 S.W.3d 855, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5476 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

Communications Law : Telephone Services : Cellular Services

70. In a murder trial, expert testimony was properly admitted regarding the interpretation of mobile phone records, to show that defendant's phone was near the murder scene until the time of the shooting. The possibility that the communications could have originated miles away from the antennas did not necessarily render the testimony unhelpful. Thompson v. State, 425 S.W.3d 480, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1579 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 1 2012).

71. Officer was qualified as an expert to interpret mobile phone records, given the relative simplicity of the technique used and the officer's 40 hours of training in that regard. Thompson v. State, 425 S.W.3d 480, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1579 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 1 2012).

Communications Law : Telephone Services : Wireless Services

72. Where defendant was charged with murder, the employee of a cellular phone company was permitted to provide her expert testimony as to defendant's cell phone records and how they reflected his movements during the relevant time. Wilson v. State, 195 S.W.3d 193, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 815 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Eminent Domain & Takings

73. In a condemnation case, expert testimony from a lessor under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was improperly admitted because it violated the value-to-the-taker rule by impermissibly focusing on the benefit in avoiding the cost of removing a gas processing facility under a lease agreement. However, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding a lessee's expert testimony because it did not explain why the existing use of the property was not the highest and best use, did not offer fair market value of the land based on its condition at the time of condemnation, and did not account for all relevant factors affecting valuation. Enbridge Pipelines (e. Tex.) L.P. v. Avinger Timber, Llc, 386 S.W.3d 256, 2012 Tex. LEXIS 745, 55 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1387, 178 Oil & Gas Rep. 475 (Tex. 2012).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Procedural Due Process : Scope of Protection

74. Petitioner state death row inmate argued that a probation officer who had taken courses in sexual deviancy was not qualified to provide expert testimony because she did not have a professional license as a psychologist, psychiatrist, or counselor, and claimed that allowing her to testify violated his rights to the due process of law and to a fair trial; however, court found that the claim that the requirements of education and expertise necessary to qualify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 were too low to meet the requirements of the due process had not been clearly established in federal law; therefore, because the state court's adjudication of the claim was neither contrary to nor the result of an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, habeas relief was denied. Wyatt v. Dretke, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26997 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 3 2003).

Contracts Law : Breach : Causes of Action : General Overview

75. In a breach of contract case, a court properly admitted plaintiff's expert testimony where the expert testified that when money was missing from a parking garage, if records were not computerized, he looked for revenue trend changes and ticket trend changes, familiarized himself with the facility, and he testified that actually reviewing the tickets would not have aided him in his audit because when someone was stealing, there were no tickets. The expert considered several factors in his audit including frequency of building occupancy, the possibility of an increase in daily parkers versus contract parkers, parking validation, marketing, and higher parking rates; therefore, the testimony was reliable. Republic Parking Sys. of Tex., Inc. v. Medical Towers, Ltd., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9287 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 21 2004).

Contracts Law : Breach : Causes of Action : Breach of Warranty

76. Take nothing judgment was properly entered against a contractor because, even if a trial court incorrectly determined that the contractor was unable to assert his breach-of-implied-warranty cause of action, there was no evidence of damages since the contractor had not paid to replace a defective floor and did not show that he would do so in the future; moreover, he was unable to show that the cost of an expert witness was recoverable. Even if the contractor had attached evidence of payment to his motion or supporting brief, he did not present the evidence before judgment was rendered; moreover, he did not request the trial court to reopen the evidence, or grant a new trial based on newly discovered evidence. Hammer v. Wood, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6632, 2009 WL 2589432 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 25 2009).

Contracts Law : Remedies : Foreseeable Damages : Lost Profits

77. In a suit for breach of a noncompete agreement, an expert's use of historical sales data before and after the competitor's entry into the market was an acceptable method for calculating lost profits. Heritage Operating, L.P. v. Rhine Bros., Llc, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4939, 2012 WL 2344864 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 21 2012).

78. In a breach of contract case, a trial court did not err by allowing testimony from experts regarding the lost profits of a dealership that was delayed in opening; the testimony was not unreliable based upon the use of a yardstick method, and, even though issues relating to planning potential, a comparable dealership, or the applicable time period were hotly disputed, the actual damages awarded were within the range of a manufacturer's own estimate of net profits and a dealer's witnesses. Even if there was an error in the admission of expert testimony, it was harmless. Daimlerchrysler Motors Co., Llc v. Manuel, 362 S.W.3d 160, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1489 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 24 2012).

79. Expert witness who lacked an accounting background was not qualified to testify on lost profits in a suit for breach of a credit card processing contract. Spin Doctor Golf, Inc. v. Paymentech, L.P., 296 S.W.3d 354, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7349 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 18 2009).

80. In an action for breach of contract arising from an agreement to finance and develop a casino, Tex. R. Evid. 702 permitted the financial representative for the developer to testify as to damages; the fact that he could not have personal knowledge concerning the admitted, actual revenues of the finance company did not prevent him from using the company's financial data as a basis for determining the developer's lost profits. Am. Heritage, Inc. v. Nev. Gold & Casino, Inc., 259 S.W.3d 816, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 942 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Delivery, Distribution & Sale

81. In a criminal trial for unlawful possession with intent to deliver cocaine, a detective properly testified that in his expert opinion an individual possessing 70.6 grams of cocaine intended to sell the cocaine. The testimony was helpful to the jury in determining defendant's intent to deliver the cocaine. Walker v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10414 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 18 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Manufacture : General Overview

82. In a trial for manufacture of methamphetamine, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to an officer's testimony in connection with photographs showing defendant's burned and soiled hands; the officer's experience gave him the capability to testify that manufacturing methamphetamine often caused blisters and discoloration on the manufacturers' hands; it was not necessary to qualify the officer under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and, because the testimony was based on personal observations and was helpful to the jury, it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : General Overview

83. In a cocaine possession trial, there was no error in admitting an officer's testimony that defendant passenger jointly possessed cocaine or in admitting the officer's testimony explaining how he believed the bag of cocaine became positioned behind the driver's seat. The testimony was rationally based on the circumstances the officer perceived in the course of arresting defendant and investigating the case. Salazar v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3983, 2014 WL 1408121 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 10 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : General Overview

84. In an aggravated assault case, an expert was qualified to testify regarding blood spatter analysis where he had been an officer for 13 years, he participated in 45-50 hours of instruction, and he had applied his knowledge at other crime scenes. Holmes v. State, 135 S.W.3d 178, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2690 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Aggravated Offenses

85. Conviction for aggravated assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02(a)(2) was appropriate where a victim suffered a wound that went all the way through her arm and a stab wound to her neck. A police officer could have been an expert witness with regards to whether a deadly weapon under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1.07(a)(17)(B) had been used. Tucker v. State, 274 S.W.3d 688, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1443 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Kidnapping : General Overview

86. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, a police officer's testimony that a 14-year old girl did not fit the profile of a prostitute was admissible in an inmate's trial on charges of kidnapping where (1) the officer had extensive experience in the child exploitation unit; and (2) the inmate's attorney made an issue of whether the girl was a prostitute, thereby entitling the state to ask the officer's opinion on the issue, in light of his training, experience, and knowledge of the girl. Jordan v. Dretke, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31950 (N.D. Tex. May 22 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Involuntary Manslaughter : General Overview

87. In a manslaughter case, a court properly admitted an expert's testimony because the expert directed a program training individuals in the effects of alcohol and drugs on driving, he published medical and scientific literature in the area of toxicology, and he did not speculate how the methamphetamine affected defendant, what phase of the drug defendant was in at the time of the accident, or whether defendant fell asleep at the wheel. Haley v. State, 396 S.W.3d 756, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3974, 2013 WL 1286650 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Involuntary Manslaughter : Elements

88. In the homicide trial of a doctor who occluded a patient's breathing tube, a physician who testified that the patient was alive at the time of the occlusion did not base her opinions on conjecture because the expert testified that her opinions were based on information that included the patient's medical records and affidavits from hospital employees, as well as her education, training, and expertise. Grotti v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8153 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 14 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : General Overview

89. It would have been proper for defense counsel in a murder trial to object under Tex. R. Evid. 702, 608(a)(1) when an officer opined that defendant was deceptive and lying, but failing to object did not render counsel ineffective because defendant did not show prejudice, given that the case did not hinge on a single witness's credibility. Salinas v. State, 368 S.W.3d 550, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1923 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 17 2011).

90. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in admitting the testimony of a forensic anthropologist regarding the science of toolmark analysis; the expert opined that toolmarks on bone fragments found in defendant's yard were consistent with being made by either a hunting knife or a saw, that the bone fragments had characteristics consistent with being human, and that they showed no signs of healing, indicating that the cuts occurred at or near the time of death. Shepherd v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 133, 2011 WL 166893 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 11 2011).

91. In a murder trial, an expert should not have been allowed to testify hypothetically on the possible impact of methamphetamine on defendant because the unsubstantiated testimony was both unreliable and irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 702; the expert possessed no information regarding how much, or precisely what, defendant ingested; defendant's individual characteristics at the time of the incident; defendant's previous drug use and tolerance for methamphetamine; or what defendant may have eaten during the previous 24 hours. Acevedo v. State, 255 S.W.3d 162, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 613 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2008).

92. Where defendant was charged with murder, the employee of a cellular phone company was permitted to provide her expert testimony as to defendant's cell phone records and how they reflected his movements during the relevant time. Wilson v. State, 195 S.W.3d 193, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 815 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

93. In a trial for a "shaken-baby" murder, any error arising from the admission of an investigator's opinion on guilt was harmless. Although defendant objected to the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 during the prosecution's re-direct, the same question and answer had come in without objection during the defense's prior cross-examination. San Martin Adriano v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7140 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Capital Murder : Elements

94. In defendant's capital murder case, the evidence was legally sufficient as to the issue of causation because the record reflected that a microscopic examination was conducted of the baby's skull, the expert's findings helped establish the date of the injury, and defendant did not dispute the method by which the expert conducted the microscopic examination. Villegas v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1899 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 13 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Voluntary Manslaughter : Elements

95. Trial court did not err by excluding expert testimony on whether defendant was a man of ordinary temper under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02(d) because it was not relevant, as the issue was not whether defendant was a man of ordinary temper, but rather how the objectively reasonable man would react if placed in defendant's situation. Mcghee v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 15 2010).

96. Trial court did not err by excluding expert testimony on whether defendant snapped before shooting his ex-wife to death because defendant's questions attempted to have the expert testify about defendant's state of mind at the time of the incident. Mcghee v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 15 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Riot, Rout & Unlawful Assembly

97. Court did not err by allowing officers to testify regarding gangs where one witness testified about the activities of the Mexican Mafia as well as the organization's constitution and bylaws, and she identified photographs and information received from a confidential informant, both connecting defendant to membership in the Mexican Mafia; the other witness had also received specialized training in gang identification and investigation, specifically including the Mexican Mafia, and had conducted numerous investigations involving gangs; both testified that, in addition to their course work and investigations, their knowledge was gained by discussions with gang officers, interviews of informants and gang members, and monitoring of websites. Hernandez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 722 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 26 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Child Pornography : General Overview

98. Admission of expert testimony regarding the connection between a photograph of a child and sexual arousal did not affect defendant's substantial rights because there was evidence of images of children on various devices owned by defendant, one of the devices contained a video of defendant with the victim, and the images were purposefully placed on defendant's devices. Hoard v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11760 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 18 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

99. During defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in allowing the testimony of a sheriff department's investigator where the testimony did not involve expert testimony, but, rather, concerned only factual matters that she had personally observed because the trial court limited the testimony to what the investigator had seen in her own experience, and the actual question asked of her was simply whether delayed outcry was normal in her experience; because the investigator had several years of experience as a forensic interviewer at a children's advocacy center, she had some basis on which to answer that, in her experience, it was normal for children to delay reporting the crime of sexual assault. Escamilla v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 762 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 31 2006).

100. During defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, no witness testified concerning a psychiatrist's theory of Child Abuse Accommodation Syndrome because a registered nurse's testimony did not describe the findings of a psychiatrist or attempt to describe a syndrome, but explained her role as a sexual assault nurse examiner, the physical findings she encountered, and that her training and experience made her aware that some children delay reporting this crime for several reasons. Escamilla v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 762 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 31 2006).

101. During defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, a registered nurse's testimony was within the scope of her field of expertise where she was the sexual assault nurse examiner certified by the Texas Office of the Attorney General and had to undergo 96 hours of clinical training to become certified; with her 11 years of experience with child sexual assault victims, the nurse had abundant personal observation and experience of common characteristics of sexually assaulted children, and she did not attempt to describe a medical or psychiatric syndrome, but presented evidence to allow the conclusion that her training and experience provided an explanation for the reasons children delayed reporting sexual assaults. Escamilla v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 762 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 31 2006).

102. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the State's expert witnesses were permitted to give their opinion testimony concerning the reluctance of child victims to talk about sexual abuse by a family member. The witnesses had equal or substantially similar education, training, and experience to other experts in the field. Foxworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2005).

103. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the State's expert witness was permitted to give a legal definition of penetration. The expert's testimony was consistent with the court's definition of penetration. Foxworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2005).

104. Where defendant was charged with indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, a counselor with years of training and experience was permitted to testify as an expert on child sexual abuse. The counselor held a Bachelor's Degree in social work with a minor in psychology, and a Master's Degree in counseling. Johnson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7412 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 7 2005).

105. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting a sexual assault nurse examiner to testify about why some sexual assault victims did not remember the details of the assault; defendant's objection as to speculation lacked merit because the nurse's expert opinion was not speculation. Villarreal v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6720 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 18 2005).

106. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, an expert witness was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to testify about sex offenders and the effects of sexual abuse on victims because, contrary to defendant's contentions, the expert testified that he had experience in sex offender treatment and in identifying the emotional effects of sexual abuse. The training, experience, research, seminars, materials, periodicals, and treatises about which the expert testified and upon which he based his opinions qualified him under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to testify as an expert witness. Lively v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4703 (Tex. App. Dallas June 17 2005).

107. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a doctor who never examined the victim and had no personal knowledge of her. The doctor indicated that withdrawal from family and friends may occur after sexual abuse and that a sexually abused child may experience shame, guilt, and ambivalence toward the perpetrator; her testimony was tied to the facts of the case. Comeaux v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3748 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 17 2005).

108. Examining physician in a child sexual assault trial was properly allowed to testify about a colposcope, even though he lacked experience using the device, which magnified the genital area. The trial court limited the testimony to what a colposcope was and what it did, two areas that the doctor had learned about during his training; thus, the court properly tailored the testimony to the actual qualifications. Croft v. State, 148 S.W.3d 533, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8398 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

109. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child after an eight-year-old complainant made an "outcry" during therapy that defendant forced him to engage in oral sex, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding an expert's opinion that therapists could implant memories. Ard v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7339 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 16 2004).

110. In a sexual assault case, a court erred by failing to allow defendant's expert to testify where the subject of the expert's opinion was relevant, just as the State's expert was permitted to testify that the lack of genital injuries did not indicate that the complainant had not been sexually assaulted, defendant's expert should have been permitted to testify that no sexual assault occurred. One party could not proffer expert testimony and subsequently argue successfully that the testimony was not relevant when the opposing party sought to offer expert testimony on the same subject which reached a different conclusion; in addition, the error was not harmless. Vela v. State, 159 S.W.3d 172, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7257 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

111. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of a sexual assault diagnosis made by a physician's assistant, who explained that a statement made by defendant's girlfriend was considered, but not relied upon, in making the diagnosis. Scott v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4949 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 3 2004).

112. In a case involving child indecency, a trial court did not err by allowing an expert to testify regarding defendant's future dangerousness, despite the fact that the expert never met defendant because such contact was not required under Tex. R. Evid. 703; moreover, the expert was qualified to give an opinion based on the expert's training, education, and vast experience with sexual offenders. Rodriguez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3457 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 15 2004).

113. In a sexual assault case, a court properly allowed an expert to testify regarding sexual abuse where, although the State did not tie the testimony to the facts of the case, the testimony was relevant, it had a relatively close association with the evidence, and it was better for the expert not to tie his or her testimony too tightly to the particular child victim, but instead, to limit the import of such testimony to general characteristics and empirically obtained data, so that the jury could draw its own conclusions. Carey v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3188 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 8, 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

114. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony of a clinical supervisor at the Dallas Children's Advocacy Center as expert testimony because she was qualified as she had a bachelor's degree in psychology, a master's degree in counseling and development, and had been licensed in Texas as a professional counselor for over seven years, and she was familiar with, and kept current on, the literature and research in the field of child sexual abuse; and her testimony was specialized and scientific and would assist the jury to understand the evidence or to determine the facts at issue as she testified regarding delayed outcry and the wide range of symptoms and behavioral changes in children who had been abused. Cabrera v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7033 (Tex. App. Dallas June 27 2014).

115. Expert testimony of a sexual assault nurse examiner was properly admitted because foundation as to reliability included that the nurse had conducted more than 2,000 forensic examinations on children. Further, defendant's objections were better reserved for cross-examination rather an admissibility challenge. Kaizer v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7271 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 13 2013).

116. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a licensed psychologist to testify because his testimony about his examination and evaluation of the victim was within the scope of his expertise as a psychologist specializing in child sexual abuse. He also testified that his methodology followed principles recognized by his peers in child sexual abuse psychology. Vergara v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1837, 2013 WL 749774 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2013).

117. In a child sexual assault case, a child forensic interviewer was qualified, by virtue of her training and significant experience with child sex abuse cases, to testify regarding "grooming" and "Child Abuse Accommodation Syndrome," even though she was not expert in the field of psychology. Applewhite v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8101, 2012 WL 4447592 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 26 2012).

118. Trial court did not err by admitting the testimony of a detective during defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child because defendant failed to point to any testimony from the detective that constituted an opinion about whether the victim was telling the truth, but rather testified that the grooming process could lead to memory lapses and result in a delayed outcry in many child sexual abuse cases. The detective also opined that the victim's behavior was consistent with that of children who had been groomed and that her lack of recall was typical. Ambriati

v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7594, 2012 WL 3860642 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 5 2012).

119. "Grooming" of children for sexual molestation is a legitimate subject of expert testimony. Morris v. State, 361 S.W.3d 649, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1664 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 7 2011).

120. Law enforcement-official with a significant amount of experience with child sex abuse cases may be qualified to talk about grooming of children for sexual molestation. Morris v. State, 361 S.W.3d 649, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1664 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 7 2011).

121. Expert testimony on grooming of children for sexual molestation is useful to the jury. Morris v. State, 361 S.W.3d 649, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1664 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 7 2011).

122. In a trial for indecency with a child, a ranger was properly permitted to testify that grooming was an attempt by the offender to create a compliant victim, involved an escalation of conduct, could involve spending intimate time alone with the child, was designed to desensitize the child, often began with innocuous touches, and could involve supplying the child with alcohol or pornography, giving gifts, giving back rubs, engaging in horseplay, or talking about the offender's sexual experiences. Morris v. State, 361 S.W.3d 649, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1664 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 7 2011).

123. In a trial for aggravated-sexual assault of a child, it was proper to admit testimony from a forensic interviewer regarding her referral of the case to law enforcement officers. The testimony was not an opinion regarding the truthfulness of the child; the examiner did not say she believed the child, but rather that it was the practice to refer a child's allegation, regardless of her opinion as to veracity. Burke v. State, 371 S.W.3d 252, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8368, 2011 WL 5023008 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 20 2011).

124. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 702 in admitting testimony from a pediatrician with expertise in child abuse cases, who examined the complainant after she made her outcry, (nine years after the offense occurred) and who was unable to medically confirm or refute the allegations of abuse. Alejo v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6652, 2011 WL 3659309 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 19 2011).

125. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child, a child forensic interviewer's testimony about behavioral characteristics of child sexual abuse victims was permitted under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because it was relevant to assessing the victim's behavior and testimony, and to determining the ultimate issue of whether defendant was guilty of the charged offense. The expert did not offer a direct opinion that the victim was truthful. Dison v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2809, 2011 WL 1435201 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 14 2011).

126. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child younger than 14 years old case, where a doctor's testimony and opinions were based on his experience and training as a physician at the child advocacy center, his educational and professional background was relevant to prove his expertise in the evaluation and treatment of child victims and to lay the predicate for his testimony; thus, without a showing of harm, evidence, like the doctor's curriculum vitae, was properly admitted to assist the jury in making its determination as it served a relevant purpose beyond solely bolstering the witness and any extraneous information included on the curriculum vitae had only slight effect. Walker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8452 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 21 2010).

127. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, an expert witness never expressed an opinion that he believed the victim had been coached; instead, his testimony imparted scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge that related to his general experience with victims who had been sexually abused. Thus, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, his testimony was admissible as it did not convey whether he had an opinion regarding the victim's truthfulness. Cook v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8095, 2010 WL 3910585 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 6 2010).

128. In a trial for child sexual assault, no prejudice resulted from any error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in admitting testimony from an officer that he would not necessarily expect to see physical trauma to the female sexual organ of a child who had been penetrated by an adult male. A sexual assault nurse examiner gave substantially similar testimony in more detailed form without objection. Starnes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3715 (Tex. App. Dallas May 19 2010).

129. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021 and indecency with a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11, although defendant complained that the trial court erred by allowing a psychologist to express an implied opinion that the victim was truthful in her report of sexual abuse, the psychologist, in the complained-of portion of his testimony, did no more than express his expert opinion concerning the coping means employed by victims of sexual assault. Because the psychologist's testimony, if believed, would assist the jury's evaluation of the testimony of the victim, there was no abuse of discretion by the trial court in admitting the psychologist's statement. Drake v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 716, 2010 WL 348365 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 31 2010).

130. In a case involving sexual assault of a child, a trial court did not err by admitting expert testimony; even though there was no explicit ruling made on a doctor's qualifications, an implicit ruling was made since defendant's predicate objection was overruled. The trial court did not err by finding that the doctor was qualified based on her knowledge, training, skill, experience, and education; inter alia, the doctor testified that she had performed about 8,500 sexual abuse examinations. Little v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7091, 2009 WL 2882932 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 9 2009).

131. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of fourteen in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the rebuttal testimony of the State's expert who testified that the complainant's "normal" behavior would not necessarily negate sexual abuse; the expert was qualified to provide testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and 703 based on his educational and professional background and experience, and the expert's academic and professional background focusing on the treatment and observation of child victims of sexual abuse appropriately matched the subject matter of his testimony focusing on the behavioral patterns of child victims of sexual abuse. Briones v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5944, 2009 WL 2356626 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 30 2009).

132. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that a pediatrician was qualified to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 on the issue of whether a victim of sexual abuse as a child had a higher chance of becoming a perpetrator of sexual abuse; although the pediatrician admitted that he was not an expert in that particular field of study, he qualified as an expert witness by virtue of his knowledge, experience, training, and education. Clemons v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6003, 2009 WL 2372927 (Tex. App. Eastland July 30 2009).

133. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child, a trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing a counselor to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 about how offenders groomed children for abuse based on her nine years of experience, specialized training, and treatment of sex offenders; the counselor had a master's degree, as well as state-issued licenses in counseling and treating sex offenders, and she completed a 2,000-hour internship. Even if there was an error, defendant made no effort to show how this affected his substantial rights since other testimony about grooming came into evidence through the victim's therapist. Mitchell v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8594 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 14 2008).

134. Evidence was sufficient to support an adjudication of delinquency for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. §§ 22.021, 21.011 because it was up to the jury to determine the credibility of the child and the conflicting experts, defendant, a juvenile, admitted to the conduct in a voluntary and noncustodial statement, and the child made an outcry statement. In re Q.D.M.T., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8634 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 13 2008).

135. In a trial for child sexual assault, a State medical expert did not testify that the victim was truthful or that sexual abuse victims, as a class, were truthful. To the contrary, the expert properly testified, under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 702, that, although not definitive, the complainant's physical condition was consistent with the abuse later described. Reyes v. State, 274 S.W.3d 724, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5921 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2008).

136. In a trial for sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, defendant failed to preserve an argument, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33, regarding testimony that the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services (DFPS) had "reason to believe" the allegations; the appellate argument under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was not presented in the court below through an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Todd v. State, 242 S.W.3d 126, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9053 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

137. In the punishment phase of a trial for indecency with a child, the trial court did not unduly limit the testimony of defendant's psychological expert; following a hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 705, the trial court admitted all of the testimony that the court understood the witness to have given and defendant did not indicate that he re-urged the matter to the trial court with evidence that would contradict the court's recollection of the witness's testimony. Jimenez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6538 (Tex. App. Waco July 26 2006).

138. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted expert testimony regarding sadism because the alleged abuse was sadistic in nature, the expert's testimony regarding sadism shed light on such relevant issues as how the abuse might have injured and psychologically affected the victims, how the victims might have been threatened and placed in fear, and whether any behavior the victims engaged in with each other might have been coerced. Hatter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4516 (Tex. App. Austin May 26 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : General Overview

139. In a driving while intoxicated case, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by finding that an officer was an expert on the effects of alcohol and tolerance to alcohol because (1) the effects alcohol had on a human body and whether an individual could develop a tolerance to alcohol were not complex subjects; (2) homeostasis could potentially involve complex areas of inquiry, but the officer did little more than define the term; (3) the officer did not render any conclusive opinions but provided only general information; (4) the officer's area of expertise was not central to the resolution of the suit as the focus of the trial was on another officer's observations and defendant's intoxilyzer test results; and (5) the officer did not opine that defendant was intoxicated or express any opinion on the other officer's testimony. Sims v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8464, 2010 WL 4148372 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 21 2010).

140. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, evidence of a horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 702, despite expert testimony that the test was performed in a non-standardized manner, because the arresting officer testified that he administered the test properly. The court deferred to the trial court's resolution of the conflict. Plouff v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 18 2005), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 192 S.W.3d 213, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

141. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, walk-and-turn and one-leg tests were properly admitted, despite testimony that they were improperly performed. Testimony by the arresting officer concerning both tests was lay witness testimony governed by Tex. R. Evid 701 rather than Tex. R. Evid 702. Plouff v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 18 2005), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 192 S.W.3d 213, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

142. Defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated (DWI) under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04(a) was proper because the trial court did not err in admitting a police officer's testimony regarding the results of the horizontal-gaze nystagmus tests (HGN) test where the officer testified that he attended a standardized field sobriety testing class, that he was certified, and that he had conducted such tests. The theory underlying the HGN test and the technique employed in administering it have both been found sufficiently reliable to allow the test to be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and even though the officer who testified at trial was not the officer that administered the test to defendant, the officer testified about how the HGN test was administered and described the steps the other officer took to administer the tests as a videotape of the incident was shown to the jury. Barrineau v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 903 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 3 2005).

143. Where an officer improperly administered a Horizontal Gaze Nystagmus test in a driving while impaired case, a trial court erred in admitting the test under Tex. R. Evid. 702, but the error was harmless based on other evidence since the other evidence showed that defendant committed several traffic offenses, smelled of alcohol, had bloodshot eyes, had a slow response time, performed poorly on other field sobriety tests, admitted to drinking, and had a high concentration of alcohol in two intoxilyzer samples. McRae v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5933 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 1 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 152 S.W.3d 739, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10805 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

144. Where the trial court did not engage in a determination of the vertical gaze nystagmus test's scientific reliability, admission of officer's testimony regarding the VGN test, and regarding defendant's impairment, was an abuse of discretion; because almost 40 percent of the entire trial was devoted to the VGN's unproven results, defendant's conviction for felony driving while intoxicated as an habitual offender had to be reversed because the error was not harmless. Stovall v. State, 140 S.W.3d 712, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4026 (Tex. App. Tyler 2004).

145. In an intoxicated assault case, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.07(a)(1), the State's witness's testimony was objectionable because he was not shown to be qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 on retrograde extrapolation for purposes of blood alcohol tests, nor was his testimony shown to be reliable and, thus, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 704, the witness's testimony on whether defendant was intoxicated beyond a reasonable doubt, an ultimate issue in the case, was also objectionable; therefore, counsel's representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness as he failed to object to the witness testimony. However, counsel's failure to object to the admission of the witness's testimony did not prejudice defendant because there was substantial other evidence of defendant's intoxication at the time of the accident, including testimony that defendant smelled of alcohol and appeared intoxicated, that the inside of defendant's vehicle smelled of the metabolized odor of alcohol, and that defendant had been drinking that day. Blumenstetter v. State, 135 S.W.3d 234, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3074 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

146. In a prosecution for DWI, the trial court was not required to suppress evidence of defendant's horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) tests. The underlying scientific theory and the technique applying the theory of the HGN testing were both sufficiently reliable to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Oropeza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 24 2004).

147. Inasmuch as the scientific reliability of the horizontal gaze nystagmus test has already been established, evidence of its reliability is not required before results may be admitted. Oropeza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS

2588 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 24 2004).

148. In a driving while intoxicated prosecution under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04(b), where defendant sought to admit an expert witness to testify as to whether the factors of intoxication were identifiable from the videotape but, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court properly excluded the expert witness's testimony because its substance was not outside the knowledge and experience of the average juror, and the expert's testimony did not meet the Daubert standard for expert testimony as (1) the expert's testimony did not establish that a rate of error could be assigned where a determination of intoxication was made from viewing a videotape and no field sobriety tests were conducted; (2) the expert could not cite any scientific theory supporting a conclusion that intoxication could be determined solely from viewing a videotape nor could he refer the court to any literature supporting or rejecting that conclusion; and (3) the expert presented no publications or peer-reviewed data relating to a determination of intoxication without field sobriety test data nor did he establish that his method was generally accepted in the relevant community. Platten v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 588 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 21, 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence

149. Defendant's motion to suppress his breath test results was properly denied; even if the State's expert had insufficient information at trial on which to base an expert opinion regarding defendant's likely blood alcohol level at the time he was last seen driving, that was no basis for excluding the breath test results. Kercho v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4369 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 31 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence

150. Sufficient evidence demonstrated that defendant was intoxicated because an officer observed his erratic driving and pulled him over; initially, defendant refused to stop and then tried to flee; and defendant was agitated, had bloodshot eyes, and had a strong odor of alcohol on his breath; the reviewing court noted that even if the deputy was not qualified to testify as an expert, his statements were admissible as lay witness testimony. Jaritas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6864 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 3 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence

151. In a driving while intoxicated case, police officer testimony pertaining to the administration of the one-leg-stand and walk-and-turn tests was properly admitted as lay testimony because the officer did not use words that gave the testimony an aura of scientific validity that would subject it to the Kelly requirements; instead, the testimony consisted of the officer demonstrating the test for jurors and relaying an assessment of defendant's mental faculties and physical coordination. Gutierrez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7087, 2014 WL 2993787 (Tex. App. El Paso June 30 2014).

152. In a driving while intoxicated trial, no prejudice was shown from counsel's failure to request a hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 702 before an officer testified about the administration of a horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test because the testimony was limited to the implication of the HGN test results to the presence of alcohol or other substances in defendant's system, and there was overwhelming evidence that defendant had alcohol or other substances in his system. Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2064, 2013 WL 765711 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 28 2013).

153. To the extent there was any error in the trial court's admission of retrograde extrapolation testimony as proof of defendant's blood-alcohol level, the error was harmless given other evidence of his intoxication, including his high test results, his failure of field sobriety tests, and a videotape of his traffic stop. Young v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6053, 2012 WL 3043000 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 26 2012).

154. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, it was permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to allow a chemist to testify regarding the application of retrograde extrapolation to a hypothetical situation. All facts in the hypothetical were tied to characteristics of defendant, and any assumptions in the hypothetical as to whether all alcohol had been absorbed were appropriate, as the State's theory was that defendant was in the elimination phase. Garner v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5991, 2011 WL 3278533 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 2 2011).

155. Merely referring to Tex. R. Evid. 702 was insufficient to give the trial court notice of an objection to the reliability of retrograde extrapolation evidence. Garner v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5991, 2011 WL 3278533 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 2 2011).

156. State satisfied the Kelly reliability test, and therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the breath test results because the record showed that the officer was certified by the Texas Department of Public Safety and he testified that he complied with the required 15 minute observation period when administering the test. The officer was not required to demonstrate any personal familiarity with the underlying science and technology. Bolen v. State, 321 S.W.3d 819, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 24 2010).

157. During defendant's trial for driving while intoxicated (DWI) in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, the testimony of an officer with the police department's DWI enforcement unit might have been improper under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 702 because, by repeatedly testifying that the walk-and-turn and one-leg stand sobriety tests provided "validated" or "scientifically validated" clues of impairment, the officer gave those tests an imprimatur of scientific accuracy that they had not been shown to possess and that, in any event, he was not shown qualified to confer. However, reversible error was not presented because the issue was not preserved for appeal, and because defendant's substantial rights were not affected, as there was substantial evidence of defendant's intoxication, including his admission that he had consumed four shots of tequila and the testimony of four witnesses describing his reckless driving, odor of alcoholic beverage, bloodshot eyes, slurred speech, and lack of balance. McIntosh v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 849 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 4 2010).

158. In defendant's trial for driving while intoxicated in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, the trial court erred in allowing evidence of retrograde extrapolation before the jury because the testimony of the State's expert was unreliable, irrelevant, and prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and 403; the error, however, did not affect defendant's substantial rights for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the State did not emphasize the witness's status as an expert nor subscribe special credibility to his testimony and there was other persuasive evidence supporting the verdict. Burns v. State, 298 S.W.3d 697, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6018 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 5 2009).

159. Motion to suppress evidence was properly denied in a driving while intoxicated case because a failure to videotape a horizontal gaze nystagmus test did not bar the admission of such evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 702. An agent testified that he was unable to tape the test since his patrol car was not equipped to do so, and the jail's camera was not functioning. Hays v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4801, 2009 WL 1794784 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 24 2009).

160. In a trial for driving while intoxicated (DWI) under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04(a), there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 arising from the fact that a walk-and-turn test was administered by a deputy sheriff who was not certified to administer the test because the deputy testified to being very familiar with how to administer the standardized test through extensive training and years of experience. Kirby v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5776 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 31 2008).

161. Retrograde extrapolation evidence was properly admitted as reliable scientific evidence in a felony murder case based on the underlying felony of driving while intoxicated with a child passenger; the expert clearly explained how he converted the serum-blood result to a whole-blood result, consistently testified without contradicting himself, and testified as to his years of experience with retrograde extrapolation and the underlying theory of the science and its methodologies. Bigon v. State, 252 S.W.3d 360, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

162. In a driving while intoxicated trial, defendant failed to preserve error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 as to testimony relating to the horizontal gaze nystagmus and field sobriety tests because there was no objection raised at trial to the complained of testimony, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33; a motion in limine did not preserve any error. Ramirez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8563 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 11 2007).

163. In an intoxication manslaughter case, testimony regarding blood alcohol testing was sufficiently reliable; the imprecision of the test did not affect the outcome because defendant's blood alcohol level was significantly above the legal limit, and a substantial amount of data supported a retrograde extrapolation estimate. Morris v. State, 214 S.W.3d 159, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 278 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

164. Court affirmed court of appeals judgment upholding defendant's conviction of driving while intoxicated; as long as the breath test operator knew the protocol involved in administering the test and could testify that he followed it on the occasion in question, he did not have to also demonstrate any personal familiarity with the underlying science. Reynolds v. State, 204 S.W.3d 386, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2038 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

165. In a felony murder trial arising from a fatal automobile accident, a chemist was properly allowed to testify concerning defendant's blood-alcohol concentration because the chemist knew the results of two tests taken a reasonable time after the accident and knew several of defendant's relevant characteristics. Bigon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8756 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 4 2006).

166. In defendant's driving while intoxicated trial, the trial court properly admitted evidence of a horizontal gaze nystagmus test for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702; the officer testified that the prolonged test administered when defendant refused to follow instructions would not have caused fatigue nystagmus. Fernandez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8248 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 21 2006).

167. Appellant's issue was overruled and his driving while intoxicated conviction and sentence pursuant to Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04 were affirmed because an officer had sufficient training and experience to be qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to testify regarding the administration of the horizontal gaze nystagmus test. Price v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5349 (Tex. App. Austin June 23 2006).

168. Defendant in a driving while intoxicated case could not complain on appeal about the absence of sufficient evidence concerning the qualifications of an officer as an expert on the horizontal gaze nystagmus test because she waived the issue at a suppression hearing when the trial court, upon the request of the State, took "judicial notice" of the officer's qualifications as an expert witness from a previous suppression hearing. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

169. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding two officers qualified as experts to testify as to the administration and technique of the horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test, even though the record did not make clear that the officers had received practitioner's certificates, because an expert witness did not have to be certified by the State of Texas before his testimony on the subject of the HGN test was admissible. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

170. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, an officer was properly allowed to testify as to the administration of a one-leg stand test because the evidence related to nonscientific evidence and was admissible as lay opinion under

Tex. R. Evid. 701; the testimony was not subject to the criteria of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

171. In a driving while intoxicated case, an officer's testimony that he was certified to perform field sobriety testing, coupled with his testimony that defendant did not have the normal use of his physical and mental faculties, was permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Cates v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4238 (Tex. App. Dallas May 17 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence

172. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of a former military police officer because it was irrelevant and would not have assisted the jury in deciding the case. Allowing the testimony would have suggested to the jury the existence of a legal duty that was not recognized in Texas, i.e., asking a driving while intoxicated suspect if he had physical injuries before administering the field sobriety tests. Oliva v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3523, 2014 WL 1319308 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 2 2014).

173. Police officer who stopped defendant for driving while intoxicated, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, was properly qualified to testify as an expert pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702 on the administration of the horizonal gaze nystagmus test based on his training and experience, despite the lapse of his National Highway Traffic Safety Administration certification under 37 Tex. Admin. Code § 221.9. Liles v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7744, 2009 WL 3152174 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

174. In a driving while intoxicated case, the court did not err by allowing the officer to testify that defendant failed the field sobriety tests because the officer's use of the word "failed" did not give his testimony an "aura of scientific reliability" or cloak it with unearned credibility; the majority of the officer's testimony consisted of a straightforward narrative of each field sobriety test, followed by a particular description of how defendant performed each test. The officer's observations were based on common knowledge and observations and did not, under the circumstances convert his lay witness testimony into expert testimony. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2051, 2009 WL 765490 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 25 2009).

175. Court properly admitted an officer's testimony regarding horizontal gaze nystagmus because, although holding the stimulus for less time than required, the officer testified that he stopped at the thirty-five degree mark because he saw the onset of nystagmus; additionally, defendant pointed to no authority and nothing in the record suggesting that doing the tests in a "backwards" way would invalidate the results. Soto v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1904 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 19 2009).

176. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant failed to preserve error relating to the testimony of a technical supervisor about an intoxliyzer machine because, despite originally objecting, defense counsel did not object to answers given during cross-examination or to testimony that the supervisor did not doubt the accuracy and validity of the test; nothing in the record suggested that defendant invoked the exception to the general rule regarding preservation when defense counsel also treated the witness as an expert. The appellate court was unable to simply affirm the general verdict based on the alternate theory of proof of intoxication. Taylor v. State, 264 S.W.3d 914, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6255 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : Elements

177. Even if an officer was qualified as an expert in field sobriety testing, such expertise did not prevent him from testifying to his own "lay" observations of defendant's demeanor. Mccormick v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2654, 2014 WL 1022450 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 6 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Speeding : Elements

178. Officer's testimony was a sufficient predicate to support the admission of radar evidence in defendant's driving while intoxicated case and to establish the radar unit validly applied the underlying scientific principles of radar and the officer's technique was properly applied on the date in question, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the officer's testimony; although defendant complained of the State's failure to introduce evidence that the officer's training, experience, and duties qualified him to decide whether defendant was speeding, an officer's testimony that he had been trained to operate a radar set and test it for accuracy, as in this case, was a sufficient predicate to support admission of radar evidence and it was not necessary to call an expert witness to establish the accuracy of the radar. Maki v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5145 (Tex. App. Dallas July 10 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Vehicular Homicide : General Overview

179. In defendant's intoxication manslaughter case, the trial court did not err by allowing the State's drug recognition expert to testify, over objection, regarding defendant's intoxication even though the expert had performed none of the tests required in order to form his expert opinion because he was testifying based on the documents in the file including the blood test, as well as his knowledge of how cocaine affected the human body; the witness told the court that the knowledge and experience he had gained in face-to-face interviews could be applied to subjects he had not observed firsthand. Bumgarner v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6066 (Tex. App. Tyler July 12 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Weapons : Definitions

180. In a case involving unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon, expert testimony was not required on the issue of what constituted a "firearm." This was a subject well within the knowledge and experience of ordinary persons; there was no "specialized knowledge" needed to assist the trier of fact. Jackson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7251, 2009 WL 3365880 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 10 2009).

181. Conviction for aggravated assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02(a)(2) was appropriate where a victim suffered a wound that went all the way through her arm and a stab wound to her neck. A police officer could have been an expert witness with regards to whether a deadly weapon under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1.07(a)(17)(B) had been used. Tucker v. State, 274 S.W.3d 688, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1443 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juvenile Offenders : Juvenile Proceedings : Appeals

182. Evidence was sufficient to support an adjudication of delinquency for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. §§ 22.021, 21.011 because it was up to the jury to determine the credibility of the child and the conflicting experts, defendant, a juvenile, admitted to the conduct in a voluntary and noncustodial statement, and the child made an outcry statement. In re Q.D.M.T., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8634 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 13 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Search & Seizure : Warrantless Searches : Dog Sniff Searches

183. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the deputy's testimony concerning the dog-scent lineup identification evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because, even if the court was to presume that the field was a legitimate area of expertise, the State failed to carry its burden in establishing the reliability and relevancy of the deputy's testimony; the State offered only the deputy's testimony, and although the deputy claimed that his dogs were reliable and accurate in identifying scents, he failed to produce or cite any evidence supporting his claims. The deputy had no records of success rates to verify the reliability of his testimony, nor did he have records of his procedures or order of the dogs in the lineup at issue; the record also showed that the deputy testified that he used multiple dogs and ran multiple tests, which was contrary to expert recommendations and accepted methods. State

v. Smith, 335 S.W.3d 706, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 934 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 10 2011).

184. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of a deputy's canine scent lineup tests because defendant gave the court no reason to reach a different result in the instant case than in a previous case where the deputy's tests had been held to be reliable and admissible. Pate v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6980, 2010 WL 3341853 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Interrogation : Voluntariness

185. Expert testimony regarding the voluntariness of a confession was properly excluded where the expert had diagnosed defendant with a bipolar disorder that affected defendant's ability to reason and think clearly, but the expert (1) would not give an opinion as to whether the disorder affected voluntariness; (2) would not give an opinion as to whether defendant understood her statutory warnings; (3) would only state that anybody coming before a court of law would say whatever they thought the court would want to hear; and (4) could not refer to any documented studies in the field. Beller v. State, 192 S.W.3d 1, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8343 (Tex. App. Waco 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10354 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 17, 2004), reinstated by 191 S.W.3d 718, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 603 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

186. Rebuttal testimony by a psychological expert was properly admitted, with regard to defendant's intellectual level and the voluntariness of his confession, where the expert relied on intelligence test scores, school records, a mental status examination, and an interview with defendant. Sanchez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7073 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 5 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : Expert Testimony

187. In a case involving indecency with a child and sexual assault, defendant's argument on appeal that the State did not disclose the name of an expert witness was rejected because a trial court did not order the State to disclose such information. Flores v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6808, 2009 WL 2914982 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 27 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : Expert Testimony : Indigents

188. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it denied the motion for the appointment of a mental health expert because defendant did not attach any affidavits or provide any factual evidence to show how his request for a psychiatrist or a mental health expert aided his defense. Sennett v. State, 406 S.W.3d 661, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 25 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Witness Lists : General Overview

189. In defendant's drug case, the court properly allowed a State witness to testify where, although she was not designated as an expert, the police report made available to defendant indicated that she was the chemist who performed the tests and analyses of cocaine; thus, although the State did not produce a piece of paper with the witness's name followed by "expert," neither was her identity and function concealed. Shepard v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2793 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 6 2006).

190. In defendant's theft case, a court properly allowed the testimony of a fraud examiner who had not been disclosed to appellant prior to trial because the witness testified to the summaries of information that the trial court had admitted, the summaries were of bank and credit card records admitted into evidence, the witness did not offer opinion testimony on the source of the money or the responsible party, and therefore, the witness testified as a lay witness and his testimony did not exceed the limits placed on the testimony of lay witnesses. Reuter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1314 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 16 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Preliminary Proceedings : Withdrawal of Charges : Expungement of Records

191. In a case seeking expunction of arrest records and deoxyribonucleic acid testing, an accused did not preserve a complaint for review relating to a trial court's denial of a request for the appointment of an expert because the accused failed to provide any argument, citations to the record, or legal analysis supporting his complaint. Ex parte Brewer, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4809, 2009 WL 1801037 (Tex. App. Dallas June 25 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Eyewitness Identification : General Overview

192. Finding that expert testimony regarding "weapon focus effect" in an aggravated robbery case was not relevant was inappropriate given the content of the expert testimony, the context in which it was offered, and, most pertinently, the paucity of other evidence to establish defendant's identity as the assailant. Blasdell v. State, 384 S.W.3d 824, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1604 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012).

193. There was no abuse of discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in refusing to allow an expert to to testify as to eyewitness identification because the evidence showed that the expert's background may not have been sufficiently tailored to the area of eyewitness identification; eyewitness identification was a small part of the expert's wide-ranging practice: the expert had not performed any research or published on the topic in a peer-reviewed publication, had read only approximately .0025 percent of all published articles on eyewitness identification, and in a 16 year career had received only 10 days of seminar education on the topic. Garcia v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10059 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 6 2007).

194. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the court properly admitted expert testimony in a burglary trial that described defendant's identification by trained police dogs based on his scent; the foundational requirements established in the record complied with the Nenno test. Robinson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10220 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 29 2006).

195. In a criminal trial for murder, the trial court did not err by excluding expert testimony of his eyewitness and cross-racial identification on the ground that he did not adequately establish his qualifications as an expert in that field as required by Tex. R. Evid. 702. Silva v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9599 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 24 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Eyewitness Identification : Fair Identification Requirement

196. Defense counsel's failure to prepare an expert to testify about the unreliability of cross-racial eyewitness identification, which was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702, prevented a federal habeas corpus petitioner convicted of robbery from presenting testimony that would have called into question the only direct evidence against him; thus, petitioner demonstrated a reasonable probability that the result of his trial would have been different if counsel had performed in an objectively reasonable manner, and he was entitled to federal habeas relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254. Sturgeon v. Quarterman, 615 F. Supp. 2d 546, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40382 (S.D. Tex. May 12 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Competency to Stand Trial

197. In a competency trial, opinions from medical experts were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702-705 regarding the specific facts and factors set out in Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 46B.024, but the legal definition and standard by which competency was measured was a question of law, not defined by medical experts. Morris v. State, 301 S.W.3d 281, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1615 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Suppression of Evidence

198. When, on the State's appeal of a trial court's order granting defendant's motion to suppress, defendant raised, for the first time, as an alternate basis for affirming the trial court's ruling, a claim that breath test results were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702, defendant's claim was not "law applicable to the case" available to justify the trial court's erroneous ruling because, even though defendant was the appellee, the State had no notice of a need to establish the results' admissibility. State v. Esparza, 413 S.W.3d 81, 2013 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1599 (Tex. Crim. App. Oct. 30 2013).

199. In a driving while intoxicated case, because Tex. R. Evid. 702 did not apply to suppression hearings, a trial judge, in ruling on the admissibility of Light Detection and Ranging technology, was not required to hold a Rule 702 Kelly gatekeeping hearing to determine the reliability of that technology. Hall v. State, 297 S.W.3d 294, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1205 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

200. Motion to suppress evidence was properly denied in a driving while intoxicated case because a failure to videotape a horizontal gaze nystagmus test did not bar the admission of such evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 702. An agent testified that he was unable to tape the test since his patrol car was not equipped to do so, and the jail's camera was not functioning. Hays v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4801, 2009 WL 1794784 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 24 2009).

201. In a prosecution for DWI, the trial court was not required to suppress evidence of defendant's horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) tests. The underlying scientific theory and the technique applying the theory of the HGN testing were both sufficiently reliable to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Oropeza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 24 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Sentencing

202. In a case in which a jury had convicted a habeas corpus applicant of possession of a controlled substance, methamphetamine, in the amount of 200 grams or more, but less than 400 grams, applicant demonstrated that trial counsel was deficient at the punishment stage of trial because counsel failed to: (1) object to a DEA agent's testimony on the dangers and societal costs caused by methamphetamine constituted deficient performance; (2) request pre-trial notice of the State's experts; (3) determine that a DEA agent would testify about methamphetamine addiction; (4) properly object to the agent's testimony about addiction and the number of people who could get high from the methamphetamine that applicant possessed; and (5) call an expert in rebuttal. During the punishment stage of trial, the prosecutors asked for a life sentence, relying heavily on the objectionable testimony that was introduced during both phases of trial, and because applicant had received a life sentence, the maximum sentence available for her offense, she had shown that there was a reasonable probability--one sufficient to undermine confidence in the result--that the outcome at the punishment stage would have been different but for her counsel's deficient performance. Ex Parte Lane, 303 S.W.3d 702, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1750 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

203. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to testimony of the State's expert relating to the characteristics of child victims of sexual abuse because the testimony was admissible under this rule and counsel may have had a strategic reason for not objecting to the testimony, as counsel conducted an extensive and thorough cross-examination of the expert. Adair v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14923, 2013 WL 6665033 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 12 2013).

204. In a case in which defendant was convicted of trafficking of persons, aggravated sexual assault, aggravated kidnapping, and compelling prostitution, defendant failed to establish that his trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to object to a witness's testimony where it could not be said that the trial court would have abused its discretion by allowing the witness's testimony had trial counsel objected. The trial court could have concluded that the witness's testimony about delayed outcries, how victims responded to sexual abuse, and how the abuse was reported was the special knowledge or additional insight that could be helpful to the jury. Moreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4077, 2012 WL 1864490 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 23 2012).

205. Defendant did not show that counsel was ineffective in failing to object when a detective testified, in a singular question and response, regarding the truthfulness of the complainant, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 702, 608(a), because there was nothing in the record to indicate why counsel did not object. McGuire v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 673, 2010 WL 322988 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 29 2010).

206. In a case in which defendant claimed that his trial counsel improperly failed to object to the admission of expert testimony regarding the results of a scent lineup, which defendant contended produced the sole evidence that resulted in his being charged with burglary of a habitation, defendant had failed to satisfy the first prong of Strickland because it could not be said that his trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the legitimacy of dog-scent evidence that had been held admissible by two Texas courts of appeal in similar cases and that no Texas court had ruled inadmissible. Because another trial court's ruling to admit evidence from a pad lineup, performed similarly to the pad lineup in defendant's case, had been upheld on appeal, defendant failed to carry his burden of showing the dog scent evidence admitted was inadmissible, and, at most, he had shown weaknesses in the testimony that provided a basis for cross-examination, but he had not shown that its admission was outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Perkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7069 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 28 2009).

207. In defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 30.02, trial counsel was not ineffective in failing to object to the admission of expert testimony regarding the results of a scent lineup in which bloodhounds alerted to defendant's scent; trial counsel's performance was within the bounds of professional competence because any objection under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was unlikely to succeed. Perkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5555 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 16 2009).

208. Counsel was not ineffective by failing to object to an expert's improperly offered direct opinion as to another witness's veracity because counsel's questioning of the expert, in which counsel posited that a hypothetical child, with a description nearly identical to the complainant's, fabricated his report of sexual abuse, opened the door to the expert's otherwise objectionable testimony. Herrera v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4893, 2009 WL 1813093 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 25 2009).

209. Even though testimony concerning a child's truthfulness was not admissible in a sexual assault case either through lay or expert testimony, no ineffectiveness of counsel was shown based on a failure to object because there was only one witness from whom the State elicited an opinion about the child's truthfulness, and the State did not emphasize the testimony in its closing statement. Defendant did not show that, but for such omission, there was a reasonable probability that the result of the trial would have been different. Arcement v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1096, 2009 WL 383398 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 18 2009).

210. In a direct appeal, defendant did not show that he received ineffective assistance of counsel under the United States Constitution in a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child because there was no direct expert testimony that a minor victim was being truthful; since defendant conceded that sexual offenses had occurred, he was not harmed by the indirect bolstering of a victim that occurred when it was shown that her conduct was consistent with the conduct of one that had been sexually abused. Moreover, there was no reasoning in the record showing why trial counsel failed to object. Bustamante v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 385, 2009 WL 144138 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 22 2009).

211. In a case involving indecency with a child, defendant failed to show that he received ineffective assistance of counsel due to a failure to subpoena an expert witness; trial counsel was not given the opportunity to explain her decision, evidence regarding defendant's mental condition and sanity at other times was introduced, and a jury instruction on insanity was obtained. Edwards v. State, 280 S.W.3d 441, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 320 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 15 2009).

212. In a cocaine possession case, defendant's failure to object to an officer's testimony that drug dealers often carried many small bills waived the issue under Tex. R. App. P. 33, and counsel was not ineffective for failing to challenge the testimony as Tex. R. Evid. 702 expert testimony because it was admissible as Tex. R. Evid. 701 opinion testimony. Hayes v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 747 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 1 2008).

213. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, it was not ineffective assistance when counsel failed to object to the State's questions directed at a forensic toxicologist concerning the addictiveness and side effects of certain prescription medication because the trial court would not have abused its discretion by overruling an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 702, given that there was nothing to suggest that the toxicologist was not qualified to testify on the therapeutic levels of the medication at issue. Carey v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9052 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 16 2007).

214. In a sexual assault case, defendant was unable to show that he received ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to object to the testimony of a social worker as unqualified expert testimony; the social worker could have testified about giving a victim information about a sexual assault examination as either a lay or expert witness. Benjamin v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2007).

215. In a trial for child sexual abuse, counsel was rendered ineffective by not objecting to the State's bolstering of the complainant's truthfulness and credibility through both experts and lay witnesses; testimony from a forensic interviewer and an expert in child sexual assault investigations was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to the extent that it went to truthfulness rather than methodology. Fuller v. State, 224 S.W.3d 823, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3686 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

216. In a trial for manufacture of methamphetamine, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to an officer's testimony in connection with photographs showing defendant's burned and soiled hands; the officer's experience gave him the capability to testify that manufacturing methamphetamine often caused blisters and discoloration on the manufacturers' hands; it was not necessary to qualify the officer under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and, because the testimony was based on personal observations and was helpful to the jury, it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

217. Counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, to opinion testimony regarding an officer's statement relating to whether he believed that defendant was telling to the truth; an objection to the testimony would properly have been overruled, given the context in which it was offered. Adelaja v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10379 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 5 2006).

218. In an aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child case, defendant's trial counsel was not ineffective because (1) although the complainant's hearsay statements to her mother and sister did not satisfy the outcry exception to the hearsay rule under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.072, the same testimony had been previously admitted without objection and thus any harmful testimony was merely cumulative; and (2) defendant's counsel was not ineffective in failing to object to a police officer's testimony because the officer's testimony was admissible under the expert witness rule, Tex. R. Evid. 702, based on her three months of training and approximately 100 hours of classes in child abuse investigation, sexual abuse investigation, suspect interrogation, and interviewing. Castillo v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8790 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 12 2006).

219. Court rejected defendant's contention that his trial counsel fell below an objective standard of reasonable competence for failing to object to an officer's testimony that he did not believe defendant's version of events; under Tex. R. Evid. 704, a lay witness could offer an opinion on an ultimate issue. Adelaja v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4596 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 25 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Province of Court & Jury : Credibility of Witnesses

220. Although defendant argued that the trial court erred in admitting into evidence the buccal swab that was used to take a DNA sample from defendant's mouth, the authorities cited had no application to physical evidence such as a buccal swab and defendant neither complained on appeal regarding any expert testimony, nor made any other arguments against the swab's admission. Gonzalez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3371 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 8 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Confrontation

221. There was no merit to a murder defendant's argument that his right to confront witnesses was violated when the trial court limited his cross examination of an officer, who defendant claimed was an expert witness, regarding the officer's underlying report, which contained an exculpatory statement from a deceased witness. The officer did not express an opinion or conclusion that would have opened the door to examination on the witness's statement and did not express in his report an opinion or conclusion based upon his special knowledge. Hartless v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5066 (Tex. App. Tyler June 14 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Counsel : Effective Assistance

222. In an intoxicated assault case, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.07(a)(1), the State's witness's testimony was objectionable because he was not shown to be qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 on retrograde extrapolation for purposes of blood alcohol tests, nor was his testimony shown to be reliable and, thus, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 704, the witness's testimony on whether defendant was intoxicated beyond a reasonable doubt, an ultimate issue in the case, was also objectionable; therefore, counsel's representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness as he failed to object to the witness testimony. However, counsel's failure to object to the admission of the witness's testimony did not prejudice defendant because there was substantial other evidence of defendant's intoxication at the time of the accident, including testimony that defendant smelled of alcohol and appeared intoxicated, that the inside of defendant's vehicle smelled of the metabolized odor of alcohol, and that defendant had been drinking that day. Blumenstetter v. State, 135 S.W.3d 234, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3074 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : General Overview

223. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a detective to testify in a narrative form because the testimony served to explain why he had reached the conclusion that the child victim's account of the sexual abuse was plausible, and defendant lodged no objection concerning the detective's qualifications to provide his opinion on the topic, nor did he object that the detective's opinion on the question was irrelevant. Romero v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5735, 2010 WL 2854307 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 21 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Child Witnesses

224. In a trial for sexual assault on a child, a psychological expert's testimony did not cross the line between assisting the jury and attempting to replace the jury as trier of fact with respect to the complainant's credibility when the doctor described the general approach in verifying the truthfulness of a child's allegations by providing fake symptoms to check the reaction and by disagreeing to find flaws in the story. Aguilera v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 340 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 19 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Cross-Examination

225. Even if the trial court erred by limiting defendant's cross-examination of the sexual assault nurse examiner, the error was harmless because the same or similar testimony was admitted without objection at another point in the trial; before the State's objection, the nurse testified that she accepted the victims' oral history as true, that the notches in one victim's hymen could be consistent with consensual sexual activity, and that there was no way of knowing when the notches happened. Young v. State, 382 S.W.3d 414, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8627, 2012 WL 4874628 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 16 2012).

226. There was no merit to a murder defendant's argument that his right to confront witnesses was violated when the trial court limited his cross examination of an officer, who defendant claimed was an expert witness, regarding the officer's underlying report, which contained an exculpatory statement from a deceased witness. The officer did not express an opinion or conclusion that would have opened the door to examination on the witness's statement and did not express in his report an opinion or conclusion based upon his special knowledge. Hartless v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5066 (Tex. App. Tyler June 14 2006).

227. Expert's testimony regarding a child sexual assault victim did not constitute an improper opinion where it was defendant who elicited the very testimony of which he complained on appeal because, on his cross-examination of the expert, he went through each of the factors that the expert considered in determining the truthfulness of a child. Because defendant's question in concluding the cross-examination of whether the victim's story appeared to be realistic induced the response that, in the expert's opinion, the victim was telling the truth, defendant had invited the response. Fox v. State, 175 S.W.3d 475, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7071 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : General Overview

228. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, a police officer's testimony that a 14-year old girl did not fit the profile of a prostitute was admissible in an inmate's trial on charges of kidnapping where (1) the officer had extensive experience in the child exploitation unit; and (2) the inmate's attorney made an issue of whether the girl was a prostitute, thereby entitling the state to ask the officer's opinion on the issue, in light of his training, experience, and knowledge of the girl. Jordan v. Dretke, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31950 (N.D. Tex. May 22 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Credibility

229. In a sexual assault of a child case, the trial court erred in admitting an expert's opinion on the complainant's credibility because the expert did not base his belief on evidence provided to him before he met the complainant; the expert testified that he believed that the complainant was sexually assaulted "because of how he described that he felt pain or soreness in his butt." The only time the complainant offered such a description was during an interview at a children's advocacy center, which the expert observed first-hand. Lopez v. State, 288 S.W.3d 148, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2050 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 26 2009).

230. In defendant's indecency with a child case, the trial court properly excluded the testimony of his expert witness who was going to testify as to the reliability of child-victim testimony because, when the State asked the expert what he intended to state as his ultimate opinion, he answered "at this stage of the outcry it will be very difficult for jurors to evaluate credibility or reliability because there have been too many times this child has been interviewed." The expert's testimony directly addressed the victim's credibility and truthfulness. Pinales v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 32, 2009 WL 26886 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Diminished Capacity

231. Defendant was not entitled under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) to offer evidence of diminished capacity because his experts' reports, which did not address the standard for recklessness under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 6.03(c) or knowledge under § 6.03(a), could not support a claim that defendant was guilty only of manslaughter under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.04(a), rather than murder under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02. Thus, the experts' testimony was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Quick v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 680, 2011 WL 286155 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Insanity : Insanity Defense

232. In a case involving indecency with a child, defendant failed to show that he received ineffective assistance of counsel due to a failure to subpoena an expert witness; trial counsel was not given the opportunity to explain her decision, evidence regarding defendant's mental condition and sanity at other times was introduced, and a jury instruction on insanity was obtained. Edwards v. State, 280 S.W.3d 441, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 320 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 15 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Justification

233. In a juvenile defendant's homicide case, the court erred by excluding an expert's testimony regarding defendant's belief that he would suffer imminent harm at the hands of the victim because the expert's methodology was sound, and the expert testified that his analysis was based on his more than twenty years' experience in psychology and his meticulous examination of defendant's records. Lay people, especially adults, who had not experienced abuse for most of their lives did not have a frame of reference to fully understand why a child in defendant's position might have felt that deadly force was immediately necessary to avoid imminent harm. In re E.C.L., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9292 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 11 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Scienter : Specific Intent

234. In a criminal trial for unlawful possession with intent to deliver cocaine, a detective properly testified that in his expert opinion an individual possessing 70.6 grams of cocaine intended to sell the cocaine. The testimony was helpful to the jury in determining defendant's intent to deliver the cocaine. Walker v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10414 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 18 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Curative Instructions

235. Although the record reflected that a therapist originally offered a direct opinion on the child-complainant's truthfulness in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 702, defendant objected to that testimony, and received a favorable ruling from the trial court and an instruction to the jury to disregard the testimony; thus, there was no error and no harm from the therapist's testimony. Conti v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8758, 2011 WL 5248348 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 3 2011).

236. Because a police officer's statement that he found a child to be credible constituted a direct opinion on the truthfulness of the child-complainant's allegations, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court properly excluded the officer's statement and instructed the jury to disregard the testimony. Santamaria v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 541, 2011 WL 2165153 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 20 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Limiting Instructions

237. Trial court had ruled that the psychotherapist was not qualified to testify as an expert, but the State could have her testify as a fact witness. Furthermore, the trial court instructed the jury to disregard any testimony from the psychotherapist concerning her "diagnosis" of the complainant, such that there was no error in the admission of her testimony. Taylor v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8546 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 23 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Capital Punishment : Aggravating Circumstances

238. Even though the trial court by admitting a forensic psychiatrist's expert testimony about future dangerous, as there was no objective source material to substantiate his methodology as one that was appropriate in the practice of forensic psychiatry, the error was harmless, because there was ample evidence that there was a probability that defendant would commit future acts of violence apart from the psychiatrist's testimony; that evidence included the following a psychiatric interview and evaluation done more than 20 years before the murders and 40 years before sentencing that found reached the same basic conclusions about defendant as the instant psychiatrist did. In addition, the prosecution did not rely heavily on the psychiatrist's testimony during its closing arguments. Coble v. State, 330 S.W.3d 253, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1297 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

239. In the penalty phase of a capital murder trial, there was no error in allowing testimony about Texas prison conditions in general and that violence could occur within the Texas prison system; an issue for the jury's determination was future dangerousness; therefore, the testimony was relevant to whether defendant would have opportunities to commit violent acts in prison. Lucero v. State, 246 S.W.3d 86, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 219 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Evidence

240. Trial court did not err by admitting an investigator's testimony about the prison classification system and violence in prisons during sentencing because it was admissible as rebuttal educator-expert evidence. Coble v. State, 330 S.W.3d 253, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1297 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

241. After defendant pled guilty to murder, the trial court erred at the sentencing proceedings in excluding testimony of a psychologist who sought to testify as to testing results that he opined demonstrated that defendant was an appropriate candidate for probation, because the psychologist was qualified as an expert and because the tests were accepted as valid within the scientific community. Muhammad v. State, 46 S.W.3d 493, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 3366 (Tex. App. El Paso 2001).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : General Overview

242. In a case where a patient was committed as a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.003(a), the evidence was sufficient with regards to experts' testimony because they had all reviewed the patient's records, interviewed him, and scored him on assessment tests; their opinions, while differing, all had support. A rational jury could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that the patient suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to commit a predatory act of sexual violence. In re Diaz, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6930, 2009 WL 2749958 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 31 2009).

243. In a case where a patient was committed as a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.003(a), the patient was permitted to raise the issue of the sufficiency of expert testimony for the first time on appeal; the patient did not make objections at trial that the testimony was speculative or conclusory. In re Diaz, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6930, 2009 WL 2749958 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 31 2009).

244. Challenge to expert testimony was rejected in a case involving a civil commitment for a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. §§ 841.001-841.150, because a forensic psychologist based his testimony on sufficient facts and data and on a reliable method used in his field of expertise for forming an opinion, and he applied that method reliably to the facts in this case. There was no analytical gap in the testimony and no abuse of discretion by the trial court in admitting the testimony. In re Commitment of Tolleson, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3660 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 28 2009).

245. Challenge to expert testimony alleging that it was speculative or conclusory was rejected in a case involving a civil commitment for a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. §§ 841.001-841.150, where three experts reviewed documents, interviewed the patient, and administered actuarials before testifying that the patient suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to commit future acts of sexual violence; the experts also explained his risk factors for re-offending. Therefore, the evidence was legally sufficient to support the commitment. In re Commitment of Tolleson, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3660 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 28 2009).

246. In a case involving the commitment of a sexually violent predator, a request for a gatekeeper hearing was untimely where it was made after the substance of an expert's opinion had already been given. In re Commitment of Marks, 230 S.W.3d 241, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5424 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

247. In a civil commitment proceeding wherein appellant was found to be a sexually violent predator, the testimony of the State's expert witness, a board-certified psychiatrist, was not improperly admitted because she too narrowly defined "sexually violent offenses;" despite the fact that her definition was narrower than that found in Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002(8), it fell within the ambit of those offenses specified therein, and her use of a more narrow definition went to the weight that a jury might choose to give her testimony; further, appellant's pen packet proved that he, on more than one prior occasion, had been convicted of sexually violent offenses; thus, he had not demonstrated that the expert's testimony was unreliable, and her opinion remained of assistance, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, to the jury in determining a fact in issue. In re Commitment of Gollihar, 224 S.W.3d 843, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3786 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : Civil Commitments

248. In a trial of inmate's civil commitment as a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.062, the trial court properly excluded the inmate's expert's testimony that one of the victims had recanted pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 702, because such evidence represented a collateral attack on the underlying convictions, which had not been set aside. In re Barron, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8495, 2013 WL 3487385 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 11 2013).

249. Person is not disqualified from testifying as an expert in an sexually violent predator commitment proceeding merely because the person is not licensed as a physician or psychologist; therefore, in a civil commitment case under the Texas Civil Commitment of Sexually Violent Predators Act, a trial court abused its discretion by determining that a counselor was not qualified to testify because she was not a physician or psychologist. The general rule under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was applied because the Act did not prescribe the qualifications that an expert had to have to opine on whether a person was a sexually violent predator. In re Bohannan, 388 S.W.3d 296, 2012 Tex. LEXIS 734, 55 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1337 (Tex. 2012).

250. Trial court erred by excluding defendant's sole expert witness, a forensic psychiatrist, from testifying at trial concerning his commitment to outpatient treatment under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.081 on the basis of his supposed disbelief in the existence of "behavioral abnormality" because the psychiatrist's opinion was based on his methodology, which he explained and applied to the particular facts of the case, including the commission of repeated sexual assault against elderly nursing home patients; the improperly excluded testimony related to a critical issue that was submitted to the jury, namely whether defendant suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence. The error was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1 because the psychiatrist's testimony was the only evidence defendant had favoring a finding that he would not likely reoffend, and defendant's risk of reoffending was one of the central disputed issues. In re Commitment of Winkle, 362 S.W.3d 241, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1820, 2012 WL 746298 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 8 2012).

251. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the experts' testimony was not speculative or conclusory as to be lacking in probative value and both experts concluded that the patient was a sexually violent predator (SVP); the jury could conclude that the patient was an SVP, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.062. In re Conley, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7877, 2011 WL 4537938 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 29 2011).

252. During appellant's civil commitment trial, the trial court erred by excluding the testimony of appellant's expert witness, based on its conclusion that the expert's testimony would confuse the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 403, because the trial court acknowledged that he qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and, despite the trial court's belief that the expert would testify that behavioral abnormality did not exist, the offer of proof established that the expert would have told the jury that the ultimate issue in the case, whether appellant suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence, could not be determined by scientific method alone. The error was not harmless because without the expert's testimony, the State's experts' testimony regarding their diagnoses of personality disorder and their scoring of the actuarial instruments went unchallenged by any expert in the field of psychiatry or psychology. In re Commitment of Hinkle, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2011).

253. In a hearing to determine whether an individual was a sexually violent predator, it was error to exclude testimony from the individual's only expert, who was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702, even though she was not a psychiatrist or a psychologist, because she possessed special skills in administering actuarial tests relevant to assessing an individual's risk of reoffending. In re Bohannan, 379 S.W.3d 293, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5737, 2010 WL 2854254 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 22 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : Classification

254. The patient did not show that any error in excluding his expert as an expert witness probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment, Tex. R. Evid. 702, where the trial court could conclude that the expert's testimony confused the issue and would not assist the jury with its assigned task under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002. In re Bernard, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4681, 2012 WL 2150328 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 14 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Briefs

255. In a case seeking expunction of arrest records and deoxyribonucleic acid testing, an accused did not preserve a complaint for review relating to a trial court's denial of a request for the appointment of an expert because the accused failed to provide any argument, citations to the record, or legal analysis supporting his complaint. Ex parte Brewer, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4809, 2009 WL 1801037 (Tex. App. Dallas June 25 2009).

256. In a case involving the sexual assault of a child, an alleged error relating to expert testimony was adequately briefed under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1 where defendant cited to the record in his statement of facts, there was a review of only about 15 pages of testimony, and there was a citation to Tex. R. Evid. 702. Even though defendant's application of the law to the facts was cursory, his argument that it was error to allow an expert to testify that a complaining witness was telling the truth was sufficient to raise the issue for appellate consideration, given the liberal construction of the appellate rules under Tex. R. App. P. 38.9. Long v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1090, 2009 WL 387018 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 18 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : Evidence

257. Trial court erred by excluding defendant's sole expert witness, a forensic psychiatrist, from testifying at trial concerning his commitment to outpatient treatment under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.081 on the basis of his supposed disbelief in the existence of "behavioral abnormality" because the psychiatrist's opinion was based on his methodology, which he explained and applied to the particular facts of the case, including the commission of repeated sexual assault against elderly nursing home patients; the improperly excluded testimony related to a critical issue that was submitted to the jury, namely whether defendant suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence. The error was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1 because the psychiatrist's testimony was the only evidence defendant had favoring a finding that he would not likely reoffend, and defendant's risk of reoffending was one of the central disputed issues. In re Commitment of Winkle, 362 S.W.3d 241, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1820, 2012 WL 746298 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 8 2012).

258. Trial court abused its discretion by allowing the arresting officer to testify regarding his opinion on defendant's prescription medications in conjunction with his ultimate opinion on defendant's intoxication because the officer's testimony was neither relevant nor reliable and the officer was not qualified to offer such detailed testimony as required by Tex. R. Evid. 702;.the officer conceded that he was not certified by the police department as a drug-recognition expert, he did not conduct the standard 12-step examination that would have been conducted by a drug-recognition expert, he did not contact such an expert after defendant refused a breath test, and the officer's testimony did not reveal that he had expert knowledge about the medications that defendant had taken or their effects. The error was not harmless because the officer's extensive testimony about defendant's prescription medications was unreliable and the testimony was constituted a substantial part of the State's case. Delane v. State, 369 S.W.3d 412, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 905, 2012 WL 340234 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 2 2012).

259. Trial court did not commit reversible error by overruling defendant's objection to the State's expert concerning the psychological effects of the prescription drug carisoprodol because substantially the same evidence was admitted without objection. Massey v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4453, 2011 WL 2418482 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 14 2011).

260. In an indecency with a child case, assuming the challenged testimony regarding the children's accounts of sexual abuse should not have been admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the admission of the evidence was not reversible error as other testimony relevant to the truthfulness of the children was admitted, without objection, through the same expert witnesses. Nabors v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2538 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 28 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

261. Defendant waived appellate review regarding an officer's testimony on the psychological and physiological effects of ecstasy, cocaine, and marijuana because at trial he objected on confrontation grounds, not on the basis put forward on appeal, that the State failed to establish the admissibility of the complained-of testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 701, 702, or 703. Nelson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6710 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 18 2005).

262. Appellate court did not review an argument that a police officer's testimony regarding whether an assault occurred constituted improper expert testimony because the issue was not preserved for review by a bolstering objection; the objection did not comport with the argument raised on appellate review. Mumphrey v. State, 155 S.W.3d 651, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 370 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

263. In a driving while intoxicated case, the State's intoxilyzer expert miscalculated defendant's blood alcohol level under the retrograde extrapolation method; however, defendant failed to object to the expert's testimony on the basis that she made an erroneous calculation and thus, defendant did not preserve error regarding the expert's miscalculations. Smothers v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6399 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2004).

264. Where defendant claimed on appeal that the State's expert witness was not properly qualified as an expert witness but at trial defense counsel did not object to the witness's qualifications until after the witness provided an expert opinion, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) defendant failed to preserve for review any objection to the witness's qualifications Tello v. State, 138 S.W.3d 487, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4653 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004), affirmed by 180 S.W.3d 150, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2039 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

265. Where defendant did not object each time the State's expert witness's opinion about the victim's credibility was offered, defendant's complaint about the trial court's admission of her testimony was waived. Allam v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4177 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 6 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Constitutional Issues

266. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant failed to preserve a constitutional error as to whether a scent-identification procedure was improperly suggestive because he did not cite a state or federal constitutional provision, and he did not cite to any case law. Moreover, similar testimony was found to be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and, even if the issue was preserved for review, any error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(a). Jennings v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4361, 2009 WL 1677858 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 4 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

267. Defendant failed to preserve an argument that opinion testimony was speculative because similar testimony was admitted without objection. Moreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6018, 2012 WL 3025932 (Tex. App. El Paso July 25 2012).

268. Merely referring to Tex. R. Evid. 702 was insufficient to give the trial court notice of an objection to the reliability of retrograde extrapolation evidence. Garner v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5991, 2011 WL 3278533 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 2 2011).

269. Defendant waived his argument that the trial court erred in admitting the DNA test results to the extent the argument was based on failure to show, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, that the instrument used was reliable because the trial objection and ruling did not pertain to the reliability of the instrument. Parker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5508, 2010 WL 2784428 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 15 2010).

270. Although defendant asserted on appeal that a trial court erred in admitting the testimony of the State's expert, at no time did defendant raise an objection that the expert's testimony was unreliable because it was not tied to the particular facts of the complainant's case, which was his current argument on appeal, and, accordingly, the trial court never had notice of that alleged defect. Because the complaint defendant raised on appeal was different from his objection in the trial court, he failed to preserve the issue for appellate review, pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1). Vogel v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2606, 2010 WL 1491848 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 14 2010).

271. In a trial for sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, defendant failed to preserve an argument, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33, regarding testimony that the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services (DFPS) had "reason to believe" the allegations; the appellate argument under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was not presented in the court below through an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Todd v. State, 242 S.W.3d 126, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9053 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

272. Defendant asserted that the trial court erred in admitting an expert's testimony because he was not qualified to testify as an expert and because his "backdoor opinion" that sex offenders were not capable of being cured violated Tex. R. Evid. 702; that argument was rejected, however, because defendant did not properly object and, therefore, failed to preserve the alleged error as required by Tex. R. Evid. 103 and Tex. R. App. P. 33. Ghahremani v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8584 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 30 2007).

273. In a driving while intoxicated trial, defendant failed to preserve error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 as to testimony relating to the horizontal gaze nystagmus and field sobriety tests because there was no objection raised at trial to the complained of testimony, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33; a motion in limine did not preserve any error. Ramirez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8563 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 11 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

274. On appeal of defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated, he claimed the trial court should have excluded the blood serum test results from evidence because the State failed to establish reliability of the results under Tex. R. Evid. 702. While defendant objected to the admission of a blood vial into evidence, he failed to object to the medical technologist's testimony concerning the test results; therefore, defendant's evidentiary challenge was not preserved for review. Kuciemba v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4901 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 30 2011).

275. In an aggravated sexual assault case, defendant failed to preserve error relating to the qualifications of an expert witness because no objections to such were made before the trial court. Defendant did not object in the trial court to the expert's testimony on the ground that the State had not properly qualified her as an expert witness, nor did defendant make a request to take the expert on voir dire outside the presence of the jury to contest her qualifications. Robledo v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6416, 2009 WL 2525412 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 19 2009).

276. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant failed to preserve error relating to the testimony of a technical supervisor about an intoxliyzer machine because, despite originally objecting, defense counsel did not object to answers given during cross-examination or to testimony that the supervisor did not doubt the accuracy and validity of the test; nothing in the record suggested that defendant invoked the exception to the general rule regarding preservation when defense counsel also treated the witness as an expert. The appellate court was unable to simply affirm the general verdict based on the alternate theory of proof of intoxication. Taylor v. State, 264 S.W.3d 914, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6255 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

277. In a case involving the civil commitment of a patient found to be a sexually violent predator, the patient failed to object at the first opportunity to an expert's opinion regarding truthfulness; therefore, the alleged error was not preserved for appellate review. In re Commitment of Eeds, 254 S.W.3d 555, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3337 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

278. When, on the State's appeal of a trial court's order granting defendant's motion to suppress, defendant raised, for the first time, as an alternate basis for affirming the trial court's ruling, a claim that breath test results were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702, defendant's claim was not "law applicable to the case" available to justify the trial court's erroneous ruling because, even though defendant was the appellee, the State had no notice of a need to establish the results' admissibility. State v. Esparza, 413 S.W.3d 81, 2013 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1599 (Tex. Crim. App. Oct. 30 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : Admission of Evidence

279. At defendant's trial for assault of a family member, the trial court did not err by admitting expert testimony regarding the "cycle of violence" because it consisted of specialized information valuable to assist the jury in understanding why the complainant recanted her previous statement. Because defendant did not object to the expert testimony as bolstering or to the testimony that the complainant was "minimizing," these arguments were waived on appeal/ Pritchard v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 365, 2014 WL 119003 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 14 2014).

280. On appeal of defendant's conviction for murder, he challenged whether the DNA sample test results were the product of contamination; while the issue of contamination was relevant to reliability, he failed to raise the issue at trial; therefore, the claim was waived for review. Lane v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8912 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 17 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : General Overview

281. Motion to strike an expert witness's testimony based on his lack of qualifications, which is made after the witness has testified, can serve as a renewed objection to the trial court's earlier ruling that the witness was qualified; in these circumstances, an appellate court reviews the trial court's ruling based upon all of the evidence before the court at the time of the motion to strike. Rodgers v. State, 205 S.W.3d 525, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 852 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

282. Where the trial court did not engage in a determination of the vertical gaze nystagmus test's scientific reliability, admission of officer's testimony regarding the VGN test, and regarding defendant's impairment, was an abuse of discretion; because almost 40 percent of the entire trial was devoted to the VGN's unproven results, defendant's conviction for felony driving while intoxicated as an habitual offender had to be reversed because the error was not harmless. Stovall v. State, 140 S.W.3d 712, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4026 (Tex. App. Tyler 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : General Overview

283. At trial, an expert witness testified that fingerprint analysis was recognized and accepted as valid in the scientific community, that there was a procedure used in analyzing fingerprints, and that he had followed the technique in this case. Given the fact that fingerprint evidence was accepted as a matter of common knowledge, and given the expert's testimony regarding the fingerprint analysis in defendant's case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the fingerprint testimony. Salazar v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7187 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2005).

284. It is an abuse of discretion if the trial court's decision to exclude expert testimony is outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Ard v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7339 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 16 2004).

285. Court will not reverse a trial court's decision about the admissibility of expert testimony unless the trial court abuses its discretion. Rogers v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 1241 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 25 1999).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

286. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding defendant's expert's testimony because: (1) the expert did not know defendant's blood-breath ratio; (2) the expert provided no data, scientific theory, or documentary evidence to support his position that intoxication could be determined from viewing a videotape without evidence of field sobriety tests; (3) the expert made no attempt to establish that his method was generally accepted in the relevant community; and (4) the jury did not need the expert's testimony in order to evaluate defendant's appearance on the jail tape. Freeman v. State, 276 S.W.3d 630, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9383 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

287. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the evidence regarding the cadaver dogs was reliable and admissible because (1) the trainers were qualified to handle the cadaver dogs; (2) the dogs had been trained and certified as cadaver dogs; (3) the testimony of the witnesses established that the dogs had never falsely indicated human remains and that the dogs could consistently distinguish human remains from other scents; (4) each dog performed its search independently from the handlers, working off-lead; and (5) the dogs alerted to the same location that defendant had indicated the victim's body had been placed. Trejos v. State, 243 S.W.3d 30, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4045 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

288. Trial court did not err by allowing the State to introduce an expert's testimony regarding post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and eye movement desensitization and reprocessing (EMDR) under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because based on the expert's testimony, the trial court could have found that he was qualified to testify; the expert demonstrated that he was familiar with PTSD and EMDR and that he had worked with victims of extended sexual abuse; the evidence demonstrated that PTSD was an accepted diagnosis in the medical community and that EMDR treatment was used and recognized in the fields of social work, psychiatry, and psychology. Bailey v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 208 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 11 2007).

289. Even though the appellate court erred by limiting the scope of its review to those questions asked of the expert initially during voir dire and excluding testimony developed during defendant's subsequent cross-examination of the expert, it correctly determined that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the expert's testimony, as testimony concerning shoe and tire print comparisons had long been admissible by either lay or expert witnesses, the jury heard descriptions of the physical comparisons upon which the expert based his conclusions, and the exhibits the expert relied on for his physical comparisons were admitted into evidence and were available to the jury during its deliberations; the jury could make its own comparisons. Rodgers v. State, 205 S.W.3d 525, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 852 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Witnesses

290. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a forensic chemist's testimony because from the evidence before it, the trial court reasonably conclude that the scientific theory underlying gun shot residue (GSR) testing was valid, that the technique applying the theory was valid, and that the technique was properly applied by the chemist. the chemists specifically testified that most labs allowed the reporting of one particle of GSR. Burks v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3243, 2014 WL 1285731 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2014).

291. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by ruling that defendant's expert could not testify as to his opinion that defendant fit the profile of someone who would be susceptible to giving a false confession because there was a lack of evidence showing that the expert's testimony properly relied on or utilized the principles involved in the field. Coleman v. State, 440 S.W.3d 218, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13205, 2013 WL 5758084 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 24 2013).

292. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that a child forensic interviewer was qualified to express her opinion about "rolling disclosures" because she had a bachelor's degree in and was licensed as a social worker, she had conducted 1,000 forensic interviews of children, and she obtained her knowledge of rolling disclosures through training, seminars, and education. Lair v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9906 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 8 2013).

293. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it found the police sergeant qualified to testify as an expert on the Mexican Mafia because the sergeant testified that he had amassed the majority of his experience and training on the topic through his work in the field, namely by interviewing between 50 to 100 current and former members of the Mexican Mafia and by speaking with at least 1,000 other law enforcement officers who had investigated cases and crimes committed by the organization. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5228 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2013).

294. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the police sergeant's expert testimony over defendant's reliability objections because: (1) the sergeant's field of expertise, gang behavior and the Mexican Mafia, was generally accepted as a legitimate field of expertise; (2) the sergeant's testimony regarding the purpose, history, hierarchical structure, and the rules and regulations that purportedly govern the organization and conduct of its members, as well as the type of distinctive tattoos that its members use to signify their membership in the organization, clearly fit within the scope of that field; and (3) the sergeant's testimony was derived from his field interviews with current and former Mexican Mafia members and collaboration with other law enforcement officials familiar with the organization. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5228 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2013).

295. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a doctor to testify regarding matters related to neurology and endocrinology because the State established that the doctor specialized in forensic pathology and that by virtue of his education, training, and experience he was knowledgeable about diabetes, low blood sugar, and diseases such as epilepsy and had treated patients suffering from those conditions. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 868 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 31 2013).

296. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the State to elicit testimony from two witnesses, a forensic interviewer and a therapist because their testimony did not suggest that the victims' allegations of sexual abuse were truthful. Rather, both experts' testimony dealt with general behavioral characteristics and traits shown by sexually abused children. Pawlak v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7109, 2012 WL 3612493 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2012).

297. Trial court did not err by admitting an investigator's testimony regarding grooming of a prospective child victim of sexual assault because he investigator was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702, as: (1) the field of the investigator's expertise was not particularly complex; (2) the testimony was not conclusive of anything, but rather provided background information; and (3) the testimony was not particularly central to determining defendant's guilt or innocence, but rather provided some explanation of the significance of the numerous telephone calls between defendant and the victim and how they may have empowered defendant to take advantage of her. Bryant v. State, 340 S.W.3d 1, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6614 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 12 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

298. In a capital murder trial for the shooting death of a store clerk, the trial court erred by permitting an expert witness to provide a narrative interpretation of the videotaped recording of the incident. However, the testimony that defendant's waving to the gunman was consistent with his saying "come this way," did not have a substantial or injurious effect on the jury's verdict and did not affect his substantial rights; therefore, the error was harmless under

Tex. R. App. P 44.2. Gonzales v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2518 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 30 2006).

299. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

300. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

301. Trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 702 by admitting evidence of Horizontal Gaze Nystagus test without requiring proof from the State that the test was administered properly. The error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), however, because defendant drove erratically as he left the scene of an accident, had a strong odor of alcohol on his breath, admitted to drinking beer and smoking marijuana, had two empty beer cans in his car, and performed poorly on three other sobriety tests. Tillinghast v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7818 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2005).

302. Although the court erred by allowing an expert to testify that a sexual assault occurred, the error was harmless where the child victim told her caregivers and the jury that defendant put his "private" in her "private" on numerous occasions. The victim also provided detailed descriptions of the sexual abuse in age-appropriate language. Smith v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4203 (Tex. App. El Paso May 31 2005).

303. In a criminal prosecution for endangering a child arising from the sexual assault of defendant's two children by her live-in boyfriend, the trial court erred by allowing a detective to testify as to the boyfriend's truthfulness; however, the error was harmless, because the trial court instructed the jury that it had to decide the credibility of the witnesses testifying from the stand. Naivar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4883 (Tex. App. Tyler May 28 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

304. Even if admission of the presumptive test for blood performed on defendant's shoes and vehicle was in error, the error was harmless because an additional test confirmed the presumptive test results. Dean v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11011 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 29 2013).

305. Trial court's instruction to disregard was sufficient to cure any alleged error in the admission of the trooper's testimony, Tex. R. Evid. 702, on defendant's eye tremors, and defendant suffered no harm, Tex. R. App. P. 44.2. Maldonado v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5978 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 15 2013).

306. Defendant failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion by permitting the State's expert to testify because defendant stipulated that he was a qualified expert witness, and the questions asked of the expert were proper because they asked him to opine on whether the facts and circumstances revealed by his investigation measured up to a standard of legal culpability. Even if the trial court erred by admitting the evidence, the error would have been harmless given the other evidence against defendant, including evidence that in the hours before the fatal accident, defendant had been drinking beer and whiskey and smoking marijuana. Blanchard v. State, 2013

Tex. App. LEXIS 5140 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 25 2013).

307. Even if the trial court erred by limiting defendant's cross-examination of the sexual assault nurse examiner, the error was harmless because the same or similar testimony was admitted without objection at another point in the trial; before the State's objection, the nurse testified that she accepted the victims' oral history as true, that the notches in one victim's hymen could be consistent with consensual sexual activity, and that there was no way of knowing when the notches happened. Young v. State, 382 S.W.3d 414, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8627, 2012 WL 4874628 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 16 2012).

308. To the extent there was any error in the trial court's admission of retrograde extrapolation testimony as proof of defendant's blood-alcohol level, the error was harmless given other evidence of his intoxication, including his high test results, his failure of field sobriety tests, and a videotape of his traffic stop. Young v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6053, 2012 WL 3043000 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 26 2012).

309. Trial court erred by allowing an officer to testify as an expert concerning a test he performed on defendant's jacket and pockets to test for the presence of cocaine because: (1) the State made no effort to prove the officer's qualifications; (2) the officer testified concerning chemical identification, a field of complex expertise; (3) the officer did not qualify the identification with any mention of the accuracy of the test; and (4) whether sufficient affirmative links to the contraband existed was the sole disputed issue. However, the error was harmless because defendant was in close proximity to the drugs, he possessed $ 1,414, had a tobacco wrapper in his hand, and later admitted to being a crack cocaine dealer. Gill v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4662, 2012 WL 2127504 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 13 2012).

310. On appeal of defendant's conviction for indecency with a child by contact, defendant claimed the trial court erred by permitting a detective to testify that he had no concerns that the case was made up, because Tex. R. Evid. 702 did not permit an expert to give an opinion that the complainant was truthful. The Court of Appeals of Texas found nothing to show that this testimony affected defendant's substantive rights under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Taylor v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1663, 2012 WL 662373 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 1 2012).

311. Court of appeals properly found the trial court abused its discretion by overruling defendant's objection and admitting inadmissible expert testimony, Tex. R. Evid. 702; however, the court of appeals erred in holding that the error was harmful as additional evidence should have been considered in the court of appeals' harm analysis, Tex. R. App. P. 44. 2. Barshaw v. State, 342 S.W.3d 91, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 914 (Tex. Crim. App. 2011).

312. In a trial for child sexual assault, no prejudice resulted from any error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in admitting testimony from an officer that he would not necessarily expect to see physical trauma to the female sexual organ of a child who had been penetrated by an adult male. A sexual assault nurse examiner gave substantially similar testimony in more detailed form without objection. Starnes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3715 (Tex. App. Dallas May 19 2010).

313. Detective's testimony was improperly admitted because it decided the ultimate fact for the jury; whether the undisputed fact that defendant broke into the house and killed the victim constituted capital murder, and it was not designed to enable the jurors to better comprehend the full significance of the evidence. However, the error was harmless because entering a building or habitation without the effective consent of the owner and killing a person therein constituted capital murder because it was murder in the course of committing burglary. Jones v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8122, 2009 WL 3366559 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 21 2009).

314. In defendant's trial for driving while intoxicated in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, the trial court erred in allowing evidence of retrograde extrapolation before the jury because the testimony of the State's expert was unreliable, irrelevant, and prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and 403; the error, however, did not affect defendant's substantial rights for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the State did not emphasize the witness's status as an expert nor subscribe special credibility to his testimony and there was other persuasive evidence supporting the verdict. Burns v. State, 298 S.W.3d 697, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6018 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 5 2009).

315. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant failed to preserve a constitutional error as to whether a scent-identification procedure was improperly suggestive because he did not cite a state or federal constitutional provision, and he did not cite to any case law. Moreover, similar testimony was found to be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and, even if the issue was preserved for review, any error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(a). Jennings v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4361, 2009 WL 1677858 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 4 2009).

316. In a trial for child sexual assault, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to admit testimony from a clinical social worker regarding the child-complainant's veracity, but the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because defense counsel elicited nearly identical testimony on cross-examination. Nasrollah Hanjani Alizadeh v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1423 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 26 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Cognizable Issues : General Overview

317. Petitioner state death row inmate argued that a probation officer who had taken courses in sexual deviancy was not qualified to provide expert testimony because she did not have a professional license as a psychologist, psychiatrist, or counselor, and claimed that allowing her to testify violated his rights to the due process of law and to a fair trial; however, court found that the claim that the requirements of education and expertise necessary to qualify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 were too low to meet the requirements of the due process had not been clearly established in federal law; therefore, because the state court's adjudication of the claim was neither contrary to nor the result of an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, habeas relief was denied. Wyatt v. Dretke, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26997 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 3 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Cognizable Issues : Ineffective Assistance

318. Defense counsel's failure to prepare an expert to testify about the unreliability of cross-racial eyewitness identification, which was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702, prevented a federal habeas corpus petitioner convicted of robbery from presenting testimony that would have called into question the only direct evidence against him; thus, petitioner demonstrated a reasonable probability that the result of his trial would have been different if counsel had performed in an objectively reasonable manner, and he was entitled to federal habeas relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254. Sturgeon v. Quarterman, 615 F. Supp. 2d 546, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40382 (S.D. Tex. May 12 2009).

Environmental Law : Litigation & Administrative Proceedings : Toxic Torts

319. In a toxic tort case, there was no error under Tex. R. Civ. P. 277 from a specific causation instruction stating that plausible causes of plaintiff's gastric cancer, other than chemicals from defendant's wood treatment facility, had to be excluded with reasonable certainty. There was evidence that the cancer could have been caused by H. pylori or cigarette smoking, and the burden to exclude those other plausible causes of injury did not relate solely to the trial court's reliability inquiry under Tex. R. Evid. 702; thus the trial court's gatekeeper function was not improperly shifted to the jury. Faust v. Bnsf Ry. Co., 337 S.W.3d 325, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 644 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 27 2011).

320. In a toxic tort case filed by several apartment complex residents, summary judgment was properly granted on the issue of property damage because an expert provided no empirical evidence or methodology that explained the validity of his extrapolation that observations pertaining to the mold exposure of one resident's property were also applicable to all the other residents' property. Plunkett v. Conn. Gen. Life Ins. Co., 285 S.W.3d 106, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1405 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 27 2009).

321. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding an expert's testimony on causation of symptoms by insecticide exposure as unreliable; the expert did not analyze exposure levels, did not seek to negate other plausible causes, did not know the concentration used, and did not offer foundational data or epidemiological studies. City of Dallas v. Furgason, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7539 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 18 2007).

322. Although there is not a precise fit between science and legal burdens of proof, properly designed and executed epidemiological studies may be part of the evidence supporting causation in a toxic tort case, and there is a rational basis for relating the requirement that there be more than a doubling of the risk to the no evidence standard of review and to the more likely than not burden of proof. Mobil Oil Corp. v. Bailey, 187 S.W.3d 265, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1880 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : General Overview

323. In a criminal trial for unlawful possession with intent to deliver cocaine, a detective properly testified that in his expert opinion an individual possessing 70.6 grams of cocaine intended to sell the cocaine. The testimony was helpful to the jury in determining defendant's intent to deliver the cocaine. Walker v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10414 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 18 2004).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Business Records : General Overview

324. Testimony of a trucking company's safety administrative coordinator was properly admitted because her purpose was to explain how global positioning systems (GPS) data, which another witness's testimony showed was reliable, became a business record of the trucking company. Furthermore, her testimony established her understanding of the many systems the company used to track its drivers and showed that the system of transmitting and receiving the GPS data was automatic. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Business Records : Admissibility in Criminal Trials

325. Trial court acted within its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon in admitting the victim's medical records without expert testimony because Tex. R. Evid. 803(6) plainly authorized the admission of the medical records without any witness, and while the State might have offered expert testimony to explain the medical records to the jury, Tex. R. Evid. 702 did not require such testimony. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2250, 2013 WL 857252 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 7 2013).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Medical Diagnosis & Treatment

326. Nurse practitioner who performed the sexual assault exam on the victim was allowed to testify regarding the victim's medical history as told to her by the victim; also, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, it was also permissible for the nurse practitioner to testify and give her expert opinion that her findings were consistent with the medical history given by the victim. Dickson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1087 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 5 2004).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Public Records : Law Enforcement Reports

327. In a subrogation action, a trial court did not err by admitting a police report into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 803(8) because there was nothing to indicate that the report lacked trustworthiness. Moreover, because a large part of the report was admissible non-opinion evidence and a driver did not specifically object to the opinion statements, the trial court properly overruled an alleged driver's objection regarding expert opinion. Lawrence v. Geico Gen. Ins. Co., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5082, 2009 WL 1886177 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 2 2009).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Statements of Child Abuse

328. Where defendant was charged with multiple counts of indecency with a child by contact, the court properly excluded expert testimony that the complainants' allegations were the result of manipulation, peer pressure, and improper interview techniques. The court was not convinced that the study in question was reliable, and the probative value of the study was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Music v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7789 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 22 2005).

329. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the expert testimony regarding child sexual abuse victims' delayed outcry because the testimony regarding delayed outcry was specialized knowledge that was helpful to the jury in understanding the delay by the child in reporting the first instance of sexual abuse, and this type of evidence has been held relevant in child sexual abuse cases. Perez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2408 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2005).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Statements by Party Opponents : General Overview

330. Statements in a proof of loss form relating to the date of hail damage were competent summary judgment evidence because they constituted admissions under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2). Even if the statements in the proof of loss form were not binding or conclusive, they were considered prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein; moreover, expert testimony was not required on the issue of whether hail occurred on a certain date and caused property damage. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Lynd Co., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3206, 2012 WL 1430541 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 25 2012).

331. In a wrongful death case, a court properly excluded expert deposition testimony on hearsay grounds where the expert was not an employee of defendant pharmacy, and there was no evidence that an agency relationship existed. When the family non-suited their claims against the doctor, the subject matter over which the expert was asked to give his opinion became moot; subsequently, he was not called at trial, and, therefore, the trial court excluded his testimony on hearsay grounds. McCluskey v. Randall's Food Mkts., Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9178 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 19 2004).

Evidence : Judicial Notice

332. In an aggravated assault case, because blood spatter analysis was subject to judicial notice and the State proved the proper application of blood spatter analysis, the trial court did not err in admitting the State's testimony on the issue of blood spatter analysis. Holmes v. State, 135 S.W.3d 178, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2690 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

333. Texas takes judicial notice of the validity of blood spatter analysis; the State is not required to produce evidence on the first two criteria of Kelly. Holmes v. State, 135 S.W.3d 178, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2690 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Evidence : Judicial Notice : Scientific & Technical Facts

334. In a felony driving while intoxicated case, the trial court did not err in taking judicial notice of the reliability of the theory underlying the horizontal gaze nystagmus test and its technique without conducting a gatekeeper hearing. Goains v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7875, 2011 WL 4537892 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 28 2011).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Burdens of Proof : General Overview

335. Although there is not a precise fit between science and legal burdens of proof, properly designed and executed epidemiological studies may be part of the evidence supporting causation in a toxic tort case, and there is a rational basis for relating the requirement that there be more than a doubling of the risk to the no evidence standard of review and to the more likely than not burden of proof. Mobil Oil Corp. v. Bailey, 187 S.W.3d 265, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1880 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2006).

336. Former legal client, who claimed that bad legal advice given to his father had prevented him from pursuing product liability claims against a car manufacturer, could not recover against the law firm that gave the advice because he could not show that he would have recovered in the products liability suit, if he had brought it. The client claimed that the seat belts in his father's car were defective, but he could not prove his product liability claims without expert scientific and/or technical expert testimony, and he had not presented any expert testimony to support his claims. Rangel v. Lapin, 177 S.W.3d 17, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 318 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

337. Where defendant flunked all three field sobriety tests, defendant's conviction of misdemeanor driving while intoxicated in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04 was affirmed because: (1) admission of the evidence regarding the horizontal gaze nystagmus test under Texas R. Evid. 702 was proper in that the officer was qualified as an expert in the administration and the officer performed the screening properly on the occasion in question, and (2) the trial court erred in admitting evidence of vertical gaze nystagmus (VGN) and resting nystagmus tests under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the State failed to show that evidence of VGN and resting nystagmus testing was reliable and relevant to assist the trier of fact, but admission of the evidence was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because it did not affect defendant's substantial rights in that the jury instruction did not require the jury to determine what substance caused defendant's intoxication. Quinney v. State, 99 S.W.3d 853, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1695, 117 A.L.R.5th 803 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2003).

338. Party offering an expert's testimony bears the burden of proving that the witness is qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 by establishing that the expert has knowledge, skill, experience, training or education regarding the specific issue before the court which would qualify the expert to give an opinion on that particular subject; the word "knowledge" connotes more than subjective belief or unsupported speculation. Dziedzic v. Stephanou, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 7458 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 7 1999).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Curative Admissibility

339. Counsel was not ineffective by failing to object to an expert's improperly offered direct opinion as to another witness's veracity because counsel's questioning of the expert, in which counsel posited that a hypothetical child, with a description nearly identical to the complainant's, fabricated his report of sexual abuse, opened the door to the expert's otherwise objectionable testimony. Herrera v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4893, 2009 WL 1813093 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 25 2009).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

340. Where defendant was charged with stealing property, the trial court did not err by refusing to admit the testimony of an expert witness in commercial trucking regulation; while the complainant was a commercial truck driver, the testimony was irrelevant. Edrington v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10637 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 21

2005).

341. Where defendant was charged with multiple counts of indecency with a child by contact, the court properly excluded expert testimony that the complainants' allegations were the result of manipulation, peer pressure, and improper interview techniques. The court was not convinced that the study in question was reliable, and the probative value of the study was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Music v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7789 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 22 2005).

342. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a doctor who never examined the victim and had no personal knowledge of her. The doctor indicated that withdrawal from family and friends may occur after sexual abuse and that a sexually abused child may experience shame, guilt, and ambivalence toward the perpetrator; her testimony was tied to the facts of the case. Comeaux v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3748 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 17 2005).

343. Trial court was capable of reviewing the evidence, without the benefit of expert testimony, to determine whether the State met its burden of showing computer images depicting "actual" children necessary for conviction under the child pornography statute as opposed to "virtual" children, and, thus, the trial court properly denied defendant's motion for a determination about the admissibility of computer images in his case involving the felony possession of child pornography. Porath v. State, 148 S.W.3d 402, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6767 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

344. In a driving while intoxicated case, because the police officer admitted that in administering the horizontal gaze nystagmus test (HGN) on defendant that he failed to complete the minimum number of 14 passes across defendant's eyes, as required by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, the HGN test results did not meet the requirements for admissibility into evidence, and the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the officer's testimony regarding the HGN test results. Smothers v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6399 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2004).

345. In a criminal prosecution for endangering a child arising from the sexual assault of defendant's two children by her live-in boyfriend, the trial court erred by allowing a detective to testify as to the boyfriend's truthfulness; however, the error was harmless, because the trial court instructed the jury that it had to decide the credibility of the witnesses testifying from the stand. Naivar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4883 (Tex. App. Tyler May 28 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : General Overview

346. In addressing the admissibility of forensic analysis of physical evidence, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.35(d)(1) prevails over Tex. R. Evid. 702 to the extent of a conflict. Op. Tex. Att'y Gen. No. KP-0127 (2017).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : General Overview

347. When a challenge to an expert's testimony is restricted to the face of the record, and is not a challenge that requires a court to evaluate the underlying methodology, technique, or foundational data used by the expert, a legal sufficiency challenge can be lodged in the absence of any objection to the evidence. Coastal Transp. Co. v. Crown Cent. Petroleum Corp., 136 S.W.3d 227, 2004 Tex. LEXIS 441, 47 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 559 (Tex. 2004).

348. Where defendant did not object each time the State's expert witness's opinion about the victim's credibility was offered, defendant's complaint about the trial court's admission of her testimony was waived. Allam v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4177 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 6 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Objections

349. Because the district court found that defendant insured had suffered no damage that was covered under the policy issued by plaintiff insurer, the appraisal by the insurer's expert and the corresponding activation of an underinsurance clause therefore did not affect the insured's claim because the reduced coverage percentage would have been zero anyway, the argument that it was error to have admitted the expert's report was moot and no error affecting the insured's substantial rights was shown under Fed. R. Evid. 103(a)(1); while the insured argued error under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the federal court, sitting in diversity, had to apply the Federal Rules of Evidence in matters relating to expert testimony. Certain Underwriters at Lloyds London v. Corporate Pines Realty Corp, 355 Fed. Appx. 778, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 21882 (5th Cir. Tex. 2009).

350. In a subrogation action, a trial court did not err by admitting a police report into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 803(8) because there was nothing to indicate that the report lacked trustworthiness. Moreover, because a large part of the report was admissible non-opinion evidence and a driver did not specifically object to the opinion statements, the trial court properly overruled an alleged driver's objection regarding expert opinion. Lawrence v. Geico Gen. Ins. Co., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5082, 2009 WL 1886177 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 2 2009).

351. Even though testimony concerning a child's truthfulness was not admissible in a sexual assault case either through lay or expert testimony, no ineffectiveness of counsel was shown based on a failure to object because there was only one witness from whom the State elicited an opinion about the child's truthfulness, and the State did not emphasize the testimony in its closing statement. Defendant did not show that, but for such omission, there was a reasonable probability that the result of the trial would have been different. Arcement v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1096, 2009 WL 383398 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 18 2009).

352. In a direct appeal, defendant did not show that he received ineffective assistance of counsel under the United States Constitution in a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child because there was no direct expert testimony that a minor victim was being truthful; since defendant conceded that sexual offenses had occurred, he was not harmed by the indirect bolstering of a victim that occurred when it was shown that her conduct was consistent with the conduct of one that had been sexually abused. Moreover, there was no reasoning in the record showing why trial counsel failed to object. Bustamante v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 385, 2009 WL 144138 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 22 2009).

353. In a case involving the civil commitment of a patient found to be a sexually violent predator, the patient failed to object at the first opportunity to an expert's opinion regarding truthfulness; therefore, the alleged error was not preserved for appellate review. In re Commitment of Eeds, 254 S.W.3d 555, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3337 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2008).

354. Defendant asserted that the trial court erred in admitting an expert's testimony because he was not qualified to testify as an expert and because his "backdoor opinion" that sex offenders were not capable of being cured violated Tex. R. Evid. 702; that argument was rejected, however, because defendant did not properly object and, therefore, failed to preserve the alleged error as required by Tex. R. Evid. 103 and Tex. R. App. P. 33. Ghahremani v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8584 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 30 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Offers of Proof

355. Appellate court could not consider an expert's testimony from the bill of exceptions in determining whether the trial court erred in excluding his causation testimony because it did not first determine, pursuant to properly assigned error, that the trial court erred in refusing to admit the testimony. Mack Trucks v. Tamez, 206 S.W.3d 572, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 1074, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 80 (Tex. 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Preliminary Questions : General Overview

356. In a dispute regarding open-space valuation of real property, there was no error in the trial court's decision to qualify the taxpayers' expert witness pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), 702; although the expert did not have training specific to ad valorem taxation, he had substantial experience and expertise in agricultural use of land and prudent land management. Calhoun County Appraisal Review Bd. v. Stofer L.P., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6629 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 18 2005).

357. Horse owner was properly permitted to testify in rebuttal that a veterinarian who testified that the horse owner's filly did not die because of any actions taken by the horse farm owners, with whom the horse owner left his filly, had told the horse owner that the filly died because the horse farm owners failed to get the filly to the veterinary clinic sooner. Even if the veterinarian's statements to horse owner did not qualify as expert testimony, such statements included a factual basis and had probative value. Gabriel v. Lovewell, 164 S.W.3d 835, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4060 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Preliminary Questions : Admissibility of Evidence : Witness Qualifications

358. Evidence was insufficient to defeat no-evidence motion for summary judgment, because the expert's opinions were not reliable, were conclusory and speculative, and the expert was not qualified to render such opinions; the expert's opinions relied extensively on one published article, which did nothing more than conclude that darker shoes would become hotter than lighter shoes when exposed to sun light, and the expert failed to provide testimony regarding the temperature at which to expect blisters to form on the claimant's feet. Davis v. Aetrex Worldwide, Inc., 392 S.W.3d 213, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9845, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P18967, 2012 WL 5969621 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 29 2012).

359. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated sexual assault, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting opinion testimony from a pediatrician; the testimony the witness gave regarding her qualifications, experience, and education all went to her status as an expert for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702; no express words were required to offer the expert; the defense never objected that she was unqualified or that the subject matter of her testimony was inappropriate for expert testimony. Degollado v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6032 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 1 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Rulings on Evidence

360. Any error by determining the drug test results were admissible was harmless, because the father's testimony was admitted without objection, when the content of the testimony was cumulative of the drug test results the father argued were inappropriately admitted. D.O.H. v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6685, 2011 WL 3684568 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 23 2011).

361. In a case in which a jury found that defendant juvenile engaged in delinquent conduct by committing the offenses of aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, the trial court did not err in excluding certain testimony of various witnesses and did not prevent defendant from fully presenting his defensive theory where: (1) the proffered testimony of the victim's mother as set forth in defendant's bill of exceptions was properly excluded as speculative pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 602; (2) the victim's mother was not shown to be qualified as an expert to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 702; (3) at trial, defendant was allowed to question the victim and her sister regarding the meeting they allegedly had with their grandparents during the time period after the victim's outcry but prior to the Monday morning interview with a deputy; and (4) the only testimony excluded by the trial court during defense counsel's examination of the victim and her sister was testimony regarding statements made by their grandparents during the alleged meeting, which was properly excluded on hearsay grounds pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 802. Although defendant's bill of exceptions set forth the testimony that he asserted that the victim would have offered regarding what she told her grandparents during the alleged meeting, defense counsel did not question the victim regarding what she told her grandparents during that meeting, and, additionally, defense counsel did not argue that the trial court improperly sustained the State's hearsay objections to statements of the grandparents. In re J.R.N., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2280, 2009 WL 6312273 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 1 2010).

362. During defendant's trial for delivering more than one gram but less than four grams of cocaine, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112, the trial court did not err in permitting a police officer to testify in general terms about the practices employed in cocaine trafficking because, as a veteran narcotics detective with the police department, he could have been properly admitted as an expert to provide testimony regarding the manufacture and sale of crack cocaine in the area; the trial court could have reasonably determined that such expert testimony would have assisted the jury by providing it with information regarding the nuances of the illegal narcotics trade. Henderson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9843 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 20 2007).

363. In a medical malpractice suit against two doctors, an internist and a cardiologist, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing a deceased patient's family from calling the internist's expert witness during their case in chief because: (1) the family should not have been prohibited from calling the internist's expert as a witness solely on the basis that he was the internist's expert; (2) the family's cross-designation of the expert was not deficient under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 or Tex. R. Civ. P. 195, as the cross-designations were reasonably prompt and included the information available to the family at the time; and (3) due to differences in qualifications and the potential for perceived bias involving testimony on controlling issues, the expert's testimony would have added substantial weight to the family's case and thus was not cumulative. Hooper v. Chittaluru, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2334 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 29, 2006).

364. Trial court did not err in precluding defendant's proffered expert witness testimony when the expert did not demonstrate familiarity with the facts of the case, and the expert's field of expertise in the subject of memories of eyewitnesses, who provide an identification, was called into question. Sturgeon v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10904 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 23 2005).

365. Error in admitting expert testimony regarding the results of parents' drug tests in a proceeding to terminate their parental rights probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1 because the expert did not have expertise concerning the actual subject about which he offered his expert opinion, and because the results of the tests were not shown to be reliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702. The expert's "opinion" that the samples tested positive for cocaine was beyond the scope of his expertise and based entirely on a written report he received from a laboratory, and even though the scientific theory of testing hair samples for illegal drugs using immunoassay and gas chromatography mass spectrometry or gas chromatography mass spectrometry mass spectrometry might be reliable, there was no showing of the reliable application of that theory in the case because the expert merely speculated that the lab had to have followed protocol or it would have lost its license. In re S.E.W., 168 S.W.3d 875, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3809 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

366. Trial court must make an initial determination of whether the expert's testimony is relevant and reliable so as to be admissible. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

367. Even when challenged expert testimony is admitted by the trial court, a party may later complain on appeal that the expert testimony is legally insufficient to support the judgment because it is unreliable. Unreliable expert testimony is not evidence. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

368. In determining whether expert testimony is reliable and, therefore, some evidence supporting the judgment, the appellate court must employ an almost de novo-like review and, like the trial court, look beyond the expert's bare testimony to determine the reliability of the theory underlying it. The court does not focus on the correctness of the expert's opinion, but on the reliability of the analysis the expert used in reaching his or her conclusions. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

369. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining objections to challenged paragraphs of an expert witness's affidavit because the witness was never designated as an expert. Tara Capital Partners I, L.P. v. Deloitte & Touche, L.L.P., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4577 (Tex. App. Dallas May 20 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Weight & Sufficiency

370. Evidence was insufficient to prove breach of an implied duty to market under an oil and gas lease providing that royalties were to be determined based on net proceeds because the royalty owners' expert based his testimony on a hypothetical gas that was free from impurities, rather than the actual gas produced at the well. Thus, his opinion on this issue amounted to no evidence. Occidental Permian Ltd. v. French, 391 S.W.3d 215, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8996, 181 Oil & Gas Rep. 647, 2012 WL 5351131 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 31 2012).

371. Finding against the property owner in his inverse condemnation counterclaim against the city was appropriate because the engineer's testimony constituted legally sufficient evidence from which the trial court could have concluded that the construction had not negatively impacted drainage from the tract. Martini v. City of Pearland, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2972, 2012 WL 1345744 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 17 2012).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

372. Trial court did not err by allowing a physician to testify as an expert witness and testify generally as to the patterns of sexual offenders and how those offenders typically victimized children because the trial court could have concluded that the testimony would be helpful to the jury in its deliberations of the evidence and defendant failed to explain how the testimony about statistical correlations in families with sex offenders or the vulnerability of a child born into such a family carried with it unfair prejudice or how there was a clear disparity between its probative value and its degree of prejudice. Beltran v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10639 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 21 2012).

373. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted expert testimony regarding sadism because the alleged abuse was sadistic in nature, the expert's testimony regarding sadism shed light on such relevant issues as how the abuse might have injured and psychologically affected the victims, how the victims might have been threatened and placed in fear, and whether any behavior the victims engaged in with each other might have been coerced. Hatter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4516 (Tex. App. Austin May 26 2006).

374. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 702 by concluding that defendant failed to demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that excluded testimony was reliable and would assist the trier of fact to determine a fact in issue. The trial court effectively recognized the legitimacy of the study of interrogation techniques and false confessions by ruling that most of the expert's proffered testimony was admissible; the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the expert's proffered testimony regarding the categories of false confessions, and particularly persuaded false confessions. Scott v. State, 165 S.W.3d 27, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2168 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

375. Trial court did not err by allowing a physician to testify as an expert witness and testify generally as to the patterns of sexual offenders and how those offenders typically victimized children because the trial court could have concluded that the testimony would be helpful to the jury in its deliberations of the evidence and defendant failed to explain how the testimony about statistical correlations in families with sex offenders or the vulnerability of a child born into such a family carried with it unfair prejudice or how there was a clear disparity between its probative value and its degree of prejudice. Beltran v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10639 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 21 2012).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

376. Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of defendant's expert as irrelevant as to whether the trooper was lawfully discharging an official duty when defendant drove at him because the expert's opinion regarding the justification for the use of force was not based on any information regarding the trooper's encounter with defendant. Ramos v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6818 (Tex. App. Austin June 26 2014).

377. Defendant was not was denied the right to present a full defense when the trial court refused to allow his DNA expert to testify regarding lab bias because the expert's proposed testimony was not relevant to the issues before the jury; absent any evidence of lab bias, the substance of the proposed testimony-that context could influence experts and that all human beings had bias-was more appropriate for cross-examination than for expert testimony. Millage v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3801, 2014 WL 1407331 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 8 2014).

378. At defendant's trial for indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in admitting the expert testimony of the nurse who performed the examination of the child, even though she was not certified at the time. Because the facts of the hypothetical matched the facts of this case, the relevancy fit requirement was met. Pierson v. State, 398 S.W.3d 406, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4868 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 19 2013).

379. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of the sexual assault nurse examiner who examined the child victim during the course of the State's investigation because she was deemed an expert in sexual abuse examinations, so her expert testimony could be helpful to the jury, including to explain why physical evidence would not necessarily be present on the body of a sexual assault complainant. The nurse merely reported the events of the examination and her clinical findings, and she did not offer an opinion as to whether the victim had been sexually assaulted and did not comment on the victim's veracity. Owens v. State, 381 S.W.3d 696, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7922, 2012 WL 4098990 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 19 2012).

380. There was no abuse of discretion in allowing the witness's testimony concerning the behavior of child sexual assault victims, because the crux of the witness's testimony was that children who had been the victims of abuse could make a delayed outcry since they didn't know what to do with the abuse, and the witness did not testify concerning the complainant's truthfulness; expert testimony that a child exhibited behavioral characteristics that had been empirically shown to be common among children who had been abused was relevant and admissible as substantive evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Hassell v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4972, 2012 WL 2353713 (Tex. App. Dallas June 21 2012).

381. Grant of summary judgment in favor of the company men and others in the employee's defamation action was proper because expert testimony about bankruptcy was not relevant to any element of the defamation claims, nor was the bankruptcy testimony relevant to any element of the employee's other pleaded claims. Thus, the expert was property struck as an expert witness. Bell v. Bennett, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2097, 2012 WL 858603 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 15 2012).

382. Court properly allowed an expert witness to testify about the similarity of physical evidence recovered from the crime scene because the tapes from the crime scene and defendant's home were offered to show that because the tapes were similar, it was more likely that they came from a common source, and if they came from a common source, it was more likely that the tape in defendant's home came from the packaging for the marijuana in the murder victim's home. The testimony showed the similarities of the tapes and was therefore relevant to show that defendant was at the crime scene and had a motive for shooting the victims. Robinson v. State, 368 S.W.3d 588, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483, 2012 WL 593558 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

383. Property owners' expert's testimony was properly admitted because the expert's opinion was that the owners' property flooded because of an increase in elevation of the development relative to the owners' property; that testimony was neither speculative nor otherwise unreliable. The expert specifically testified the increase in elevation altered historical surface water drainage patterns, and his testimony was based on his own visual inspection of the property where he noted diversions from the historical drainage patterns due to increases in elevation, as well as a drainage area map used by the company that constructed the development. Marin Real Estate Partners., L.P. v. Vogt, 373 S.W.3d 57, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9259, 2011 WL 5869520 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 23 2011).

384. Property owners' appraiser's testimony was properly admitted because the appraiser specifically stated he developed his estimate based on the one-acre tract as a property independent from the nineteen-acre tract. To develop his estimate, he researched comparable sales in an attempt to find the best comparison possible and he also prepared his appraisal using the "highest and best use" analysis, which required the appraiser to consider what was the potential best use for the property being appraised. Marin Real Estate Partners., L.P. v. Vogt, 373 S.W.3d 57, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9259, 2011 WL 5869520 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 23 2011).

385. In a case involving the civil commitment of a sexually violent predator, to the extent that a patient complained about the foundational data used by experts in reaching their opinions, the complaint was not preserved for appellate review because no objection was made to the use of records or actuarial tests. To the extent that the patient challenged the expert opinions as baseless and not relevant, the testimony of the experts was not conclusory or speculative; the experts testified that they based their opinions on the facts and date gathered from the records they reviewed, their interviews with the patient, the risk assessment conducted, and the actuarial tests administered. In re Mason, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8531 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 27 2011).

386. During appellant's civil commitment trial, the trial court did not err by excluding an expert's testimony that appellant did not commit the crimes for which he had been convicted because the issue of whether appellant had been wrongfully convicted was not at issue. In re Commitment of Hinkle, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2011).

387. Relevancy objection was properly overruled pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 702 in a case involving sexual abuse of a child because defense counsel had previously cross-examined the nurse practitioner about her experience with false allegations of sexual abuse and circumstances involving the absence of physical findings; thus, the redirect of the nurse practitioner regarding statistics of confirmed cases of sexual abuse where there were no physical findings was relevant. Cortez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5854, 2010 WL 2889670 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 22 2010).

388. Because forgery was not pleaded as an affirmative defense under Tex. R. Civ. P. 94 in a suit for a constructive trust, handwriting evidence was not helpful and thus was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 702. Estate of Wallis, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3710, 2010 WL 1987514 (Tex. App. Tyler May 19 2010).

389. Expert's opinions in a products liability case on how a fire started were subjective and conclusory because they were unsupported by testing; thus, they were not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, were not based on a reliable foundation under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and constituted no evidence that an alleged design defect in a dryer caused the fire. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 298 S.W.3d 631, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 1041, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 179 (Tex. 2009).

390. In a driving while intoxicated case, evidence of defendant's use of prescription medications was not relevant because there was no evidence as to the dosage, the exact times of ingestion, or the half-life of the drug; a lay juror was not in a position to determine whether the drugs, taken more than 12 hours before arrest, would have any effect on defendant's intoxication. Without expert testimony to provide the foundation required to admit scientific evidence, the testimony regarding defendant's use of prescription medications was not relevant. Layton v. State, 280 S.W.3d 235, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 149 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

391. In an aggravated assault case where insanity was an issue, a trial court did not err by excluding the testimony of a psychiatrist regarding defendant's mental condition in 2007 as irrelevant because the psychiatrist did not have any information regarding defendant's mental state in 2005 when the crime was committed. Likewise, records of defendant's visit to an emergency room in 2007 where he saw the psychiatrist were properly excluded for the same reason. Wiley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 225, 2008 WL 5501149 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 14 2009).

392. Although a medical study referred to by a doctor in his testimony at defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 involved females older than the complainant and under different circumstances, the evidence was relevant because the doctor was in the best position to explain to the jury why the genitalia of sexually abused victims often exhibited no physical signs of penetration, and he tied the study to his earlier conclusion that he was not surprised about the lack of physical evidence of penetration in the complainant's genital examination, which assisted the trier of fact to understand the lack of physical evidence; the testimony showed that the farther away in time the examination was from the abuse, the less likely there would be physical evidence of penetration, and, accordingly, the trial court properly admitted the testimony. Whitfield v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9726 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 9 2006).

393. Before novel scientific evidence may be admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the proponent must persuade the trial court, by clear and convincing evidence, that the evidence is reliable and therefore relevant. Atkinson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1173 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 6 2004).

394. When offered evidence is the testimony of an expert witness, the court must apply the principles set forth in the rules governing expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702-705; a two-part test governs whether expert testimony is admissible: (1) the expert must be qualified and (2) the testimony must be relevant and based on a reliable foundation. Ramsey v. Reagan, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 276 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 16 2003).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : General Overview

395. There was no abuse of discretion by excluding the expert's testimony regarding alleged marketing or design defects in the automatic external defibrillator or its battery, because the expert did not test the actual device or battery involved and did not express specific expertise regarding automatic external defibrillators and batteries. Schronk v. Laerdal Med. Corp., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9916 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 8 2013).

396. Finding that defendant did not properly preserve his issue for appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 was improper because the appellate court's parsing of his objections was the kind of hyper-technical analysis that had been repeatedly rejected. It erred by distinguishing between admitting scientific evidence and admitting expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702; and erred in distinguishing between admissibility based on relevance and admissibility based on reliability. Everitt v. State, 407 S.W.3d 259, 2013 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 255 (Tex. Crim.

App. Feb. 6 2013).

397. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of a deputy's canine scent lineup tests because another appellate court had previously considered and determined that they were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Pate v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8151, 2010 WL 3921177 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 7 2010).

398. Trial court did not err by allowing the State's expert to testify that defendant's burns were consistent with someone reaching down with the right arm near where an accelerant had been poured because the expert was a medical examiner who had conducted numerous autopsies on burn victims. The testimony was not highly technical or beyond the realm of general medical knowledge based upon observation and some basic principles pertaining to burns to the skin. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

399. Trial court did not err by allowing the State's expert to testify that one of the children killed in the house fire set by defendant had been sexually abused because: (1) the expert's opinion was not based upon an area of medical science that was highly technical or theoretical; (2) he drew his conclusions from the nature of the physical injuries presented and the circumstances surrounding the patient; (3) as a medical doctor, he was qualified to do the physical examination of the child and make a diagnosis, and he explained with clarity the basis for his opinion; and (4) although he was not an expert in sexual assault cases, his opinion was confirmed by another medical professional who was. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

400. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding expert testimony regarding contact marks on defendant's vehicle on the basis that the underlying theory was unreliable where Tex. R. Evid. 702 required that a three-part reliability test for the admission of scientific evidence must be satisfied: (1) the underlying scientific theory must be valid; (2) the technique applying the theory must be valid; and (3) the technique must have been properly applied on the occasion in question. Sheehy v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6870 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 29 2004).

401. Before novel scientific evidence may be admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the proponent must persuade the trial court, by clear and convincing evidence, that the evidence is reliable and therefore relevant. Atkinson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1173 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 6 2004).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Autopsies

402. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the medical examiner's testimony and autopsy report under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the evidence was relevant in that it helped the trial court determine whether the decedent had suffered serious bodily injury and it was free to give whatever mitigating or aggravating weight it deemed appropriate. Compton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5375, 2010 WL 2698775 (Tex. App. Dallas July 9 2010).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Ballistics

403. In a civil action arising from a shooting death, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in admitting testimony from an independent forensic firearms consultant regarding the orientation of the gun against the victim's head when it was fired; with regard to foundation, the expert testified that the opinion was based upon the expert's experience and knowledge of recoil and muzzle imprint and a review of the autopsy report describing the wound. Peek v. Rudik, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1527 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 28 2008).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Battered Child Syndrome

404. In a trial for sexual assault on a child, a psychological expert's testimony did not amount to an opinion that the complainant was being truthful, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 702, when the expert testified that the complainant's symptoms were consistent with those of children who had been sexually abused. Aguilera v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 340 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 19 2007).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Blood Alcohol

405. This rule did not provide a basis to exclude the results of a blood test when the nurse who drew the blood was unavailable because the toxicologist was available to testify regarding the reliability of the tests performed and had not yet been given the opportunity to do so. State v. Guzman, 439 S.W.3d 482, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7347 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 9 2014).

406. Court erroneously concluded defendant's blood-alcohol test results were scientifically unreliable or irrelevant; scientific unreliability or irrelevance was not a theory of law applicable to the case for purposes of excluding the medical records because State did not seek to use a blood test obtained hours after an accident that was below the legal limit of intoxication and, through retrograde extrapolation, attempt to show defendant's blood-alcohol level exceeded the legal limit at the time of the accident. State v. Huse, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2657 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 6 2014).

407. Trial court did not err by admitting the testimony of the nurse that drew defendant's blood because she testified concerning the procedure she normally used for drawing blood and that her signature was on defendant's tube, she was not asked for specific opinions based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge, and her testimony was relevant. Halbirt v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12823, 2013 WL 5658371 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 16 2013).

408. In a felony DWI case, the trial court erred by allowing a forensic scientist to estimate defendant's blood-alcohol level based on a blood test taken several hours after his arrest; the scientist did not have sufficient facts regarding defendant's characteristics to conduct a proper retrograde extrapolation analysis. The error was harmless, because the other evidence in the case was sufficient to prove that defendant was intoxicated. Hazlip v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8141 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 26 2012).

409. State satisfied the Kelly reliability test, and therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the breath test results because the record showed that the officer was certified by the Texas Department of Public Safety and he testified that he complied with the required 15 minute observation period when administering the test. The officer was not required to demonstrate any personal familiarity with the underlying science and technology. Bolen v. State, 321 S.W.3d 819, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 24 2010).

410. In a case involving intoxication manslaughter, a trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing defendant's Dade Dimension RXL blood-alcohol results or expert-witness testimony regarding appellant's blood-test results to be presented to the jury; the trial court was satisfied with expert testimony as to the underlying scientific theory involving photomatic readings of the absorbent matter created from an enzymatic reaction caused by mixing a reagent with blood serum. It was within the zone of reasonable disagreement for the trial court to conclude the State met the three factors under Kelly v. State, 824 S.W.2d 568 (Tex. Crim. App. 1992), by clear and convincing evidence regarding the Dade Dimension RXL. Wooten v. State, 267 S.W.3d 289, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5497 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

411. Retrograde extrapolation evidence was properly admitted as reliable scientific evidence in a felony murder case based on the underlying felony of driving while intoxicated with a child passenger; the expert clearly explained how he converted the serum-blood result to a whole-blood result, consistently testified without contradicting himself, and testified as to his years of experience with retrograde extrapolation and the underlying theory of the science and its methodologies. Bigon v. State, 252 S.W.3d 360, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

412. In a personal injury suit stemming from a collision between a motorist and a bicyclist, evidence of the bicyclist's intoxication should have been admitted because the bicyclist's vigilance, judgment, and reactions were at issue; the absence of evidence that causally connected alcohol consumption or intoxication to the cause of that collision did not require the exclusion of expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Ticknor v. Doolan, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6717 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 27 2006).

413. Given that the expert knew the results of one test of defendant's blood alcohol concentration a reasonable time from defendant's driving and knew several of defendant's relevant characteristics, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection to retrograde extrapolation evidence regarding his blood alcohol level. Lomax v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2527 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 29 2006).

414. Court properly suppressed retrograde extrapolation testimony where the expert had not been provided with facts justifying the assumption that defendant was in the post-absorptive phase at the time of the accident, and he admitted that if a hypothetical individual consumed a meal and alcohol with that meal, the presence of food in his stomach would affect the absorptive phase to the point that peak blood-alcohol level could be reached some time much later than when the incident occurred. State v. Franco, 180 S.W.3d 219, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10823 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

415. In a driving while intoxicated case, the trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony using retrograde extrapolation to establish defendant's blood alcohol concentration because the expert was qualified and the science was reliable. Peden v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9954 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2004).

416. In a driving while intoxicated case, the State's intoxilyzer expert's testimony regarding retrograde extrapolation of defendant's blood alcohol content, which estimated defendant's blood-alcohol level when he was driving based on a test result from some later time, was admissible because: (1) the intoxilyzer tests were given within a reasonable amount of time after he was driving; (2) more than three of defendant's personal characteristics -- such as weight, gender, typical drinking pattern, tolerance for alcohol, amount of alcohol consumed, what the person ingested, the duration of the drinking spree, the time of the last drink, and how much and what the person had to eat either before, during, or after the drinking -- were known by the expert; and (3) the expert used the accepted average rate for elimination of alcohol at 0.015 grams per hour, instead of calculating a specific elimination rate for defendant. Smothers v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6399 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2004).

417. In a driving while intoxicated case, the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the State's expert's testimony on retrograde extrapolation based on defendant's intoxilyzer results as the State was unable to show that the expert's testimony was reliable; the expert did not explain the science of retrograde extrapolation and did not know many relevant, important personal characteristics of defendant. Owens v. State, 135 S.W.3d 302, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3536 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Blood & Bodily Fluids

418. Trial court did not err by admitting expert testimony because the underlying scientific theory, that the 3-chlorotyrosine detected in the victims' blood came from a bleach injection, was valid and could be clearly explained, the use of a gas chromatography mass spectrometer to apply the theory to humans was valid, the theory was accepted by the relevant scientific community, the theory had been applied in testing on human blood plasma, and literature existed that supported the underlying theory. Saenz v. State, 421 S.W.3d 725, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 591,

2014 WL 223220 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 22 2014).

419. Trial court did not err by admitting expert testimony because the underlying scientific theory, that the 3-chlorotyrosine detected in the victims' blood came from a bleach injection, was valid and could be clearly explained, the use of a gas chromatography mass spectrometer to apply the theory to humans was valid, the theory was accepted by the relevant scientific community, the theory had been applied in testing on human blood plasma, and literature existed that supported the underlying theory. Saenz v. State, 421 S.W.3d 725, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 591, 2014 WL 223220 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 22 2014).

420. Even if admission of the presumptive test for blood performed on defendant's shoes and vehicle was in error, the error was harmless because an additional test confirmed the presumptive test results. Dean v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11011 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 29 2013).

421. In a criminal prosecution for murder, the trial court did not err in permitting a detective to testify as a blood spatter expert. The detective was qualified, because he received training in the area of blood stains and blood spatter patterns, he had taught classes on intermediate crime scene investigations, and he served as an expert witness in other cases. De Leon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 813 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 1 2006).

422. In a child sexual assault trial, testimony was properly admitted regarding whether there would be bleeding during a female's first sexual intercourse and regarding a physician's ability to detect semen on clothing versus skin. Based on the expert's extensive background, experience, and expertise in the area of pediatrics and child sexual abuse, the testimony was sufficiently reliable. Croft v. State, 148 S.W.3d 533, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8398 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

423. In an aggravated assault case, an expert was qualified to testify regarding blood spatter analysis where he had been an officer for 13 years, he participated in 45-50 hours of instruction, and he had applied his knowledge at other crime scenes. Holmes v. State, 135 S.W.3d 178, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2690 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

424. In an aggravated assault case, because blood spatter analysis was subject to judicial notice and the State proved the proper application of blood spatter analysis, the trial court did not err in admitting the State's testimony on the issue of blood spatter analysis. Holmes v. State, 135 S.W.3d 178, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2690 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

425. Texas takes judicial notice of the validity of blood spatter analysis; the State is not required to produce evidence on the first two criteria of Kelly. Holmes v. State, 135 S.W.3d 178, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2690 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Crime Scene

426. Trial court did not err by allowing the State's expert to testify that the probability that the fire was ignited by an electrical spark in the air conditioner or refrigerator was extremely low because the matters defendant complained of went to the weight of the expert's testimony and not its admissibility. The expert was clearly qualified and explained his conclusion about the probability of ignition sources in scientific terms, based on known principles of movement, distribution, and concentration of gas vapors. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

427. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the State's expert's testimony had a reliable scientific basis because the expert's testimony addressed nearly all of the seven considerations for the trial court, demonstrating that the technique for determining what started the fire was well-accepted as valid, explaining the theory and technique with clarity and focus, showing evidence of his experience and training, and explaining how he applied those to his investigation of the instant case. Common sense dictated that some speculation was involved in attempting to reconstruct a scene that was destroyed by fire or in assessing a burn injury based on numerous variables, but this went to the weight of the evidence, rather than its admissibility. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Daubert Standard

428. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant provided the trial court with insufficient information to allow the trial court to determine that the psychologist's testimony regarding the weapon focus effect was reliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Consequently, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the psychologist's proffered testimony about the weapon focus effect. Blasdell v. State, 420 S.W.3d 406, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 167, 2014 WL 68801 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 8 2014).

429. In a case in which defendant claimed that his trial counsel improperly failed to object to the admission of expert testimony regarding the results of a scent lineup, which defendant contended produced the sole evidence that resulted in his being charged with burglary of a habitation, defendant had failed to satisfy the first prong of Strickland because it could not be said that his trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the legitimacy of dog-scent evidence that had been held admissible by two Texas courts of appeal in similar cases and that no Texas court had ruled inadmissible. Because another trial court's ruling to admit evidence from a pad lineup, performed similarly to the pad lineup in defendant's case, had been upheld on appeal, defendant failed to carry his burden of showing the dog scent evidence admitted was inadmissible, and, at most, he had shown weaknesses in the testimony that provided a basis for cross-examination, but he had not shown that its admission was outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Perkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7069 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 28 2009).

430. Where defendant was charged with possession of cocaine with intent to deliver, Tex. R. Evid. 702 allowed the trial court to admit the expert testimony of the canine handler whose drug-sniff dog alerted on defendant; the canine handler had twelve years of experience and the dog had participated in 74 lineups without misidentifying anyone; while defendant was the only African-American and the only person handcuffed, the lineup consisting of defendant and five police officers was sufficiently objective to be reliable. Risher v. State, 227 S.W.3d 133, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10462 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

431. Trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 702 by admitting evidence of Horizontal Gaze Nystagus test without requiring proof from the State that the test was administered properly. The error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), however, because defendant drove erratically as he left the scene of an accident, had a strong odor of alcohol on his breath, admitted to drinking beer and smoking marijuana, had two empty beer cans in his car, and performed poorly on three other sobriety tests. Tillinghast v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7818 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2005).

432. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's objection to the reliability of the testimony of crime lab scientist who tested the heroin evidence because the scientist's testimony addressed the methods he used in testing the heroin and the acceptance of the tests he performed within the scientific community as valid methods for determining the composition of suspected controlled substances as required by Tex. R. Evid. 702. Lopez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4625 (Tex. App. Eastland June 16 2005).

433. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's objection to the reliability of the testimony of crime lab scientist who tested the heroin evidence because the scientist's testimony addressed the methods he used in testing the heroin and the acceptance of the tests he performed within the scientific community as valid methods for determining the composition of suspected controlled substances as required by Tex. R. Evid. 702. Lopez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4610 (Tex. App. Eastland June 16 2005).

434. Testimony of a witness for the State regarding how the global positioning system (GPS) worked and its reliability was properly admitted where the witness testified that he had a bachelor's degree in geography, and where his testimony demonstrated a knowledge of how GPS worked and its reliability. The trial court could decide that a geographer who used GPS daily in his job was qualified to testify about the reliability of GPS technology, and the witness's testimony demonstrated that GPS-figured coordinates were accepted as reliable in his field just as arithmetical sums on an electronic calculator were commonly accepted as reliable. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

435. Testimony of a trucking company's safety administrative coordinator was properly admitted because her purpose was to explain how global positioning systems (GPS) data, which another witness's testimony showed was reliable, became a business record of the trucking company. Furthermore, her testimony established her understanding of the many systems the company used to track its drivers and showed that the system of transmitting and receiving the GPS data was automatic. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

436. Defendant failed to show that a trial court abused its discretion in overruling his objection to a DNA analyst's testimony and report on the population frequency statistic of the DNA she tested because the analyst was a highly qualified expert on all aspects of DNA analysis, including statistical interpretation of the DNA profile, and testified that multiplication was the standard way of calculating genotype frequencies. Furthermore, she explained that multiplication of the frequencies for each allele was a permitted method of determining the overall statistical likelihood of a person having all the alleles because they were unrelated. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

437. Reliability of a DNA analyst's population frequency calculation was shown by clear and convincing evidence because her testimony showed that the scientific theory and technique that she applied in making her population frequency calculation was accepted as valid in the scientific community. She also testified to the existence of documentation (i.e., literature) supporting the underlying scientific theory, and there was an absence of any contrary expert testimony. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

438. Clear and convincing evidence supported a trial court's decision to admit a DNA analyst's population frequency statistics where defendant never questioned the analyst concerning the independence of the loci tested, and where the analyst's testimony about the wide acceptance of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's population statistics that she used was sufficient to establish their reliability. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

439. Where the trial court did not engage in a determination of the vertical gaze nystagmus test's scientific reliability, admission of officer's testimony regarding the VGN test, and regarding defendant's impairment, was an abuse of discretion; because almost 40 percent of the entire trial was devoted to the VGN's unproven results, defendant's conviction for felony driving while intoxicated as an habitual offender had to be reversed because the error was not harmless. Stovall v. State, 140 S.W.3d 712, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4026 (Tex. App. Tyler 2004).

440. In a driving while intoxicated prosecution under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04(b), where defendant sought to admit an expert witness to testify as to whether the factors of intoxication were identifiable from the videotape but, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court properly excluded the expert witness's testimony because its substance was not outside the knowledge and experience of the average juror, and the expert's testimony did not meet the Daubert standard for expert testimony as (1) the expert's testimony did not establish that a rate of error could be assigned where a determination of intoxication was made from viewing a videotape and no field sobriety tests were conducted; (2) the expert could not cite any scientific theory supporting a conclusion that intoxication could be determined solely from viewing a videotape nor could he refer the court to any literature supporting or rejecting that conclusion; and (3) the expert presented no publications or peer-reviewed data relating to a determination of intoxication without field sobriety test data nor did he establish that his method was generally accepted in the relevant community. Platten v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 588 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 21, 2004).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : DNA

441. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's challenge to the reliability of a DNA analyst's expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because 1) the DNA analyst testified that the lab technicians performed all of the lab work, but that she made all the DNA comparisons; that everyone followed the same training program; that all of the lab work was subject to an internal validation process; that the lab took steps to ensure that contamination did not occur during the DNA testing process; and that she was able to ascertain that the DNA was properly extracted; and 2) there was no testimony to suggest that the technicians who performed the lab work deviated from proper protocols or procedures. Dreyer v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 353, 2011 WL 193494 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 19 2011).

442. Defendant waived his argument that the trial court erred in admitting the DNA test results to the extent the argument was based on failure to show, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, that the instrument used was reliable because the trial objection and ruling did not pertain to the reliability of the instrument. Parker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5508, 2010 WL 2784428 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 15 2010).

443. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 702, in admitting DNA test results, despite the analyst's failure to observe all 28 cycles of the instrument. Parker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5508, 2010 WL 2784428 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 15 2010).

444. In defendant's injury to a child case, the court did not err in admitting opinion testimony concerning a DNA test because the expert duly limited her testimony concerning the sample to show it was human skin, consistent with the child's skin, and that the child could not be excluded as the donor. The question raised by defendant concerned more the weight of the testimony rather that its reliability; the expert did not testify that the skin belonged to the child as defendant identified in his trial objection. Smith v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 401, 2009 WL 1941999 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 22 2009).

445. On appeal of defendant's conviction for murder, he challenged whether the DNA sample test results were the product of contamination; while the issue of contamination was relevant to reliability, he failed to raise the issue at trial; therefore, the claim was waived for review. Lane v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8912 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 17 2006).

446. Expert testimony was properly admitted regarding semen evidence obtained from the victim in defendant's aggravated sexual assault case, because the expert testified that the underlying scientific theory for DNA was valid and had been accepted by the scientific community, that literature existed supporting the scientific theory, that the techniques used to apply the theory were valid, and that the valid techniques were applied in this case. Although she stated that she was unfamiliar with the error rate of DNA testing, she testified that she used quality measures and positive and negative controls to insure accuracy during DNA testing. Ford v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3151 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 27 2005).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Fingerprints & Footprints

447. Court properly admitted expert testimony regarding fingerprint evidence because the officers' testimony was limited to the types of surfaces that were not conducive to lifting fingerprints; as officers trained and experienced in lifting fingerprints, their area of expertise included what made certain surfaces less suitable to lift fingerprints. Brown v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8405 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2014).

448. Trial court properly admitted the State's fingerprint expert's opinion because the expert testified as to the technique she employed when comparing fingerprints, that the technique she employed had been used and accepted by the scientific community, and that she used the technique properly. Shorter v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9250 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 25 2013).

449. Trial court did not err by overruling defendant's objection to the State's expert being allowed to testify as an expert witness on the subject of fingerprint comparison because the evidence showed that the expert was qualified, as he testified that he had been a forensic investigator for 18 years, he had training in fingerprint comparison, he had been certified to examine fingerprints, and had been doing fingerprint comparison for the police department for 17 years. The court also held that the evidence was reliable because the uniqueness of fingerprints was common knowledge upon which the court could take judicial notice. Lightner v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5365 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 30 2013).

450. In defendant's theft case, a witness's shoe print identification testimony was properly admitted because the witness testified that he applied the appropriate technique in reaching his opinions. Noting accidentals common to defendant's shoes and the impressions, the witness opined that no shoe but defendant's could have made the impression on three of the decals and the paper from the getaway vehicle; conversely, the other decal sampled did not contain an accidental and therefore could have been produced by any shoe of like size and brand as defendant's. Castellon v. State, 302 S.W.3d 568, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9681 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 21 2009).

451. Court properly admitted a latent fingerprint report because the officer had fifteen years experience, he testified regarding the numerous courses he had taken in fingerprint examination, and after reprinting defendant, the officer located fourteen characteristics between the print from the duct tape and defendant's print. Montez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7033 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 24, 2008).

452. At trial, an expert witness testified that fingerprint analysis was recognized and accepted as valid in the scientific community, that there was a procedure used in analyzing fingerprints, and that he had followed the technique in this case. Given the fact that fingerprint evidence was accepted as a matter of common knowledge, and given the expert's testimony regarding the fingerprint analysis in defendant's case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the fingerprint testimony. Salazar v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7187 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2005).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Hairs & Fibers

453. In defendant's capital murder case, the trial court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress hair-comparison analysis because the expert had to complete police training in forensic-hair comparison and work on various hair-comparison cases under direct supervision, he explained how he tested the hair found in defendant's vehicle to the hair taken from the victim's head, and the expert testified that hair-comparison analysis was considered an accepted science within the scientific community and that there was literature on the topic. Arciba v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9815, 2009 WL 5155532 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 30 2009).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Handwriting

454. Defendant's convictions for aggravated robbery and unlawful possession of a firearm were proper because a detective's testimony regarding handwriting by comparison was well within the scope of the field and the detective relied upon and utilized the principles involved in the field. Carter v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5918, 2009 WL 2343725 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2009).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Polygraphs

455. Revocation of defendant's deferred-adjudication community supervision based on the results of polygraph examinations was inappropriate because, while the psychotherapist did make the conclusory statement that those in his field reasonably relied on polygraph results, the sole basis of his opinion was the results of a test that had been held inadmissible because it was not reliable. Total reliance on inadmissible and untrustworthy facts could not be reasonable, nor would such an opinion achieve the minimum level of reliability necessary for admission under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Leonard v. State, 385 S.W.3d 570, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1598 (Tex. Crim. App. Nov. 21 2012).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Psychiatric & Psychological Evidence

456. In a case in which appellant juvenile was charged with engaging in delinquent conduct for fatally shooting his father, the trial court erred in excluding the expert testimony of a psychiatrist as to appellant's belief that force was immediately necessary and that a reasonable person in his circumstances could not retreat where the testimony was relevant to appellant's state of mind, which had been profoundly affected by the sum of his violent experiences with his father, and would aid the jury in understanding his fear at the time of the offense. At the beginning of the hearing on its reliability, the parties agreed the psychiatrist was an expert, and the State did not challenge the fact that psychology was a recognized health-care field, and because the psychiatrist testified that his analysis was based on his more than 20 years' experience in psychology and his meticulous examination of appellant's records, his methodology was sound. In re E.C.L., 278 S.W.3d 510, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 995 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2009).

457. In a trial for sexual assault on a child, a psychological expert's testimony was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 702, even though the expert did not employ any standardized psychological tests in the evaluation and diagnosis of the complainant; the fact that another psychologist might have chosen to use one or more standardized tests went to the weight, not the admissibility, of the testimony and did not make the expert's scientifically accepted methodology unreliable. Aguilera v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 340 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 19 2007).

458. Trial court did not err by allowing the State's expert to testify that it was more likely than not that defendant would commit future acts of criminal violence because: (1) as a board certified psychiatrist with years of experience and specializing in forensic psychology, the expert was shown to be qualified; (2) while making predications about future behavior was controversial among psychiatrists, forensic psychiatry was a legitimate and recognized field by the American Psychiatric Association; and (3) the expert testified that his method of assessing future-dangerousness was considered valid. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

459. Where defendant was charged with indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, a counselor with years of training and experience was permitted to testify as an expert on child sexual abuse. The counselor held a Bachelor's Degree in social work with a minor in psychology, and a Master's Degree in counseling. Johnson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7412 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 7 2005).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Sobriety Tests

460. Smooth pursuit portion of a horizontal gaze nystagmus test was properly admitted, even though the officer was unable to determine the length of time he spent conducting it, because he also testified that he administered the test correctly and the videotape supported a conclusion that, contrary to defendant's argument, the officer spent approximately 16 seconds in administering the challenged portion of the procedure. Tullos v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6993, 2011 WL 3925586 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 24 2011).

461. In a driving while intoxicated case, an officer was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to testify to the results of a horizontal gaze nystagmus test (HGN), even though he was not currently certified at the time of the stop, because he had obtained his certificate originally in 1999, took a refresher course in 2003 and another in 2009, after the stop in question, and testified he had performed the HGN test hundreds of times. Patton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1069, 2011 WL 541481 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 16 2011).

462. During defendant's trial for driving while intoxicated (DWI) in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, the testimony of an officer with the police department's DWI enforcement unit might have been improper under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 702 because, by repeatedly testifying that the walk-and-turn and one-leg stand sobriety tests provided "validated" or "scientifically validated" clues of impairment, the officer gave those tests an imprimatur of scientific accuracy that they had not been shown to possess and that, in any event, he was not shown qualified to confer. However, reversible error was not presented because the issue was not preserved for appeal, and because defendant's substantial rights were not affected, as there was substantial evidence of defendant's intoxication, including his admission that he had consumed four shots of tequila and the testimony of four witnesses describing his reckless driving, odor of alcoholic beverage, bloodshot eyes, slurred speech, and lack of balance. McIntosh v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 849 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 4 2010).

463. Court properly admitted an officer's testimony regarding horizontal gaze nystagmus because, although holding the stimulus for less time than required, the officer testified that he stopped at the thirty-five degree mark because he saw the onset of nystagmus; additionally, defendant pointed to no authority and nothing in the record suggesting that doing the tests in a "backwards" way would invalidate the results. Soto v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1904 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 19 2009).

464. In a driving while intoxicated trial, exclusion of horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test evidence was within the trial court's discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 702, even though a trooper testified to administering the HGN test in accordance with recommended procedures, because the trial court found the officer's credibility to be lacking, given the failure to have defendant perform the HGN test on video. State v. Rudd, 255 S.W.3d 293, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2360 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

465. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the State made an adequate showing that an officer was qualified to provide expert testimony on a horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test because the officer testified that the officer was certified and had performed the HGN test on 35 test subjects in the police academy in order to receive practitioner certification. Smith v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1783 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 7 2007).

466. In a driving while intoxicated prosecution, the arresting officer was properly permitted to render an expert opinion as to the validity of the horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test, even though he testified he held the stimulus 6 to 8 inches from the eye rather than 12 to 15 inches, because there was no evidence that the distance invalidated the test. Bordelon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 275 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 17 2007).

467. In a criminal prosecution for DWI, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by granting the defendant's motion in limine to prohibit expert testimony relating to the HGN test; the officer deviated from the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration standards by flicking his finger on the pen during the test; therefore, the results were not reliable pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702. State v. Trinidad, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8180 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 13 2006).

468. Appellant's issue was overruled and his driving while intoxicated conviction and sentence pursuant to Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04 were affirmed because an officer had sufficient training and experience to be qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to testify regarding the administration of the horizontal gaze nystagmus test. Price v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5349 (Tex. App. Austin June 23 2006).

469. In defendant's driving while intoxicated case, the court properly allowed the arresting officer to testify regarding defendant's performance on the walk-and-turn and one-legged stand sobriety tests because the tests were grounded in the common knowledge that excessive alcohol consumption could cause problems with coordination, balance, and mental agility. Plouff v. State, 192 S.W.3d 213, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2546 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

470. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

471. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

472. Trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 702 by admitting evidence of Horizontal Gaze Nystagus test without requiring proof from the State that the test was administered properly. The error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), however, because defendant drove erratically as he left the scene of an accident, had a strong odor of alcohol on his breath, admitted to drinking beer and smoking marijuana, had two empty beer cans in his car, and performed poorly on three other sobriety tests. Tillinghast v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7818 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2005).

473. Defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated (DWI) under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04(a) was proper because the trial court did not err in admitting a police officer's testimony regarding the results of the horizontal-gaze nystagmus tests (HGN) test where the officer testified that he attended a standardized field sobriety testing class, that he was certified, and that he had conducted such tests. The theory underlying the HGN test and the technique employed in administering it have both been found sufficiently reliable to allow the test to be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and even though the officer who testified at trial was not the officer that administered the test to defendant, the officer testified about how the HGN test was administered and described the steps the other officer took to administer the tests as a videotape of the incident was shown to the jury. Barrineau v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 903 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 3 2005).

474. Because an officer had completed the necessary training to be considered an expert on the Horizontal Gaze Nystagmus test, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the officer to testify concerning the test even though he had not yet received his certification at the time he performed the test on defendant. Barton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8863 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 5 2004).

475. Sufficient evidence supported a DWI conviction where an officer testified as to his experience, his credentials to give field sobriety tests and as to the specifics on which his opinion was based. Even if a proper predicate was not established, any error was harmless. McDonald v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7319 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 13 2004).

476. In a driving while intoxicated case, because the police officer admitted that in administering the horizontal gaze nystagmus test (HGN) on defendant that he failed to complete the minimum number of 14 passes across defendant's eyes, as required by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, the HGN test results did not meet the requirements for admissibility into evidence, and the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the officer's testimony regarding the HGN test results. Smothers v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6399 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2004).

477. Police officer was qualified as an expert on the HGN test where the requirement was satisfied by proof that the officer had received certification by the State of Texas to administer the HGN, and the officer testified and provided supporting documentation that he had become duly certified to administer the HGN test. Rodriguez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5697 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 29 2004).

478. In a prosecution for DWI, the trial court was not required to suppress evidence of defendant's horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) tests. The underlying scientific theory and the technique applying the theory of the HGN testing were both sufficiently reliable to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Oropeza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 24 2004).

479. Inasmuch as the scientific reliability of the horizontal gaze nystagmus test has already been established, evidence of its reliability is not required before results may be admitted. Oropeza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 24 2004).

480. Where defendant flunked all three field sobriety tests, defendant's conviction of misdemeanor driving while intoxicated in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04 was affirmed because: (1) admission of the evidence regarding the horizontal gaze nystagmus test under Texas R. Evid. 702 was proper in that the officer was qualified as an expert in the administration and the officer performed the screening properly on the occasion in question, and (2) the trial court erred in admitting evidence of vertical gaze nystagmus (VGN) and resting nystagmus tests under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the State failed to show that evidence of VGN and resting nystagmus testing was reliable and relevant to assist the trier of fact, but admission of the evidence was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because it did not affect defendant's substantial rights in that the jury instruction did not require the jury to determine what substance caused defendant's intoxication. Quinney v. State, 99 S.W.3d 853, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1695, 117 A.L.R.5th 803 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2003).

481. Where there was no indication in an officer's sworn report that his opinion of a driver's intoxication was based on his training and experience, his qualifications did not have to be established under Tex. R. Evid. 702; further, the walk-and-turn and one-leg stand tests were not based on a novel scientific theory and, under Tex. R. Evid. 701, a police officer was not required to be an expert to express an opinion as to whether the person he observed was intoxicated. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Struve, 79 S.W.3d 796, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4433 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2002).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Toxicology

482. In a manslaughter case, a court properly admitted an expert's testimony because the expert directed a program training individuals in the effects of alcohol and drugs on driving, he published medical and scientific literature in the area of toxicology, and he did not speculate how the methamphetamine affected defendant, what phase of the drug defendant was in at the time of the accident, or whether defendant fell asleep at the wheel. Haley v. State, 396 S.W.3d 756, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3974, 2013 WL 1286650 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2013).

483. Record contained sufficient evidence showing that enzyme-multiplied immunoassay technique (EMIT), with or without a confirmation test, was reliable scientific evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and therefore the appellate court erred by holding that EMIT tests were unreliable without a confirmation test; the court concluded that the reliability of even a single, unconfirmed EMIT test had been sufficiently established that it met the first two Kelly prongs. The record showed that: (1) the expert witnesses testified that the underlying scientific theory and technique of the EMIT test were accepted as valid by the accredited Texas Department of Public Safety laboratory and the greater forensic toxicology community in Texas; (2) an expert testified that there was literature supporting EMIT as a reliable screening test; (3) from the experts' testimony, the trial court understood that EMIT was a screening test based on enzyme reactions; (4) the expert testimony suggested that the potential error rate in EMIT was very low; (5) the experts testified as to the validity and reliability of the EMIT test and were subject to cross-examination by the State, and many of the courts in the cases cited relied upon expert evaluations of the EMIT technique from their records; and (6) the qualifications of defendant's experts were such that the court believed it could confidently rely upon their testimony. Somers v. State, 368 S.W.3d 528, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 753 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012).

484. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting blood test results because a police officer, who was a drug recognition expert, was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to offer expert testimony as to the effects of a controlled substance on an individual. Through his experience, education, and training, the officer established that he possessed knowledge beyond that of the average person determining if the prescription drug defendant took caused intoxication. Armstrong v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2041, 2012 WL 864778 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 15 2012).

485. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting blood test results because a forensic scientist in toxicology were qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to offer expert testimony as to the effects of a controlled substance on an individual. The forensic scientist received her bachelors and doctorate degrees in chemistry, both with an emphasis in forensic science, she attended a training program with DPS, and that testing for central nervous system depressants was her specialty. Armstrong v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2041, 2012 WL 864778 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 15 2012).

486. Where defendant was charged with intoxication manslaughter and aggravated assault following a vehicular accident, the State's chemist was permitted to give expert testimony concerning the presence of a cocaine metabolite in defendant's blood; defendant presented no challenge to the reliability of the expert's testimony. Bannister v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8522 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 29 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : General Overview

487. At defendant's trial for two counts of continuous sexual abuse of a young child and one count of aggravated sexual assault, the trial court abused its discretion by admitting opinion testimony from an investigator about the truthfulness of the fifteen-year-old victim. Such testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Lewis v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2052, 2012 WL 858601 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 15 2012).

488. In a trial for child sexual assault, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to admit testimony from a clinical social worker regarding the child-complainant's veracity, but the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because defense counsel elicited nearly identical testimony on cross-examination. Nasrollah Hanjani Alizadeh v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1423 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 26 2009).

489. In an action in which appellant appealed from his convictions of three counts of indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the case was remanded to the trial court for a new trial where the exclusion of the psychologist's testimony regarding false memories had a substantial and injurious effect or influence on the jury's verdict and affected a substantial right of appellant's; the psychologist's false-memory testimony was general evidence that directly attacked the complainants' credibility and was, therefore, relevant and admissible during appellant's case-in-chief. Delong v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10031 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 16 2006).

490. Horse owner was properly permitted to testify in rebuttal that a veterinarian who testified that the horse owner's filly did not die because of any actions taken by the horse farm owners, with whom the horse owner left his filly, had told the horse owner that the filly died because the horse farm owners failed to get the filly to the veterinary clinic sooner. Even if the veterinarian's statements to horse owner did not qualify as expert testimony, such statements included a factual basis and had probative value. Gabriel v. Lovewell, 164 S.W.3d 835, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4060 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Rehabilitation

491. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a counselor who worked with victims of family violence because it was not improper bolstering testimony, as the victim, defendant's girlfriend, was vigorously cross-examined and impeached. The testimony also helped explain why the victim refused to report the abuse and why she recanted her affidavit of non- prosecution. Zavala v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9565, 2011 WL 6089935 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 7 2011).

492. In a trial for child sexual abuse, counsel was rendered ineffective by not objecting to the State's bolstering of the complainant's truthfulness and credibility through both experts and lay witnesses; testimony from a forensic interviewer and an expert in child sexual assault investigations was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to the extent that it went to truthfulness rather than methodology. Fuller v. State, 224 S.W.3d 823, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3686 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : General Overview

493. Court properly admitted a psychologist's expert testimony because it was relevant to the jury's understanding of the underage prostitution victim's interactions with defendant, the consequences, and the reasons she remained in an abusive situation. Kentish v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8978 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 14 2014).

494. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated assault of a family member, the trial court erred in admitting testimony from a State witness as an expert on lethality assessment because she did not offer any specifics to support her assertion, and she did not cite any books, articles, journals, or other clinical social workers who practiced in the area. Petriciolet v. State, 442 S.W.3d 643, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8414 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 31 2014).

495. Court properly admitted a lab report and allowed a witness to testify as an expert to the results because he testified that the machine went through the validation process when it arrived at the lab, and defendant did not ask the witness to explain how the software program worked. Brown v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8405 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2014).

496. Court properly admitted expert testimony regarding fingerprint evidence because the officers' testimony was limited to the types of surfaces that were not conducive to lifting fingerprints; as officers trained and experienced in lifting fingerprints, their area of expertise included what made certain surfaces less suitable to lift fingerprints. Brown

v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8405 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2014).

497. Trial court did not commit error in allowing the detective's testimony where the detective did not give an expert opinion about the latent prints he lifted and he did did he testify about the science of fingerprint analysis. Ridge v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7829 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 18 2014).

498. Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of defendant's expert as irrelevant as to whether the trooper was lawfully discharging an official duty when defendant drove at him because the expert's opinion regarding the justification for the use of force was not based on any information regarding the trooper's encounter with defendant. Ramos v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6818 (Tex. App. Austin June 26 2014).

499. Expert is not obligated to have a license to testify under the Texas Supreme Court's own rules of evidence if the person is otherwise qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Tyson Fresh Meats, Inc. v. Abdi, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5693 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 28 2014).

500. In a negligence action under the Federal Employers Liability Act, an ergonomist expert was found to be reliable, as the expert was very knowledgeable of the locomotives and seats a railroad employee encountered because the expert had personally evaluated a large number of a railroad company's locomotives and cab seats over the course of his career. BNSF Ry. Co. v. Phillips, 434 S.W.3d 675, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5533 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 22 2014).

501. Expert testimony was not necessary to establish causation in this case, and evidence of temporal proximity, along with other evidence tending to exclude other potential causes, could have established that the business's trucks caused the damage to the car wash concrete; the causal relationship between the occurrence (delivery trucks driving over the pavement) and the condition (damage to the pavement) could in principle be determined by a layman in this case. Raul Flores, Inc. v. Rodriguez, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3561, 2014 WL 1370344 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 3 2014).

502. Regardless of the questions asked of the officer, he did not give answers that required medical expertise, and his answers related to circumstances such as having to fight an accused or vials being damaged, which amounted to testimony of a lay witness concerning what he observed; defendant was not harmed because the officer did not give expert testimony, regardless of whether the trial court erred in overruling the objection. Eckiss v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7371 (Tex. App. Dallas June 11 2013).

503. Although the motorist's expert calculated the diminution of value to the motorist's vehicle at a certain amount, the jury was free to not believe him, and despite the motorist's arguments, the law is clear an expert is not required to testify as to diminution of value, and because the subject is not one for experts alone, the jury could have disbelieved the expert's uncontroverted testimony, and the court reversed the grant of judgment notwithstanding the verdict to the motorist. Culwell v. Diaz, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7016 (Tex. App. Dallas June 7 2013).

504. Appellant did not object to testimony on expert witness grounds, and that issue was not preserved under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Irving v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6443, 2013 WL 2297075 (Tex. App. Dallas May 23 2013).

505. Given that the proper operation of a sour gas well was not a matter within laypersons' experience, in order for a jury to find the owner liable on the business's negligence claim, the business had to present expert testimony on the standard of care and that the owner violated this. Fairways Offshore Exploration, Inc. v. Patterson Servs., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 891 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 31 2013).

506. Business did not present to the jury expert testimony on the standard of care owed by an owner and operator of a well or that the owner breached any such standard; thus, the business did not provide evidence that the owner failed to exercise the care a well operator would have exercised under the circumstances. Fairways Offshore Exploration, Inc. v. Patterson Servs., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 891 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 31 2013).

507. To the extent the trial court found that expert testimony was necessary in this breach of contract case, this was error; the record indicated that the cost of repairing the pool in question could be shown via bids and the homeowners' lay opinion based on estimates. Seasha Pools, Inc. v. Hardister, 391 S.W.3d 635, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10765, 2012 WL 6761528 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 28 2012).

508. Court agrees that Coastal Transp. Co. v. Crown Cent. Petroleum Corp. provides the appropriate standard for judging the adequacy of testimony offered under the Property Owner Rule, and because property owner testimony is the functional equivalent of expert testimony, it must be judged by the same standards, and thus, as with expert testimony, property valuations may not be based solely on a property owner's ipse dixit; an owner may not simply echo the phrase market value and state a number to substantiate his diminished value claim, he must provide the factual basis on which his opinion rests, and this burden is not onerous, particularly in light of the resources available today: evidence of price paid, nearby sales, tax valuations, appraisals, online resources, and any other relevant factors may be offered to support the claim, but the valuation must be substantiated, and a naked assertion of "market value" is not enough. Of course, the owner's testimony may be challenged on cross-examination or refuted with independent evidence, but even if unchallenged, the testimony must support a verdict, and conclusory or speculative statements do not.

509. Evidence was insufficient to prove breach of an implied duty to market under an oil and gas lease providing that royalties were to be determined based on net proceeds because the royalty owners' expert based his testimony on a hypothetical gas that was free from impurities, rather than the actual gas produced at the well. Thus, his opinion on this issue amounted to no evidence. Occidental Permian Ltd. v. French, 391 S.W.3d 215, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8996, 181 Oil & Gas Rep. 647, 2012 WL 5351131 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 31 2012).

510. Evidence was factually sufficient to support the verdict concerning the citizen's future medical expenses; the jury heard from various experts, including the motorist's treating urologist, and his statements were directed at his inability to predict what future treatment and technology would be available, and his statements were not to imply that the motorist would not have any future medical expenses, and other experts detailed the motorist's diagnoses, medication, and anticipated future medical expenses. Saeco Elec. & Util., Ltd. v. Gonzales, 392 S.W.3d 803, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8647 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 17 2012).

511. Question of whether hail fell on a particular location on a particular day, and whether it caused property damage, is not a matter solely within the scope of an expert's knowledge, and thus is not a matter that requires expert testimony; to the contrary, it is a matter of personal observation and common sense that is within the scope of lay testimony. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Lynd Co., 399 S.W.3d 206, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6770 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 15 2012).

512. Lay witness is competent to state based on personal observation and common sense whether hail fell on a particular location on a particular date, and to make a logical connection between the hail event and the property damage existing after the storm; while it may require an expert using scientific data to predict or plot the track of a hail storm or to estimate the dollar value of the property damage, it does not require expert knowledge to say, based on one's personal observation and recollection, whether a hail storm in fact damaged a particular property during a particular time period, and no authority is cited establishing that this type of causation issue must be guided solely by expert evidence. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Lynd Co., 399 S.W.3d 206, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6770 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 15 2012).

513. Insured cited case law stating that expert testimony was required in a hail damage case, but that case was distinguishable because the court found only that expert testimony was required to establish the necessity of a replacement of a roof, plus the costs thereof, based on a negligent roof repair. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Lynd Co., 399 S.W.3d 206, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6770 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 15 2012).

514. Expert evidence presented did not conclusively establish the fact that one storm caused the damage; summary judgment on the issue was improper. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Lynd Co., 399 S.W.3d 206, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6770 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 15 2012).

515. Billing attorney was permitted to testify on the process of document production, which included the volume of documents produced by each side and the process of review, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that this testimony was not expert testimony. Port of Houston Auth. v. Zachry Constr. Corp., 377 S.W.3d 841, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6591 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 9 2012).

516. Counsel objected to a billing attorney's testimony in light of the trial court's expert opinion ruling, the trial court agreed that the attorney would be offering an opinion if she talked about certain things, and appellant agreed to ask the attorney not to add certain information, such that the trial court did not make an adverse ruling or deny appellee relief. Port of Houston Auth. v. Zachry Constr. Corp., 377 S.W.3d 841, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6591 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 9 2012).

517. Court finds no authority that holds that failure to challenge a fee expert's methodology waives a factual sufficiency complaint on appeal. Port of Houston Auth. v. Zachry Constr. Corp., 377 S.W.3d 841, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6591 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 9 2012).

518. Expert's testimony was sufficient to support the findings on attorney fees. Port of Houston Auth. v. Zachry Constr. Corp., 377 S.W.3d 841, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6591 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 9 2012).

519. Witnesses were considered experts because their testimony was based on their diagnoses and treatment of appellants; the main substance of the witnesses' testimony was based on an application of their specialized scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge. Ibarra v. City of Laredo, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5741, 2012 WL 2914216 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 18 2012).

520. Because the insurer did not object to expert opinion testimony, on appeal the insurer could only challenge whether the expert's testimony was conclusory and amounted to no evidence. Charter Oak Fire INS. Co. v. Swanigan, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3312 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 26 2012).

521. Insurer did not object to an expert's testimony, and thus the insurer's analytical gap complaint regarding the expert's testimony was not preserved for review. Charter Oak Fire INS. Co. v. Swanigan, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3312 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 26 2012).

522. Finding in favor of the taxpayer in a property tax dispute was inappropriate because the testimony of the taxpayer's appraiser was legally insufficient to support the jury's findings. Although there was some evidence of the apartment complex's market value, the evidence did not conclusively establish the market value under Tex. Tax Code Ann. § 23.01(b). Cent. Appraisal Dist. v. Western Ah 406, Ltd., 372 S.W.3d 672, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3299, 2012 WL 1438454 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 26 2012).

523. Customers claimed a representative for the bank was not designated as an expert, and thus it appeared they believed the representative's affidavit should not have been allowed, but the court did not find an abuse of discretion; the representative was designated as a representative of the bank, and the objection to his affidavit was in a response to the bank's summary judgment motion, which did not seek relief regarding the affidavit and did not specify what parts of the affidavit required expert testimony. All Am. Siding & Windows, Inc. v. Bank of Am., N.A., 367 S.W.3d 490, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3118, 77 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. 2d (CBC) 388, 2012 WL 1366568 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 20 2012).

524. To show that an attorney's breach caused damages, the client had to prove a suit within a suit, and based on the nature of his breach of fiduciary duty claim, expert testimony was required to prove causation and the client did not proffer any evidence to that effect, making summary judgment for the attorney proper. Smith v. Aldridge, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2499, 2012 WL 1071246 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 29 2012).

525. Client sought the appointment of a special master so he could get help in finding an expert to testify on his behalf, but that was not an exceptional reason that warranted such an appointment. Smith v. Aldridge, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2499, 2012 WL 1071246 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 29 2012).

526. Client claimed he was harmed because the attorney unreasonably engaged in settlement talks, and expert testimony was needed to prove the claim because the wisdom of engaging in such talks was tactical and not within most jurors' common understanding. Smith v. Aldridge, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2499, 2012 WL 1071246 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 29 2012).

527. Client claimed the attorney did not marshal evidence to defeat summary judgment in the underlying case; lay jurors are not familiar with summary judgment standards and thus expert testimony would be necessary to show that any evidence produced would be enough to preclude summary judgment. Smith v. Aldridge, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2499, 2012 WL 1071246 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 29 2012).

528. Expert testimony was necessary to prove the client's claim that he would have prevailed but for the attorney's failure to give him pleadings and other documents, and because he proffered no expert testimony to establish this and other issues that required expert testimony, the trial court did not err in granting the attorney no-evidence summary judgment as to the client's negligence claim. Smith v. Aldridge, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2499, 2012 WL 1071246 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 29 2012).

529. Client's request for counsel did not relieve him of his summary judgment burden to submit evidence of causation in his action against his attorney, which required expert testimony. Smith v. Aldridge, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2499, 2012 WL 1071246 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 29 2012).

530. In a partnership dispute, a trial court did not err by awarding withdrawal damages because expert testimony was not required; the only two assets at the time of a partner's death were his capital contribution and two properties, and former Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 6132b-8.06 did not apply. Moreover, the jury could have reasonably relied upon testimony by a partner regarding the value of the properties. Sewing v. Bowman, 371 S.W.3d 321, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2438, 2012 WL 1065876 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 29 2012).

531. Appellant did not object to the evidence offered by witnesses in valuing an automated teller machine, front-end loader, or cost of repairs in his trial for theft and criminal mischief, and thus any objection related to hearsay and lay and expert opinions was waived under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Lee v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1441, 2012 WL 592192 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 23 2012).

532. Attorney's expert conclusions on causation, which were offered without explanation of how a jury would have more likely than not returned a verdict favorable to a corporation after hearing certain evidence, did not amount to evidence of causation, and thus there was no evidence of asserted breaches of duty by a law firm. Burnwood, Inc. v. Craig, Terrill Hale & Grantham, L.L.P., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1212, 2012 WL 512648 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 16 2012).

533. Jury's award of $ 66.5 million in damages was not rendered insufficient simply because it exceeded the range of values suggested by an expert. Carlton Energy Group, LLC v. Phillips, 369 S.W.3d 433, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1299, 2012 WL 555980 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 14 2012).

534. Court was not compelled to affirm the trial court's remittitur just because a limited liability company's counsel suggested that the jury award actual damages of $ 31.16 million; the court's duty was to determine whether the evidence, including but not limited to the expert opinion testimony, was sufficient to support the jury's higher award. Carlton Energy Group, LLC v. Phillips, 369 S.W.3d 433, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1299, 2012 WL 555980 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 14 2012).

535. In calculating the fair market value of the limited liability company's interest in a project at the time of the tortious interference and awarding $ 66.5 million, the jury had the expert's opinions and methodologies, and a business and corporation did not present the jury with any contradictory evidence in connection with attacking the expert evidence, nor did they present their own expert testimony to suggest a lesser fair market value; although nothing directly set forth how the jury arrived at its damage award, the award was sufficiently supported by expert testimony and other detailed information. Carlton Energy Group, LLC v. Phillips, 369 S.W.3d 433, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1299, 2012 WL 555980 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 14 2012).

536. In this legal malpractice case, both sides presented expert witnesses, and the jury was free to give each expert's testimony the weight it felt was appropriate; the jury was free to believe one expert over another and the finding that law firm two was not negligent was not against the great weight of the evidence. Parsons v. Greenberg, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 888, 2012 WL 310505 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 2 2012).

537. Statement in case law did not support the position that the sole means of proof in cases involving seismic testing was by way of expert testimony. Seitel Data, Ltd. v. Simmons, 362 S.W.3d 782, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 347, 2012 WL 129766 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 18 2012).

538. Court is not persuaded that expert testimony about the connection between the blasting and the injury is necessary in every case, and will not state such a bright-line rule, and a claimant is required, however, to show a causal connection between the event and the injury; in an appeal where the review is under a "no evidence" standard, the evidence would not need to be great, but only more than a scintilla or a suspicion, and in making such a determination, however, the court still must determine what sort of evidence must have been presented, and what evidence actually was presented. Seitel Data, Ltd. v. Simmons, 362 S.W.3d 782, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 347, 2012 WL 129766 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 18 2012).

539. Court believes that a juror, applying commonsense understanding, can tie the relationship of the vibrations of the earth caused by seismic testing with reasonable probability to the concurrent abrupt sanding of a water well; hence, although expert testimony is often helpful to the understanding of the effects of seismic testing and is often advised, when there has been convincing lay witness evidence presented, it is not absolutely mandatory. Seitel Data, Ltd. v. Simmons, 362 S.W.3d 782, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 347, 2012 WL 129766 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 18 2012).

540. Common sense could allow a jury to conclude that when explosives strong enough to bounce waves off various geologic strata are used to shake the ground, the shaking could open previously tight formations to allow sand to filter through the gravel pack into the wellbore, and the jury issue as framed in this case required no particularized expertise; for the analysis, in the context of the situation in this case, expert testimony was not necessary, and there was some evidence to connect the actions of the company in its on-site seismic testing and the damage occasioned to the water well. Seitel Data, Ltd. v. Simmons, 362 S.W.3d 782, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 347, 2012 WL 129766 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 18 2012).

541. Given the evidence that the insurer provided coverage even before the house was built and damage manifested in May 2000, actual damages had to have happened during the insurer's coverage; thus, the insurer's duty to indemnify was triggered, and expert testimony showing the exact injury date was not required in order to trigger this duty. Vines-Herrin Custom Homes, Llc v. Great Am. Lloyds INS. Co., 357 S.W.3d 166, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10027 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 21 2011).

542. To defeat summary judgment on their negligence, warranty, and Deceptive Trade Practices Act claims, appellants had to produce expert testimony that appellees' acts or omissions were not merely a possible cause of the vehicle fire, but were the probable cause, but the evidence offered fell short of this; appellants produced no expert testimony and they failed to designate a testifying expert on causation. Santos v. I Lone Star Auto Parts, Ltd., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9424, 2011 WL 6157031 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 1 2011).

543. Assuming arguendo that the trial court erroneously allowed a witness's alleged expert testimony, prior to the witness testifying, another witness testified to similar evidence without objection, and thus error, if any, was harmless. Basic Energy Serv. v. D-S-B Props., 367 S.W.3d 254, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9286, 2011 WL 6187113 (Tex. App. Tyler Nov. 23 2011).

544. Homeowners produced no admissible expert testimony on causation relating to their property damage claims, and thus summary judgment on the claims for property damage was proper. Baker v. Energy Transfer Co., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8304, 2011 WL 4978287 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 19 2011).

545. This case, concerning toxic exposure, required expert testimony, and because homeowners' experts were stricken, they had no causation evidence from an expert, and the grant of summary judgment to the companies on the homeowners' negligence and negligence per se claims was thus proper. Baker v. Energy Transfer Co., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8304, 2011 WL 4978287 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 19 2011).

546. Homeowners did not file competent expert testimony that companies caused harm to them, and thus the trial court did not err in granting summary judgment on the nuisance claim. Baker v. Energy Transfer Co., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8304, 2011 WL 4978287 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 19 2011).

547. Homeowners did not file competent expert testimony that companies caused chemicals to enter onto the homeowners' land, and thus summary judgment on their trespass claim was proper. Baker v. Energy Transfer Co., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8304, 2011 WL 4978287 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 19 2011).

548. Doctors testified to the patient's mental illness, but expert testimony confirming such, alone, would not support an involuntary commitment. State Ex Rel. C.B., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7324, 2011 WL 3918686 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 7 2011).

549. Whether complications arose from surgical procedures performed on a patient and whether excess skin was a complication required expert testimony, plus this testimony was necessary to establish the meaning of complication, as defined within the medical community and also within the parties' settlement agreement. Contreras v. Clint Indep. Sch. Dist., 347 S.W.3d 413, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6231 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 10 2011).

550. Rational juror, based on the plain language of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 82.001(4) and the evidence, could have concluded that a company was a manufacturer under the statute; witnesses testified that the company designed, assembled, and installed underground storage tanks, and created design plans, and to the extent an expert testified, an expert witness could state an opinion on mixed questions of law and fact, as in this instance. Petroleum Solutions, Inc. v. Head, 454 S.W.3d 518, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3289 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 29 2011).

551. Because property owners did not designate themselves or qualify as experts on the issues concerning attorney fees, the trial court properly restricted their testimony concerning the reasonableness and necessity of attorney fees. Ogu v. C.I.A. Servs., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1979, 2011 WL 947008 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 17 2011).

552. In condemnation proceedings, an affidavit of the vice president of the corporate general partner of a limited partnership was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 701 regarding the valuation of the property to be take for a water line easement because his opinion was based on his expertise rather than his personal familiarity with the property and he was not timely disclosed as an expert. Reid Rd. Mun. Util. Dist. No. 2 v. Speedy Stop Food Stores, Ltd., 337 S.W.3d 846, 2011 Tex. LEXIS 190, 54 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 658 (Tex. 2011).

553. Expert testimony was legally sufficient to support damages awarded to a motorist for future physical pain; one doctor testified that the motorist would never be pain free, and another doctor testified that the motorist would likely have continuous pain for at least 15 to 20 years. City of Waco v. Fuentes, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1707, 2011 WL 817418 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 9 2011).

554. Although the city argued insufficient evidence supported the amount awarded because there was no expert testimony that the conditions treated and the expenses were caused by the accident, the court found that legally sufficient evidence existed from which the jury could have inferred that the damages claimed in certain bills resulted from the accident, given that (1) a doctor testified that everything he ordered was reasonable and directed at the motorist's complaints, and (2) the x-rays and MRIs ordered by another doctor were necessary for diagnosing the motorist's injuries suffered in the accident. City of Waco v. Fuentes, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1707, 2011 WL 817418 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 9 2011).

555. Decedent's wife failed to preserve any error on the admission of the deputy's testimony because she affirmatively stated that she had no other objection to the report, and thereby waived her objection to the deputy's point-of-impact opinion in the police report based on Tex. R. Evid. 702; the deputy's testimony became cumulative of other evidence in the case. Austin v. Weems, 337 S.W.3d 415, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4166 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 24 2011).

556. Worker's family argued that the trial court, under Tex. R. Civ. P. 278, properly refused to submit questions in the charge on the worker's negligence because there was no expert testimony submitted requiring such, but the court disagreed; the evidence that supported submission of the questions was that when the worker first struck the iron sponge on the tank, the vibration started knocking things down, and it would have been within the common knowledge of laymen that hitting the iron sponge again might have caused further sponge portions to fall. Gsf Energy, Llc v. Padron, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 948 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 10 2011).

557. Probable duration of a passenger's injuries was not within the general experience and common knowledge of laypersons, and while a layperson's knowledge could link the passenger's injuries to the accident, a layperson could only speculate about how long a neck or back strain, bruised ribs, and a fractured toe took to heal or whether they were likely to heal at all; absent the required expert testimony, the jury lacked legally sufficient evidence on which to base its damage award, and because the court was unable to suggest an appropriate amount for a remittitur, the court remanded for a new trial on all issues, under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(b). Tex. DOT v. Banda, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10316, 2010 WL 5463857 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 22 2010).

558. Mother did not object to the reliability of a doctor's testimony at trial, and thus waived this complaint for appellate review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. In the Interest of S.R., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9681, 2010 WL 4983484 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 8 2010).

559. Experts' testimony identifying numerous potential causes of the worker's accident without excluding any of them constituted no evidence that these factors caused the accident. Blaine v. National-oilwell, L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9614, 2010 WL 4951779 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2010).

560. Expert's opinion that the speed of the sand line drum caused a worker's death was conclusory and unsupported by the facts, plus he improperly relied on witnesses who lacked personal knowledge under Tex. R. Evid. 602. Blaine v. National-oilwell, L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9614, 2010 WL 4951779 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2010).

561. In the absence of any underlying facts to support the opinion that a guard gate was a producing cause of the accident, an expert's statements were just conclusory and insufficient to defeat summary judgment. Blaine v. National-oilwell, L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9614, 2010 WL 4951779 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2010).

562. Two experts' opinions failed to provide an adequate factual basis to support the conclusion that an allegedly unsecured floor plate contributed to an accident and was insufficient to defeat summary judgment. Blaine v. National-oilwell, L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9614, 2010 WL 4951779 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2010).

563. Expert's opinion that the speed of the drum caused the accident was not supported by any actual evidence, and his opinion also did not provide any underlying facts to support his conclusion that a lower guard gate contributed to the accident; he offered nothing showing that a higher gate had any probability of preventing the accident or lessening the worker's injuries, such that the expert's opinion was conclusory and was no evidence of causation. Blaine v. National-oilwell, L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9614, 2010 WL 4951779 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2010).

564. Subject of how water traveled after being absorbed by the ground and how such affected the water table were subjects beyond the general understanding and common knowledge of lay witnesses, and the homeowners' evidence did not show a close connection between the filling of the pond and the problems the homeowners experienced on their lot; for purposes of their claims, including under Tex. Water Code Ann. § 11.086, the homeowners were required to present expert testimony to show that a fact issue existed regarding whether the construction of the pond was the cause in fact of the excessive water on their lot, and as they did not, summary judgment was proper for the developer. Palma v. Chribran Co., L.L.C., 327 S.W.3d 866, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8921 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 10 2010).

565. Assuming that the client's allegations constituted a breach of the standard of care, the causal link between the client's allegations and any damages was not sufficiently obvious so as to have rendered expert testimony unnecessary; such testimony was necessary to determine whether (1) the client would have prevailed at trial if there was no filing delay or a change of venue, (2) the client would have prevailed had the attorney not withdrawn, (3) the trial court would have granted certain requests that would have altered the outcome of the underlying litigation, and (4) the client would have prevailed on a foregone malpractice claim. Finley v. Fargason, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8324, 2010 WL 4053711 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 15 2010).

566. Without the benefit of expert testimony, it was beyond a fact-finder's common understanding how the attorney's failure to notify the client's ex-wife of a deposition caused the client to give up an owelty lien; the client presented no evidence, expert or otherwise, that a reasonable attorney should have foreseen dangers allegedly created by this notification failure. Finley v. Fargason, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8324, 2010 WL 4053711 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 15 2010).

567. Objection that an expert's affidavit was conclusory was a substantive defect that could be raised for the first time on appeal, as here. Pakideh v. Pope, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7988, 2010 WL 3820899 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 30 2010).

568. Attorney's expert statements were nothing more than categorical denials of the clients' allegations; the challenged statements were conclusory and the traditional summary judgment was improper to the extent it was based on this evidence. Pakideh v. Pope, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7988, 2010 WL 3820899 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 30 2010).

569. Assuming, without deciding, that it was error to admit an officer's testimony under either Tex. R. Evid. 701 or 702, his testimony had a slight effect, if any, on the jury's verdict, and thus any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the purpose of the officer's testimony was to show the dangerous nature of the events that took place, and from photographs admitted, the jury could have inferred that the incident was extremely dangerous. The primary issue was whether appellant committed the offenses of criminal mischief, attempted escape, and resisting arrest, and the evidence from other sources showing appellant committed these offenses was overwhelming. Mccutchen v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7760, 2010 WL 3699987 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 22 2010).

570. Court had no doubt that the diagnosis of hypoglycemia was more complicated than merely comparing the test results to the ranges preprinted on a test result form; the court was not a medical doctor and it was not the court's role to determine whether the doctor's diagnosis was correct, plus the State did not present any expert testimony that the doctor's analysis was incorrect. Smarr v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7478, 2010 WL 3518746 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 10 2010).

571. Although defendant claimed that counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the admission of one of the victim's videotaped statement, which defendant claimed was inadmissible pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.071, § 5(a) because a police officer was present when the statement was made, for failing to object to the testimony of a nurse who examined one of the victims, and for failing to object to testimony regarding extraneous offenses, the court found that: (1) the detective was not "present" for the victim's interview as that term was used in Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.071, § 5(a) since it was a common practice for officers to contemporaneously observe the child's interview in an adjacent room; (2) assuming without deciding that the testimony was improper, defendant was not harmed by its admission, and thus, the court could not say that the admission of the nurse's "diagnosis" prejudiced the defense; (3) pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, the State used the hypothetical questions at issue to help the jury understand the absence of physical evidence and to know that that was not uncommon in cases of child sexual abuse, and thus, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to that line of questions; and (4) much of the victim's testimony was directly relevant to the allegations in the indictment regarding defendant's sexual assaults on the other victim and to the extent, the testimony involved extraneous acts committed against the victim, the evidence was admissible as same transaction-contextual evidence. Bonner v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7440, 2010 WL 3503858 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 8 2010).

572. Although the expert testimony did not specifically address the precise proportion of the injury attributable to each accident, the evidence showed that the first one started the injury; the jury could have found that the motorist's injuries were the result of a preexisting condition caused by the first accident, and there was more than a scintilla of evidence to support the jury's award. Benham v. Lynch, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7086 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug.

573. Appellees' expert could not opine that the worker would not have developed mesothelioma absent exposure to a company's asbestos-containing joint compound, and because a plaintiff had to prove that a defendant's conduct was a cause in fact of the harm, appellees' evidence did not satisfy the required substantial factor causation elements for maintaining their product liability and negligence suit. Ga.-pac. Corp. v. Bostic, 320 S.W.3d 588, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7072 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26 2010).

574. Court agreed with the company's assertion that appellees did not establish substantial factor causation to the extent they improperly based their showing of specific causation on their expert's testimony and the testimony of another doctor that each and every exposure to asbestos caused or contributed to the worker's mesothelioma. Ga.-pac. Corp. v. Bostic, 320 S.W.3d 588, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7072 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26 2010).

575. Expert doctor admitted his studies could not establish an exposure level or dose for a worker particularly because of the many variables in the circumstances, and thus his testimony regarding the results of his material practice simulation studies did not quantify the worker's exposure to asbestos fibers from the company's asbestos-containing joint compound. Ga.-pac. Corp. v. Bostic, 320 S.W.3d 588, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7072 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26 2010).

576. Appellees' evidence, including that from expert witnesses that had been found to be insufficient proof in other cases, was insufficient to provide quantitative evidence of a worker's exposure to asbestos fibers from a company's joint compound or to show that his exposure was in sufficient amounts to have increased his risk of developing mesothelioma; appellees failed to meet the substantial factor causation mandate. Ga.-pac. Corp. v. Bostic, 320 S.W.3d 588, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7072 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26 2010).

577. Issue of whether a provision in a divorce decree demonstrated a breach of the standard of care was not an issue that any layperson could understand and the client did not cite and the court did not find any legal authority that would support an extension of an exception to providing expert testimony in a legal malpractice matter to the situation in this case. Bagan v. Hays, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6530, 2010 WL 3190525 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 12 2010).

578. Because appellees disputed the existence of an agreement extending certain deadlines and the client did not provide evidence that the alleged agreement met the requirements of Tex. R. Civ. P. 11, the court rejected the argument that an agreement between the parties relieved the client of the requirement of providing expert testimony by the time the summary judgment motion was filed. Bagan v. Hays, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6530, 2010 WL 3190525 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 12 2010).

579. Relevancy objection was properly overruled pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 702 in a case involving sexual abuse of a child because defense counsel had previously cross-examined the nurse practitioner about her experience with false allegations of sexual abuse and circumstances involving the absence of physical findings; thus, the redirect of the nurse practitioner regarding statistics of confirmed cases of sexual abuse where there were no physical findings was relevant. Cortez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5854, 2010 WL 2889670 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 22 2010).

580. Insurer was entitled to no-evidence summary judgment in an employee's action for breach of contract after the denial of continuous total disability benefits because the employee's physical symptoms could not be directly linked to his on-the-job injury without expert testimony; affidavits by the employee and his wife were insufficient as the employee had a prior back injury in 1980 that led to a spinal fusion and subsequent issues with obesity, high blood pressure, and diabetes. Humphrey v. Aig Life Ins. Co., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4961, 2010 WL 2635643 (Tex.

App. Houston 14th Dist. July 1 2010).

581. Driver did not brief one expert testimony issue separately, and she did not advise where she preserved such a sufficiency challenge based on a lack of expert testimony and the court did not find it in her motion for a new trial, motion for directed verdict, or in her objections, and the court did not address the argument. Figueroa v. Davis, 318 S.W.3d 53, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2574 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 8 2010).

582. Expert did not opine as to how much asbestos a worker had been exposed to or what a minimum exposure at which a person's risk of mesothelioma increases might be, such that the opinion went only to general causation. Smith v. Kelly-moore Paint Co., 307 S.W.3d 829, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1367 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 25 2010).

583. Without scientific evidence of the minimum exposure level leading to an increased risk of development of mesothelioma from exposure to chrysotile-only asbestos, such as that contained in the company's joint compound, an expert's opinion lacked the factual and scientific foundation required by case law and was insufficient to raise a fact issue as to specific causation. Smith v. Kelly-moore Paint Co., 307 S.W.3d 829, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1367 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 25 2010).

584. Corporation's employees who testified against appellant, a terminated employee, regarding allegedly improper financial conduct by appellant were fact witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 701 rather than expert witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 702, such that non-produced documents, which the testifying employees referred to, were not subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.6(a). Marin v. IESI TX Corp., 317 S.W.3d 314, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 981 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 11 2010).

585. Whether a construction-management firm's supervisory duties included more than ensuring that the approved plans were built according to specifications called for requires specialized knowledge in the construction-management firm industry, but there was never any evidence, interpretation, or determination of the standard of care for the jury to properly decide the negligence issue; even if the contract identified the applicable standard of care, competent expert testimony was required to establish that standard for construction-management firms, and the company's expert did not discuss this. 3D + Perspectiva v. Castner Palms, Ltd., 310 S.W.3d 27, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 936 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 10 2010).

586. Because no expert testimony, much less any evidence, was presented as to the applicable standard of care, the trial court erred by denying a joint venture's motion for an instructed verdict in this negligence action. 3D + Perspectiva v. Castner Palms, Ltd., 310 S.W.3d 27, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 936 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 10 2010).

587. Proper scope of discovery is a matter for the sound discretion of the trial court under Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.4, and these are not generally matters appropriate for expert testimony. Shanley v. First Horizon Home Loan Corp., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9301 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 8 2009).

588. Expert's affidavit suggested that additional discovery was necessary to establish the duties owed, but the existence of a duty was a question of law and an expert was not competent to give an opinion on such, such that the trial court did not err in striking the expert's affidavit. Shanley v. First Horizon Home Loan Corp., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9301 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 8 2009).

589. Court had to decide by clear and convincing evidence that because the parents were mentally deficient, they were unable to prevent exposing their oldest child to the person she accused of sexually abusing her and that this supported a finding that the parents were unable to provide for the needs of the other children, but this was difficult to prove because it first required proof that the exposure to sexual abuse of the older child was not mere negligence or poor parenting, but that it happened because the parents were mentally deficient, and there also had to be evidence to support a finding that the parents' mental deficiencies kept them from now and in the future providing for the children; while the court is not holding that expert testimony is always essential in a termination case of this sort, the other evidence in this case consisted primarily of conclusory statements by lay witnesses. In re A.L.M., 300 S.W.3d 914, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8991 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 20 2009).

590. Court disagreed with an architecture firm that expert testimony as to whether the firm breached an architect's standard of care would serve any relevant purpose for the trial court prior to trial; the trial court was perfectly capable of determining whether the contract required the firm to apply the law in its design, whether the law prohibited the use of a septic system, and whether the design included a septic system, such that a certificate of merit would not be required for the trial court to determine if the claim had merit. Parker County Veterinary Clinic, Inc. v. Gsbs Batenhorst, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8986, 2009 WL 3938051 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 19 2009).

591. There was no expert evidence showing the value of a client's claims in the coin company lawsuit and no evaluation of whether his claims would somehow have entitled him to greater recovery than that afforded by the settlement; the client had not produced more than a scintilla of evidence on the elements of proximate cause or damages in his professional negligence claim. Walker v. Morgan, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8653, 2009 WL 3763779 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 12 2009).

592. Company did not have the burden of proof and it was not required to prove there was no defect, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 82.005(a), and the company also was not required to prove an alternate theory for the fire; not having the burden of proof, the company did not need to present any expert testimony at all, such that the alleged unreliability of the company's expert testimony was immaterial, for holding otherwise would improperly shift the burden of proof to the company. Hunter v. Ford Motor Co., 305 S.W.3d 202, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8682 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 10 2009).

593. Even if the court was to disregard the company's expert testimony and to review only the family's expert testimony, in this case the jury could still properly determine that the family had not proved a defective design that was unreasonably dangerous; a reasonable jury could have disbelieved the family's experts' theory as to how the fire started and their proposed safer alternative designs, or the jury could have believed that the truck was not unreasonably dangerous based on the record. Hunter v. Ford Motor Co., 305 S.W.3d 202, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8682 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 10 2009).

594. While the family was required to present expert testimony on design defect, including safer alternative design and producing cause, that requirement did not translate into such expert testimony, even if uncontroverted, being conclusive and binding on the jury, which alone determined if the product was unreasonably dangerous and a producing cause. Hunter v. Ford Motor Co., 305 S.W.3d 202, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8682 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 10 2009).

595. Parties did not dispute and the court agreed that the deceased driver's family was required to prove their design-defect claim with expert testimony. Hunter v. Ford Motor Co., 305 S.W.3d 202, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8682 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 10 2009).

596. In defendant's drug case, the trial court did not err in allowing a witness to testify as to what tanks were used for because the witness had worked for the business for 16 years at the time of the trial, and the witness testified that the tanks were used to store and move fertilizer and anhydrous ammonia. That was not scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge that was being offered to assist the trier of fact. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8078, 2009 WL 3335282 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 16 2009).

597. Existence of a duty was a question of law for the court to decide and thus the court's analysis was unaffected by an expert's affidavit; in addition, his conclusions, which were contrary to governing law, were based at least in part on assumptions that were contrary to the undisputed facts. Leigh v. Kuenstler, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7633, 2009 WL 3126538 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

598. Erroneous admission of expert testimony was nonconstitutional error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Lantrip v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7401, 2009 WL 3019699 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 23 2009).

599. Trooper's complained-of testimony regarding the correlation between defendant's performance during the one-leg stand test and blood alcohol concentration was significantly outweighed by other evidence of intoxication in defendant's driving while intoxicated trial; evidence of defendant's performance on three standardized field sobriety tests and testimony correlating performance on the other two field sobriety tests to a blood alcohol concentration level was powerful evidence having a similar nature and probative value as the complained-of expert testimony, and because the unchallenged trial evidence significantly outweighed any potential harm caused by the complained-of testimony, even though the court assumed error, defendant did not show the level of harm necessary under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) to require reversal. Lantrip v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7401, 2009 WL 3019699 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 23 2009).

600. In a case where a patient was committed as a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.003(a), the evidence was sufficient with regards to experts' testimony because they had all reviewed the patient's records, interviewed him, and scored him on assessment tests; their opinions, while differing, all had support. A rational jury could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that the patient suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to commit a predatory act of sexual violence. In re Diaz, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6930, 2009 WL 2749958 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 31 2009).

601. In a case where a patient was committed as a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.003(a), the patient was permitted to raise the issue of the sufficiency of expert testimony for the first time on appeal; the patient did not make objections at trial that the testimony was speculative or conclusory. In re Diaz, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6930, 2009 WL 2749958 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 31 2009).

602. Because causation was not an issue for experts alone, the jury could have disregarded an expert's conclusion as to causation and the jury was free to conclude that an employer failed to prove (1) that the negligence of others was a cause of the accident and (2) that a marketing or design defect was a cause of the accident; furthermore, evidence proving a safer alternative design was lacking. Rentech Steel, L.L.C. v. Teel, 299 S.W.3d 155, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6323 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 13 2009).

603. In this case in which a minor employee sustained serious bilateral hand injuries, the amount of damages for medical expenses and lost earning capacity was supported by the experts' testimony. Rentech Steel, L.L.C. v. Teel, 299 S.W.3d 155, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6323 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 13 2009).

604. Expert testimony did not support the damages awarded in this case; because both the income and market methods relied on speculative income forecasting and the cost method only supported an award of $ 2.2 million, the evidence was not legally sufficient to support an award of $ 3 million. M&A Tech., Inc. v. iValue Group, Inc., 295 S.W.3d 356, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6264 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 12 2009).

605. Dentist did not move for directed verdict on the lack of expert testimony with respect to either the standard of care or any breach of the standard; therefore in the court's analysis, the court addressed only the evidence offered with respect to causation. Cooper v. Gulley, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6129, 2009 WL 2397808 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 6 2009).

606. Patient argued that the trial court erred in granting a directed verdict on causation because there was probative evidence that the removal of the wrong tooth caused him to no longer be a candidate for a permanent bridge, and the court agreed; an expert's testimony regarding a permanent bridge was couched in terms of probability, not possibility, and considering the evidence proffered on the issue of causation under the standards for granting a directed verdict, the court sustained the patient's issue. Cooper v. Gulley, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6129, 2009 WL 2397808 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 6 2009).

607. Phrases such as "it's entirely probable" and "planned on using" go beyond conjecture, speculation, and mere possibility and indicate reasonable medical probability. Cooper v. Gulley, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6129, 2009 WL 2397808 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 6 2009).

608. In a products liability case, expert testimony was required because the evidence merely created a suspicion that a manufacturing defect caused a portable picnic table to collapse; in this case, causation was not within a layperson's general experience and common understanding. Further, there was no showing of a deviation from specifications or planned output, other possible causes had not been ruled out, and an injured party's pain could have been affected by the natural aging process and arthritis. Lyon v. Atico Int'l USA, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4823, 2009 WL 1800820 (Tex. App. Waco June 24 2009).

609. In an action alleging nuisance, a trial court did not err by striking an untimely motion to designate an expert witness; the attempted designation was over a year after the original deadline and over two years after the filing of the suit. Moreover, there was no showing of good cause. Paselk v. Rabun, 293 S.W.3d 600, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4266 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 16 2009).

610. Owner presented no expert testimony as to any of the theories of liability asserted in his live pleading; thus, the court had to analyze each of the owner's theories and the evidence presented as to each to determine whether a layperson would have been able to ascertain the applicable standard of care in the absence of expert testimony. Huffaker v. Wylie LP Gas, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3741, 2009 WL 1506901 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2009).

611. Testimony provided no insight into what the applicable standard of care would have been for a gas company and the court did not find the evidence sufficient to have allowed an ordinary layperson, in the absence of expert testimony, to find what the applicable standard of care was in regard to the company's storage of its propane tanks or that the company breached this standard. Huffaker v. Wylie LP Gas, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3741, 2009 WL 1506901 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2009).

612. While testimony established that a gas company's manager felt that there were times when proper inspections were not performed, because the basis for his opinion was not shown, the court was unable to conclude, without expert testimony, what the applicable standard of care was in regard to the company's maintenance, handling, and inspection of the tanks, nor did the evidence raise a genuine issue of fact about that standard having been breached. Huffaker v. Wylie LP Gas, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3741, 2009 WL 1506901 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2009).

613. In the absence of expert testimony, no evidence established that the applicable standard of care would be that no tanks ever be overfilled or that, if a tank was overfilled, that it should not be bled off, and because the filling of liquid propane gas tanks was beyond the experience of an ordinary layperson, a property owner provided no evidence of what the applicable standard of care was as it related to filling propane tanks and whether bleeding off the excess propane in an overfilled tank fell below the applicable standard of care. Huffaker v. Wylie LP Gas, Inc.,

2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3741, 2009 WL 1506901 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2009).

614. There was no evidence that a reasonable liquid propane dealer would conduct fire drills or that, had a gas company held fire drills, the fire would have been contained, plus there was no indication why employees needed to be supervised at all times or how the lack of supervision of these particular employees fell below the applicable standard of care; thus, there was no evidence presented that would have allowed a reasonable layperson, in the absence of expert testimony, to identify the applicable standard of care in relation to the gas company's safety procedures nor that the safety procedures fell below that standard. Huffaker v. Wylie LP Gas, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3741, 2009 WL 1506901 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2009).

615. Because there was no evidence offered of the proximity of the area where smoking occurred to propane tanks, the court would have had to speculate that it was an unsafe distance, and while the court believed that a layperson, without expert testimony, could conclude that smoking in close proximity to liquid propane gas tanks was a breach of the applicable standard of care, the property owner offered no evidence to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to how close to the propane tanks employees were smoking. Huffaker v. Wylie LP Gas, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3741, 2009 WL 1506901 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2009).

616. Because there was no expert evidence establishing the applicable standard of care owed by a gas company and a layperson would not have been able to determine the applicable standard of care regarding a property owner's theories of liability, the trial court properly granted the company summary judgment under Tex. R. Civ. P. 166a(i). Huffaker v. Wylie LP Gas, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3741, 2009 WL 1506901 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2009).

617. In a products-liability case arising from injuries sustained by a truck driver in attempting to unload a truck trailer, the trial court properly directed a verdict in favor of the trailer's manufacturer on the driver's design-defect claim where the driver had not produced evidence to show that his proposed alternatively designed trailer with a covered rear gutter would be a safer alternative design under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 82.005(b); no evidence reflected that the use of dock plates, when used as intended and spaced evenly over the gutter, would reduce or eliminate the hazard of pallet-jack wheels "falling" into the gutter, and the record also contained no expert testimony that any of the proposed alternative designs satisfied both requirements of § 82.005(b) as a safer alternative design. Champion v. Great Dane L.P., 286 S.W.3d 533, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3222, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P18223 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 7 2009).

618. In a dispute over the valuation of oil and gas interests, testimony from a professional appraiser was not conclusory and insufficient because the appraiser testified without objection to his expertise and qualifications, he testified in great detail how he arrived at the appraisal values for the oil and gas interests, he explained that he valued the property using accepted appraisal methods, he testified at length regarding the methods and techniques he used to appraise the properties, he gave his appraisal values using Tex. Tax Code Ann. § 23.175, and he explained that these values exceeded market value. Moreover, an objector also conducted extensive cross-examination of the appraiser regarding his appraisal techniques. Averitt v. Caudle, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2284, 2009 WL 891034 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 2 2009).

619. Client provided no expert testimony in his malpractice case regarding the appropriate standard of care and causation owed him by the attorney in a separate case, but expert testimony was unnecessary under these facts to prove that the attorney fell below the standard of care of a reasonably prudent attorney and that he was the proximate cause of the client's injury; because the client presented some evidence of breach and proximate cause, the standard of legal sufficiency was met. Okorafor v. Jeffreys, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2099, 2009 WL 793750 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 26 2009).

620. Expert witness's statement showed that he worked for his own company and was not an agent or employee of contractors; thus, the expert's sworn statement was not a sworn statement by the contractors and the expert's statements in a separate lawsuit could not be used as the basis for the affirmative defense of judicial estoppel because they were not sworn statements by the contractors. Horizon Offshore Contrs., Inc. v. Aon Risk Servs. of Tex., 283 S.W.3d 53, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1691 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 12 2009).

621. To avoid no-evidence summary judgment as to the causation element of a client's legal malpractice claim, it was the client's burden to produce summary judgment evidence, including expert testimony, that supported each element of his alleged medical malpractice claim against his treating physicians under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.001(a)(13). Hackett v. Littlepage & Booth, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1166 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 20 2009).

622. In a fraud real estate case, although buyers pointed to their expert witness's testimony in which he stated that the property was located in a floodplain, his opinion was based solely on the fact that the property flooded and not on any official records or public documents, plus other evidence admitted at trial showed that the property was not located in any recorded floodplain. Sutton v. Ebby Halliday Real Estate, Inc., 279 S.W.3d 418, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 842 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 6 2009).

623. Even if a client's legal malpractice and breach of fiduciary suit was not barred by limitations, the trial court's grant of summary judgment to the attorneys was proper in light of the client's failure to provide expert testimony. Kastner v. Martin & Drought, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 701, 2009 WL 260601 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 4 2009).

624. Client's allegations called for consideration of whether the attorneys' manner of preparing for and trying a proceeding amounted to professional negligence and whether, had the attorneys made decisions within the standard of care, the result would have been different; because the client's professional negligence claim required expert testimony and he presented none, summary judgment for the attorneys was proper. Kastner v. Martin & Drought, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 701, 2009 WL 260601 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 4 2009).

625. Assuming a client could maintain a breach of fiduciary claim apart from his malpractice action, expert testimony was still necessary on the breach of duty and causation elements for this claim, just as in his professional negligence cause of action; because he had no expert testimony in this regard, summary judgment was proper. Kastner v. Martin & Drought, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 701, 2009 WL 260601 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 4 2009).

626. In a driving while intoxicated case, evidence of defendant's use of prescription medications was not relevant because there was no evidence as to the dosage, the exact times of ingestion, or the half-life of the drug; a lay juror was not in a position to determine whether the drugs, taken more than 12 hours before arrest, would have any effect on defendant's intoxication. Without expert testimony to provide the foundation required to admit scientific evidence, the testimony regarding defendant's use of prescription medications was not relevant. Layton v. State, 280 S.W.3d 235, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 149 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

627. Property owner rule applies to corporate entities owning property, and a representative of the corporate owner who is familiar with the market value of the property in question may testify under this rule as to the market value of the property, without being designated as an expert witness. Therefore, a trial court erred by granting a utility district's motion for no-evidence summary judgment in a condemnation action because an affidavit from a vice president associated with a corporate property owner should have been allowed to show fair market value immediately before and immediately after the condemnation of a waterline easement. Speedy Stop Food Stores v. Reid Rd. Mun. Util., 282 S.W.3d 652, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 669 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 3 2009).

628. Expert testified that she diagnosed a child with a psychological condition that, within a reasonable degree of medical probability, had been caused by his experience in a day care worker's classroom, plus the expert described at length the objective testing process she used in reaching the diagnosis, and thus the child's parents presented more than a scintilla of evidence of the child's future mental anguish. Hyde Park Baptist Church v. Turner, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 586, 2009 WL 211586 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 30 2009).

629. Day care failed to make a timely objection to a witness's designation as an expert witness and thus the day care waived its right to assert that the underlying methodology of her testimony was so unreliable as to constitute no evidence to support an award of future medical expenses. Hyde Park Baptist Church v. Turner, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 586, 2009 WL 211586 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 30 2009).

630. Expert witness testified that the reasonable and necessary cost of a child's future medical care was a certain amount, based on her expert opinion regarding the child's need for future play therapy sessions, family therapy sessions, and another psychological evaluation at the age of six; in light of the day care's waiver of error regarding the witness's designation as an expert, her testimony constituted more than a scintilla of evidence to support the award of future medical expenses. Hyde Park Baptist Church v. Turner, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 586, 2009 WL 211586 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 30 2009).

631. Day care did not object to a witness's designation as an expert witness during trial, and having failed to preserve the complaint about the reliability of the testimony, the day care could not assert that the testimony constituted no evidence on the issue of a child's future mental anguish. Hyde Park Baptist Church v. Turner, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 586, 2009 WL 211586 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 30 2009).

632. Damages were properly awarded in a medical malpractice case for a mother's pain and mental anguish because the evidence was legally sufficient to show that she was conscious at the time that she was struggling to breathe, even though the testimony of an expert physician was ambiguous; further, taking agonal breaths indicated that one was suffering pain. The physician's testimony, coupled with the testimony of a nurse expert concerning the demeanor of one experiencing agonal breathing, was legally sufficient to support a jury's award of damages. Las Palmas Med. Ctr. & El Paso Healthcare Sys. v. Rodriguez, 279 S.W.3d 413, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 627 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 30 2009).

633. In a disciplinary matter, where the Texas Commission for Lawyer Discipline properly designated an expert, and a lawyer was afforded several opportunities to depose the expert, the admission of his testimony was proper because the lawyer failed to notice the expert in a timely manner. Therefore, subjecting the Commission to sanctions in light of the untimely notice would not have been just. Onwuteaka v. Comm'n for Lawyer Discipline, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 351 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 20 2009).

634. In a case alleging breach of fiduciary duty, negligence, and negligence misrepresentation, a jury did not err in its calculation of the comparative responsibility of various underwriters because an expert's testimony was not speculative on the face of the record with regards to what would have been discussed had the underwriters contacted an insurance agency regarding a discrepancy in an insurance application, even though the testimony could have been clearer; preservation of this error was not an issue because no objection in the trial court was required to assert such an error. Moreover, to the extent that a few of the expert's statements indicated that he was not testifying as to what a person of ordinary prudence would do or not do under the same or similar circumstances as existed with respect to the underwriters, the jury, as factfinder, was free to disregard these statements. Underwriters at Lloyds Subscribing to Policy Nos. MDJ03/L075 & MDJ03/Z0165 v. Edmond & Stephens Ins. Agency, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9730 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 30 2008).

635. Given the testimony regarding the size and shape of the knife and the manner in which defendant's friend used it, the evidence was sufficient to show that the knife was capable of causing death or serious bodily injury and was a deadly weapon under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1.07(a)(17)(B), for purposes of defendant's aggravated robbery conviction; while the knife was not introduced into evidence, there was no expert or lay opinion testimony, and there was no testimony concerning sharpness, the victim testified as to the size and shape of the knife, that defendant's friend stuck the knife to the back of the victim's neck, demanded his laptop, and asked whether it was worth the victim's life when he refused to surrender it, and the victim claimed he was scared to death and received a small scratch from the knife, although the victim did not believe he was intentionally cut. Williams v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8540 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 13 2008).

636. In a case where a mother was seeking to regain property from her daughter, although the mother did not entirely waive her request for sanctions for failure to have a hearing or obtain a ruling, she waived any complaint concerning the designation of experts for failure to timely raise the issue before a trial court. Delahoussaye v. Kana, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 13 2008).

637. Appellate court erred in finding insufficient evidence of a compensable injury in the future, in connection with a case involving a child sexually abused by a camp counselor; the court had recognized the consensus among experts that child victims of sexual abuse frequently repressed and suppressed memories and emotions associated with the event until their adult years, the evidence of the child's emotional outbursts and phobic anxiety, along with the expert testimony, supported a reasonable inference that an enormous reaction was likely when the vault of the child's memory opened, and Texas law permitted jurors to make this determination and the trial court did not err in rendering judgment on their verdict, such that the court granted the child's parents' petition for review without hearing oral argument under Tex. R. App. P. 59.1, reversed the appellate court's judgment, and remanded the case for the consideration of the remaining issues. Adams v. YMCA, 265 S.W.3d 915, 2008 Tex. LEXIS 858, 51 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1443 (Tex. 2008).

638. Evidence was factually sufficient to support defendant's conviction of possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver, given that (1) a bag containing six grams of methamphetamine was found on defendant's person, (2) there was expert testimony that a letter was in defendant's handwriting, (3) a police officer with 20 years experience in drug trafficking testified that the letter was typical of the type of ledger maintained by someone dealing in drugs, (4) a court citation in defendant's name was found in the motel room, (5) a substantial amount of drug paraphernalia was located in the motel room that defendant was observed leaving, and (6) defendant admitted that she had been staying in the motel room; the trial court was allowed to make reasonable inferences from the evidence produced at trial about who was in the control of the room and was present when or shortly before the contraband was discovered, and the expert testimony that defendant authored the letter, when considered with the officer's testimony about the amount of drugs found on defendant, made the inference of the intent to distribute drugs even stronger. Friar v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6809 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 11, 2008).

639. Although a carrier contended that it reasonably disputed coverage because it believed the claimant's surgery was the result of a new and more severe injury in 2003, and not a 2000 injury, the carrier did not offer any evidence of a new injury or evidence that another injury necessitated surgery; the mere fact that the carrier offered expert testimony to support its position did not insulate the carrier from liability and other evidence enabled the jury to find no reasonable investigation by the carrier and reasonably clear liability for the claim. Tex. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Morris, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9868 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 26 2008).

640. Widow's conclusory allegation that the area was widely known to be dangerous and that many crimes occurred in the general area was insufficient to survive a no-evidence summary judgment motion against the restaurant, as conclusory or speculative opinion testimony did not tend to make the existence of a material fact more or less probable and was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 nor competent, and thus an opinion that the widow's husband's murder was not foreseeable to the restaurant, as supported by the facts recited from unchallenged police reports and crime statistics, was uncontroverted; the court recognized that, because the question of duty was a question of law for the court, an expert could not properly opine regarding the existence of a duty, and expert testimony alone was insufficient to raise a fact issue on foreseeability, but the widow failed to produce more than a scintilla of evidence showing that the restaurant had a duty to the husband and that it breached that duty, such that the trial court properly entered summary judgment in the restaurant's favor. Pouncy-Pittman v. Pappadeaux Seafood Kitchen, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5780 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 31 2008).

641. Mental soundness was within common knowledge and did not require proof by expert testimony. In re Estate of Mask, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5439 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 23 2008).

642. Because the customer and her husband had no expert testimony, they needed to show, for purposes of their res ipsa loquitur argument in this premises liability action, that it was generally known that carpet adjacent to a hotel bathroom would not become wet in the absence of negligence; however, the court was not aware of such general knowledge and they did not show that proposition to be true, and thus the doctrine did not apply. Carlson v. Remington Hotel Corp., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3841 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 22 2008).

643. Expert testimony was required to establish that the employee's depression, anxiety, and post-traumatic stress disorder were causally related to her head injury and thus compensable. State Office of Risk Mgmt. v. Larkins, 258 S.W.3d 686, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3717 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

644. For a chiropractor's opinions to be considered expert testimony, the employee would have had to show that the chiropractor had medical expertise regarding psychological disorders caused by head injuries. State Office of Risk Mgmt. v. Larkins, 258 S.W.3d 686, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3717 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

645. Evidence presented to the trial court was insufficient to support an award of past medical expenses because it did not establish the reasonableness and necessity of the expenses; at the default judgment hearing under Tex. R. Civ. P. 243, the motorist did not provide expert testimony to establish the reasonableness and necessity of his past medical expenses or submit an affidavit under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 18.001 for that purpose. Swinnea v. Flores, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3038 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 25 2008).

646. Defendant did not object to an officer's assertion that he was a gang expert, for purposes of defendant's conviction under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 71.02; because defendant's contention on appeal was different from his trial objection, he failed to preserve any issue for the court's review. Mendoza v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2937 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 2008).

647. Although the company claimed that expert testimony was required, case law refused to hold that expert medical testimony was required in every personal injury case, and in this case, the causal connection between the event and the pain in the landowner's shoulder was within a layperson's general experience and common sense. Southwestern Bell Tel., L.P. v. Valadez, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1153 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 14 2008).

648. Assuming there was a duty to preserve the evidence, appellees preserved the scene as practicably as possible and the scene was initially altered not by appellees, but by the fire department in its suppression and investigation efforts; the manufacturer was able to marshal the services of several experts to rebut appellees' expert testimony and thus the trial court did not err by not dismissing the suit or including a spoliation instruction. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 251 S.W.3d 88, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 356 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

649. Trial court could have chosen to disbelieve the homeowners' expert regarding repairs. Dumler v. Quality Work By Davidson, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 127 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 10 2008).

650. Expert's opinion regarding an insured's state of mind amounted to no more than nonprobative speculation and testimony based on certain documents was mere speculation. United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Scottsdale Ins. Co., 264 S.W.3d 160, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 64 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

651. Finding in favor of the homeowner in his action against an company for damages to the homeowner's residence was improper because the trial court should not have admitted the homeowner's expert's testimony that the residence suffered a 20 percent reduction in market value since there was too great an analytical gap between the data that the expert might have used and his conclusion as to the percentage of the home's lost market value. Royce Homes, L.P. v. Humphrey, 244 S.W.3d 570, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 60 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2008).

652. In a marketing defect products liability case, a doctor testified that it was impossible to determine what caused the patient's staple line to dehisce and the patient's expert was unable to state this cause either, and thus, there was no evidence that the failure to warn of any specific or exact risk caused the patient's injury. Ethicon Endo-Surgery, Inc. v. Meyer, 249 S.W.3d 513, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9892, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17742 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

653. Because no one testified to the reasonable attorney fee factors under Tex. Disciplinary R. Prof. Conduct 1.04, and no expert testified that the fees actually incurred were reasonable and necessary, there was no evidence to support the jury's answer as to damages in this regard, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 38.001. Cunningham v. Williams, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9894 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 20 2007).

654. Because the jury had no basis on which to evaluate roof repair estimates, the trial court did not err by granting the seller's judgment notwithstanding the verdict motion on breach of contract damages as to the roof repairs. Cunningham v. Williams, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9894 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 20 2007).

655. In a case involving damage allegedly caused by the discharge of soot and black smoke from the central air-conditioning and heating system, to the extent that a witness testified as a non-expert, the combustion process of a heating furnace is a matter beyond a juror's common understanding and thus a determination of the causation in this case required expert testimony. Poteet v. Kaiser, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9749 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 13 2007).

656. To the extent a witness testified as an expert on insureds' heating system, an issue not brought before the trial court, the witness's conclusions had to be based on more than a belief, as a bare expert opinion did not satisfy the scintilla test; the witness failed to establish the necessary links between the holes in the heat exchangers and the resulting process that allegedly caused the damages complained of by the insureds. Poteet v. Kaiser, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9749 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 13 2007).

657. Because the combustion process of a heating furnace is a condition that involves matters beyond jurors' common understanding, expert testimony was required to determine causation in insureds' case, and thus circumstantial evidence from one insured was not enough to preclude summary judgment. Poteet v. Kaiser, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9749 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 13 2007).

658. Because an expert conducted no tests to determine the cause of the soot, based his opinion on observations of another, and because he could not rule out other potential sources that he admitted probably caused the soot, his opinion as to the source of the soot was no evidence, and a clarification document supplementing the expert's deposition did not help; the expert was precluded from stacking inference upon inference in forming his opinion on causation. Poteet v. Kaiser, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9749 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 13 2007).

659. Court disagrees that proving a balance as reflected on an account statement requires expert testimony. Sikander Ghia v. Am. Express Travel Related Servs., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8194 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 11 2007).

660. Because an expert witness did not render a direct and unequivocal conclusion that attorney fees sought by the company under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 38.001 were unreasonable, the witness's affidavit did not raise an issue of material fact and thus another witness's affidavit was uncontroverted; however that witness's affidavit was inconsistent on whether the company was seeking fees for breach of contract or for the entire case, including tort claims, and thus this affidavit was unable to support the trial court's judgment awarding attorney fees. Anglo-Dutch Petroleum Int'l, Inc. v. Littlemill Ltd., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7826 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 2 2007).

661. While an expert witness speculated that the neighbor's wife was probably aware that the neighbor had bathed the daughter, this speculation did not constitute evidence that the wife was aware of the conduct because it was not based on any personal knowledge. Madison v. Williamson, 241 S.W.3d 145, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7844 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

662. Expert testimony was legally and factually sufficient to support the jury's findings regarding attorney fees; the party offered expert testimony on many of the facts set forth in case law regarding determining attorney fees, including the time and labor required, the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved, the fee customarily charged, the amount involved and results obtained, the experience, reputation, and ability of the lawyer, whether the representation precluded other employment, and whether the fee was fixed or contingent. Solar Soccer Club v. Prince of Peace Lutheran Church, 234 S.W.3d 814, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7624 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

663. Expert testimony is required to prove the reasonableness and necessity of repairs. Legacy Motors, LLC v. Bonham, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7530 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 13 2007).

664. Court found it unconvincing that a law firm complained about the opinion of an expert it sponsored in an underlying lawsuit, but the clients did not raise this complaint below or urge in on appeal, other than in response to the sufficiency of damages issue. Akin, Gump, Strauss, Hauer & Feld, L.L.P. v. Nat'l Dev. & Research Corp., 232 S.W.3d 883, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6954 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

665. Law firm insisted that the evidence was insufficient to support the jury's award of damages for the fair market value of the stock a corporation was obligated to repurchase from the clients; although the firm's expert testified that he would have calculated the cash flow distribution differently, this did not make another expert's calculations unreliable, and while this expert mistakenly counted the undistributable cash flow twice, the court did not agree that this made his opinion unreliable, as an error in addition went to the weight of the opinion, not the reliability of the underlying data. Akin, Gump, Strauss, Hauer & Feld, L.L.P. v. Nat'l Dev. & Research Corp., 232 S.W.3d 883, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6954 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

666. Expert's opinion on the value of stock was not unreliable because he used a tariff from a 1997 offering memorandum; whether the law firm's expert would have considered possible price changes did not impact the reliability of the other expert's calculations, which were based on an independent report from a third party, and a single article questioning whether the project would have been able to charge the contracted-for price did not affect the reliability of the underlying data prepared by an independent third party upon which this expert relied. Akin, Gump, Strauss, Hauer & Feld, L.L.P. v. Nat'l Dev. & Research Corp., 232 S.W.3d 883, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6954

(Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

667. It was not necessary for the shareholder to qualify as an expert witness to testify about his opinion of his own personal property; although he did not use the words "market value," the court found that his testimony concerning the valuation of the stock was based on market value and thus this testimony was some evidence of the fair market value of the stock at the time of the breach. Akin, Gump, Strauss, Hauer & Feld, L.L.P. v. Nat'l Dev. & Research Corp., 232 S.W.3d 883, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6954 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

668. Insurer argued that the homeowners, the insureds, were not entitled to fees under the Texas Deceptive Trade Practices Act and thus asserted a position adverse to the homeowners whom the insurer should have been protecting, which suggested that the equity was not to favor the insurer in a determination of subrogation rights; the insurer's expert testimony amounted to a judicial admission, but the insurer later tried to claim that the damages were limited, and this also supported the trial court's equitable decision to deny subrogation to the insurer, but given new case law, the issue of subrogation was remanded. Osborne v. Jauregui, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7259 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 29 2007).

669. Regarding attorney fees under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the court was not persuaded that the trial court was required to award the full amount of fees requested because the employer did not present contrary expert testimony. Vernon v. CAC Distribs., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6294 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 9 2007).

670. In determining that the father had the right to determine the child's primary residence under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 101.016, the jurors, as the sole judges of the credibility of witnesses, was free to accept lay testimony over that of experts, when confronted with the conflicting evidence in this case; notwithstanding the testimony that the mother was better suited to determine the child's residence, there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding in the father's favor, as there were a number of witnesses who testified that the father was a loving and devoted parent, the jury also heard testimony that the father regretted not trying harder to stay in touch with his other children, that he recently made contact with them, and that he took a 10-week parenting course to improve his parenting skills, and the minor child was able to depend on the father for her physical and moral needs. Garcia v. Garcia, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5801 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 25 2007).

671. Because defendant elicited an expert's testimony and failed to object on the basis of a non-responsive answer, defendant was precluded from complaining about the testimony on appeal; moreover, the complaint on appeal did not comport with the running relevancy objection at trial, such that the issue was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Montgomery v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5682 (Tex. App. Dallas July 19 2007).

672. Although the mother raised "sufficiency" points regarding the termination of her parental rights, neither the mother nor the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services discussed in any significant detail the specific evidence presented at trial, and thus the court did not discuss in detail the sufficiency of the evidence, but instead discussed the specific arguments on appeal concerning the absence of testimony from the mother's expert witnesses, pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 47.1. McKay v. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4833 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 21 2007).

673. Evidence was not rendered legally and factually insufficient to support the termination of the mother's parental rights based on the absence of expert testimony from the mother's doctor and therapist and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying the mother the chance to present this testimony; for purposes of Tex. R. Civ. P. 251, although the mother claimed that the experts were properly subpoenaed, there was nothing in the record to substantiate that claim, no proper oral motion was made and no written motion was in the record and there was no explanation of the content of the expected testimony. McKay v. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2007 Tex. App.

LEXIS 4833 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 21 2007).

674. In a medical malpractice case, the burden was on the widow and other relatives to prove by expert testimony that based upon a reasonable medical probability the injuries suffered by the widow's husband were causally linked to the negligent acts of the doctor, and a defendant such as the doctor is not required to produce expert testimony in a medical malpractice case. Lalusin v. Subnani, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4652 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 14 2007).

675. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a Tex. R. Evid. 705 hearing concerning a special agent's testimony because the trial court properly admitted the agent's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701; the State presented the agent as a lay witness to testify about the pimp subculture and to address the issue of cause, as placed into issue by defendant's cross-examination of the complainant; the questions contemplated drew directly from the agent's personal experience and familiarity with the pimping subculture, including its terms, many of which the complainant had used in her testimony, which the agent gained from interviewing both pimps and prostitutes; questioning the agent about what he learned from his experience assisted the fact-finder in determining a fact in issue, specifically defendant's utilizing the complainant as a prostitute for his personal profit; because Tex. R. Evid. 702 did not apply, the trial court did not err by overruling defendant's objections to the relevancy of the agent's testimony on the ground that the State did not establish how his opinion fit the facts of the case as required by Tex. R. Evid. 702. Richardson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4281 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 31 2007).

676. In a condemnation proceeding, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of damages due to an impairment of access that the State contended was not material or substantial, because the case was not about the impairment of access that was material and substantial; the best use of the property was disputed and the experts testified that there was a change in the best use due to the taking and that the change damaged the value to the remainder. State v. Dawmar Ptnrs, Ltd., 268 S.W.3d 79, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4245 (Tex. App. Waco 2007).

677. Record did not reveal or suggest more than one cause of the employee's injuries and thus medical expert testimony was not required to show a causal nexus in this case. Bowler v. Metro. Transit Auth., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3451 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 3 2007).

678. Charge asking whether a patient, who happened to be a doctor, exhibited ordinary prudence under the same or similar circumstances at least allowed jurors to consider his training, even if it did not instruct them to do so; jurors could hardly have overlooked the patient's special knowledge and the patient designated himself as a testifying expert, and having presented himself to jurors as a person with superior knowledge, he was not free to complain that jurors took him at his word. Jackson v. Axelrad, 221 S.W.3d 650, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 323, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 628 (Tex. 2007).

679. Although a patient argued that there was no evidence that any failure to report where the pain began proximately caused his injuries, the patient's expert testified otherwise and the jurors could have found a causal connection. Jackson v. Axelrad, 221 S.W.3d 650, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 323, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 628 (Tex. 2007).

680. Trial court did not err in refusing to allow a defense expert to testify in the punishment phase of appellant's capital murder trial that appellant's use of alcohol and cocaine caused him to commit the crime because, in excluding the evidence, the trial court properly determined that appellant did not make the requisite showing of reliability under Tex. R. Evid. 702; the expert was permitted to testify about the correlation between alcohol and cocaine usage and violence, but she was not permitted to take the extra step of opining whether alcohol and drug dependence was related to appellant's violent conduct. Roberts v. State, 220 S.W.3d 521, 2007 Tex. Crim. App.

LEXIS 429 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

681. Under binding precedent, a contractor in a negligence/premises liability case was not required to produce expert testimony that the electrocution caused his damages within a reasonable medical probability. Choice v. Gibbs, 222 S.W.3d 832, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2852 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

682. Court was not able to address the alleged inadmissibility of a doctor's affidavit because the homeowners waived their evidentiary objections by failing to obtain a ruling from the trial court on their objections; the homeowners were free to assert that the affidavit was conclusory. Choice v. Gibbs, 222 S.W.3d 832, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2852 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

683. In this negligence/premises liability case, a doctor's testimony that he believed an electrocution caused the contractor's heart attack, combined with the evidence of the prompt onset of heart-attack symptoms following the electrocution, raised a genuine fact issue, and although the homeowners claimed that the evidence did not raise a fact issue because there was no expert testimony based on a reasonable medical probability, such was unnecessary under these circumstances, and thus summary judgment was improperly granted to the homeowners. Choice v. Gibbs, 222 S.W.3d 832, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2852 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

684. Client's claim against the attorney was predicated on circumstances involving questions of legal representation and fiduciary duties, such that a layman could not have been expected to ascertain, without expert witness guidance, whether the attorney breached a duty owed to the client; because the client was not able to provide summary judgment evidence on an issue requiring expert testimony, the trial court properly excluded the client's affidavit, and without expert testimony, the client failed to raise a scintilla of evidence as to whether any breach proximately caused harm. Kothmann v. Cook, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2778 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 11 2007).

685. Test for whether a representation is material is whether it actually induced the insurance company to assume the risk, and that test contains no requirement of expert testimony, much less that of an actuary, as an insured argued, and there is no particular expert testimony requirement on the issue of materiality; in any event, ample evidence supported the proposition that the insured's representations caused the insurer to provide insurance without further investigation and the doctor's testimony was not conclusory or subjective, but was based on the doctor's experience and training. Soto v. Int'l Med. Group, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2577 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 3 2007).

686. Patient's claim that an expert's testimony concerning a radiologist's alleged mistreatment and misdiagnosis of patients other than the patient was not properly preserved for review, because although the patient included some evidence in this regard in an offer of proof, the patient failed to state why the evidence was improperly excluded or why it should have been admitted, and the patient failed to specify the purpose for which the evidence was offered; in any event, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding this evidence given that the expert's testimony in one aspect amounted to pure speculation and the patient did not establish how the testimony was material to the radiologist's interpretation of certain scans, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding the testimony was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, or that even if relevant, its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Montgomery v. Varon, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2582 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 3 2007).

687. Although a patient made an offer of proof, the patient failed to make any argument as to why evidence of a surgeon's reputation in the medical community and alleged mistreatment of other patients was improperly excluded or why it should have been admitted, and the patient failed to specify the purpose for which the evidence was offered; because both steps were required to avoid waiver, the patient failed to preserve certain issues for review.

Montgomery v. Varon, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2582 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 3 2007).

688. Even if the court assumed error in the admission of a doctor's testimony, the employees and spouses failed to make the showing that the ruling probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment, as the company set forth various defenses and accepting any of them could have resulted in the jury's "no" answer to the question of whether the company's negligence proximately caused the occurrence in question. Barfield v. SST Trucking Co., L.L.C., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2376 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 28 2007).

689. In defendant's trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, although defendant argued that an synergistic effect of alcohol and a prescription drug instruction was improperly given because there was no expert testimony on the subject, defendant, contrary to Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h), cited no authority for that proposition and thus waived on appeal any complaint about the lack of expert testimony; furthermore, the error regarding expert testimony was unpreserved, requiring reversal only if egregious harm was shown, which it was not. Robinson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2316 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2007).

690. Trial court did not err in excluding an expert's opinion linking permanent brain injury and cerebral palsy; the expert had to search the medical record for clinical indications that the child's pH was below seven at birth, and this goal-oriented reasoning was contrary to the foundation of the scientific method, and the trial court acted within its discretion in questioning the reliability of the expert's methodology without experience or authoritative literature to support it. Quiroz v. Covenant Health Sys., 234 S.W.3d 74, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1771 (Tex. App. El Paso 2007).

691. In an insurance breach of contract case, because the insureds' expert failed to indicate the extent to which the covered peril damaged the home, the court was unable to conclude that a certain percentage of the damage was caused by plumbing leaks, the covered perils, and the expert's affidavit did not raise the issue of causation. Kelly v. Travelers Lloyds of Tex. Ins. Co., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1320 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 22 2007).

692. Contrary to the ex-husband's claim, the trial court did not fail to order a just and right division of the community estate, for purposes of Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 7.001; the trial court was faced with two proffered valuations and neither was supported by customary expert valuation evidence, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by accepting the ex-wife's testimony over the ex-husband. Davis v. Davis, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1297 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 16 2007).

693. Where a contractor, who was installing a bath tub, sued homeowners for negligence after he was electrocuted by exposed live wires sticking out of a hole in the wall and suffered a heart attack, no-evidence summary judgment was improperly granted to the homeowners because, when the onset of a heart attack occurred immediately after an electrocution, it was not necessary for an expert to testify to a "reasonable medical probability" that the electrocution caused the damages, and there were genuine issues of material fact regarding cause in fact and foreseeability; although the homeowners alleged that a doctor's affidavit was conclusory, and unreliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and not based on a reasonable medical probability, a statement that an electrocution probably caused the contractor's heart attack was sufficient expert testimony to raise a fact issue as to cause in fact given that there was a fact issue as to whether the heart attack occurred shortly after the contractor was electrocuted. Choice v. Gibbs, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1063 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 13 2007).

694. Trial court's commitment order under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 574.034(a) was error because there was no evidence of an overt act or continuing pattern of behavior that tended to confirm the deterioration of the patient's ability to function; although there was expert testimony that the patient was mentally ill, selectively mute, claimed to be blind, and at times was angry, agitated, and demanding, even assuming this constituted a pattern of behavior for purposes of the statute, none of the behaviors indicated an inability to function independently, and thus the evidence was legally insufficient and the court did not need to reach the patient's factual sufficiency complaint under Tex. R. App. P. 47.1. State ex rel. L.T., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 975 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 9 2007).

695. Expert report is required under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351 for a patient's second cause of action, even where it was based on the theory of res ipsa loquitur; as a general rule, however, res ipsa loquitur did not apply in medical malpractice cases, as set forth in Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.201, and the cause of action here fell outside the narrow scope of operation currently recognized for the theory of res ipsa loquitur in health care liability claims. Valley Baptist Med. Ctr. v. Gonzales, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 996 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 8 2007).

696. Even if the case could have been found to be governed by the rules concerning a lost or destroyed record under Tex. R. App. P. 34.6(f), the court disagreed that a new trial was required in this will contest action; the court reporter wholly failed to record anything as required by Tex. R. App. P. 13.1, one of the depositions was the testimony of an expert, which required an explanation of the background and qualifications of the witness and the testimony covered the mental capacity of the testator and was the primary issue in the case, and the record showed no objection for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). In re Estate of Arrendell, 213 S.W.3d 496, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10816 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006), reh'g overruled, No. 06-05-00022-CV, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 388 (Tex. App.--Texarkana Jan. 23, 2007).

697. Customer was represented by counsel, presented a demand to the bank, and received no tender of payment, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 38.002, and expert testimony, given by the attorneys who were qualified to testify to the facts of their representation, established the reasonableness of the hourly fees charged by the attorneys, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 38.001, and thus the trial court abused its discretion by denying the customer attorney fees. Bank of Am., N.A. v. Hubler, 211 S.W.3d 859, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10552 (Tex. App. Waco 2006).

698. Trial court's order of temporary inpatient mental health services under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 574.034(a) was proper; the State provided testimony that the patient was mentally ill, as such was defined in Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 571.003(14), and that the patient had stopped taking his medication and threatened people in the community, and the record contained expert testimony of a recent overt act, staying awake for several days in a row, that tended to confirm the patient's distress and the deterioration of his ability to function, as shown by his inability to provide for his own basic needs, and the trial court could have disbelieved the patient's claims to the contrary. State ex rel. J.H., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8566 (Tex. App. Tyler Oct. 4 2006).

699. In a products liability design defect action against a sport utility vehicle's (SUV) manufacturer in which it was alleged that a passenger's side airbag in the SUV should have deployed in an accident involving the SUV and an eighteen-wheeler, the causation testimony of the passenger's biomechanical engineering expert was reliable based on her qualifications and experience in the study of how human bodies moved and reacted when forces were applied to them; the expert did not fail to account for the passenger's left-side injuries, the inward forces applied to the B-pillar of the SUV, or the driver's unconsciousness at the scene, as the manufacturer contended. GMC v. Burry, 203 S.W.3d 514, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8284 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

700. Although it might have been appropriate to offer testimony regarding defendant's mental condition and expert testimony regarding such behavioral characteristics, the focus of the basis for the admission of testimony was to attribute defendant's courtroom behavior to the lack of medication, and because defendant conceded that defendant was taken off medication, the trial court did not err in excluding the testimony. Reed v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8143 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 13 2006).

701. It was not an abuse of discretion to allow a probation officer to testify during the punishment phase of a trial that petitioner was not a "suitable" candidate for community supervision because suitability was a matter "relevant to sentencing" under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) when petitioner sought placement on community supervision under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 42.12, § 4; the probation officer not only based her testimony on her general professional knowledge and experience but also on her personal knowledge and perceptions of petitioner and the complainant during their interviews. Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

702. When a witness who is capable of being qualified as an expert testifies regarding events which he or she personally perceived, the evidence may be admissible as both Tex. R. Evid. 701 opinion testimony and Tex. R. Evid. 702 expert testimony. Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

703. State had to prove that defendant penetrated his daughter's sexual organ with his sexual organ while she was younger than 14 years old, and the daughter testified to this, and the court found that the evidence was factually sufficient to support defendant's conviction of aggravated sexual assault of a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021; although the daughter was unable to place an exact time or age on each occurrence perfectly, that was not required. McQueen v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7956 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 5 2006).

704. Appellate court cannot now sit as the jury and decide to accept one expert's testimony over another's, and this is especially true when the jury seems to have adopted one expert's view over the other's; that is the jury's province. McQueen v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7956 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 5 2006).

705. In a medical negligence case, experts offered conflicting opinions on the applicable standard of care and causation, and the jury was authorized to find the testimony indicating negligence less credible than the evidence supporting the doctor; because there was evidence to support the jury's finding that the doctor was not negligent, the verdict was not against the great weight of the evidence. Miles v. Caraway, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7682 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 29 2006).

706. Contractor testified as an expert regarding the market value of property to support a damage award; the evidence supported the range of damages and the jury awarded an amount in that range. Bowen v. Robinson, 227 S.W.3d 86, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6921 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

707. Testimony supported the finding that sexual assault nursing was a legitimate field of expertise; the expert testified to being (1) a registered nurse for eight years, (2) certified as a sexual assault nurse examiner, and (3) a member of an association of forensic nurses, and the expert had training and peer reviews in the field. Denton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6662 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 27 2006).

708. In the punishment phase of a trial for indecency with a child, the trial court did not unduly limit the testimony of defendant's psychological expert; following a hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 705, the trial court admitted all of the testimony that the court understood the witness to have given and defendant did not indicate that he re-urged the matter to the trial court with evidence that would contradict the court's recollection of the witness's testimony. Jimenez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6538 (Tex. App. Waco July 26 2006).

709. Record contained no evidence, expert or otherwise, that showed whether the attorney breached the standard of care, and thus summary judgment was properly granted on the ground that there was no evidence on an element of the clients' claim of legal malpractice in connection with the attorney advising them on approaching a victim of crime to suggest restitution in exchange for dropping criminal charges, after which criminal charges were filed against the clients for witness tampering. Evans v. Adamo, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6441 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 20 2006).

710. Evidence was sufficient to support defendant's conviction of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02(a)(2) and the finding that defendant used a firearm for deadly weapon purposes under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1.07(a)(17), given that the record showed that defendant used or exhibited a firearm as alleged; there was eyewitness testimony that provided specific facts from which the jury was able to evaluate the reasonableness of their beliefs that the object was a firearm, and contrary to defendant's assertion, if, as here, a weapon was not recovered, corroboration of a victim's description of the weapon in the form of expert testimony was not required. Harris v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6054 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 13 2006).

711. Expert testimony established only that it was a possibility that the minor might suffer from some form of mental anguish after being molested, which was no evidence that the minor would in reasonable probability suffer from mental anguish, such that the jury was left to speculate on the issue. YMCA v. Adams, 220 S.W.3d 1, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5958 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

712. In defendant's trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02, the State was not required to offer expert testimony to show that the knife defendant used to stab the victim was a deadly weapon under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1.07(a)(17)(B), and the testimony of the victim and a witness regarding the use of the knife was sufficient. Webster v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5941 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 6 2006).

713. Court of Appeals found no authority to support proposition that it is inherently improper to call an opponent's expert adversely; court saw no reason why expert testimony should automatically be treated differently than any other evidence produced by opponents, such as documents, that unquestionably can be used against the producing party. Hooper v. Chittaluru, 222 S.W.3d 103, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

714. Appellants' cross-designations of an expert were reasonably prompt and included the information that was available to appellants at the time; the court noted that the discovery rules did not require appellants to do the impossible, the exclusion of evidence for failure to timely disclose was not appropriate if there was no surprise to the opposing parties, for purposes of Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.6(a)(2), and to the extent appellants could have provided any of the cross-designation supplements earlier, the failure to do so did not justify exclusion because appellants had no information to disclose beyond that which appellants already received from the internist. Hooper v. Chittaluru, 222 S.W.3d 103, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

715. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, cumulativeness was not a legitimate basis for upholding the trial court's decision to strike an expert's testimony, given that the testimony in question was non-cumulative. Hooper v. Chittaluru, 222 S.W.3d 103, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

716. Hired experts risk being perceived by the jury as interested in providing testimony helpful to the party paying them and thus, damaging testimony against a party by its own expert (or even a co-defendant's expert) carries more weight than similar testimony from an expert paid by the other side. Hooper v. Chittaluru, 222 S.W.3d 103, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

717. In a medical malpractice case, appellants should not have been prohibited from calling an expert as a witness solely on the basis that the witness was the internist's expert, and because there was no other legitimate basis for excluding the expert's testimony, reversal was required; the exclusion of the evidence was harmful, given that the expert's testimony implicated negligence and proximate cause and was central to a material issue dispositive to the case, and the court noted that the expert did not need to independently establish proximate cause as suggested by the internist and cardiologist. Hooper v. Chittaluru, 222 S.W.3d 103, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App.

Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

718. Because appellants timely cross-designated an expert as to both the internist and the cardiologist, excluding the expert's testimony on this basis under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.6(a) would have been an abuse of discretion; appellants timely designated their own experts and included a general cross-designation of the experts of the internist and cardiologist, but did not identify their witnesses because appellants did not have access to that information, for purposes of Tex. R. Civ. P. 195.1, and after the internist designated the witness, appellants supplemented the cross-designation to include the expert. Hooper v. Chittaluru, 222 S.W.3d 103, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

719. There was no dispute that expert medical testimony was required to demonstrate the causal connection between the medical center's nursing staff's claimed negligence and the patient's injuries related to a nasogastric tube and its maintenance. Basinger v. Covenant Med. Ctr. Lakeside, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5425 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 23 2006).

720. In a medical negligence action, the trial court properly granted a medical center summary judgment, as there was no expert medical opinion that the patient's illness was caused by a nasogastric tube that did not function properly, and there was no causal connection established between the patient's illness and her memory impairment; the court reviewed evidence from two doctors, but one statement did not constitute a medical diagnosis, and the other statement, if assumed to have been an opinion resting in reasonable medical probability, it was not reasonable to infer therefrom that the doctor was attributing the patient's probable aspiration to any particular cause. Basinger v. Covenant Med. Ctr. Lakeside, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5425 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 23 2006).

721. Because defendant's objection at trial to a witness's testimony focused on Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.072, and on appeal the objection focused on Tex. R. Evid. 702, defendant preserved nothing for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; even if error was preserved, any error was harmless because evidence that the victim's behavior was inconsistent with common behavioral patterns of sexually abused children, if anything, was helpful to the defense in defendant's trial for sexual assault on a child. Estes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5028 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 13 2006).

722. Trial court erred in denying defendants' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict because the evidence did not prove with reasonable certainty the profits plaintiffs claimed to have lost as a result of defendants' breaches of contract, given that plaintiffs' experts set forth conclusory and self-serving statements, and many times did not explain the basis for various determinations; because plaintiffs were not entitled to any lost profits, and because lost profits were the only damages awarded to them, plaintiffs were not entitled to recover any attorney fees. Ramco Oil & Gas Ltd. v. Anglo-Dutch (Tenge) L.L.C., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4837 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 6 2006), appeal dismissed by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5543 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 29, 2006).

723. Appellees offered testimony of a witness and an expert to explain specialized terms in the parties' contract, not to create an ambiguity or vary the terms of the contract, and the court noted that expert evidence was useful in general in explaining commonly understood industry terms. XCO Prod. Co. v. Jamison, 194 S.W.3d 622, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3660, 163 Oil & Gas Rep. 605 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

724. Court agreed with the driver that expert testimony was required to establish that an automobile accident caused the motorist to suffer herniated disks when the motorist suffered from other preexisting conditions, but the driver did not object to the jury charge on the basis that the damage questions could have invited the jury to include damages for herniations, nor did the driver seek a separate jury question on causation, and without any separate findings on the elements, the court was unable to assess if the award contained an award for disk herniation; the driver was limited to challenging the legal sufficiency of the evidence supporting the damages as a whole because the driver did not object to the broad form submission. Kemp v. Havens, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3655 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 27 2006).

725. Expert testimony is required to establish that an automobile accident caused a person to suffer herniated disks when that person suffers from other preexisting conditions and injuries. Kemp v. Havens, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3655 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 27 2006).

726. Police officer did not need to be qualified as an expert for the officer's opinions to be admissible and the trial court did not err in allowing the officer's report into evidence; the opinions in the report did not touch on causation or liability, and the officer merely reported factual observations. Ontiveroas v. Lozano, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3669 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 27 2006).

727. In a case alleging breach of contract relating to an oral partnership agreement, testimony given by an expert witness on damages was supported by the evidence, and his opinions were not based on unfounded assumptions where the revenue information relied upon was provided by the opposing party. Deere v. Ingram, 198 S.W.3d 96, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3391 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

728. At the time of the deed transfers, the father was suffering from mental and physical problems; the court found the evidence supported a determination that the father was unduly influenced and that he lacked the mental capacity, for which expert testimony was not required and for which lay testimony was sufficient, to transfer title to the property in question. Decker v. Decker, 192 S.W.3d 648, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3023 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

729. Doctor's testimony that surgery was reasonable, coupled with evidence of how non-surgical treatment options had failed, constituted sufficient evidence of the need for the motorist to have surgery in the future; the expert opinion evidence of the estimated costs of future surgery was sufficient to support the award of future medical expenses. Nat'l Freight, Inc. v. Snyder, 191 S.W.3d 416, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2833 (Tex. App. Eastland 2006).

730. Even assuming an officer's testimony as to what a ballistics report concluded was subject to Tex. R. Evid. 702, any resulting error was harmless and any error as a result of impermissible hearsay or on the basis of a Confrontation Clause violation was waived and not preserved under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) because these claims were not asserted at trial; assuming the trial court committed error in overruling the objection, the court found no reversible error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the court had a fair assurance that the error did not influence the jury. Rincon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2758 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 5 2006).

731. Court found the evidence factually sufficient to support defendant's conviction of possession of cocaine with intent to deliver, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112(c); nothing required expert testimony that a particular amount of drugs packaged in a particular number of units established an intent to deliver, and defendant's interpretations of the evidence did not provide sufficient contrary proof outweighing the jury's finding of guilt. Dearmon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2514 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 30 2006).

732. Even if a police department chemist's chemistry training in college did not qualify her as an expert to testify about the chemical composition of a substance found in defendant's car, based on the evidence about her overall training and experience and the subject matter about which she offered an opinion, the trial court did not err in permitting her to testify about the substance's chemical composition because that was her primary responsibility for the police department, and she had testified as an expert in the area before. Norton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2006).

733. There is no reason why expert testimony should automatically be treated differently than any other evidence produced by opponents, such as documents, that unquestionably can be used against the producing party. Hooper v. Chittaluru, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2334 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 29, 2006).

734. In a medical malpractice suit against two doctors, an internist and a cardiologist, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing a deceased patient's family from calling the internist's expert witness during their case in chief because: (1) the family should not have been prohibited from calling the internist's expert as a witness solely on the basis that he was the internist's expert; (2) the family's cross-designation of the expert was not deficient under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 or Tex. R. Civ. P. 195, as the cross-designations were reasonably prompt and included the information available to the family at the time; and (3) due to differences in qualifications and the potential for perceived bias involving testimony on controlling issues, the expert's testimony would have added substantial weight to the family's case and thus was not cumulative. Hooper v. Chittaluru, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2334 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 29, 2006).

735. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that expert testimony was not required before permitting a witness to testify about personal perceptions of the odors smelled on defendant's boat, which included "cigarettes, stale beer, and sweaty sex," in connection with defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child. Livingston v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2234 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 23 2006).

736. Finding in favor of the patient and spouse in a negligence action against the hospital was proper where, given the substantial similarity between the probative value of the testimony of one physician and that of another, the court believed that any error in the trial court's admission of the first physician's testimony could not have led to the rendition of an improper judgment. Columbia Rio Grande Reg'l Healthcare, L.P. v. Hawley, 188 S.W.3d 838, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2265 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

737. Although the parents presented expert testimony in their action for medical malpractice and negligence, the experts did not raise a fact issue on causation; two experts only stated that the child's chances would have been better had antibiotics been administered, one expert was unable to place the chances of survival at more than 50 percent, and the third expert's testimony amounted to no evidence of causation because the opinion relied on mere possibility and speculation, as the expert was not able to identify any literature upon which the expert's empirical experience was based. Arredondo v. Rodriguez, 198 S.W.3d 236, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2156 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

738. Doctor raised several objections to an expert witness's testimony, but the doctor failed to obtain a ruling on the objections to the parents' summary judgment evidence; however, because an objection to the speculative nature of an expert's opinion was able to be raised for the first time on appeal, the court addressed only that specific complaint on appeal. Arredondo v. Rodriguez, 198 S.W.3d 236, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2156 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

739. In representatives' medical negligence action, the trial court erred in granting a doctor, healthcare specialist group, and a healthcare system summary judgment because the representatives' expert witness testified that the minor child had an untreated condition that ultimately led to the child's death and that if the pneumothorax had been treated in a timely fashion, the child would have recovered and lived a normal life span; thus raising an issue concerning proximate cause, which made summary judgment improper. Bryant v. Levy, 196 S.W.3d 166, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2150 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

740. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, an expert did not cross the line and directly address whether certain witnesses were testifying truthfully, and error was not shown. Parson v. State, 193 S.W.3d 116, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1901 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

741. Although there is not a precise fit between science and legal burdens of proof, properly designed and executed epidemiological studies may be part of the evidence supporting causation in a toxic tort case, and there is a rational basis for relating the requirement that there be more than a doubling of the risk to the no evidence standard of review and to the more likely than not burden of proof. Mobil Oil Corp. v. Bailey, 187 S.W.3d 265, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1880 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2006).

742. Testimony from an expert witness concerning the recovery of child pornography from computers found in defendant's apartment was properly admitted, as was the evidence in the punishment phase for 10 counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14; the witness testified to the program used to retrieve the deleted files, which program was a field standard for forensic computer examination. Sanders v. State, 191 S.W.3d 272, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1872 (Tex. App. Waco 2006).

743. Trial court did not act without reference to guiding principles or rules in excluding the claimants' expert, because generally in his practice, the claimants' expert was not asked to determine the cause of death, and the trial court could have found that the claimants' expert did not have the specialized knowledge necessary to establish the element of causation. Hensarling v. Covenant Health Sys., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1700 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 1 2006).

744. Even assuming that the expert's opinion based on personal experience was correct, the absence of medical literature and general knowledge in the medical community of the procedure recommended by the expert rendered a determination of the foreseeability element of proximate cause speculative, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Brazil v. Khater, 223 S.W.3d 418, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1539 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

745. Factors considered in analyzing the admissibility of expert testimony do not constitute the legal equivalent of a litmus test, but instead, furnish guidelines for the trial court to use in determining the relevance and reliability requirements in discharging its duty as the gatekeeper. Brazil v. Khater, 223 S.W.3d 418, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1539 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

746. Although defendant claimed that expert testimony pertained to bolstering, defendant failed to show in the record where the errors allegedly occurred, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h), and thus defendant waived the issue by failing to brief it, pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a); even had the issue been properly briefed, defendant failed to preserve error for appeal, given that defendant did not obtain an adverse ruling on objections made, nor did defendant move for a mistrial. Trevino v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1400 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 22 2006).

747. Trial court's order provided that it excluded an expert's testimony based on all of appellees' objections; thus, the court was to affirm the trial court's ruling if any ground was meritorious. Dornberg v. Toyota Motor Sales USA, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1291 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 16 2006).

748. Trial court did not err in excluding the expert's testimony; for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, the testimony was nothing more than subjective belief or unsupported speculation, and the expert failed to demonstrate how any of the material reviewed supported the expert's alleged conclusions. Dornberg v. Toyota Motor Sales USA, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1291 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 16 2006).

749. In defendant's theft case, a court properly allowed the testimony of a fraud examiner who had not been disclosed to appellant prior to trial because the witness testified to the summaries of information that the trial court had admitted, the summaries were of bank and credit card records admitted into evidence, the witness did not offer opinion testimony on the source of the money or the responsible party, and therefore, the witness testified as a lay witness and his testimony did not exceed the limits placed on the testimony of lay witnesses. Reuter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1314 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 16 2006).

750. In a personal injury case, a court did not err by permitting defendants' hired police accident reconstructionist to testify as an expert where during his employment with the department he investigated more than 10,000 accidents, he attended accident reconstruction training courses, and he taught about twenty courses involving accident reconstruction at the police academy; therefore, he was sufficiently qualified as an expert witness. Shaw v. Triple J Mowers, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1316 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 15 2006).

751. In a personal injury case, a court did not err by permitting defendants' hired expert accident reconstructionist to testify as his opinion was reliable because the expert testified that he went to the scene of the collision and personally observed the gouge marks in question, he did not assume that gouge marks existed, he examined the combined length of the tractor and mower (29 feet), the distance between a culvert and the generally agreed point of impact (about 20 feet), and the turning radius of the tractor. Shaw v. Triple J Mowers, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1316 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 15 2006).

752. Difference between what constituted assault and terroristic threats involved issues of statutory interpretation, which were questions of law, and thus the trial court did not err in refusing to admit an officer's testimony on the subject, given that experts were not permitted to testify to an opinion on a pure question of law, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, and it was the trial court's duty to instruct the jury on the law pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.14. Anderson v. State, 193 S.W.3d 34, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1140 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

753. Trial court properly determined that an expert's opinions on the cost of waste removal were unreliable, given that the expert stated that more soil samples should have been taken and the expert admitted not being able to determine the cost of such removal and disposal with such limited data; because the jury relied on that evidence in awarding damages, the trial court properly disregarded that finding. Hall v. Hubco, Inc., 292 S.W.3d 22, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1037 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

754. Court held that what a power company's practices and procedures should have been were not within one's general knowledge, and thus, the citizen was obligated to present expert testimony discussing the proper standard of care and whether the city public service board met that standard; because the citizen did not provide such testimony, there was no evidence of the standard of care or any breach of that standard. Schwartz v. City of San Antonio, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 995 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 8 2006).

755. Police officer's testimony on specialized training, experience, and certified status was sufficient to establish that the officer was an expert for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702 on the administration and technique of the horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test; thus, the trial court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to the officer's testimony concerning the HGN test and the results in defendant's trial for driving while intoxicated. Cooper v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 942 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 2 2006).

756. Defendant's complaints, that the trial court erred in failing to take judicial notice of the reliability of a horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test and in failing to make other inquiry under Tex. R. Evid. 702, were not raised in the trial court, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; however, HGN tests had previously been found to be scientifically reliable, and thus the State was not required to present evidence on the issue and the appellate court was free to take judicial notice of the reliability on appeal, and thus, even if preserved, no abuse of discretion existed on these grounds. Cooper v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 942 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 2 2006).

757. In a criminal prosecution for murder, the trial court did not err in permitting a detective to testify as a blood spatter expert. The detective was qualified, because he received training in the area of blood stains and blood spatter patterns, he had taught classes on intermediate crime scene investigations, and he served as an expert witness in other cases. De Leon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 813 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 1 2006).

758. In a homeowner's breach of contract action against a contractor, the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony of the homeowner's expert witness because the witness's testimony, based on firsthand observations and accompanied by the knowledge and experience of his subcontractors and an outside expert, was reliable. Facundo v. Solis, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 318 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 12 2006).

759. In contrast to the relevancy requirements for expert testimony, the reliability requirement of Tex. R. Evid. 702 focuses on the principles, research, and methodology underlying an expert's conclusions; under this requirement, expert testimony is unreliable if it is no more than subjective belief or unsupported speculation. Facundo v. Solis, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 318 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 12 2006).

760. In a challenge to the tax liability of a shopping center, the underlying data used by the taxpayer's appraiser was reliable for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the appraiser found properties in the surrounding area that had the same land use code and low-rent classification, and he restricted those results based on size, location, and age. The nine remaining properties represented a reasonable sample for the purposes of Tex. Tax Code § 42.26. Harris County Appraisal v. Hartman Reit Operating P'ship, L.P., 186 S.W.3d 155, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

761. In a suit challenging a real estate tax assessment, the trial court properly allowed expert testimony from the taxpayer's appraiser. The testimony was relevant, within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 702 because the appraiser found a reasonable number of comparable properties, made appropriate adjustments, and compared the median appraisal value of those properties to the appraisal value applied to the property at issue, as required by Tex. Tax Code § 42.26. Harris County Appraisal v. Hartman Reit Operating P'ship, L.P., 186 S.W.3d 155, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

762. Expert testimony did not raise a fact issue on cause-in-fact in connection with a customer's action against a restaurant related to the customer's gastroenteritis; the expert did not express an ultimate opinion, in reasonable medical probability or otherwise, that the customer's gastroenteritis was caused by the food consumed at the restaurant. Smith v. Landry's Crab Shack, Inc., 183 S.W.3d 512, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 30 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

763. There was legally and factually sufficient evidence to support the trial court's order of commitment for temporary inpatient mental health services pursuant to Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 574.034(a)(2)(A), given that (1) a doctor testified that the patient heard voices and had self-injurious behavior, and (2) the doctor's testimony was expert testimony of a continuing pattern of behavior that tended to confirm the likelihood that the patient was going to cause serious harm to himself; the patient did not deny hearing voices and the trial court was entitled to disbelieve the patient's other testimony and disregard evidence contrary to the State's position. In re C.M., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10829 (Tex. App. Tyler Dec. 21 2005).

764. Court was unable to uphold a finding of negligence on any of a fire investigator's four theories of the cause of a fire because there were too many inferences that had to be stacked to show causation; expert opinions had to be supported by facts in evidence, not conjecture, and the investigator's opinions were premised on conjecture only. Chubb Lloyds Ins. Co. v. H.C.B. Mech., Inc., 190 S.W.3d 89, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10244 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

765. Reasonable minds could have differed as to the causal nexus, whether the evidence proved the father's mental pain and anguish damages, and whether the daughter proved the amounts, reasonableness, and necessity of the father's past medical expenses, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 18.001(b), and thus the trial court erred in granting a judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Ferrer v. Guevara, 192 S.W.3d 39, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10010 (Tex. App. El Paso 2005).

766. Because appellant did not object on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 702 at trial, appellant failed to preserve error pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Watson v. Michael Haskins Photography, Inc., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9838 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 23 2005).

767. Although the dissent concluded the jury could only have considered a physician's causation testimony in conjunction with the doctor's negligence, not in conjunction with the nurses' negligence, the court noted that a medical doctor was free to testify concerning causation from a breach of the nursing standard of care. Morrell v. Finke, 184 S.W.3d 257, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9190 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

768. In a personal injury accident, an expert was permitted to testify that he conducted an injury causation analysis based on physics and biomechanics and concluded that forces involved in the accident could not have caused the condition that necessitated plaintiff's surgeries. The testimony was not incompetent under Havner, because the evidence failed to conclusively establish the opposite of the expert's conclusion. Gill v. Slovak, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8876 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 27 2005).

769. In a medical malpractice case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by ruling that the patient's expert witness was not qualified to testify as an expert concerning pathology slides because his curriculum vitae did not contain specific information regarding pathology credentials. Daniels v. Yancey, 175 S.W.3d 889, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8789 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

770. In a medical negligence action, any error in excluding an expert's testimony as to when a patient developed a tumor was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a) because the excluded evidence would not have been sufficient to prove that the alleged failure to diagnose prevented the patient from considering treatment options other than radical mastectomy. Reyna v. Maldonado, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8694 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 20 2005).

771. In an action against the operator of a nursing home, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that an estate administratrix failed to establish her expert witness's testimony was based on a reliable foundation. Although the expert was experienced in geriatrics, he had only slight experience regarding fire ant bites and no experience dealing with the possible complications from fire ant bites that he stated could have affected the decedent. Bartosh v. Gulf Health Care Center-Galveston, 178 S.W.3d 434, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8431 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

772. Pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant's trial objection based only on Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403 waived any objection beyond those based on those rules, but even if the court considered defendant's argument as a Tex. R. Evid. 702 argument, there still was no error; the doctor testified that the findings of the physical examination were consistent with abuse allegations, that frequently there were no physical signs of abuse, and that the examination results did not prove that any abuse occurred at all, and the testimony was relevant to the issue of whether the victim was abused and thus the trial court did not err in finding that the testimony would have aided the jury and was not overly prejudicial under the circumstances. Segura v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7783 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 23 2005).

773. Where defendant was charged with multiple counts of indecency with a child by contact, the court properly excluded expert testimony that the complainants' allegations were the result of manipulation, peer pressure, and improper interview techniques. The court was not convinced that the study in question was reliable, and the probative value of the study was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Music v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7789 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 22 2005).

774. In a suit by a 17-year-old church member, who alleged that other church members assaulted and falsely imprisoned her, the trial court properly admitted expert testimony on post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), even though the record showed that the methods and analyses relied upon in formulating the diagnoses involved some subjective interpretation. The record also showed that those methods and analyses had a rate of error generally accepted in the scientific community as reliable, had been accepted as valid in the scientific community for decades, had been subject to extensive peer review and publication, and had been widely used for nonjudicial purposes. Pleasant Glade Assembly of God v. Schubert, 174 S.W.3d 388, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7660 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

775. Court erred by admitting an expert's report on damages to a home caused by water because the damage estimate wholly relied on another expert's report that should not have been admitted, and the expert had not checked to see if the prices he quoted in his report were usual and customary for Johnson County. State Farm Lloyds v. Blacklock, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7433 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 7 2005).

776. Court erred by admitting an expert's report in a homeowner's case against their insurer where the expert's testimony was orchestrated for litigation purposes only, and his opinions regarding his repair plan were not sufficiently supported by authority or accepted as valid by the relevant scientific community. State Farm Lloyds v. Blacklock, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7433 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 7 2005).

777. Police officer's perception of defendant's wife as a victim of family violence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and was not testimony of scientific or technical knowledge for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702; the statement was based on the officer's personal observations and experience as an officer working in the family violence division, the testimony suggested that the State was asking the officer to elaborate on events leading up to and executing the warrant for defendant's arrest, and in light of the overwhelming evidence of guilt, as well as the admission of similar testimony without objection, error, if any, was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Horta v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7151 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2005).

778. Intoxilyzer test results and the expert testimony were properly admitted because they were pieces in the evidentiary puzzle for the jury to consider in determining whether defendant was intoxicated at the time he drove. Gigliobianco v. State, 179 S.W.3d 136, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7303 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

779. Expert's testimony regarding a child sexual assault victim did not constitute an improper opinion where it was defendant who elicited the very testimony of which he complained on appeal because, on his cross-examination of the expert, he went through each of the factors that the expert considered in determining the truthfulness of a child. Because defendant's question in concluding the cross-examination of whether the victim's story appeared to be realistic induced the response that, in the expert's opinion, the victim was telling the truth, defendant had invited the response. Fox v. State, 175 S.W.3d 475, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7071 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

780. Court rejected an insurer's claims that the testimony of an expert witness was conclusory; the expert's opinion was based on personal knowledge, training, and experience as a structural engineer, personal observation of the insureds' home, and on data compiled by the insurer's engineer, and the evidence showed that the expert's opinion was supported in a published treatise relied on in the engineering community. United Servs. Auto. Ass'n v.

Croft, 175 S.W.3d 457, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7032 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

781. Expert's testimony was not conclusory because the opinion was based on an independent evaluation of the insureds' home using personal knowledge and training in the foundation repair industry, and the expert's testimony was not an unsupported opinion. United Servs. Auto. Ass'n v. Croft, 175 S.W.3d 457, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7032 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

782. Because an expert's testimony provided an explanation and factual support for the expert's conclusion, the testimony was not conclusory. United Servs. Auto. Ass'n v. Croft, 175 S.W.3d 457, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7032 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

783. In a dispute regarding open-space valuation of real property, there was no error in the trial court's decision to qualify the taxpayers' expert witness pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), 702; although the expert did not have training specific to ad valorem taxation, he had substantial experience and expertise in agricultural use of land and prudent land management. Calhoun County Appraisal Review Bd. v. Stofer L.P., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6629 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 18 2005).

784. Trial court did not err in granting a no-evidence summary judgment in favor of a law firm in a malpractice action because the client presented no expert evidence to show that any acts or omissions of the law firm fell below the applicable standard of care or caused the client any damages. Jennings v. Zimmerman, Axelrod, Meyer, Stern & Wise, P.C., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6518 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 17 2005).

785. Evidence was sufficient to support the amount of setoff and credits awarded the surviving partner against the redemption price under Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 6132b-7.01(a) of the Texas Revised Partnership Act; the evidence did not prove that the surviving partner was entitled to a credit more than was given by the trial court, the surviving partner did not challenge the qualifications of a witness who evaluated the interest as an expert, and the final valuation was supported by the evidence. Coleman v. Coleman, 170 S.W.3d 231, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6557 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

786. Court agreed that one witness was not qualified to testify as an expert pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702 about the standard of care for a gastroenterologist such as a physician involved in a widow's medical malpractice action; the widow failed to show that the witness had the knowledge, skill, and experience regarding the applicable standard of care in this case. Eisner v. Bentch, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6276 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 10 2005).

787. Although a witness was a gastroenterologist like the physician in this medical malpractice action and thus was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to testify about the standard of care, the witness did not point to any scientific studies or published medical literature to support the opinion that the standard of care required the widow's husband to be reclassified as a high-risk patient by the physician; furthermore, the witness never had a patient who experienced the same complications as the husband, and thus the trial court did not err in excluding the witness's testimony. Eisner v. Bentch, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6276 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 10 2005).

788. Trial court did not err in finding that a witness was qualified as an expert to give an opinion regarding lost profits in a business venture; the witness was a certified public accountant, had performed many lost profits evaluations, and used standard accounting methodologies in reaching a conclusion, and the testimony was reliable. Bright v. Addison, 171 S.W.3d 588, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6080 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

789. Trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony regarding the decedent's state of consciousness following a fatal accident; the expert explained that the decedent showed signs of unconsciousness that were age-appropriate, and because other witnesses testified that the decedent was unconscious following the accident and the jury found no liability, appellants were not prejudiced by the expert testimony as to the decedent's pain and suffering. Garza v. Perez, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5810 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 27 2005).

790. In a negligence action arising out of an automobile accident, the trial court did not err in refusing to permit a public safety department officer to testify as an expert witness concerning an employee's ability to avoid hitting a cow; the officer had credentials to be considered an expert witness, considering the officer's training and personal experience, but the record failed to demonstrate that the officer had adequate facts to have enabled the officer to form an opinion about whether the employee could have avoided hitting the cow. Tex. Elec. Coop. v. Dillard, 171 S.W.3d 201, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5620 (Tex. App. Tyler 2005).

791. In a driver's product liability and negligence action against a trailer owner, the trial court properly excluded part of the testimony of the driver's expert witness because his testimony established that he was not qualified to testify regarding the industry standard of care for the inspection of fasteners in tractor-trailer rigs. The expert indicated that he did not know what the standard of care was, and his opinion based on his experience as an accident reconstructionist was not enough to establish the industry standard of care. Fulgham v. FFE Transp. Servs., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5377 (Tex. App. Dallas July 12 2005).

792. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's objection to the reliability of the testimony of crime lab scientist who tested the heroin evidence because the scientist's testimony addressed the methods he used in testing the heroin and the acceptance of the tests he performed within the scientific community as valid methods for determining the composition of suspected controlled substances as required by Tex. R. Evid. 702. Lopez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4625 (Tex. App. Eastland June 16 2005).

793. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's objection to the reliability of the testimony of crime lab scientist who tested the heroin evidence because the scientist's testimony addressed the methods he used in testing the heroin and the acceptance of the tests he performed within the scientific community as valid methods for determining the composition of suspected controlled substances as required by Tex. R. Evid. 702. Lopez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4610 (Tex. App. Eastland June 16 2005).

794. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that the opinion testimony of a former church member's experts was reliable and therefore admissible in the member's action for assault and battery and false imprisonment because, although the methods and analyses that the experts relied upon in formulating their diagnoses of post-traumatic stress disorder and major depression involved some subjective interpretation, the methods and analyses had a rate of error generally accepted in the scientific community as reliable, had been accepted as valid in the scientific community for decades, had been subject to extensive peer review and publication, and had been widely used for nonjudicial purposes. Pleasant Glade Assembly of God v. Schubert, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4457 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 9 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7771 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 15, 2005).

795. Only an expert's conclusory opinion was presented by a clothing store to establish causation in connection with the store's negligence claim, and thus the expert's affidavit was no evidence of proximate cause and the trial court's grant of summary judgment under Tex. R. Civ. P. 166a(i) to a plumbing company and property manager was proper; for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, the expert never bridged the analytical gap between the evidence and the expert's opinion. Jos. A. Bank Clothiers, Inc. v. Cazzola Plumbing, Inc., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4466 (Tex. App. Austin June 9 2005).

796. Excluded medical records consisted of forms with handwritten notations using symbols and medical terminology that would have been unfamiliar to laypersons, and the medical implications clearly could not have been determined by laypersons; thus, the trial court did not err in excluding the medical records on the ground that they were not supported by medical testimony. Presswood v. Goehring, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4467 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 9 2005).

797. Court disagreed with defendant's characterization of a witness as an expert for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the State called the witness as a lay witness to testify about the victim's statements about the alleged sexual abuse; defendant had previously impeached the victim with prior inconsistent statements, and thus the State properly sought to rehabilitate the victim with testimony regarding the victim's character for truthfulness under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a)(2). Bronaugh v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4455 (Tex. App. Waco June 8 2005).

798. Trial court did not err in excluding the testimony of the consumer's expert witnesses in his products-liability and negligence action against the manufacturers of a generator and a gas engine because the witnesses were not shown to be experts in the relevant field of internal-combustion engines, generators, product warnings or the origins and causes of fire, and because they failed to meet the requirement that their theories on causation had been or could be proven through other scientifically valid testing. Bush v. Coleman Powermate, Inc., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4004 (Tex. App. Austin May 26 2005).

799. Although a corporation claimed that the trial court erred in barring the corporation's expert's testimony, the corporation failed to preserve the issue for appellate review, and even if the complaint was properly preserved, and if the court found that the exclusion was erroneous, the court was unable to perform a harm analysis in the absence of a complete record; the court had notified the corporation, under Tex. R. App. P. 37.3(c), that unless it made arrangements to pay for the record within 15 days, the court was going to consider and decide those issues that did not require a reporter's record, but the corporation did not respond, and in the absence of a reporter's record, the corporation was not able to establish any abuse of discretion on the trial court's part. Fletcher Aviation, Inc. v. Booher, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4048 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 26 2005).

800. Horse owner was properly permitted to testify in rebuttal that a veterinarian who testified that the horse owner's filly did not die because of any actions taken by the horse farm owners, with whom the horse owner left his filly, had told the horse owner that the filly died because the horse farm owners failed to get the filly to the veterinary clinic sooner. Even if the veterinarian's statements to horse owner did not qualify as expert testimony, such statements included a factual basis and had probative value. Gabriel v. Lovewell, 164 S.W.3d 835, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4060 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

801. In a medical malpractice case, expert testimony regarding the standard of care under 1995 Tex. Gen. Laws 985 (repealed), (current version at Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.401(c)), was not admitted because the expert in question did not have knowledge, skill, experience, or training in the areas of general or orthopedic surgery. Gomez v. Valley Baptist Med. Ctr., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4092 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 26 2005).

802. Testimony of a witness for the State regarding how the global positioning system (GPS) worked and its reliability was properly admitted where the witness testified that he had a bachelor's degree in geography, and where his testimony demonstrated a knowledge of how GPS worked and its reliability. The trial court could decide that a geographer who used GPS daily in his job was qualified to testify about the reliability of GPS technology, and the witness's testimony demonstrated that GPS-figured coordinates were accepted as reliable in his field just as arithmetical sums on an electronic calculator were commonly accepted as reliable. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

803. Testimony of a trucking company's safety administrative coordinator was properly admitted because her purpose was to explain how global positioning systems (GPS) data, which another witness's testimony showed was reliable, became a business record of the trucking company. Furthermore, her testimony established her understanding of the many systems the company used to track its drivers and showed that the system of transmitting and receiving the GPS data was automatic. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

804. Defendant failed to show that a trial court abused its discretion in overruling his objection to a DNA analyst's testimony and report on the population frequency statistic of the DNA she tested because the analyst was a highly qualified expert on all aspects of DNA analysis, including statistical interpretation of the DNA profile, and testified that multiplication was the standard way of calculating genotype frequencies. Furthermore, she explained that multiplication of the frequencies for each allele was a permitted method of determining the overall statistical likelihood of a person having all the alleles because they were unrelated. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

805. Reliability of a DNA analyst's population frequency calculation was shown by clear and convincing evidence because her testimony showed that the scientific theory and technique that she applied in making her population frequency calculation was accepted as valid in the scientific community. She also testified to the existence of documentation (i.e., literature) supporting the underlying scientific theory, and there was an absence of any contrary expert testimony. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

806. Clear and convincing evidence supported a trial court's decision to admit a DNA analyst's population frequency statistics where defendant never questioned the analyst concerning the independence of the loci tested, and where the analyst's testimony about the wide acceptance of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's population statistics that she used was sufficient to establish their reliability. Brown v. State, 163 S.W.3d 818, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3949 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

807. Error in admitting expert testimony regarding the results of parents' drug tests in a proceeding to terminate their parental rights probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1 because the expert did not have expertise concerning the actual subject about which he offered his expert opinion, and because the results of the tests were not shown to be reliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702. The expert's "opinion" that the samples tested positive for cocaine was beyond the scope of his expertise and based entirely on a written report he received from a laboratory, and even though the scientific theory of testing hair samples for illegal drugs using immunoassay and gas chromatography mass spectrometry or gas chromatography mass spectrometry mass spectrometry might be reliable, there was no showing of the reliable application of that theory in the case because the expert merely speculated that the lab had to have followed protocol or it would have lost its license. In re S.E.W., 168 S.W.3d 875, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3809 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

808. Motorists were not entitled to mandamus relief after the trial court limited testimony of their expert witness in a personal injury action brought against the motorists for damages arising from a collision between a motor vehicle and a motorcycle. The trial court's order circumscribed the expert's testimony but did not prevent the expert from testifying or prevent the motorists from presenting other evidence or testimony concerning the accident. In re Pena, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3663 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 12 2005).

809. Appellate court did not reach the issue of whether an expert witness's affidavit was relevant because the threshold issues, whether he was qualified to opine concerning the cause of injury and whether his opinions were reliable, were waived due to inadequate briefing. Sanders v. Home Depot U.S.A., Inc., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3651 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2005).

810. Court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress evidence of his horizontal gaze nystagmus test results because the evidence was sufficient to establish that the officer who administered the test was an expert at administering the test. In addition, the testimony of the officer was not offered to secure a conviction but rather to enable the trial court to determine whether the factfinder would be allowed to hear it. Reynolds v. State, 163 S.W.3d 808, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3516 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2005).

811. For an officer to testify as an expert on the administration of a horizontal gaze nystagmus test, it need only be shown that he received from the State of Texas a practitioner's certification to administer the test. Reynolds v. State, 163 S.W.3d 808, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3516 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2005).

812. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a truck owner's expert, who was a metallurgical and mechanical engineer, in the owner's action that claimed that a manufacturing defect in his truck caused his collision with two parked cars because the truck manufacturer's attacks on the expert's theory of why the nuts on the truck's u-bolt were not tightened sufficiently did not undermine his observation that the nuts on the u-bolt were insufficiently tightened in a way that allowed the u-bolt to fail. To prove a manufacturing defect, the owner did not need to prove that the manufacturing process was flawed, only that it produced a flawed product. Ford Motor Co. v. Ledesma, 173 S.W.3d 78, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3377 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

813. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a truck owner's expert, who was a metallurgical and mechanical engineer, in the owner's action that claimed that a manufacturing defect in his truck caused his collision with two parked cars because the truck manufacturer had not shown an analytical gap sufficient to make the trial court's admission of the expert's testimony regarding the effect of the off-center flattening of the truck's u-bolt error. Evidence casting doubt on whether the expert's theory was realized in the case might affect the credibility of his opinion, but it did not demonstrate that the trial court abused its discretion by finding that his theory regarding the effect of an asymmetrically flattened u-bolt was reliable. Ford Motor Co. v. Ledesma, 173 S.W.3d 78, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3377 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

814. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a truck owner's accident reconstruction expert in the owner's action that claimed that a manufacturing defect in his truck caused his collision with two parked cars because the manufacturer's criticisms went to the credibility, not the reliability of the expert's theories, and he was subject to vigorous cross-examination regarding the accuracy of his opinions. Ford Motor Co. v. Ledesma, 173 S.W.3d 78, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3377 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

815. Trial court properly excluded some of the testimony of a truck manufacturer's expert regarding a truck owner's collision with two parked cars, which the owner claimed was caused by a manufacturing defect in the truck's axle, because the expert undisputedly lacked training in accident reconstruction. The expert had some practical experience in his job with the manufacturer, but his testimony contained sufficient uncertainty to support the trial court's decision because he did not explain how the relatively minor external damage to both vehicles squared with his theory that the tire-to-tire collision caused the axle to displace, and he had no test data to know the likelihood that the collision could cause the axle to displace. Ford Motor Co. v. Ledesma, 173 S.W.3d 78, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3377 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

816. Where the patient failed to establish causation testimony through expert testimony that linked his full thickness skin loss with the therapist's application of moist heat packs during physical therapy, the trial court did not err by granting the therapist summary judgment on both traditional and no evidence grounds. Reyes v. Jebo's, Inc., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3344 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 4 2005).

817. Trial court did not err in admitting, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, testimony by the State's expert on retrograde extrapolation in connection with defendant's trial for driving while intoxicated; the expert explained the use of retrograde extrapolation in a clear and understandable manner, and the expert had sufficient information available upon which to reliably extrapolate defendant's alcohol concentration at the time of the offense. Beckendorf v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3353 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 4 2005).

818. Considering a State expert's education, training, and experience, a trial court did not act arbitrarily or unreasonably in overruling an objection by defendant on trial for sexually abusing his 13-year-old daughter to her expert testimony on the basis of her qualifications. Because the expert had experience and education in the behavioral sciences in general and in the area of child abuse more specifically, she was in a position in which she would be able to evaluate, interpret, and incorporate research articles on topics of personality types with the tendency to commit incest, and, in preparation for her testimony, she reviewed several journal articles on the characteristics of incest offenders and narcissistic personality disorders. Malone v. State, 163 S.W.3d 785, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3163 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

819. Because an expert's testimony was based on sources reasonably relied upon by experts in the field, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that the expert's testimony fell within Tex. R. Evid. 702, 703. In re M.G., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3253 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 28 2005).

820. Expert testimony was properly admitted regarding semen evidence obtained from the victim in defendant's aggravated sexual assault case, because the expert testified that the underlying scientific theory for DNA was valid and had been accepted by the scientific community, that literature existed supporting the scientific theory, that the techniques used to apply the theory were valid, and that the valid techniques were applied in this case. Although she stated that she was unfamiliar with the error rate of DNA testing, she testified that she used quality measures and positive and negative controls to insure accuracy during DNA testing. Ford v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3151 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 27 2005).

821. In a prosecution for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in admitting a treating counselor's testimony regarding behavioral symptoms generally exhibited by sexually abused children and that the complainant had exhibited such symptoms. The subject matter was within the scope of the counselor's field as she had a master's degree in behavioral sciences and human services, with an emphasis on working with those who had been sexually abused, and she had counseled between 25 and 30 children who had been sexually abused. Mulvihill v. State, 177 S.W.3d 409, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3047 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

822. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting expert testimony in defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault and prohibited sexual conduct. The State established the reliability of the testimony by showing that the study of sex offenders and their victims was a legitimate field of expertise, that grooming and victim outcries were within the scope of that field, and that the expert properly relied upon or utilized the principles involved in that field. Reid v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3072 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 21 2005).

823. Expert testimony was relevant because it connected the facts of the case to behavior typically associated with sex offenders and their victims. The expert's examples of grooming behaviors were identical to those described by the complainant, and his description of how young victims became aware that they were being abused and eventually disclosed the abuse mirrored the complainant's circumstances. Reid v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3072 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 21 2005).

824. Trial court did not err in allowing a witness for the State, a licensed clinical psychologist at the time of trial, to testify during the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault about facts that she learned from defendant during counseling sessions at a time that she was not licensed in Texas because licensure or certification in the particular discipline was not a per se requirement of Tex. R. Evid. 702. The witness's education and experience supported admitting her testimony because she had graduated from a doctoral psychology program, had completed an internship at a state hospital where she worked with patients who were not guilty by reason of insanity for various crimes, had worked with sex offenders, and had worked with defendant in both a group therapy program and in individual therapy. Duran v. State, 163 S.W.3d 253, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2868 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

825. Where defendant's probation officer had received a psychology degree with an emphasis on sex crimes and aggression, a degree in criminal justice, had supervised sex offenders as part of her duties as a probation officer, had special training involving sex crimes and supervising sex offenders, had attended seminars on violence, domestic violence, and sex crimes, and in the previous year had received 75 hours of specialized training, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing her to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Ellison v. State, 165 S.W.3d 774, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2776 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

826. In an action arising from a car fire, a verdict against a car manufacturer was reversed because there was no evidence that the fire and death were caused by a defect that allowed gas to siphon from the fuel system. The difficulty was that there were significant conflicts in and between testimony by plaintiff's two experts as to nature of the leak; experts could not be as ambivalent as those two were and establish the privilege of offering opinion testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702. GMC v. Iracheta, 161 S.W.3d 462, 2005 Tex. LEXIS 304, 48 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 529, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17372 (Tex. 2005).

827. Bare opinion by an expert as to nature of a leak in a fuel system, without a basis, was not competent evidence. GMC v. Iracheta, 161 S.W.3d 462, 2005 Tex. LEXIS 304, 48 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 529, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17372 (Tex. 2005).

828. There was no error in allowing a physician, who examined a child that accused her father, defendant, of having sexually assaulted her to render an opinion. Foundation was sufficiently laid as to the physician's expertise and she was qualified to answer a question about the child's outcry statement. Barnes v. State, 165 S.W.3d 75, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2603 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

829. In a store owner's breach of contract suit against a security system company, the trial court erred in allowing the owner's witnesses to testify as experts as neither tested the owner's equipment and neither witness had any knowledge or experience with the particular type of security system that the company installed in the owner's store. Argus Sec. Sys. v. Owen, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2451 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 31 2005).

830. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the expert testimony regarding child sexual abuse victims' delayed outcry because the testimony regarding delayed outcry was specialized knowledge that was helpful to the jury in understanding the delay by the child in reporting the first instance of sexual abuse, and this type of evidence has been held relevant in child sexual abuse cases. Perez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2408 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2005).

831. In a dispute between insureds under a homeowners policy and their insurer concerning mold in the insureds' home, the insureds' claims failed on summary judgment because the insureds did not timely designate any expert to testify as to causation and lay testimony was insufficient. While the general causal relationship between water and mold might have been common knowledge, the causation issue in the instant case was not within the general experience and common sense of a lay person. Qualls v. State Farm Lloyds, 226 F.R.D. 551, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5049 (N.D. Tex. 2005).

832. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in ruling on the qualifications of the State's tire and shoe expert witness in a murder trial based on the evidence before the trial court at the time of its ruling. Although defendant conducted a lengthy and detailed cross-examination of the expert, during which defendant made a strong challenge to the expert's general knowledge of tires and shoes, this testimony came after the expert had already expressed his opinions before the jury. Rodgers v. State, 162 S.W.3d 698, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2277 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005), affirmed by 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 852 (Tex. Crim. App. May 3, 2006).

833. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 702 by concluding that defendant failed to demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that excluded testimony was reliable and would assist the trier of fact to determine a fact in issue. The trial court effectively recognized the legitimacy of the study of interrogation techniques and false confessions by ruling that most of the expert's proffered testimony was admissible; the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the expert's proffered testimony regarding the categories of false confessions, and particularly persuaded false confessions. Scott v. State, 165 S.W.3d 27, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2168 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

834. In a wrongful death and survival action, the trial court did not err in excluding the expert testimony of two accident reconstructionists because their opinions were conclusory and/or speculative. Reinicke v. Aeroground, Inc., 167 S.W.3d 385, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2132 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

835. Trial court did not err in finding that a witness was qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in connection with a negligence action involving nursing homes; the witness had the proper work experience, which included working as a staff nurse and as a supervisor of staff nurses. SunBridge Healthcare Corp. v. Penny, 160 S.W.3d 230, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1887 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

836. Expert testimony was required in a negligence case involving nursing homes because the issues involved those not within the common knowledge or experience of the jury. SunBridge Healthcare Corp. v. Penny, 160 S.W.3d 230, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1887 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

837. With regard to evaluating matters within the psychological or sociological sciences in parental termination cases under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 161.001, a certain case law framework regarding expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 should be employed, according to the Court of Appeals of Texas, Third District, Austin, to evaluate soft science testimony in civil cases, and that approach is as follows: when measuring the reliability of an expert's opinions in the fields within the soft sciences, courts should consider (1) the field of expertise is a legitimate one, (2) the subject matter of the expert's testimony is within the scope of that field, and (3) the expert's testimony properly relies upon the principles involved in that field of study; a Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 107.051 social study does not lend itself to evaluation by other case law factors because it is an inherently subjective endeavor and is not susceptible to scientific replication or statistical or rate of error analysis. Taylor v. Tex. Dep't of Protective & Regulatory Servs., 160 S.W.3d 641, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1793 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

838. Trial court did not err in allowing into evidence a court-ordered home study of the grandmother's home prepared by a social worker pursuant to Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 107.051(a), (b); considering the social worker's education, training, and experience, and that the social worker explained the findings and conclusions in depth, the trial court properly found that the social worker was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to testify. Taylor v. Tex. Dep't of Protective & Regulatory Servs., 160 S.W.3d 641, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1793 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

839. In a dispute over conservatorship of a child after termination of parental rights, the trial court did not err in ruling under Tex. R. Evid. 702 that a social worker, who was certified and had significant experience, was qualified to conduct a Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 107.051 social study of the grandmother's home and to testify in support of her conclusions. Taylor v. Texas Dept of Protective & Regulatory Servs., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1967 (Mar. 10, 2005).

840. Because an expert's opinion constituted no more than mere possibility, speculation, and surmise, the trial court properly struck the expert's report, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, 705. Emmett Props. v. Halliburton Energy

Servs., 167 S.W.3d 365, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1624 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

841. Trial court erred in denying a builder's motion to exclude the testimony of the homeowners' expert witness under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and 703. Although the expert had sufficient experience in repairing and remodeling homes to give an expert opinion on reasonable and necessary repair costs, that experience alone was not enough to provide a substantial basis of reliability for his opinion where he relied upon visual inspection and significant experience to justify his conclusions. Royce Homes, L.P. v. Neel, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1514 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 23 2005).

842. In a proceeding to terminate parental rights, a caseworker was properly permitted to testify as a fact witness. Contrary to the father's assertion that she expressed the "collective opinion" of the agency, she did not voice an opinion, when asked, about what was in the best interest of the children. Rogers v. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 175 S.W.3d 370, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1327 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

843. Trial court erred in allowing a licensed counselor to provide expert testimony concerning the suitability of each parent to be appointed sole or joint managing conservator. Because the counselor did not relate to any of the three prongs of inquiry necessary to establish the admissibility of her testimony. The counselor never stated that counseling was a legitimate field, that her testimony was within the scope of her field, or that her testimony properly relied upon or utilized principles involved in her field. In re K.L.R., 162 S.W.3d 291, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1268 (Tex. App. Tyler 2005).

844. Because the one-leg-stand and walk-and-turn field sobriety tests (FSTs) are grounded in the common knowledge that excessive alcohol consumption can cause problems with coordination, balance, and mental agility, a law enforcement officer's testimony about a defendant's coordination, balance, and mental agility problems during these FSTs is considered lay witness opinion testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701. McClain v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 760 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 1 2005).

845. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting the State's expert to testify through the use of hypothetical questions because he imparted specialized knowledge and did not state a direct opinion about the complainant's credibility but only general characteristics of child-abuse victims. McMillin v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 438 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 21 2005).

846. Former legal client, who claimed that bad legal advice given to his father had prevented him from pursuing product liability claims against a car manufacturer, could not recover against the law firm that gave the advice because he could not show that he would have recovered in the products liability suit, if he had brought it. The client claimed that the seat belts in his father's car were defective, but he could not prove his product liability claims without expert scientific and/or technical expert testimony, and he had not presented any expert testimony to support his claims. Rangel v. Lapin, 177 S.W.3d 17, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 318 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

847. In a products liability action arising from an auto accident, there was no evidence of causation; an expert witness' opinion was unreliable because it lacked objective scientific analysis and was unsupported by studies, publications, or peer review. Volkswagen of Am., Inc. v. Ramirez, 159 S.W.3d 897, 2004 Tex. LEXIS 1429, 48 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 256, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17242 (Tex. 2004).

848. Striking the patient's expert's evidence was an abuse of the trial court's discretion because the patient's expert had extensive experience and expertise in the procedure performed by the physician defendants, was actively practicing in the pertinent specialty when the treatment was provided and at the time he provided the affidavit, and satisfied the criteria expressed in Tex. R. Evid. 702 and former Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 4590i, § 14.01 (see Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.401). Downing v. Larson, 153 S.W.3d 248, 2004 Tex. App.

LEXIS 11502 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2004), reversed by 2006 Tex. LEXIS 524, 49 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 715 (Tex. 2006).

849. Expert's testimony was relevant to the issues to be decided by the jury where he conducted an audit of the manufacturer's design process, determining whether the manufacturer acted as a reasonable manufacturer would have in designing the forklift and taking safety considerations into account; the expert also offered testimony regarding the operator's suggested alternative design, contradicting the testimony of the operator's experts by concluding the inclusion of a door in the forklift's design was not a safer alternative, and this testimony was sufficiently tied to the facts of the case to assist the jury in resolving a factual dispute. Costilla v. Crown Equip. Corp., 148 S.W.3d 736, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10163 (Tex. App. Dallas 2004).

850. In a fraud case, the trial court erred by not disqualifying an expert witness who had switched sides during the litigation. It was reasonable to conclude that a confidential relationship existed, and confidential information was in fact disclosed. Formosa Plastics Corp., USA v. Kajima Int'l, Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9950 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 10 2004).

851. Special knowledge which qualified a witness to give an expert opinion could be derived from specialized education, practical experience, a study of technical works, or a varying combination of those things. Thomas v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10221 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 8 2004).

852. Trial court did not err in denying the lessee's motion to exclude an expert's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 regarding damages; the aspects of the expert's testimony concerned instances when the relevance and reliability of an expert's testimony were shown by the expert's skill and experience. Tesoro Marine Servs. v. Bagby, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11914 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 3 2004).

853. In a breach of contract case, a court properly admitted plaintiff's expert testimony where the expert testified that when money was missing from a parking garage, if records were not computerized, he looked for revenue trend changes and ticket trend changes, familiarized himself with the facility, and he testified that actually reviewing the tickets would not have aided him in his audit because when someone was stealing, there were no tickets. The expert considered several factors in his audit including frequency of building occupancy, the possibility of an increase in daily parkers versus contract parkers, parking validation, marketing, and higher parking rates; therefore, the testimony was reliable. Republic Parking Sys. of Tex., Inc. v. Medical Towers, Ltd., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9287 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 21 2004).

854. In a wrongful death case, a court properly excluded expert deposition testimony on hearsay grounds where the expert was not an employee of defendant pharmacy, and there was no evidence that an agency relationship existed. When the family non-suited their claims against the doctor, the subject matter over which the expert was asked to give his opinion became moot; subsequently, he was not called at trial, and, therefore, the trial court excluded his testimony on hearsay grounds. McCluskey v. Randall's Food Mkts., Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9178 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 19 2004).

855. In a manufacturing defect case brought against a tire company, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony from plaintiffs' experts; the opinions of one expert, a tire failure analyst, were reliable pursuant to Cal. R. Evid. 702 because the expert provided thorough information concerning his methodology and it was clear that his expertise rested on his many years of experience in tire examination. Additionally, the court rejected the tire company's assertion that a report relied on by the expert was inadmissible hearsay; the expert testified that the company that issued the report was a firm of rubber specialists and chemists who used sophisticated techniques, were highly competent, and widely used by experts. Cooper Tire & Rubber Co. v. Mendez, 155 S.W.3d 382, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9112 (Tex. App. El Paso 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 204 S.W.3d 797, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 555

856. In a manufacturing defect case brought against a tire company, the trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony on causation; review of one expert's testimony showed that he formed his opinions based on test data and physical evidence of the scene and on the vehicle. Additionally, after reviewing another expert's testimony, it was clear that he had at least the minimum requisite qualifications to render his opinion on deceleration; his testimony on the matter was based on testing that he believed was applicable despite the different cause of the deceleration in the case. Cooper Tire & Rubber Co. v. Mendez, 155 S.W.3d 382, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9112 (Tex. App. El Paso 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 204 S.W.3d 797, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 555 (Tex. 2006).

857. In a manufacturing defect case brought against a tire company, the trial court did not err in finding the opinions of one of plaintiffs' experts to be based on a reliable foundation. The expert, a professional engineer who had specialized in failure analysis and accident investigation involving metallurgical, mechanical, automotive, and combustion engineering, provided great detail concerning his methodology and procedure in tire examination; he also applied his experiential knowledge in failure analysis in determining the cause of the tread separation and in eliminating other potential causes. Cooper Tire & Rubber Co. v. Mendez, 155 S.W.3d 382, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9112 (Tex. App. El Paso 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 204 S.W.3d 797, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 555 (Tex. 2006).

858. In a manufacturing defect case brought against a tire company, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony from plaintiffs' experts. One expert, a researcher who was retained for the purpose of interpreting the results of a report, demonstrated that he had specialized knowledge in chemical analysis, identification of polymer materials, and was familiar with technologies used in related testing; additionally, the expert explained his methodology in analyzing data from the report and the research materials that informed his opinions in the case. Cooper Tire & Rubber Co. v. Mendez, 155 S.W.3d 382, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9112 (Tex. App. El Paso 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 204 S.W.3d 797, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 555 (Tex. 2006).

859. In light of the court's conclusion that an insurance policy was ambiguous, it was not error for the trial court to permit an expert witness to testify as to an interpretation of the policy; the expert was qualified pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, and the opinions were on mixed questions of law and fact and were proper pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 704. Royal Maccabees Life Ins. Co. v. James, 146 S.W.3d 340, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9025 (Tex. App. Dallas 2004).

860. Because an officer had completed the necessary training to be considered an expert on the Horizontal Gaze Nystagmus test, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the officer to testify concerning the test even though he had not yet received his certification at the time he performed the test on defendant. Barton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8863 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 5 2004).

861. Trial court erred in allowing legal experts to testify on questions of law concerning fiduciary duties, attorneys' duties, and conspiracy. It is not the role of the expert witness to define the particular legal principles applicable to a case; that is the role of the trial court. Greenberg Traurig of N.Y., P.C. v. Moody, 161 S.W.3d 56, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8744 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

862. Trial court erred in permitting a former judge to testify that the standard of care for attorneys was based on the Texas disciplinary rules when no such liability could be based on any violation of those rules. Greenberg Traurig of N.Y., P.C. v. Moody, 161 S.W.3d 56, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8744 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

863. Former judge's testimony was not relevant and, therefore, did not assist the jury in any way that was germane to the matters in dispute in a securities fraud case. Because the investors had no claim, and indeed could maintain no claim, against a law firm for negligence or breach of fiduciary duty, and because the firm's attorneys were not subject to the Texas disciplinary rules, former judge's opinions should not have been admitted into evidence. Greenberg Traurig of N.Y., P.C. v. Moody, 161 S.W.3d 56, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8744 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

864. Trial court had ruled that the psychotherapist was not qualified to testify as an expert, but the State could have her testify as a fact witness. Furthermore, the trial court instructed the jury to disregard any testimony from the psychotherapist concerning her "diagnosis" of the complainant, such that there was no error in the admission of her testimony. Taylor v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8546 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 23 2004).

865. Because a company did not call the author of a report to testify or otherwise prove that the author was qualified to render opinions pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the expert opinions in the report. Rebel Drilling Co., L.P. v. Nabors Drilling USA, Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8320 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 16 2004).

866. Robinson analysis may not apply to certain types of expert testimony. In these types of cases, there must still be a reliable basis for the expert's opinion. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

867. Trial court erred in rendering verdict for parents in their medical malpractice suit against doctors and a hospital for failure to treat and diagnose their twins for retinopathy of prematurity. Expert testimony that the twins' eyesight could have been successfully treated if their pediatrician had referred them for treatment when she first saw them was unreliable; the expert could not testify to any personal knowledge, experience, or any scientific data supporting his theory. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

868. Trial court must make an initial determination of whether the expert's testimony is relevant and reliable so as to be admissible. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

869. Even when challenged expert testimony is admitted by the trial court, a party may later complain on appeal that the expert testimony is legally insufficient to support the judgment because it is unreliable. Unreliable expert testimony is not evidence. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

870. In determining whether expert testimony is reliable and, therefore, some evidence supporting the judgment, the appellate court must employ an almost de novo-like review and, like the trial court, look beyond the expert's bare testimony to determine the reliability of the theory underlying it. The court does not focus on the correctness of the expert's opinion, but on the reliability of the analysis the expert used in reaching his or her conclusions. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

871. Expert must explain the basis of his statements to link his conclusions to the facts. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

872. Appellate courts should consider Robinson factors in determining whether scientific testimony is reliable: (1) the extent to which the theory has been or can be tested; (2) the extent to which the technique relies upon the subjective interpretation of the expert; (3) whether the theory has been subjected to peer review and publication; (4) the technique's potential rate of error; (5) whether the underlying theory or technique has been generally accepted as valid by the relevant scientific community; and (6) the non-judicial uses that have been made of the theory or technique. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

873. Experience alone may provide a sufficient basis for an expert's testimony, unless there is too great an analytical gap between the data and the opinion proffered. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

874. Doctor's self-serving statements that his methodology is generally accepted and reasonably relied upon by other experts in the field is insufficient to establish the reliability of the technique and theory underlying his opinion. Gross v. Burt, 149 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

875. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of the expert of the oil and gas well interest owners in their action against the well operators for fraud, breach of contract and conversion because the testimony of a petroleum accountant would have clearly assisted the trier of fact to understand the evidence presented in the case, and would have helped the jury to determine the fact issues posed by the parties. Cass v. Stephens, 156 S.W.3d 38, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8010, 160 Oil & Gas Rep. 27 (Tex. App. El Paso 2004), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 819, 128 S. Ct. 115, 169 L. Ed. 2d 26, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 10460 (2007).

876. In a legal malpractice suit, the court of appeals erred in finding that expert testimony was not needed because the connection between the attorneys' negligence and the client's loss in an underlying suit in bankruptcy court was obvious and in reversing the trial court's take-nothing judgment; the jury was asked to decide a complicated and very subjective causation issue: whether, in reasonable probability, a bankruptcy judge would have decided the underlying adversary proceeding differently if the attorney had personally tried the case or if he or his associate had introduced other evidence. Alexander v. Turtur & Assocs., 146 S.W.3d 113, 2004 Tex. LEXIS 734, 47 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 992 (Tex. 2004).

877. Defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04(a) was proper where there was evidence supporting the trial court's finding that a co-worker's testimony established the time of defendant's last drink; thus, the court concluded that the expert had sufficient information available upon which to extrapolate defendant's alcohol concentration at the time of the offense. The expert's extrapolation was sufficiently reliable to be useful to the jury and, therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the extrapolation evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Fulenwider v. State, 176 S.W.3d 290, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6352 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

878. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that a workplace safety expert did not have a reasonable basis for any of his opinions with respect to the legal duties owed by the hospital and how those duties were breached. Moore v. Mem'l Hermann Hosp. Sys., 140 S.W.3d 870, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6067 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

879. Trial court did not err in granting summary judgment to doctors in a medical malpractice suit where the court sustained the objections to the patient's expert's affidavit at the hearing because the expert's affidavit failed to state any knowledge that she possessed on the standard of care applicable to hospitals in cancer diagnosis. Shelton v. Sargent, 144 S.W.3d 113, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6116 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

880. Texas Supreme Court identifies the following factors as well as others to consider in determining whether scientific evidence is reliable and thus, admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702: (1) the extent to which the theory has been or can be tested; (2) the extent to which the technique relies upon the subjective interpretation of the expert; (3) whether the theory has been subjected to peer review and/or publication; (4) the technique's potential rate of error; (5) whether the underlying theory or technique has been generally accepted as valid by the relevant scientific community; and (6) the non-judicial uses which have been made of the theory or technique. Loram Maint. of Way, Inc. v. Ianni, 141 S.W.3d 722, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5857 (Tex. App. El Paso 2004), reversed by 2006 Tex. LEXIS

609, 49 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 874 (Tex. 2006).

881. In a negligence lawsuit against an employer brought by a police officer who was shot by an employee strung out on drugs provided by the employer, a psychiatrist was qualified to testify as an expert on methamphetamine abuse where the psychiatrist had constant contact with amphetamine abuse and directing others how to treat the disorder, and his course work included teaching how other substances like alcohol, amphetamines, and cocaine can present psychiatric syndromes or disorders. Loram Maint. of Way, Inc. v. Ianni, 141 S.W.3d 722, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5857 (Tex. App. El Paso 2004), reversed by 2006 Tex. LEXIS 609, 49 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 874 (Tex. 2006).

882. In a medical malpractice case, a court properly found that an expert witness was qualified to testify where she was a board certified pathologist at Baylor University, she was a full professor and held an endowed chair, she had written several articles about gastrointestinal cytology, she was familiar with pathology of the gastrointestinal tract, and she testified that it was within a pathologist's area of expertise to estimate the age of a perforation based on examination of cells taken from a colon. Axelrad v. Jackson, 142 S.W.3d 418, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5693 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

883. In a medical malpractice case, a court properly found that an expert witness's testimony was reliable where the witness observed acute inflammatory cells on specimen tissue taken from the patient's colon, and she also saw new blood vessels, histiocytes, chronic inflammatory cells, and fibroblasts. Based on her observations, she estimated a perforation that was one to two-and-a-half weeks old, and when questioned whether the patient might have suffered a microperforation, which partially healed, followed by a larger perforation in the same site after the enema, the witness discounted such a theory. Axelrad v. Jackson, 142 S.W.3d 418, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5693 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

884. Police officer was qualified as an expert on the HGN test where the requirement was satisfied by proof that the officer had received certification by the State of Texas to administer the HGN, and the officer testified and provided supporting documentation that he had become duly certified to administer the HGN test. Rodriguez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5697 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 29 2004).

885. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting expert's testimony as to why victims in general change their minds concerning prosecution of domestic abuse where the testimony was relevant to help the jury understand why the victim initially contacted the police about the assault and then later filed three affidavits of nonprosecution. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5548 (Tex. App. Eastland June 24 2004).

886. Nurse's report did not establish her qualifications to express an expert opinion on causation because her license precluded her from acts of medical diagnosis, and to give a medical opinion on the cause of someone's death demanded the ability to make a medical diagnosis where the doctor's mere assertion that the patient would have survived if appropriately triaged was conclusory and insufficient and failed to state how the hospital's failure to act was a substantial factor in bringing about the mother's death and without which her death would not have occurred. Costello v. Christus Santa Rosa Health Care Corp., 141 S.W.3d 245, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5500 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

887. Widow's expert's testimony presented no evidence as to the husband's cause of death, where in workers' compensation cases, expert medical testimony could enable a plaintiff to go to the jury if the evidence established reasonable probability of a causal connection between employment and the present injury, but if there were other plausible causes of the injury or condition that could be negated, the plaintiff had to offer evidence excluding those causes with reasonable certainty; the widow's expert was unable to prove that it was a reasonable probability that the husband contracted tetanus from the May 13th wound in light of the incubation period and in light of numerous other existing probable causes for the infection. Tex. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Lerma, 143 S.W.3d 172, 2004 Tex. App.

LEXIS 5235 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

888. Trial court did not err in striking the affidavits because there was no indication that either the self-employed licensed counselor or the chiropractor were qualified to give an opinion as to whether the claimant was of unsound mind, and the claimant's own affidavit was correctly stricken by the trial court because she did not show she was qualified to testify. Chavez v. Davila, 143 S.W.3d 151, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4902 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

889. In a family's design defect and marketing defect case against a minivan manufacturer arising from injuries their child sustained when an airbag deployed during a car accident, the family's damages award was reversed as the testimony of the family's expert should not have been admitted on the issue of whether the alternative design would have prevented the child's injuries because his testimony was unreliable and unsupported by any meaningful analysis. DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Hillhouse, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4921, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17018 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 2 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 161 S.W.3d 541, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11471 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

890. In a criminal prosecution for endangering a child arising from the sexual assault of defendant's two children by her live-in boyfriend, the trial court erred by allowing a detective to testify as to the boyfriend's truthfulness; however, the error was harmless, because the trial court instructed the jury that it had to decide the credibility of the witnesses testifying from the stand. Naivar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4883 (Tex. App. Tyler May 28 2004).

891. Estate's expert's report did not refer to any knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education regarding the standard of care applicable to urologists, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the expert was not qualified to testify about the doctor's actions; the scheduling order did not designate a later date as a deadline to file expert reports but specified a date on which the estate was required to provide the name of expert witnesses expected to testify at trial, such that the trial court did not act prematurely in dismissing the estate's claims. Olveda v. Sepulveda, 141 S.W.3d 679, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4698 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

892. Where a group life insurance policy was ambiguous as a matter of law, a trial court did not err by permitting expert testimony as to the interpretation of the policy; the witness had 48 years' experience in the insurance industry, was a licensed claims adjuster and a licensed risk manager, had taught insurance courses at the college level, attended many seminars to maintain his licenses, and had handled numerous group health and life claims. Royal Maccabees Life Ins. Co. v. James, 134 S.W.3d 906, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4638 (Tex. App. Dallas 2004), vacated by, opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 146 S.W.3d 340, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9025 (Tex. App. Dallas 2004).

893. When a challenge to an expert's testimony is restricted to the face of the record, and is not a challenge that requires a court to evaluate the underlying methodology, technique, or foundational data used by the expert, a legal sufficiency challenge can be lodged in the absence of any objection to the evidence. Coastal Transp. Co. v. Crown Cent. Petroleum Corp., 136 S.W.3d 227, 2004 Tex. LEXIS 441, 47 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 559 (Tex. 2004).

894. Employee's expert witness did not present a scientific foundation regarding general causation as he did not refer to a single epidemiological study or scientific article to prove that exposure to commercial cleaners could cause reactive airways dysfunction syndrome. The absence of any general-causation evidence, combined with the absence of reliable scientific literature, created a fatal evidentiary gap in the employee's claim against his employer; therefore, the jury's verdict in favor of the employee was reversed and a judgment that the employee take nothing was rendered. Brookshire Bros. v. Smith, 176 S.W.3d 30, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4385 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

895. Trial court could have reasonably concluded that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing that proffered expert testimony on an eyewitness identification issues was scientifically reliable where the witness had done no research in the area, less than one-tenth of her practice involved eyewitness identification, and she did not discuss the specifics of the studies and research underlying the tenets on which she would have relied. Mims v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4019 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 30 2004).

896. Trial court could have reasonably concluded that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing that proffered expert testimony on eyewitness identification issues was relevant because the expert's opinions failed to take into account enough pertinent facts to be of assistance to the jury, such as the eyewitness's photo identification of defendant prior to a live lineup, and much of her testimony focused on matters that did not require expert testimony. Mims v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4019 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 30 2004).

897. Admission of expert testimony by a play therapist was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and Tex. R. Evid. 703, as the trial court held a Daubert hearing and pursuant to the assessment of factors to assess reliability under Nenno, it was found that such was a legitimate field of expertise and the testimony itself was sufficiently reliable; the expert's testimony was based on her therapy and counseling sessions with a child, wherein he had indicated that his mother was abusive to him and his sister, and was admissible in the mother's parental rights termination proceeding. In re A.J.L., 136 S.W.3d 293, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3825 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

898. Court declined to hold that expert medical testimony was mandatory in a suit seeking to terminate parental rights under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 161.001(1)(D) or (E); mother's rights were properly terminated without expert testimony, based in part on her boyfriend's abuse of the child. In re K.W., 138 S.W.3d 420, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3467 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

899. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in striking the school district expert's testimony where there was too great an analytical gap between the expert's assumptions underlying his use of the 25 basis points and the opinion he offered on the issue of damages; therefore, his opinion on damages was not reliable and amounted to no evidence. Rio Grande City Consol. Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Stephens, Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3305 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 14 2004).

900. Expert witness was qualified to testify on behalf of drilling company in a breach of contract suit against a contractor. The expert had received B.S. and M.S. degrees in civil engineering, and although he had never operated a system such as the one at the center of the dispute, he had consulted with others on the system; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony. McLaughlin, Inc. v. Northstar Drilling Techs., Inc., 138 S.W.3d 24, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3084 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

901. In a personal injury case arising from an employee's fall through a skylight, scientific inquiries were not involved when experts testified as to safety measures, calculating the costs of medical care, lost earnings, and living assistance, and explaining the injuries. Therefore, the trial court was not required to analyze the specific factors from case law in determining that the experts were reliable. Taylor v. Am. Fabritech, Inc., 132 S.W.3d 613, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2550 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

902. In a products liability suit arising from a fire which destroyed the buyers' apartment and was allegedly caused by an air conditioning unit, the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony of the expert put forward by the unit's manufacturer and seller, as the expert's work background, education, and knowledge and experience in fire investigation demonstrated that he had expertise concerning the actual subject about which he offered an opinion. Pugh v. Conn's Appliances, Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2443 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 18 2004).

903. In a case alleging improper ventilation of a building, summary judgment was properly granted in favor of a company, its owners, and its managers because the medical evidence offered by an injured party was stricken based on a failure to show causation; there was insufficient epidemiological data to support causation of neurotoxicity under the six applicable reliability factors analyzed by the trial court, and the evidence showed an "analytical gap" because the experts' experience and training, the diagnostic tests, and the medical literature that served as a basis for their medical opinions did not provide any evidence of causation. Feria v. Dynagraphics Co., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2366 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 15 2004).

904. Nurse practitioner who performed the sexual assault exam on the victim was allowed to testify regarding the victim's medical history as told to her by the victim; also, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, it was also permissible for the nurse practitioner to testify and give her expert opinion that her findings were consistent with the medical history given by the victim. Dickson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1087 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 5 2004).

905. In a driving while intoxicated prosecution under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04(b), where defendant sought to admit an expert witness to testify as to whether the factors of intoxication were identifiable from the videotape but, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court properly excluded the expert witness's testimony because its substance was not outside the knowledge and experience of the average juror, and the expert's testimony did not meet the Daubert standard for expert testimony as (1) the expert's testimony did not establish that a rate of error could be assigned where a determination of intoxication was made from viewing a videotape and no field sobriety tests were conducted; (2) the expert could not cite any scientific theory supporting a conclusion that intoxication could be determined solely from viewing a videotape nor could he refer the court to any literature supporting or rejecting that conclusion; and (3) the expert presented no publications or peer-reviewed data relating to a determination of intoxication without field sobriety test data nor did he establish that his method was generally accepted in the relevant community. Platten v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 588 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 21, 2004).

906. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, the homeowner's expert was qualified to testify as an expert about home foundations based on his knowledge, experience, and training because he had practiced civil engineering in the Army for 20 years; after retiring from the Army, he worked with a home builder in analyzing and recommending changes to foundation plans and had investigated approximately 6,000 foundations. United Servs. Auto. Ass'n v. Pigott, 154 S.W.3d 625, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10806 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2003), opinion withdrawn by, appeal dismissed by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8017 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 1, 2004).

907. Psychologist's expert testimony in child sexual abuse case that the complainant was truthful was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702; the psychologist's testimony that the child did not exhibit the traits of manipulation was not a direct comment on the truth of the child's allegations and thus was admissible. Burns v. State, 122 S.W.3d 434, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10193 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003).

908. Petitioner state death row inmate argued that a probation officer who had taken courses in sexual deviancy was not qualified to provide expert testimony because she did not have a professional license as a psychologist, psychiatrist, or counselor, and claimed that allowing her to testify violated his rights to the due process of law and to a fair trial; however, court found that the claim that the requirements of education and expertise necessary to qualify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 were too low to meet the requirements of the due process had not been clearly established in federal law; therefore, because the state court's adjudication of the claim was neither contrary to nor the result of an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, habeas relief was denied. Wyatt v. Dretke, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26997 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 3 2003).

909. Expert testimony concerning drug testing methods was sufficiently reliable in an action brought by disqualified exhibitors against a livestock show; the expert possessed adequate knowledge to criticize the procedures used and did not offer some unproven scientific method as an alternative. Houston Livestock Show & Rodeo, Inc. v. Hamrick,

125 S.W.3d 555, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 6339 (Tex. App. Austin 2003).

910. Trial court did not err in admitting the consumer's expert's testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702 in connection with a products liability case; the expert properly focused the examination on the finished product, and thus the analysis of the composition of the final product was sufficiently tied to the facts of the case so that it aided the jury in resolving the factual dispute and thus was relevant. Johnson Controls Battery Group, Inc. v. Runnels, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10956 (Tex. App. Tyler May 21 2003).

911. Considering the criteria set forth in case law, the court found the expert testimony reliable in connection with a consumer's products liability action; even considering the fact that microprobe analysis was somewhat subjective in that the expert determined what areas to test, the record indicated that the expert tested various zones of the grid and stated that it was not necessary to conduct multiple tests in the same area as the results were not going to differ. Johnson Controls Battery Group, Inc. v. Runnels, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10956 (Tex. App. Tyler May 21 2003).

912. Where defendant flunked all three field sobriety tests, defendant's conviction of misdemeanor driving while intoxicated in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04 was affirmed because: (1) admission of the evidence regarding the horizontal gaze nystagmus test under Texas R. Evid. 702 was proper in that the officer was qualified as an expert in the administration and the officer performed the screening properly on the occasion in question, and (2) the trial court erred in admitting evidence of vertical gaze nystagmus (VGN) and resting nystagmus tests under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the State failed to show that evidence of VGN and resting nystagmus testing was reliable and relevant to assist the trier of fact, but admission of the evidence was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because it did not affect defendant's substantial rights in that the jury instruction did not require the jury to determine what substance caused defendant's intoxication. Quinney v. State, 99 S.W.3d 853, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1695, 117 A.L.R.5th 803 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2003).

913. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, an expert qualified by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify as to scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge if it will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or determine a fact in issue. Cresthaven Nursing Residence v. Freeman, 134 S.W.3d 214, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1187 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2003).

914. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, there was no abuse of discretion in allowing a doctor to testify as an expert witness for appellee decedent's daughters because there was nothing to indicate that the opinions offered required an expertise peculiar to the fields of cardiology or urology, and multiple doctors who were not pathologists offered opinions as to the cause of decedent's death. Cresthaven Nursing Residence v. Freeman, 134 S.W.3d 214, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1187 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2003).

915. In a wrongful death and survival action filed by the decedent's daughters against the healthcare providers, the daughters' expert's opinions as to the negligence of the nursing home, because it failed to give an antibiotic that had been prescribed for a urinary tract infection, to maintain accurate information in nursing home records, and to communicate that information to hospital personnel upon transfer of a patient to the hospital, was based on the expert's experience as a director of a nursing home and additionally, in regards to the decedent's cause of death, the expert relied on the expert's medical training and general experience treating patients; thus, there was nothing to indicate that the expert's opinions required an expertise peculiar to the fields of cardiology or urology and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the expert to testify pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702. Cresthaven Nursing Residence v. Freeman, 134 S.W.3d 214, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1187 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2003).

916. When offered evidence is the testimony of an expert witness, the court must apply the principles set forth in the rules governing expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702-705; a two-part test governs whether expert testimony is admissible: (1) the expert must be qualified and (2) the testimony must be relevant and based on a reliable foundation. Ramsey v. Reagan, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 276 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 16 2003).

917. Trial court did not err in permitting a witness to testify as an expert witness on the valuation of a divorcing couple's real property, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the witness was qualified with many years experience, continuing education courses, service on the county appraisal board, and the witness gave relevant testimony based on a reliable foundation. The witness' testimony as to the value of the couple's property was based on approved valuation methods and the value of their property was relevant to the trial court in determining a division of the property. In re Marriage of Rice, 96 S.W.3d 642, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 150 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2003).

918. Affidavits of expert witnesses offered in support of homeowners' motion against summary judgment in an action seeking losses for a house fire failed to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, 702, and 703, as the testimony was a pyramid of inferences lacking probative force because it was based on assumed facts that varied from the actual undisputed facts. Rayon v. Energy Specialties, Inc., 121 S.W.3d 7, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9160 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

919. Police officer with relevant training or experience may qualify under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and 702 to give opinion testimony. Thrailkille v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8972 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 18 2002).

920. In a driver's action against an automobile company alleging chemicals released when her car's airbag deployed and caused her sinusitis and asthma, the trial court properly concluded that the driver's expert testimony was inadmissible or insufficient, although one of her experts, a doctor, had medical expertise greater than that of the general population, since the driver did not establish that expertise of the expert on the issue of cause in fact met the requisites of Tex. R. Evid. 702; similary, there was sound basis for the trial court to conclude that the driver's other expert, an independent consultant on automotive safety and design and vehicle crashworthiness, was not qualified to render an opinion on whether deployment of the air bag caused the driver's respiratory symptoms. Praytor v. Ford Motor Co., 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8572 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 5 2002), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 97 S.W.3d 237, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9017 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2002).

921. Because evidence of defendant's alcohol concentration was shown by the results of an Intoxilyzer test, taken at the request or order of a peace officer, during his trial for diving while intoxicated, the trial court was to determine whether the technique was properly applied, at a "gatekeeper" hearing, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, but the issues at the hearing were only those that were not resolved by the legislature's decisions on reliability. Beard v. State, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 183 (Tex. Crim. App. Sept. 25 2002), opinion withdrawn by 108 S.W.3d 304, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 108 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003).

922. Where there was no indication in an officer's sworn report that his opinion of a driver's intoxication was based on his training and experience, his qualifications did not have to be established under Tex. R. Evid. 702; further, the walk-and-turn and one-leg stand tests were not based on a novel scientific theory and, under Tex. R. Evid. 701, a police officer was not required to be an expert to express an opinion as to whether the person he observed was intoxicated. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Struve, 79 S.W.3d 796, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4433 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2002).

923. Tex. R. Evid. 702's reliability requirement focuses on the principles, research, and methodology underlying an expert's conclusions. Under this requirement, expert testimony is unreliable if it is not grounded in the methods and procedures of science and is no more than subjective belief or unsupported speculation; expert testimony is also unreliable if there is too great an analytical gap between the data the expert relies upon and the opinion offered.

Exxon Pipeline Co. v. Zwahr, 88 S.W.3d 623, 2002 Tex. LEXIS 59, 45 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 691, 155 Oil & Gas Rep. 82 (Tex. 2002).

924. When an expert appraiser relied on the condemnation of a tract of land in establishing a separate economic unit and assigning a value to that unit, his testimony was irrelevant to determining the value of the land condemned and was therefore inadmissible. Exxon Pipeline Co. v. Zwahr, 88 S.W.3d 623, 2002 Tex. LEXIS 59, 45 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 691, 155 Oil & Gas Rep. 82 (Tex. 2002).

925. Where scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue or both, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education can testify permissibly thereto in the form of opinion or otherwise. Volkswagen of Am., Inc. v. Ramirez, 79 S.W.3d 113, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3358 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2002), rev'd on other grounds, 159 S.W.3d 897, 2004 Tex. LEXIS 1429 (Tex. 2004).

926. Registered nurse who had examined the child victim was properly allowed to testify as an expert witness in defendant's trial for indecent assault on a child where the evidence showed that she had been performing sexual assault examinations for more than four years on hundreds of children; the fact that she did not have a medical degree did not render her unqualified as an expert. Gregory v. State, 56 S.W.3d 164, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 4519 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2001), writ of certiorari denied by 538 U.S. 978, 123 S. Ct. 1787, 155 L. Ed. 2d 667, 2003 U.S. LEXIS 2967, 71 U.S.L.W. 3666 (2003).

927. In farmers' action against a seed company, for damages arising out the failure of their crop allegedly due to defective seeds, the trial court properly allowed an expert to testify on behalf of the farmers where the expert's experience and background in plant science rendered him qualified to render and opinion and where his knowledge would aid the jury in understanding the evidence. Helena Chem. Co. v. Wilkins, 47 S.W.3d 486, 2001 Tex. LEXIS 38, 44 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 675 (Tex. 2001).

928. When an expert is not qualified, his testimony has no probative worth and is not proper evidence. Dziedzic v. Stephanou, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 7458 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 7 1999).

929. Testifying expert cannot establish medical standards of care by testifying as to what he would have done, but a defendant doctor can establish a medical standard by which his own conduct is to be judged. Dziedzic v. Stephanou, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 7458 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 7 1999).

930. Admission of expert testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702 lies within the sound discretion of a trial court and will not be set aside absent a showing of abuse of that discretion. Dziedzic v. Stephanou, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 7458 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 7 1999).

931. Party offering an expert's testimony bears the burden of proving that the witness is qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 by establishing that the expert has knowledge, skill, experience, training or education regarding the specific issue before the court which would qualify the expert to give an opinion on that particular subject; the word "knowledge" connotes more than subjective belief or unsupported speculation. Dziedzic v. Stephanou, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 7458 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 7 1999).

932. In a juvenile defendant's trial for murder, the trial court properly excluded defendant's expert witness, where the witness was a linguist who sought to testify that the words in defendant's statement were not defendant's own words and might have been influenced by the questions asked, where the trial court had much evidence regarding the expert's qualifications, skill, and experience, but where the trial court had little evidence about the extent to which the theory or technique may have been accepted by the scientific community, the existence of literature supporting or rejecting the theory, the potential rate of error, and whether other experts were available to test the evidence or determine a fact issue. Rogers v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 1241 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 25 1999).

933. Court will not reverse a trial court's decision about the admissibility of expert testimony unless the trial court abuses its discretion. Rogers v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 1241 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 25 1999).

934. Trial court must determine whether the proffered scientific expert testimony is sufficiently reliable and relevant to help the jury in reaching accurate results. Rogers v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 1241 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 25 1999).

935. to be considered reliable, evidence based on scientific theory must meet three criteria: (1) the underlying scientific theory must be valid, (2) the technique applying the theory must be valid, and (3) the technique must have been properly applied on the occasion in question. Rogers v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 1241 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 25 1999).

936. In determining a theory's reliability, a trial court may look at some unexclusive factors including: (1) the extent to which the relevant scientific community accepts as valid the underlying scientific theory and technique; (2) the expert's qualifications; (3) whether literature exists that supports or rejects the underlying theory and technique; (4) the technique's potential rate of error; (5) whether other experts are available to test and evaluate the technique; (6) the clarity with which the expert and the proponent can explain to the trial court the underlying theory; and (7) the experience and skill of the expert who applied the technique on the occasion in question. Rogers v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 1241 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 25 1999).

937. Defendant argued that his trial counsel was ineffective because he failed to object to an expert's testimony that the victim had competently answered age-appropriate questions during the interview, the expert's testimony that the victim competently answered age-appropriate questions did not directly comment on the victim's truthfulness. Sosa-Medrano v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5756 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 29 2014).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Admissibility

938. Expert stated that the child was consistent throughout his story, but the expert did not offer an opinion concerning or otherwise discuss the truthfulness of the child's statements or allegations; the expert's statement did not constitute a comment on the child's credibility, but if it was, the error was harmless, as the testimony was not reviewed or revisited and was but a small portion of the evidence before the jury. Martinez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8369, 2014 WL 3763649 (Tex. App. El Paso July 30 2014).

939. Trial court did not commit error in allowing the detective's testimony where the detective did not give an expert opinion about the latent prints he lifted and he did did he testify about the science of fingerprint analysis. Ridge v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7829 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 18 2014).

940. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the testimony of a witness related to cause of concrete damage because his conclusion was based only on a visual inspection and another's report, and he did not investigate other possible causes of the damage, such that his causation testimony was unreliable and was properly excluded. Raul Flores, Inc. v. Rodriguez, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3561, 2014 WL 1370344 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 3 2014).

941. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding a witness's testimony regarding causation, as he did not take or analyze a core sample or subgrade sample for testing, the scope of his work was a visual inspection, and he did not investigate potential alternate causes of damage, such that his testimony was no more than subjective belief and was properly excluded as unreliable. Raul Flores, Inc. v. Rodriguez, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3561, 2014 WL 1370344 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 3 2014).

942. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of a former military police officer because it was irrelevant and would not have assisted the jury in deciding the case. Allowing the testimony would have suggested to the jury the existence of a legal duty that was not recognized in Texas, i.e., asking a driving while intoxicated suspect if he had physical injuries before administering the field sobriety tests. Oliva v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3523, 2014 WL 1319308 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 2 2014).

943. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a forensic chemist's testimony because from the evidence before it, the trial court reasonably conclude that the scientific theory underlying gun shot residue (GSR) testing was valid, that the technique applying the theory was valid, and that the technique was properly applied by the chemist. the chemists specifically testified that most labs allowed the reporting of one particle of GSR. Burks v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3243, 2014 WL 1285731 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2014).

944. Defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated was appropriate because testimony that defendant showed signs of impairment consistent with the use of hydrocodone supplied a logical connection between defendant's admitted use of hydrocodone and his driving. As such, that testimony was relevant; because the challenged evidence was relevant and reliable, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the videorecording of defendant's statement and the expert's testimony. Everitt v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1667, 2014 WL 586100 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 13 2014).

945. During defendant's trial for murdering her tenth husband, the court erred in admitting testimony from the State's expert, a licensed professional counselor, regarding borderline personality disorder because the testimony was merely speculative; however, the error was harmless given the strength of the evidence supporting the conviction. Maxwell v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1514, 2014 WL 556377 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 12 2014).

946. Trial court did not err in allowing the State's appraisal expert to testify at trial that the condemned property most likely would not be developed for eight years while it was undergoing environmental remediation as the market survey results that the expert conducted supported his conclusion that the property most likely would not be developed until regulatory closure or a letter of no further action was obtained.

947. In an eminent domain proceeding, because appellant's contention that the State's appraisal expert's opinion under the comparable sales method was tainted by speculation and improper assumptions and appellant's argument that the expert's opinions were unreliable and thus inadmissible were rejeted, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the expert's appraisal opinions.

948. Appellant's argument that there was no support for the State's appraisal expert's use of a discount rate in appraising property was rejected because appellant cited no authority for its contention that a discount rate analysis was an improper methodology in condemnation practice; and the expert testified that performing a discounted cash flow analysis to determine the environmentally impaired property value was supported by Appraisal Institute literature.

949. Trial court did not err in denying a taxpayer's motion to exclude the testimony of an appraisal district's expert, a registered professional appraiser with close to 30 years of experience, because his calculations were based on quantitative foundational data and followed approved methodology. Key Energy Servs., Llc v. Shelby County

Appraisal Dist., 428 S.W.3d 133, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 439, 2014 WL 130547 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 15 2014).

950. Legally sufficient evidence supported the finding of $90,000 in enhanced market value caused by construction of a permanent improvement to the land because the expert's testimony established his thoroughness in appraising the land with and without improvements, his testimony was grounded in a sound evidentiary basis, was detailed and not conclusory. Mason v. Mason, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 413, 2014 WL 199649 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 13 2014).

951. In a suit for personal injury and underinsured motorist coverage, the trial court excluded the testimony of a defense expert based on a determination that the expert's report did not meet the reliability requirements of this rule; because the insurance company had an adequate remedy by appeal, mandamus review was not available. In re Farmers Tex. County Mut. Ins. Co., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15350, 2013 WL 6730094 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 20 2013).

952. At defendant's DWI trial, the court did not deny his rights under the Sixth Amendment by limiting his cross-examination of the State's witness who was a former breath test technical advisor. Because the witness indicated at a Rule 702 hearing outside the presence of the jury that he no longer felt comfortable testifying as an expert in the field, the trial court properly excluded testimony that was not sufficiently reliable to assist the jury in reaching an accurate result. Balderama v. State, 421 S.W.3d 247, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15133, 2013 WL 6637703 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 18 2013).

953. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to testimony of the State's expert relating to the characteristics of child victims of sexual abuse because the testimony was admissible under this rule and counsel may have had a strategic reason for not objecting to the testimony, as counsel conducted an extensive and thorough cross-examination of the expert. Adair v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14923, 2013 WL 6665033 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 12 2013).

954. Physician's deposition testimony and report were inadmissible because they were conclusory and unreliable, as corroborating data was not included in the report, his theory that the patient would have survived had the defibrillator administered a successful defibrillation was undermined by the American Medical Association's manual, and he admitted that admitting a patient in the instant patient's condition into the hospital was no assurance that the patient would eventually be discharged alive. Schronk v. Laerdal Med. Corp., 440 S.W.3d 250, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15024, 2013 WL 6570907 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 12 2013).

955. Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the officer to testify as an expert on the HGN test, because the officer was certified at the time he administered the HGN test, and he further testified that he had extensive training in administering the test. Leigh v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13248, 2013 WL 5777852 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 24 2013).

956. Expert testimony that an injured worker probably would have been promoted to a highly paid directional driller position was based on speculation and conjecture, given his limited experience in oil drilling and the cyclic nature of the industry; moreover, the erroneous admission of the experts' testimony was harmful because lost earning capacity was an integral part of the case. Chesapeake Operating, Inc. v. Hopel, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13281, 2013 WL 5782916 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 24 2013).

957. Trial court did not err by finding that the testimony of the expert presented by the building materials supplier constituted no evidence to support a finding that the manufacturer's decking rotted, decayed, split, checked, or splintered as a direct result of a manufacturing defect because the expert did not apply any scientific methodology or technique and merely gave his subjective opinion, and therefore his opinions were not based on a reliable foundation. Bldg. Prods. Plus v. Tamko Bldg. Prods., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12590, 2013 WL 5604738 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 10 2013).

958. No evidence supported an award based on a valuation provided by an expert witness who did not follow guidelines for valuing intangible assets or otherwise establish a reliable basis for stating that his valuation of a partnership interest attributed no value to goodwill; however, because the expert's testimony provided some evidence of the correct measure of damages based on book value, the trial court erred in rendering a take-nothing JNOV. Vega v. Fulcrum Energy, Llc, 415 S.W.3d 481, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12323, 2013 WL 5490183 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 3 2013).

959. Expert's testimony regarding damages in a trade secrets action was properly admitted because it was not illogical for the expert to assign a value to each separate piece of the compilation, and it was not suggested how using the geologist's former partner's name as the hypothetical "willing buyer" changed the expert's calculations in any way. Bishop v. Miller, 412 S.W.3d 758, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11614 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 12 2013).

960. Expert's testimony regarding damages in a trade secrets action was properly admitted because it was not illogical for the expert to assign a value to each separate piece of the compilation, and it was not suggested how using the geologist's former partner's name as the hypothetical "willing buyer" changed the expert's calculations in any way. Bishop v. Miller, 412 S.W.3d 758, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11614 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 12 2013).

961. Where defendant was convicted of possession of one to four grams of a controlled substance based on methamphetamine found in the car during a traffic stop, an expert's opinion that the sergeant's failure to follow police procedure suggested that the drugs were planted in the car was inadmissible. Because the expert did not explain why the sergeant's acts were suspicious or why they led to the conclusion that the drugs were planted, there was not a sufficient basis for an expert opinion. Nickols v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11241 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 30 2013).

962. Although based on calculations from a reliable software program, an expert's testimony did not provide legally sufficient evidence of a contractor's lost profits for repairs the contractor had been prevented from performing under an insurance authorization form because the starting point for the calculations was the initial insurance claim amounts, rather than the appraisal award. Azad v. Mrco, Inc., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10969 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 29 2013).

963. Trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony in a wrongful termination action because the employee's expert articulated a reliable and well-accepted method for evaluating back pay and front pay. Dell, Inc. v. Wise, 424 S.W.3d 100, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10654 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 22 2013).

964. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, the testimony of a forensic interviewer could have been viewed as a description of what was said, as the interviewer did not testify that she believed the child was being truthful, and it would not have been outside the zone of disagreement for the trial court to have found that the testimony would assist the jury. Page v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10153 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 15 2013).

965. Expert's deposition testimony and accompanying report did not constitute admissible evidence, because the deposition testimony and report were conclusory and lacked indicia of reliability. Schronk v. Laerdal Med. Corp., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9916 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 8 2013).

966. There was no abuse of discretion by excluding the expert's testimony regarding alleged marketing or design defects in the automatic external defibrillator or its battery, because the expert did not test the actual device or battery involved and did not express specific expertise regarding automatic external defibrillators and batteries. Schronk v. Laerdal Med. Corp., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9916 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 8 2013).

967. At defendant's trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a licensed professional counselor who treated sex offenders; the expert's testimony about grooming for a sexual offense was relevant to assist the jury in understanding defendant's behavior. Cox v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8890 (Tex. App. Waco July 18 2013).

968. In a trial of inmate's civil commitment as a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.062, the trial court properly excluded the inmate's expert's testimony that one of the victims had recanted pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 702, because such evidence represented a collateral attack on the underlying convictions, which had not been set aside. In re Barron, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8495, 2013 WL 3487385 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 11 2013).

969. In a customer's action against a vehicle dealership for breach of warranty and fraud, the trial court did not err in ruling that testimony by the customer's expert was inadmissible because the testimony was not demonstrated to be reliable; the expert could not explain why, in arriving at his opinion on damages, the "clean trade-in" value was used as a starting point instead of the "clean retail" value, the difference in which was nearly $ 4,000. Moore v. Jordan Ford, Ltd., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8372 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 10 2013).

970. Trial court had discretion to exclude a misleading line of questions, and the fact that the trial court improperly disallowed the questioning on the recidivism rate among patients in appellant's offer of proof did not preclude him from properly presenting his appeal; even if the court assumed there had been no recidivism in the treated class of those committed to a program, it did not follow that expert testimony appellant would likely reoffend was incorrect. In re Weissinger, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7819, 2013 WL 3355758 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 27 2013).

971. Proffered expert testimony, even if relevant, was not necessarily admissible, and assuming the trial court erred in limiting appellant's cross-examination of the expert, given his testimony on his credentials and that supporting his methodology, any error likely made no difference in the jury's verdict. In re Weissinger, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7819, 2013 WL 3355758 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 27 2013).

972. Appellant claimed that the attorney fee testimony by the attorney, who testified as an expert, was conclusory as to an estimate, but the court disagreed, as it was permissible for an attorney to estimate the amount of time expended on claims for which fees were recoverable, and the attorney's testimony sufficiently linked his opinions to the facts of the case and his testimony was not conclusory. Ropa Exploration Corp. v. Barash Energy, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7290 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 13 2013).

973. Expert's testimony was speculative and conclusory, and should have been excluded in its entirety, because the expert never stated that the horses escaped due to the alleged inadequacies. Russell Equestrian Ctr., Inc. v. Miller, 406 S.W.3d 243, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6826 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 5 2013).

974. Although neither expert read the contract before trial, each expert had years of experience in the area; the court could not find that the experts had no reasonable basis for their opinions concerning contractor one's duties under the contract, and the analysis each expert used was reliable and therefore admissible, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting this testimony. City of Alton v. Sharyland Water Supply Corp., 402 S.W.3d 867, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6606 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 30 2013).

975. Expert based his opinions not on the reading of a particular contract, but on assumptions, and there was no evidence that the assumptions were unfounded. City of Alton v. Sharyland Water Supply Corp., 402 S.W.3d 867, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6606 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 30 2013).

976. Company presented expert testimony on a repair estimate, and the expert testified as to his calculations and method and was cross-examined, and the jury was presented with evidence allowing the jury to assess the facts and accordingly award damages; the testimony revealed factors that were considered in order to ensure the reasonableness of the damages the jury awarded, and the evidence was sufficient for the jury to have found that the cost of future repairs awarded was reasonable. City of Alton v. Sharyland Water Supply Corp., 402 S.W.3d 867, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6606 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 30 2013).

977. Trial court's instruction to disregard was sufficient to cure any alleged error in the admission of the trooper's testimony, Tex. R. Evid. 702, on defendant's eye tremors, and defendant suffered no harm, Tex. R. App. P. 44.2. Maldonado v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5978 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 15 2013).

978. Expert's testimony regarding the value of minority owners' interest in dissolved companies was unreliable and should have been excluded because the expert relied on internal projections that were overly optimistic and speculative; moreover, the expert did not fully account for the accrual of preferred return. Citrin Holdings, LLC v. Minnis, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 9 2013).

979. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the police sergeant's expert testimony over defendant's reliability objections because: (1) the sergeant's field of expertise, gang behavior and the Mexican Mafia, was generally accepted as a legitimate field of expertise; (2) the sergeant's testimony regarding the purpose, history, hierarchical structure, and the rules and regulations that purportedly govern the organization and conduct of its members, as well as the type of distinctive tattoos that its members use to signify their membership in the organization, clearly fit within the scope of that field; and (3) the sergeant's testimony was derived from his field interviews with current and former Mexican Mafia members and collaboration with other law enforcement officials familiar with the organization. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5228 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2013).

980. Even if defendant's objection during the punishment phase was timely, and an investigator's expert opinion that defendant's child would be at further risk if around defendant was inadmissible, similar evidence was introduced during the guilt-innocence phase of the trial without objection; hence, defendant was not harmed by the admission of the investigator's opinion. Lomax v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5306 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 30 2013).

981. Trial court did not err by overruling defendant's objection to the State's expert being allowed to testify as an expert witness on the subject of fingerprint comparison because the evidence showed that the expert was qualified, as he testified that he had been a forensic investigator for 18 years, he had training in fingerprint comparison, he had been certified to examine fingerprints, and had been doing fingerprint comparison for the police department for 17 years. The court also held that the evidence was reliable because the uniqueness of fingerprints was common knowledge upon which the court could take judicial notice. Lightner v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5365 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 30 2013).

982. Defendant failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion by permitting the State's expert to testify because defendant stipulated that he was a qualified expert witness, and the questions asked of the expert were proper because they asked him to opine on whether the facts and circumstances revealed by his investigation measured up to a standard of legal culpability. Even if the trial court erred by admitting the evidence, the error would have been harmless given the other evidence against defendant, including evidence that in the hours before the fatal accident, defendant had been drinking beer and whiskey and smoking marijuana. Blanchard v. State, 2013

Tex. App. LEXIS 5140 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 25 2013).

983. Trial court correctly decided that defendant's computer expert could not testify regarding authenticating the e-mails between defendant and the alleged victim because he had no personal knowledge of the case and he was not shown to be qualified by his scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge to give any opinions in the case. Sennett v. State, 406 S.W.3d 661, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 25 2013).

984. At defendant's trial for indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in admitting the expert testimony of the nurse who performed the examination of the child, even though she was not certified at the time. Because the facts of the hypothetical matched the facts of this case, the relevancy fit requirement was met. Pierson v. State, 398 S.W.3d 406, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4868 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 19 2013).

985. Court noted that the potential prejudicial effect of an attorney testifying as an expert was of greater significance that other experts, and even greater impact is likely when the testifying attorney describes qualifications that portray her as a trusted advisor to specific members of the Texas Supreme Court with respect to the disciplinary rules being discussed, as in this case. George Fleming & Fleming & Assocs., L.L.P. v. Kinney, 395 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4507 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

986. Attorney preserved his challenges to an expert's testimony by filing a motion to exclude under Tex. R. Evid. 702; he challenged admissibility on several grounds, discussed these objections with the trial court, and the trial court overruled the motion to exclude, and these steps preserved the attorney's appellate challenges. George Fleming & Fleming & Assocs., L.L.P. v. Kinney, 395 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4507 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

987. Expert must testify before the jury has received the jury charge and before it has been instructed on specific elements and standards concerning specific claims, and the expert must have some leeway to reference the controlling legal terms and related concepts while testifying, otherwise, a jury would not be able to make sense of the expert's testimony or measure it against the charge's requirements, and the sponsoring litigant could not meet a motion for directed verdict; it follows that the standards governing admission of expert testimony do not automatically foreclose every reference to legal terms or the disciplinary rules in the course of expert testimony addressing an attorney's alleged breaches of the duties owed to a client, and such an expert properly may include these references when the trial court sets appropriate limits, and the continuum of potentially relevant testimony from an expert likely will vary according to the specific facts and the specific legal standards being litigated in specific cases. George Fleming & Fleming & Assocs., L.L.P. v. Kinney, 395 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4507 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

988. Expert permissibly testified concerning general fiduciary duty concepts and her opinion that an attorney's handling of expenses violated those duties. George Fleming & Fleming & Assocs., L.L.P. v. Kinney, 395 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4507 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

989. Expert's testimony concerning an attorney's breach of fiduciary duty crossed the admissibility border when she tried to explain the application of specific rules of professional conduct, she opined that the attorney violated at least half a dozen specific rules, and she told the jury that violating the rules necessarily established a breach of fiduciary duty; this ran afoul of the reliability requirement and the prohibition against testimony regarding pure questions of law, plus a violation of a rule did not give rise to a private cause of action or create a presumption that a legal duty had been breached, for purposes of Tex. Disc. R. Prof. Conduct, pmbl., para. 15. George Fleming & Fleming & Assocs., L.L.P. v. Kinney, 395 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4507 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist.

Apr. 9 2013).

990. Trial court abused its discretion in admitting an expert's testimony because she equated disciplinary rule violations with per se breaches of fiduciary duties, which was unreliable; as the expert predicated her testimony on an asserted intertwining of the professional conduct rules and breach of fiduciary duty, the error impacted her entire testimony regarding the attorney's asserted breaches of duty. George Fleming & Fleming & Assocs., L.L.P. v. Kinney, 395 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4507 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

991. Attorney was entitled to counter an expert's testimony after it was admitted over objection, and to answer the question asked of him, as he was not required to give up at trial to preserve his complaint on appeal. George Fleming & Fleming & Assocs., L.L.P. v. Kinney, 395 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4507 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

992. Error arising from admission of an expert's testimony was harmful and probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment, under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1), given that the expert opined that the disciplinary rules set forth the standard for civil liability for attorney misconduct, and the jury was permitted to draw the conclusion that the clients could recover for any rule violation, even though such did not alone give rise to civil liability, for purposes of Tex. Disc. R. Prof. Conduct, pmbl., para. 15, and the expert was the clients' only liability expert, plus the impact of the expert's testimony was underscored by closing arguments. George Fleming & Fleming & Assocs., L.L.P. v. Kinney, 395 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4507 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

993. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the State's expert's testimony because the subject matter of her testimony was within the field of expertise of providing psychotherapy to children and her testimony described how she utilized the principles in the field based on her significant experience and training. Cox v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4073, 2013 WL 1286676 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 28 2013).

994. In defendant's aggravated assault case, the court properly excluded the testimony of defendant's expert witness, a pharmacist, regarding side effects of failure of defendant to take his anti-depressant because her opinion was based solely on the list of possible side effects provided by the manufacturer, and any of the side effects reported were less than one percent of all cases. There were no reported cases of violence that she knew of, and she could not say that the stoppage of an anti-depressant would directly cause violence. Randle v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3134, 2013 WL 1188647 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 21 2013).

995. Detective referred to the consistency of the child's statements to police and others, but this testimony was given in the context of explaining how the investigation progressed and how the detective determined to seek charges against appellant, plus the detective did not offer an express opinion about whether the child was being truthful about the sexual assaults, and counsel might have found that the comments were not objectionable. Garcia v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2868, 2013 WL 1149288 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 20 2013).

996. Even if a detective's testimony was an unqualified direct opinion about the child's truthfulness, counsel might have made the tactical decision not to object, and therefore appellant did not meet his burden of proving deficient conduct. Garcia v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2868, 2013 WL 1149288 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 20 2013).

997. In a divorce, it was not error to admit the testimony of a wife's expert on play therapy or to exclude the husband's expert challenge to the testimony because the wife's witness testified to the witness's qualifications and to the general acceptance of play therapy. Howell v. Howell, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1991, 2013 WL 784542 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 28 2013).

998. Trial court abused its discretion by admitting an attorney's expert testimony that a lawyer who violated the disciplinary rules necessarily violated a fiduciary duty because that testimony was unreliable, as it contravened Texas law. The error was not harmless because it probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment, given the closing arguments and the jury's questions to the trial court. Fleming v. Kinney, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1986 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 28 2013).

999. Trial court acted within its discretion in concluding that an attorney was qualified to testify as an expert with respect to compliance with the fiduciary duties that attorneys owe to clients in the context of charging litigation expenses as part of an aggregate settlement because: (1) she had a J.D. from a Texas university; (2) she had been licensed to practice law in Texas since 1989; (3) in private practice she worked on mass action litigation; (4) she had served since 2001 as a member of the committee of the State Bar of Texas that drafted and revised proposed language for the Texas Disciplinary Rules of Professional Conduct; and (5) in 2003 she began working as a consultant with a focus on attorney and judicial ethics. Fleming v. Kinney, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1986 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 28 2013).

1000. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a licensed psychologist to testify because his testimony about his examination and evaluation of the victim was within the scope of his expertise as a psychologist specializing in child sexual abuse. He also testified that his methodology followed principles recognized by his peers in child sexual abuse psychology. Vergara v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1837, 2013 WL 749774 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2013).

1001. In a lawsuit concerning the breakup of a medical practice group that involved several related business entities in which a partner specifically alleged that the testimony of his former partners' valuation expert was both unreliable and irrelevant because it was based on an improper valuation methodology and an incorrect factual assumption that the partnership had dissolved, the premises of the partner's challenge to the expert's testimony were without merit where the expert did not actually testify that he used a disapproved book value methodology, but, instead, he specifically testified to the fair market value of the partner's interest. There was also evidence supporting the conclusion that the entity at issue had been dissolved, and whether it was properly dissolved or not, it was not a continuing enterprise. Bhatia v. Woodlands North Houston Heart Center, Pllc, 396 S.W.3d 658, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1482, 2013 WL 554181 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 14 2013).

1002. Relatives assumed that a witness testified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and the lessor stood on its waiver argument only; nothing indicated that the witness testified as a lay witness under Tex. R. Evid. 701, and thus the court addressed the issue as presented. Qui Phloc Ho v. Macarthur Ranch, Llc, 395 S.W.3d 325, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1199, 2013 WL 458323 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 7 2013).

1003. Regarding a waiver argument, no objection was required at the time of admission of certain expert testimony for relatives to challenge the testimony as conclusory on its face. Qui Phloc Ho v. Macarthur Ranch, Llc, 395 S.W.3d 325, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1199, 2013 WL 458323 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 7 2013).

1004. In this fraudulent transfer case, the unspecified appraised value without more provided nothing on which the trial court could rely and did not support a verdict, and thus the expert's testimony concerning the appraised value of certain properties was conclusory and speculative on its face and was thus not valid evidence; the witness also answered yes to counsel's leading questions concerning value and did not offer a basis for the number suggested, and the yes answer was conclusory. Qui Phloc Ho v. Macarthur Ranch, Llc, 395 S.W.3d 325, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1199, 2013 WL 458323 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 7 2013).

1005. Testimony in case law was not judged under the case law rule that testimony that was conclusory would not support a judgment, and thus this case law did not change the trial court's finding that expert testimony was not sufficient to support findings concerning the fair market value of properties in this fraudulent transfer case. Qui Phloc Ho v. Macarthur Ranch, Llc, 395 S.W.3d 325, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1199, 2013 WL 458323 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 7 2013).

1006. Finding that defendant did not properly preserve his issue for appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 was improper because the appellate court's parsing of his objections was the kind of hyper-technical analysis that had been repeatedly rejected. It erred by distinguishing between admitting scientific evidence and admitting expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702; and erred in distinguishing between admissibility based on relevance and admissibility based on reliability. Everitt v. State, 407 S.W.3d 259, 2013 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 255 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 6 2013).

1007. Engineer's testimony about restrictions on construction across a pipeline easement and difficulties that the restrictions could cause in developing the remainder property was admissible because it was not based on speculative or hypothetical uses and did not focus on impaired vehicle access. Moreover, the owners' damages theory and the engineer's testimony did not focus on impaired vehicle access to the property, which would not have been compensable in a condemnation proceeding. Crosstex Dc Gathering Co., J.V. v. Button, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 683 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 24 2013).

1008. Trial court did not err by admitting the testimony of the geographic information systems coordinator for county public works about whether the offense occurred within a drug-free zone because he was qualified to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, as the his familiarity with the mapping software and how drug-free zone maps were created using the software put context to the map of the area the State offered as an exhibit. The coordinator's training, education, and experience regarding mapmaking and analyzing GIS data qualified him to offer an opinion that defendant committed the drug offense within the drug-free zone. Procella v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 487, 2013 WL 222274 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 17 2013).

1009. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault and endangering a child in permitting a State witness to testify as an expert witness where the witness's expertise fit with the subject matter at issue, which was whether the damages to the victims' vehicles were consistent with their accounts of how the damage occurred. The witness had seventeen years of experience in the automotive industry and thirteen years of experience as an estimator for damaged vehicles, and his testimony did not involve a complex subject, but rather consisted of matching up paint transfer and damages to the victims' vehicles with damages to defendant's truck. Ibarra v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 169, 2013 WL 123705 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 10 2013).

1010. Court acted within its discretion in concluding that the psychologist was an expert with specialized knowledge and was qualified to render her opinions in the case, because the psychologist testified that she had a master's degree in counseling and was a licensed professional counselor, she was certified as an expert witness regarding children's issues, and had provided therapeutic counseling, consisting of approximately 30 sessions, for the child in the case. Mueller v. Bran, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 176, 2013 WL 123693 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 10 2013).

1011. Although the client argued that the trial court erred in not conducting a hearing to evaluate expert testimony, nothing indicated that she requested such, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A), and instead the client argued that the attorney waived any objections by not requesting a hearing, but this was incorrect, as the attorney, as the party opposing the evidence, had the burden to object, and then the burden shifted to the client to show the evidence's admissibility; the attorney was not required to ask for a hearing on her objections for the burden to shift to the client, and the attorney did not waive her objections by not requesting a hearing, and instead it was the client's burden to ask for a hearing and present evidence supporting the admissibility of the expert testimony. Hearn v. Snapka, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10788, 2012 WL 7283791 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 28 2012).

1012. Attorney made 12 objections to the expert evidence, and at least four called into question the reliability of the expert's methodology and opinions, which shifted the burden to the client on the issue of admissibility, but instead of trying to meet this burden, the client relied on an argument of waiver, which was rejected by the court; as the client did not affirmatively establish that reliability of each opinion in her expert's affidavit, the trial court had discretion to strike it, and while this compelled the court to affirm the ruling, it was to be noted that the speculative nature of the expert's testimony provided additional support for the ruling. Hearn v. Snapka, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10788, 2012 WL 7283791 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 28 2012).

1013. In light of an expert's opinion that a major change in the relevant area of law eliminated the settlement value of the client's injury claims, the trial court could have found that her claims were like those where projecting the possibility of settlement was speculative, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in striking the expert's affidavit. Hearn v. Snapka, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10788, 2012 WL 7283791 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 28 2012).

1014. Foundation of an expert's opinions conflicted with the Texas Supreme Court's holding that there was some safe asbestos exposure; the expert did not connect the client's well-differentiated papillary mesothelioma to any specific product or defendant, and thus was not evidence of causation, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in striking the expert's affidavit. Hearn v. Snapka, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10788, 2012 WL 7283791 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 28 2012).

1015. Expert's testimony did not have any defendant-specific evidence regarding the approximate amount to which the client was exposed, and the expert's testimony was anecdotal evidence of some asbestos exposure, which was insufficient to prove causation, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in striking the expert's affidavit. Hearn v. Snapka, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10788, 2012 WL 7283791 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 28 2012).

1016. Expert's opinions were based on the assumption that the standard used by the Texas Supreme Court in one case would not have applied to the underlying claims of the client because the supreme court case was still on appeal when the client's claims were litigated, but this was problematic because (1) it was pure speculation that the expert assumed an asbestos defendant in 2004-05 would not have made the same arguments as the defendant in the supreme court case, and (2) it was unreasonable to assume that in 2004-05, the client would not have been required to meet the same standards that the plaintiff in the supreme court case was expected to meet in 2002; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding this expert's affidavit. Hearn v. Snapka, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10788, 2012 WL 7283791 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 28 2012).

1017. Mother failed to preserve error regarding her challenge to certain testimony, as she did not obtain a running objection or object when the witness took the stand; counsel acknowledged that she had to make another objection to the testimony to preserve error, but when the witness took the stand, there was no objection to the admissibility of the testimony or the witness's expert qualifications, and thus the mother waived her objection to the witness's testimony as an expert. In the Interest of A.C., 394 S.W.3d 633, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10299, 2012 WL 6204285 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 13 2012).

1018. Assuming without deciding that the trial court abused its discretion in permitting expert witness testimony, the court could not find that appellant's substantial rights were affected, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103(a) and Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given in part that (1) the jury heard evidence that appellant, while driving, weaved, struck a guardrail, failed to signal, and almost hit another car, (2) the jury saw a video recording showing appellant crossing into another lane and failing to signal, (3) the jury heard officer testimony that appellant smelled of alcohol, was wobbly and had slow speech and a cold beer can in his vehicle, and (4) appellant admitted to drinking and taking prescription medication; the defense reminded the jury that the expert was not a doctor, and the jury was advised that it could only find appellant guilty if it found so beyond a reasonable doubt, and thus even without the expert's testimony, there was sufficient evidence from which the jury could have found appellant guilty of driving with a child passenger while intoxicated. Miller v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10264, 2012 WL 6213735 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 12 2012).

1019. In a wife's suit to enforce the property division in the parties' divorce decree, the wife's experts could rely on invoices in forming their opinions about reasonable repair costs for property left in poor condition by the husband. In re Marriage of Bivins, 393 S.W.3d 893, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10139, 2012 WL 6099066 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 6 2012).

1020. Finding that expert testimony regarding "weapon focus effect" in an aggravated robbery case was not relevant was inappropriate given the content of the expert testimony, the context in which it was offered, and, most pertinently, the paucity of other evidence to establish defendant's identity as the assailant. Blasdell v. State, 384 S.W.3d 824, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1604 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012).

1021. Revocation of defendant's deferred-adjudication community supervision based on the results of polygraph examinations was inappropriate because, while the psychotherapist did make the conclusory statement that those in his field reasonably relied on polygraph results, the sole basis of his opinion was the results of a test that had been held inadmissible because it was not reliable. Total reliance on inadmissible and untrustworthy facts could not be reasonable, nor would such an opinion achieve the minimum level of reliability necessary for admission under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Leonard v. State, 385 S.W.3d 570, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1598 (Tex. Crim. App. Nov. 21 2012).

1022. Appellant was not suffering from mental illness or delusions that negated an element of the crime of attempted capital murder, and an expert's testimony did not truly negate the element of mens rea, but was an opinion that appellant did not want to hurt anyone; thus, the court rejected appellant's claim that the trial court erred in excluding the expert testimony. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9880 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 15 2012).

1023. Testimony of a property owner's valuation expert was reliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because he followed a methodology approved by Tex. Tax Code Ann. § 42.26(a)(3) for estimating an appraised value in accordance with Tex. Tax Code Ann. §§ 1.04(8), 23.01(a).

1024. Appellants did not object to an expert's testimony before trial or when the testimony was offered, and therefore whether the issue was preserved for review depended on whether appellants challenged the testimony as unreliable or conclusory. Church v. Exxon Mobil Corp., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9321 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 1 2012).

1025. Appellants argued that an expert's experiments did not take into account all the pertinent factors, and to evaluate the merits, the court had to examine whether too great an analytical gap existed between the conditions that were present for the experiments and the conditions in the restroom on the day of the injury; this was the type of complaint that required a timely objection in the trial court, because appellants did not object prior to trial or when the testimony was offered, they did not preserve this issue for review. Church v. Exxon Mobil Corp., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9321 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 1 2012).

1026. Appellant's objection to fingerprint analysis for expert witness purposes was made after the State rested its case, and thus the objection was not timely, and the objection was not preserved for appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Stubblefield v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8846, 2012 WL 5258675 (Tex. App. Tyler Oct. 24 2012).

1027. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because the admission of a licensed psychologist's testimony was appropriate. The testimony was reliable since the psychologist relied on and utilized the principles in the relevant area of psychology. Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

1028. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the member's expert's testimony where it could have reasonably concluded that the expert opinions were more than just ordinary, bare assertions based solely on the husband's valuations. Whitmire v. Nat'l Cutting Horse Ass'n, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8518 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 11 2012).

1029. In a felony DWI case, the trial court erred by allowing a forensic scientist to estimate defendant's blood-alcohol level based on a blood test taken several hours after his arrest; the scientist did not have sufficient facts regarding defendant's characteristics to conduct a proper retrograde extrapolation analysis. The error was harmless, because the other evidence in the case was sufficient to prove that defendant was intoxicated. Hazlip v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8141 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 26 2012).

1030. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of the sexual assault nurse examiner who examined the child victim during the course of the State's investigation because she was deemed an expert in sexual abuse examinations, so her expert testimony could be helpful to the jury, including to explain why physical evidence would not necessarily be present on the body of a sexual assault complainant. The nurse merely reported the events of the examination and her clinical findings, and she did not offer an opinion as to whether the victim had been sexually assaulted and did not comment on the victim's veracity. Owens v. State, 381 S.W.3d 696, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7922, 2012 WL 4098990 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 19 2012).

1031. Trial court could have found an expert's opinion unreliable or unfounded, given that one could not deduce from the fact that an employee had sleep issues that he was tired on the day of the accident, or that having sleep issues meant the employee had to have fallen asleep right before or during the accident. Schmieding v. Mission Petroleum Carriers, Inc., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7907, 2012 WL 4092716 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 18 2012).

1032. Trial court did not err by admitting the testimony of a detective during defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child because defendant failed to point to any testimony from the detective that constituted an opinion about whether the victim was telling the truth, but rather testified that the grooming process could lead to memory lapses and result in a delayed outcry in many child sexual abuse cases. The detective also opined that the victim's behavior was consistent with that of children who had been groomed and that her lack of recall was typical. Ambriati v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7594, 2012 WL 3860642 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 5 2012).

1033. In a condemnation case, expert testimony from a lessor under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was improperly admitted because it violated the value-to-the-taker rule by impermissibly focusing on the benefit in avoiding the cost of removing a gas processing facility under a lease agreement. However, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding a lessee's expert testimony because it did not explain why the existing use of the property was not the highest and best use, did not offer fair market value of the land based on its condition at the time of condemnation, and did not account for all relevant factors affecting valuation. Enbridge Pipelines (e. Tex.) L.P. v. Avinger Timber, Llc, 386 S.W.3d 256, 2012 Tex. LEXIS 745, 55 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1387, 178 Oil & Gas Rep. 475 (Tex. 2012).

1034. Court did not err during defendant's murder trial in allowing the State to present expert testimony that the victim was likely killed on the back patio of the victim's house; the expert had training in the area of conclusions to be drawn from blood loss. Burris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7446, 2012 WL 3793268 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 30 2012).

1035. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the State to elicit testimony from two witnesses, a forensic interviewer and a therapist because their testimony did not suggest that the victims' allegations of sexual abuse were truthful. Rather, both experts' testimony dealt with general behavioral characteristics and traits shown by sexually abused children. Pawlak v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7109, 2012 WL 3612493 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2012).

1036. Trial court did not improperly limit the expert's testimony because, after hearing the expert's basis for her opinions, during which she admitted that she could not opine that the notches on the victim's hymen were not caused by sexual abuse, it restricted her from testifying that the notches described by a sexual assault nurse examiner on the victim were not caused by sexual abuse. Hernandez-Mora v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6997, 2012 WL 3631640 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 22 2012).

1037. In a product liability action, the trial court erred in deeming any of appellants' expert testimony to be unreliable because the experts provided sufficient evidence on the origin and cause of a fire in a manufacturing facility; appellants' experts established that they relied upon generally accepted scientific methodologies and completed all of the testing that was feasible for them to complete. Control Solutions, Inc. v. Gharda Usa, Inc., 394 S.W.3d 127, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6793, 2012 WL 3525372 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 16 2012).

1038. Defendant's conviction for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 was improper because admitting the statistical opinion on false allegations was error and the admission of the opinion likely affected defendant's substantial rights. An expert was not permitted to give an opinion as to whether a person, or a class of persons to which the complainant belonged, was truthful. Wiseman v. State, 394 S.W.3d 582, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6255, 2012 WL 3125130 (Tex. App. Dallas July 31 2012).

1039. Testimony of a minority shareholder's valuation expert in a shareholder oppression case was not conclusory and did not assume facts contrary to the record. The expert gave detailed testimony about his opinions and the relevant facts regarding amounts paid by the majority shareholder to himself and his children, and the expert's discussion of the corporation's tax status did not assume an incorrect status. Cardiac Perfusion Servs. v. Hughes, 380 S.W.3d 198, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6134, 2012 WL 3038504 (Tex. App. Dallas July 26 2012).

1040. Defendant's convictions for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 was appropriate because a social worker's testimony was properly admitted since she was qualified to give her testimony; she did not need to have personal knowledge of all the facts on which she bases her opinion; and testimony abut the behavior of child sex abuse victims was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Brucia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5844, 2012 WL 2926203 (Tex. App. Dallas July 19 2012).

1041. Trooper had 11 years of experience, was a certified field sobriety instructor, had made over 500 driving while intoxicated arrests, and his testimony met the criteria for nonscientific expert witness testimony; the accuracy of field sobriety tests was a proper area of testimony for this trooper, and his tesitmony was important for the jury in deciding the issue of intoxication in a driving while intoxicated case, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting his testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Stovall v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5571, 2012 WL 2862369 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1042. Trial court erred in a medical malpractice action in excluding testimony by appellants' experts because based upon their years of treating patients with renal insufficiency and the unequivocal autopsy and toxicology reports supporting their opinions that the patient died from an accidental overdose of Hydrocodone and Oxycontin, their causation opinions met the reliability requirements for admissibility. White v. Scaff, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5346, 2012 WL 2608626 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 5 2012).

1043. In a suit for breach of a noncompete agreement, an expert's use of historical sales data before and after the competitor's entry into the market was an acceptable method for calculating lost profits. Heritage Operating, L.P. v. Rhine Bros., Llc, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4939, 2012 WL 2344864 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 21 2012).

1044. There was no abuse of discretion in allowing the witness's testimony concerning the behavior of child sexual assault victims, because the crux of the witness's testimony was that children who had been the victims of abuse could make a delayed outcry since they didn't know what to do with the abuse, and the witness did not testify concerning the complainant's truthfulness; expert testimony that a child exhibited behavioral characteristics that had been empirically shown to be common among children who had been abused was relevant and admissible as substantive evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Hassell v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4972, 2012 WL 2353713 (Tex. App. Dallas June 21 2012).

1045. The patient did not show that any error in excluding his expert as an expert witness probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment, Tex. R. Evid. 702, where the trial court could conclude that the expert's testimony confused the issue and would not assist the jury with its assigned task under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002. In re Bernard, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4681, 2012 WL 2150328 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 14 2012).

1046. At the proceeding to commit appellant as a sexually violent predator, his counsel did not object that an expert's testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 02 because it commented on appellant's credibility; therefore, the alleged error was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. In re Commitment of Petrus, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4686, 2012 WL 2150336 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 14 2012).

1047. During voir dire, a counselor said her testimony on the cycle of violence was standard and she gave the trial court reason to find that her testimony would use principles used in the field, plus case law and literature confirmed that her testimony was consistent with that testimony that had been ruled admissible in other cases; the court found no error in the admission of the testimony. Brewer v. State, 370 S.W.3d 471, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4519, 2012 WL 2290871 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 7 2012).

1048. Counselor's inability to cite studies did not make her testimony unreliable, given the nature of her expertise field; the trial court properly limited the testimony to comport with the counsel's expertise, and the court found no abuse of discretion in admitting her testimony in order to help the jury understand why the victim delayed in calling the police in this aggravated assault case involving appellant, the victim's fiance. Brewer v. State, 370 S.W.3d 471, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4519, 2012 WL 2290871 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 7 2012).

1049. Record contained sufficient evidence showing that enzyme-multiplied immunoassay technique (EMIT), with or without a confirmation test, was reliable scientific evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and therefore the appellate court erred by holding that EMIT tests were unreliable without a confirmation test; the court concluded that the reliability of even a single, unconfirmed EMIT test had been sufficiently established that it met the first two Kelly prongs. The record showed that: (1) the expert witnesses testified that the underlying scientific theory and technique of the EMIT test were accepted as valid by the accredited Texas Department of Public Safety laboratory and the greater forensic toxicology community in Texas; (2) an expert testified that there was literature supporting EMIT as a reliable screening test; (3) from the experts' testimony, the trial court understood that EMIT was a screening test based on enzyme reactions; (4) the expert testimony suggested that the potential error rate in EMIT was very low; (5) the experts testified as to the validity and reliability of the EMIT test and were subject to cross-examination by the State, and many of the courts in the cases cited relied upon expert evaluations of the EMIT technique from their records; and (6) the qualifications of defendant's experts were such that the court believed it could confidently rely upon their testimony. Somers v. State, 368 S.W.3d 528, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 753 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012).

1050. Family therapist did not testify, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702 in appellant's trial for aggravated sexual assault, that she believed the allegations, and she did not give a direct opinion that the child victim had been telling the truth; the therapist's testimony that the victim showed behavior that was consistent with abuse was not any comment on the child's truthfulness, and the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony. Lopez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4533, 2012 WL 2053846 (Tex. App. Waco June 6 2012).

1051. Trial court properly followed the Nenno standards concerning the State's expert; although the trial court did not specifically state that the expert's information was relevant, it found the expert qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 which included a relevancy component. The expert testified that he specialized in the area of child sexual abuse; he testified about general principles in the field and that he used those principles in his work. Odom v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4316, 2012 WL 1964580 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 31 2012).

1052. Grant of summary judgment in favor of the medical center in the spouse's action after the patient died was inappropriate because a physician's testimony offered more than merely his credentials and a subjective opinion. He had a sufficiently reliable foundation for his opinions on proximate cause to warrant admission of his testimony. Constancio v. Shannon Med. Ctr., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4339 (Tex. App. Austin May 22 2012).

1053. Appraiser's testimony made clear that he followed a statutorily-approved methodology for estimating an appraised value, Tex. Tax Code Ann. § 42.26(a)(3), where he used the appraisal value of the comparable properties as listed in the tax rolls as his starting point, and when he adjusted the values of the comparable properties, he relied on generally accepted appraisal principles that were commonly used among professionals in his field; the appraiser testified that his methodology had been tested, was generally accepted as valid, and was mandated, to some extent, by statute, and the property owner met its burden to show the reliability of the appraiser's testimony, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting his testimony. Harris County Appraisal Dist. v. Houston 8th Wonder Prop., L.P., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3889, 2012 WL 1757591 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 17 2012).

1054. In a divorce proceeding, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing an expert witness to testify regarding the net asset value of a business run by appellant former husband during the marriage because the expert had been a certified public accountant for twenty-five years and had experience using the net asset value method for valuing businesses. Mora v. Mora, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3831, 2012 WL 1721540 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 16 2012).

1055. Doctor's testimony that the worker suffered from reflex sympathetic dystrophy/complex regional pain syndrome was not conclusory and was based on facts he documented during treating the worker for 14 months; the doctor relied on his training and experience in diagnosing the worker, and the criteria were the same as most of the clinical findings set forth in medical guides. Charter Oak Fire INS. Co. v. Swanigan, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3312 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 26 2012).

1056. Doctor's testimony that a worker's injury was a producing cause of his reflex sympathetic dystrophy/complex regional pain syndrome was not conclusory, but was grounded in facts he documented concerning the worker's treatment and symptoms. Charter Oak Fire INS. Co. v. Swanigan, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3312 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 26 2012).

1057. Defendant did not make a reliability argument to expert testimony in the trial court, and thus he failed to preserve error. Foley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3416, 2012 WL 1499368 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 25 2012).

1058. Even if error has been preserved, the court would still reject appellant's reliability argument because (1) the expert testified that literature existed that supported his methodology, (2) the court does not know of any authority stating that an expert must name specific published works to establish the reliability of his methodology, (3) the expert gave the names of law enforcement agencies that employed his methodology, and (4) even if he did not cite specific works that were published, the expert gave many bases on which the trial court could have found that his methodology was reliable. Foley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3416, 2012 WL 1499368 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 25 2012).

1059. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in admitting the testimony of the director of a trauma center, who was trained as a clinical psychologist with specialization in psychological trauma, because the director was qualified to opine about the impact of sexual assault, underage marriage, and polygamy on children. Jessop v. State, 368 S.W.3d 653, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3176, 2012 WL 1402117 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 19 2012).

1060. Finding against the property owner in his inverse condemnation counterclaim against the city was appropriate because the engineer's testimony constituted legally sufficient evidence from which the trial court could have concluded that the construction had not negatively impacted drainage from the tract. Martini v. City of Pearland, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2972, 2012 WL 1345744 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 17 2012).

1061. Expert's testimony in a condemnation case, opining that the damage to the remainder property was the loss of the entire income-producing value of two buildings, was reliable because it was based on a proper measure of damages in stating that a buyer would place no value on two buildings because their close proximity to the highway after the taking meant that they would be nonconforming under a city zoning ordinance if annexed. State v. Ledrec, Inc., 366 S.W.3d 305, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2895 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 12 2012).

1062. State claimed that the court should not consider an argument in its harm analysis because it was invited; while this might be persuasive if appellant was complaining about the argument, the issue was not whether the State's argument was proper or improper, but whether the error in the admission of expert evidence affected appellant's substantial rights, and in making this determination, the court reviewed the entire record, including counsels' arguments. Tran v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2831 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 11 2012).

1063. Appellant consistently denied assaulting the victim and argued that she made up the accusation so her mother would not tell her father that she had been kissing a boy in her room, and although the victim's friend's testimony supported the State's theory that there was no fabrication, the case remained completely about credibility; the expert's complained-of testimony, that 98 percent of accusers were telling the truth, struck at the heart of the defense, as the expert was allowed to testify that it had been scientifically proven that children told the truth except in few instances, and because the complained-of evidence supplanted the jury in its decision concerning whether the child's testimony was credible, the court was left with grave doubt as to whether the result of the trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under 14 was free from the influence of the error, and the court reversed. Tran v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2831 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 11 2012).

1064. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling appellant's objection to an expert's testimony about whether the information from the child victim in this indecency case came from the child or another source; the question asked for the same opinion the witness gave in another answer to an unobjected-to question, plus the trial court could have considered the question to ask about indications of coaching, which was permissible, instead of whether the witness thought the child was truthful, and the witness's answer did not convey her opinion of the truthfulness of the child, but only that the allegations came from the child instead of someone else telling the child what to say. Cantu v. State, 366 S.W.3d 771, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2838 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 11 2012).

1065. In a personal injury action arising from an accident in which appellee was injured when another driver's vehicle struck her vehicle, although a chiropractor was not appellee's treating chiropractor after the car accident, the trial court did not err in allowing him to testify about causation and damages, in light of his qualifications and testimony. Among other things, the chiropractor stated that part of his training and duties as a chiropractor was to review hospital and medical records and to consult with other medical specialists to treat patients. Haddard v. Rios, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2706 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 5 2012).

1066. Appellant claimed the trial court erred in allowing victim impact testimony in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 702; the test for evaluating expert testimony regarding "soft sciences" was the applicable test in this case. Keate v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117, 2012 WL 896200 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 16 2012).

1067. At defendant's trial for two counts of continuous sexual abuse of a young child and one count of aggravated sexual assault, the trial court abused its discretion by admitting opinion testimony from an investigator about the truthfulness of the fifteen-year-old victim. Such testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Lewis v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2052, 2012 WL 858601 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 15 2012).

1068. Grant of summary judgment in favor of the company men and others in the employee's defamation action was proper because expert testimony about bankruptcy was not relevant to any element of the defamation claims, nor was the bankruptcy testimony relevant to any element of the employee's other pleaded claims. Thus, the expert was property struck as an expert witness. Bell v. Bennett, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2097, 2012 WL 858603 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 15 2012).

1069. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the opinion of the children's treating psychologist for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702 and considering it alongside other evidence, and the court could not say his analysis regarding the children's best interests was inadmissible because he did not interview the birth parents; he found that the primary factor in promoting the children's best interests was stability, his opinion that termination of the father's rights was in the children's best interest was consistent with his emphasis on the stability of the children's placement with a couple, and any weaknesses of the psychologist's opinion, if any, went to the weight the trial court accorded to the opinion. Aguilar v. Foy, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1685, 2012 WL 677497 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 1 2012).

1070. Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that a deputy was qualified to testify as an expert regarding cell phone tracking because he had completed a course in reading cell phone records, identifying cell phone tower locations, and plotting and tracking cell phone activity. Additionally, the deputy described for the jury how he used the locations of the cell phone towers that relayed defendant's calls to track the location of defendant's phone to a particular geographic area. Robinson v. State, 368 S.W.3d 588, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483, 2012 WL 593558 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

1071. Court properly allowed an expert witness to testify about the similarity of physical evidence recovered from the crime scene because the tapes from the crime scene and defendant's home were offered to show that because the tapes were similar, it was more likely that they came from a common source, and if they came from a common source, it was more likely that the tape in defendant's home came from the packaging for the marijuana in the murder victim's home. The testimony showed the similarities of the tapes and was therefore relevant to show that defendant was at the crime scene and had a motive for shooting the victims. Robinson v. State, 368 S.W.3d 588, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483, 2012 WL 593558 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

1072. In a breach of contract case, a trial court did not err by allowing testimony from experts regarding the lost profits of a dealership that was delayed in opening; the testimony was not unreliable based upon the use of a yardstick method, and, even though issues relating to planning potential, a comparable dealership, or the applicable time period were hotly disputed, the actual damages awarded were within the range of a manufacturer's own estimate of net profits and a dealer's witnesses. Even if there was an error in the admission of expert testimony, it was harmless. Daimlerchrysler Motors Co., Llc v. Manuel, 362 S.W.3d 160, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1489 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 24 2012).

1073. Patient claimed the evidence was insufficient to prove that he suffered from a behavioral abnormality, for purposes of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. §§ 841.002(2), 841.003(a), but he did not object at trial or file post-judgment motions asking the trial court to direct a verdict for him based on the claim that no evidence had been admitted that showed he had a behavioral abnormality; even had the issue been properly preserved, the arguments were without merit because the patient did not object to the reliability of expert testimony, those experts' opinions were not conclusory, each expert performed an assessment in accordance with his training, and each expert stated that the patient suffered from a behavioral abnormality, such that there was legally sufficient evidence to support that finding. In re Macon, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1182, 2012 WL 503678 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 16 2012).

1074. In a condemnation proceeding in which plaintiff county acquired a portion of commercial property used for a car wash in order to widen a county roadway, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the county's appraisal expert because the expert's bald assurance that he used a widely accepted appraisal method was insufficient to establish reliability. His report, as well as the underlying data and methodology, did not reflect application of an accepted appraisal method to arrive at the fair market value of the remainder after the taking where he simply took the market value of the whole and assumed--without any basis--that a willing buyer and willing seller would agree to reduce the market value by one-fifth after the taking. Dallas County v. Crestview Corners Car Wash, 370 S.W.3d 25, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1269 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 16 2012).

1075. Trial court abused its discretion by allowing the arresting officer to testify regarding his opinion on defendant's prescription medications in conjunction with his ultimate opinion on defendant's intoxication because the officer's testimony was neither relevant nor reliable and the officer was not qualified to offer such detailed testimony as required by Tex. R. Evid. 702;.the officer conceded that he was not certified by the police department as a drug-recognition expert, he did not conduct the standard 12-step examination that would have been conducted by a drug-recognition expert, he did not contact such an expert after defendant refused a breath test, and the officer's testimony did not reveal that he had expert knowledge about the medications that defendant had taken or their effects. The error was not harmless because the officer's extensive testimony about defendant's prescription medications was unreliable and the testimony was constituted a substantial part of the State's case. Delane v. State, 369 S.W.3d 412, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 905, 2012 WL 340234 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 2 2012).

1076. Assuming the trial court erred in excluding a doctor's expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702, because appellant was able to present her theory through the testimony of other witnesses, and she emphasized the defense during closing argument, she was not effectively precluded from presenting a defense for Sixth Amendment purposes, and the court applied the harmless error standard of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Young v. State, 358 S.W.3d 790, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 158 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 10 2012).

1077. Because appellant's issue regarding a doctor's excluded expert testimony addressed only the failure to provide adequate protection, and the court found the evidence supporting all three theories including failure to provide adequate protection sufficient to support appellant's conviction of recklessly causing serious bodily injury to a child younger than 15, the trial court's error in excluding the doctor from testifying was harmless. Young v. State, 358 S.W.3d 790, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 158 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 10 2012).

1078. During a murder trial, the court did not err in refusing to permit defendant's expert witness to testify because how a trained Marine instinctively reacted to a perceived threat was not relevant to the issue of whether an ordinary and prudent man, viewing the circumstances from defendant's viewpoint, would have formed a reasonable belief that deadly force was immediately necessary to protect himself from the use or attempted use of unlawful deadly force. Echavarria v. State, 362 S.W.3d 148, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10188 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 30 2011).

1079. Expert reports cannot be conclusory to satisfy Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351, and the rule that a conclusory opinion is not probative is not a mere procedural hurdle, as the factfinder typically lacks the expertise necessary to form an opinion without expert assistance, and this is why expert testimony is admitted in the first place under Tex. R. Evid. 702; it is the expert's explanation of how and why causation exists that allows the factfinder to weigh the credibility of the expert's opinion and, when expert opinions conflict, to decide which testimony to disregard. Shenoy v. Jean, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10212, 2011 WL 6938538 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 29 2011).

1080. While the State failed to meet its burden that a pediatric hematologist was qualified to opine that a child's fatal injuries were consistent with shaken baby syndrome, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the evidence of defendant's guilt was strong, particularly because four other experts had also reached the conclusion that the child's injuries were caused by shaking. Guerrero v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10080, 2011 WL 6808314 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 22 2011).

1081. Evidence was sufficient to establish that the seized substance contained cocaine, for purposes of appellant's conviction of possession of cocaine in the amount of four grams or more but less than 200 grams, given that (1) a forensic scientist testified that the substance contained based-form cocaine and weighed 19.31 grams, (2) this kind of expert testimony had been found to be reliance, (3) appellant did not object to the scientist's testimony, (4) an officer recognized two large rocks to be crack cocaine, and (5) during a field test, the substance tested positive for cocaine. Traylor v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9933, 2011 WL 6307835 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 15 2011).

1082. Regarding a sergeant's accident reconstruction expert evidence testimony, appellant offered no evidence that either the methodology the sergeant described or the way he applied it was unreliable; virtually all of the sergeant's testimony was cumulative of other eyewitness testimony that described the crash and the force of the impact, and thus any alleged error would have been harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Howard v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9423 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 1 2011).

1083. Even if a trial court erred on a petition to commit appellant as a sexually violent predator in excluding the testimony of a consulting expert, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1); after the trial court struck the expert, in lieu of a continuance, the trial court helped appellant retain another expert to testify at trial. In re Hitt, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9377 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 1 2011).

1084. Property owners' expert's testimony was properly admitted because the expert's opinion was that the owners' property flooded because of an increase in elevation of the development relative to the owners' property; that testimony was neither speculative nor otherwise unreliable. The expert specifically testified the increase in elevation altered historical surface water drainage patterns, and his testimony was based on his own visual inspection of the property where he noted diversions from the historical drainage patterns due to increases in elevation, as well as a drainage area map used by the company that constructed the development. Marin Real Estate Partners., L.P. v. Vogt, 373 S.W.3d 57, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9259, 2011 WL 5869520 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 23 2011).

1085. Property owners' appraiser's testimony was properly admitted because the appraiser specifically stated he developed his estimate based on the one-acre tract as a property independent from the nineteen-acre tract. To develop his estimate, he researched comparable sales in an attempt to find the best comparison possible and he also prepared his appraisal using the "highest and best use" analysis, which required the appraiser to consider what was the potential best use for the property being appraised. Marin Real Estate Partners., L.P. v. Vogt, 373 S.W.3d 57, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9259, 2011 WL 5869520 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 23 2011).

1086. Expert's testimony was sufficiently tied to the facts of the case; the expert specifically referenced appellant's testimony and interviews he gave. Zavala v. State, 401 S.W.3d 171, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8671, 2011 WL 5156843 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2011).

1087. Although testimony by an expert that a witness displays malingering behavior might approach the line of commenting on the witness's truthfulness, appellant did not show how an expert's testimony caused harm for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); she informed the jury that she could not express an ultimate opinion as to whether appellant suffered from dissociative amnesia without testing him, and at most, the expert's testimony was unhelpful. Zavala v. State, 401 S.W.3d 171, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8671, 2011 WL 5156843 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2011).

1088. In a case involving the civil commitment of a sexually violent predator, to the extent that a patient complained about the foundational data used by experts in reaching their opinions, the complaint was not preserved for appellate review because no objection was made to the use of records or actuarial tests. To the extent that the patient challenged the expert opinions as baseless and not relevant, the testimony of the experts was not conclusory or speculative; the experts testified that they based their opinions on the facts and date gathered from the records they reviewed, their interviews with the patient, the risk assessment conducted, and the actuarial tests administered. In re Mason, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8531 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 27 2011).

1089. Whether a psychiatrist's testimony was admissible was at least subject to reasonable disagreement, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the expert's testimony regarding appellant's intent. Ernst v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8645, 2011 WL 5182599 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 27 2011).

1090. During defendant's trial for capital murder, the court erred in holding that a defense expert on eyewitness identifications was not permitted to testify before the jury because the evidence, which was reliable and relevant, would have assisted the jury by increasing the jurors' awareness of biasing factors in eyewitness identification. Tillman v. State, 354 S.W.3d 425, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1343 (Tex. Crim. App. Oct. 5 2011).

1091. Appellant argued that a corporal's testimony should have been excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because he contradicted himself about how the dog alerted and the dog's reward; if two distinct rewards existed, appellant failed to put on conflicting testimony that multiple rewards for drug dogs was improper, and the trial court could have found that the use of multiple rewards was a proper principle in this canine-sniff testing field. Hamal v. State, 352 S.W.3d 835, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7692 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2011).

1092. Appellant did not offer expert testimony as to what constituted "cueing," and she did not explain how a corporal's actions qualified as cueing, and the trial court was within its discretion to find that a corporal did not cue the dog and utilized the principles of the field of canine-sniff testing. Hamal v. State, 352 S.W.3d 835, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7692 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2011).

1093. Expert did not explain how the conditions of a certain study compared to the circumstances concerning the accident's tire use and failure, and given the analytical gap, the expert's causation opinion rested on his subjective interpretation and was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and case law; the expert's causation opinion was predicated on speculation and the trial court was within its discretion in striking the challenged portions of the expert's testimony. Jones v. Pennzoil-quaker State Co., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7423, 2011 WL 4031018 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 13 2011).

1094. In considering appellants' claim that testimony supported appellants' claims that the use of a company's product caused a tire to fail, the court did not consider the expert's properly excluded causation opinion. Jones v. Pennzoil-quaker State Co., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7423, 2011 WL 4031018 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 13 2011).

1095. Central to appellants' claims of defective marketing, negligence, breach of express and implied warranties, and Texas Deceptive Trade Practices Act violations was the allegation that using the company's product in the manner marketed caused the tire in this case to fail; even assuming that appellants could rely on the testimony of an expert designated only by the tire manufacturer, the court agreed that the testimony did not include an opinion that the company's product caused the accident tire to fail in this case, and thus the company was entitled to summary judgment. Jones v. Pennzoil-quaker State Co., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7423, 2011 WL 4031018 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 13 2011).

1096. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a motion by a company and business for leave to supplement its expert disclosures, for purposes of Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.6; the court has found no case holding that the exclusion of an expert witness's opinion as unreliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702 can constitute good cause for late disclosure of new experts, inadvertence of counsel was not good cause for the designation of new experts, and this rule encompassed the argument by the company and business that it needed new experts based on the incompetence of the original expert. The trial court properly found that the inadmissibility of expert testimony on reliability grounds was not an impossible circumstance that rose to the level of good cause. Popcap Games, Inc. v. MumboJumbo, LLC, 350 S.W.3d 699, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7122 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 31 2011).

1097. In a design defect suit arising from a helicopter crash that was caused by a bird strike, although expert testimony on an alternative windshield design and on the design of the door mounts was conclusory and insufficient under Tex. R. Evid. 702, another expert's testimony on an alternative seatbelt design was sufficient under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 82.005(b). De Damian v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., 352 S.W.3d 124, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7316 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2011).

1098. Fact that an insured's neck issues did not present themselves until three years after the accident alone did not render the opinions of two doctors either speculative or conjecture as a matter of law. Mid-continent Group v. Goode, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6695, 2011 WL 3962502 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 19 2011).

1099. Trooper was not qualified to testify as an expert witness in accident reconstruction because: (1) the case involved multiple vehicles, multiple collisions, and could only be reconstructed with knowledge and skills exceeding the experience of most police officers; (2) the trooper completed a Level II certification in accident reconstruction through the DPS in Austin; (3) the trooper had never testified concerning accident reconstruction; and (4) the trooper denied having any physics training or being an expert in physics. Lopez-juarez v. Kelly, 348 S.W.3d 10, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6446 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2011).

1100. Even though the trial court erred by admitting the testimony of a trooper concerning the causation of the accident, as his testimony contained opinions and he did not qualify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the error was harmless because his conclusion that the bus driver was not at fault was cumulative of other evidence. The driver's other expert witness provided testimony consistent with the trooper's conclusions, testified in much greater detail, length, and depth than the trooper, and explained the methods he used and the calculations he made. Lopez-juarez v. Kelly, 348 S.W.3d 10, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6446 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2011).

1101. During defendant's trial for DWI, the court did not err in allowing a chemist to testify regarding the application of retrograde extrapolation to a hypothetical situation based on evidence already before the jury; the record showed no inconsistencies or error in the chemist's testimony. Sutton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6388, 2011 WL 3528259 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 12 2011).

1102. Trial court did not err in excluding an expert's affidavit from consideration as summary judgment evidence, given that (1) there were several erroneous factual statements, (2) there were legal conclusions unsupported by a factual basis, and (3) the expert drew legal conclusions regarding the driver's liability in this personal injury case without supporting his conclusions with analysis or supporting evidence. Husain v. Petrucciani, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6180, 2011 WL 3449497 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 9 2011).

1103. Record demonstrated that the ALJ allowed the doctors to offer their expert testimony after voir dire on the issue of their qualifications, and the ALJ heard extensive testimony about their qualifications as well as their methods, analyses, and the principles upon which they relied in reaching their opinions; there was no abuse of discretion in the ALJ's decision that the doctors were qualified as experts and their testimony should be admitted. Scally v. Tex. State Bd. of Med. Examiners, 351 S.W.3d 434, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6117 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 4 2011).

1104. Doctor opined that the decedent died of exsanguinations as a result of his collision with the driver, but these statements were no more than speculation as to the cause of death; given that the doctor was not able to rule out other plausible causes of death and because an autopsy was not conducted and the doctor failed to review the decedents' medical records, the trial court did not err in finding that the doctor's testimony was not reliable and would fail to be helpful to the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1105. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in striking a doctor's testimony on the basis that he was not qualified to opine on how an accident occurred, given that (1) the doctor had no experience with accident reconstruction, (2) the doctor admitted that he was unqualified to testify as to how the accident occurred, (3) articles did not appear to be a reliable foundation upon which the doctor could rely in forming his opinion, and (4) accident reconstruction was not within the general experience of laypersons. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1106. Emergency medical technician (EMT) was not qualified to opine medical causation or accident reconstruction, given that (1) there was no evidence showing that the EMT was qualified as an accident reconstructionist, (2) nothing showed that he was qualified to opine about the expert's injuries, and (3) the EMT did not provide any scientific studies to support his assertions that the impact with a driver's car was what caused the decedent's death. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1107. While an emergency medical technician (EMT) could testify as a lay witness as to what he observed at the scene of the accident, he could not testify as an expert as to causation; although in some cases a witness could be considered an expert as to medical causation based on special experience, this did not apply here given the EMT's limited experience with automobile accidents involving fatalities. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1108. Decedent sustained multiple major injuries as a result of multiple collisions with vehicles and other objects and appellants' experts could not agree on the specific impact and injury that caused the decedent's death; thus, this accident was not within the general experience and common sense of laypersons to determine causation without the aid of expert testimony. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1109. Even if an emergency medical technician was qualified to opine on causation and accident reconstruction matters, the bare opinion he gave in his deposition was premised upon his subjective interpretation of the facts, which rendered his opinion unreliable; the trial court did not err in striking this testimony. Dickerson v. State Farm

Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1110. Much of an expert's testimony was against the great weight of the evidence contained in the record, plus there existed too many analytical gaps between the expert's opinions and the facts, even though he had significant experience in accident reconstruction; the expert did not show that he was qualified to opine as to the causation of the decedent's injuries, such that the expert's opinions were unreliable and the trial court did not err in striking his testimony. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1111. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the officer's expert testimony that there was nothing the employee could have done to avoid colliding with the daughter's car after the daughter's car struck the third-party's tractor-trailer, because there was no analytical gap between the data the officer collected and relied on in his investigation and his opinion as to causation. Schultz v. Lester, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5866, 2011 WL 3211271 (Tex. App. Dallas July 29 2011).

1112. Sexual abuse victim's counselor did not testify regarding the truthfulness of the victim; under Tex. R. Evid. 702, it was permissible for the counselor to testify regarding behavioral characteristics common among abused children and to give her expert opinion regarding the victim's delayed disclosure. Sharp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5377, 2011 WL 2732518 (Tex. App. Eastland July 14 2011).

1113. In a brother's action against a sister to try title to real property, the court did not err in sustaining the sister's objection to the affidavit of the brother's handwriting expert because the expert's affidavit failed to adequately connect the underlying data with the offered conclusion. Gonzales v. Reyes, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5183, 2011 WL 2652127 (Tex. App. Austin July 7 2011).

1114. On appeal of defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated, he claimed the trial court should have excluded the blood serum test results from evidence because the State failed to establish reliability of the results under Tex. R. Evid. 702. While defendant objected to the admission of a blood vial into evidence, he failed to object to the medical technologist's testimony concerning the test results; therefore, defendant's evidentiary challenge was not preserved for review. Kuciemba v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4901 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 30 2011).

1115. Court of appeals properly found the trial court abused its discretion by overruling defendant's objection and admitting inadmissible expert testimony, Tex. R. Evid. 702; however, the court of appeals erred in holding that the error was harmful as additional evidence should have been considered in the court of appeals' harm analysis, Tex. R. App. P. 44. 2. Barshaw v. State, 342 S.W.3d 91, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 914 (Tex. Crim. App. 2011).

1116. During appellant's civil commitment trial, the trial court erred by excluding the testimony of appellant's expert witness, based on its conclusion that the expert's testimony would confuse the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 403, because the trial court acknowledged that he qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and, despite the trial court's belief that the expert would testify that behavioral abnormality did not exist, the offer of proof established that the expert would have told the jury that the ultimate issue in the case, whether appellant suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence, could not be determined by scientific method alone. The error was not harmless because without the expert's testimony, the State's experts' testimony regarding their diagnoses of personality disorder and their scoring of the actuarial instruments went unchallenged by any expert in the field of psychiatry or psychology. In re Commitment of Hinkle, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2011).

1117. During appellant's civil commitment trial, the trial court did not err by excluding an expert's testimony that appellant did not commit the crimes for which he had been convicted because the issue of whether appellant had been wrongfully convicted was not at issue. In re Commitment of Hinkle, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2011).

1118. Trial court did not commit reversible error by overruling defendant's objection to the State's expert concerning the psychological effects of the prescription drug carisoprodol because substantially the same evidence was admitted without objection. Massey v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4453, 2011 WL 2418482 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 14 2011).

1119. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in concluding that a psychologist's testimony was admissible because the psychologist did not express an opinion as to the child complainant's truthfulness; the psychologist testified that children who were sexually abused typically exhibited problematic behaviors, such as performing poorly in school, stealing, or failing to follow directions. Johnson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3143, 2011 WL 1631791 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 28 2011).

1120. Court did not abuse its discretion by finding the canine handler properly relied on or utilized the principles involved in the field and finding the lineup was objective, because defendant presented no challenge to the canine handler's expertise, and defendant cited no evidence of a requirement or recommendation that the officer who placed the samples should then abstain from any further participation in the process. Powell v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2986, 2011 WL 1579734 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 21 2011).

1121. Appellant's counsel conceded that witnesses were not testifying as experts, such that appellant's issues related to the admissibility of these witnesses' testimony as experts, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, 703, 705(b), were moot. Zuffante v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2332 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 31 2011).

1122. Burden was on the sellers to establish that their expert's testimony was admissible. U.S. Renal Care, Inc. v. Jaafar, 345 S.W.3d 600, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 30 2011).

1123. Expert's opinion was unreliable, given that his analysis of reports was subjective, his technique had no known rate of error, and his opinion had not been subjected to peer review, plus the expert's theory appeared to have been developed for the litigation in this case; the expert did not connect the data relied upon and his opinion, and there was too great an analytical gap, and thus the expert's testimony constituted no evidence to support the jury's damage award. U.S. Renal Care, Inc. v. Jaafar, 345 S.W.3d 600, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 30 2011).

1124. Adverse inference could not compensate for the deficiencies of sellers' demand letter or their witness's expert testimony. U.S. Renal Care, Inc. v. Jaafar, 345 S.W.3d 600, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 30 2011).

1125. Testimony of the insureds' expert in a dispute regarding property damage caused by hail was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702, 703, because he was not required to review or discuss the insurance policy and because he used his own professional judgment in discussing an inspector's report. Southland Lloyds Ins. Co. v. Cantu, 399 S.W.3d 558, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2251, 2011 WL 1158244 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 30 2011).

1126. Order civilly committing appellant as a sexually violent predator was proper because the opinions offered by the State's experts, a psychologist and a psychiatrist, were reliable and adequately tied to relevant facts; they diagnosed appellant with paraphilia, polysubstance dependence, and personality disorder with antisocial features.

In re Polk, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1323, 2011 WL 662928 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 24 2011).

1127. Detective's expert testimony was neither conclusive nor dispositive, and the trial court did not err in admitting such; he did not purport to identify appellant's precise whereabouts based on the phone records, he merely explained that the cell phone was in the vicinity of the crime scene, and there was other ample evidence tying appellant to the crime of murder and aggravated assault, including eyewitness testimony and other testimony. Saenz v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1156, 2011 WL 578757 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 17 2011).

1128. Because the trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony, the court did not need to address, under Tex. R. App. P. 47.1, whether appellant's substantial rights were affected. Saenz v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1156, 2011 WL 578757 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 17 2011).

1129. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the deputy's testimony concerning the dog-scent lineup identification evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because, even if the court was to presume that the field was a legitimate area of expertise, the State failed to carry its burden in establishing the reliability and relevancy of the deputy's testimony; the State offered only the deputy's testimony, and although the deputy claimed that his dogs were reliable and accurate in identifying scents, he failed to produce or cite any evidence supporting his claims. The deputy had no records of success rates to verify the reliability of his testimony, nor did he have records of his procedures or order of the dogs in the lineup at issue; the record also showed that the deputy testified that he used multiple dogs and ran multiple tests, which was contrary to expert recommendations and accepted methods. State v. Smith, 335 S.W.3d 706, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 934 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 10 2011).

1130. Expert's study and testimony provided no evidence that an operator failed to pay royalties based on the market value of the gas in the field; the study did not resolve itself to a market value for the casinghead gas stated in dollars and cents. Occidental Permian Ltd. v. Helen Jones Found., 333 S.W.3d 392, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 701, 177 Oil & Gas Rep. 1072 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 31 2011).

1131. Expert's testimony was unreliable because the casinghead gas sold under other contracts she compared was not comparable in quality to that produced from other market-value leases; the expert's intentional omission of the high CO2 content of the gas from her evaluation improperly injected a subjective factor into the search for what was described in Texas law as an objective calculation and represented an outcome-derived methodology that was condemned in case law. Occidental Permian Ltd. v. Helen Jones Found., 333 S.W.3d 392, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 701, 177 Oil & Gas Rep. 1072 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 31 2011).

1132. Without a true comparison of hydrocarbon quality, too great an analytical gap stood between the data, if it was accurate, and an expert's market value opinion; the opinion, lacking reliability, was incompetent and amounted to no evidence the operator or former operators underpaid royalties on the market-value leases. Occidental Permian Ltd. v. Helen Jones Found., 333 S.W.3d 392, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 701, 177 Oil & Gas Rep. 1072 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 31 2011).

1133. At the revocation hearing, a police officer was permitted to testify over objection that the results of a field test indicated the substance found on the two objects in defendant's possession contained methamphetamine; while defendant challenged the officer's qualifications to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, any error in the admission of the officer's testimony was harmless in light of the evidence supporting the revocation of defendant's community supervision. Defendant admitted he was using methamphetamine, and an officer found him in possession of drug paraphernalia in violation of the terms of his community supervision. Kessler v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 606, 2011 WL 317673 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 28 2011).

1134. Automotive fraud consultant who was an experienced odometer fraud investigator was qualified to testify on the buyers' behalf regarding odometer tampering on a used vehicle, which included his opinion that a dealer performing a reasonable inspection would have discovered the tampering, and the trial court did not err in finding the expert's opinions reliable. Mac Haik Chevrolet Ltd. v. Diaz, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 668, 2011 WL 286124 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2011).

1135. Defendant was not entitled under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) to offer evidence of diminished capacity because his experts' reports, which did not address the standard for recklessness under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 6.03(c) or knowledge under § 6.03(a), could not support a claim that defendant was guilty only of manslaughter under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.04(a), rather than murder under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02. Thus, the experts' testimony was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Quick v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 680, 2011 WL 286155 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2011).

1136. Because a police officer's statement that he found a child to be credible constituted a direct opinion on the truthfulness of the child-complainant's allegations, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court properly excluded the officer's statement and instructed the jury to disregard the testimony. Santamaria v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 541, 2011 WL 2165153 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 20 2011).

1137. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's challenge to the reliability of a DNA analyst's expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because 1) the DNA analyst testified that the lab technicians performed all of the lab work, but that she made all the DNA comparisons; that everyone followed the same training program; that all of the lab work was subject to an internal validation process; that the lab took steps to ensure that contamination did not occur during the DNA testing process; and that she was able to ascertain that the DNA was properly extracted; and 2) there was no testimony to suggest that the technicians who performed the lab work deviated from proper protocols or procedures. Dreyer v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 353, 2011 WL 193494 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 19 2011).

1138. Appellant did not argue that the trial court erred in finding that a witness was not an expert on certain issues or that his testimony would invade the jury's province, and appellant failed to cite any authority showing the trial court abused its discretion, contrary to Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(i), and thus appellant presented nothing for review and this complaint was waived. Wilson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 145, 2011 WL 166901 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 11 2011).

1139. In a condemnation case, the landowner's appraisal expert provided competent evidence of the diminution in value to the remainder by considering comparable sales from two counties. He was not required to determine whether the parties to comparable sales subjectively believed that a pipeline easement affected the sales price, and any gap between the comparable sales data and his conclusions went to the weight of his testimony rather than its reliability. Lasalle Pipeline, Lp v. Donnell Lands, L.P., 336 S.W.3d 306, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9892 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2010).

1140. Expert's testimony regarding accounts receivable was unreliable because he made several unfounded assumptions regarding the balances owed, did not review any of the underlying documents upon which his reports were based, and did not take into consideration aging of the accounts receivable. U.S. Renal Care, Inc. v. Jaafar, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9646, 2010 WL 4983398 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 8 2010).

1141. Paternal grandmother testified that she was present at the birth of the children, that she had provided assistance to the children, and that the children enjoyed visiting with her and her other children, in addition to her extended family, but that evidence did not address the primary issue in a Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 153.433 case, that eliminating contact with the grandmother would significantly impair the children's physical health or emotional well-being; furthermore, the testimony of a school district counselor, who had not been trained as a counselor for children in family situations, did not have professional experience dealing with child-grandparent relationships, and had never treated or even seen any of the children involved in the litigation in a clinical setting, did not qualify as expert witness testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and her opinion constituted nothing more than lay personal opinion. The mere opinion of the grandmother and an interested, nonexpert witness that the grandmother should be granted access to the children did not overcome the statutory presumption in Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 153.433(2) that the mother acted in the best interest of the children. In the Interest of M.K.S., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9138, 2010 WL 4644496 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 17 2010).

1142. In a driving while intoxicated case, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by finding that an officer was an expert on the effects of alcohol and tolerance to alcohol because (1) the effects alcohol had on a human body and whether an individual could develop a tolerance to alcohol were not complex subjects; (2) homeostasis could potentially involve complex areas of inquiry, but the officer did little more than define the term; (3) the officer did not render any conclusive opinions but provided only general information; (4) the officer's area of expertise was not central to the resolution of the suit as the focus of the trial was on another officer's observations and defendant's intoxilyzer test results; and (5) the officer did not opine that defendant was intoxicated or express any opinion on the other officer's testimony. Sims v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8464, 2010 WL 4148372 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 21 2010).

1143. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of a deputy's canine scent lineup tests because another appellate court had previously considered and determined that they were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Pate v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8151, 2010 WL 3921177 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 7 2010).

1144. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, an expert witness never expressed an opinion that he believed the victim had been coached; instead, his testimony imparted scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge that related to his general experience with victims who had been sexually abused. Thus, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, his testimony was admissible as it did not convey whether he had an opinion regarding the victim's truthfulness. Cook v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8095, 2010 WL 3910585 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 6 2010).

1145. Expert's testimony was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in appellant's prosecution for aggravated robbery because the expert did not commit to an opinion that the weapon focus effect had impacted the victim's identification of appellant and a juror could have just as easily concluded that the gun put in the victim's face possibly impacted the victim's ability to accurately identify the man who had robbed her without expert testimony. Blasdell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8092 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 6 2010).

1146. Dog scent-discrimination lineups, when used alone or as primary evidence, are legally insufficient to support a conviction, and the court believes that the dangers inherent in the use of dog tracking evidence can only be alleviated by the presence of corroborating evidence; to the extent that lower-court opinions suggest otherwise, the court overrules them and expressly holds that when inculpatory evidence is obtained from a dog-scent lineup, its role in the courtroom is merely supportive. Winfrey v. State, 323 S.W.3d 875, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1167 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1147. All three bloodhounds alerted to appellant's scent, but this was not proof positive that appellant came into contact with the victim, for purposes of appellant's murder conviction; the dog-scent lineup proved only that appellant's scent was on the victim's clothes, not that appellant had been in direct contact with the victim, as the appellate court decided. Winfrey v. State, 323 S.W.3d 875, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1167 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1148. Jury gave significant weight to the canine-scent evidence and asked if it was illegal to convict solely on the scent pad evidence, but no eyewitnesses put appellant at the crime scene, the State was unable to match appellant to the fingerprint or footprints found at the crime scene, appellant did not match the DNA profile obtained, none of the victim's belongings were found in appellant's possession, and none of 73 hairs collected from the scene were consistent with appellant's; at most, the evidence showed that appellant indicated that he believed he was the number one suspect in a murder investigation, he shared information with an inmate that appellant claimed to have heard about the murder, and appellant's scent was on the victim's clothes, and the court found that this evidence merely raised a suspicion of guilt and was legally insufficient to support a murder conviction beyond a reasonable doubt. Winfrey v. State, 323 S.W.3d 875, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1167 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1149. Issue was whether dog-scent lineup evidence alone could support a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt; while this evidence might have raised a strong suspicion of appellant's guilt, the court held that, standing alone, it was insufficient to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and the court reversed appellant's murder conviction. Winfrey v. State, 323 S.W.3d 875, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1167 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1150. Trial court erred in awarding judgment to the sellers of a dialysis company in their action against a buyer for breach of the sales agreement as it pertained to pre-sale receivables because the testimony and opinion of the sellers' expert witness was unreliable and thus inadmissible; the expert's assumptions regarding contract and noncontract patients were unsupported by the evidence and the failure to test those assumptions rendered the report unreliable. U.S. Renal Care, Inc. v. Jaafar, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7085, 2010 WL 3405831 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 31 2010).

1151. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a 21-year old who was mentally retarded and functioned at approximately a 10-year-old level, the court erred in permitting a mental health-mental retardation psychologist to testify that mentally retarded persons, as a class, tended to be truthful. Barshaw v. State, 320 S.W.3d 625, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7244 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2010).

1152. Because appellant failed to object to the reliability of an expert's methodology by requesting a hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 609, plus appellant did not object to the admissibility of the testimony when it was proffered, appellant did not preserve the issue for appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Jones v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7357, 2010 WL 3448010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 31 2010).

1153. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of a deputy's canine scent lineup tests because defendant gave the court no reason to reach a different result in the instant case than in a previous case where the deputy's tests had been held to be reliable and admissible. Pate v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6980, 2010 WL 3341853 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2010).

1154. In a breach of contract action involving a broker's commissions based on a percentage of net profits from sales procured by the broker, an expert's testimony was admissible because his method of calculation of net profits was a reasonable approximation and was acceptable under the Daubert standard. Truman Arnold Cos. v. Hammond & Consultants Enters., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6190, 2010 WL 2982912 (Tex. App. Tyler July 30 2010).

1155. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a detective to testify in a narrative form because the testimony served to explain why he had reached the conclusion that the child victim's account of the sexual abuse was plausible, and defendant lodged no objection concerning the detective's qualifications to provide his opinion on the topic, nor did he object that the detective's opinion on the question was irrelevant. Romero v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5735, 2010 WL 2854307 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 21 2010).

1156. Expert concluded that an employee suffered a pre-syncopal episode that led to confusion and the loss of control of his vehicle, and this opinion was based on a reasonable medical probability; the probative evidence supported the trial court's intervening cause finding. Neufeld v. Hudnall, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5601 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 16 2010).

1157. Trial court did not err by excluding expert testimony on whether defendant was a man of ordinary temper under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02(d) because it was not relevant, as the issue was not whether defendant was a man of ordinary temper, but rather how the objectively reasonable man would react if placed in defendant's situation. Mcghee v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 15 2010).

1158. Trial court did not err by excluding expert testimony on whether defendant snapped before shooting his ex-wife to death because defendant's questions attempted to have the expert testify about defendant's state of mind at the time of the incident. Mcghee v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 15 2010).

1159. In a customer's slip-and-fall negligence action against a mall, the trial court properly struck the testimony of the customer's expert witness on the ground that the expert was not qualified; the expert conceded that the expert had never taken any courses regarding proper placement of kiosks within retail shopping environments. Downer v. Simon Prop. Group Tex., L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5386 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 8 2010).

1160. Court did not need to consider whether the trial court's admission of the retrograde extrapolation testimony was erroneous because even if the trial court erred, the error did not affect appellant's substantial rights under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that (1) there was no indication that jurors were predisposed to give the expert's testimony greater weight than the other evidence, (2) the State was not limited to proving appellant was intoxicated because his blood alcohol content was .08 or more, and intoxication could have been shown by proving appellant lacked the normal use of his faculties under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.01 by reason of his introduction of alcohol in his body, (3) the expert's testimony was cumulative because there was other evidence of appellant's intoxication, (4) the breath test results showing appellant's blood alcohol content at .115 were indicative of whether he consumed alcohol, (5) even absent retrograde extrapolation testimony, breath tests were often highly probative to prove both per se and impairment intoxication, and field sobriety tests provided another indicator of impairment, (6) the prosecutor did not emphasize the retrograde extrapolation testimony or the expert's credentials, and (7) the jury was not exposed to a long discourse on the science of retrograde extrapolation. Sung Mo Hong v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4688, 2010 WL 2510333 (Tex. App. Dallas June 23 2010).

1161. Defendant's conviction for engaging in organized criminal activity, with the two predicate offenses being aggravated sexual assault of a child, was improper because the trial court abused its discretion in allowing a Department of Family and Protective Services worker to testify as an expert on the "grooming process" used by child predators. During cross-examination of the worker, defendant elicited the fact that the worker had not received any training in psychology beyond an associate's degree and the worker agreed that she was not a licensed professional counselor or psychologist, had not attended medical school, and was neither a nurse nor a sexual assault nurse examiner. Kelly v. State, 321 S.W.3d 583, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4506 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

1162. In an action in which a mother alleged that her baby suffered nerve injuries during birth due to her obstetrician's asserted negligence, the trial court acted within its discretion when it overruled the mother's motion to exclude expert testimony relied upon by the obstetrician regarding natural forces of labor as a potential cause of the child's brachial plexus injury; the mother's challenges predicated on reliance upon retrospective studies and the potential for ascertainment bias did not warrant exclusion of the disputed expert testimony regarding the cause of the child's brachial plexus injury. Taber v. Nguyen Roush, 316 S.W.3d 139, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4508 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

1163. In an action in which a mother alleged that her baby suffered nerve injuries during birth due to her obstetrician's asserted negligence, the mother wrongly attempted to invoke the "general acceptance" factor of the Robinson factors for gauging the admissibility of expert testimony to argue that the natural forces of labor theory had not been generally accepted as a potential cause of brachial plexus injuries during birth where labeling the natural forces of labor theory as a "hypothesis" was not dispositive because that characterization by itself did not answer the reliability question. Similarly, the reliability issue was not resolved by pointing to a characterization of the natural forces of labor theory as "not the most commonly accepted at all" by one of the child's treating physicians. Taber v. Nguyen Roush, 316 S.W.3d 139, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4508 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

1164. In an action in which a mother alleged that her baby suffered nerve injuries during birth due to her obstetrician's asserted negligence, the expert testimony relied upon by the obstetrician regarding natural forces of labor as a potential cause of the child's brachial plexus injury was admissible under the Robinson standard because, on the record presented, the trial court had a valid basis for concluding that the asserted analytical gap between non-specific brachial plexus injuries discussed in the medical literature and the particular avulsion injury that the child suffered had been bridged as between natural forces of labor as an explanation for brachial plexus injuries in general and the child's specific avulsion injury. The record warranted submission of testimony regarding a natural forces of labor explanation for the jury's consideration in deciding a causation issue that -- as the mother's expert noted -- unavoidably involved an element of speculation. Taber v. Nguyen Roush, 316 S.W.3d 139, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4508 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

1165. Tex. R. Evid. 702 covers more than just scientific evidence, and expertise can be acquired in numerous ways, including by training or experience. Davis v. State, 313 S.W.3d 317, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1166. Appellant did not lodge an objection to the testimony of expert witnesses and counsel did not suggest that the witnesses were unqualified or the methodologies unreliable, nor did he present any evidence to that effect, such that appellant failed to show that he preserved error. Davis v. State, 313 S.W.3d 317, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1167. Companies' expert witness did not criticize the agent's expert's witness's methodology used, but the data the agent's expert used to arrive at his projected lost profit opinion; thus, the companies' expert's objections went to the credibility or weight to be given to the evidence, and given that the experts calculated the agent's estimated damages in close proximity, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the agent's expert's testimony. Farmers Ins. Exch. v. Hudson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3351, 2010 WL 1806660 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 6 2010).

1168. Defendant failed to make any objection questioning the reliability of an expert's testimony, and whether the court made defendant's objection that the expert did not personally interview the victim as an objection of qualification or reliability was of no moment because there was no requirement that an expert witness personally interview the victim for his testimony to be admissible, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 703, 418; because defendant made no objection to the reliability of expert testimony, he did not preserve his point for review and the court assumed without deciding that the testimony on the subject was admissible. Cockrell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3208, 2010 WL 1705538 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 28 2010).

1169. Trial court committed reversible error in a sexually violent predator civil commitment proceeding in refusing to permit appellant's only expert witness, a professional counselor, to testify as to whether appellant had a behavioral abnormality, as defined in Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002(2), because the expert possessed the necessary qualifications to provide an opinion related to the assessment of the risk that appellant would commit a future act of sexual violence. In re Dodson, 311 S.W.3d 194, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2931 (Tex. App. Beaumont

Apr. 22 2010).

1170. In a mother's medical malpractice action that attributed her son's nerve injuries to a physician's alleged negligence during the son's birth, the trial court acted within its discretion when it overruled the mother's motion to exclude expert testimony; the challenged testimony regarding natural forces of labor as a potential cause of the son's brachial plexus injury was admissible under the Robinson standard. Taber v. Roush, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2827, 2010 WL 1540128 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 20 2010).

1171. In a suit alleging negligent operation of injection wells, prejudicial error occurred under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1) as to the exclusion of a qualified expert's standard of care testimony, which was both relevant and required, and the admission of testimony from other experts that consisted of unsupported speculation. Discovery Operating, Inc. v. Bp Am. Prod. Co., 311 S.W.3d 140, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2629, 173 Oil & Gas Rep. 697 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 15 2010).

1172. Ultimate determination of whether a drug manufacturer's conduct comported with that degree of care which a reasonably prudent drug manufacturer would use under the same or similar circumstances was well within the experience of persons of ordinary intelligence; hence, expert opinion evidence was not essential to a claim of negligence by a decedent's family regarding the manufacture of a prescription pain patch. Alza Corp. v. Thompson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2347, 2010 WL 1254610 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 1 2010).

1173. Trial court properly admitted an expert's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702, given that there was no dispute that property management as a field or profession was a legitimate one, the issue of common area expenses fell within the bounds of the property management business, and there was no indication or argument that the expert's opinions depended on principles not generally applicable to entities involved in property management; the landlords' concerns were properly tested by cross-examination of the expert and the concerns were not the type that would have rendered the opinions unreliable and thus inadmissible. Five Star Int'l Holdings, Inc. v. Thomson, Inc., 324 S.W.3d 160, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2399 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 31 2010).

1174. Because expert opinions provided the jury with a reasonable basis for its award for common area expense overcharges, a landlord's no evidence point failed, as did claims that the related jury instructions were improperly submitted. Five Star Int'l Holdings, Inc. v. Thomson, Inc., 324 S.W.3d 160, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2399 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 31 2010).

1175. In a city resident's action against a mayor challenging a special election, expert testimony offered by the resident was not conclusory because the expert testified regarding the facts supporting the expert's opinion and explained how the expert reached that opinion; the expert stated that through discussions and correspondence with the resident and counsel, the expert had become familiar with the issues in the lawsuit, the three propositions involved, and the violations alleged. Duncan-hubert v. Mitchell, 310 S.W.3d 92, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1889 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 18 2010).

1176. Trial court did not err in a health care liability action in denying a hospital's motion to dismiss because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the patient's expert, a practicing physician with a significant history in surgery, was qualified to review the patient's medical records and determine that the fracture of the patient's leg in the course of a fall was caused by the inadequate assistance of the hospital staff. Clear Lake Rehab. Hosp. v. Karber, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1932 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 18 2010).

1177. After noting the victim's symptoms of post-traumatic stress from defendant's repeated abuse, including being burned with a lighter on his genital area, a State expert testified, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 42.12, § 5(a), that it would be in the best interest of the eight-year-old victim for defendant to be denied community supervision; defendant did not contest this evaluation, her expert was not involved with the victim and thus her testimony was not relevant to this finding, and even if the trial court erred in excluding defendant's expert's testimony, it did not affect defendant's substantial rights and had to be disregarded under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Hoselton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2009 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 18 2010).

1178. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the court did not err in admitting a Texas ranger's testimony about methodology and grooming; the ranger had participated in several hundred cases related to sexual offenses against children and had been the primary investigator or played a significant role in approximately 75 of those cases. Morris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1293 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 25 2010).

1179. Witness's opinion was based on what he observed at the crime scene, and he also had specialized knowledge as a homicide detective; the evidence was admissible as opinion testimony by a lay witness and as expert testimony, under Tex. R. Evid. 701 & 702. Lowery v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1230, 2010 WL 610915 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 23 2010).

1180. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the residents' expert's testimony regarding the cause of the fire, given that the expert ultimately stated that he could not determine the cause of the fire, which acknowledged that his opinion in his affidavit was no more than speculation. Hemenas v. Caston, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1023, 2010 WL 521116 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 11 2010).

1181. Residents argue that, even if the exclusion of expert testimony regarding a fire's cause was improper, it was error to exclude his expert testimony regarding the fire's origin, but the court did not need not determine whether the exclusion of the testimony was error because the court found that even if it took such testimony into consideration, the court would affirm the ruling in the homeowners' favor. Hemenas v. Caston, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1023, 2010 WL 521116 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 11 2010).

1182. In defendant's capital murder case, the trial court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress hair-comparison analysis because the expert had to complete police training in forensic-hair comparison and work on various hair-comparison cases under direct supervision, he explained how he tested the hair found in defendant's vehicle to the hair taken from the victim's head, and the expert testified that hair-comparison analysis was considered an accepted science within the scientific community and that there was literature on the topic. Arciba v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9815, 2009 WL 5155532 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 30 2009).

1183. In defendant's theft case, a witness's shoe print identification testimony was properly admitted because the witness testified that he applied the appropriate technique in reaching his opinions. Noting accidentals common to defendant's shoes and the impressions, the witness opined that no shoe but defendant's could have made the impression on three of the decals and the paper from the getaway vehicle; conversely, the other decal sampled did not contain an accidental and therefore could have been produced by any shoe of like size and brand as defendant's. Castellon v. State, 302 S.W.3d 568, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9681 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 21 2009).

1184. To the extent defendant made an expert challenge to an officer's testimony, defendant inadequately briefed the issue by failing to cite any portion of the record or any legal authority supporting her argument, contrary to Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(i). Brice v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9561, 2009 WL 4882849 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 17 2009).

1185. Expert's opinions in a products liability case on how a fire started were subjective and conclusory because they were unsupported by testing; thus, they were not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, were not based on a reliable foundation under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and constituted no evidence that an alleged design defect in a dryer caused the fire. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 298 S.W.3d 631, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 1041, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 179

(Tex. 2009).

1186. Claimant failed to preserve for review her assertion that the county failed to establish what specific knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education qualified the technologist as an expert, because the claimant's counsel specifically stated that the claimant had no objection to the admission of the technologist's testimony. Pena v. Edwards County, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9332, 2009 WL 4669300 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 9 2009).

1187. Expert's concessions regarding the limitations of photographs did not affect the reliability of his observations, but were factors relevant to the weight the jury gave the expert's opinions based on his interpretation of vehicular damage in the photographs; it was the province of the jury to decide how much weight to afford the expert's opinion, and while reliable evidence supported the expert's opinion that the accident resulted from a lane-change maneuver, the expert's opinion that the motorist's vehicle entered the lane occupied by the driver was unsupported and the trial court abused its discretion in admitting the expert's conclusions that the motorist drove into a lane occupied by the driver's vehicle and that the accident most likely occurred where vehicular debris was found. Walker v. Rangel, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9215, 2009 WL 4342505 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

1188. Despite an expert's properly-admitted testimony supporting a driver's version, the erroneously-admitted opinions of an officer and an expert were crucial to key issues of causation, and thus this probably resulted in rendition of an improper judgment under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a). Walker v. Rangel, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9215, 2009 WL 4342505 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

1189. Court did not err in determining that a trooper's description of defendant as "psychotic" was inadmissible as evidence of defendant's mental state because, although he had specialized knowledge in reconstructing accidents, the trooper acknowledged he did not have specialized knowledge in mental illnesses, nor any qualifications to give an opinion that defendant was "psychotic." Fisher-Riza v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9769, 2009 WL 4358622 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

1190. In this condemnation action, the trial court erred in excluding the State's expert testimony because the expert applied an accepted methodology for valuing the condemned property; the expert appraised the fee simple value of the easement, which included the leasehold interest, and he assigned no separate value to the leasehold estate, the expert's appraisal did not overlook the value of the property as a billboard location, and the rent the leaseholder paid the easement holder also accounted for the value of the location. State v. Cent. Expressway Sign Assocs., 302 S.W.3d 866, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 967, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 134 (Tex. 2009).

1191. In this condemnation action, the exclusion of the State's expert's testimony was reversible because the testimony was directly related to the central issue in the case, which was the value of the condemned property; on remand, the trial court was not to allow evidence of valuation based on advertising income, but general estimates of what the property would sell for considering its possible use as a billboard site were acceptable. State v. Cent. Expressway Sign Assocs., 302 S.W.3d 866, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 967, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 134 (Tex. 2009).

1192. Undivided-fee rule merely ensures that the goal of an appraiser will always be to approximate what the entire property would sell for in a market transaction, which was precisely what the expert did in this case, and his testimony was admissible. State v. Cent. Expressway Sign Assocs., 302 S.W.3d 866, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 967, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 134 (Tex. 2009).

1193. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding an expert opinion about the truthfulness of the child complainant's allegation. Love v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8952, 2009 WL 3930900 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 19 2009).

1194. There was no abuse of discretion in allowing the testimony of the State's expert, a clinical supervisor and therapist, regarding the effects of sexual abuse on children, because the expert's generic testimony was connected to the facts of the case through the complainant's testimony, and the admission of the testimony, if erroneous, did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict. Bullock v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8872, 2009 WL 3838861 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 18 2009).

1195. Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the expert testimony that defendant's recent withdrawal from heroin affected his ability to converse with the police and give a written statement, because the expert's testimony was neither reliable nor relevant, and it was an impermissible opinion on the truthfulness of defendant's confession. Gonzalez v. State, 301 S.W.3d 393, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8878 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 18 2009).

1196. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly allowed an expert to testify on the cause of death because the expert was shown to have training in child abuse, sodium levels, sodium intoxication, other causes of elevated sodium levels, head injuries, "pica", and out-of-hospital cardiac arrest. The expert testified that he used standard practice and procedures, including the widely accepted method of differential diagnosis, to determine the cause of the child's illness. Overton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8312, 2009 WL 3489844 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 29 2009).

1197. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly allowed an expert to testify on the cause of death because the expert stated that he had training and experience in the area of sodium poisoning during medical school; he attended "classes that covered material dealing with patients that had elevated sodium levels, and "treated patients with elevated sodium levels." Finally, the doctor testified that the methods that he employed were "standard operating procedure, standard medical examiner practice." Overton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8312, 2009 WL 3489844 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 29 2009).

1198. Employees of a business purchaser who testified in a trial against the owner of the sold business regarding allegedly improper financial conduct by the owner were fact witnesses pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 701 rather than expert witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 702, such that documents which the employees referred to were not subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.6(a) for not being disclosed in a timely manner pursuant to Tex. R. Civ. P. 194, as such disclosure only applied to expert witnesses.

1199. Corporation failed to explain which of an expert's particular statements violated the standards of scientific reliability as set forth in case law and cited evidentiary rules, including Tex. R. Evid. 702, 703, 705, plus the corporation failed to provide the court with any citations to the record to support this portion of its argument, which was waived. SCTW Health Care Ctr., Inc. v. AAR Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8071, 2009 WL 3321399 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 15 2009).

1200. Expert's testimony about duties that an attorney might owe to an opposing party was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because an attorney's duties were not within the jurors' understanding as laypersons; moreover, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1) because the jury was asked to decide whether the attorney had notice that he was paid from converted funds, not whether he had a duty to the rightful owner of the funds. Great Western Drilling, Ltd. v. Alexander, 305 S.W.3d 688, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7853 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 8 2009).

1201. Because the district court found that defendant insured had suffered no damage that was covered under the policy issued by plaintiff insurer, the appraisal by the insurer's expert and the corresponding activation of an underinsurance clause therefore did not affect the insured's claim because the reduced coverage percentage would have been zero anyway, the argument that it was error to have admitted the expert's report was moot and no error affecting the insured's substantial rights was shown under Fed. R. Evid. 103(a)(1); while the insured argued error under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the federal court, sitting in diversity, had to apply the Federal Rules of Evidence in matters relating to expert testimony. Certain Underwriters at Lloyds London v. Corporate Pines Realty Corp, 355 Fed. Appx. 778, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 21882 (5th Cir. Tex. 2009).

1202. In a driving while intoxicated case, because Tex. R. Evid. 702 did not apply to suppression hearings, a trial judge, in ruling on the admissibility of Light Detection and Ranging technology, was not required to hold a Rule 702 Kelly gatekeeping hearing to determine the reliability of that technology. Hall v. State, 297 S.W.3d 294, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1205 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1203. Expert's opinion that a pool deck's surface caused a guess to fall was not so speculative or conclusory that it could not support the jury finding; the expert based his opinion regarding the cause of the fall based both on an inspection of the pool deck where the guest fell and a review of the material used to coat the deck's surface and the expert's testimony provided legally sufficient evidence that the pool deck surface was slippery. Towers of Town Lake Condo. Ass'n v. Rouhani, 296 S.W.3d 290, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7033 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2009).

1204. Expert's opinion regarding a guest's future earning capacity was supported by his review of the evidence combined with economic assumptions that he explained to the jury; the expert had experience valuing dental practices such as the guest's practice, the expert's assumption of future growth was not based on pure speculation, and while the condominium association's expert witness and the expert here made different assumptions regarding the future income projections, each expert's opinion was based on the application of economic assumptions to historical data and the expert's assumptions were not unreasonable and provided legally sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding regarding loss of future earning capacity. Towers of Town Lake Condo. Ass'n v. Rouhani, 296 S.W.3d 290, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7033 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2009).

1205. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 702, 703 in excluding an expert's opinions as unreliable in a suit for legal malpractice and breach of fiduciary duty involving a suit against a consulting company that had failed to obtain financing; the expert did not identify sources of financing or adequately discuss its availability. Ray D. Robertson, Inc. v. Morin, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7170, 2009 WL 2902720 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 27 2009).

1206. In a capital murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding a doctor qualified to testify as to the cause of the child's death because the doctor had fifteen years of experience as a licensed physician, she had worked in a pediatric intensive care unit for eleven years, and she was certified in both pediatrics and pediatric critical care, specializing in critical care, where she treated many children with neurological injuries and illnesses. The doctor was also an associate professor at Baylor College of Medicine. Marin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6477 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 20 2009).

1207. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly denied defendant's witness's testimony relating to the field of false confessions because the witness's testimony could not have assisted the jury in understanding the evidence or in making a determination of a fact issue. He did not intend to offer an opinion as to the truth or falsity of defendant's confession, and during cross-examination defendant admitted the truth of the portions of his confession that he earlier claimed were inaccurate. Munoz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6475, 2009 WL 2517664 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 19 2009).

1208. Golf club seller's expert was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the individual's experience in evaluating business opportunities, executing marketing plans for businesses, and monitoring business results for golf club manufacturers did not amount to knowledge, skill, and experience so as to qualify him as an expert on the issue of lost profits of the seller. Spin Doctor Golf, Inc. v. Paymentech, L.P., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5991 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 3 2009).

1209. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, a trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that an expert's testimony that there must have been an oral agreement regarding the proceeds of title insurance for pending projects was reliable where he was familiar with the operations of a title company and what was involved when that type of business was sold, based on his experience, he testified that it was unusual that the written documents pertaining to the sale of a title company did not address accounts receivable, accounts payable, and work in progress, and he would have expected the parties to have an agreement pertaining to the outstanding obligations of the company being sold, to income that the seller expected to receive but which had not yet been received, and what value to place on transactions in progress that had not yet closed. Adams v. McFadden, 296 S.W.3d 743, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5817 (Tex. App. El Paso July 29 2009).

1210. To determine whether the record supported the trial court's decision to exclude an expert witness's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 regarding an assessment for sexual interest test, the court had to decide whether defendant showed by clear and convincing proof that the test was reliable under the three criteria set out in case law. Figueroa v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5604, 2009 WL 2183460 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 22 2009).

1211. Defendant did not demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that an expert's evaluation of defendant under an assessment for sexual interest test was reliable for the purposes of characterizing defendant as being sexually uninterested in minors; it was within the trial court's discretion to weigh the expert's testimony regarding the test's significant potential for error and its inaccuracy in Hispanic subjects more heavily than the expert's testimony about the objectiveness of the test. The trial court did not act unreasonably and its decision to exclude the expert's testimony was not an abuse of discretion. Figueroa v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5604, 2009 WL 2183460 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 22 2009).

1212. Court expressed no opinion as to whether the an assessment for sexual interest test could be found reliable if different evidence had been presented; the court only held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that defendant did not demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that the test was admissible based on the evidence in this case. Figueroa v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5604, 2009 WL 2183460 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 22 2009).

1213. Contrary to what was suggested by the easement holder and leaseholder, the State's expert did value the entire property, which was the easement because the State had already acquired the underlying fee, and the expert's appraisal did not overlook the value of the property as a billboard location because he valued the easement as put to its highest and best use; thus, the expert's testimony reflected an accepted and reliable method of appraising the condemned easement and should not have been excluded; the error was reversible because the expert's testimony was directly related to the central issue in the case concerning the value of the condemned property, and on remand, the trial court was not to allow evidence of valuation based on advertising income. State v. Cent. Expressway Sign Assocs., 302 S.W.3d 866, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 967, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 134 (Tex. 2009).

1214. Challenge to expert testimony was rejected in a case involving a civil commitment for a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. §§ 841.001-841.150, because a forensic psychologist based his testimony on sufficient facts and data and on a reliable method used in his field of expertise for forming an opinion, and he applied that method reliably to the facts in this case. There was no analytical gap in the testimony and no abuse of discretion by the trial court in admitting the testimony. In re Commitment of Tolleson, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3660 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 28 2009).

1215. Challenge to expert testimony alleging that it was speculative or conclusory was rejected in a case involving a civil commitment for a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. §§ 841.001-841.150, where three experts reviewed documents, interviewed the patient, and administered actuarials before testifying that the patient suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to commit future acts of sexual violence; the experts also explained his risk factors for re-offending. Therefore, the evidence was legally sufficient to support the commitment. In re Commitment of Tolleson, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3660 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 28 2009).

1216. Appellants' expert opined that a company employee had actual knowledge of the dangers and conditions that resulted in the decedent's death, but considering the evidence relied upon by the expert, this was a conclusory statement that did nothing more than create a mere surmise or suspicion of fact; it was not evidence on which a reasonable jury could return a verdict in appellants' favor, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 95.003. Eisen v. Four Sevens Operating Co., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4032, 2009 WL 1506916 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 28 2009).

1217. In a wrongful death case, expert testimony that a driver was the cause of a fatal collision was properly admitted into evidence as reliable, even though no witnesses were interviewed; no witnesses came forward since the accident occurred in an unpopulated area. Further, the expert did not overlook the driver's contention that a decedent had been the one to cross over a median; rather, the driver's account was inconsistent with and contradicted the physical evidence at the scene of the accident. Thomas v. Uzoka, 290 S.W.3d 437, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4354 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 28 2009).

1218. In a wrongful death case, expert testimony regarding the speed of two vehicles at impact was properly admitted into evidence because the use of a roller wheel was generally accepted as a valid instrument used in taking measurements in the field of accident investigation, the loss of the expert's field notes did not render measurements unreliable since they could have been tested and independently verified, and there was no error in allowing conclusions to be drawn from the measurements listed in a scale diagram. Thomas v. Uzoka, 290 S.W.3d 437, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4354 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 28 2009).

1219. In a wrongful death case, expert testimony from an investigating officer was properly admitted because an opinion regarding vehicle speed was based on a reliable foundation where a computer program called WinCrash was used. The appellate court rejected the arguments that the officer was forced to guess at the total pre-collision weight of each vehicle, the speed calculations were generated using an incorrect impact-angle analysis, and the WinCrash report contained several errors that undermined any confidence in the program's computations. Thomas v. Uzoka, 290 S.W.3d 437, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4354 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 28 2009).

1220. Corporal properly testified to his rationale for charging defendant with possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver because of the way the drugs were packaged, and even if error, similar evidence was introduced through the testimony of another witness concerning the manner of the drug's packaging and the number of packages. Tovar v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2739, 2009 WL 1066115 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 21 2009).

1221. In a dispute over the valuation of oil and gas interests, an objector preserved a complaint for review about the testimony of a professional appraiser because the argument was that the testimony was conclusory on its face. In this circumstance, the objector was challenging the legal sufficiency of the evidence, even in the absence of any objection to its admissibility. Averitt v. Caudle, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2284, 2009 WL 891034 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 2 2009).

1222. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the evidence of state trooper because he demonstrated that he was qualified to give the kind of opinion he gave, which was an opinion of how the wreck occurred based on his observation of the scene of the wreck and subsequent investigation. Brown v. State, 303 S.W.3d 310, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2166 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 31 2009).

1223. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a Child Protective Services' supervisor because she did not vouch for the victim's truthfulness in their allegations or express her opinion as to whether sexual abuse had occurred. Rather, she testified that her agency's investigation resulted in a conclusion that, based on the victims' accounts, there was reason to believe that defendant had sexually abuse them; the testimony could assist a trier of fact in determining an issue for which the jury was not qualified to the best possible degree in deciding whether the alleged events occurred. Wagner v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2423 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

1224. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of two therapists who testified that the two child victims each offered consistent accounts of the charged offenses because the therapists did not attempt to suggest that the victims were truthful or that there allegations were true. Wagner v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2423 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

1225. In a sexual assault of a child case, the trial court erred in admitting an expert's opinion on the complainant's credibility because the expert did not base his belief on evidence provided to him before he met the complainant; the expert testified that he believed that the complainant was sexually assaulted "because of how he described that he felt pain or soreness in his butt." The only time the complainant offered such a description was during an interview at a children's advocacy center, which the expert observed first-hand. Lopez v. State, 288 S.W.3d 148, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2050 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 26 2009).

1226. In a driving while intoxicated case, the court did not err by allowing the officer to testify that defendant failed the field sobriety tests because the officer's use of the word "failed" did not give his testimony an "aura of scientific reliability" or cloak it with unearned credibility; the majority of the officer's testimony consisted of a straightforward narrative of each field sobriety test, followed by a particular description of how defendant performed each test. The officer's observations were based on common knowledge and observations and did not, under the circumstances convert his lay witness testimony into expert testimony. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2051, 2009 WL 765490 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 25 2009).

1227. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the trial court properly excluded defendant's proffered expert testimony regarding memory because the expert would have testified in general about memory and how it could be faulty or distorted, but he would not have tied that opinion to a material fact at issue in the case. He never met with the victim, and there was no showing that the types of tests used in the studies and articles he described were ever performed on the victim. Hales v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1589, 2009 WL 565713 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 6 2009).

1228. In a toxic tort case filed by several apartment complex residents, summary judgment was properly granted on the issue of personal injury because the expert testimony of two doctors did not sufficiently show causation; one doctor ultimately opined only that there was "a possibility" of a causal connection between the contaminant exposure alleged and the residents' claimed symptoms, and he conceded he had drawn no further conclusions because he had not evaluated the residents. A second doctor also stated during a deposition that he had not examined any of the residents subject to the trial court's summary judgment, and he was unable to file an affidavit to contradict deposition testimony merely to raise a fact issue for purposes of summary judgment; even if the affidavit was considered, it did no more than provide evidence that the type of mold found at the apartment complex was generally capable of causing health problems, it was not evidence of cause-in-fact of any specific resident's health complaints, and it was conclusory. Plunkett v. Conn. Gen. Life Ins. Co., 285 S.W.3d 106, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1405 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 27 2009).

1229. In a toxic tort case filed by several apartment complex residents, summary judgment was properly granted on the issue of property damage because an expert provided no empirical evidence or methodology that explained the validity of his extrapolation that observations pertaining to the mold exposure of one resident's property were also applicable to all the other residents' property. Plunkett v. Conn. Gen. Life Ins. Co., 285 S.W.3d 106, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1405 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 27 2009).

1230. There is no authority to support an argument that normal expert reliability standards do not apply in a summary judgment proceeding. Therefore, an appellate court looked to these standards in assessing whether or not summary judgment should have been granted in a toxic tort case on the issues of property damage and personal injury. Plunkett v. Conn. Gen. Life Ins. Co., 285 S.W.3d 106, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1405 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 27 2009).

1231. For purposes of Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. § 17.50(a)(1), (3), a client had the burden to produce evidence to raise a material fact issue on whether he had a viable medical malpractice claim under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.001(a)(13) to preclude no evidence summary judgment on causation, and to the extent the trial court required a suit within a suit requirement as a component of causation, the trial court did not err; the client's affidavit did not address causation and the client could not indirectly rely on an excluded expert's opinions through another's affidavit to create a fact issue on causation, and without admissible testimony that raises a fact issue that the client's medical malpractice case was viable, there was no evidence that, but for the law firms' alleged conduct, the client would not have sustained injury. Hackett v. Littlepage & Booth, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1166 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 20 2009).

1232. Because it was dispositive, under Tex. R. App. P. 47.1, the court limited its review to the ground that an expert's testimony was not reliable for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Hackett v. Littlepage & Booth, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1166 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 20 2009).

1233. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding an expert and sustaining objections to the expert's deposition testimony; for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, the issue was whether the expert's testimony was scientifically reliable that a drug caused or worsened the client's renal condition, and to the extent the trial court relied on case law standards for excluding expert testimony, the trial court did not abuse its discretion, and in any event, the trial court could have found that the expert's conclusions, lacking foundational data linking the drug to the client's condition, amounted to no more than unsupported speculation. Hackett v. Littlepage & Booth, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1166 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 20 2009).

1234. Case law standards for the admission of epidemiology studies were not at issue here, as a client did not rely on an epidemiological study that linked a drug to his condition; when an expert relied on epidemiology studies, they had to meet certain criteria as outlined in case law. Hackett v. Littlepage & Booth, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1166 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 20 2009).

1235. In a products liability case, where a retailer failed to raise a scientific reliability challenge to an expert's testimony before a trial court, it was waived on review. However, a challenge that the testimony was speculative and conclusory could have been raised for the first time on appeal. Merrell v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 276 S.W.3d 117, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 414 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 23 2009).

1236. In a products liability case, an expert's testimony regarding a fire allegedly started by a lamp was not speculative or conclusory nor did it contain an impermissible analytical gap between the data and the conclusions; while the expert's analysis was not irrefutable, the expert did provide factual substantiation for his opinions. The expert's opinions were based on his knowledge, training and experience as an expert in fire science and fire investigation, his review of the pictures of the scene, the statements of the fact witnesses, and numerous published articles. Merrell v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 276 S.W.3d 117, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 414 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 23 2009).

1237. In defendant's injury to a child case, the court did not err in admitting opinion testimony concerning a DNA test because the expert duly limited her testimony concerning the sample to show it was human skin, consistent with the child's skin, and that the child could not be excluded as the donor. The question raised by defendant concerned more the weight of the testimony rather that its reliability; the expert did not testify that the skin belonged to the child as defendant identified in his trial objection. Smith v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 401, 2009 WL 1941999 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 22 2009).

1238. Distinct line cannot be drawn between lay opinion and expert testimony because all perceptions are evaluated based on experiences, but as a general rule, observations which do not require significant expertise to interpret and which are not based on a scientific theory can be admitted as lay opinions if the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 701 are met, and this is true even when the witness has experience or training; additionally, even events not normally encountered by most people in everyday life do not necessarily require the testimony of an expert. Hawkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 16, 2009 WL 30255 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 7 2009).

1239. In a divorce case, a former husband did not preserve an error relating to the admissibility of expert testimony because the record reflected that the husband lodged no admissibility objections to the testimony assessing the value of the estates, characterizing community assets and separate property, and assessing a former wife's reimbursement claims. As to his complaint about the weight given to the testimony, this was for the trier of fact to decide. Sharma v. Routh, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9737 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 31 2008).

1240. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding defendant's expert's testimony because: (1) the expert did not know defendant's blood-breath ratio; (2) the expert provided no data, scientific theory, or documentary evidence to support his position that intoxication could be determined from viewing a videotape without evidence of field sobriety tests; (3) the expert made no attempt to establish that his method was generally accepted in the relevant community; and (4) the jury did not need the expert's testimony in order to evaluate defendant's appearance on the jail tape. Freeman v. State, 276 S.W.3d 630, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9383 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

1241. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court properly allowed an expert to testify as to what direction the wounds had been inflicted because the expert was fully qualified to render his expert medical opinion as to how he believed the wound was inflicted. The expert was not required to have special forensic training to render his medical opinion on the direction of the cut. McClure v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9026 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 4 2008).

1242. In defendant's sexual assault of a child trial, an expert witness did not directly testify that the child victim was telling the truth, but the expert's testimony did more than simply lay out the behavioral characteristics exhibited by victims of sexual assault or tell the jury what she had observed in treating the witness; some of the expert's testimony was of the kind permitted by the evidence rules, including her statement about the victim's emotionality and the difficulty witnesses have in recalling specific details, which appeared to be permissible, but the expert never offered any explanation for how it was that she was able to assess witness testimony and cross examination and there appeared to be no basis for her conclusion that the victim was as detailed as she could be or that her account was not diminished or exaggerated. The expert staked her professional reputation on her assessment of the case, which was essentially that the witness was telling the truth, and this application of whatever principles the expert used to assess the State's case and the testimony of the witness was for the jury to perform, such that the admission of the expert's testimony related to the truthfulness of the victim was error. Long v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8885 (Tex. App. Tyler Nov. 26 2008).

1243. Error of admitting expert testimony relating to the truthfulness of a witness, as the parties agreed in this case, is nonconstitutional error, and the appellate court reviews the entire record to see if the appellant's substantial rights were harmed, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), Tex. R. Evid. 103(a). Long v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8885 (Tex. App. Tyler Nov. 26 2008).

1244. While there was evidence of defendant's guilt of sexual assault of a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.011(a)(2)(A), this was not a case where a guilty verdict was the only likely outcome, and while the evidence was substantial, it was not overwhelming, and the court held that the error of admitting expert testimony related to the truthfulness of the victim harmed defendant's substantial rights under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); whether the victim was telling the truth was the singular issue in the trial, the expert testified that the victim testified truthfully, it was likely that this testimony was powerful, there were no instructions sought or given to explain how the jury was to use the expert's testimony, the State emphasized the expert's opinion in closing arguments, and the expert's testimony invaded the province of the jury in a fundamental way by putting the weight of expert opinion behind the conclusion that the complaining witness was telling the truth, and the court was not convinced that defendant's substantial rights were not harmed. Long v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8885 (Tex. App. Tyler Nov. 26 2008).

1245. Court properly admitted a latent fingerprint report because the officer had fifteen years experience, he testified regarding the numerous courses he had taken in fingerprint examination, and after reprinting defendant, the officer located fourteen characteristics between the print from the duct tape and defendant's print. Montez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7033 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 24, 2008).

1246. Defendant argued that a deputy's employment of the horizontal gaze nystagmus test was not reliable for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and the testimony was not only not helpful to the jury, but was misleading and unfairly prejudicial, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, 702, but defendant's objection, which referred broadly to the deputy's administration of the test, was not specific enough to have informed the trial court of the basis of the argument defendant now raised on appeal so as to have afforded the trial court the opportunity to rule on it, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 103; thus, defendant waived error, if any. Gowin v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6873 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 17 2008).

1247. In a personal injury action in which appellee truck driver pleaded a claim for negligent hiring against appellant foreign corporation by alleging that it hired a Texas corporation to deliver products to Texas when appellant retained control over the Texas corporation and knew or should have known that the Texas corporation employed an incompetent driver, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling appellant's objection to an affidavit and expert report drafted by a transportation expert for appellee where appellant had neither assailed the expert's scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge nor challenged whether his testimony was relevant and based on a reliable foundation. Furthermore, although appellant pointed the reviewing court to authority pertaining to affidavits in a summary judgment context, it did not explain why expert reports tendered at a special appearance hearing should have been held to the same standard as an affidavit presented at a summary judgment hearing. Ltd. Logistics Servs. v. Villegas, 268 S.W.3d 141, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6536 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

1248. In defendant's sexual assault case, the court did not err by denying a hearing on expert testimony because the underlying facts and data supporting the expert's opinion -- her education, training, and experience, years of clinical treatment of victims of family sexual abuse, and knowledge of Hispanic culture -- were not inadmissible. Merlos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6514 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26, 2008).

1249. In defendant's sexual assault case, the court properly found an expert to be qualified and her opinion to be reliable because the expert was trained and licensed as a psychologist and therapist, many of her clients were Hispanic, and she worked with children who were not raised in the United States. The expert explained the complexity of sexual abuse, especially involving incest, how children internalized and blamed themselves for the abuse, and that it took many years for a victim to work out the effects of sexual abuse. Merlos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6514 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26, 2008).

1250. Summary judgment was properly granted to health care providers in a medical malpractice case because an expert opinion relating to proximate causation was stricken; the expert offered no support for his opinion that the presence of two separate primary cancers resulted in a prognosis identical to the individual prognosis of the more serious cancer. Flores v. Eakin, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6456 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 22, 2008).

1251. Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing an expert to testify as to an opinion of defendant's mental state at the time of the offense because based on education and experience, the expert was qualified to testify as to what might or might not have contributed to defendant behavior at the time of the offenses. Additionally, the expert based the testimony upon the facts that defendant's story was inconsistent, he did not have a history of delusions, and his panic at being apprehended by police officers after the commission of the offenses was inconsistent with the delusion that one was God. Howard v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6431 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 21 2008).

1252. Defendant argued on appeal that a question to and an answer from a nurse examiner exceeded the scope of Tex. R. Evid. 702, 704 because they constituted improper opinion testimony regarding the victim's truthfulness, but because this objection did not comport with defendant's trial objection, he waived this complaint pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, plus the nurse offered the same testimony on seven previous occasions and on one subsequent occasion without objection from defendant, and the improper admission of evidence did not constitute reversible error if the same facts were shown by other evidence that was not challenged; even if defendant preserved his complaint, the nurse's testimony was proper because it was limited to her expert opinion on the physical findings that she observed and the record did not contain any evidence that would have supported a finding that the trial court would have abused its discretion in allowing the nurse's testimony if it had been presented with a proper objection. Jernigan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6310 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 14 2008).

1253. In an indecency with a child case, the court did not err by admitting expert testimony that none of the conduct prosecuted by the State involved "innocent" touching because the State's questions did not seek to provoke an opinion about the truthfulness of the victim, but to substantively establish that the touching was not innocent. Darling v. State, 262 S.W.3d 920, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6106 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2008).

1254. Expert testimony was not relevant to the ultimate issue before the jury and thus the trial court properly excluded this testimony as not relevant for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402 to the issue of the parties' intent regarding their agreement. Boulle v. Boulle, 254 S.W.3d 701, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3604 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

1255. Individual argued that the trial court erred in striking the individual's expert witness; however, there was nothing in the record showing an offer of proof, a bill of exception, or that the expert report was brought to the trial court's attention, and without an offer of proof, the individual failed to preserve the complaint for review. Bobbora v. Unitrin Ins. Servs., 255 S.W.3d 331, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2928 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

1256. Because a party did not make objections at trial regarding expert testimony, the party did not preserve this complaint for review. In re R.A.K., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2945 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 2008).

1257. Court properly precluded defendant's expert witness from testifying in his attempted indecency with a child trial regarding defendant's belligerent and threatening behavior at the time of his arrest because defendant did not offer the doctor as an expert to explain why defendant behaved the way he did at the time of his arrest; instead, defendant's focus was on qualifying the doctor to testify as an expert on the characteristics of sexual predators and characteristics of sexual abuse victims following outcry. Bejarano v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2762 (Tex. App.

El Paso Apr. 17 2008).

1258. Contrary to Tex. R. App. P. 38, the intended purchaser cited no authority for the claim that the trial court was required to hear an expert's testimony before ruling on its admissibility and the purchaser provided no argument regarding the relevancy of the excluded evidence to particular elements of his various causes, and thus he waived this issue; even absent waiver, the court found no abuse of discretion in the trial court's ruling, as the subject areas excluded by the trial court involved matters inappropriate for expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and the court found no merit in the challenge to the trial court's ruling limiting the testimony. Petras v. Criswell, 248 S.W.3d 471, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2017 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

1259. In defendant's capital murder case, the evidence was legally sufficient as to the issue of causation because the record reflected that a microscopic examination was conducted of the baby's skull, the expert's findings helped establish the date of the injury, and defendant did not dispute the method by which the expert conducted the microscopic examination. Villegas v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1899 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 13 2008).

1260. Because appellants did not object to the reliability of expert testimony in the trial court, the court's review of the evidence was limited to the face of the record. Hong v. Integrated Applications Eng'g, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1905 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 11 2008).

1261. Expert testimony was conclusory because the expert's opinions were not supported by the evidence; although the expert testified that he conducted an extensive review of many documents in reaching his conclusions, no exhibits were introduced during his testimony to support the damages calculations that he reached, the documents the expert relied upon could not be ascertained with reasonable certainty from certain reports that were admitted into evidence, and the supporting information the expert referenced either failed to sufficiently identify the origin on the data used in the expert's calculations or failed to explain the facts relied upon by the expert in reaching his conclusions. Hong v. Integrated Applications Eng'g, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1905 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 11 2008).

1262. Comments concerning appellees' beliefs did not constitute the type of objective facts or data required to support an expert's damages calculations. Hong v. Integrated Applications Eng'g, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1905 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 11 2008).

1263. Expert testimony did not support the damages awarded and the rest of the record did not support the damages; thus, reversal was required and a new trial ordered. Hong v. Integrated Applications Eng'g, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1905 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 11 2008).

1264. Appellate court could not conclude that the trial judge abused his discretion in excluding the testimony as expert witness testimony, because there was no showing that the witness's underlying scientific theory was valid, and the witness conceded as much when questioned by the State. Vela v. State, 251 S.W.3d 794, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1287 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

1265. In a cocaine possession case, defendant's failure to object to an officer's testimony that drug dealers often carried many small bills waived the issue under Tex. R. App. P. 33, and counsel was not ineffective for failing to challenge the testimony as Tex. R. Evid. 702 expert testimony because it was admissible as Tex. R. Evid. 701 opinion testimony. Hayes v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 747 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 1 2008).

1266. Although a manufacturer cited certain case law numerous times in its challenge to appellees' expert testimony, the manufacturer devoted just over two pages of its 50-page brief to those case law factors and instead challenged the expert's testimony as allegedly resting on multiple untested assumptions; the court therefore found that the manufacturer's argument primarily relied on the analytical gap test, plus the court found that test to be the appropriate way to analyze the expert testimony because it was based on the experience of the testifying experts. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 251 S.W.3d 88, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 356 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

1267. Bulk of manufacturer's expert testimony challenge was lodged against one expert, but the manufacturer made a passing reference against the reliability of a second expert's testimony; out of an abundance of caution, the court discussed the reliability of the second expert's testimony where appropriate, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 38. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 251 S.W.3d 88, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 356 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

1268. In a products liability action, an expert's lint ignition testimony was based on an objective observation of lint build-up in the dryer cabinet, independent observations supported the expert's testimony regarding how an ember survived to ignite the clothes in the dryer and then spread from the dryer, and this expert and another expert relied on objective criteria in the record and their own experience to conclude that the dryer caused the fire; while the manufacturer might have disagreed with their conclusions, the experts explained the basis for their opinions and based those opinions on objective facts, and the trial court did not err in admitting this evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 251 S.W.3d 88, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 356 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

1269. While a manufacturer's expert testimony might have been plausible, it was not conclusive, and appellees' expert's evidence contradicted the manufacturer's expert's testimony, and thus the manufacturer did not show that it conclusively disproved appellees' theories in its products liability case. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 251 S.W.3d 88, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 356 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

1270. Appellees' expert's testimony sufficiently linked his conclusions to the facts and there was at least some evidence, more than a scintilla, of the existence of a safer alternative design, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 82.005. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 251 S.W.3d 88, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 356 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

1271. Expert testimony offered on behalf of a consumer was admissible in a manufacturing defect case relating to an accident allegedly caused by a part of a truck coming apart because it was reliable in nature; the issues raised by a manufacturer during cross-examination went to the weight of the testimony, but not its admissibility; the testimony did not present a case where there was simply too great an analytical gap between the data and the opinion proffered, or where the expert's testimony amounted to nothing more than a recitation of his credentials and a subjective opinion. Ford Motor Co. v. Ledesma, 242 S.W.3d 32, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 1130, 51 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 250, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17894 (Tex. 2007).

1272. Using the analytical-gap analysis in a wrongful death action by appellees, a surviving spouse and children, against a hospital, a trial court could have concluded that the medical experience and knowledge of appellees' expert, and his explanation of the basis for his opinions, demonstrated that his testimony that the patient died of acute opiate toxicity that could have been avoided by monitoring the patient was reliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702. McAllen Hosps., L.P. v. Muniz, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9683 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 13 2007).

1273. For purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33, the court found that the "outside his range" objection was sufficient to have put the trial court on notice that defendant was challenging a doctor's credibility as an expert and the reliability of his testimony, especially given the trial court's response to the objection, and thus defendant lodged an adequate objection and presented the issue for review. Martin v. State, 246 S.W.3d 246, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9698 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1274. In defendant's trial for capital murder, a doctor was qualified to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 regarding a perpetrator's state of mind, given that (1) the doctor was an assistant professor of pediatrics, (2) he was triple board certified in pediatrics, pediatric emergency medicine, and pediatric infectious diseases, and (3) he experienced hundreds of injuries similar to the child's injuries and knew the injuries were generally consistent with child abuse; thus, he was qualified in regard to whether the injuries presented were intentional and not accidental injuries, such involved specialized knowledge and his testimony assisted the jury in understanding the evidence and determining the fact at issue, and under Tex. R. Evid. 704, the doctor was qualified to render his opinion on the ultimate issue of whether the child's injuries were intentionally inflicted. Martin v. State, 246 S.W.3d 246, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9698 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1275. Defendant's conviction for murder was proper because the trial court did not err by admitting an officer's testimony as a gang membership expert since the officer was qualified; the officer had been a certified peace officer for 11 years; he had over 3,000 hours of training directly involved with gang identification of prison and street gang members; and he had been a member of a gang investigators association for 12 years and had been with a gang task force for 13 years. Rivers v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8898 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 8 2007).

1276. On a no-evidence motion for summary judgment, an expert affidavit stating that a tenant's injury was caused by a particular dangerous condition of which the landlord knew or should have known should not have been stricken as conclusory because its conclusions were supported by scientific observations. Gillenwater v. Fort Brown Villas, III, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7145 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2007).

1278. Homeowners' expert's testimony was legally sufficient to support the homeowners' claims for damages because the expert's testimony was not conclusory. Sparks v. Booth, 232 S.W.3d 853, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6909 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

1279. In defendant's sexual assault on a child case, the court properly allowed a nurse to testify as an expert regarding the risk of HIV transmission during unprotected sex because the State offered testimony to establish that the nurse was qualified to testify about the matter. She was a nurse practitioner who specialized in infectious diseases, she received extensive training and education related to HIV, and she indicated that she was familiar with several studies establishing that there was a high risk of HIV transmission during unprotected sex. Henry v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6791 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 23 2007).

1280. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court properly allowed expert testimony by a nurse concerning her finding no trauma to the child's genitals in her examination because she was qualified by her knowledge, skill, experience, training, and education as an expert witness in the field of child sexual abuse; she testified that she relied on a study in reaching her opinion, and therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the nurse to testify about the results of the study. Archer v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 17 2007).

1281. Without having to determine whether the business records exception to the hearsay rule predicate was even necessary, so long as the document itself was not offered into evidence, the court found that testimony served as a sufficient predicate for admission of the evidence regarding the chemist's test; while one chemist did test the cocaine in question, no report was offered into evidence and it was proper for him to base his opinion on another chemist's test results. Alexander v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6260 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 9 2007).

1282. Grant of summary judgment in favor of the corporation in the homeowners' action for property damage from seismic surveys conducted by the corporation was appropriate because no evidence revealed the qualifications of three experts and the fourth lacked expertise in the areas most critical to establishing causation in the case; because of that, the appellate court was unable to say that the trial court would have abused its discretion had it excluded all four of the homeowners' witnesses based on the failure to prove the qualifications of their expert witnesses. Adair v. Veritas DGC Land, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6338 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 9 2007).

1283. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated sexual assault, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting opinion testimony from a pediatrician; the testimony the witness gave regarding her qualifications, experience, and education all went to her status as an expert for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702; no express words were required to offer the expert; the defense never objected that she was unqualified or that the subject matter of her testimony was inappropriate for expert testimony. Degollado v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6032 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 1 2007).

1284. Even if the parishioner's theory of limited unsound mind was valid, the parishioner's expert did not demonstrate any objective evidence or data that would support the conclusion that the parishioner was of unsound mind from 1985 until 2004; thus, the trial court abused its discretion in excluding the expert's testimony as unreliable. Ramirez v. Mansour, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6035 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 1 2007).

1285. Psychiatrist who had several years of experience working with sexually violent offenders and evaluating them for civil commitment was qualified as an expert in the field of psychiatry and qualified to testify that an individual had a behavioral abnormality that made him likely to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence; moreover, no analytical gap was shown in the psychiatrist's methodology. In re Zamora, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5852 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2007).

1286. Trial court properly sustained the objection to the admission of a chemist report prepared by the expert's employee and relied upon by the expert, but the trial court properly admitted the expert's testimony because it was not hearsay and was not required to be based on personal knowledge; even if the expert's testimony did improperly reveal underlying facts or data that were inadmissible, for which Tex. R. Evid. 705 would have required the trial court to give a limiting instruction upon request, no such instruction was requested and thus the trial court did not err in admitting the expert's testimony. Collins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6116 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 26 2007).

1287. In a condemnation proceeding, admission of appellee's expert testimony regarding temporary damages was not an abuse of discretion. Appellant State's analysis that a hotel needed only 75 percent of the total parking spaces was overly simplistic, as the hotel had on average 75 percent occupancy; according to the expert, on certain nights, the hotel might have 100 percent occupancy. State v. Bristol Hotel Asset Co., 293 S.W.3d 211, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5565 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

1288. In a condemnation proceeding as to hotel property, admission of appellee's expert testimony regarding permanent damages was not an abuse of discretion. According to appellant State, a civil engineer disputed the expert's testimony, testifying that reconfigured driveways were not safety concerns, and, as such, the State argued that there was no support for the expert's conclusion that the property diminished five percent; however, in reviewing the record, the court concluded that the engineer did not dispute the expert's assertion that the new drive would create a safety issue that did not exist before condemnation. State v. Bristol Hotel Asset Co., 293 S.W.3d

211, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5565 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

1289. In a case involving the commitment of a sexually violent predator, a request for a gatekeeper hearing was untimely where it was made after the substance of an expert's opinion had already been given. In re Commitment of Marks, 230 S.W.3d 241, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5424 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

1290. In a dispute involving a homestead exemption, experts were properly allowed to testify about the establishment, assertion, and abandonment of homestead protections in Texas, and there was no misstatements of the law made regarding homesteads. Wilcox v. Marriott, 230 S.W.3d 266, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5440 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

1291. Trial court could have reasonably found that an agent's testimony established both a computer program's reliability and the agent's qualifications to testify to that reliability, and thus the trial court properly admitted the agent's testimony in defendant's child pornography trial regarding the evidence obtained from defendant's computers; the agent had a college degree with majors in management information systems, he was certified in hardware and operating systems and Internet processing, he had worked for the Federal Bureau of Investigation for seven years and had received 200 hours of specialized training to become a certified forensic examiner, and his training including programs like the one in question. Krause v. State, 243 S.W.3d 95, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5461, 40 A.L.R.6th 711 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007), aff'd, Krause v. Leonard, 352 Fed. Appx. 933, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 24387 (5th Cir. Tex. 2009).

1292. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a fraud action in permitting one of a home health business's accountants to testify as an expert on the business members' alleged damages because his education, training, and experience in accounting and auditing in the field of Medicare-funded home-health agencies, as well as his exposure to business valuation in that specialized field qualified him to testify as an expert on damages pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702. Furthermore, the accountant's experience, coupled with his thorough testimony about the methodology he employed, demonstrated that the opinions he drew from the underlying data were reliable, and his damage models comported with the jury instruction concerning damages. Rogers v. Alexander, 244 S.W.3d 370, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5103 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

1293. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of defendant's expert on eyewitness identification because the expert's testimony was offered purely as educational material for the jury, which was insufficient to demonstrate that the scientific principles would assist the trier of fact in the case or were sufficiently tied to the pertinent facts of the case. Baldree v. State, 248 S.W.3d 224, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5057 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

1294. Trial court did not err by allowing the program director of a child advocacy center to testify as an expert because: (1) the field of expertise of characteristics and dynamics of sexually abused children was a legitimate one; (2) it was within the program director's scope of expertise to testify that she did not observe in the child victim's demeanor anything to indicate that she had been coached in her allegation against defendant and to discuss a phenomenon called delayed disclosure by victims of sexual assault; and (3) the program director listed journals and articles on which she relied for her opinions and testified that she participated in a peer review committee. Reynolds v. State, 227 S.W.3d 355, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4250 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

1295. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the evidence regarding the cadaver dogs was reliable and admissible because (1) the trainers were qualified to handle the cadaver dogs; (2) the dogs had been trained and certified as cadaver dogs; (3) the testimony of the witnesses established that the dogs had never falsely indicated human remains and that the dogs could consistently distinguish human remains from other scents; (4) each dog performed its search independently from the handlers, working off-lead; and (5) the dogs alerted to the same location that defendant had indicated the victim's body had been placed. Trejos v. State, 243 S.W.3d 30, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4045 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

1296. In a products liability and negligence lawsuit alleging that defective cellulose insulation caused a house fire, the deposition testimony and affidavit of the homeowners' expert witness were properly excluded because they were contradictory, contained conclusory allegations, and failed to rule out alternative causes of the fire; hence, there was no evidence of causation under either the proximate cause standard of negligence or the producing cause standard of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 82.005(a)(2). Jacob v. Int'l Cellulose Corp., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3314 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 27 2007).

1297. Trial court did not err in refusing to allow a defense expert to testify in the punishment phase of appellant's capital murder trial that appellant's use of alcohol and cocaine caused him to commit the crime because, in excluding the evidence, the trial court properly determined that appellant did not make the requisite showing of reliability under Tex. R. Evid. 702; the expert was permitted to testify about the correlation between alcohol and cocaine usage and violence, but she was not permitted to take the extra step of opining whether alcohol and drug dependence was related to appellant's violent conduct. Roberts v. State, 220 S.W.3d 521, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 429 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1298. In this personal injury lawsuit, even if the court assumed that the trial court erred in admitting certain expert testimony, the employees and their spouses failed to show that the ruling probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment; accepting any of the manufacturer's propositions could have resulted in the jury's "no" answer to the question of whether the manufacturer's negligence proximately caused the occurrence in question, and the verdict did not turn on the expert's testimony. Barfield v. SST Truck Co., L.L.C., 220 S.W.3d 206, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2908 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

1299. In an indecency with a child case, assuming the challenged testimony regarding the children's accounts of sexual abuse should not have been admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the admission of the evidence was not reversible error as other testimony relevant to the truthfulness of the children was admitted, without objection, through the same expert witnesses. Nabors v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2538 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 28 2007).

1300. Family was required to proffer the testimony of an expert witness as to whether a reasonable firefighter could have believed that he was justified in entering the intersection as the fireman did after weighing the risk of an accident against the need to respond to the alarm. Fireman was entitled to official immunity under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 108.002 because the fireman made an adequate showing that he acted in good faith; he activated his emergency lights and siren, slowed down as he approached the intersection, activated his air horn and looked in the direction of approaching traffic, and drove slowly through the intersection. Green v. Alford, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2342 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 27 2007).

1301. In a legal malpractice lawsuit, the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in excluding the testimony of an expert witness as conclusory because of a lack of legal support for the expert's asserted opinion that the order of the questions in the jury charge in the underlying negligence case should have been different. Juarez v. Elizondo, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2133 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 21 2007).

1302. Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding defendant's witness's testimony because the court was within its discretion to conclude that the witness was in fact being called as an expert in accident reconstruction, and although the witness's testimony revealed that he had significant experience investigating traffic accidents, he had no formal training in the field in nearly thirty years. Brown v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483 (Tex. App. Waco

Feb. 21 2007).

1303. Defendant objected on the basis of improper predicate and that a legal conclusion was asked for by the State, and although defendant did not use trigger words like "expert," "qualifications," and "relevance," the actual objection was specific enough to make the trial court aware of the complaint under Tex. R. Evid. 702, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). McKee v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 831 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 1 2007).

1304. Even though defendant properly made the trial court aware of the complaint, defendant did not provide specific grounds regarding why an officer was unqualified to testify as an expert, such that defendant failed to preserve for review any specific complaint about the officer's testimony regarding whether defendant used a vehicle as a deadly weapon under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1.07(a)(17)(B). McKee v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 831 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 1 2007).

1305. Defendant failed to note that his objection to a witness's testimony was largely sustained, and he failed to argue how any of the court-permitted questions elicited expert testimony; to the extent that the fact questions allowed did elicit expert testimony, such did not harm defendant, as the witness was listed as a regular witness and defendant had the chance to challenge him, plus defendant could have asked for a continuance to investigate, and thus the court overruled defendant's claim that the trial court erred in allowing expert testimony without first providing him proper notice. Sprouse v. State, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1862 (Tex. Crim. App. Jan. 31 2007).

1306. Trial court did not err in admitting the testimony of a landowner's expert witness in this eminent domain case on the issue of fair market value of the fee area, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702; the expert testified as to the highest and best use of the property, the expert used four comparable sales in the vicinity, and the court found that the testimony was relevant and reliable. City of Sugar Land v. Home & Hearth Sugarland, L.P., 215 S.W.3d 503, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 308 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

1307. Cost of a fence was admissible, not as a separate element of damage, but as information that could have been used by the jury to arrive at the diminished value of the remainder tract after the taking, if any; expert testimony regarding the value of the remainder before and after the taking was admissible and thus the trial court did not err in admitting it. City of Sugar Land v. Home & Hearth Sugarland, L.P., 215 S.W.3d 503, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 308 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

1308. Although the cost approach generally was less accurate the older a property was, in this case, less than one year had passed between the completion of construction and the date of the taking; the property was unique in character and not frequently exchanged in the market place, and the cost approach was a proper barometer for assessing market value of the tract before the taking, and thus the trial court did not err in admitting this expert testimony. City of Sugar Land v. Home & Hearth Sugarland, L.P., 215 S.W.3d 503, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 308 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

1309. In an eminent domain case, expert testimony as to safety and drainage issues was relevant and reliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702; the witness reviewed plans of the city's proposed regional detention pond, the existing pond on the landowner's property, depositions, and the manner in which other detention facilities were constructed. City of Sugar Land v. Home & Hearth Sugarland, L.P., 215 S.W.3d 503, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 308 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

1310. Party filed a pretrial motion to exclude certain expert testimony, and thus the issue was preserved for review. City of Sugar Land v. Home & Hearth Sugarland, L.P., 215 S.W.3d 503, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 308 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

1311. Trial court did not err by allowing the State to introduce an expert's testimony regarding post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and eye movement desensitization and reprocessing (EMDR) under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because based on the expert's testimony, the trial court could have found that he was qualified to testify; the expert demonstrated that he was familiar with PTSD and EMDR and that he had worked with victims of extended sexual abuse; the evidence demonstrated that PTSD was an accepted diagnosis in the medical community and that EMDR treatment was used and recognized in the fields of social work, psychiatry, and psychology. Bailey v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 208 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 11 2007).

1312. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in admitting expert witness testimony because the expert limited the testimony to the general characteristics of child victims of sexual abuse and whether hypothetical fact situations were consistent with sexual abuse, and other courts had upheld the admissibility of such testimony; the expert never claimed that the hypothetical child accusers were telling the truth or that all child victims in such cases tell the truth. Gauna v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11128 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 29 2006).

1313. Trial court abused its discretion by granting physician a directed verdict in medical malpractice action because the patient's expert stated during a deposition that the standard of care required the physician to administer a tissue plasminogen activator (TPA) within 15 minutes of his arrival at the hospital at 12:45 p.m. and that the physician breached the standard of care by failing to administer TPA to the patient until 2:25 p.m. The court further found that the expert's testimony also constituted some evidence of causation; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the expert's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Kelso v. Williamson, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10949 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 21 2006).

1314. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a continuance and by excluding the transcript of an expert's pretrial testimony because the expert's testimony was irrelevant to the knowledge of consent issue in defendant's trial for debit card abuse in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 32.31(b)(1)(A) and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 31.07(a); what the expert suggested regarding defendant's manic episode was not relevant to whether defendant believed at the time of the offense that the victim consented to defendant's use of the ambulance and debit card, there is no analogy to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) that makes mental illness evidence relevant to prosecutions for debit card abuse and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, and the expert's testimony did not tend to negate the culpable mental state for the offense but provided an excuse or explanation for defendant's intentional acts. Fleece v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10631 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 14 2006).

1315. When the appellate court in a sexual assault trial improperly evaluated the qualifications of a proposed defense expert, a certified legal nurse consultant, under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), 401, 402, and 702, and did not evaluate the reliability of the consultant's proposed testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and did not give proper deference to the trial judge's decision not to allow her to testify as an expert, the appellate court's judgment was vacated, and case was remanded to allow the appellate court to conduct a proper analysis. Vela v. State, 209 S.W.3d 128, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2384 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1316. Trial court did not err in excluding certain expert testimony because the witness admitted to lacking expertise in the matter about which the expert was to opine and thus the trial court could have inferred that the witness lacked experience and training in the field and was not qualified, or the trial court could have found that the reliability of the witness's experiment was suspect. Stringer v. Red River Commodities, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10617 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 13 2006).

1317. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the expert's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702, because the expert did not testify at the Robinson hearing to a methodology by which he reached his conclusion that the fire was caused by defects in the truck's fuel and battery systems; the expert's testimony did no more than set out

"factors" and "facts" that were consistent with his opinions and then conclude that the fire began with diesel fuel from the truck. Mack Trucks v. Tamez, 206 S.W.3d 572, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 1074, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 80 (Tex. 2006).

1318. Appellate court could not consider an expert's testimony from the bill of exceptions in determining whether the trial court erred in excluding his causation testimony because it did not first determine, pursuant to properly assigned error, that the trial court erred in refusing to admit the testimony. Mack Trucks v. Tamez, 206 S.W.3d 572, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 1074, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 80 (Tex. 2006).

1319. Court did not err in admitting a utility company's expert testimony as to the market value of the condemned property in which he did not factor in the improvements that were over 4000 feet from the power lines in assessing damages because, inter alia, the landowners' own expert relied upon several articles that specifically stated the negative impact of power lines to a property diminished with increased distance and disappeared beyond 500 feet. Utley v. LCRA Transmission Servs. Corp., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9129 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 25 2006).

1320. In an aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child case, defendant's trial counsel was not ineffective because (1) although the complainant's hearsay statements to her mother and sister did not satisfy the outcry exception to the hearsay rule under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.072, the same testimony had been previously admitted without objection and thus any harmful testimony was merely cumulative; and (2) defendant's counsel was not ineffective in failing to object to a police officer's testimony because the officer's testimony was admissible under the expert witness rule, Tex. R. Evid. 702, based on her three months of training and approximately 100 hours of classes in child abuse investigation, sexual abuse investigation, suspect interrogation, and interviewing. Castillo v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8790 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 12 2006).

1321. Court had a silent record as to counsel's reasons, but it was plausible that counsel could have sought to avoid drawing any further attention to certain alleged extraneous offenses, and the lay witness testimony concerning the victim's veracity would have been admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) and the expert testimony complained of was elicited by defendant on cross-examination, such that defendant failed to show ineffective assistance of counsel. Najar v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8499 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 28 2006).

1322. In a criminal prosecution for DWI, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by granting the defendant's motion in limine to prohibit expert testimony relating to the HGN test; the officer deviated from the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration standards by flicking his finger on the pen during the test; therefore, the results were not reliable pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702. State v. Trinidad, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8180 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 13 2006).

1323. In defendant's murder trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02, the trial court did not err in permitting a witness, an assistant warden, to testify that a fan motor wrapped in a sock was a deadly weapon as defined in Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1.07 (a)(17)(A), (B); the court first noted that it was not immediately apparent that the testimony was expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and assuming that the witness was an expert, the witness was entitled to offer an opinion on the matter, given that (1) the witness was qualified as an expert by virtue of the witness's knowledge and experience in the prison system, (2) the witness observed the weapon and the injuries inflicted and the witness's experience was related to the issue at hand, and (3) the witness's testimony was helpful to the jury. Tamez v. State, 205 S.W.3d 32, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7961 (Tex. App. Tyler 2006), aff'd, 344 Fed. Appx. 897, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 20231 (5th Cir. 2009), cert. denied, 130 S. Ct. 1523, 176 L. Ed. 2d 127, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 1489 (U.S. 2010).

1324. In a medical malpractice action against a surgeon in which the patient claimed that the surgeon damaged his vocal chord nerve during thoracic surgery to remove the patient's thymus gland, the trial court did not commit reversible error in finding that there was not too great an analytical-gap between the expert's opinions and the basis upon they were founded and in, therefore, admitting the expert's challenged testimony regarding the possibility that the patient's injury to his left vocal chord was caused during intubation not surgery. Halim v. Ramchandani, 203 S.W.3d 482, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7815 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

1325. Where a domestic violence victim originally told police she was jumped by girls at a bar, then later testified that defendant, her fiancee, had assaulted her, the testimony of an expert witness regarding the typical behavior of domestic violence victims was proper because an average juror would not know how typical victims of domestic violence behave. Capello v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7551 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25 2006).

1326. Sufficient evidence supported defendant's conviction of the murder of his roommate under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02 where conflicting evidence was presented and the jury chose to reject defendant's testimony and credit the consistent testimony of two disinterested witnesses who stated they saw defendant repeatedly stab the victim and who were familiar with the roommates; also, expert testimony on eyewitness misidentification was properly excluded because even if the expert's testimony was reliable and relevant, the expert did not apply his abstract theories to the specific facts of the case; therefore the excluded expert testimony would have had little probative effect and was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Rodriguez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6650 (Tex. App. Dallas July 27 2006).

1327. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, an expert's testimony was properly excluded because the opinion the expert wanted to give the jury was essentially that the victim's testimony was not credible. Denton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6662 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 27 2006).

1328. In defendant's intoxication manslaughter case, the trial court did not err by allowing the State's drug recognition expert to testify, over objection, regarding defendant's intoxication even though the expert had performed none of the tests required in order to form his expert opinion because he was testifying based on the documents in the file including the blood test, as well as his knowledge of how cocaine affected the human body; the witness told the court that the knowledge and experience he had gained in face-to-face interviews could be applied to subjects he had not observed firsthand. Bumgarner v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6066 (Tex. App. Tyler July 12 2006).

1329. In defendant's murder case, a court did not err by allowing a police officer to testify as to the inconsistencies between defendant's two videotaped statements because the officer's analysis contained some expertise that, based on his skill and training, could assist and guide the jury in its task. Brown v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5163 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

1330. Because defendant's brief did not explain how a witness was qualified as an expert on blood alcohol concentration or how the testing methodology was scientifically reliable and relevant based on its similarity to the facts in issue, given the jury charge of intoxication in defendant's driving while intoxicated trial, the court had no basis to find that the trial court abused its discretion in excluding the testimony for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Evans v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5027 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 13 2006).

1331. In defendant's sexual abuse of a child trial, expert testimony was relevant to correct defendant's potentially misleading argument, the expert was not permitted to give an opinion that the victim was sexually abused, and the expert was limited to testifying about whether the physical examination ruled out the possibility of abuse; because there was no indication that the expert's testimony was unfairly prejudicial or confusing, the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Estes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5028 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 13 2006).

1332. Defendant failed to preserve error regarding an expert's testimony pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33, given that (1) defendant's objection to any of the expert's testimony was overly broad and untimely, and (2) defendant's objection on appeal differed substantially from that raised at trial, and thus any error was waived; even if the error was properly preserved, the testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 803(4), and defendant did not object or identify any out-of-court statement that was made for purposes other than medical diagnosis and treatment, and thus the trial court did not err in overruling defendant's hearsay objection. Estes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5028 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 13 2006).

1333. In defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the State's expert testimony was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and Tex. R. Evid. 703; the expert's testimony was sufficiently tied to the facts of the case to assist the trier of fact in assessing the significance of the results of the victim's physical examination. Estes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5028 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 13 2006).

1334. Where an injured seaman brought suit to recover damages from a maritime company, a life care planner was qualified to testify as an expert witness on actual medical costs; he had thirty years of experience in health care management for people with disabilities and a masters degree in rehabilitation counseling; the expert testified regarding the specific basis and methodology for his opinion. SeaRiver Maritime, Inc. v. Pike, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4905 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 8 2006).

1335. In a wrongful death action, based on a witness's qualifications, research, group studies, and analysis of the facts of the case, the witness opined that an employee's fatigue was the cause of an accident, and the witness's testimony regarding qualifications and research exceeded the level of speculation and subjective observation, such that the trial court did not err in admitting the witness's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Escoto v. Estate of Ambriz, 200 S.W.3d 716, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4961 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006), rev'd on other grounds, 288 S.W.3d 401, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 394 (2009).

1336. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting landowners' expert's testimony, which valued the State's temporary access easement in this condemnation action; the improvements on the property existed and were producing income, the landowners introduced evidence establishing the income produced, the expert based his testimony on the evidence, such that the expert's testimony was not speculative, and the State had the chance to challenge the expert's methodology and submit its own evidence valuing the easement during its case-in-chief. Chitwood v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4545 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 25 2006).

1337. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in the admission of a doctor's testimony that photographs of the crime scene suggested direct-flame contact on the bodies; the trial court reasonably found that: (1) because of his training and experience, the doctor qualified as an expert on burn injuries, (2) burn injuries and any attendant damage was an appropriate area for expert testimony because lay persons were typically not versed in the area, and (3) the doctor's specialized knowledge would assist the jury. Springsteen v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2340 (Tex. Crim. App. May 24 2006).

1338. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, a police officer's testimony that a 14-year old girl did not fit the profile of a prostitute was admissible in an inmate's trial on charges of kidnapping where (1) the officer had extensive experience in the child exploitation unit; and (2) the inmate's attorney made an issue of whether the girl was a prostitute, thereby entitling the state to ask the officer's opinion on the issue, in light of his training, experience, and knowledge of the girl. Jordan v. Dretke, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31950 (N.D. Tex. May 22 2006).

1339. In a driving while intoxicated case, an officer's testimony that he was certified to perform field sobriety testing, coupled with his testimony that defendant did not have the normal use of his physical and mental faculties, was permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Cates v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4238 (Tex. App. Dallas May 17 2006).

1340. Motion to strike an expert witness's testimony based on his lack of qualifications, which is made after the witness has testified, can serve as a renewed objection to the trial court's earlier ruling that the witness was qualified; in these circumstances, an appellate court reviews the trial court's ruling based upon all of the evidence before the court at the time of the motion to strike. Rodgers v. State, 205 S.W.3d 525, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 852 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1341. Even though the appellate court erred by limiting the scope of its review to those questions asked of the expert initially during voir dire and excluding testimony developed during defendant's subsequent cross-examination of the expert, it correctly determined that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the expert's testimony, as testimony concerning shoe and tire print comparisons had long been admissible by either lay or expert witnesses, the jury heard descriptions of the physical comparisons upon which the expert based his conclusions, and the exhibits the expert relied on for his physical comparisons were admitted into evidence and were available to the jury during its deliberations; the jury could make its own comparisons. Rodgers v. State, 205 S.W.3d 525, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 852 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1342. Trial court did not err by allowing the State's expert to testify that the probability that the fire was ignited by an electrical spark in the air conditioner or refrigerator was extremely low because the matters defendant complained of went to the weight of the expert's testimony and not its admissibility. The expert was clearly qualified and explained his conclusion about the probability of ignition sources in scientific terms, based on known principles of movement, distribution, and concentration of gas vapors. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

1343. Trial court did not err by allowing the State's expert to testify that defendant's burns were consistent with someone reaching down with the right arm near where an accelerant had been poured because the expert was a medical examiner who had conducted numerous autopsies on burn victims. The testimony was not highly technical or beyond the realm of general medical knowledge based upon observation and some basic principles pertaining to burns to the skin. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

1344. Trial court did not err by allowing the State's expert to testify that one of the children killed in the house fire set by defendant had been sexually abused because: (1) the expert's opinion was not based upon an area of medical science that was highly technical or theoretical; (2) he drew his conclusions from the nature of the physical injuries presented and the circumstances surrounding the patient; (3) as a medical doctor, he was qualified to do the physical examination of the child and make a diagnosis, and he explained with clarity the basis for his opinion; and (4) although he was not an expert in sexual assault cases, his opinion was confirmed by another medical professional who was. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

1345. Trial court did not err by allowing the State's expert to testify that it was more likely than not that defendant would commit future acts of criminal violence because: (1) as a board certified psychiatrist with years of experience and specializing in forensic psychology, the expert was shown to be qualified; (2) while making predications about future behavior was controversial among psychiatrists, forensic psychiatry was a legitimate and recognized field by the American Psychiatric Association; and (3) the expert testified that his method of assessing future-dangerousness was considered valid. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

1346. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the State's expert's testimony had a reliable scientific basis because the expert's testimony addressed nearly all of the seven considerations for the trial court, demonstrating that the technique for determining what started the fire was well-accepted as valid, explaining the theory and technique with clarity and focus, showing evidence of his experience and training, and explaining how he applied those to his investigation of the instant case. Common sense dictated that some speculation was involved in attempting to reconstruct a scene that was destroyed by fire or in assessing a burn injury based on numerous variables, but this went to the weight of the evidence, rather than its admissibility. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

1347. Expert's affidavit, cover letter, and exhibit were the only evidence of an alleged defect in a lamp, and the court held that the expert did not provide the underlying facts to support the expert's conclusion; the expert stated that an electrical failure occurred at the socket base/switch assembly and that the fire resulted from a resistive heating failure, but the court found these statements to be conclusory and thus were not evidence. Gonzales v. Shing Wai Brass & Metal Wares Factory, Ltd., 190 S.W.3d 742, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10848 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

1348. Witness was a licensed advanced nurse practitioner, as defined in Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 301.152(a), and the witness was governed by the Texas Nursing Practice Act, which prohibited the witness from acts of medical diagnosis; the witness was unqualified to give an opinion on the medical cause of a decedent's injuries in this case and thus the witness's testimony was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Estate of Mann v. Geriatric Servs., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10856 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 14 2005).

1349. Defendant's conviction for the felony offense of injury to a child younger than 15 years of age was appropriate because, although he contended that a physician's testimony about the typical types of injuries that resulted from child abuse was irrelevant, the court held that the information was likely to assist the jury in determining whether his son's injuries were the result of abuse, as permitted by Tex. R. Evid. 702. Valdez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10217 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 8 2005).

1350. Court properly allowed an officer to testify regarding defendant's gang affiliation because he was a sergeant at the jail and a member of a gang unit, he verified gang affiliation by reading correspondence, checking visitation logs, and checking for tattoos, and he attended training regarding gang membership and identification. Booth v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2351, 2014 WL 887286 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 28 2014).

1351. Court properly allowed an officer to testify as to the rate of speed of the vehicles and traffic offenses committed by defendant because he relied on footage of the collision from a surveillance video, his personal observations of the scene, and measurements that he took from the scene. The officer also measured the skid marks created by the victim's vehicle and plugged those measurements into a formula published by a university in accident reconstruction manuals. Booth v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2351, 2014 WL 887286 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 28 2014).

1352. During defendant's trial for DWI, defendant's stepfather, an attorney, did not qualify as an expert witness because he conceded that his practice in administrative enforcement did not include DWIs or alcohol-related offenses. Brewer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1992, 2014 WL 709549 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 21 2014).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Court-Appointed Experts : General Overview

1353. There was evidence showing that counsel's decision not to seek appointment of an expert in the mother's termination case was based on trial strategy, and there was nothing showing that this decision was not sound; the mother did not argue how an expert could have helped her or that the result of the proceedings would have been different had an expert been appointed, and thus the mother's claim of ineffective assistance failed. Crowden v. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 563, 2009 WL 214581 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 29 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Court-Appointed Experts : Appointments

1354. Appellant's motion for appointment of an expert sought assistance on a narrow ground about proper extrapolation of appellant's blood alcohol concentration, but there was no indication that the State intended to offer extrapolation opinion testimony requiring expert rebuttal by appellant; thus, the trial court did not err in failing to appoint an expert on extrapolation. Mason v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2817, 2011 WL 1432194 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 14 2011).

1355. Appellant presented no explanation of his theory of defense, how an expert would be useful to establish that theory, or a reason to question a State's expert, and thus appellant did not meet the threshold requirement for appointment of the requested expert. Mason v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2817, 2011 WL 1432194 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 14 2011).

1357. Because appellant was not entitled to appointment of an expert, an analysis of another issue regarding ineffective assistance was unnecessary to the final disposition of this appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 47.1. Mason v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2817, 2011 WL 1432194 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 14 2011).

1358. Trial court conducted a hearing and found that the reporter's record was accurate, and defendant was allowed to present testimony that the record was inaccurate, and the court was unable to say that the trial court abused its discretion by determining an expert was not necessary to present or explain this claim. Mata v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2319 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Court-Appointed Experts : Compensation

1359. Given that the trial court ultimately granted defendant the requested funds to retain experts, defendant was clearly incorrect to the extent that he contended that he was denied the means to retain the experts. Guerrero v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1837 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 13 2008).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Credibility

1360. In a case alleging fraud in relation to the sale of certain assets, an appellate court did not have to decide the evidentiary value of the actual sales price because other evidence in the record was sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict. The jury was free to accept a former husband's expert, who testified about value and criticized the underpinnings of another expert's opinions; a former wife and a company did not satisfy their burden of showing that the assets were worth more than a one million dollar sales price. Coates v. Coates, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1790, 2009 WL 679592 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 17 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Credibility : General Overview

1361. Legally sufficient evidence supported the finding of $90,000 in enhanced market value caused by construction of a permanent improvement to the land because the expert's testimony established his thoroughness in appraising the land with and without improvements, his testimony was grounded in a sound evidentiary basis, was detailed and not conclusory. Mason v. Mason, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 413, 2014 WL 199649 (Tex. App.

Amarillo Jan. 13 2014).

1362. In a child custody proceeding, a father's complaint about an expert's testimony was not preserved for review because the father failed to object to the expert's testimony until after she testified on direct examination, and she had been cross-examined. In re D.C.M., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6774 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 9, 2008), overld in part, Tucker v. Thomas, 405 S.W.3d 694, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9991 (Tex. App.--Houston [14th Dist.] 2011, pet. granted).

1363. In an election contest under Tex. Elec. Code Ann. § 221.003(a), a trial court was not required to accept the opinion of an expert concerning the unreliability of electronic voting devices where he admitted that he had not examined or tested any machines used in the county; his conclusions were unsupported by any analysis or reasoning, and a county elections administrator testified to the contrary by pointing to the fact that signature rosters almost perfectly matched the number of paper votes. The trial court found that the election day count was valid; even if a court-supervised recount was accurate, the benefit to the incumbent was insufficient to affect the outcome of the election. Flores v. Cuellar, 269 S.W.3d 657, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6610 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2008).

1364. Given that a jury was deadlocked for hours over an issue of witness credibility, the trial court did not err in discharging the jury under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.31 and declaring a mistrial, and because there was a manifest necessity for the mistrial, a retrial would not constitute double jeopardy under Tex. Const. art. I, § 14 and the trial court properly denied the individual's motion for habeas corpus relief; the case against the individual of operating a watercraft while intoxicated did not require the jury to analyze the expert testimony regarding the intoxication tests, but merely to decide the relative credibility of the witnesses, the time spent adducing evidence regarding the identity of the boat's operator and other matters approximately equaled the time the jury spent deliberating, and given the time spent deliberating the one issue of witness credibility, over six hours, and considering that notes indicated that the jury remained deadlocked even after receiving an Allen charge, the trial court did not err in declaring a mistrial. Ex parte Underwood, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3380 (Tex. App. Austin May 8 2008).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Criminal Trials

1365. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony of a clinical supervisor at the Dallas Children's Advocacy Center as expert testimony because she was qualified as she had a bachelor's degree in psychology, a master's degree in counseling and development, and had been licensed in Texas as a professional counselor for over seven years, and she was familiar with, and kept current on, the literature and research in the field of child sexual abuse; and her testimony was specialized and scientific and would assist the jury to understand the evidence or to determine the facts at issue as she testified regarding delayed outcry and the wide range of symptoms and behavioral changes in children who had been abused. Cabrera v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7033 (Tex. App. Dallas June 27 2014).

1366. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of the victim's primary case physician as a lay witness, and therefore he did not have to be qualified as an expert to render an opinion about whether the victim was disabled, because the physician's testimony was based on his perception of the victim and his opinion was helpful to the jury in determining the factual issue of the victim's status as a disabled individual and did not require significant expertise to interpret. Edwards v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5677 (Tex. App. Austin May 29 2014).

1367. Defendant was not was denied the right to present a full defense when the trial court refused to allow his DNA expert to testify regarding lab bias because the expert's proposed testimony was not relevant to the issues before the jury; absent any evidence of lab bias, the substance of the proposed testimony-that context could influence experts and that all human beings had bias-was more appropriate for cross-examination than for expert testimony. Millage v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3801, 2014 WL 1407331 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 8 2014).

1368. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in overruling his objection to a police detective's qualifications as an expert. The detective testified that she had investigated sex crimes against children for four and a half years; she had 4,000 hours of training and education in the area of child sexual abuse; and she had taken 20 classroom hours at the world's largest conference about crimes against children. Washington v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 933 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 30 2014).

1369. At defendant's trial for assault of a family member, the trial court did not err by admitting expert testimony regarding the "cycle of violence" because it consisted of specialized information valuable to assist the jury in understanding why the complainant recanted her previous statement. Because defendant did not object to the expert testimony as bolstering or to the testimony that the complainant was "minimizing," these arguments were waived on appeal/ Pritchard v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 365, 2014 WL 119003 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 14 2014).

1370. Expert testimony on victim recantation was properly admitted during defendant's trial for injuring his elderly father where the expert witness, a caseworker in the family criminal law division of the district attorney's office, was qualified to testify as an expert because she detailed her experience working with victims of domestic violence and dealing with their tendency to minimize or recant allegations of abuse; the expert's testimony was relevant to understanding why the complainant might have changed his account of the incident that led to defendant's prosecution. Salinas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14761, 2013 WL 6328863 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 5 2013).

1371. Trial court properly allowed a crime laboratory chemist to testify as to the pharmacological effects of a particular prescription drug on the human body because the field of expertise necessary was not particularly complex, and because the chemist stated that she was familiar with the drug and had taken courses on the toxicological effects of drugs on the body; moreover, the information the chemist provided was not conclusive on a material issue and was not central in determining defendant's guilt or innocence. Ruiz v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14013, 2013 WL 6047030 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 14 2013).

1372. Admission of expert testimony regarding the connection between a photograph of a child and sexual arousal did not affect defendant's substantial rights because there was evidence of images of children on various devices owned by defendant, one of the devices contained a video of defendant with the victim, and the images were purposefully placed on defendant's devices. Hoard v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11760 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 18 2013).

1373. Where defendant was convicted of possession of one to four grams of a controlled substance based on methamphetamine found in the car during a traffic stop, an expert's opinion that the sergeant's failure to follow police procedure suggested that the drugs were planted in the car was inadmissible. Because the expert did not explain why the sergeant's acts were suspicious or why they led to the conclusion that the drugs were planted, there was not a sufficient basis for an expert opinion. Nickols v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11241 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 30 2013).

1374. In defendant's aggravated assault case, the court properly excluded the testimony of defendant's expert witness, a pharmacist, regarding side effects of failure of defendant to take his anti-depressant because her opinion was based solely on the list of possible side effects provided by the manufacturer, and any of the side effects reported were less than one percent of all cases. There were no reported cases of violence that she knew of, and she could not say that the stoppage of an anti-depressant would directly cause violence. Randle v. State, 2013 Tex.

App. LEXIS 3134, 2013 WL 1188647 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 21 2013).

1375. Trial court acted within its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon in admitting the victim's medical records without expert testimony because Tex. R. Evid. 803(6) plainly authorized the admission of the medical records without any witness, and while the State might have offered expert testimony to explain the medical records to the jury, Tex. R. Evid. 702 did not require such testimony. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2250, 2013 WL 857252 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 7 2013).

1376. Where defendant was convicted of four counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by permitting his probation officer to give expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 about defendant's suitability for probation. The probation officer had worked for the county for 12 years, had supervised sex offenders for 5 years, was supervising about 40 probationers, met with his probationers and did field visits. Alcala v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 285 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 11 2013).

1377. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault and endangering a child in permitting a State witness to testify as an expert witness where the witness's expertise fit with the subject matter at issue, which was whether the damages to the victims' vehicles were consistent with their accounts of how the damage occurred. The witness had seventeen years of experience in the automotive industry and thirteen years of experience as an estimator for damaged vehicles, and his testimony did not involve a complex subject, but rather consisted of matching up paint transfer and damages to the victims' vehicles with damages to defendant's truck. Ibarra v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 169, 2013 WL 123705 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 10 2013).

1378. In a prosecution for injury to a child, it was proper to admit bite-mark evidence, despite a report that found inherent weaknesses involved in bite mark comparison, because the evidence was used for a purpose the report deemed reliable--to exclude suspects in a closed population. Coronado v. State, 384 S.W.3d 919, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9405 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 14 2012).

1379. Although appellant claimed the evidence in his aggravated robbery trial was insufficient because there was a lack of expert testimony showing that the knife was a deadly weapon, under similar facts, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals had held the evidence sufficient without the knife being introduced into evidence and minus expert testimony concerning the wounds; the court overruled appellant's issue on appeal. Almanza v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5004, 2012 WL 2378233 (Tex. App. Eastland June 21 2012).

1380. On appeal of defendant's conviction for indecency with a child by contact, defendant claimed the trial court erred by permitting a detective to testify that he had no concerns that the case was made up, because Tex. R. Evid. 702 did not permit an expert to give an opinion that the complainant was truthful. The Court of Appeals of Texas found nothing to show that this testimony affected defendant's substantive rights under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Taylor v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1663, 2012 WL 662373 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 1 2012).

1381. Appellant argued that excluded evidence would have been admissible had it been introduced through expert testimony, but appellant did not show that counsel's decision not to employ an expert was not part of sound trial strategy. Chalker v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8944, 2011 WL 5428970 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2011).

1382. Court had to assume, absent contrary evidence, that counsel's decision not to hire an expert was propelled by sound trial strategy, and there was no claim that counsel's decision was an economic one; the expert did not discuss any potential exculpatory evidence or identify any testimony that would have supported the defense, appellant had not proven that counsel's level of consultation and investigation was unreasonable, and appellant failed to show that counsel's decision not to call an expert was not part of sound strategy, such that appellant's ineffective assistance counsel claim failed. Chalker v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8944, 2011 WL 5428970 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2011).

1383. Although the record reflected that a therapist originally offered a direct opinion on the child-complainant's truthfulness in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 702, defendant objected to that testimony, and received a favorable ruling from the trial court and an instruction to the jury to disregard the testimony; thus, there was no error and no harm from the therapist's testimony. Conti v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8758, 2011 WL 5248348 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 3 2011).

1384. Sexual abuse victim's counselor did not testify regarding the truthfulness of the victim; under Tex. R. Evid. 702, it was permissible for the counselor to testify regarding behavioral characteristics common among abused children and to give her expert opinion regarding the victim's delayed disclosure. Sharp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5377, 2011 WL 2732518 (Tex. App. Eastland July 14 2011).

1385. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony of a Texas Child Protective Services (CPS) caseworker regarding the sexual abuse victim's sister's acting out based upon her experience as a CPS caseworker and because defendant failed to present any argument as to the caseworker's qualifications or her testimony being in violation of Rule 702. Sharp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5377, 2011 WL 2732518 (Tex. App. Eastland July 14 2011).

1386. In a child sexual abuse case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a) in finding that a forensic interviewer who videotaped an interview with the victim testified as a lay witness under Tex. R. Evid. 701 by describing the events she personally observed. Because the witness did not testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, notice was not required under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 39.14(b), and there was no need to lay an expert predicate. Flood v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5409, 2011 WL 2732608 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 14 2011).

1387. In a child sexual abuse case, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in permitting expert testimony on grooming of child victims. Teczar v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2919, 2011 WL 1743756 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 15 2011).

1388. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child, a child forensic interviewer's testimony about behavioral characteristics of child sexual abuse victims was permitted under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because it was relevant to assessing the victim's behavior and testimony, and to determining the ultimate issue of whether defendant was guilty of the charged offense. The expert did not offer a direct opinion that the victim was truthful. Dison v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2809, 2011 WL 1435201 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 14 2011).

1389. Issue was whether the officer had probable cause to arrest appellant for driving under the influence based on the totality of the circumstances; thus, the court did not agree that the State was required to produce expert testimony on the effect of Xanax on appellant's condition. Sada v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 743, 2011 WL 381739 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 2 2011).

1390. At the revocation hearing, a police officer was permitted to testify over objection that the results of a field test indicated the substance found on the two objects in defendant's possession contained methamphetamine; while defendant challenged the officer's qualifications to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, any error in the admission of the officer's testimony was harmless in light of the evidence supporting the revocation of defendant's community supervision. Defendant admitted he was using methamphetamine, and an officer found him in possession of drug paraphernalia in violation of the terms of his community supervision. Kessler v. State, 2011

Tex. App. LEXIS 606, 2011 WL 317673 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 28 2011).

1391. In a case involving fraudulent Medicare and Medicaid reimbursement for motorized wheelchairs, the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 702 in allowing two witnesses for the State to testify about whether recipients qualified for a wheelchair under Medicare guidelines where neither witness gave an opinion regarding the "medical necessity" of a wheelchair or a power wheelchair. Instead, based on their knowledge of, and experience interpreting, Medicare guidelines, they opined recipients did not qualify, or were not eligible, for wheelchairs. Nwosoucha v. State, 325 S.W.3d 816, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8831, 79 A.L.R.6th 673 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 4 2010).

1392. Where the victim and her mother recanted their allegations against defendant during his trial for two counts of indecency with a child, an expert witness was permitted to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 702 that there was an eighty percent chance that a child complainant would recant. The expert testimony assisted the jury in assessing the victim's testimony. Chavez v. State, 324 S.W.3d 785, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7325 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 2 2010).

1393. Walk-and-turn and one-leg-stand tests were not scientific evidence; the officer's testimony was lay witness testimony governed by Tex. R. Evid. 701, and while she described the tests and indicated what clues meant a person was intoxicated and how many clues appellant indicated, such did not cross the line into expert testimony, and the trial court did not err in allowing this testimony in appellant's driving while intoxicated trial. Horton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7296, 2010 WL 3433776 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2010).

1394. Because an officer's testimony was lay witness testimony, and therefore the expert standard did apply, the trial court did not wrongfully place the burden of proof on appellant to show her weight at the time of her arrest for driving while intoxicated. Horton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7296, 2010 WL 3433776 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2010).

1395. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it allowed a therapist with the Children's Rape Crisis and Children's Advocacy Center to testify as an expert on the effects that sexual abuse could have on child victims where the State established that the therapist had the knowledge, skill, experience, training, and education that would qualify him to give an opinion on the particular subject before the trial court because, at the time of trial, the therapist had been employed by the Center for over five years and was a licensed professional counselor. In view of the therapist's background and the admissibility of such matters generally, the State had demonstrated the reliability underlying his testimony, which was based upon his practice and experience. Cottrell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5890, 2010 WL 2862610 (Tex. App. Eastland July 22 2010).

1396. Diminished capacity at the time, mitigating factors that are now relevant in terms of the effects of drugs taken, remorse, and adjustment to incarceration are factors that could be taken into account in determining future dangerousness; appellant's attempt to draw a distinction between these topics and a State expert's opinion as to future dangerousness conflicted with the underlying rationale for the case law about a defendant waiving his Fifth Amendment right to refuse to submit to a State's psychiatric experts once the defendant had introduced testimony based on his own interview with his own expert. Davis v. State, 313 S.W.3d 317, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1397. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon and unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon by admitting expert testimony regarding gang activity where the expert's testimony in the Tex. R. Evid. 705 hearing described his years of professional experience and training, and he testified that his opinion that defendant is or was a gang member was based on his experience with gangs, defendant's admissions to unknown contact officers, photographs of defendant, and defendant's tattoo. In light of the evidence at the time of the Tex. R. Evid. 702 ruling, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the expert was qualified to testify as an expert, and it therefore could not be concluded that the evidence that defendant was or is a gang member affected the jury in an irrational way. Burleson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3250 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 29 2010).

1398. In defendant's capital murder trial, defendant's mental-illness evidence did not rebut the culpable mental state of intentional or knowing conduct or raise any legal justification or exoneration for the murders, plus defendant offered no evidence to suggest that he intended to shoot anyone other than the officers he killed, which would have rebutted the element that elevated murder to capital murder, and defendant offered no evidence to suggest that he did not intend to shoot a person, which would have rebutted the culpable mental element of either capital murder or murder; the trial judge was not required to admit any expert testimony concerning defendant's mental illness during the guilt stage because it did not directly rebut his culpable mens rea, defendant was not entitled to any jury instruction concerning that evidence, and having requested one, he had not shown harm when the trial court gave a correct, if unnecessary, instruction concerning the use of that evidence. Mays v. State, 318 S.W.3d 368, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 480 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1399. In a case in which a jury found that defendant juvenile engaged in delinquent conduct by committing the offenses of aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, the trial court did not err in excluding certain testimony of various witnesses and did not prevent defendant from fully presenting his defensive theory where: (1) the proffered testimony of the victim's mother as set forth in defendant's bill of exceptions was properly excluded as speculative pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 602; (2) the victim's mother was not shown to be qualified as an expert to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 702; (3) at trial, defendant was allowed to question the victim and her sister regarding the meeting they allegedly had with their grandparents during the time period after the victim's outcry but prior to the Monday morning interview with a deputy; and (4) the only testimony excluded by the trial court during defense counsel's examination of the victim and her sister was testimony regarding statements made by their grandparents during the alleged meeting, which was properly excluded on hearsay grounds pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 802. Although defendant's bill of exceptions set forth the testimony that he asserted that the victim would have offered regarding what she told her grandparents during the alleged meeting, defense counsel did not question the victim regarding what she told her grandparents during that meeting, and, additionally, defense counsel did not argue that the trial court improperly sustained the State's hearsay objections to statements of the grandparents. In re J.R.N., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2280, 2009 WL 6312273 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 1 2010).

1400. Expert testimony by experienced law enforcement officers, as in this case, could be used to establish an accused's intent to deliver. Gamelin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1998, 2010 WL 1037944 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 23 2010).

1401. Defendant claimed that the trial court erred in striking her expert's entire testimony and defendant cited to civil procedure rules and civil cases in arguing that striking the testimony was an excessive sanction; however, this was not a civil case and the civil procedure rules were not applicable, given Tex. R. Civ. P. 2. Hoselton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2009 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 18 2010).

1402. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021 and indecency with a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11, although defendant complained that the trial court erred by allowing a psychologist to express an implied opinion that the victim was truthful in her report of sexual abuse, the psychologist, in the complained-of portion of his testimony, did no more than express his expert opinion concerning the coping means employed by victims of sexual assault. Because the psychologist's testimony, if believed, would assist the jury's evaluation of the testimony of the victim, there was no abuse of discretion by the trial court in admitting the psychologist's statement. Drake v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 716, 2010 WL 348365 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 31 2010).

1403. In a case in which a jury had convicted a habeas corpus applicant of possession of a controlled substance, methamphetamine, in the amount of 200 grams or more, but less than 400 grams, applicant demonstrated that trial counsel was deficient at the punishment stage of trial because counsel failed to: (1) object to a DEA agent's testimony on the dangers and societal costs caused by methamphetamine constituted deficient performance; (2) request pre-trial notice of the State's experts; (3) determine that a DEA agent would testify about methamphetamine addiction; (4) properly object to the agent's testimony about addiction and the number of people who could get high from the methamphetamine that applicant possessed; and (5) call an expert in rebuttal. During the punishment stage of trial, the prosecutors asked for a life sentence, relying heavily on the objectionable testimony that was introduced during both phases of trial, and because applicant had received a life sentence, the maximum sentence available for her offense, she had shown that there was a reasonable probability--one sufficient to undermine confidence in the result--that the outcome at the punishment stage would have been different but for her counsel's deficient performance. Ex Parte Lane, 303 S.W.3d 702, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1750 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1404. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by admitting a pediatrician's testimony where: (1) the pediatrician, a specialist in child maltreatment, had published research in the area of maltreatment, particularly in the area of child abuse; (2) the pediatrician had personally examined over one thousand children and was considered an expert in the area of sexual abuse; and (3) the pediatrician's ten-page curriculum vitae, which was admitted into evidence without objection, reflected her extensive training, skills, education, experience, and publications in the area of child sexual abuse. The prosecutor specifically requested the pediatrician's opinion based on her training and experience, as well as her examinations of children who had made a delayed outcry, for an opinion on why sexually abused children might delay outcry, which did not require a greater or more specific degree of expertise in the psychology or sociology of sexually abused children than possessed by the pediatrician, and the pediatrician's testimony would assist the jury in understanding why children might delay reporting sexual abuse. Salinas v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7828, 2009 WL 3210941 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

1405. In a case in which defendant was convicted of intentionally causing serious bodily injury to his stepson, causing his death, and intentionally or knowingly concealing the body, the trial court did not err by completely excluding the testimony of a defense expert pathologist who was board certified in both clinical and anatomical pathology, but was not a forensic pathologist, where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the defense did not demonstrate that the pathologist was sufficiently qualified in the sub-speciality of forensic pathology and that his methodology, without accessing or viewing the corpse, was not scientifically reliable; defendant did not demonstrate to the trial court that the pathologist had any experience with strangulations or decomposed bodies. Crunk v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7329, 2009 WL 2973474 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 17 2009).

1406. In a case involving unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon, expert testimony was not required on the issue of what constituted a "firearm." This was a subject well within the knowledge and experience of ordinary persons; there was no "specialized knowledge" needed to assist the trier of fact. Jackson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7251, 2009 WL 3365880 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 10 2009).

1407. In a case involving indecency with a child by sexual contact,a trial court was within its discretion when it determined that an expert for the State possessed sufficient experience to offer her opinion; she was not testifying that the child was telling the truth or that child complainants as a class were truthful. The State established the witness's expertise as a forensic interviewer, and she testified she has conducted over fifteen hundred interviews with child victims. Metcalfe v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6720, 2009 WL 2617644 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

1408. To determine whether the record supported the trial court's decision to exclude an expert witness's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 regarding an assessment for sexual interest test, the court had to decide whether defendant showed by clear and convincing proof that the test was reliable under the three criteria set out in case law. Figueroa v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5604, 2009 WL 2183460 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 22 2009).

1409. Defendant did not demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that an expert's evaluation of defendant under an assessment for sexual interest test was reliable for the purposes of characterizing defendant as being sexually uninterested in minors; it was within the trial court's discretion to weigh the expert's testimony regarding the test's significant potential for error and its inaccuracy in Hispanic subjects more heavily than the expert's testimony about the objectiveness of the test. The trial court did not act unreasonably and its decision to exclude the expert's testimony was not an abuse of discretion. Figueroa v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5604, 2009 WL 2183460 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 22 2009).

1410. Court expressed no opinion as to whether the an assessment for sexual interest test could be found reliable if different evidence had been presented; the court only held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that defendant did not demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that the test was admissible based on the evidence in this case. Figueroa v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5604, 2009 WL 2183460 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 22 2009).

1411. In defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 30.02, trial counsel was not ineffective in failing to object to the admission of expert testimony regarding the results of a scent lineup in which bloodhounds alerted to defendant's scent; trial counsel's performance was within the bounds of professional competence because any objection under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was unlikely to succeed. Perkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5555 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 16 2009).

1412. Court properly allowed a detective to testify as an expert about body language because she had been a police officer for 15 years and had investigated sexual assaults for three years, she was a fifteen year veteran officer, and she had a degree in criminal justice and was a certified special investigator of sex crimes. Brite v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4096, 2009 WL 1617741 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 10 2009).

1413. For purposes of defendant's injury to a child conviction, the evidence was sufficient to show that defendant caused the child's injuries, given that (1) although no one saw defendant shake or hit the child, her son, the child was alone with defendant during the time when his injuries occurred, (2) the expert medical testimony indicated that the child's injuries were so severe that they could not have been caused by a fall from a short distance as defendant claimed, and (3) the jury heard medical evidence that symptoms of those severe injuries would have immediately followed the injuries; the court gave appropriate deference to the jury's assessment of the evidence and resolution of evidentiary conflicts and the evidence did not contradict the verdict. Gutierrez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3296, 2009 WL 1335154 (Tex. App. Dallas May 14 2009).

1414. Corporal properly testified to his rationale for charging defendant with possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver because of the way the drugs were packaged, and even if error, similar evidence was introduced through the testimony of another witness concerning the manner of the drug's packaging and the number of packages. Tovar v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2739, 2009 WL 1066115 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 21 2009).

1415. In a case involving the sexual assault of a child, an alleged error relating to expert testimony was adequately briefed under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1 where defendant cited to the record in his statement of facts, there was a review of only about 15 pages of testimony, and there was a citation to Tex. R. Evid. 702. Even though defendant's application of the law to the facts was cursory, his argument that it was error to allow an expert to testify that a complaining witness was telling the truth was sufficient to raise the issue for appellate consideration, given the liberal construction of the appellate rules under Tex. R. App. P. 38.9. Long v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1090,

2009 WL 387018 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 18 2009).

1416. In a case involving the sexual assault of a child, it was impermissible for an expert to testify that a complaining witness was telling the truth; such expert testimony did not assist the jury. The error was not harmless because the expert went beyond simply applying well understood standards to a given fact pattern; rather, she staked her reputation on her conclusion that there was nothing troubling about the testimony from the complaining witness and the State's case. Long v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1090, 2009 WL 387018 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 18 2009).

1417. In a case in which appellant juvenile was charged with engaging in delinquent conduct for fatally shooting his father, the trial court erred in excluding the expert testimony of a psychiatrist as to appellant's belief that force was immediately necessary and that a reasonable person in his circumstances could not retreat where the testimony was relevant to appellant's state of mind, which had been profoundly affected by the sum of his violent experiences with his father, and would aid the jury in understanding his fear at the time of the offense. At the beginning of the hearing on its reliability, the parties agreed the psychiatrist was an expert, and the State did not challenge the fact that psychology was a recognized health-care field, and because the psychiatrist testified that his analysis was based on his more than 20 years' experience in psychology and his meticulous examination of appellant's records, his methodology was sound. In re E.C.L., 278 S.W.3d 510, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 995 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2009).

1418. In a juvenile defendant's homicide case, the court erred by excluding an expert's testimony regarding defendant's belief that he would suffer imminent harm at the hands of the victim because the expert's methodology was sound, and the expert testified that his analysis was based on his more than twenty years' experience in psychology and his meticulous examination of defendant's records. Lay people, especially adults, who had not experienced abuse for most of their lives did not have a frame of reference to fully understand why a child in defendant's position might have felt that deadly force was immediately necessary to avoid imminent harm. In re E.C.L., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9292 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 11 2008).

1419. In defendant's sexual assault case, the court did not err by denying a hearing on expert testimony because the underlying facts and data supporting the expert's opinion -- her education, training, and experience, years of clinical treatment of victims of family sexual abuse, and knowledge of Hispanic culture -- were not inadmissible. Merlos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6514 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26, 2008).

1420. In defendant's sexual assault case, the court properly found an expert to be qualified and her opinion to be reliable because the expert was trained and licensed as a psychologist and therapist, many of her clients were Hispanic, and she worked with children who were not raised in the United States. The expert explained the complexity of sexual abuse, especially involving incest, how children internalized and blamed themselves for the abuse, and that it took many years for a victim to work out the effects of sexual abuse. Merlos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6514 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26, 2008).

1421. In an indecency with a child case, the court did not err by admitting expert testimony that none of the conduct prosecuted by the State involved "innocent" touching because the State's questions did not seek to provoke an opinion about the truthfulness of the victim, but to substantively establish that the touching was not innocent. Darling v. State, 262 S.W.3d 920, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6106 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2008).

1422. Officer's testimony was a sufficient predicate to support the admission of radar evidence in defendant's driving while intoxicated case and to establish the radar unit validly applied the underlying scientific principles of radar and the officer's technique was properly applied on the date in question, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the officer's testimony; although defendant complained of the State's failure to introduce evidence that the officer's training, experience, and duties qualified him to decide whether defendant was speeding, an officer's testimony that he had been trained to operate a radar set and test it for accuracy, as in this case, was a sufficient predicate to support admission of radar evidence and it was not necessary to call an expert witness to establish the accuracy of the radar. Maki v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5145 (Tex. App. Dallas July 10 2008).

1423. In the penalty phase of a capital murder trial, there was no error in allowing testimony about Texas prison conditions in general and that violence could occur within the Texas prison system; an issue for the jury's determination was future dangerousness; therefore, the testimony was relevant to whether defendant would have opportunities to commit violent acts in prison. Lucero v. State, 246 S.W.3d 86, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 219 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

1424. During defendant's trial for delivering more than one gram but less than four grams of cocaine, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112, the trial court did not err in permitting a police officer to testify in general terms about the practices employed in cocaine trafficking because, as a veteran narcotics detective with the police department, he could have been properly admitted as an expert to provide testimony regarding the manufacture and sale of crack cocaine in the area; the trial court could have reasonably determined that such expert testimony would have assisted the jury by providing it with information regarding the nuances of the illegal narcotics trade. Henderson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9843 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 20 2007).

1425. In a child sexual abuse case, an expert's testimony, although not weighty, provided some basis to show that sometimes sex offenders behaved in ways similar to defendant's alleged behavior; thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the admission of this testimony and in allowing the jury to put the appropriate weight on the conclusions of the expert. Blanchard v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8403 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 25 2007).

1426. Rational jury could have found that defendant intended to deliver the cocaine, for purposes of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.002(8) and his conviction under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112, given that police officers testified, as they were able to do as expert witnesses, that the cocaine found was consistent with distribution rather than personal use, plus defendant matched the description of the man who sold cocaine from that address days before, plus defendant admitted to selling cocaine in the past. Williams v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8302 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 18 2007).

1427. Evidence was factually sufficient to support defendant's manslaughter conviction under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.04; although defendant presented expert testimony and claimed to have had a seizure at the time of the accident, and thus defendant argued that the evidence failed to show that he acted recklessly under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 6.03, the State presented expert testimony that defendant did not have a seizure disorder, and the trial court was the exclusive judge of the witnesses' credibility. Garretson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7697 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 26 2007).

1428. Nurse examiner testified that the victim spoke easily to her, which according to the nurse demonstrated that she was open and gave one an idea if she was truthful or not; while this testimony was objectionable, as expert witnesses were not free to testify that a witness was truthful, the court was unable to say that counsel's failure to object was so serious that it prejudiced the defense, and thus defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel. Ezell v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7712 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 26 2007).

1429. In a capital murder case, expert testimony that dealt with the psychology of child murder was not shown to be sufficiently relevant and reliable to assist the jury. Gallo v. State, 239 S.W.3d 757, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1234 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1430. Videotape showing the route taken by defendant during a chase was not an experiment or a reconstruction that required expert explanation, but instead it was a videotape version of a print map showing defendant's efforts to avoid officers and was used to show the jury the route followed, and the jury was instructed that its consideration of the evidence was limited to that purpose; relevant to the issue of intent in defendant's trial for aggravated assault on a public servant with a deadly weapon finding, under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02, was the preceding flight and the court did not find that the admission of the evidence in question was error. Timmons v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7519 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 17 2007).

1431. In a sexual assault case, defendant was unable to show that he received ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to object to the testimony of a social worker as unqualified expert testimony; the social worker could have testified about giving a victim information about a sexual assault examination as either a lay or expert witness. Benjamin v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2007).

1432. Although the State argued that defendant waived the issue related to expert testimony because he did not seek a running objection, defendant, the State, and the trial court discussed the admissibility of expert testimony at length outside the jury's presence; the court considered this complaint related to the expert's testimony, which was brought to the attention of and considered by the trial court, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33. Sanchez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5691 (Tex. App. Austin July 19 2007).

1433. Trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony in defendant's trial for attempted sexual assault; the expert was asked to describe in general, hypothetical terms behaviors that might be exhibited by a child who had been subjected to sexual abuse trauma, and the fact that the jury could have drawn a comparison between the expert's hypothetical child and the victim did not mean that the expert's testimony amounted to a direct comment on the victim's credibility; the expert's testimony was circumstantial evidence that something traumatic happened to the victim, and the fact that the evidence in some measure corroborated the victim's testimony did not make it any less relevant. Sanchez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5691 (Tex. App. Austin July 19 2007).

1434. For purposes of defendant's conviction of unlawful possession with intent to deliver cocaine in a drug free zone, the evidence was sufficient to show that he possessed the cocaine with intent to deliver; defendant was found in possession of a large amount of drugs and cash, some of the drugs were individually packaged and the rest were in a single block, expert testimony was presented that drug dealers typically purchased cocaine in a block and the amount of drugs in this case was not consistent with personal consumption, a witness testified that defendant sold drugs, and while this witness admitted to lying about her drug use and that she hoped to better position herself with authorities, there were no pending charges against her and no "deal" for her testimony, and defendant's conviction was not based primarily on this witness's testimony. Lucas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4485 (Tex. App. Dallas June 7 2007).

1435. There was sufficient evidence to support defendant's conviction of aggravated assault on a public servant in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02(a)(2), given that (1) videotape showed defendant repeatedly hitting the officer with closed fists and slamming the officer into the hood of his car, (2) the officer said he experienced swelling and pain and had various bruises and lacerations, and (3) the medical examiner, testifying as an expert, said the defendant's fists qualified as deadly weapons under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1.07. Jones v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3308 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 27 2007).

1436. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony from an expert witness on child abuse dynamics; the expert limited her testimony to the general characteristics of child victims of sexual abuse, and did not directly comment on the truthfulness of the victim's testimony. Ficarro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 26 2007).

1437. Court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel; the record was silent as to why trial counsel chose not to present a DNA expert witness, defendant did not raise ineffective assistance in a motion for a new trial, nor did defendant present evidence in support of the claim to the trial court, and the record did not show that counsel's decision not to present such expert witness testimony was so outrageous that no attorney would have engaged in it, and thus, the record did not show that counsel's representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. Hale v. State, 220 S.W.3d 180, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2257 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

1438. Defendant was allowed to introduce evidence, including expert testimony, regarding defendant's alleged mental retardation; contrary to defendant's claim, the trial court did not prevent defendant from presenting such evidence during the punishment hearing. Juarex v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1034 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 8 2007).

1439. Evidence was sufficient to support the finding that defendant had an intent to deliver a controlled substance given that (1) defendant was arrested in a trailer containing approximately 167 grams of crack cocaine, 17 grams of ecstasy, and other drugs, (2) the amount recovered exceeded the typical amount possessed for personal use, (3) paraphernalia used to consume narcotics was not found on defendant or in the home, (4) a significant amount of cash was seized, as well as guns, and (5) a police officer with 14 years experience testified that based on what was found, the officer believed that drugs were being sold out of the trailer, and such expert testimony was free to be used to establish intent to deliver, and the jury was free to disbelieve defendant's story. Benton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 472 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 25 2007).

1440. Where defendant was charged with possession of cocaine with intent to deliver, Tex. R. Evid. 702 allowed the trial court to admit the expert testimony of the canine handler whose drug-sniff dog alerted on defendant; the canine handler had twelve years of experience and the dog had participated in 74 lineups without misidentifying anyone; while defendant was the only African-American and the only person handcuffed, the lineup consisting of defendant and five police officers was sufficiently objective to be reliable. Risher v. State, 227 S.W.3d 133, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10462 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

1441. In an action in which appellant appealed from his convictions of three counts of indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the case was remanded to the trial court for a new trial where the exclusion of the psychologist's testimony regarding false memories had a substantial and injurious effect or influence on the jury's verdict and affected a substantial right of appellant's; the psychologist's false-memory testimony was general evidence that directly attacked the complainants' credibility and was, therefore, relevant and admissible during appellant's case-in-chief. Delong v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10031 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 16 2006).

1442. In a criminal trial for murder, the trial court did not err by excluding expert testimony of his eyewitness and cross-racial identification on the ground that he did not adequately establish his qualifications as an expert in that field as required by Tex. R. Evid. 702. Silva v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9599 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 24 2006).

1443. Where defendant was charged with intoxication manslaughter and aggravated assault following a vehicular accident, the State's chemist was permitted to give expert testimony concerning the presence of a cocaine metabolite in defendant's blood; defendant presented no challenge to the reliability of the expert's testimony. Bannister v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8522 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 29 2006).

1444. In a case of aggravated sexual assault of a child, expert testimony given by a child forensic interviewer was admissible because she was qualified by education, training, and experience, her field of expertise was legitimate, and her testimony was in the scope of her field and properly relied on the principles involved in that field. Carpenter

v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6504 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 26 2006).

1445. Appellant's issue was overruled and his driving while intoxicated conviction and sentence pursuant to Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04 were affirmed because an officer had sufficient training and experience to be qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to testify regarding the administration of the horizontal gaze nystagmus test. Price v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5349 (Tex. App. Austin June 23 2006).

1446. In defendant's drug case, the court properly allowed a State witness to testify where, although she was not designated as an expert, the police report made available to defendant indicated that she was the chemist who performed the tests and analyses of cocaine; thus, although the State did not produce a piece of paper with the witness's name followed by "expert," neither was her identity and function concealed. Shepard v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2793 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 6 2006).

1447. In a capital murder trial for the shooting death of a store clerk, the trial court erred by permitting an expert witness to provide a narrative interpretation of the videotaped recording of the incident. However, the testimony that defendant's waving to the gunman was consistent with his saying "come this way," did not have a substantial or injurious effect on the jury's verdict and did not affect his substantial rights; therefore, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P 44.2. Gonzales v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2518 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 30 2006).

1448. Given that the expert knew the results of one test of defendant's blood alcohol concentration a reasonable time from defendant's driving and knew several of defendant's relevant characteristics, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection to retrograde extrapolation evidence regarding his blood alcohol level. Lomax v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2527 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 29 2006).

1449. Where defendant was charged with murder, the employee of a cellular phone company was permitted to provide her expert testimony as to defendant's cell phone records and how they reflected his movements during the relevant time. Wilson v. State, 195 S.W.3d 193, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 815 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

1450. During defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in allowing the testimony of a sheriff department's investigator where the testimony did not involve expert testimony, but, rather, concerned only factual matters that she had personally observed because the trial court limited the testimony to what the investigator had seen in her own experience, and the actual question asked of her was simply whether delayed outcry was normal in her experience; because the investigator had several years of experience as a forensic interviewer at a children's advocacy center, she had some basis on which to answer that, in her experience, it was normal for children to delay reporting the crime of sexual assault. Escamilla v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 762 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 31 2006).

1451. During defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, no witness testified concerning a psychiatrist's theory of Child Abuse Accommodation Syndrome because a registered nurse's testimony did not describe the findings of a psychiatrist or attempt to describe a syndrome, but explained her role as a sexual assault nurse examiner, the physical findings she encountered, and that her training and experience made her aware that some children delay reporting this crime for several reasons. Escamilla v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 762 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 31 2006).

1452. During defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, a registered nurse's testimony was within the scope of her field of expertise where she was the sexual assault nurse examiner certified by the Texas Office of the Attorney General and had to undergo 96 hours of clinical training to become certified; with her 11 years of experience with child sexual assault victims, the nurse had abundant personal observation and experience of common characteristics of sexually assaulted children, and she did not attempt to describe a medical or psychiatric syndrome, but presented evidence to allow the conclusion that her training and experience provided an explanation for the reasons children delayed reporting sexual assaults. Escamilla v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 762 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 31 2006).

1453. Court did not err by allowing officers to testify regarding gangs where one witness testified about the activities of the Mexican Mafia as well as the organization's constitution and bylaws, and she identified photographs and information received from a confidential informant, both connecting defendant to membership in the Mexican Mafia; the other witness had also received specialized training in gang identification and investigation, specifically including the Mexican Mafia, and had conducted numerous investigations involving gangs; both testified that, in addition to their course work and investigations, their knowledge was gained by discussions with gang officers, interviews of informants and gang members, and monitoring of websites. Hernandez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 722 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 26 2006).

1454. Where defendant was charged with stealing property, the trial court did not err by refusing to admit the testimony of an expert witness in commercial trucking regulation; while the complainant was a commercial truck driver, the testimony was irrelevant. Edrington v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10637 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 21 2005).

1455. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

1456. In defendant's driving under the influence case, the admission of an officer's testimony regarding the reasonableness of the field sobriety tests given was improper because he was not qualified nor designated an expert witness and had no personal knowledge of the tests given. However, the error was harmless because another officer testified that he detected an odor of alcohol emanating from defendant's vehicle, defendant admitted he had consumed two to three beers, and he failed sobriety tests. Grimes v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9744 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 22 2005).

1457. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the State's expert witnesses were permitted to give their opinion testimony concerning the reluctance of child victims to talk about sexual abuse by a family member. The witnesses had equal or substantially similar education, training, and experience to other experts in the field. Foxworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2005).

1458. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the State's expert witness was permitted to give a legal definition of penetration. The expert's testimony was consistent with the court's definition of penetration. Foxworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2005).

1459. Court properly suppressed retrograde extrapolation testimony where the expert had not been provided with facts justifying the assumption that defendant was in the post-absorptive phase at the time of the accident, and he admitted that if a hypothetical individual consumed a meal and alcohol with that meal, the presence of food in his stomach would affect the absorptive phase to the point that peak blood-alcohol level could be reached some time much later than when the incident occurred. State v. Franco, 180 S.W.3d 219, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10823 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

1460. Where defendant was charged with indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, a counselor with years of training and experience was permitted to testify as an expert on child sexual abuse. The counselor held a Bachelor's Degree in social work with a minor in psychology, and a Master's Degree in counseling. Johnson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7412 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 7 2005).

1461. In a trial for a "shaken-baby" murder, any error arising from the admission of an investigator's opinion on guilt was harmless. Although defendant objected to the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 during the prosecution's re-direct, the same question and answer had come in without objection during the defense's prior cross-examination. San Martin Adriano v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7140 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2005).

1462. At trial, an expert witness testified that fingerprint analysis was recognized and accepted as valid in the scientific community, that there was a procedure used in analyzing fingerprints, and that he had followed the technique in this case. Given the fact that fingerprint evidence was accepted as a matter of common knowledge, and given the expert's testimony regarding the fingerprint analysis in defendant's case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the fingerprint testimony. Salazar v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7187 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2005).

1463. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting a sexual assault nurse examiner to testify about why some sexual assault victims did not remember the details of the assault; defendant's objection as to speculation lacked merit because the nurse's expert opinion was not speculation. Villarreal v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6720 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 18 2005).

1464. Trial court did not err in admitting the officer's testimony regarding "fist loading," because the record revealed that the officer had been a police officer for over 11 years, had a bachelor's degree in law enforcement, held a Master Peace Officer's certificate issued by the State of Texas, had specialized training in hand-to-hand or close combat, and had received specific training regarding the concept of "fist loading." Dean v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6681 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 18 2005).

1465. In a murder case, the State demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence that the underlying scientific theory of gunshot residue analysis distance determination was valid; hence, expert testimony was properly admitted. Woodward v. State, 170 S.W.3d 726, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5255 (Tex. App. Waco 2005).

1466. In defendant's murder case, a court properly allowed expert testimony on the issue of bullet lead where the evidence made it more probable than not that the expended bullets originated from the ammunition box found in defendant's residence, and defendant was free to challenge the expert's conclusions and point out the weaknesses of the analysis to the jury during cross-examination. Gonzales v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4874 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 23 2005).

1467. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, an expert witness was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to testify about sex offenders and the effects of sexual abuse on victims because, contrary to defendant's contentions, the expert testified that he had experience in sex offender treatment and in identifying the emotional effects of sexual abuse. The training, experience, research, seminars, materials, periodicals, and treatises about which the expert testified and upon which he based his opinions qualified him under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to testify as an expert witness. Lively v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4703 (Tex. App. Dallas June 17 2005).

1468. Although the court erred by allowing an expert to testify that a sexual assault occurred, the error was harmless where the child victim told her caregivers and the jury that defendant put his "private" in her "private" on numerous occasions. The victim also provided detailed descriptions of the sexual abuse in age-appropriate language. Smith v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4203 (Tex. App. El Paso May 31 2005).

1469. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a doctor who never examined the victim and had no personal knowledge of her. The doctor indicated that withdrawal from family and friends may occur after sexual abuse and that a sexually abused child may experience shame, guilt, and ambivalence toward the perpetrator; her testimony was tied to the facts of the case. Comeaux v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3748 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 17 2005).

1470. Court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress evidence of his horizontal gaze nystagmus test results because the evidence was sufficient to establish that the officer who administered the test was an expert at administering the test. In addition, the testimony of the officer was not offered to secure a conviction but rather to enable the trial court to determine whether the factfinder would be allowed to hear it. Reynolds v. State, 163 S.W.3d 808, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3516 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2005).

1471. For an officer to testify as an expert on the administration of a horizontal gaze nystagmus test, it need only be shown that he received from the State of Texas a practitioner's certification to administer the test. Reynolds v. State, 163 S.W.3d 808, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3516 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2005).

1472. Expert testimony was properly admitted regarding semen evidence obtained from the victim in defendant's aggravated sexual assault case, because the expert testified that the underlying scientific theory for DNA was valid and had been accepted by the scientific community, that literature existed supporting the scientific theory, that the techniques used to apply the theory were valid, and that the valid techniques were applied in this case. Although she stated that she was unfamiliar with the error rate of DNA testing, she testified that she used quality measures and positive and negative controls to insure accuracy during DNA testing. Ford v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3151 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 27 2005).

1473. Prisoner's trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to make a Daubert objection to a prosecution expert's testimony under Fed. R. Evid. 702 because the expert adequately established his expert credentials, which included prior testimony as to the future dangerousness of a perpetrator and there was no clearly established law that prevented a psychiatrist from basing his opinion on the records of the case and the psychiatric records of the perpetrator. Shields v. Dretke, 122 Fed. Appx. 133, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 2910 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 28, 162 L. Ed. 2d 928, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 5374, 74 U.S.L.W. 3129 (U.S. 2005).

1474. Trial court did not err in a murder trial by excluding expert testimony concerning the effects of combining Xanax, marijuana, and alcohol, because the witness was not an expert in the field of pharmacology, and therefore was not qualified to give expert advice concerning their effects. Smith v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1087 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 9 2005).

1475. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding a psychologist and a psychiatrist, based on their experience, to be qualified to testify as experts. Lopez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 770 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 2 2005).

1476. Appellate court did not review an argument that a police officer's testimony regarding whether an assault occurred constituted improper expert testimony because the issue was not preserved for review by a bolstering objection; the objection did not comport with the argument raised on appellate review. Mumphrey v. State, 155 S.W.3d 651, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 370 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

1477. Once the identity of the defendant's expert was disclosed to the state, it was no longer privileged. Further, the work-product privilege did not apply to the expert's identity once it was provided to the state as part of discovery. Pope v. State, 161 S.W.3d 114, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11529 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

1478. In a driving while intoxicated case, the trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony using retrograde extrapolation to establish defendant's blood alcohol concentration because the expert was qualified and the science was reliable. Peden v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9954 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2004).

1479. In a murder case, the trial judge did not err by excluding the testimony of defendant's expert witness as the expert offered no criteria or data by which, even out of his own experience, he arrived at his broad conclusions about murderers on probation. Further, defendant offered no evidence that the expert's testimony properly relied on or utilized principles or studies from within his field of expertise. Stubbs v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8916 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 6 2004).

1480. Because an officer had completed the necessary training to be considered an expert on the Horizontal Gaze Nystagmus test, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the officer to testify concerning the test even though he had not yet received his certification at the time he performed the test on defendant. Barton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8863 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 5 2004).

1481. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child after an eight-year-old complainant made an "outcry" during therapy that defendant forced him to engage in oral sex, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding an expert's opinion that therapists could implant memories. Ard v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7339 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 16 2004).

1482. Reliability of "soft" science evidence may be established by showing: (1) the field of expertise involved is a legitimate one; (2) the subject matter of the expert's testimony is within the scope of that field; and (3) the expert's testimony properly relies upon or utilizes the principles involved in that field. Ard v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7339 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 16 2004).

1483. It is an abuse of discretion if the trial court's decision to exclude expert testimony is outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Ard v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7339 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 16 2004).

1484. In a sexual assault case, a court erred by failing to allow defendant's expert to testify where the subject of the expert's opinion was relevant, just as the State's expert was permitted to testify that the lack of genital injuries did not indicate that the complainant had not been sexually assaulted, defendant's expert should have been permitted to testify that no sexual assault occurred. One party could not proffer expert testimony and subsequently argue successfully that the testimony was not relevant when the opposing party sought to offer expert testimony on the same subject which reached a different conclusion; in addition, the error was not harmless. Vela v. State, 159 S.W.3d 172, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7257 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

1485. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding expert testimony regarding contact marks on defendant's vehicle on the basis that the underlying theory was unreliable where Tex. R. Evid. 702 required that a three-part reliability test for the admission of scientific evidence must be satisfied: (1) the underlying scientific theory must be valid; (2) the technique applying the theory must be valid; and (3) the technique must have been properly applied on the occasion in question. Sheehy v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6870 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 29 2004).

1486. Trial court was capable of reviewing the evidence, without the benefit of expert testimony, to determine whether the State met its burden of showing computer images depicting "actual" children necessary for conviction under the child pornography statute as opposed to "virtual" children, and, thus, the trial court properly denied defendant's motion for a determination about the admissibility of computer images in his case involving the felony possession of child pornography. Porath v. State, 148 S.W.3d 402, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6767 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

1487. Defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04(a) was proper where there was evidence supporting the trial court's finding that a co-worker's testimony established the time of defendant's last drink; thus, the court concluded that the expert had sufficient information available upon which to extrapolate defendant's alcohol concentration at the time of the offense. The expert's extrapolation was sufficiently reliable to be useful to the jury and, therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the extrapolation evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Fulenwider v. State, 176 S.W.3d 290, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6352 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

1488. In a driving while intoxicated case, the State's intoxilyzer expert's testimony regarding retrograde extrapolation of defendant's blood alcohol content, which estimated defendant's blood-alcohol level when he was driving based on a test result from some later time, was admissible because: (1) the intoxilyzer tests were given within a reasonable amount of time after he was driving; (2) more than three of defendant's personal characteristics -- such as weight, gender, typical drinking pattern, tolerance for alcohol, amount of alcohol consumed, what the person ingested, the duration of the drinking spree, the time of the last drink, and how much and what the person had to eat either before, during, or after the drinking -- were known by the expert; and (3) the expert used the accepted average rate for elimination of alcohol at 0.015 grams per hour, instead of calculating a specific elimination rate for defendant. Smothers v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6399 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2004).

1489. In a driving while intoxicated case, the State's intoxilyzer expert miscalculated defendant's blood alcohol level under the retrograde extrapolation method; however, defendant failed to object to the expert's testimony on the basis that she made an erroneous calculation and thus, defendant did not preserve error regarding the expert's miscalculations. Smothers v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6399 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2004).

1490. Where an officer improperly administered a Horizontal Gaze Nystagmus test in a driving while impaired case, a trial court erred in admitting the test under Tex. R. Evid. 702, but the error was harmless based on other evidence since the other evidence showed that defendant committed several traffic offenses, smelled of alcohol, had bloodshot eyes, had a slow response time, performed poorly on other field sobriety tests, admitted to drinking, and had a high concentration of alcohol in two intoxilyzer samples. McRae v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5933 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 1 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 152 S.W.3d 739, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10805 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

1491. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of a sexual assault diagnosis made by a physician's assistant, who explained that a statement made by defendant's girlfriend was considered, but not relied upon, in making the diagnosis. Scott v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4949 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 3 2004).

1492. Where defendant claimed on appeal that the State's expert witness was not properly qualified as an expert witness but at trial defense counsel did not object to the witness's qualifications until after the witness provided an expert opinion, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) defendant failed to preserve for review any objection to the witness's qualifications Tello v. State, 138 S.W.3d 487, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4653 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004), affirmed by 180 S.W.3d 150, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2039 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

1493. Where defendant did not object each time the State's expert witness's opinion about the victim's credibility was offered, defendant's complaint about the trial court's admission of her testimony was waived. Allam v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4177 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 6 2004).

1494. In a driving while intoxicated case, the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the State's expert's testimony on retrograde extrapolation based on defendant's intoxilyzer results as the State was unable to show that the expert's testimony was reliable; the expert did not explain the science of retrograde extrapolation and did not know many relevant, important personal characteristics of defendant. Owens v. State, 135 S.W.3d 302, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3536 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

1495. In a case involving child indecency, a trial court did not err by allowing an expert to testify regarding defendant's future dangerousness, despite the fact that the expert never met defendant because such contact was not required under Tex. R. Evid. 703; moreover, the expert was qualified to give an opinion based on the expert's training, education, and vast experience with sexual offenders. Rodriguez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3457 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 15 2004).

1496. In a sexual assault case, a court properly allowed an expert to testify regarding sexual abuse where, although the State did not tie the testimony to the facts of the case, the testimony was relevant, it had a relatively close association with the evidence, and it was better for the expert not to tie his or her testimony too tightly to the particular child victim, but instead, to limit the import of such testimony to general characteristics and empirically obtained data, so that the jury could draw its own conclusions. Carey v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3188 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 8, 2004).

1497. In an intoxicated assault case, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.07(a)(1), the State's witness's testimony was objectionable because he was not shown to be qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 on retrograde extrapolation for purposes of blood alcohol tests, nor was his testimony shown to be reliable and, thus, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 704, the witness's testimony on whether defendant was intoxicated beyond a reasonable doubt, an ultimate issue in the case, was also objectionable; therefore, counsel's representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness as he failed to object to the witness testimony. However, counsel's failure to object to the admission of the witness's testimony did not prejudice defendant because there was substantial other evidence of defendant's intoxication at the time of the accident, including testimony that defendant smelled of alcohol and appeared intoxicated, that the inside of defendant's vehicle smelled of the metabolized odor of alcohol, and that defendant had been drinking that day. Blumenstetter v. State, 135 S.W.3d 234, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3074 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

1498. In an aggravated assault case, an expert was qualified to testify regarding blood spatter analysis where he had been an officer for 13 years, he participated in 45-50 hours of instruction, and he had applied his knowledge at other crime scenes. Holmes v. State, 135 S.W.3d 178, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2690 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

1499. In an aggravated assault case, because blood spatter analysis was subject to judicial notice and the State proved the proper application of blood spatter analysis, the trial court did not err in admitting the State's testimony on the issue of blood spatter analysis. Holmes v. State, 135 S.W.3d 178, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2690 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

1500. Texas takes judicial notice of the validity of blood spatter analysis; the State is not required to produce evidence on the first two criteria of Kelly. Holmes v. State, 135 S.W.3d 178, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2690 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

1501. Tex. R. Evid. 702 states if scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise. Salazar v. State, 127

S.W.3d 355, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1045 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

1502. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the proponent of scientific evidence must show, by clear and convincing proof, that the evidence is sufficiently reliable and relevant to assist the jury in understanding other evidence or in determining a fact issue. Salazar v. State, 127 S.W.3d 355, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1045 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

1503. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, defendant's expert witness exhibited no knowledge of the facts and did not attempt to relate or apply content-based criteria analysis to the particular facts. He did not offer an analysis of either the techniques used by the interviewers or the potential impact the techniques may have had on the children. Instead, defendant's expert's testimony was explicitly offered solely as educational material for the jury to use in assessing the complainants' credibility. Accordingly, the testimony was not sufficiently tied to the facts of the case and thus was not relevant. Salazar v. State, 127 S.W.3d 355, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1045 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

1504. In an arson trial, an expert's opinion that a fire had started was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and Tex. R. Evid. 704. Drake v. State, 123 S.W.3d 596, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9599 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2003).

1505. Although the officer's testimony satisfied only the second and third Kelly prongs for admissibility, the underlying scientific principles of radar were indisputable and valid as a matter of law, and it was not error to admit the radar gun results. Mills v. State, 99 S.W.3d 200, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9297 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

1506. After defendant pled guilty to murder, the trial court erred at the sentencing proceedings in excluding testimony of a psychologist who sought to testify as to testing results that he opined demonstrated that defendant was an appropriate candidate for probation, because the psychologist was qualified as an expert and because the tests were accepted as valid within the scientific community. Muhammad v. State, 46 S.W.3d 493, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 3366 (Tex. App. El Paso 2001).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Daubert Standard

1507. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting an expert's testimony and his report, given that the trial court could have found that his methodology, tax accounting principles, comported with well-established professional standards, and the trial court was not required to find there was any analytical gap between the data and the expert's conclusions so as to have rendered his testimony and report unreliable. Bazan v. MuÃ»oz, 444 S.W.3d 110, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8817 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 13 2014).

1508. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated assault of a family member, the trial court erred in admitting testimony from a State witness as an expert on lethality assessment because she did not offer any specifics to support her assertion, and she did not cite any books, articles, journals, or other clinical social workers who practiced in the area. Petriciolet v. State, 442 S.W.3d 643, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8414 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 31 2014).

1509. Trial court did not err in denying a taxpayer's motion to exclude the testimony of an appraisal district's expert, a registered professional appraiser with close to 30 years of experience, because his calculations were based on quantitative foundational data and followed approved methodology. Key Energy Servs., Llc v. Shelby County Appraisal Dist., 428 S.W.3d 133, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 439, 2014 WL 130547 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 15 2014).

1510. Given that the jury heard evidence about defendant having stumbled out of a bar and testimony about how poorly defendant performed on field sobriety tests, and the charge did not narrowly define intoxication solely on the synergistic effect theory but allowed the jury to find intoxication in other ways, the erroneous admission of expert evidence on the theory was harmless because defendant's substantial rights in his driving while intoxicated case were not affected. Parr v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 183, 2014 WL 69567 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 9 2014).

1511. State did not meet its burden to prove by clear and convincing evidence that the pharmacist's testimony was reliable scientific evidence given that the State did not show (1) the synergistic theory was accepted as valid by the scientific community, (2) the existence of literature supporting the theory, and (3) the potential rate of error applying the technique to this case, and the admission of the evidence was an abuse of discretion. Parr v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 183, 2014 WL 69567 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 9 2014).

1512. Physician's deposition testimony and report were inadmissible because they were conclusory and unreliable, as corroborating data was not included in the report, his theory that the patient would have survived had the defibrillator administered a successful defibrillation was undermined by the American Medical Association's manual, and he admitted that admitting a patient in the instant patient's condition into the hospital was no assurance that the patient would eventually be discharged alive. Schronk v. Laerdal Med. Corp., 440 S.W.3d 250, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15024, 2013 WL 6570907 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 12 2013).

1513. Trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony in a wrongful termination action because the employee's expert articulated a reliable and well-accepted method for evaluating back pay and front pay. Dell, Inc. v. Wise, 424 S.W.3d 100, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10654 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 22 2013).

1514. No abuse of discretion in excluding defendant's expert's testimony, because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing that the psychiatrist's testimony was reliable in the area of dissociative identity disorder. Harris v. State, 424 S.W.3d 599, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9481, 2013 WL 5570428 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 1 2013).

1515. In a customer's action against a vehicle dealership for breach of warranty and fraud, the trial court did not err in ruling that testimony by the customer's expert was inadmissible because the testimony was not demonstrated to be reliable; the expert could not explain why, in arriving at his opinion on damages, the "clean trade-in" value was used as a starting point instead of the "clean retail" value, the difference in which was nearly $ 4,000. Moore v. Jordan Ford, Ltd., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8372 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 10 2013).

1516. Ex-wife did not raise a Daubert objection or object to the ex-husband's tracing methodology, nor did the ex-wife appeal from the decision to admit the tracing evidence on any basis other than a discovery sanction; the court had to rely on the fact-finder, the trial court, and if the trial court found the ex-husband's testimony and tracing was credible, the trial court could have found that the assets were his separate property. Richard v. Towery, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4813 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 18 2013).

1517. Counsel could not be deemed ineffective for failing to object to a witness's testimony as impermissible expert testimony or for not requesting a Daubert hearing, given that her testimony did not involve a scientific theory and she did not need significant expertise to determine from officers' actions that they believed what they seized from the house were drugs, plus the testimony was helpful to the jury in determining a fact issue, under Tex. R. Evid. 701(b), and thus it was within the trial court's discretion to consider the witness as a lay witness. In re R.L.A., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2745, 2013 WL 1092210 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 15 2013).

1518. Evidence was admissible for determining the children's best interests, and the testimony was relevant to the best interest factors, such that it was not necessary for the mother's counsel to object to the testimony about extraneous offenses, counsel was not ineffective for failing to do so, and the court overruled appellant's issue related to a Daubert hearing. In re R.L.A., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2745, 2013 WL 1092210 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 15 2013).

1519. Under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 107.002, a case worker supervisor's testimony was admissible opinion testimony that was not subject to a Daubert hearing; she testified that she interviewed the child, formed an opinion as to his best interest, found that it was in the child's best interests to terminate the parents' rights, and the child said he wanted to stay with his foster parents. In re R.L.A., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2745, 2013 WL 1092210 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 15 2013).

1520. Appellant claimed that the officer moved the stimulus at a pace of four seconds instead of two, but such minor deviations from the manual did not render the horizontal gaze nystagmus test inadmissible, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Stanley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8442, 2012 WL 4848762 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

1521. Scientist testified that her method of homogenization was scientifically accepted, defense expert witness testimony stated that the technique was approved, and the record thus showed that the technique was scientifically reliable; the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence. Stanley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8442, 2012 WL 4848762 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

1522. Appellant cited no authority for the claims that pouring blood into a beaker or unexplained clotting of blood would render the results inadmissible; if, as in this case, the procedure used had been validated as reliable, there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence. Stanley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8442, 2012 WL 4848762 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

1523. Appellant argued that an officer did not ask qualification questions screening for potential causes of nystagmus, but asking such questions was not necessary to screen persons for medical conditions; the officer checked for equal pupil size, tracking, and resting nystagmus to see if they were a candidate to perform the test, and thus the officer sufficiently screened appellant for medical conditions that might have interfered with the test. Stanley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8442, 2012 WL 4848762 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

1524. Trial court did not find that flashing lights were problematic concerning the validity of a horizontal gaze nystagmus, and the court deferred to this finding, which was supported by the record. Stanley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8442, 2012 WL 4848762 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

1525. For purposes of Tex. Transp. Code Ann. §§ 724.064, 724.017(a), the procedure used was sufficiently reliable to admit results of the blood test, given that (1) a scientist's testimony showed that she was a forensic scientist and supervisor with a master's degree and years of experience, (2) the laboratory procedure for analysis had been validated to plus or minus 10 percent accuracy, and (3) she testified that she followed the procedure. Stanley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8442, 2012 WL 4848762 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

1526. In a product liability action, the trial court erred in deeming any of appellants' expert testimony to be unreliable because the experts provided sufficient evidence on the origin and cause of a fire in a manufacturing facility; appellants' experts established that they relied upon generally accepted scientific methodologies and completed all of the testing that was feasible for them to complete. Control Solutions, Inc. v. Gharda Usa, Inc., 394 S.W.3d 127, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6793, 2012 WL 3525372 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 16 2012).

1527. Trial court erred in a medical malpractice action in excluding testimony by appellants' experts because based upon their years of treating patients with renal insufficiency and the unequivocal autopsy and toxicology reports supporting their opinions that the patient died from an accidental overdose of Hydrocodone and Oxycontin, their causation opinions met the reliability requirements for admissibility. White v. Scaff, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5346, 2012 WL 2608626 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 5 2012).

1528. Testimony was properly admitted on the diminished value of damaged steel coils. The steel company's owner could testify to value as a property owner under Tex. R. Evid. 701, and an expert marine surveyor's testimony on representative sampling was reliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702; further, the expert marine surveyor was not required under Tex. R. Evid. 703 to personally inspect every damaged coil. Custom Transit, L.P. v. Flatrolled Steel, Inc., 375 S.W.3d 337, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4739 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 14 2012).

1529. Appellant did not preserve a Daubert claim for review, given his objection. Zavala v. State, 401 S.W.3d 171, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8671, 2011 WL 5156843 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2011).

1530. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, appellant did not argue and the record did not show that the blood test was novel; even assuming it was, the record provided no indication that a suppression hearing was held before or during trial regarding the tests, nor was it shown that the detailed reliability challenges were presented to the trial court before a witness testified about the test results, and the court could not find that the trial court abused its discretion by admitting this witness's unobjected-to testimony. Kuciemba v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8456 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 25 2011).

1531. In a brother's action against a sister to try title to real property, the court did not err in sustaining the sister's objection to the affidavit of the brother's handwriting expert because the expert's affidavit failed to adequately connect the underlying data with the offered conclusion. Gonzales v. Reyes, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5183, 2011 WL 2652127 (Tex. App. Austin July 7 2011).

1532. Order civilly committing appellant as a sexually violent predator was proper because the opinions offered by the State's experts, a psychologist and a psychiatrist, were reliable and adequately tied to relevant facts; they diagnosed appellant with paraphilia, polysubstance dependence, and personality disorder with antisocial features. In re Polk, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1323, 2011 WL 662928 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 24 2011).

1533. Expert testimony valuing property on which a large natural gas processing plant had been built as vacant rural residential property was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and was unreliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the expert failed to explain why the existing use of the property would not be presumed as the highest and best use, did not offer fair market value of the land based on its condition at the time of the condemnation, and did not account for all relevant factors affecting valuation. Enbridge Pipeline (east Texas) L.P. v. Avinger Timber, L.L.C., 326 S.W.3d 390, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8629, 172 Oil & Gas Rep. 722 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 27 2010).

1534. Even though the trial court by admitting a forensic psychiatrist's expert testimony about future dangerous, as there was no objective source material to substantiate his methodology as one that was appropriate in the practice of forensic psychiatry, the error was harmless, because there was ample evidence that there was a probability that defendant would commit future acts of violence apart from the psychiatrist's testimony; that evidence included the following a psychiatric interview and evaluation done more than 20 years before the murders and 40 years before sentencing that found reached the same basic conclusions about defendant as the instant psychiatrist did. In addition, the prosecution did not rely heavily on the psychiatrist's testimony during its closing arguments. Coble v. State, 330 S.W.3d 253, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1297 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1535. Trial court did not err by allowing the State's expert to testify about Satanism under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because he was qualified, as he testified that he had spent approximately 19 years studying that subject, and because the evidence was reliable, as the expert's testimony regarding Satanic philosophy relied directly on the numerous books and articles he had read on the subject. Davis v. State, 329 S.W.3d 798, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1536. Trial court erred in awarding judgment to the sellers of a dialysis company in their action against a buyer for breach of the sales agreement as it pertained to pre-sale receivables because the testimony and opinion of the sellers' expert witness was unreliable and thus inadmissible; the expert's assumptions regarding contract and noncontract patients were unsupported by the evidence and the failure to test those assumptions rendered the report unreliable. U.S. Renal Care, Inc. v. Jaafar, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7085, 2010 WL 3405831 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 31 2010).

1537. Walk-and-turn and one-leg-stand tests were not scientific evidence; the officer's testimony was lay witness testimony governed by Tex. R. Evid. 701, and while she described the tests and indicated what clues meant a person was intoxicated and how many clues appellant indicated, such did not cross the line into expert testimony, and the trial court did not err in allowing this testimony in appellant's driving while intoxicated trial. Horton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7296, 2010 WL 3433776 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2010).

1538. Because an officer's testimony was lay witness testimony, and therefore the expert standard did apply, the trial court did not wrongfully place the burden of proof on appellant to show her weight at the time of her arrest for driving while intoxicated. Horton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7296, 2010 WL 3433776 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2010).

1539. In a breach of contract action involving a broker's commissions based on a percentage of net profits from sales procured by the broker, an expert's testimony was admissible because his method of calculation of net profits was a reasonable approximation and was acceptable under the Daubert standard. Truman Arnold Cos. v. Hammond & Consultants Enters., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6190, 2010 WL 2982912 (Tex. App. Tyler July 30 2010).

1540. Trial court did not err in failing to hold a Kelly-Daubert hearing regarding the admissibility of the standard, physical field sobriety tests that defendant performed because an officer's testimony regarding the walk-and-turn test and the one-leg stand test was lay testimony, not expert scientific or technical evidence. Johnson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5603, 2010 WL 2803015 (Tex. App. Eastland July 15 2010).

1541. Defense counsel did not object on the basis of qualifications or reliability and he did not ask to voir dire the witness or have the trial court conduct a Daubert/Kelly hearing, and thus appellant preserved no error for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; the court noted that a lay opinion could be offered under Tex. R. Evid. 701 if the opinion was rationally based on his perceptions and helpful to the understanding of the testimony. Livingston v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5512, 2010 WL 2783911 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 15 2010).

1542. In an action in which a mother alleged that her baby suffered nerve injuries during birth due to her obstetrician's asserted negligence, the trial court acted within its discretion when it overruled the mother's motion to exclude expert testimony relied upon by the obstetrician regarding natural forces of labor as a potential cause of the child's brachial plexus injury; the mother's challenges predicated on reliance upon retrospective studies and the potential for ascertainment bias did not warrant exclusion of the disputed expert testimony regarding the cause of the child's brachial plexus injury. Taber v. Nguyen Roush, 316 S.W.3d 139, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4508 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

1543. In an action in which a mother alleged that her baby suffered nerve injuries during birth due to her obstetrician's asserted negligence, the mother wrongly attempted to invoke the "general acceptance" factor of the Robinson factors for gauging the admissibility of expert testimony to argue that the natural forces of labor theory had not been generally accepted as a potential cause of brachial plexus injuries during birth where labeling the natural forces of labor theory as a "hypothesis" was not dispositive because that characterization by itself did not answer the reliability question. Similarly, the reliability issue was not resolved by pointing to a characterization of the natural forces of labor theory as "not the most commonly accepted at all" by one of the child's treating physicians. Taber v. Nguyen Roush, 316 S.W.3d 139, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4508 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

1544. In an action in which a mother alleged that her baby suffered nerve injuries during birth due to her obstetrician's asserted negligence, the expert testimony relied upon by the obstetrician regarding natural forces of labor as a potential cause of the child's brachial plexus injury was admissible under the Robinson standard because, on the record presented, the trial court had a valid basis for concluding that the asserted analytical gap between non-specific brachial plexus injuries discussed in the medical literature and the particular avulsion injury that the child suffered had been bridged as between natural forces of labor as an explanation for brachial plexus injuries in general and the child's specific avulsion injury. The record warranted submission of testimony regarding a natural forces of labor explanation for the jury's consideration in deciding a causation issue that -- as the mother's expert noted -- unavoidably involved an element of speculation. Taber v. Nguyen Roush, 316 S.W.3d 139, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4508 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

1545. Even if appellant had lodged a sufficient objection at trial, he failed to show any reason to find the expert testimony inadmissible; nothing showed the experts' lack of qualification or the unreliability of the methodologies employed, both the experts' qualifications, including their education and experience, provided the trial court with a more than adequate basis for admitting their testimony on future dangerousness under Tex. R. Evid. 702, plus the testimony appeared to meet the requirements that the evidence derived from a soft science such as psychology was sufficiently reliable. Davis v. State, 313 S.W.3d 317, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1546. In a mother's medical malpractice action that attributed her son's nerve injuries to a physician's alleged negligence during the son's birth, the trial court acted within its discretion when it overruled the mother's motion to exclude expert testimony; the challenged testimony regarding natural forces of labor as a potential cause of the son's brachial plexus injury was admissible under the Robinson standard. Taber v. Roush, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2827, 2010 WL 1540128 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 20 2010).

1547. In a patient's medical malpractice action that arose from an L2 inferior to S1 superior decompressive laminectomy performed by appellees, a doctor and a neurosurgery clinic, the trial court abused its discretion by sustaining appellees' objections to exclude the testimony of the patient's expert witness where the expert's testimony was reliable because his affidavit sufficiently stated the methodology he employed by listing the most likely causes of cauda equina syndrome and using the patient's postoperative radiographical studies to eliminate two of the potential causes, he stated that he reviewed the patient's medical records, and he formulated his opinion that over-manipulation of the cauda equina nerves caused the patient's injury by reviewing her postoperative radiographic studies. The patient met her burden of establishing that the expert utilized a scientifically reliable methodology. St. Clair v. Alexander, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7682, 2009 WL 3135812 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 30 2009).

1548. Condominium association did not object to an expert's testimony at trial and therefore waived any complaint regarding the methodology, technique, or foundational data the expert used in forming his opinion. Towers of Town Lake Condo. Ass'n v. Rouhani, 296 S.W.3d 290, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7033 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2009).

1549. In a murder trial in which the state's theory was that the victim's head was struck against a cabinet door, the trial court abused its discretion by excluding testimony from defendant's expert that the door was not damaged in the manner that a door would be damaged from something hitting against the back of it with great force. Reliability was established under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the expert's testimony established that the field of determining the cause of damage to cabinetry was a legitimate one because that determination was necessary to apportion liability for the cost of repair or replacement of damaged cabinetry; the proffered testimony was within the scope of that field; the opinion relied upon and utilized the principles involved in the field; and the expert testified about his years of experience building and installing cabinets and testing cabinets' ability to withstand stresses, and about his knowledge of the damage caused to cabinets by different types of stress or abuse. Cuadros-Fernandez v. State, 316 S.W.3d 645, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6896 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 28 2009).

1550. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the expert testimony without holding a second Daubert hearing where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that nothing would be accomplished by holding one. Russeau v. State, 291 S.W.3d 426, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 878 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1551. Trial court did not err in not allowing the result of a polygraph examination into evidence, given that (1) the authorities cited by defendant were not more compelling that the authorities found to be unpersuasive on this issue, (2) the witness testified that the theory beyond polygraph examinations was scientifically valid, but his testimony did not stand up to scrutiny, (3) the witness's testimony as to how well defendant did on the test and his experience in giving the test did not show that the theory behind the technique was valid, (4) nothing showed that the test was reliable or that the specific theory behind it was valid, and (5) defendant offered little evidence to support a conclusion that polygraph evidence was based on a valid underlying scientific theory or that the examiner's conclusions would be relevant. Cyphers v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1716, 2009 WL 606550 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 11 2009).

1552. To the extent the trial court relied on case law toxic tort standards for excluding expert testimony, the trial court did not abuse its discretion; in case law, the issue was whether there was scientifically reliable evidence to support the verdict that a particular drug caused a birth defect, and in this case, the issue was whether a doctor's testimony was scientifically reliable that a drug caused or worsened a patient's renal condition. Hackett v. Littlepage & Booth, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 313 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 16 2009).

1553. Court reversed defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated and the trial court erred in denying his motion to suppress, because for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, the State failed to prove the reliability of a Light Detection and Ranging (LIDAR) device technology on which the officer relied in determining that defendant had been speeding; the officer testified that the reading on the LIDAR device was the sole basis for the stop and he did not offer any testimony suggesting that he independently observed defendant driving at a speed greater than reasonable and prudent under Tex. Transp. Code Ann. § 545.351(a). Hall v. State, 264 S.W.3d 346, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5754 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

1554. Light Detection and Ranging technology is novel scientific evidence which may be admissible only after its reliability has been judicially determined in a full-blown gatekeeping hearing; authorities cited by the State on appeal which supported the reliability of this technology might have been beneficial in resolving this issue, but they must be first presented to the trial court in a Kelly gatekeeping hearing. Hall v. State, 264 S.W.3d 346, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5754 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

1555. Using the analytical-gap analysis in a wrongful death action by appellees, a surviving spouse and children, against a hospital, a trial court could have concluded that the medical experience and knowledge of appellees' expert, and his explanation of the basis for his opinions, demonstrated that his testimony that the patient died of acute opiate toxicity that could have been avoided by monitoring the patient was reliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702.

McAllen Hosps., L.P. v. Muniz, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9683 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 13 2007).

1556. Trial court did not conduct a hearing outside the presence of the jury, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, to determine whether the State had established that an ignition interlock device met the requirements of case law, and the court did not find any authority establishing that any court had found the reliability of the ignition interlock device, and thus the trial court was not able to take judicial notice of the evidence; had the trial court previously conducted numerous gatekeeping hearings on this issue and repeatedly found evidence of the use of ignition interlock device scientifically reliable, then the trial court or the State could have put that in the record along with materials from those previous hearings. Brock v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8689 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 1 2007).

1557. Trial court erred in failing to hold a gatekeeper hearing because the ignition interlock evidence was scientific in nature, however, the error did not require reversal under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because (1) the evidence was merely cumulative, and (2) even without the evidence, defendant was still not a suitable candidate for community supervision as there was sufficient evidence to support her felony driving while intoxicated conviction and her eight-year prison term rather than community supervision, given that (1) she narrowly missed hitting someone, (2) her blood alcohol content was four times the legal limit, and (3) she refused to take responsibility for her repeated offenses. Brock v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8689 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 1 2007).

1558. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding an expert's testimony on causation of symptoms by insecticide exposure as unreliable; the expert did not analyze exposure levels, did not seek to negate other plausible causes, did not know the concentration used, and did not offer foundational data or epidemiological studies. City of Dallas v. Furgason, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7539 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 18 2007).

1559. In this negligence case related to illnesses allegedly caused by toxic mold, a company presented evidence of each of the factors used in determining the reliability of expert testimony involving scientific knowledge, and the trial court's order stated the factors it relied on in excluding the parents' expert's testimony; the court noted that the parents argued that research was still ongoing as to the causal connection between indoor exposure to mycotoxins and neurological illnesses, and while the court was not to foreclose the possibility that advances in science might require reevaluation of what "good science" was in future cases, the court was required to look to what was generally accepted in the current scientific community, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding the expert's testimony unreliable and in excluding his testimony. Gaudette v. Conn Appliances, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7315 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 6 2007).

1560. Trial court did not err in admitting an expert's testimony addressing the distance between the gun and the victim when the gun was discharged; the expert was board certified and had performed around 10,000 autopsies, he had been trained in gunshot wounds, and his testimony was based on his expertise as a medical examiner and his examination and evaluation of the characteristics of the victim's wound, plus he identified his discharge distance as an estimate and explained how that distance could be more accurately determined; defendant did not produce a ballistics expert to provide a discharge distance that contradicted the expert's estimate and failed to show how the degree of imprecision in the estimate rendered it unreliable. Pollard v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7302 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 5 2007).

1561. Reliability of "soft" science evidence, such as was offered in defendant's trial for indecency with a child, was capable of being established by showing that the field of expertise was legitimate, the subject matter of the testimony was within the scope of that field, and the expert's testimony properly relied on or utilized the principles involved in that field. Wright v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4700 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 14 2007).

1562. In defendant's trial for indecency with a child, given that a forensic child interviewer testified that the protocol of RATAC, which stood for rapport, anatomy, identification, touch inquiry, abuse scenario, and closure, (1) was developed by a child forensic training institute, (2) was backed by a research institute, (3) was generally accepted in the scientific community for conducting forensic interviews of children, and (4) that county workers were trained to use this protocol in interviewing children, it was established that the field of expertise involved was a legitimate one and that the subject matter of the interviewer's testimony was within the scope of that field. Wright v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4700 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 14 2007).

1563. In defendant's trial for indecency with a child, a forensic child interviewer used the protocol of RATAC, which stood for rapport, anatomy, identification, touch inquiry, abuse scenario, and closure, to review the propriety of an interview of the victim and stated that her job was not to determine whether the victim was telling the truth in her allegations; the interviewer's testimony properly relied upon or utilized the principles involved in that field. Wright v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4700 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 14 2007).

1564. In defendant's trial for indecency with a child, while there was conflicting evidence as to whether a certain protocol used in interviewing child witnesses was valid, the forensic child interviewer's testimony was sufficiently relevant and reliable such that its admission did not constitute an abuse of discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Wright v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4700 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 14 2007).

1565. Doctor was proffered as an expert witness in the field of psychology, which was a legitimate and recognized field of expertise, and the reliability of eyewitness identification was a legitimate subject matter within the psychology field; the proffered testimony was arrived at after proper utilization of the principles involved in the psychology field, such that the evidence was admissible and the trial court erred in excluding it. Stephenson v. State, 226 S.W.3d 622, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3125 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

1566. Given that the reliability of the eyewitness identification was a vital aspect of the case, the trial court's decision to exclude the expert testimony significantly impaired defendant's ability to present a defense and was of constitutional proportions for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, and thus under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(a), the court was unable to find that the error did not contribute to the conviction. Stephenson v. State, 226 S.W.3d 622, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3125 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

1567. When DNA evidence was offered properly in a hearing outside the jury's presence, the evidence and expert witness were established within the Daubert standard; the trial court could have found that the witness followed the current laboratory protocol upon discovering contamination, as a new extraction was made and the contamination, from uncleaned scissors, was not present in the second test. Stewart v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2029 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 15 2007).

1568. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence the testimony of the contractor's expert witness because his testimony did not include the criticized "as-release method" for calculating damages, but rather was limited to the valuation of the work the contractor performed; the expert's testimony regarding the calculation of the reasonable value of the work performed by the contractor was objectively verifiable and was based on unit pricing and quantities and utilized standard estimating techniques. Formosa Plastics Corp., USA v. Kajima Int'l, Inc., 216 S.W.3d 436, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11098 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

1569. When the appellate court in a sexual assault trial improperly evaluated the qualifications of a proposed defense expert, a certified legal nurse consultant, under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), 401, 402, and 702, and did not evaluate the reliability of the consultant's proposed testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and did not give proper deference to the trial judge's decision not to allow her to testify as an expert, the appellate court's judgment was vacated, and case was remanded to allow the appellate court to conduct a proper analysis. Vela v. State, 209 S.W.3d 128, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2384 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1570. Expert's testimony was more akin to a soft science because the testimony was based primarily upon experience and training as opposed to a scientific method, and the expert's testimony was within the scope of the field and relied upon and utilized the principles involved in sexual assault nursing, such that under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court did not err in admitting this testimony. Denton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6662 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 27 2006).

1571. Expert's testimony as to how an automobile passenger's body and head moved during an accident was reliable in that the expert was a biomechanical engineer who had completed some medical school; further, she had developed scientific models to determine reasonably what happened to people and how their head injuries occurred that were used by engineers in the field. GMC v. Burry, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5736, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17487 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 29 2006).

1572. With respect to vertical gaze nystagmus, the court has concluded that it was novel scientific evidence that had not yet been evaluated and found to be scientifically reliable; that conclusion has not changed, but neither has the contrary proposition been established, that vertical gaze nystagmus evidence may never be received. Cook v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5068 (Tex. App. Tyler June 14 2006).

1573. In a medical malpractice action, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony from the deceased patient's expert witnesses because the experts were all highly qualified and had extensive experience in their respective fields, and they based their opinions on the objective data contained in the medical records of the deceased patient as required under Tex. R. Evid. 702; the doctors did not challenge the experts' qualifications; rather the doctors' claims of unreliability went to the weight to be given the expert testimony, not its reliability. Brandt v. Surber, 194 S.W.3d 108, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4962 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

1574. Even though the appellate court erred by limiting the scope of its review to those questions asked of the expert initially during voir dire and excluding testimony developed during defendant's subsequent cross-examination of the expert, it correctly determined that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the expert's testimony, as testimony concerning shoe and tire print comparisons had long been admissible by either lay or expert witnesses, the jury heard descriptions of the physical comparisons upon which the expert based his conclusions, and the exhibits the expert relied on for his physical comparisons were admitted into evidence and were available to the jury during its deliberations; the jury could make its own comparisons. Rodgers v. State, 205 S.W.3d 525, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 852 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Helpfulness

1575. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in disallowing the mother's expert's testimony because it would not have assisted the finder of fact. In the Interest of D.W.C., 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5166 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 15 2014).

1576. At defendant's DWI trial, the court did not deny his rights under the Sixth Amendment by limiting his cross-examination of the State's witness who was a former breath test technical advisor. Because the witness indicated at a Rule 702 hearing outside the presence of the jury that he no longer felt comfortable testifying as an expert in the field, the trial court properly excluded testimony that was not sufficiently reliable to assist the jury in reaching an accurate result. Balderama v. State, 421 S.W.3d 247, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15133, 2013 WL 6637703 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 18 2013).

1577. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, the testimony of a forensic interviewer could have been viewed as a description of what was said, as the interviewer did not testify that she believed the child was being truthful, and it would not have been outside the zone of disagreement for the trial court to have found that the testimony would assist the jury. Page v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10153 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 15 2013).

1578. At defendant's trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a licensed professional counselor who treated sex offenders; the expert's testimony about grooming for a sexual offense was relevant to assist the jury in understanding defendant's behavior. Cox v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8890 (Tex. App. Waco July 18 2013).

1579. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court's determination to allow the State's expert to testify to the level of cocaine found in defendant's blood sample, both at the time of blood draw and at the time of the incident, fell within the zone of reasonable disagreement, even though the expert identified trace levels of the drug that were below minimums set by the Department of Public Safety. Bekendam v. State, 398 S.W.3d 358, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3064 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 21 2013).

1580. Trial court's conclusion the counselor's testimony would aid the jury in understanding the victim's actions and resolving the contradictions in her trial testimony was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. Hill v. State, 392 S.W.3d 850, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 453, 2013 WL 174062 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 16 2013).

1581. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the member's expert's testimony where it could have reasonably concluded that the expert opinions were more than just ordinary, bare assertions based solely on the husband's valuations. Whitmire v. Nat'l Cutting Horse Ass'n, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8518 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 11 2012).

1582. Defendant's conviction for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 was improper because admitting the statistical opinion on false allegations was error and the admission of the opinion likely affected defendant's substantial rights. An expert was not permitted to give an opinion as to whether a person, or a class of persons to which the complainant belonged, was truthful. Wiseman v. State, 394 S.W.3d 582, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6255, 2012 WL 3125130 (Tex. App. Dallas July 31 2012).

1583. During defendant's trial for sexual assault, the court did not err in admitting automatic vehicle locator (AVL) data showing the location of his patrol car on the dates and times the victim, a prostitute, was sexually assaulted; the testimony of an internal affairs police officer regarding interpretation of the AVL data was helpful to the jury. Demetrie Trevail Dixon v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5156, 2012 WL 2452842 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 28 2012).

1584. In a case in which defendant was convicted of trafficking of persons, aggravated sexual assault, aggravated kidnapping, and compelling prostitution, defendant failed to establish that his trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to object to a witness's testimony where it could not be said that the trial court would have abused its discretion by allowing the witness's testimony had trial counsel objected. The trial court could have concluded that the witness's testimony about delayed outcries, how victims responded to sexual abuse, and how the abuse was reported was the special knowledge or additional insight that could be helpful to the jury. Moreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4077, 2012 WL 1864490 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 23 2012).

1585. During a murder trial, the court did not err in refusing to permit defendant's expert witness to testify because how a trained Marine instinctively reacted to a perceived threat was not relevant to the issue of whether an ordinary and prudent man, viewing the circumstances from defendant's viewpoint, would have formed a reasonable belief that deadly force was immediately necessary to protect himself from the use or attempted use of unlawful deadly force. Echavarria v. State, 362 S.W.3d 148, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10188 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 30 2011).

1586. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of the patron's expert, a safety engineer, because the trial court could have reasonably determined that the engineer's opinion would not assist a jury in determining if the condition of the walkway posed an unreasonable risk of harm. From photographs and testimony about prior falls and complaints, a jury would have been able to form its own conclusion about whether the walkway posed an unreasonable risk of harm.

1587. Expert testimony on grooming of children for sexual molestation is useful to the jury. Morris v. State, 361 S.W.3d 649, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1664 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 7 2011).

1588. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a counselor who worked with victims of family violence because it was not improper bolstering testimony, as the victim, defendant's girlfriend, was vigorously cross-examined and impeached. The testimony also helped explain why the victim refused to report the abuse and why she recanted her affidavit of non- prosecution. Zavala v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9565, 2011 WL 6089935 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 7 2011).

1589. During defendant's trial for capital murder, the court erred in holding that a defense expert on eyewitness identifications was not permitted to testify before the jury because the evidence, which was reliable and relevant, would have assisted the jury by increasing the jurors' awareness of biasing factors in eyewitness identification. Tillman v. State, 354 S.W.3d 425, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1343 (Tex. Crim. App. Oct. 5 2011).

1590. Expert testimony was not necessary in a premise defect suit against a county that had covered an oil spill on a road with dirt because it was common knowledge that an oily mixture on a road would be slick and could interfere with a driver's ability to stop. Pitts v. Winkler County, 351 S.W.3d 564, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7643 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 21 2011).

1591. Doctor opined that the decedent died of exsanguinations as a result of his collision with the driver, but these statements were no more than speculation as to the cause of death; given that the doctor was not able to rule out other plausible causes of death and because an autopsy was not conducted and the doctor failed to review the decedents' medical records, the trial court did not err in finding that the doctor's testimony was not reliable and would fail to be helpful to the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1592. Trial court erred in awarding damages to appellee in a negligence action against a taxi cab company because appellee failed to present any expert testimony to prove the claim; the standard of care applicable to the placement of specialized equipment within a cab, which was necessary for its operation and was governed by industry standards, was not within a person's general knowledge. Greater San Antonio Transp. Co. v. Polito, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5502, 2011 WL 2893080 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 20 2011).

1593. Court did not abuse its discretion by finding the canine handler properly relied on or utilized the principles involved in the field and finding the lineup was objective, because defendant presented no challenge to the canine handler's expertise, and defendant cited no evidence of a requirement or recommendation that the officer who placed the samples should then abstain from any further participation in the process. Powell v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2986, 2011 WL 1579734 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 21 2011).

1594. Plat records were susceptible to only one reasonable interpretation and thus presented purely legal questions, and thus the issue was not a matter for which expert opinion testimony would assist the trier of fact under Tex. R. Evid. 702; appellant did not show how the exclusion of the expert's affidavit probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1, and any error was harmless. Infiniti Hotel Group, LLC

v. Patel, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2655, 2011 WL 1344605 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 8 2011).

1595. Court presumed without deciding that an objection to relevance preserved the alleged error that testimony did not assist the trier of fact for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702; the court did not need to decide this issue because appellant's argument failed on the merits. Shaw v. State, 329 S.W.3d 645, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8902 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 9 2010).

1596. Officer, based on her experience, testified that sexually abused children often cry out to multiple persons, making the child's similar actions appropriate, and this enhanced an inference drawn from the fact that the child cried out to multiple adults and made it more probable that she was sexually abused; the officer's testimony was about a child victim's behavior, not a direct opinion on whether the child was telling the truth, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the officer's testimony, as it was relevant and assisted the trier of fact. Shaw v. State, 329 S.W.3d 645, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8902 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 9 2010).

1597. Trial court did not err by admitting an investigator's testimony about the prison classification system and violence in prisons during sentencing because it was admissible as rebuttal educator-expert evidence. Coble v. State, 330 S.W.3d 253, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1297 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1598. Trial court did not err by permitting a doctor to testify regarding patterns of disclosure of sexual abuse by children under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the doctor was qualified by virtue of her education, knowledge, training, and experience, and because the testimony would aid the jury in understanding why the victim waited four years before telling her father about the sexual assault; the doctor testified that it was common for a child to delay making an outcry to an adult if the perpetrator had threatened to harm someone the child loved. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7915, 2010 WL 3783946 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 29 2010).

1599. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the medical examiner's testimony and autopsy report under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the evidence was relevant in that it helped the trial court determine whether the decedent had suffered serious bodily injury and it was free to give whatever mitigating or aggravating weight it deemed appropriate. Compton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5375, 2010 WL 2698775 (Tex. App. Dallas July 9 2010).

1600. Because forgery was not pleaded as an affirmative defense under Tex. R. Civ. P. 94 in a suit for a constructive trust, handwriting evidence was not helpful and thus was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 702. Estate of Wallis, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3710, 2010 WL 1987514 (Tex. App. Tyler May 19 2010).

1601. Defendant complained that a pediatrician's expert testimony would not assist the jury and that her testimony was unreliable; the court concluded that the trial court impliedly overruled these complaints by allowing the pediatrician's testimony, and given that defendant objected to the pediatrician's diagnostic impression testimony twice, the issue was preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Casillas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2888, 2010 WL 1609697 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2010).

1602. Defendant specifically objected to a pediatrician's expert testimony about studies because it would not help the jury decide what happened in this case, and the trial court overruled this objection; defendant's complaint was preserved for review. Casillas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2888, 2010 WL 1609697 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2010).

1603. Pediatrician testified that her diagnostic impression would differ from a nurse's, and that her diagnostic impression would be sexual abuse; the trial court could have reasonably determined that the pediatrician's testimony regarding her diagnostic impression was not merely an impermissible attempt to bolster the credibility of the complaining witness, but would assist the jury in understanding the evidence. Casillas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2888, 2010 WL 1609697 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2010).

1604. Whether the child victim was penetrated by defendant was at issue in this case for aggravated sexual assault and indecency; the trial court could have reasonably determined that the pediatrician expert's testimony that children who are sexually abused by way of penetration might not show any physical injuries was relevant and assisted the jury in understanding the evidence in this case, such that the trial court did not err in admitting the expert's testimony. Casillas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2888, 2010 WL 1609697 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2010).

1605. Ultimate determination of whether a drug manufacturer's conduct comported with that degree of care which a reasonably prudent drug manufacturer would use under the same or similar circumstances was well within the experience of persons of ordinary intelligence; hence, expert opinion evidence was not essential to a claim of negligence by a decedent's family regarding the manufacture of a prescription pain patch. Alza Corp. v. Thompson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2347, 2010 WL 1254610 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 1 2010).

1606. Defendant did not specifically object to an expert's testimony based on her alleged failure to tie the facts of the case to scientific principles; however, even had defendant properly objected, the trial court could have overruled the objection, the expert reviewed numerous documents prior to forming her opinion and the expert's testimony showed a thorough understanding of the particular facts of the case, such that the trial court could have found that the expert had sufficient facts and data upon which to base her opinions. Saenz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1519 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2010).

1607. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the court did not err in admitting a Texas ranger's testimony about methodology and grooming; the ranger had participated in several hundred cases related to sexual offenses against children and had been the primary investigator or played a significant role in approximately 75 of those cases. Morris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1293 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 25 2010).

1608. Structural engineer's report was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because it was helpful to a zoning board in ruling on an application to demolish property in a historical area, and it provided substantive and probative evidence to justify the denial of a permit under regulations adopted pursuant to Tex. Loc. Gov't Code Ann. § 211.003(b). Christopher Columbus St. Mkt. Llc v. Zoning Bd. of Adjustments of Galveston, 302 S.W.3d 408, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8763 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 13 2009).

1609. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly denied defendant's witness's testimony relating to the field of false confessions because the witness's testimony could not have assisted the jury in understanding the evidence or in making a determination of a fact issue. He did not intend to offer an opinion as to the truth or falsity of defendant's confession, and during cross-examination defendant admitted the truth of the portions of his confession that he earlier claimed were inaccurate. Munoz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6475, 2009 WL 2517664 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 19 2009).

1610. In a sexual assault case, an officer was properly allowed to testify regarding defendant's "grooming" the victim for sexual assaults because he had been a police officer for thirty years, he had investigated twenty sexual assault and child abuse cases per year, and he testified that it was his opinion based on his investigation that defendant had been "grooming" the victim prior to her outcry. He explained that sexual predators often developed a relationship with a victim to build trust, and then started committing small offenses to see if the victim made an outcry. Weatherly v. State, 283 S.W.3d 481, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2435 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 1 2009).

1611. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a Child Protective Services' supervisor because she did not vouch for the victim's truthfulness in their allegations or express her opinion as to whether sexual abuse had occurred. Rather, she testified that her agency's investigation resulted in a conclusion that, based on the victims' accounts, there was reason to believe that defendant had sexually abuse them; the testimony could assist a trier of fact in determining an issue for which the jury was not qualified to the best possible degree in deciding whether the alleged events occurred. Wagner v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2423 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

1612. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the trial court properly excluded defendant's proffered expert testimony regarding memory because the expert would have testified in general about memory and how it could be faulty or distorted, but he would not have tied that opinion to a material fact at issue in the case. He never met with the victim, and there was no showing that the types of tests used in the studies and articles he described were ever performed on the victim. Hales v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1589, 2009 WL 565713 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 6 2009).

1613. In a condemnation case, the evidence was legally and factually sufficient to support the jury's finding of the condemned property's fair market value; the jury was presented with documentary evidence as well as expert testimony from which it could evaluate the property's fair market value, the jury was free to find certain testimony more persuasive, the jury's finding fell within the range of the evidence, and the court did not know and did not need to know how the jury arrived at its finding because the finding of market value was supported by more than a scintilla of the evidence. Waterways on the Intercoastal, Ltd. v. State, 283 S.W.3d 36, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3799 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 26 2009).

1614. In a case involving the sexual assault of a child, it was impermissible for an expert to testify that a complaining witness was telling the truth; such expert testimony did not assist the jury. The error was not harmless because the expert went beyond simply applying well understood standards to a given fact pattern; rather, she staked her reputation on her conclusion that there was nothing troubling about the testimony from the complaining witness and the State's case. Long v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1090, 2009 WL 387018 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 18 2009).

1615. Because it was dispositive, under Tex. R. App. P. 47.1, the court limited its review to the ground that a witness's testimony was not reliable for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Hackett v. Littlepage & Booth, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 313 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 16 2009).

1616. Doctor concluded that a drug adversely affected a client's renal condition and at best, his medical records did not foreclose the doctor's conclusions, but the doctor did not rule out other possible causes for the client's renal condition and the doctor was unable to provide case studies, peer review, or medical publications to support his conclusion that the drug caused the worsening of the client's condition; the trial court could have found that the doctor's conclusions amounted to not more than unsupported speculation and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the doctor and sustaining law firms' objections to the doctor's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Hackett v. Littlepage & Booth, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 313 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 16 2009).

1617. In an aggravated assault case where insanity was an issue, a trial court did not err by excluding the testimony of a psychiatrist regarding defendant's mental condition in 2007 as irrelevant because the psychiatrist did not have any information regarding defendant's mental state in 2005 when the crime was committed. Likewise, records of defendant's visit to an emergency room in 2007 where he saw the psychiatrist were properly excluded for the same reason. Wiley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 225, 2008 WL 5501149 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 14 2009).

1618. Court properly excluded expert testimony because the jury was equally competent to form an opinion about the ultimate fact issues, namely the voluntariness of defendant's statement. Because the expert's testimony impermissibly offered a direct opinion as to the truthfulness of defendant's statement, the court properly excluded it. Contreras v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 91, 2009 WL 50601 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 8 2009).

1619. Experienced truck driver, also the plaintiff in a truck roll-over accident case, was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to give an expert opinion that the shipper had improperly loaded the cargo, beer, by stacking the pallets too high and not using void fillers to keep the load from shifting. Dewbre v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9046 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 26 2008).

1620. In a trial for child sexual assault, a State medical expert did not testify that the victim was truthful or that sexual abuse victims, as a class, were truthful. To the contrary, the expert properly testified, under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 702, that, although not definitive, the complainant's physical condition was consistent with the abuse later described. Reyes v. State, 274 S.W.3d 724, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5921 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2008).

1621. Court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, given that (1) counsel obtained pretrial competency and sanity evaluations of defendant, (2) counsel placed before the jury defendant's claim that his depression medication affected him by introducing evaluations into evidence and three family members who testified to his depressed condition, plus counsel argued that defendant's depression and self-medication were mitigating factors; counsel's decision not to call an expert at punishment was not an economical one, counsel made personal investigations into the effects of the drug defendant took and counsel determined that defendant knew right from wrong at the time of the offense, such that calling an expert at punishment might have compromised counsel's argument in mitigation, and defendant did not show how expert testimony could have benefitted him. Pool v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 677 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 31 2008).

1622. In an aggravated assault prosecution, the trial court did not err in admitting a police officer's expert testimony concerning the propensity of family violence victims to return to the family members who abused them because he was qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 based on his knowledge, training, and experience; further, his testimony was an appropriate subject for expert testimony as it assisted the jury by helping it to understand the evidence regarding the complainant's post-assault behavior in returning to defendant. Dixon v. State, 244 S.W.3d 472, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9292 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1623. Effect of seismic testing on structures is a very technical area and necessitates expert testimony as to whether the testing caused the damage alleged in the case. Adair v. Veritas DGC Land, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7744 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 27 2007).

1624. In a negligence case, expert testimony that a tank would have ruptured even if a relief valve had not been disabled was properly excluded because it was not probative of the cause in fact of the explosion or injuries under the actual circumstances; because there was no legally sufficient evidence of causation, other asserted errors were harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44. Goss v. Kellogg Brown & Root, Inc., 232 S.W.3d 816, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6621 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1625. In a civil commitment proceeding wherein appellant was found to be a sexually violent predator, the testimony of the State's expert witness, a board-certified psychiatrist, was not improperly admitted because she too narrowly defined "sexually violent offenses;" despite the fact that her definition was narrower than that found in Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002(8), it fell within the ambit of those offenses specified therein, and her use of a more narrow definition went to the weight that a jury might choose to give her testimony; further, appellant's pen packet proved that he, on more than one prior occasion, had been convicted of sexually violent offenses; thus, he had not demonstrated that the expert's testimony was unreliable, and her opinion remained of assistance, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, to the jury in determining a fact in issue. In re Commitment of Gollihar, 224 S.W.3d 843, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3786 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

1626. In a medical malpractice case, while a doctor admitted being unfamiliar with the disease process in question, the court agreed with the appellate court's detailed analysis that the doctor's opinions were reliable. Jackson v. Axelrad, 221 S.W.3d 650, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 323, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 628 (Tex. 2007).

1627. Objection to an affidavit in support of summary judgment was properly overruled in a case involving business disparagement, tortious interference, and false advertising between competitors because the affiant was qualified to testify as an expert regarding the quality of materials used by one of the parties to manufacture utility bodies since he had been in the industry at issue for 36 years, and the average person was unfamiliar with the types and quality of such materials. A v. B, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3311 (Tex. App. 2007).

1628. Trial court did not err in excluding certain expert testimony because it would not have aided the jury in determining the ultimate fact issues. In re W.A.R., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11001 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 20 2006).

1629. Although a medical study referred to by a doctor in his testimony at defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 involved females older than the complainant and under different circumstances, the evidence was relevant because the doctor was in the best position to explain to the jury why the genitalia of sexually abused victims often exhibited no physical signs of penetration, and he tied the study to his earlier conclusion that he was not surprised about the lack of physical evidence of penetration in the complainant's genital examination, which assisted the trier of fact to understand the lack of physical evidence; the testimony showed that the farther away in time the examination was from the abuse, the less likely there would be physical evidence of penetration, and, accordingly, the trial court properly admitted the testimony. Whitfield v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9726 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 9 2006).

1630. In the deceased accountant's employer's action seeking to impose a constructive trust on the accountant's life insurance policies that named his wife as beneficiary, the trial court did not err in determining that the deceased accountant's employer established the reliability of its expert testimony under the requirements of Daubert standard because the expert's use of the family expense method to determine whether the life insurance premiums were paid from the funds the accountant embezzled from the employer was reasonable and did not depend upon an analysis of the sequence in which deposits and withdrawals were made; also Tex. R. Evid. 702 contemplates a flexible inquiry and provides for the admission of expert testimony that actually assists the finder of fact. Paschal v. Great W. Drilling, Ltd., 215 S.W.3d 437, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8998, 165 Oil & Gas Rep. 504 (Tex. App. Eastland 2006).

1631. Sufficient evidence supported defendant's conviction of the murder of his roommate under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02 where conflicting evidence was presented and the jury chose to reject defendant's testimony and credit the consistent testimony of two disinterested witnesses who stated they saw defendant repeatedly stab the victim and who were familiar with the roommates; also, expert testimony on eyewitness misidentification was properly excluded because even if the expert's testimony was reliable and relevant, the expert did not apply his abstract theories to the specific facts of the case; therefore the excluded expert testimony would have had little probative effect and was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Rodriguez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6650 (Tex. App. Dallas July 27 2006).

1632. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted expert testimony regarding sadism because the alleged abuse was sadistic in nature, the expert's testimony regarding sadism shed light on such relevant issues as how the abuse might have injured and psychologically affected the victims, how the victims might have been threatened and placed in fear, and whether any behavior the victims engaged in with each other might have been coerced. Hatter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4516 (Tex. App. Austin May 26 2006).

1633. Defendant's conviction for the felony offense of injury to a child younger than 15 years of age was appropriate because, although he contended that a physician's testimony about the typical types of injuries that resulted from child abuse was irrelevant, the court held that the information was likely to assist the jury in determining whether his son's injuries were the result of abuse, as permitted by Tex. R. Evid. 702. Valdez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10217 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 8 2005).

1634. Even if defense counsel had timely objected to the expert's statement regarding Hispanic households, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling the objection because testimony that Hispanic children were taught to listen to their parents was not equivalent to opinion testimony stating that because the child complainant was Hispanic, she was telling the truth, and expert testimony that provided useful information to aid the jury in evaluating the testimony of another witness was admissible. Alfaro v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1851, 2014 WL 1017868 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 19 2014).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Kelly-Frye Process

1635. Trial court did not err by admitting expert testimony because the underlying scientific theory, that the 3-chlorotyrosine detected in the victims' blood came from a bleach injection, was valid and could be clearly explained, the use of a gas chromatography mass spectrometer to apply the theory to humans was valid, the theory was accepted by the relevant scientific community, the theory had been applied in testing on human blood plasma, and literature existed that supported the underlying theory. Saenz v. State, 421 S.W.3d 725, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 591, 2014 WL 223220 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 22 2014).

1636. Trial court did not err by admitting expert testimony because the underlying scientific theory, that the 3-chlorotyrosine detected in the victims' blood came from a bleach injection, was valid and could be clearly explained, the use of a gas chromatography mass spectrometer to apply the theory to humans was valid, the theory was accepted by the relevant scientific community, the theory had been applied in testing on human blood plasma, and literature existed that supported the underlying theory. Saenz v. State, 421 S.W.3d 725, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 591, 2014 WL 223220 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 22 2014).

1637. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by ruling that defendant's expert could not testify as to his opinion that defendant fit the profile of someone who would be susceptible to giving a false confession because there was a lack of evidence showing that the expert's testimony properly relied on or utilized the principles involved in the field. Coleman v. State, 440 S.W.3d 218, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13205, 2013 WL 5758084 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 24 2013).

1638. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court's determination to allow the State's expert to testify to the level of cocaine found in defendant's blood sample, both at the time of blood draw and at the time of the incident, fell within the zone of reasonable disagreement, even though the expert identified trace levels of the drug that were below minimums set by the Department of Public Safety. Bekendam v. State, 398 S.W.3d 358, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3064 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 21 2013).

1639. Trooper's testimony was not novel scientific evidence, but was expert testimony from someone who gained his expertise through training and experience, and thus criteria in Kelly v. State was inapplicable to this situation. Stovall v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5571, 2012 WL 2862369 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1640. Defendant had filed a motion to preclude the State from offering horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) evidence, but because it had been previously held that HGN evidence was scientifically reliable, the State was not required to present evidence on the first two factors of the reliability test in this case. Murphy v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166, 2010 WL 1729341 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 29 2010).

1641. As to the third reliability factor, nothing in defendant's motion to exclude horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) evidence provided a basis for a hearing or a ruling, as defendant did not identify any specific problem with the manner in which the HGN test was administered; because the motion did not identify any issue requiring the trial court to rule, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion without a hearing before trial. Murphy v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166, 2010 WL 1729341 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 29 2010).

1642. Because defendant did not point out his specific expert testimony complaints to the trial court, he failed to preserve error concerning any horizontal gaze nystagmus testimony actually offered at trial. Murphy v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166, 2010 WL 1729341 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 29 2010).

1643. Defendant argued that certain factors were to apply to the expert's testimony because his methodology involved more than just observation and involved starting from a question of whether the child had been sexually abused, but in reviewing the expert's testimony regarding his methodology, it was not an appropriate case for employing the Kelly v. State factors; the court instead believed that the methodology was the kind of soft science based primarily upon experience and training referred to by other case law, and thus the Kelly factors did not apply to the expert's testimony and the soft sciences standard should apply, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Chavarria v. State, 307 S.W.3d 386, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9059 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 25 2009).

1644. Pursuant to case law and the soft sciences standard, in determining whether an expert's testimony was reliable, the trial court should have inquired about the following: (1) whether the field of expertise was a legitimate one, (2) whether the subject matter of the expert's testimony was within the scope of that field; and (3) whether the expert's testimony properly relied on or utilized the principles involved in the field. Chavarria v. State, 307 S.W.3d 386, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9059 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 25 2009).

1645. Given that (1) research concerning the behavioral characteristics of sexually abused children had been recognized as a legitimate field of expertise, (2) the expert specialized in child abuse, (3) his testimony relating to his examination of the child was within the scope of his expertise, and (4) he relied on texts accepted and used by others in the field and followed the protocols and procedures included in those texts, the trial court did not err in finding that the expert's testimony was reliable. Chavarria v. State, 307 S.W.3d 386, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9059 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 25 2009).

1646. Defendant's criticism of an expert for employing what defendant called a patchwork of techniques went to the weight, not the admissibility, of the expert's testimony. Chavarria v. State, 307 S.W.3d 386, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9059 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 25 2009).

1647. Employer's expert's proffered testimony was that the employee, although not high on cocaine at the time of the accident, was impaired by his prior cocaine use, and the trial court ruled that the opinion was scientifically unreliable and did not meet the predicate for admissibility required by Tex. R. Evid. 702; given the questions raised about the evidence, the trial court's ruling was within the zone of reasonable disagreement and was in the trial court's discretion, and no abuse of discretion was shown to support the employer's claim for mandamus relief. In re Pilgrim's Pride Corp., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8619 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 17 2008).

1648. Court found that the employer had an adequate remedy at law by way of appeal, if that was to prove necessary, regarding the trial court's ruling that expert testimony did not meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 702, and this made mandamus relief improper; the court presumed that the transcript of the trial court's hearing on the admissibility of testimony would be available in a post-trial direct appeal, the employer had not been stripped of its only viable defenses, and because this was a non-healthcare personal injury claim, the court did not find that case law mandated expanding the reach of extraordinary relief to this case. In re Pilgrim's Pride Corp., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8619 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 17 2008).

1649. In a case involving intoxication manslaughter, a trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 on the issues of accident reconstruction and drug detection because the experts were qualified due to training, education, and experience; moreover, the three criteria in Kelly v. State, 824 S.W.2d 568 (Tex. Crim. App. 1992), were satisfied. The experts testified about effects of marijuana and alcohol in a person's body, as well as to defendant's speed at the time of a fatal accident. Wooten v. State, 267 S.W.3d 289, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5497 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

1650. In a case involving intoxication manslaughter, a trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing defendant's Dade Dimension RXL blood-alcohol results or expert-witness testimony regarding appellant's blood-test results to be presented to the jury; the trial court was satisfied with expert testimony as to the underlying scientific theory involving photomatic readings of the absorbent matter created from an enzymatic reaction caused by mixing a reagent with blood serum. It was within the zone of reasonable disagreement for the trial court to conclude the State met the three factors under Kelly v. State, 824 S.W.2d 568 (Tex. Crim. App. 1992), by clear and convincing evidence regarding the Dade Dimension RXL. Wooten v. State, 267 S.W.3d 289, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5497 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

1651. In defendant's driving while intoxicated trial, the trial court properly admitted evidence of a horizontal gaze nystagmus test for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702; the officer testified that the prolonged test administered when defendant refused to follow instructions would not have caused fatigue nystagmus. Fernandez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8248 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 21 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Qualifications

1652. Regarding their health care liability claim, the parents were required to establish that the expert was qualified on the basis of knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education to offer opinions concerning the causal link between the alleged breaches of the standard of care by the doctor and the injuries suffered by the parents' baby. Cornejo v. Hilgers, 446 S.W.3d 113, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9019 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 14 2014).

1653. Expert's report demonstrated that he had specific expertise in the relevant areas of obstetrical complications in pregnancy, and the expert was qualified to opine as to the causal relationship between a newborn's injuries and the failure of a doctor to recognize complications in pregnancy and take appropriate actions; the expert did not have to be certified or treat newborns to be qualified to opine, and the trial court erred in granting motions to dismiss the parents' claims on the ground that the expert was not qualified to opine on the issue of causation. Cornejo v. Hilgers, 446 S.W.3d 113, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9019 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 14 2014).

1654. Trial court did not err by allowing a physician's assistant to testify that the infant victim's injury presented a substantial risk of death from which he would have died without medical intervention because the assistant was qualified to do so under this rule 702 based on the evidence of his education and experience. Scott v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7793 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 17 2014).

1655. Expert is not obligated to have a license to testify under the Texas Supreme Court's own rules of evidence if the person is otherwise qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Tyson Fresh Meats, Inc. v. Abdi, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5693 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 28 2014).

1656. It may well be that the witness was not qualified to testify about the design and implementation of safety systems, yet that was not the focus of his testimony. The injured party proffered him as a human factors and industrial safety expert, and his expertise dealt with analyzing the safety measures implemented in various industries via the application of, among other things, the American Society of Mechanical Engineers standards that the employer's expert reluctantly deemed relevant. Tyson Fresh Meats, Inc. v. Abdi, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5693 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 28 2014).

1657. Licensed professional counselor was qualified to render a diagnosis that the victim suffered posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) as a result of the abuse because she was authorized to diagnose mental and emotional disorders under Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 503.003(a)(2)-(4)and PTSD was a recognized mental disorder. Melder v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5130 (Tex. App. Tyler May 14 2014).

1658. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in overruling his objection to a police detective's qualifications as an expert. The detective testified that she had investigated sex crimes against children for four and a half years; she had 4,000 hours of training and education in the area of child sexual abuse; and she had taken 20 classroom hours at the world's largest conference about crimes against children. Washington v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 933 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 30 2014).

1659. In an aggravated robbery case, a forensic psychologist demonstrated that he had knowledge about various confounding factors that may exist in a witness's ability to accurately recall, describe, and identify the perpetrator seen committing a crime. To the extent the trial court disallowed the psychologist's testimony based on his qualifications as an expert in the weapon focus effect, the trial court abused its discretion. Blasdell v. State, 420 S.W.3d 406, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 167, 2014 WL 68801 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 8 2014).

1660. Expert was not qualified to opine regarding the alleged marketing or design defects in the defibrillator or its battery because he did not test the actual device involved in this case and he did not express specific expertise regarding defibrillators and batteries. Schronk v. Laerdal Med. Corp., 440 S.W.3d 250, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15024, 2013 WL 6570907 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 12 2013).

1661. Expert testimony on victim recantation was properly admitted during defendant's trial for injuring his elderly father where the expert witness, a caseworker in the family criminal law division of the district attorney's office, was qualified to testify as an expert because she detailed her experience working with victims of domestic violence and dealing with their tendency to minimize or recant allegations of abuse; the expert's testimony was relevant to understanding why the complainant might have changed his account of the incident that led to defendant's prosecution. Salinas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14761, 2013 WL 6328863 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 5 2013).

1662. Trial court properly allowed a crime laboratory chemist to testify as to the pharmacological effects of a particular prescription drug on the human body because the field of expertise necessary was not particularly complex, and because the chemist stated that she was familiar with the drug and had taken courses on the toxicological effects of drugs on the body; moreover, the information the chemist provided was not conclusive on a material issue and was not central in determining defendant's guilt or innocence. Ruiz v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14013, 2013 WL 6047030 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 14 2013).

1663. Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the officer to testify as an expert on the HGN test, because the officer was certified at the time he administered the HGN test, and he further testified that he had extensive training in administering the test. Leigh v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13248, 2013 WL 5777852 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 24 2013).

1664. Because the chiropractor's education consisted of a three-and-a-half year program with rigorous courses on the musculoskeletal systems, as well as courses in neurology and radiology, and he had treated thousands of patients, approximately one-half of whom come to him having sustained physical injuries, appellee's chiropractor was qualified based on his knowledge, experience, education, and training to testify as an expert regarding appellee's injury and the reasonableness and necessity of his treatment. Treimee Corp. v. Garcia, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11104 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 29 2013).

1665. Because appellee's chiropractor was qualified to testify as an expert witness on the reasonableness and necessity of appellee's treatment, and his testimony was reliable, there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's damage award for past medical expenses. Treimee Corp. v. Garcia, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11104 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 29 2013).

1666. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that a child forensic interviewer was qualified to express her opinion about "rolling disclosures" because she had a bachelor's degree in and was licensed as a social worker, she had conducted 1,000 forensic interviews of children, and she obtained her knowledge of rolling disclosures through training, seminars, and education. Lair v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9906 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 8 2013).

1667. Finding in favor of the employee in a workers' compensation action was appropriate because an expert witness was qualified to testify since he was a licensed cardiologist with a Ph.D. in biochemistry and he had also done research in cardiology both on animals and in clinical research. N.H. INS. Co. v. Allison, 414 S.W.3d 266, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9604 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 1 2013).

1668. Defendant failed to show that trial counsel was ineffective during a sexual assault trial for failing to object to testimony by a nurse that she had examined over 1,100 subjects of sexual assault; the portion of the nurse's testimony that defendant found objectionable was given within the context of the State laying the foundation that she was qualified under the rule. Allen v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7273 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 13 2013).

1669. Expert physician was qualified to opine as to the standards of care for nurse practitioners in a health care liability action because the expert stated that the expert had trained and supervised nurse practitioners; the expert had experience with nurse practitioners in a hospital where nurse practitioners had been called upon to evaluate a patient who had complex medical issues. Children's Med. Ctr. of Dallas v. Durham, 402 S.W.3d 391, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6747 (Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2013).

1670. Appellants complained that one of the debt collector's witnesses, a vice president and 25-year employee of the collector, was not an expert about lost profits, but the witness was qualified to testify about profits, and in any event, the president was qualified to testify even though he was not an expert. Hht Ltd. v. Nationwide Recovery Sys., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6717 (Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2013).

1671. Appellant did not make an objection to the qualifications of a sexual assault nurse examiner or the reliability of her testimony, and thus appellant did not preserve this issue for review. Morgan v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5927 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 14 2013).

1672. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it found the police sergeant qualified to testify as an expert on the Mexican Mafia because the sergeant testified that he had amassed the majority of his experience and training on the topic through his work in the field, namely by interviewing between 50 to 100 current and former members of the Mexican Mafia and by speaking with at least 1,000 other law enforcement officers who had investigated cases and crimes committed by the organization. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5228 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2013).

1673. Trial court correctly decided that defendant's computer expert could not testify regarding authenticating the e-mails between defendant and the alleged victim because he had no personal knowledge of the case and he was not shown to be qualified by his scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge to give any opinions in the case. Sennett v. State, 406 S.W.3d 661, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 25 2013).

1674. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by finding that the expert was qualified to testify as an expert witness, Tex. R. Evid. 702, where he demonstrated an understanding of the scientific theories involved with the device, how those theories were applied through operation of the Secure Continuous Remote Alcohol Monitor device, and proper interpretation of the data collected by the device; defendant tested the expert's knowledge about the device and interpretation of the data through pointed cross-examination and the expert provided clear and detailed answers to those questions. Alvarez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5062 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 24 2013).

1675. Trial court did not err in concluding that an expert was qualified to render an opinion in a health care liability action because, as a practicing surgeon, the expert was clearly qualified to show how another surgeon's breaches of the standard of care resulted in a misleading report concerning the cause of a patient's death. Kim v. Hoyt, 399 S.W.3d 714, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5102 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2013).

1676. While the extent of practical experience may be a factor to be considered in assessing an expert's qualifications depending on the circumstances, this factor was not dispositive in this case. George Fleming & Fleming & Assocs., L.L.P. v. Kinney, 395 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4507 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

1677. Court rejected an attorney's challenge to an expert's qualifications and the trial court acted within its discretion in finding the expert was qualified to testify as an expert regarding compliance with fiduciary duties that attorneys owed to clients in the context of charging expenses as a part of an aggregate settlement; the expert had been licensed to practice law since 1989, she had worked on mass action litigation, and she had served since 2001 as a member of the committee that drafted and revised proposed language for the professional conduct rules. George Fleming & Fleming & Assocs., L.L.P. v. Kinney, 395 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4507 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

1678. When defendant pleaded guilty to the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that a fingerprint expert was qualified to testify at the punishment hearing. The expert was trained in fingerprint examination, he trained others, and had conducted fingerprint investigations for many years. Campbell v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4353 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 3 2013).

1679. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the State's expert's testimony because the subject matter of her testimony was within the field of expertise of providing psychotherapy to children and her testimony described how she utilized the principles in the field based on her significant experience and training. Cox v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4073, 2013 WL 1286676 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 28 2013).

1680. Doctor claimed the trial court erred in denying his motion to dismiss the health care liability claim because the expert, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. §§ 74.401(a), 74.403(a), lacked the expertise to provide opinions on the standard of care, breach, and causation, but the court disagreed; the expert had over 18 years of medical experience and he possessed specialized knowledge on the subject matter and the patient's treatment, including developing treatment plans, administering antibiotics, and writing home health discharge plans, such that the trial court could have found that the expert had knowledge of the accepted standards of care. Khan v.

Ramsey, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2981, 2013 WL 1183276 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 21 2013).

1681. It was undisputed that an expert was currently licensed and practiced in family medicine, and he possessed specialized experience that was relevant to the claim, and thus the trial could have found that he established his qualifications to render opinions, for purposes Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351, and thus the trial court did not err in denying the doctor's motion to dismiss on the ground the expert was not qualified. Khan v. Ramsey, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2981, 2013 WL 1183276 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 21 2013).

1682. Appellant's complaint that an officer was not qualified to testify as an expert was not preserved for review; to the extent an argument could have been considered an objection to the testimony, it was insufficient to inform the trial court of a Tex. R. Evid. 702 complaint, as the argument was really that the evidence was insufficient to prove appellant's consumption of alcohol and did not make the trial court aware of the complaint that the officer lacked qualifications to identify the smell of alcohol, plus if the court interpreted the argument as an objection, it was not timely, as the argument was made after the parties rested and evidence had been closed. Gregorio-Ochoa v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1568, 2013 WL 624119 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 20 2013).

1683. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a doctor to testify regarding matters related to neurology and endocrinology because the State established that the doctor specialized in forensic pathology and that by virtue of his education, training, and experience he was knowledgeable about diabetes, low blood sugar, and diseases such as epilepsy and had treated patients suffering from those conditions. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 868 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 31 2013).

1684. Trial court did not err by admitting the testimony of the geographic information systems coordinator for county public works about whether the offense occurred within a drug-free zone because he was qualified to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, as the his familiarity with the mapping software and how drug-free zone maps were created using the software put context to the map of the area the State offered as an exhibit. The coordinator's training, education, and experience regarding mapmaking and analyzing GIS data qualified him to offer an opinion that defendant committed the drug offense within the drug-free zone. Procella v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 487, 2013 WL 222274 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 17 2013).

1685. Trial court's conclusion the counselor's testimony would aid the jury in understanding the victim's actions and resolving the contradictions in her trial testimony was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. Hill v. State, 392 S.W.3d 850, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 453, 2013 WL 174062 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 16 2013).

1686. Where defendant was convicted of four counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by permitting his probation officer to give expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 about defendant's suitability for probation. The probation officer had worked for the county for 12 years, had supervised sex offenders for 5 years, was supervising about 40 probationers, met with his probationers and did field visits. Alcala v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 285 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 11 2013).

1687. Court acted within its discretion in concluding that the psychologist was an expert with specialized knowledge and was qualified to render her opinions in the case, because the psychologist testified that she had a master's degree in counseling and was a licensed professional counselor, she was certified as an expert witness regarding children's issues, and had provided therapeutic counseling, consisting of approximately 30 sessions, for the child in the case. Mueller v. Bran, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 176, 2013 WL 123693 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 10 2013).

1688. Mother failed to preserve error regarding her challenge to certain testimony, as she did not obtain a running objection or object when the witness took the stand; counsel acknowledged that she had to make another objection to the testimony to preserve error, but when the witness took the stand, there was no objection to the admissibility of the testimony or the witness's expert qualifications, and thus the mother waived her objection to the witness's testimony as an expert. In the Interest of A.C., 394 S.W.3d 633, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10299, 2012 WL 6204285 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 13 2012).

1689. Contractors who served as expert witnesses for a wife in her suit to enforce the property division in a divorce decree did not need college degrees to be qualified to testify about reasonable repair costs for property left in poor condition by the husband. In re Marriage of Bivins, 393 S.W.3d 893, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10139, 2012 WL 6099066 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 6 2012).

1690. Expert report submitted in a medical malpractice claim arising out of an otolaryngologist's allegedly puncturing a patient's nostril with a hard plastic vacuum tool represented an objective good-faith effort as required by Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351(r)(6) given that the expert set forth the standard of care applicable to an otolaryngologist, how it was breached during post-operative care following sinus surgery, and causation. Jassin v. Bennett, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9854 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 29 2012).

1691. Patient was not required to file an expert report concerning appellees' vicarious liability, which was a legal issue upon which a medical professional was not able to opine. Young v. Medical Imaging Diagnostic Assocs., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9992 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 29 2012).

1692. Evidence was insufficient to defeat no-evidence motion for summary judgment, because the expert's opinions were not reliable, were conclusory and speculative, and the expert was not qualified to render such opinions; the expert's opinions relied extensively on one published article, which did nothing more than conclude that darker shoes would become hotter than lighter shoes when exposed to sun light, and the expert failed to provide testimony regarding the temperature at which to expect blisters to form on the claimant's feet. Davis v. Aetrex Worldwide, Inc., 392 S.W.3d 213, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9845, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P18967, 2012 WL 5969621 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 29 2012).

1693. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding a witness to be qualified as an expert to testify that sexual abuse was the cause of a victim's substance abuse problems, given in part that (1) the witness was a substance abuse counselor and completed courses and over 6,000 hours of internship, (2) he had an associate's degree in child clinical psychology and counseled almost 400 patients, and (3) discovering the root cause of one's drug addiction was a needed step in treatment; the court noted that the cause of the victim's substance abuse was not central to the case's resolution. Solis v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7512, 2012 WL 3833036 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 5 2012).

1694. Expert's curriculum vitae and report showed that he was a practicing doctor, knew of the accepted standards of care, and was qualified on the basis of experience and training to offer an expert opinion concerning the standards of care and the causal relationship concerning the failure to diagnose and treat the patient and the risk of death from pneumonia, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.401(a). Ortiz v. Patterson, 378 S.W.3d 667, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7679 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 5 2012).

1695. This case concerned a patient who presented acute symptoms of severity, not a disease that was chronic, and an expert showed that he had the experience and training to offer an expert opinion on the standard of care in this situation and the tests available, plus the expert had been presented with similar factual situations and this showed that he and the doctor were family practice physicians; the court rejected the claim that the expert was not qualified to opine on primary care during an office visit, and the trial court abused its discretion in granting a motion to dismiss on grounds the expert was not qualified to offer an opinion on the standard of care. Ortiz v. Patterson,

378 S.W.3d 667, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7679 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 5 2012).

1696. Having found that the trial court erred in granting a motion to dismiss as to an expert's qualifications, the court did not need to consider whether the case was subject to remand for consideration of an extension to cure the deficiency. Ortiz v. Patterson, 378 S.W.3d 667, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7679 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 5 2012).

1697. Person is not disqualified from testifying as an expert in an sexually violent predator commitment proceeding merely because the person is not licensed as a physician or psychologist; therefore, in a civil commitment case under the Texas Civil Commitment of Sexually Violent Predators Act, a trial court abused its discretion by determining that a counselor was not qualified to testify because she was not a physician or psychologist. The general rule under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was applied because the Act did not prescribe the qualifications that an expert had to have to opine on whether a person was a sexually violent predator. In re Bohannan, 388 S.W.3d 296, 2012 Tex. LEXIS 734, 55 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1337 (Tex. 2012).

1698. Court did not err during defendant's murder trial in allowing the State to present expert testimony that the victim was likely killed on the back patio of the victim's house; the expert had training in the area of conclusions to be drawn from blood loss. Burris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7446, 2012 WL 3793268 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 30 2012).

1699. Although an engineering expert was not licensed in Texas, his testimony was admissible under Tex. Occ. Code Ann. §§ 1001.003(c)(1), 1001.004(e)(2) and Tex. R. Evid. 702 in a products liability case. Tidwell v. Terex Corp., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7724 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

1700. Physician, a pediatric otolaryngologist, was qualified to opine on causation where he had experience treating patients who had had their tracheostomy tubes dislodged and had suffered brain damage caused by lack of oxygen as a result. Rio Grande Reg'l Hosp. v. Ayala, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7175, 2012 WL 3637368 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 24 2012).

1701. Appellant stipulated to a report's admissibility, and although she could claim the report was not evidence of causation, she could not argue about the inspector's expert qualifications, as an objection to qualifications had to be raised in the trial court to preserve error. Marin v. Herron, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6484, 2012 WL 3205427 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 8 2012).

1702. Appellant did not qualify a witness as an expert or prove to the trial court that the purported testimony was relevant and reliable, and thus the testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and the Sixth Amendment right to compulsory process was not violated. Clark v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5973, 2012 WL 3025685 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 25 2012).

1703. Defendant's convictions for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 was appropriate because a social worker's testimony was properly admitted since she was qualified to give her testimony; she did not need to have personal knowledge of all the facts on which she bases her opinion; and testimony abut the behavior of child sex abuse victims was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Brucia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5844, 2012 WL 2926203 (Tex. App. Dallas July 19 2012).

1704. Trooper had 11 years of experience, was a certified field sobriety instructor, had made over 500 driving while intoxicated arrests, and his testimony met the criteria for nonscientific expert witness testimony; the accuracy of field sobriety tests was a proper area of testimony for this trooper, and his tesitmony was important for the jury in deciding the issue of intoxication in a driving while intoxicated case, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting his testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Stovall v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5571, 2012 WL 2862369 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1705. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the trooper's testimony as a collision investigator as he had five years' experience with Level II certification; the appellate court assumed the jury followed the trial court's jury instruction that the trooper had not been qualified an accident-reconstruction expert, but only as a Level II collision investigator. Balderas v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5198, 2012 WL 2469642 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 28 2012).

1706. Trial court erred by allowing an officer to testify as an expert concerning a test he performed on defendant's jacket and pockets to test for the presence of cocaine because: (1) the State made no effort to prove the officer's qualifications; (2) the officer testified concerning chemical identification, a field of complex expertise; (3) the officer did not qualify the identification with any mention of the accuracy of the test; and (4) whether sufficient affirmative links to the contraband existed was the sole disputed issue. However, the error was harmless because defendant was in close proximity to the drugs, he possessed $ 1,414, had a tobacco wrapper in his hand, and later admitted to being a crack cocaine dealer. Gill v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4662, 2012 WL 2127504 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 13 2012).

1707. During voir dire, a counselor said her testimony on the cycle of violence was standard and she gave the trial court reason to find that her testimony would use principles used in the field, plus case law and literature confirmed that her testimony was consistent with that testimony that had been ruled admissible in other cases; the court found no error in the admission of the testimony. Brewer v. State, 370 S.W.3d 471, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4519, 2012 WL 2290871 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 7 2012).

1708. Counselor's inability to cite studies did not make her testimony unreliable, given the nature of her expertise field; the trial court properly limited the testimony to comport with the counsel's expertise, and the court found no abuse of discretion in admitting her testimony in order to help the jury understand why the victim delayed in calling the police in this aggravated assault case involving appellant, the victim's fiance. Brewer v. State, 370 S.W.3d 471, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4519, 2012 WL 2290871 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 7 2012).

1709. Grant of summary judgment in favor of the medical center in the spouse's action after the patient died was inappropriate because a physician's testimony offered more than merely his credentials and a subjective opinion. He had a sufficiently reliable foundation for his opinions on proximate cause to warrant admission of his testimony. Constancio v. Shannon Med. Ctr., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4339 (Tex. App. Austin May 22 2012).

1710. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in admitting the testimony of the director of a trauma center, who was trained as a clinical psychologist with specialization in psychological trauma, because the director was qualified to opine about the impact of sexual assault, underage marriage, and polygamy on children. Jessop v. State, 368 S.W.3d 653, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3176, 2012 WL 1402117 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 19 2012).

1711. In a personal injury action arising from an accident in which appellee was injured when another driver's vehicle struck her vehicle, although a chiropractor was not appellee's treating chiropractor after the car accident, the trial court did not err in allowing him to testify about causation and damages, in light of his qualifications and testimony. Among other things, the chiropractor stated that part of his training and duties as a chiropractor was to review hospital and medical records and to consult with other medical specialists to treat patients. Haddard v. Rios, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2706 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 5 2012).

1712. For purposes of Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 107.013(a)(1), although a mother claimed counsel was ineffective for not challenging a psychologist's qualifications, nothing indicated that she was not qualified, given that she was employed as a psychotherapist, practiced psychology for 16 years, and held a master of science in social work. Maxwell v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2339, 2012 WL 987787 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 23 2012).

1713. Appellant objected to a witness's testimony under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), suggesting a relevancy complaint, but he did not object on expert qualification or reliability grounds or on Tex. R. Evid. 403 grounds; thus, the only issue preserved for review was the claim that the witness's testimony was inadmissible because it was not linked to appellant. Keate v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117, 2012 WL 896200 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 16 2012).

1714. Appellant objected to a doctor's testimony, challenging his qualifications and claiming his testimony was irrelevant under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), but an objection to the reliability of the doctor's opinion was not raised in the trial court; thus, his reliability complaint was not preserved for review. Keate v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117, 2012 WL 896200 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 16 2012).

1715. Appellant claimed he stood on objections made at a Tex. R. Evid. 702 hearing, but no actual objections were made, and the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals had held that a hearing alone did not preserve a complaint for review. Keate v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117, 2012 WL 896200 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 16 2012).

1716. Doctor was qualified by education, training, and experience in psychology and psychological trauma and he was qualified to opine about the impact of underage marriage, sexual assault, and polygamy on children, and the trial court did not err in overruling appellant's objection; the doctor spent 21 years treating trauma victims, he showed familiarity with the church's practices and theology, and he had experience in behaviors associated with the victimization of children by abuse. Keate v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117, 2012 WL 896200 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 16 2012).

1717. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting blood test results because a police officer, who was a drug recognition expert, was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to offer expert testimony as to the effects of a controlled substance on an individual. Through his experience, education, and training, the officer established that he possessed knowledge beyond that of the average person determining if the prescription drug defendant took caused intoxication. Armstrong v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2041, 2012 WL 864778 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 15 2012).

1718. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting blood test results because a forensic scientist in toxicology were qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to offer expert testimony as to the effects of a controlled substance on an individual. The forensic scientist received her bachelors and doctorate degrees in chemistry, both with an emphasis in forensic science, she attended a training program with DPS, and that testing for central nervous system depressants was her specialty. Armstrong v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2041, 2012 WL 864778 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 15 2012).

1719. In a mother's health care liability lawsuit that alleged that defendants' negligence proximately caused her child's legal blindness, the trial court abused its discretion in overruling defendants' objections to the mother's expert report that was written by a neonatologist because nothing in the report indicated that the neonatologist had knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education in ophthalmology, pediatric ophthalmology, the way in which retinopathy of prematurity presented in newborns, or how that disease was treated in general and in the child's case. Accordingly, the trial court could not have reasonably concluded that the neonatologist had genuine expertise regarding the causal relationship between defendants' alleged breach of the applicable standard of care and the child's injury. Caviglia v. Tate, 363 S.W.3d 298, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2018, 2012 WL 899269 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 14 2012).

1720. Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that a deputy was qualified to testify as an expert regarding cell phone tracking because he had completed a course in reading cell phone records, identifying cell phone tower locations, and plotting and tracking cell phone activity. Additionally, the deputy described for the jury how he used the locations of the cell phone towers that relayed defendant's calls to track the location of defendant's phone to a particular geographic area. Robinson v. State, 368 S.W.3d 588, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483, 2012 WL 593558 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

1721. In a medical malpractice case, read as a whole, the patient's expert's report and curriculum vitae established his qualifications to offer opinions on the standard of care relevant to defendant's decision to proceed to surgery, but they did not establish his qualifications to offer opinions on the standard of care relevant to defendant's care and treatment of the patient during and after the surgery. Nothing within the report's four corners disclosed or described the expert's training or experience performing, observing, or teaching other physicians about the surgical removal of an ovary and the patient's postoperative care. Cortez v. Tomas, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1092, 2012 WL 407382 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 9 2012).

1722. Witness established his background as a professional engineer with a background in hydrology/hydraulics, plus as the city engineer, his department initiated the flood study in question; the witness provided the factual background to support his conclusions and thus his affidavit was proper summary judgment evidence. Strother v. City of Rockwall, 358 S.W.3d 462, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 715 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 27 2012).

1723. Whether appellant's statements were speculative or contained hearsay were objections to form, which had to be ruled on or they were waived, but an objection that an affidavit was conclusory could be raised on appeal, as was the claim that an affiant failed to establish her qualifications as an expert; thus, the court reviewed the city's objections to conclusory statements and whether appellant was qualified to give her opinion. Strother v. City of Rockwall, 358 S.W.3d 462, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 715 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 27 2012).

1724. In this inverse condemnation case, an owner did not show that she had any expertise in reading flood maps, studies, or that she had any independent expertise in hydrology, and lay witnesses were not competent to controvert an expert opinion. Strother v. City of Rockwall, 358 S.W.3d 462, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 715 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 27 2012).

1725. While the State failed to meet its burden that a pediatric hematologist was qualified to opine that a child's fatal injuries were consistent with shaken baby syndrome, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the evidence of defendant's guilt was strong, particularly because four other experts had also reached the conclusion that the child's injuries were caused by shaking. Guerrero v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10080, 2011 WL 6808314 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 22 2011).

1726. Appellant did not object to a forensic scientist's qualifications or testimony, and thus appellant failed to preserve for review any complaint regarding the scientist's testimony. Traylor v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9933, 2011 WL 6307835 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 15 2011).

1727. Law enforcement-official with a significant amount of experience with child sex abuse cases may be qualified to talk about grooming of children for sexual molestation. Morris v. State, 361 S.W.3d 649, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1664 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 7 2011).

1728. Trial court properly denied a hospital's motion to dismiss a patient's health care liability action because the patient's expert was qualified to opine as to the causation element; the expert had the training and experience regarding the standard of care for the treatment and/or prevention of pressure ulcers. Hillcrest Baptist Med. Ctr. v. Payne, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9182, 2011 WL 5830469 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 16 2011).

1729. Based on a neonatologist's experience in requesting ophthalmologic consultations to screen pre-term babies for retinopathy of prematurity (ROP) and familiarity with implementing policies and procedures to ensure proper care for babies at risk for ROP, the neonatologist was qualified to provide an expert opinion in a medical malpractice action brought on behalf of a premature child who developed blindness. Pediatrix Med. Group, Inc. v. Robinson, 352 S.W.3d 879, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8622 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 31 2011).

1730. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining objections that homeowners were not qualified to give expert testimony. Baker v. Energy Transfer Co., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8304, 2011 WL 4978287 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 19 2011).

1731. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the experts' testimony was not speculative or conclusory as to be lacking in probative value and both experts concluded that the patient was a sexually violent predator (SVP); the jury could conclude that the patient was an SVP, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.062. In re Conley, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7877, 2011 WL 4537938 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 29 2011).

1732. In a felony drunk driving case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that a police officer qualified as an expert on the horizontal gaze nystagmus test. At the time of trial, the officer had been a certified peace officer for 10 years, and the officer had attended a 32-hour standardized field sobriety test class. Goains v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7875, 2011 WL 4537892 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 28 2011).

1733. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, a corporal's testimony supported the trial court's implied finding that he was qualified to testify as an expert witness in dog handling; although the corporal admitted that he was not an expert, he detailed his credentials and experience and noted that he was nationally certified in dog handling and was an expert in that particular field. Hamal v. State, 352 S.W.3d 835, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7692 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2011).

1734. Corporal testified about his credentials, expertise, and experience with the dog that alerted on appellant's car, and the corporal testified that the dog had detected drugs in vehicles before, such that the trial court could have found that the officer was qualified to testify about the dog's actions. Hamal v. State, 352 S.W.3d 835, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7692 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2011).

1735. In a medical malpractice case, the district court did not err in denying defendant doctor's motion to dismiss because, while the report of plaintiff patient's expert was far from perfect, the trial court did not err in finding it adequate. While the expert was not active in a hospital practice at the time at issue, he nevertheless was actively practicing orthopedic medicine and opined that the injury involved was of the type he treated in his practice; therefore, the trial court did not abuse its decision in finding that the expert was qualified to opine on the standard of care. Further, where the report indicated that the etiology of the patient's brachial plexus injury was most likely attributable to a traction injury resulting from positioning during surgery, the report was sufficient to establish a causal connection. Padilla v. Loweree, 354 S.W.3d 856, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7147 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2011).

1736. Trooper was not qualified to testify as an expert witness in accident reconstruction because: (1) the case involved multiple vehicles, multiple collisions, and could only be reconstructed with knowledge and skills exceeding the experience of most police officers; (2) the trooper completed a Level II certification in accident reconstruction through the DPS in Austin; (3) the trooper had never testified concerning accident reconstruction; and (4) the trooper denied having any physics training or being an expert in physics. Lopez-juarez v. Kelly, 348 S.W.3d 10, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6446 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2011).

1737. Employee merely provided his medical records and expected the jury to understand them, and laypersons did not have the knowledge to understand the intricacies involved in diagnosing a back injury without some guidance from a medical expert; accordingly, the employee failed to provide more than a scintilla of evidence to support his claim of a compensable injury. State Office of Risk Mgmt. v. Adkins, 347 S.W.3d 394, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6187 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 9 2011).

1738. Record demonstrated that the ALJ allowed the doctors to offer their expert testimony after voir dire on the issue of their qualifications, and the ALJ heard extensive testimony about their qualifications as well as their methods, analyses, and the principles upon which they relied in reaching their opinions; there was no abuse of discretion in the ALJ's decision that the doctors were qualified as experts and their testimony should be admitted. Scally v. Tex. State Bd. of Med. Examiners, 351 S.W.3d 434, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6117 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 4 2011).

1739. Emergency medical technician (EMT) was not qualified to opine medical causation or accident reconstruction, given that (1) there was no evidence showing that the EMT was qualified as an accident reconstructionist, (2) nothing showed that he was qualified to opine about the expert's injuries, and (3) the EMT did not provide any scientific studies to support his assertions that the impact with a driver's car was what caused the decedent's death. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1740. While an emergency medical technician (EMT) could testify as a lay witness as to what he observed at the scene of the accident, he could not testify as an expert as to causation; although in some cases a witness could be considered an expert as to medical causation based on special experience, this did not apply here given the EMT's limited experience with automobile accidents involving fatalities. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1741. Even if an emergency medical technician was qualified to opine on causation and accident reconstruction matters, the bare opinion he gave in his deposition was premised upon his subjective interpretation of the facts, which rendered his opinion unreliable; the trial court did not err in striking this testimony. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1742. Much of an expert's testimony was against the great weight of the evidence contained in the record, plus there existed too many analytical gaps between the expert's opinions and the facts, even though he had significant experience in accident reconstruction; the expert did not show that he was qualified to opine as to the causation of the decedent's injuries, such that the expert's opinions were unreliable and the trial court did not err in striking his testimony. Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

1743. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony of a Texas Child Protective Services (CPS) caseworker regarding the sexual abuse victim's sister's acting out based upon her experience as a CPS caseworker and because defendant failed to present any argument as to the caseworker's qualifications or her testimony being in violation of Rule 702. Sharp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5377, 2011 WL 2732518 (Tex. App. Eastland July 14 2011).

1744. Record showed that the medical examiner was qualified by education, training, and experience in the field of forensic pathology and was qualified to opine about the impact of gunshot wounds on a deceased's body; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection to the medical examiner's qualifications to testify that the complainants were shot from over two feet away. Dianas v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4932, 2011 WL 2623956 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 30 2011).

1745. Trial court properly denied a physician's motion to dismiss a health care liability action because the reports from appellees' experts, along with their curriculum vitae, adequately established their expertise to state the standard of care applicable to the physician in relation to the care of a patient, who suffered a cerebral hemorrhage. Iqbal v. Rash, 346 S.W.3d 827, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4943 (Tex. App. El Paso June 29 2011).

1746. Trial court did not err in finding that a patient's expert, an anesthesiologist, was qualified to testify as to the appropriate standard of care for a hospital's nurses in a medical malpractice action; the expert testified that the expert had been involved in between 500 and 1,000 spinal surgeries and that it was both the anesthesiologists' and the nurses' joint responsibility to ensure that a patient was repositioned during a lengthy procedure. Christus Health Sys. v. Harlien, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4369, 2011 WL 2394614 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 9 2011).

1747. Salon argued that a witness was not qualified to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because she was not a licensed cosmetologist and was only a licensed manicurist, but the court disagreed; given the fact that the salon, not the actual worker, was sued, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the witness to testify, as her testimony focused on salon management and safety issues instead of hair coloring or styling. J.C. Penney Corp. v. Gonzalez-alaniz, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4057, 2011 WL 2090241 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 26 2011).

1748. Expert opined on all three required elements: standard of care, breach, and causation and the expert's amended report tied the alleged breach to the alleged injury; the doctor was the patient's treating physician and the report referred to the doctor's conduct, and the expert's amended report adequately described the causation element required under chapter 74, and the expert was qualified to opine on the cause of injuries that allegedly occurred as a result of the doctor's alleged negligence as the expert was an expert in discography. Whisenant v. Arnett, 339 S.W.3d 920, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3386 (Tex. App. Dallas May 5 2011).

1749. Defense counsel was not required to challenge a probation officer's qualifications to opine that sex offenders could not be rehabilitated because the record was silent regarding whether the State could have easily proven the officer's qualifications had they been challenged at trial. Cueva v. State, 339 S.W.3d 839, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3333 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 2 2011).

1750. To the extent that a party objected to an expert's qualifications on appeal, such arguments were waived, as the party did not object at trial. Petroleum Solutions, Inc. v. Head, 454 S.W.3d 518, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3289 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 29 2011).

1751. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, a witness's qualifications were based on specialized knowledge and experience, and the trial court did not err in allowing him to testify as an expert on damages, given that (1) he held degrees in business, (2) he had extensive experience in valuing businesses over 20 years, and (3) he was accredited as a credit senior appraiser and taught courses in this regard. U.S. Renal Care, Inc. v. Jaafar, 345 S.W.3d 600, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 30 2011).

1752. City's argument that a witness was not qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to offer certain opinion testimony as an accident reconstruction expert was not presented to the trial court; thus, the city could not raise the issue on appeal and the issue was not preserved under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. City of Waco v. Fuentes, 2011 Tex. App.

LEXIS 1707, 2011 WL 817418 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 9 2011).

1753. Regarding a city's challenge to a witness's qualifications to offer opinion testimony that an accident caused the motorist's injury, the court could not determine if the trial court abused its discretion because the court did not have the evidence the trial court considering in making its ruling, and the court overruled the issue. City of Waco v. Fuentes, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1707, 2011 WL 817418 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 9 2011).

1754. Because the court found no abuse of discretion in the trial court's finding a witness qualified, his testimony was considered in the court's review of the causation evidence in this personal injury case, and the evidence supported the verdict in favor of the motorist. City of Waco v. Fuentes, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1707, 2011 WL 817418 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 9 2011).

1755. Deputy's testimony that the presence and degree of lividity indicated death had occurred over an hour before he first observed the victim's body was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because it was based on first-hand knowledge and under Tex. R. Evid. 702 based on his training and experience, which included his 11 years as a crime-scene investigator, during which he had amassed extensive training and experience; the classes conducted by physicians in the county medical examiner's office in which instruction was provided on the approximate times for lividity and rigor mortis to set in on a corpse; medical conferences he attended regularly in which information was provided on lividity as a beginning stage of decomposition; and the fact that he had seen hundreds of homicide victims. Thompson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1633, 2011 WL 782051 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 8 2011).

1756. Detective's expert opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was based on his analysis of records provided by a phone company and admitted into evidence without objection, and although the process involved in compiling the data was technically complex, the process involved in reading and analyzing the data was not; because an analysis of cell phone records is relatively simple, the required degree of education, training and experience was not extremely high, and the detective's qualification, including four years as an officer, a three-day course in cell phone call tracking, and 12 times in performing such, were sufficient to allow him to assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence. Saenz v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1156, 2011 WL 578757 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 17 2011).

1757. In a health care liability action, while appellants claimed that the first physician was not qualified to render a reliable expert opinion under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351(r)(5)(C) because he served as a member of the Medical Board in the surgeon's termination request and was thus biased, any bias went to first physician's credibility under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) and did not disqualify him from rendering an expert opinion. Beaumont Spine Pain & Sports Med. Clinic, Inc. v. Swan, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 768, 2011 WL 379168 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 3 2011).

1758. Automotive fraud consultant who was an experienced odometer fraud investigator was qualified to testify on the buyers' behalf regarding odometer tampering on a used vehicle, which included his opinion that a dealer performing a reasonable inspection would have discovered the tampering, and the trial court did not err in finding the expert's opinions reliable. Mac Haik Chevrolet Ltd. v. Diaz, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 668, 2011 WL 286124 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2011).

1759. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in qualifying a witness as a fingerprint expert, given that (1) latent fingerprint analysis was not complex, (2) the witness testified that he was certified in fingerprint comparison, had been mentored by experts, and had been trained in all the equipment used for latent print collection and comparison, (3) there was no authority cited suggesting that such a background was insufficient to qualify the witness as a fingerprint expert, (4) the witness's opinion was conclusive, which was more than offset because his testimony was not central to the resolution of the lawsuit and was effectively superfluous, and (5) the expert testimony was not the only evidence in the case, which reduced the centrality of the witness's testimony. Martin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10042, 2010 WL 5129085 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 15 2010).

1760. Expert who had degrees in finance and business, and who testified to extensive experience in valuing businesses, was qualified to testify regarding accounts receivable. U.S. Renal Care, Inc. v. Jaafar, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9646, 2010 WL 4983398 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 8 2010).

1761. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, an expert testified that psychology was an accepted field of practice, that she studied various methods and theories of psychology, and that she used such in her practice; the trial court did not err in admitting this testimony. In the Interest of S.R., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9681, 2010 WL 4983484 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 8 2010).

1762. Although the court harbored some doubt about a witness's qualifications to give an opinion on the value of real property for testimony in a condemnation proceeding, the court assumed that he was qualified to testify about the value of the easement. Trend Gathering & Treating, Lp v. Moore, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9644, 2010 WL 4983488 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 1 2010).

1763. In this condemnation proceeding, a witness did not show that it was reasonably probable that the land would be used for industrial purposes or as a subdivision, and his testimony did not rebut the presumption that the current use of irrigated cropland was the highest and best use; the witness's opinion on highest and best use was unsupported, conclusory, and unreliable. Trend Gathering & Treating, Lp v. Moore, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9644, 2010 WL 4983488 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 1 2010).

1764. Having found that a witness's testimony was unreliable because it was speculative and conclusory, the trial court erred in admitting the testimony in this condemnation case, the evidence did not support the verdict of damages, and the court suggested a remittitur in a certain amount, under Tex. R. App. P. 46.3. Trend Gathering & Treating, Lp v. Moore, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9644, 2010 WL 4983488 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 1 2010).

1765. Trial court did not err in admitting an office's testimony regarding the field sobriety tests he performed on appellant; regarding the one-leg stand test and the walk-and-turn test, the officer's testimony was admissible as lay testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 701 and he was not required to be qualified as an expert witness under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9405, 2010 WL 4840491 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 24 2010).

1766. Regarding a horizontal nystagmus gaze (HGN) test, the officer was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 by his extensive education and certification, as well as his years of administering the HGN test; his statements that he was not an eye doctor or doctor was insignificant because a witness need not be either in order to testify regarding the HGN test. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9405, 2010 WL 4840491 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 24 2010).

1767. Regardless of whether an officer was willing to label himself as an expert, which, in fact, is a legal determination to be made by the trial judge, his testimony showed sufficient experience and expert qualifications from which the trial court could have found he was qualified to testify regarding the horizontal nystagmus gaze (HGN) test; he never indicated he lacked the qualifications to testify regarding administering the HGN test, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the officer to testify as an expert. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9405, 2010 WL 4840491 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 24 2010).

1768. Implied objection based on a witness's qualifications did not preserve error related to the reliability of the witness's testimony or the court's alleged failure to hold a Tex. R. Evid. 705(b) hearing. Shaw v. State, 329 S.W.3d

645, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8902 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 9 2010).

1769. Doctor was qualified to opine about causation where: (1) the doctor was licensed to practice medicine in Texas; (2) he was board certified in internal medicine and geriatrics and was actively engaged in the practice of these specialties; (3) he regularly engaged in the diagnosis and treatment of patients with Alzheimer's disease; (4) he had had patients with violent behavior like the facility's resident's behavior and who represented a threat to others as well as themselves; (5) he had knowledge of the admission assessment process and the care needed for these patients; and (6) in his opinion, it was reasonably foreseeable that the facility could not meet the resident's needs and that the resident's behavior would likely result in injury to himself or others. Christian Care Ctrs., Inc. v. Golenko, 328 S.W.3d 637, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8826 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 4 2010).

1770. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child younger than 14 years old case, where a doctor's testimony and opinions were based on his experience and training as a physician at the child advocacy center, his educational and professional background was relevant to prove his expertise in the evaluation and treatment of child victims and to lay the predicate for his testimony; thus, without a showing of harm, evidence, like the doctor's curriculum vitae, was properly admitted to assist the jury in making its determination as it served a relevant purpose beyond solely bolstering the witness and any extraneous information included on the curriculum vitae had only slight effect. Walker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8452 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 21 2010).

1771. Patient's expert's report was sufficient to satisfy the elements of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351 concerning the patient's claim that the orthopedic surgeon failed to timely diagnose and treat her ankle fracture because: (1) the report explained that the standard of care required the surgeon to conduct full range of motion testing regarding the patient's injured leg, including the knee, ankle, and foot; (2) the report was not inadequate or conclusory on the statutory elements of standard of care, breach, and causation merely because it contained some collective statements concerning both the surgeon and another doctor; (3) the report satisfied the causation element as the expert stated that due to the surgeon's failure to correctly diagnose the patient's injury, her fracture went undetected for over seven months, and that as a result the patient was subjected to surgery, a prolonged period of disability, loss of foot movement, and chronic pain; and (4) the expert was qualified to offer his opinions, as his report and curriculum vitae established that he was practicing medicine at the time the patient was treated by the surgeon and when he provided the report, that he possessed knowledge of accepted standards of medical care for the diagnosis, care, or treatment of a person with a leg injury, and he had 18 years of experience. Otero v. Richardson, 326 S.W.3d 363, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8018 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 30 2010).

1772. Expert qualified as an expert on the issue of the standard of care in the health care liability case and the expert report was sufficient, because the expert was a board certified thoracic surgeon who was currently practicing, the expert had an extensive background in cardiothoracic surgery, and the report put the doctor on notice that his use of the posterolateral thoracotomy, instead of the open procedure, delayed restoration of the blood supply to multiple organs, which subsequently failed and caused the decedent's death. Mettauer v. Noble, 326 S.W.3d 685, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8027 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 30 2010).

1773. Trial court did not err by allowing the State's expert to testify about Satanism under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because he was qualified, as he testified that he had spent approximately 19 years studying that subject, and because the evidence was reliable, as the expert's testimony regarding Satanic philosophy relied directly on the numerous books and articles he had read on the subject. Davis v. State, 329 S.W.3d 798, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1774. Trial court did not err by permitting a doctor to testify regarding patterns of disclosure of sexual abuse by children under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the doctor was qualified by virtue of her education, knowledge, training, and experience, and because the testimony would aid the jury in understanding why the victim waited four years before telling her father about the sexual assault; the doctor testified that it was common for a child to delay making an outcry to an adult if the perpetrator had threatened to harm someone the child loved. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7915, 2010 WL 3783946 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 29 2010).

1775. Express ruling on a company's expert objections to the methodology, technique, or foundational data was required to exclude as unreliable the treating oncologist's causation opinion; considered with notice and opportunity-to-be-heard principles, the two proceedings, a challenge under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a) and a no-evidence motion for summary judgment, had to be separate under the circumstances of this case, and the court was not to consider the company's reliability objections as implicitly sustained by the trial court. Pink v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 324 S.W.3d 290, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7461 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

1776. Process missing from the record and necessary in this case was a hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), and without an express ruling that the treating oncologist's causation opinion was unreliable, however, the treating oncologist's affidavit remained part of the summary judgment proof and provided some evidence to defeat the no-evidence motion on causation; if the trial court decided the affidavit had to be stricken because of unreliable data or for some other reason, the trial court might then decide whether to grant the no-evidence summary judgment, or order a continuance, and the court reversed the judgment against the company. Pink v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 324 S.W.3d 290, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7461 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

1777. While the etiology of a disease is often significant to a clinician's care of a patient, as well as to public health issues, and while a clinician may have training and experience in the study of cancer and its etiology, the clinician may nevertheless lack the expertise necessary to present a causation opinion related to a toxic chemical exposure. Pink v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 324 S.W.3d 290, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7461 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

1778. Company had not challenged the qualifications of the treating oncologist to express an opinion on the cause of the cancer; considering the evidence of his education, training, experience, and area of expertise, the court considered as true the assertion that the doctor had the expertise to determine whether the benzene exposure caused the cancer. Pink v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 324 S.W.3d 290, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7461 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

1779. Company noted that a doctor's oral deposition was taken after the summary judgment hearing and was not part of the evidence, but established his lack of knowledge; however, generally, the court confined its view to the evidence considered by the trial court. Pink v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 324 S.W.3d 290, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7461 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

1780. Treating oncologist's report referenced materials he consulted and the company did not complain about the lack of discovery responses from the widow, for purposes of Tex. R. Civ. P. 194.2(f)(4), 195; the implicit assertion was that the scientific literature reviewed supported the oncologist's opinion, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 705, the trial court made no ruling requiring disclosure of the literature and did not strike any of the evidence, and the oncologist's affidavit explained how he reached his opinion and he grounded his opinion under oath on reasonable medical probability, such that the court could not say that the opinion concerning etiology was conclusory. Pink v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 324 S.W.3d 290, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7461 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

1781. Ruling sustaining a company's objections to the oncologist's causation opinion was not implicit in the trial court's ruling on the motion for summary judgment; a contrary conclusion, that the trial court implicitly sustained the company's objections and found the causation affidavit unreliable and inadmissible, would arguably require that two standards of review be applied, but without a record of the Tex. R. Evid. 104(a) determination, and the court applied the summary judgment standard in this appeal. Pink v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 324 S.W.3d 290, 2010 Tex.

App. LEXIS 7461 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

1782. If the trial court did not abuse its discretion in implicitly sustaining the expert evidence challenge, there would be no affidavit by the treating oncologist to consider and no causation evidence in response to the no-evidence motion, and practically this approach would reduce the summary judgment appellate review standard to an abuse of discretion standard whenever case-determinative objections, coupled with a no-evidence motion, were considered implicitly sustained by the granting of summary judgment; whether or not the trial court abused its discretion in sustaining the objections would be determinative on appeal of whether the summary judgment had to be reversed or affirmed. Pink v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 324 S.W.3d 290, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7461 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

1783. Patient's expert was qualified under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351(r)(5)(C) and Tex. R. Evid. 702 because his report and curriculum vitae reflected that he was a licensed physician in good standing in Pennsylvania and Missouri who had been practicing since 1977, that he was a board certified internist, and that he provided medical evaluation, care, and treatment to acute and chronically ill patients with urinary tract infections and urosepsis, and that he had experience assisting and supervising the transfer of such patients to long-term care facilities and had knowledge of the documentation required for such transfers. Tthr, L.P. v. Guyden, 326 S.W.3d 316, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7348 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 31 2010).

1784. In a health care liability suit alleging misdiagnosis of cancer, the Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351 report of an expert who was qualified under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.401 with regard to a pathologist's standard of care and breach could also include a causation opinion under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.403 and Tex. R. Evid. 702 as to unnecessary surgery because it was undisputed that no cancer was present. Somerville v. Lawrence, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6583, 2010 WL 3168405 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2010).

1785. Trial court did not err by admitting an investigator's testimony regarding grooming of a prospective child victim of sexual assault because he investigator was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702, as: (1) the field of the investigator's expertise was not particularly complex; (2) the testimony was not conclusive of anything, but rather provided background information; and (3) the testimony was not particularly central to determining defendant's guilt or innocence, but rather provided some explanation of the significance of the numerous telephone calls between defendant and the victim and how they may have empowered defendant to take advantage of her. Bryant v. State, 340 S.W.3d 1, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6614 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 12 2010).

1786. Because the physician's expert report did not set forth his qualifications for giving an expert opinion on causation of the patient's death after being placed on a restraint board, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by dismissing the health care liability claim filed by the patient mother. The physician's curriculum vitae showed only that he was currently practicing in the field of emergency medicine and that he had held several positions as an emergency medicine physician and a general and trauma surgeon. Salais v. Tex. Dep't of Aging & Disability Servs., 323 S.W.3d 527, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6259 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 4 2010).

1787. Appellant did not object to a fire chief's testimony on the ground that it was not relevant to sentencing for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), and instead she lodged only a speculation objection, but given the chief's credentials and experience, he was qualified to testify about the nature of one fire and the damages it could have caused and this testimony was certainly relevant to sentencing. Utley v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5775, 2010 WL 2873942 (Tex. App. Eastland July 22 2010).

1788. Defense counsel did not object on the basis of qualifications or reliability and he did not ask to voir dire the witness or have the trial court conduct a Daubert/Kelly hearing, and thus appellant preserved no error for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; the court noted that a lay opinion could be offered under Tex. R. Evid. 701 if the opinion was rationally based on his perceptions and helpful to the understanding of the testimony. Livingston v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5512, 2010 WL 2783911 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 15 2010).

1789. In a customer's slip-and-fall negligence action against a mall, the trial court properly struck the testimony of the customer's expert witness on the ground that the expert was not qualified; the expert conceded that the expert had never taken any courses regarding proper placement of kiosks within retail shopping environments. Downer v. Simon Prop. Group Tex., L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5386 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 8 2010).

1790. Defendant's conviction for engaging in organized criminal activity, with the two predicate offenses being aggravated sexual assault of a child, was improper because the trial court abused its discretion in allowing a Department of Family and Protective Services worker to testify as an expert on the "grooming process" used by child predators. During cross-examination of the worker, defendant elicited the fact that the worker had not received any training in psychology beyond an associate's degree and the worker agreed that she was not a licensed professional counselor or psychologist, had not attended medical school, and was neither a nurse nor a sexual assault nurse examiner. Kelly v. State, 321 S.W.3d 583, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4506 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

1791. Tex. R. Evid. 702 covers more than just scientific evidence, and expertise can be acquired in numerous ways, including by training or experience. Davis v. State, 313 S.W.3d 317, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1792. Trial court would not have abused its discretion if it had found that a detective possessed sufficient expertise to give an expert opinion, based on his experience as an officer and a homicide detective, regarding whether the wounds suffered by the victim's cat could have been inflicted by the same knife that killed the victim. Davis v. State, 313 S.W.3d 317, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1793. Appellant did not lodge an objection to the testimony of expert witnesses and counsel did not suggest that the witnesses were unqualified or the methodologies unreliable, nor did he present any evidence to that effect, such that appellant failed to show that he preserved error. Davis v. State, 313 S.W.3d 317, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1794. Even if appellant had lodged a sufficient objection at trial, he failed to show any reason to find the expert testimony inadmissible; nothing showed the experts' lack of qualification or the unreliability of the methodologies employed, both the experts' qualifications, including their education and experience, provided the trial court with a more than adequate basis for admitting their testimony on future dangerousness under Tex. R. Evid. 702, plus the testimony appeared to meet the requirements that the evidence derived from a soft science such as psychology was sufficiently reliable. Davis v. State, 313 S.W.3d 317, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1795. Doctor's fourth expert report represented an objective, good faith effort to comply with the definition of an expert report provided in Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351(r)(6), because the report affirmatively stated that a uniform standard of care applied to each physician and nurse, identified what the standard of care was, and there was no challenge to the doctor's qualifications as a vascular surgeon, nor was there a challenge that defendant did not know how to care for an individual in the patient's alleged condition. Hayes v. Carroll, 314 S.W.3d 494, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3637 (Tex. App. Austin May 14 2010).

1796. Court did not find that, based on a doctor's qualifications, the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the doctor's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702; as for her qualifications to testify as to the cause of death of the child, the doctor (1) was a medical director for many years and board certified in pediatrics, (2) had extensive experience in dealing with child abuse victims, (3) had seen many autopsies with similar injuries and was experienced in interpreting pictures and autopsy reports, and (4) had reviewed the autopsy report and photographs, as well as medical records for the child. Latimer v. State, 319 S.W.3d 128, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3149 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 28 2010).

1797. Under Tex. R. Evid. 702, the evidence of an expert's education, training, and experience provided a sufficient basis for the trial court to have found the expert qualified to testify on the behavior of sexually assaulted and abused children, including recantation, given that (1) she had a master's degree in clinical psychology and had been in practice for 37 years, (2) she attended 40 hours of continuing education annually, and (3) since 1994, she had been designated a registered sex offender treatment provider; the subject matter of the recantation testimony was an appropriate one for an expert witness and such testimony could assist the jury in determining how child victims of abuse typically behaved. Cockrell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3208, 2010 WL 1705538 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 28 2010).

1798. Whether an expert participated in clinical studies related to recantation by child sexual assault and abuse victims did not affect the admissibility of her testimony but only affected the weight her testimony. Cockrell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3208, 2010 WL 1705538 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 28 2010).

1799. Trial court committed reversible error in a sexually violent predator civil commitment proceeding in refusing to permit appellant's only expert witness, a professional counselor, to testify as to whether appellant had a behavioral abnormality, as defined in Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002(2), because the expert possessed the necessary qualifications to provide an opinion related to the assessment of the risk that appellant would commit a future act of sexual violence. In re Dodson, 311 S.W.3d 194, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2931 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2010).

1800. Record showed no objections were made to a pediatrician's expert estimony about her own qualifications, and therefore this complaint was not preserved for review. Casillas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2888, 2010 WL 1609697 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2010).

1801. In a nuisance suit, a property inspector was qualified as an expert witness to opine that construction activity had caused cracks in homes because he was an experienced inspector and master plumber, was familiar with heavy construction equipment and the area's geology, and previously had performed similar investigations. C. C. Carlton Indus. v. Blanchard, 311 S.W.3d 654, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2530 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 9 2010).

1802. Internal medicine specialist was qualified under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. §§ 74.351(r)(5)(A), 74.401(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 702 to opine on the standard of care for supervising a patient who took a psychiatric drug because he was currently practicing medicine, treated patients who took the drug for the same diagnosis, and was board certified. Davisson v. Nicholson, 310 S.W.3d 543, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2153 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 25 2010).

1803. Trial court did not err in a health care liability action in denying a hospital's motion to dismiss because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the patient's expert, a practicing physician with a significant history in surgery, was qualified to review the patient's medical records and determine that the fracture of the patient's leg in the course of a fall was caused by the inadequate assistance of the hospital staff. Clear Lake Rehab. Hosp. v. Karber, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1932 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 18 2010).

1804. There was no abuse of discretion by denying the physician's motion to dismiss the medical malpractice case, because the expert had the education, training and experience to assist the jury in determining whether the physician's misidentification of the ramus artery caused the patient's damages, and the expert provided sufficient facts in his report and linked his causation opinions to those facts and the standard of care for identification of a ramus artery. Reardon v. Nelson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1824, 2010 WL 917573 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 16 2010).

1805. Contrary to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1), defendant did not object to an expert's qualifications to provide testimony on delay outcry, and only objected to qualifications to provide testimony on recantation, but even had he defendant properly objected, the trial court could have properly allowed this testimony, given the expert's qualifications that included education and practical experience. Saenz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1519 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2010).

1806. Trial court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to a doctor's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702; the doctor's specialized knowledge and experience in emergency medicine, including narcotics overdoses and the effects of narcotics on persons, sufficiently fit his testimony on the potential effects narcotics could have on children, in connection with defendant's endangerment trial. Butler v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1159, 2010 WL 547055 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 18 2010).

1807. Defendant did not object to a sergeant's qualifications as an expert; therefore, the court presumed, without deciding, that this witness was qualified as an expert. Verdun v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 360, 2010 WL 183523 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 21 2010).

1808. Although defendant argued that a sergeant's testimony vouched for the victim's credibility contrary to Tex. R. Evid. 702, the sergeant offered no opinion as to the truthfulness of the victim's allegations, the testimony revealed only that the victim recounted the same facts to the investigator about what occurred, and the testimony did not supplant the jury's ability to determine witness credibility, plus the testimony could have assisted the jury in determining an issue for which the jury was not qualified to the best possible degree in deciding: whether the alleged events occurred; the testimony was not inadmissible, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to admissible evidence, plus it was plausible that counsel chose not to object for strategic reasons, such that ineffective assistance was not shown. Verdun v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 360, 2010 WL 183523 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 21 2010).

1809. Trial court did not err in allowing a witness's testimony, which was not about science or scientific causation, but rather was about actual practice and a general understanding in the oil and gas industry as to what constituted commencement of operations; the witness was qualified to testify about the practices in the industry with which he was familiar, despite the fact that he was not a driller, and because the issue of a nonoperator's compliance with the joint operating agreement's requirement of commencement of operations was submitted to the jury, this kind of evidence was relevant and appropriate. Valence Operating Co. v. Anadarko Petroleum Corp., 303 S.W.3d 435, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 300 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 15 2010).

1810. Trial court abused its discretion by overruling defendant's qualification objection concerning an officer, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, given that the officer failed to explain how his experience gave him expertise in accident reconstruction, plus the officer admitted that he was not an accident reconstructive expert. Walker v. Rangel, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9215, 2009 WL 4342505 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

1811. Court did not err in determining that a trooper's description of defendant as "psychotic" was inadmissible as evidence of defendant's mental state because, although he had specialized knowledge in reconstructing accidents, the trooper acknowledged he did not have specialized knowledge in mental illnesses, nor any qualifications to give an opinion that defendant was "psychotic." Fisher-Riza v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9769, 2009 WL 4358622 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

1812. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing a witness to give an opinion regarding the fingerprints, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, given that the State contended that it established the witness's qualifications by the testimony of the witness's training and experience, plus the court only had a general objection to consider, even though defendant could have requested to take the witness on voir dire and pointed out specific deficiencies, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 705(b). Sepeda v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9235, 2009 WL 4348600 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 30 2009).

1813. Case law cited by defendant did not show that a witness was not qualified. Sepeda v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9235, 2009 WL 4348600 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 30 2009).

1814. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly allowed an expert to testify on the cause of death because the expert was shown to have training in child abuse, sodium levels, sodium intoxication, other causes of elevated sodium levels, head injuries, "pica", and out-of-hospital cardiac arrest. The expert testified that he used standard practice and procedures, including the widely accepted method of differential diagnosis, to determine the cause of the child's illness. Overton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8312, 2009 WL 3489844 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 29 2009).

1815. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly allowed an expert to testify on the cause of death because the expert stated that he had training and experience in the area of sodium poisoning during medical school; he attended "classes that covered material dealing with patients that had elevated sodium levels, and "treated patients with elevated sodium levels." Finally, the doctor testified that the methods that he employed were "standard operating procedure, standard medical examiner practice." Overton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8312, 2009 WL 3489844 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 29 2009).

1816. Expert's report established that he was qualified to opine on the issue of causation because he was qualified to render such an opinion under the rules of evidence, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. §§ 74.351(r)(5)(C), 74.401(a). Barber v. Dean, 303 S.W.3d 819, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8383 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 29 2009).

1817. In a medical malpractice case, the court erred in granting the doctor's motion to dismiss on the basis that the expert was not a qualifying "expert" because he tied his education and training not only to his knowledge of anesthesia care during a cardiac procedure, but also to the medical and health standards of care for general surgeons like the doctor. Additionally, the padding and positioning of a patient during surgery was common to surgeries generally, and the expert made clear that he had knowledge, training, and experience regarding the medical and surgical management duties of the general surgeon during surgical procedures. Barber v. Mercer, 303 S.W.3d 786, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8621 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 15 2009).

1818. Police officer who stopped defendant for driving while intoxicated, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04, was properly qualified to testify as an expert pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702 on the administration of the horizonal gaze nystagmus test based on his training and experience, despite the lapse of his National Highway Traffic Safety Administration certification under 37 Tex. Admin. Code § 221.9. Liles v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7744, 2009 WL 3152174 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

1819. In a patient's medical malpractice action that arose from an L2 inferior to S1 superior decompressive laminectomy performed by appellees, a doctor and a neurosurgery clinic, the trial court abused its discretion by finding the patient's expert witness unqualified to render expert testimony as to the standard of care involved in laminectomies because the expert continued to participate in lumbar laminectomy surgeries, and although he was presently unable to hold the title of "lead" surgeon due to an arm injury, he was nevertheless a surgeon who assisted in laminectomies preoperatively, operatively, and postoperatively. Therefore, at the time of the patient's surgery, the patient's expert was practicing health care in a field of practice that involves the same type of care or treatment as that required of appellees, pursuant to Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.402(b)(1). St. Clair v. Alexander, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7682, 2009 WL 3135812 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 30 2009).

1820. Expert witness who lacked an accounting background was not qualified to testify on lost profits in a suit for breach of a credit card processing contract. Spin Doctor Golf, Inc. v. Paymentech, L.P., 296 S.W.3d 354, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7349 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 18 2009).

1821. Expert was qualified under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. §§ 74.351(r)(5)(C), 74.403(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 702 because he was familiar with the issues involved in the health care liability claim, although he was not a specialist. Estorque v. Schafer, 302 S.W.3d 19, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7343 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 17 2009).

1822. In a case involving sexual assault of a child, a trial court did not err by admitting expert testimony; even though there was no explicit ruling made on a doctor's qualifications, an implicit ruling was made since defendant's predicate objection was overruled. The trial court did not err by finding that the doctor was qualified based on her knowledge, training, skill, experience, and education; inter alia, the doctor testified that she had performed about 8,500 sexual abuse examinations. Little v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7091, 2009 WL 2882932 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 9 2009).

1823. Expert was qualified under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.401 to opine as to the standards of care, their breach by a doctor, and causation, even though the doctor was a family practitioner and the expert was an emergency room physician, as § 74.401 focused on the condition involved, which was appendicitis in a patient's case; the expert was licensed to practice medicine in Texas, had been practicing for 20 years, was practicing medicine when the claim arose, and was qualified to opine on causation under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Granbury Minor Emergency Clinic v. Thiel, 296 S.W.3d 261, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6957 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 27 2009).

1824. In a case involving indecency with a child by sexual contact,a trial court was within its discretion when it determined that an expert for the State possessed sufficient experience to offer her opinion; she was not testifying that the child was telling the truth or that child complainants as a class were truthful. The State established the witness's expertise as a forensic interviewer, and she testified she has conducted over fifteen hundred interviews with child victims. Metcalfe v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6720, 2009 WL 2617644 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

1825. Expert's report was inadequate because, besides summarily asserting "knowledge," the expert's report and curriculum vitae did not demonstrate how he gained the requisite experience or training to satisfy the requirement that he had substantial training or experience in total knee replacement surgery and the post-operative care of such a procedure. Carreras, M.D. v. Trevino, 298 S.W.3d 721, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6644 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2009).

1826. In a capital murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding a doctor qualified to testify as to the cause of the child's death because the doctor had fifteen years of experience as a licensed physician, she had worked in a pediatric intensive care unit for eleven years, and she was certified in both pediatrics and pediatric critical care, specializing in critical care, where she treated many children with neurological injuries and illnesses. The doctor was also an associate professor at Baylor College of Medicine. Marin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6477 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 20 2009).

1827. In an aggravated sexual assault case, defendant failed to preserve error relating to the qualifications of an expert witness because no objections to such were made before the trial court. Defendant did not object in the trial court to the expert's testimony on the ground that the State had not properly qualified her as an expert witness, nor did defendant make a request to take the expert on voir dire outside the presence of the jury to contest her qualifications. Robledo v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6416, 2009 WL 2525412 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 19 2009).

1828. Appellants challenged an expert's qualifications, as well as the reliability of her testimony, but none of these objections were raised at trial and they were waived under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Tex. Specialty Trailers, Inc. v. Jackson & Simmen Drilling Co., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6318 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 13 2009).

1829. Golf club seller's expert was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the individual's experience in evaluating business opportunities, executing marketing plans for businesses, and monitoring business results for golf club manufacturers did not amount to knowledge, skill, and experience so as to qualify him as an expert on the issue of lost profits of the seller. Spin Doctor Golf, Inc. v. Paymentech, L.P., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5991 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 3 2009).

1830. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of fourteen in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the rebuttal testimony of the State's expert who testified that the complainant's "normal" behavior would not necessarily negate sexual abuse; the expert was qualified to provide testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and 703 based on his educational and professional background and experience, and the expert's academic and professional background focusing on the treatment and observation of child victims of sexual abuse appropriately matched the subject matter of his testimony focusing on the behavioral patterns of child victims of sexual abuse. Briones v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5944, 2009 WL 2356626 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 30 2009).

1831. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that a pediatrician was qualified to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 on the issue of whether a victim of sexual abuse as a child had a higher chance of becoming a perpetrator of sexual abuse; although the pediatrician admitted that he was not an expert in that particular field of study, he qualified as an expert witness by virtue of his knowledge, experience, training, and education. Clemons v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6003, 2009 WL 2372927 (Tex. App. Eastland July 30 2009).

1832. Doctor's expert report satisfied the requirements of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351 as well as the qualifications necessary under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. §§ 74.402, 74.403 and Tex. R. Evid. 702 to opine on a patient's claim of negligent emergency room treatment of an ankle fracture and adequately linked his determinations regarding the alleged breach of care to the resulting damages. Stephanie M. Philipp, P.A. v. McCreedy, 298 S.W.3d 682, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5786 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 29 2009).

1833. Defendant did not challenge the qualifications of an officer as an expert on horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) testing, but defendant did complain that the officer improperly administered the test; the officer deviated in the timing of the tests, and although the trial court opined that the deviations were somewhat significant, the courts had not held that timing errors alone justified exclusion of HGN testimony, and the court found no abuse of discretion. Sotelo v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5818, 2009 WL 2343134 (Tex. App. El Paso July 29 2009).

1834. Trial court did not err in finding that a witness possessed sufficient qualifications to assist the jury to understand domestic violence victims, given that (1) the witness's testimony was not conclusive on the issue of whether defendant assaulted the victim, and thus did not require a much higher degree of scientific expertise, and (2) the witness's testimony was not dispositive to the disputed issues, making the reliability of the expertise and the witness's qualifications less crucial. Booker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5541, 2009 WL 2006428 (Tex. App. Dallas July 13 2009).

1835. Because defendant did not analyze his complaint the expert testimony was not relevant, defendant waived the issue, but even if the court addressed the issue, the testimony was admissible; defendant argued that the victim continued to see him, making her assault story unlikely, and in light of defendant's posture, the witness's testimony of how victims of domestic violence interact with their abusers and why the victims might lie was relevant to the case. Booker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5541, 2009 WL 2006428 (Tex. App. Dallas July 13 2009).

1836. Because the evidence provided by a witness's testimony was within or close to the jury's common understanding, the witness's qualifications were less important than when the evidence was outside the jury's own experience, but regardless, she had social work undergraduate and masters degrees, had over three years job experience, had thousands of interactions with victims, had developed publications, and had done trainings and presentations on domestic violence, such that the witness had the knowledge, skill, experience, training, interaction, and education necessary to give opinions on issues relating to domestic violence victims. Booker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5541, 2009 WL 2006428 (Tex. App. Dallas July 13 2009).

1837. In this condemnation case, it was not clear that the principals' testimony was based on advertising revenue, although they did mention it, but given that under Texas law, an owner of property was qualified to testify to the property's market value, on remand, the trial court was not to allow evidence of valuation based on advertising income, but general estimates of what the property would sell for considering its possible use as a billboard site were acceptable. State v. Cent. Expressway Sign Assocs., 302 S.W.3d 866, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 967, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 134 (Tex. 2009).

1838. Because there was no timely objection to an expert's qualifications, the complaint was not preserved, but even if the issue was preserved, the court found the expert qualified and had the necessary knowledge, education, skills, and experience to testify as an expert regarding causation and repetitive trauma injuries. Old Republic Ins. Co. v. Weeks, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4139, 2009 WL 1740820 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 11 2009).

1839. Doctor's testimony established a reasonable medical probability that the employee's injuries were caused by repetitive trauma and an acute trauma and that the foundation of his expert opinion was sound; the doctor's physical exam of the employee demonstrated an appropriate methodology and his reliance on other's medical reports showed that his opinion was based on more than subjective speculation, plus the doctor's testimony showed that his opinions had a reliable foundation, such that the trial court did not err in admitting the doctor's testimony. Old Republic Ins. Co. v. Weeks, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4139, 2009 WL 1740820 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 11 2009).

1840. Court properly allowed a detective to testify as an expert about body language because she had been a police officer for 15 years and had investigated sexual assaults for three years, she was a fifteen year veteran officer, and she had a degree in criminal justice and was a certified special investigator of sex crimes. Brite v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4096, 2009 WL 1617741 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 10 2009).

1841. Based on a trooper's training and experience in Horizontal Gaze Nystagmus (HGN) test administration, although he had no formal HGN certification, the trial court did not err in permitting him to testify that six out of six clues on the test indicated intoxication; given the trial court's broad discretion to decide whether a witness qualified as an expert, the court could not find that the trial court erred in defendant's trial for driving while intoxicated under Tex. Penal Code Ann. §§ 49.04(a), 49.09(a). Drew v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3994, 2009 WL 1491888 (Tex. App. Austin May 29 2009).

1842. Livestock dealer was qualified to render expert testimony on the cattle business, and opinions or estimates of lost profits might be competent evidence, if that opinion or estimate was based on objective facts, figures, or data from which the amount of lost profits might be ascertained, but the dealer failed to provide the trial court with any objective evidence to substantiate his opinion. Penner Cattle, Inc. v. Cox, 287 S.W.3d 370, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3546 (Tex. App. Eastland May 21 2009).

1843. Doctor disputed an expert's qualifications under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.401(a), but the court believed the doctor characterized the issue in this case too narrowly and failed to focus on the standards of medical care for the diagnosis, care or treatment of the condition involved in the claim under § 74.401(a)(3). Leonard v. Glenn, 293 S.W.3d 669, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3446 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 20 2009).

1844. Because an expert was qualified to opine on the standards of care applicable to the prescribing of Indomethacin to an individual with chronic kidney disease, the court affirmed the trial court's denial of the motion to dismiss pursuant to Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351. Leonard v. Glenn, 293 S.W.3d 669, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3446 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 20 2009).

1845. Expert opined that the doctor and physician assistant should have avoided using a drug with a patient and the doctor did not need to have experience in supervising a physician assistant to render such an opinion. Leonard v. Glenn, 293 S.W.3d 669, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3446 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 20 2009).

1846. Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.401(c)(2) did not require a medical expert to practice in the exact same field as the defendant physician and rather the expert only needed to be actively practicing medicine in rendering services relevant to the claim; the claim in this case was the alleged negligent treatment of a knee with a contraindicated drug, and the court had to determine if the expert's report reflected that he had the necessary qualifications to provide an opinion on the medical standard of care for prescribing Indomethacin for gout to an individual with renal disease. Leonard v. Glenn, 293 S.W.3d 669, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3446 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 20 2009).

1847. Expert's reports and accompanying curriculum vitae established his extensive experience and current practice in the area of internal medicine, nephrology, and renal failure; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in accepting the expert's qualifications under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.401 to render an opinion regarding the standard of care provided by a doctor. Leonard v. Glenn, 293 S.W.3d 669, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3446 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 20 2009).

1848. For an expert to be qualified under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.402, he had to be practicing health care and possess sufficient training and experience to offer expert opinions. Leonard v. Glenn, 293 S.W.3d 669, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3446 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 20 2009).

1849. Physician assistant argued that an expert had to be qualified to render an opinion regarding the standard of care for a physician assistant in an acute care setting treating a patient complaining of knee pain, but based on the expert's petition and the expert reports, the relevant standard of care was the appropriate prescription of medication for a patient presenting with gout and a history of renal disease. Leonard v. Glenn, 293 S.W.3d 669, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3446 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 20 2009).

1850. Expert had extensive experience in the field of nephrology and the effects of Indomethacin on patients suffering from renal failure and the expert's training and experience were comparable to those of experts that other appellate courts have held to be qualified to opine regarding health care providers, plus the expert report and attached curriculum vitae clearly substantiated that he had knowledge of accepted standards of care for health care providers for the diagnosis, care, or treatment of the illness, injury, or condition involved in the claim and that he was qualified on the basis of training or experience to offer an expert opinion regarding those accepted standards of health care, for purposes of Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.402(b)(3); the expert's opinion was that the acceptable standard of care for treating gout in someone with the patient's medical history was that no one should have prescribed Indomethacin and thus the expert was sufficiently qualified to opine that it should have been obvious to the physician assistant and the doctor should have been aware that the patient's past medical history and should have avoided the use of Indomethacin which caused the progression of his renal disease. The trial court did not err in finding that the expert was qualified. Leonard v. Glenn, 293 S.W.3d 669, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3446 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 20 2009).

1851. In a products-liability case arising from injuries sustained by a truck driver in attempting to unload a truck trailer, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the testimony of the driver's expert witness regarding design defect where the witness was not qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because although he might have demonstrated his experience in designing workplace products and in designing solutions for hazards in walking surfaces, he was not shown to have any training, experience, or special knowledge in the design or manufacture of refrigerated trailers or their relevant components. The witness demonstrated no specialized knowledge regarding the particular design of an uncovered gutter spanning the width of the trailer in the rear, and, accordingly, his testimony as to the driver's proposed alternative designs did not rise above mere speculation. Champion v. Great Dane L.P., 286 S.W.3d 533, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3222, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P18223 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 7 2009).

1852. Affidavits of a resident and his wife failed to give rise to the requisite issue of material fact that the owner should have foreseen that the resident would be robbed and stabbed on the premises; they did not establish the necessary expertise to qualify as experts, and as statements of opinion by lay, interested witnesses, their opinions were neither readily controvertible nor competent, for summary judgment purposes. Xiao Yu Zhong v. Sunblossom Gardens, LLC, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3010, 2009 WL 1162213 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2009).

1853. Father did not address the alleged error of the trial court regarding expert witnesses and other claims, but even if he had, defendant made no objections regarding witness qualification and he waived error in that regard under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). In re A.H., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2851, 2009 WL 1065205 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 16 2009).

1854. Defendant did not argue that counsel should have objected to either witnesses' qualifications as experts in their respective fields, or to any specific portion of their testimony, and thus the court's review related only to the procedural notice given regarding this testimony. Vasquez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2412, 2009 WL 943868 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 9 2009).

1855. In a sexual assault case, an officer was properly allowed to testify regarding defendant's "grooming" the victim for sexual assaults because he had been a police officer for thirty years, he had investigated twenty sexual assault and child abuse cases per year, and he testified that it was his opinion based on his investigation that defendant had been "grooming" the victim prior to her outcry. He explained that sexual predators often developed a relationship with a victim to build trust, and then started committing small offenses to see if the victim made an outcry. Weatherly v. State, 283 S.W.3d 481, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2435 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 1 2009).

1856. In a case alleging that pain and swelling in a patient's left vulvar area was negligently diagnosed as cellulitis rather than Methicillin Resistant Staphylococcus Aureus (MRSA), an expert was qualified under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.401 to render liability and causation opinions, despite being an infectious disease specialist rather than a gynecologist. Moheb v. Harvey, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 229, 2008 WL 5501166 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 15 2009).

1857. Witness was properly qualified as a forensic and fingerprint expert in reviewing crime scenes and although the State suggested that his qualifications were sufficient to justify his testimony regarding the physical aspects of injuries sustained during the course of a crime, the court's review of his qualifications did not reveal special credentials to speak as an expert about wound patterns, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Hawkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 16, 2009 WL 30255 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 7 2009).

1858. Even if evidence admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 701 was inadmissible, it did not constitute reversible error for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because there was a qualified expert testifying that lacerations might have been defensive wounds and the witness testifying similarly that they were consistent with defensive wounds, and thus the court did not find that the addition of the testimony by the witness would have affected a substantial right of defendant. Hawkins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 16, 2009 WL 30255 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 7 2009).

1859. In a case alleging breach of fiduciary duty, negligence, and negligence misrepresentation, various underwriters preserved an error relating to an expert's qualifications by raising an objection in the trial court; however, the expert was not required to have experience underwriting under certain manuals and contracts. As to another error based on the expert's methodology, it was not preserved because no objection was made before the trial court. Underwriters at Lloyds Subscribing to Policy Nos. MDJ03/L075 & MDJ03/Z0165 v. Edmond & Stephens Ins. Agency, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9730 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 30 2008).

1860. In a workers' compensation case, a trial court did not err by allowing expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because a doctor was qualified to give an opinion regarding causation; he had graduated from medical school, had been an orthopedic surgeon for 17 years, and was board certified in total joint replacement. Moreover, the expert's opinion that a benefit claimant's compensable injury included osteoarthritis and chondromalacia was based on a number of factors, and it was based on a reasonable medical probability, and not possibility, speculation, or surmise. Am. Cas. Co. of Reading v. Zachero, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9263 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 11 2008).

1861. Experienced truck driver, also the plaintiff in a truck roll-over accident case, was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 to give an expert opinion that the shipper had improperly loaded the cargo, beer, by stacking the pallets too high and not using void fillers to keep the load from shifting. Dewbre v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9046 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 26 2008).

1862. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child, a trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing a counselor to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 about how offenders groomed children for abuse based on her nine years of experience, specialized training, and treatment of sex offenders; the counselor had a master's degree, as well as state-issued licenses in counseling and treating sex offenders, and she completed a 2,000-hour internship. Even if there was an error, defendant made no effort to show how this affected his substantial rights since other testimony about grooming came into evidence through the victim's therapist. Mitchell v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8594 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 14 2008).

1863. Physician was qualified to render an opinion in a medical malpractice action where, despite appellants' claims that he was not a "physician" because his curriculum vitae did not state that he was licensed to practice medicine in Texas because the facts that he held staff privileges at two area hospitals and served as the medical director of a surgery center indicated that he was licensed to practice medicine in Texas. Azle Manor, Inc. v. Vaden, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8414 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 6, 2008).

1864. In a product liability case, a trial court properly determined that an expert was qualified to give an opinion regarding seatbelts in buses because he was a structural engineer with a bachelor's and master's degree who had performed all of the structural analysis and design on a safety school bus project, including seat supports, which led to the development of a Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard, performed data analysis of bus-seat testing for the United States Department of Transportation, and designed computer modeling programs to simulate the performance of seatbelt and airbag systems. MCI Sales & Serv. v. Hinton, 272 S.W.3d 17, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6951 (Tex. App. Waco 2008), aff'd, 329 S.W.3d 475, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 976, 54 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 386 (Tex. 2010),

1865. In a case where an insurer was seeking to recover damages to a car, a driver failed to preserve error relating to a contention that unqualified expert testimony was presented in an attachment to an affidavit; no objection was lodged, and the filing of motions for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and a directed verdict did not preserve error either because the objection should have been lodged when the exhibit was offered into evidence. Adams v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 264 S.W.3d 424, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6486 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

1866. Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing an expert to testify as to an opinion of defendant's mental state at the time of the offense because based on education and experience, the expert was qualified to testify as to what might or might not have contributed to defendant behavior at the time of the offenses. Additionally, the expert based the testimony upon the facts that defendant's story was inconsistent, he did not have a history of delusions, and his panic at being apprehended by police officers after the commission of the offenses was inconsistent with the delusion that one was God. Howard v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6431 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 21 2008).

1867. Trial court properly denied a motion for summary judgment filed by an anesthesiologist and registered nurse anesthesiologist because a neurologist was qualified as an expert under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351(r)(5)(A), as he had experience and academic work in blood flow to the brain, and the husband alleged that the anesthesiologist did not adequately monitor the patient's breathing after her surgery and the omission resulted in decreased blood flow to her brain and her current condition. Gelman v. Cuellar, 268 S.W.3d 123, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6173 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

1868. In a trial for driving while intoxicated (DWI) under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04(a), there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 702 arising from the fact that a walk-and-turn test was administered by a deputy sheriff who was not certified to administer the test because the deputy testified to being very familiar with how to administer the standardized test through extensive training and years of experience. Kirby v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5776 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 31 2008).

1869. Defendant argued that a witness's violation of Tex. R. Evid. 614 should not have prevented her from testifying and she should have been qualified to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, but the court overruled these points of error because the witness was not qualified to provide a professional opinion about the victim's wound and whether or not it appeared to be self-inflicted; although the witness had a degree in nursing, she had no specific training for looking at wounds or determining whether they were self-inflicted, and there was nothing establishing that the witness was qualified as an expert on self-inflicted wounds by her knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, such that it was not error for the trial court to exclude her testimony as an expert witness. Jones v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5819 (Tex. App. Austin July 30, 2008).

1870. In an action involving medical negligence, although a doctor did not specialize and was not certified in infectious disease, his experience and training qualified him as an expert to testify regarding the cause of the patient's injuries. Jelinek v. Casas, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5647 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 29 2008).

1871. In defendant's murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing a doctor to testify as an expert witness because the witness received his medical degree from the University of Matamoros in 1985, he had been practicing medicine for over twenty years, he was a certified coroner, a licensed forensic medical examiner, and, at the time of trial, had been employed by the Attorney General's Office for the State of Tamaulipas, Mexico for approximately twelve years. Manzanares v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5636 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 29 2008).

1872. Even if the court assumed, without deciding, that a witness offered an expert opinion and that she was not qualified to do so, defendant failed to establish that admission of the opinion testimony was reversible error for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that (1) the evidence of defendant's guilt of aggravated robbery was overwhelming, (2) as to whether defendant was a good candidate for rehabilitation, the jury had ample evidence from which to draw its own conclusions even without the witness's opinion, and (3) defendant's guilt, combined with evidence of his long pattern of criminal conduct, adequately supported the jury's decision to assess a life sentence. Dickey v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5599 (Tex. App. Dallas July 25 2008).

1873. Witness had experience performing business valuations, had valued a partnership interest using the income approach, and had valued a contingency fee practice by relying on the same type of projections he used in this case, and although he had never used information from a patent case in valuing a law firm, the specific issue in this case was valuation of a partner's interest in a law firm, for which the witness had specialized knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, and therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the witness to testify as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 for purposes of determining how to divide marital property. Von Hohn v. Von Hohn, 260 S.W.3d 631, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5416 (Tex. App. Tyler 2008).

1874. In a health care liability case where a patient suffered a fatal heart attack shortly after being treated by a gastroenterologist, a motion to dismiss under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351 was denied because an internist and a cardiologist were qualified to opine on the standard of care, breach, and causation, despite having differing specialties; they demonstrated sufficient qualifications to opine about the standards of care in connection with recognizing, investigating, and treating or ruling out cardiovascular disease in treating the patient. Moreover, their reports discussed the standard of care, breach, and causation with sufficient specificity to inform the gastroenterologist of the conduct that was alleged and to provide a basis for the trial court to conclude that the claims had merit. Pacha v. Casey, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5490 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 22 2008).

1875. In a case involving intoxication manslaughter, a trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 on the issues of accident reconstruction and drug detection because the experts were qualified due to training, education, and experience; moreover, the three criteria in Kelly v. State, 824 S.W.2d 568 (Tex. Crim. App. 1992), were satisfied. The experts testified about effects of marijuana and alcohol in a person's body, as well as to defendant's speed at the time of a fatal accident. Wooten v. State, 267 S.W.3d 289, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5497 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

1876. In a case involving a dispute over charges owed to a lease operator, while evidence that wells were inactive for six months prior to the witness's inspection would have been relevant, his opinion regarding how long the wells had to have been inactive for rust to form also had to be shown to be reliable; given that (1) nothing in his testimony identified the basis for the witness's opinion that the rusted wells had been inactive for six months, and (2) the witness, although a pumper for 17 years, did not testify that he had any specialized knowledge relating to the formation of rust on inactive oil wells or that he had ever before observed rust, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the witness's opinion regarding the period that lease wells were inactive. S & J Invs. v. Am. Star Energy & Minerals Corp., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5078 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 8, 2008).

1877. In a medical malpractice action, which claimed that one of a hospital's nurses improperly "triaged" a patient and that unreasonable delay in the patient's medical treatment caused the patient to suffer a ruptured appendix before surgery, the trial court properly denied the hospital's motion to dismiss where the reports by plaintiffs' expert established that the expert had experience in triage and emergency department management, as well as surgical management of abdominal pain, including appendicitis; hence, the expert was qualified. CHCA Mainland, L.P. v. Wheeler, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2537 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 10 2008).

1878. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702, the trial court did not err in excluding the client's expert's affidavit in her legal malpractice suit where the trial court could reasonably conclude that the analytical gaps in the expert's affidavit rendered his opinion too conclusory to be reliable. Childs v. Crutchfield, Decordova & Chauveaux, P.C., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2540 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 10 2008).

1879. Expert was qualified to opine on causation and therefore the doctor's motion to dismiss a medical malpractice action was properly denied, because he was a board certified internist, he had been an urgent care provider, he was currently an emergency medicine doctor at a hospital, and he had been the director of emergency medicine. Mosely v. Mundine, 249 S.W.3d 775, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2411 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

1880. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in accepting an infectious disease specialist's qualifications as sufficient to allow him to offer an opinion concerning the potential that a decedent would benefit from heart surgery, under Tex. R. Evid. 702, because the specialist's qualifications reflected that he had prior experience in the diagnosis and treatment of persons with atrial myxomas. Reddy v. Seale, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2000 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 20 2008).

1881. Because a cardiologist's qualifications reflected his training and experience in the diagnosis and treatment of persons with atrial myxomas, a trial court did not abuse its discretion in accepting the cardiologist's qualifications as sufficient to allow him to identify the applicable standards of care and how breaches in those standards resulted in a decedent's alleged injury, under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Reddy v. Seale, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2000 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 20 2008).

1882. Officer was qualified to give expert testimony regarding blood spatter evidence because he testified that he had been a deputy for eight years, he had been a member of the crime scene unit for three years, and he testified that he had completed and was certified in level one training in blood spatter analysis. Turner v. State, 252 S.W.3d 571, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2009 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

1883. Officer was qualified to give expert testimony on the street value of cocaine found in defendant's possession because of the officer's training and experience regarding narcotics. Overton v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1067 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 13 2008).

1884. In an action involving a fire and who was the cause of it, a proper foundation had not been laid to qualify an expert to testify whether he had any criticism of the plumbing company's work and the admission of testimony that an individual was not seeking to recover anything from the plumbing company was irrelevant since none of it even remotely related to whether the plumbing company was liable for the fire; however, those errors were harmless since they did not cause the rendition of an improper verdict and therefore, a reversal was not required. Richmond Condos. v. Skipworth Commer. Plumbing, Inc., 245 S.W.3d 646, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 963 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

1885. In an action for breach of a maintenance contract, the evidence was sufficient to support an attorney fee award because the contractor's expert on fees demonstrated that he was qualified by knowledge, skill, experience, training, and education to provide specialized testimony to assist the jury in understanding the evidence regarding attorney fees. United Plaza-Midland, L.L.C. v. First Serv. Air Conditioning Contractors, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10027 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 20 2007).

1886. In an aggravated assault prosecution, the trial court did not err in admitting a police officer's expert testimony concerning the propensity of family violence victims to return to the family members who abused them because he was qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702 based on his knowledge, training, and experience; further, his testimony was an appropriate subject for expert testimony as it assisted the jury by helping it to understand the evidence regarding the complainant's post-assault behavior in returning to defendant. Dixon v. State, 244 S.W.3d 472, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9292 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1887. In a health care liability action brought by a patient's guardian against a rehabilitation hospital, the purported expert reports filed by the guardian did not constitute a good faith effort to comply with the statutory requirements, and the trial court thus properly dismissed the suit pursuant to Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351, where the first report submitted by the guardian was that of a nurse, who was not qualified to testify as an expert witness on the issue of causation because she was not a physician; the second report submitted by the guardian was that of a doctor licensed to practice medicine in the state of Coahuila, Mexico, but because nothing in the record indicated that the doctor was licensed in Texas or any of the states of the United States, he did not meet the statutory definition of a "physician," and, therefore, was not qualified to testify on the issue of causation, and, accordingly, neither the nurse nor the doctor were qualified as an "expert" capable under the statute of opining on causation. Cuellar v. Warm Springs Rehab. Found., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8974 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 14 2007).

1888. Defendant's conviction for murder was proper because the trial court did not err by admitting an officer's testimony as a gang membership expert since the officer was qualified; the officer had been a certified peace officer for 11 years; he had over 3,000 hours of training directly involved with gang identification of prison and street gang members; and he had been a member of a gang investigators association for 12 years and had been with a gang task force for 13 years. Rivers v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8898 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 8 2007).

1889. Expert was qualified to provide an opinion on causation in a medical malpractice action, and therefore the physician's motion to dismiss under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351 was properly denied, because the report indicated that she was a physician who had knowledge and experience concerning the swallowing mechanism and in evaluating elderly patients. Palafox v. Silvey, 247 S.W.3d 310, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10155 (Tex. App. El Paso 2007).

1890. In a health care liability action brought by a patient's parents against a dentist and his alleged employer, the expert report of the parent's expert represented an objective good faith effort to comply with the statutory requirements of a health care liability expert report where: (1) the expert's report focused on the patient's overdose of sedation medication, her monitoring after the procedure, her untimely discharge, and her resulting cerebral hypoxia; (2) his qualifications supported his expertise in the subjects on which he provided opinions in his report because he had been a board-certified anesthesiologist for over 30 years, currently practiced medicine, and was a tenured professor of anesthesiology with the state university; (3) according to the expert's report and curriculum vitae, he had extensive training and experience with the standards of anesthesia management and recovery from medications used in sedating patients; (4) the expert was one of the researchers in a multi-center study on one of the sedation reversal agents used during the patient's procedure; and (5) the report provided the link between the health care providers' breach (overdose of sedation medication, failure to properly reverse deep sedation, failure to monitor properly, untimely discharge, and the placement of the patient in the vehicle) and the expert's conclusion on causation that, if properly medicated or monitored, the patient would have avoided the obstruction of her airway that resulted in hypoxia and brain injury. Comstock v. Clark, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8447 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 25 2007).

1891. Affidavit of company's expert was competent summary judgment evidence because it was clear and free from inconsistency, and thus the burden fell on the homeowners to raise a fact issue by controverting expert testimony; because the company challenged the qualifications of the homeowners' expert witnesses, the homeowners also had the burden of establishing the admissibility of any controverting expert opinions. Adair v. Veritas DGC Land, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7744 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 27 2007).

1892. Neither below nor on appeal did homeowners object to the expert's affidavit on the basis of qualifications, reliability or relevance, or otherwise claim it was deficient, so the court did not need to consider whether it satisfied all admissibility requirements. Adair v. Veritas DGC Land, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7744 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 27 2007).

1893. Because no evidence revealed the qualifications of three experts and the fourth lacked expertise in the areas most critical to establishing causation in the case, the court was unable to say that the trial court would have abused its discretion had it excluded all four of these witnesses based on the failure to prove the qualifications of the witnesses. Adair v. Veritas DGC Land, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7744 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 27 2007).

1894. In a capital murder trial, a trial court did not err in excluding an expert's testimony about identification because, while the expert could have been qualified on the topic, his area of expertise was not closely tailored to the area of eyewitness identification. Garcia v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7057 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 30 2007).

1895. Trial court permitted a witness to testify as an expert and gave a detailed and specific ruling allowing some areas and expertise and disallowing others; the trial court could have found that either the proffered testimony was beyond basic blood spatter opinions or that the expert lacked a sufficient background in this field for the degree of complexity of this case, and thus the court found no abuse of discretion in the partial exclusion of the expert's spatter testimony, and the court noted that it viewed the exclusion to be on the basis of expertise rather than reliability. Wilson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7173 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 30 2007).

1896. In defendant's sexual assault on a child case, the court properly allowed a nurse to testify as an expert regarding the risk of HIV transmission during unprotected sex because the State offered testimony to establish that the nurse was qualified to testify about the matter. She was a nurse practitioner who specialized in infectious diseases, she received extensive training and education related to HIV, and she indicated that she was familiar with several studies establishing that there was a high risk of HIV transmission during unprotected sex. Henry v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6791 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 23 2007).

1897. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the State's expert witness was qualified to testify about the symptoms of sexual abuse exhibited by the victim; the expert provided the court with a record of extensive experience in counseling sexually abused children and tied the symptoms that she observed in the victim with what she had observed in other sexually abused children. Jones v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6358 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 9 2007).

1898. Even if the parishioner's theory of limited unsound mind was valid, the parishioner's expert did not demonstrate any objective evidence or data that would support the conclusion that the parishioner was of unsound mind from 1985 until 2004; thus, the trial court abused its discretion in excluding the expert's testimony as unreliable. Ramirez v. Mansour, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6035 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 1 2007).

1899. Psychiatrist who had several years of experience working with sexually violent offenders and evaluating them for civil commitment was qualified as an expert in the field of psychiatry and qualified to testify that an individual had a behavioral abnormality that made him likely to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence; moreover, no analytical gap was shown in the psychiatrist's methodology. In re Zamora, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5852 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2007).

1900. In a negligence case arising from a fire at a condominium complex, speculative testimony regarding the adequacy of plumbing work was irrelevant and inadmissible and no showing of expert qualifications was made under Tex. R. Evid. 702; however, the trial court's error in admitting the testimony was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44. Richmond Condos. v. Skipworth Commer. Plumbing, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5977 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 26 2007).

1901. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a fraud action in permitting one of a home health business's accountants to testify as an expert on the business members' alleged damages because his education, training, and experience in accounting and auditing in the field of Medicare-funded home-health agencies, as well as his exposure to business valuation in that specialized field qualified him to testify as an expert on damages pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702. Furthermore, the accountant's experience, coupled with his thorough testimony about the methodology he employed, demonstrated that the opinions he drew from the underlying data were reliable, and his damage models comported with the jury instruction concerning damages. Rogers v. Alexander, 244 S.W.3d 370, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5103 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

1902. Where a patient allegedly developed decubitus ulcers because of substandard care at a hospital, a doctor was qualified to render an expert opinion on the issue of causation because the doctor was board certified in internal medicine and occupational medicine and had 25 years of experience as a medical doctor, including direct experience in treating patients with decubitus ulcers and instructing nurses and other personnel in the proper techniques to prevent decubitus ulcers. Mem'l Hermann Healthcare Sys. v. Burrell, 230 S.W.3d 755, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5015 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1903. Forensic child interviewer was qualified to testify, in defendant's trial for indecency with a minor, as an expert, based on her knowledge, training, and experience, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702; she had worked as an interviewer for six years, interviewed approximately 3,200 children, attended 500 hours of training on child abuse issues, taught classes on child abuse, and she had training and experience in the way a child disclosed abuse and the way of interviewing a child regarding that type of abuse. Wright v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4700 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 14 2007).

1904. Factors the appellate court must examine to determine a cadaver dog's qualifications and reliability are whether the dog (1) is a breed or type that typically works well off-lead, (2) has been trained to discriminate between human scents and animal scents, and (3) has been found by experience to be reliable; those factors are not exclusive. Trejos v. State, 243 S.W.3d 30, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4045 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

1905. Court agreed with the trial court that there was no evidence from a qualified expert, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702, that any breach of the standard of care by the doctor proximately caused the amputation suffered by the patient; the patient submitted the testimony of a physician to support his claim, but the physician was an emergency room physician and his curriculum vitae indicated no specific surgical training, he did not have any experience in treating high pressure injection injuries such as the patient's, and upon deposition cross-examination, the physician was unable to say that the patient would not have required an equal amount of amputation even if he had been immediately referred to a surgeon. Bryan v. Sherick, 279 S.W.3d 731, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3875 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

1906. Evidence was sufficient to support defendant's conviction of criminal mischief in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 28.03(a)(1) and the amount of pecuniary loss for purposes of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 28.06(b); the expert was formerly employed as a body shop manager and spent 80 percent of his time writing estimates and had 23 years of experience, and given that the expert estimated, during a recess and without using his software, that the repair cost to the cars at or over $ 2,500, there was sufficient evidence that the loss was more than $ 1,500. Retana v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2796 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 12 2007).

1907. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child younger than 14 years of age, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021, the record demonstrated that a doctor had extensive training and experience in examining child sexual assault victims and the record did not show that the doctor, who had been suspended after failing a drug test, had been under the influence of any type of drug when he examined the child or when he testified at trial; the record did not support defendant's claim that the doctor's testimony was unreliable. Flores v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2818 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 12 2007).

1908. Nurse's testimony demonstrated that she had minimal training and experience in the areas of sexual abuse and the causes of trauma to the hymen, and considering her lack of experience and training, the trial court properly found that the nurse was not qualified to testify as an expert witness in defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child younger than 14 years of age, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021. Flores v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2818 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 12 2007).

1909. In a false advertising suit, plaintiff's expert's testimony was properly considered in the summary judgment affidavit because the expert stated in his affidavit that he had been in the utility and service truck body industry for thirty-six years and had owned several companies that were in the business of manufacturing and selling fiberglass truck bodies; the expert further stated that he was the owner and vice president of plaintiff company, and thus, he was qualified by his skill and experience to testify as an expert regarding the quality of the materials the company and other companies used to manufacture utility bodies. Astoria Indus. of Iowa, Inc. v. SNF, Inc., 223 S.W.3d 616, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2512 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

1910. In a health care liability action asserting a negligent failure to perform prompt and appropriate surgery for glaucoma, an expert who was both a biomedical engineer and a consulting ophthalmologist was qualified under Tex. R. Evid. 702 and Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.401 regarding standards of medical care and causation; hence, the trial court did not err in denying a Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351 motion to dismiss. Evans v. Arambula, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 21 2007).

1911. In a medical malpractice case, a mother's expert was not a doctor and did not have medical training, and a qualified expert needed more than a general understanding that the lack of oxygen had the potential to cause brain damage; there was no evidence that the expert had any medical expertise in the subject or how the administrative failures he identified could have contributed to a brain injury such as the one suffered by the mother's child at birth, and the expert's opinion was mere speculation, the expert was not qualified, and the testimony was properly denied. Quiroz v. Covenant Health Sys., 234 S.W.3d 74, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1771 (Tex. App. El Paso 2007).

1912. It is true that a hospital's liability can be independent of a physician's negligence; it does not necessarily follow, however, that an administrative expert without any medical training is qualified to testify that a permanent and debilitating brain injury was foreseeable. Quiroz v. Covenant Health Sys., 234 S.W.3d 74, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1771 (Tex. App. El Paso 2007).

1913. Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding defendant's witness's testimony because the court was within its discretion to conclude that the witness was in fact being called as an expert in accident reconstruction, and although the witness's testimony revealed that he had significant experience investigating traffic accidents, he had no formal training in the field in nearly thirty years. Brown v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 21 2007).

1914. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in admitting the testimony of a probation officer, but because defendant failed at first to object to the officer's expertise or lack thereof, the trial court did not have a chance to assess the complaint, and defendant's objections to a question and answer preserved only the asserted complaints of relevance and invading the jury's province, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33, and there was no reason for a late objection to the officer's lack of expertise; notwithstanding any preservation issues, the record showed no abuse of discretion by the trial court in admitting the officer's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the trial court could have found that the officer was qualified, given the officer's experience, to testify on the subject matter. Merito v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 827 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 1 2007).

1915. Defendant objected on the basis of improper predicate and that a legal conclusion was asked for by the State, and although defendant did not use trigger words like "expert," "qualifications," and "relevance," the actual objection was specific enough to make the trial court aware of the complaint under Tex. R. Evid. 702, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). McKee v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 831 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 1 2007).

1916. Even though defendant properly made the trial court aware of the complaint, defendant did not provide specific grounds regarding why an officer was unqualified to testify as an expert, such that defendant failed to preserve for review any specific complaint about the officer's testimony regarding whether defendant used a vehicle as a deadly weapon under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1.07(a)(17)(B). McKee v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 831 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 1 2007).

1917. In an eminent domain case, a witness qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, given that the witness was a land planner, president of a land planning firm, had 40 years experience in planning, and had dealt with detention and drainage issues as an expert advisor for 15 years; that the witness did not design detention ponds, had not written safety articles, and was not a licensed engineer did not mean the witness was not qualified to testify on safety and drainage issues. City of Sugar Land v. Home & Hearth Sugarland, L.P., 215 S.W.3d 503, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 308 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).
