1394. Evidence supported the jury's finding against a carrier under Tex. Ins. Code Ann. §§ 541.060, 541.061, given that (1) the jury had proof that a claims adjuster denied or disputed the claim the first day the adjuster looked at the file and she ignored accepted methods of investigating a claim, (2) there was proof that the claimant's attorneys provided the carrier with medical records, but the carrier failed to forward a crucial page to its medical expert and failed to do so on more than one occasion, (3) the carrier offered no evidence that it had any reason to believe that any new or pre-existing injury was the sole cause of the claimant's herniation that would have precluded coverage, (4) the jury could have found that the carrier's assertions were merely a pretext to justify its refusal to pay for the claimant's surgery, (5) whether a medical records authorization signed by the claimant's wife would have enabled the carrier to obtain the claimant's records was irrelevant because the evidence did not show that the carrier sought to obtain any records with it and was refused, and the evidence showed that the claimant himself gave an authorization to obtain records, and (6) the jury was asked if the claimant committed fraud by not revealing a prior injury and found that he did not commit fraud; the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that (1) the carrier refused to pay the claim without conducting a reasonable investigation with respect to the claim, and (2) the carrier failed to attempt in good faith to effectuate a prompt, fair, and equitable settlement of the claim when its liability had become reasonably clear. Tex. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Morris, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9868 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 26 2008).

1395. Defendant did not raise the issue of relevancy on appeal and those objections did not support defendant's present complaint of hearsay or the denial of his right to confrontation; as to his final hearsay objection and denial of the right to confront certain witnesses, defendant did not show a legitimate reason for the delay in raising these complaints until after the publication of the audio recordings to the jury, and thus the final objection raising these issues was untimely and these issues were not preserved for review. Bates v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6130 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 13, 2008).

1396. Evidence against the individual was placed before the jury in the historical context of the relationship between the parties and their dealings prior to the individual's arrest incident; thus, there was at least a logical connection between this line of questioning and the propositions that the owners were trying to prove regarding their easement claim, and thus the evidence was relevant for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401. South Plains Lamesa R.R. v. Heinrich, 280 S.W.3d 357, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6038 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2008).

1398. Although an heir argued that testimony of an argument between the heir and his parents was prejudicial for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the heir did not demonstrate that the entire case turned on the disputed testimony, and the disputed testimony was relevant to show how the heir interacted and responded to his parents; given the claims, it was important for the jury to be given historical information regarding this relationship and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting this evidence. Dace v. Dace, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5779 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 31 2008).

1399. Widow's conclusory allegation that the area was widely known to be dangerous and that many crimes occurred in the general area was insufficient to survive a no-evidence summary judgment motion against the restaurant, as conclusory or speculative opinion testimony did not tend to make the existence of a material fact more or less probable and was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 nor competent, and thus an opinion that the widow's husband's murder was not foreseeable to the restaurant, as supported by the facts recited from unchallenged police reports and crime statistics, was uncontroverted; the court recognized that, because the question of duty was a question of law for the court, an expert could not properly opine regarding the existence of a duty, and expert testimony alone was insufficient to raise a fact issue on foreseeability, but the widow failed to produce more than a scintilla of evidence showing that the restaurant had a duty to the husband and that it breached that duty, such that the trial court properly entered summary judgment in the restaurant's favor. Pouncy-Pittman v. Pappadeaux Seafood Kitchen, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5780 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 31 2008).

1400. Defendant's arrest photo was properly admitted as relevant on the question of identification because defendant looked very different from how he looked in the courtroom. Defendant raised only a relevancy objection at trial and did not preserve his argument based on Tex. R. Evid. 403. Avendano v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5832 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31, 2008).

1401. Items seized at the scene of a house fire were relevant under Tex. R. Evid 401, 402, 403, 404(b) to show that the fire started as a result of the cooking of methamphetamine on the stove and that the debris found in the burned house pertained to the use or manufacture of illegal drugs; defendant failed to establish that the trial court abused its discretion or that the determination fell outside of the zone of reasonable disagreement. Dentler v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5708 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2008).

1402. In a sexual assault case, the court properly allowed the victim to read her poem to the jury during punishment because it was relevant to show that the consequences of defendant's act included the victim's sadness at having lost the sense of safety she once knew with defendant, her mixed feelings, her anger, her need to apologize for her promise not to tell, and implicitly, for breaking that promise. Mansfield v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5615 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 29 2008).

1403. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of a life insurance policy covering her husband, of which defendant was the beneficiary, because the fact that defendant may have been motivated to shoot her husband by the $ 300,000 life insurance policy was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the State's attempt to prove defendant acted knowingly and intentionally. The trial court could have reasonably concluded the existence of the husband's life insurance policy related directly to the charged offense, did not have a tendency to confuse or distract the jury from the main issues in the case or have any tendency to be given undue weight by the jury; defendant admitted she shot her husband but claimed it was partially in self-defense and partially an accident; the trial court could have reasonably concluded that it was unlikely that presentation of the evidence of life insurance would consume an inordinate amount of time or merely repeat evidence already admitted. Armstrong v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5448 (Tex. App. Dallas July 24 2008).

1404. In defendant's assault on a public servant trial, a spitting incident was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show intent and there was no violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that (1) the inherent probative value of the evidence was great, (2) although evidence of the spitting incident could potentially impress the jury, it was not of such a nature as to have impressed the jury in an irrational or indelible way, (3) the record did not indicate that the time needed to develop this evidence was such that the jury would be distracted from the indicted offense, and (4) although the evidence was relevant to defendant's intent, several witnesses identified defendant as the attacker, such that the need for the evidence factor weighed against admissibility, but the factors as a whole weighed in favor of admissibility and the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence. Collins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5481 (Tex. App. Waco July 23 2008).

1405. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the weight demonstration because defendant's weight at trial was not relevant and the demonstration would do nothing to establish what he weighed at the time of his arrest. Tyler v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5211 (Tex. App. Dallas July 15 2008).

1406. Informant could offer no testimony about the actual offense and there was no evidence that the informant participated in the offense for which defendant was charged, nor was there evidence that the informant was an eyewitness to the search, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 508; the informant's testimony would only have been relevant to the issue of probable cause, thus making it unnecessary for the identity of the informant to be disclosed, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to hold an in-camera hearing or to disclose the identity of the informant. Johnson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3494 (Tex. App. Waco May 14 2008).

1407. In defendant's child sexual assault case, the trial court did not err by determining that details of alleged abuse by another person were not relevant to the determination of whether defendant sexually assaulted the child, and that such details did not tend to make the existence of a material fact more or less probable; the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it ruled that the details of any alleged previous abuse by the other person were not relevant. Bargas v. State, 252 S.W.3d 876, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3443 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

1408. In defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation, the testimony made clear that defendant did not possess any of the victims' belongings at his apartment, nor did the State offer testimony showing that the items found there were stolen; defendant's possession of the unusual items, to the extent his possession of them constituted an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404, was relevant to his intent when he was discovered walking near the victims' home with a black bag, and it cast doubt on his claim that a neighbor made a mistake in identifying defendant as a burglar, plus the jury was instructed that if it heard any testimony about defendant committing extraneous offenses, it could not consider the testimony for any purpose unless it believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant had committed the offenses and it could consider the offenses only in determining the intent, knowledge or lack of mistake of defendant, if any, in connection with the offense alleged against him in this case, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence. Brown v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3377 (Tex. App. Dallas May 9 2008).

1409. Evidence of defendant's flight was relevant in defendant's burglary of a habitation trial because defendant fled from his own apartment when he saw police officers there to arrest him, and the State was generally entitled to put on evidence showing the circumstances of a defendant's arrest; defendant did not meet his burden to show that the flight was directly connected to some other transaction and was not connected with the burglary offense in this case, and thus the trial court did not err in admitting this evidence. Brown v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3377 (Tex. App. Dallas May 9 2008).

1410. To properly preserve error, counsel needed to have either objected to each purportedly irrelevant question or requested a running objection; counsel only objected when the prosecutor posed the first query and then toward the end of the exchange and counsel failed to object to the vast majority of the supposedly objectionable questions or request a running objection, plus defendant failed to lodge any objection to the questions and answers he claimed harmed him the most, and thus, no error was preserved. Gonzalez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3371 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 8 2008).

1411. Driver's consumption of alcohol was relevant to the element of causation in his negligence suit against a trucker because the trucker presented evidence that the accident could have been avoided had the driver steered his vehicle to the right to avoid the trucker's trailer, and in failing to do so, the driver caused the accident. PPC Transp. v. Metcalf, 254 S.W.3d 636, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3291 (Tex. App. Tyler 2008).

1412. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit evidence of a doctor's scrubs in this medical malpractice case because there was no evidence that the patient ever saw the doctor wearing scrubs or that he relied on the language on the scrubs in forming a belief that the doctor or the hospital and its parent company were holding the doctor out as an agent, and there was no evidence that the patient's wife was influenced by the language on the scrubs. Farlow v. Harris Methodist Fort Worth Hosp., 284 S.W.3d 903, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9836, 64 A.L.R.6th 741 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

1413. In a medical malpractice case, there was no evidence that anyone saw or relied on a hospital wall plaque in forming a belief as to whether a doctor was an agent of a hospital and its parent company, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit this evidence for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402; moreover, the evidence, even if considered to show an affirmative holding out by the hospital and its parent company of doctors as employees, was negated by evidence that the hospital and company included language in its admissions paperwork specifically disclaiming any such relationship. Thus, even if the trial court erred, the court could not say that error, cumulatively or individually, resulted in the rendition of an improper judgment under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1). Farlow v. Harris Methodist Fort Worth Hosp., 284 S.W.3d 903, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9836, 64 A.L.R.6th 741 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

1414. Because defendant claimed self-defense against both victims, the court agreed with the State that defendant's experience with firearms prior to the shootings was relevant to rebut defendant's defensive theory, as the testimony spoke to defendant's lack of maturity and good judgment in handling his weapon and was relevant to show absence of mistake or accident regarding the victims' deaths; the photograph of defendant at a firing range was relevant to provide a link between defendant, a cellular phone, and the handgun used in the shooting, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony and photograph over defendant's Tex. R. App. P. 404(b) objection, and, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the ruling to admit the testimony and photograph did not fall outside the zone of reasonable disagreement, as the record did not support the notion that the evidence tended to impress the jury irrationally, the evidence was developed quickly and a disproportionate amount of time was not spent on the subject, and the State had a compelling reason to present the evidence to rebut defendant's theory of self-defense. Lopez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3167 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 1 2008).

1415. Evidence was sufficient to support the robbery element of defendant's capital murder offense, given that (1) accomplice testimony showed that defendant and his companions had devoted their afternoon to robbing vulnerable ice cream vendors, (2) the vendor shot by defendant said the young men had tried to rob him, (3) the evidence showed that defendant and his cohort attempted to rob the vendor and then temporarily fled from the scene, but before making an escape, defendant went back to the vendor and shot him, and (4) it was irrelevant to the court's analysis that defendant's control of the vendor's money had been thwarted and that he might have abandoned the theft component of the offense at the time of the shooting. Zubiri v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3069 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 29 2008).

1416. In an illegal possession of a weapon case, audio portions of the patrol-car videotape were properly admitted because an issue during trial was the course and conduct of the officer's investigation of defendants, and the statements concerned one defendant's friend's alleged drug use, and did not concern any drug use by either of the defendants. Gomez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2966 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 24 2008).

1417. In determining the relevancy of a photograph offered as punishment evidence, the court did not ask if it made a fact in issue more or less probable, but whether it was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art.

37.07. Thomas v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3050 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 24 2008).

1418. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony about the victim's physical capabilities before the incident (not using a cane, doing yard work and hunting), because this was victim character evidence since it showed the victim's uniqueness as a human being and was a quick glimpse into his life. Dotson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2673 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 15 2008).

1419. Records showing that defendant obtained hydrocodone and other prescriptions many times in the past from different doctors made it more probable that, when defendant was unable to get a doctor to refill his prescription, he knowingly asked a co-worker to refill it through fraudulent means, and thus the trial court did not err in finding that the records were relevant for purposes of defendant's conviction of possession of a controlled substance, dihydrocodeinone (hydrocodone), by fraud, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.129(a); considering that the only direct evidence of defendant's culpable mental state was the co-worker's testimony and she was impeached, the trial court could have found (1) that the probative force of and the State's need for the records were considerable, (2) the records were not inflammatory and did not suggest a decision on an improper basis, (3) the records would not have misled the jury, and (4) the probative value of the records was not substantially outweighed by the countervailing factors specified in Tex. R. Evid. 403. Starn v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2402 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 3 2008).

1420. Sole issue at trial was whether the mother's parental rights were to be terminated, and termination of parental rights merely clears the way for the possibility of an adoption, which would have to be decided in a separate proceeding and which, as all parties agreed, would not necessarily have resulted in adoption by the foster parents, and thus the court agreed that the merits of a prospective adoptive home were irrelevant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, Tex. R. Evid. 402, to the issue of whether the mother's parental rights were to be terminated. Bennett v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2420 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 3 2008).

1421. In the State's action under the Texas Deceptive Trade Practices-Consumer Protection Act (DTPA) that alleged that appellants, a husband and wife who operated a business assisting Spanish speaking individuals with immigration matters, had counseled consumers without legal authorization or qualification, appellants raised no valid complaints regarding the admissibility of the evidence and the trial court's rulings thereon where an exhibit consisting of a summary of the more than 2,180 G-28 forms filed by the husband was itself a business record entitled to be treated as other business records, making Tex. R. Evid. 1006 inapplicable, and where the testimony of an intelligence research specialist with the Citizenship and Immigration Services Branch of the United States Department of Homeland Security established the necessary predicate required by Tex. R. Evid. 803(6) because the specialist testified that the exhibit was a business record made in the ordinary course of business at Citizenship and Immigration Services, made at or near the time his department received the G-28 forms, by a person with knowledge of the events being recorded; furthermore, the trial court did not err in refusing to allow a previous client of appellants who was testifying for the State to answer when asked if she obtained her residency status because any testimony going to the gravity of the harm done by engaging in the prohibited act was irrelevant and inadmissible. Avila v. State, 252 S.W.3d 632, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2270 (Tex. App. Tyler 2008).

1422. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs of the victim at the crime scene because some of the photographs were used by the experts to explain the manner of the death and the amount of force used by defendant when hitting the victim with the baseball bat, tending to disprove his self-defense claim; other photographs, along with the testimony of the blood-spatter expert, addressed the absence of any struggle between the victim and defendant and that the victim was either on his knees or on the ground while being beaten, while some photographs depicted the brutality of the crime and the severity of the injuries and were probative of the manner of the victim's death. Grayson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2210 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 27 2008).

1423. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a continuance under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 29.06, given that (1) defendant's written motion contained none of the required witness information, (2) the motion was filed four days before trial, and did not identify the witnesses who were unable to appear, (3) while defendant claimed not to have notice of certain issues, the motion failed to show any support for those assertions, (4) even if the court considered defendant's oral motions, they did not satisfy the statute, (5) the required diligence was not shown, and (6) defendant failed to show the relevance or materiality of the absent witness's testimony and thus failed to show actual prejudice from the denial of the continuance motion. Cline v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2242 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2008).

1424. Contrary to Tex. R. App. P. 38, the intended purchaser cited no authority for the claim that the trial court was required to hear an expert's testimony before ruling on its admissibility and the purchaser provided no argument regarding the relevancy of the excluded evidence to particular elements of his various causes, and thus he waived this issue; even absent waiver, the court found no abuse of discretion in the trial court's ruling, as the subject areas excluded by the trial court involved matters inappropriate for expert testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and the court found no merit in the challenge to the trial court's ruling limiting the testimony. Petras v. Criswell, 248 S.W.3d 471, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2017 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

1425. Intended purchaser's partner was not party to this suit and thus his detrimental reliance was irrelevant to the purchasers promissory estoppel claim; absent any evidence of the purchaser's substantial detrimental reliance, the trial court did not err in granting summary judgment on this promissory estoppel claim. Petras v. Criswell, 248 S.W.3d 471, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2017 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

1426. Trial court's disposition of the no-evidence summary judgment motion turned on whether an intended purchaser met his burden; any evidence submitted by the owner was irrelevant to that determination, and the purchaser failed to establish any reversible error. Petras v. Criswell, 248 S.W.3d 471, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2017 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

1427. In defendant's trial for retaliation, aggravated kidnapping, and aggravated assault, the fact that defendant had also locked another girlfriend in the same trunk in the past made it more probable that he had done the same to his current ex-girlfriend, and the first girlfriend's testimony that she did not feel free to leave him tended to rebut his claim that his ex-girlfriend remained with him voluntarily, and thus the first girlfriend's testimony was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence over a Tex. R. Evid. 402 objection; because the first and third factors under Tex. R. Evid. 403 weighed heavily in favor of admissibility, given that the jury was drawn away from the indicted offenses only briefly and the testimony was compelling and supported the ex-girlfriend's claims, and the second and fourth factors were neutral, the trial court did not err in finding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of this evidence. Stephenson v. State, 255 S.W.3d 652, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2072 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

1428. State did not explain how a video recording of a prior drug deal was relevant, the trial court did not explain any such relevance, and the court failed to see any relevance, plus defendant was not contesting motive, opportunity, intent, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, and thus these issues would not have been a fact of consequence and the admission of a video recording was outside the zone of reasonable disagreement; however, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44 because the same facts shown on the video were proved by other properly admitted evidence. Toliver v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1974 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 19 2008).

1429. Ironworker explained, during voir dire, that he could not make a correlation between the fifteen checks he offered and the twenty-eight invoices at issue, and he testified that he did business with the steel company all year and there were more than twenty-eight transactions with many checks written to cover all of the invoices for the year; therefore, the checks did not make the consequential fact that he paid the particular invoices at issue more or less probable; therefore, the trial court did not act arbitrarily or unreasonably without reference to guiding rules or principles. Martinez v. Rio Grande Steel, Ltd., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1860 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 13 2008).

1430. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding part of defendant's employer's testimony concerning the employer's son's prescription medication and a videotape of defendant's 2000 arrest for driving while intoxicated because the evidence was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to whether defendant was guilty of the charged crimes of driving while intoxicated and evading arrest. Peavey v. State, 248 S.W.3d 455, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1818 (Tex. App. Austin 2008).

1431. Evidence was both legally and factually sufficient to support defendant's burglary of a motor vehicle conviction under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 30.04(a), given that (1) defendant was riding in a car with three other juveniles shortly after a car burglary occurred half a mile away, (2) in plain sight inside the vehicle were burglary tools and stolen property, and (3) near defendant was specific stolen property, including a master key to a victim's property, and thus this constituted circumstantial evidence of defendant's knowledge of the burglary, plus (4) the jury was free to disbelieve testimony in defendant's favor concerning timing, (5) the lack of cuts on defendant's hands was not relevant to her innocence, as many inculpatory acts would not subject a burglar to such cuts, (6) for purposes of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 3.01(1), the trial court could have inferred that defendant's blanket was part of a common scheme or plan for the four persons in the vehicle to burglarize motor vehicles, (7) none of the other occupants of the vehicle testified that defendant joined them after the burglary and had no knowledge thereof, and (8) the evidence supported the finding that defendant was an active participant in the robberies. Campos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1511 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 29 2008).

1432. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for the Class A misdemeanor offense of assault causing bodily injury in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant regarding past accusations of spousal abuse where the complainant's character for truthfulness was not attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise as required by Tex. R. Evid. 608; instead, during cross-examination, defendant attempted to inquire into prior accusations of abuse that the complainant made against her ex-husband for the purpose of attacking the complainant's credibility, and, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, Tex. R. Evid. 402, Tex. R. Evid. 608, the probative value of the evidence sought to be admitted was extremely low, particularly because defense counsel admitted during trial that he had no evidence that the complainant lied about the abuse and that the accusations occurred a long time ago. Sullivan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1394 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2008).

1433. In defendant's aggravated robbery trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 29.03, the trial court did not err in admitting extraneous offense evidence of two subsequent robberies, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404, given that identity was an issue in this case, defendant's physical appearance linked him to all three incidents, and the proximity in time and place, the common mode of committing the offenses, and the circumstances surrounding the offenses were sufficiently similar for the extraneous offense evidence to be relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the issue of identity. Ina v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1220 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 21 2008).

1434. Court disagreed that the cross-examination of defendant's estranged wife about her extramarital affair would have been proper to impeach her credibility under Tex. R. Evid. 608; as to her motive to lie in an effort to gain custody of the minor child, this was at best only relevant to a collateral matter, and whether the wife had sexual relations while the child was in an adjacent room or asleep was relevant neither to the crime for which defendant was indicted -- unlawful interception, use, and disclosure of a wire communication -- nor to any defense, and thus the trial court did not err in limiting defendant's cross-examination of the wife. Green v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1193 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 20 2008).

1435. Because a stock option agreement was not ambiguous, the employee's testimony on his understanding of a certain paragraph was not relevant and constituted no evidence supporting the jury's finding in his favor, and because there was no evidence supporting the jury's damage finding, the trial court correctly granted a judgment notwithstanding the verdict on this issue. Simplified Dev. Corp. v. Garfield, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1127 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 14 2008).

1436. In an action involving a fire and who was the cause of it, a proper foundation had not been laid to qualify an expert to testify whether he had any criticism of the plumbing company's work and the admission of testimony that an individual was not seeking to recover anything from the plumbing company was irrelevant since none of it even remotely related to whether the plumbing company was liable for the fire; however, those errors were harmless since they did not cause the rendition of an improper verdict and therefore, a reversal was not required. Richmond Condos. v. Skipworth Commer. Plumbing, Inc., 245 S.W.3d 646, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 963 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

1437. In a products liability action, an expert's lint ignition testimony was based on an objective observation of lint build-up in the dryer cabinet, independent observations supported the expert's testimony regarding how an ember survived to ignite the clothes in the dryer and then spread from the dryer, and this expert and another expert relied on objective criteria in the record and their own experience to conclude that the dryer caused the fire; while the manufacturer might have disagreed with their conclusions, the experts explained the basis for their opinions and based those opinions on objective facts, and the trial court did not err in admitting this evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 251 S.W.3d 88, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 356 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

1438. In defendant's murder case, the court properly allowed the State to reveal defendant's tattoos because the evidence was relevant to support the State's theory that defendant was a gang member who murdered rival gang members in retaliation; in addition, given the other evidence indicating defendant's admitted gang membership, the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial. Reyes v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 293 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 16 2008).

1439. In defendant's murder case, the trial court properly excluded defendant's testimony about the victim's alleged indifference to her pregnancy and the problems she encountered just before her son's birth because the proffered evidence was not probative of the alleged reasonableness of defendant's belief that the victim had used, was using, or even might use deadly force at the time that she shot and killed him. Eisenman v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 282 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 10 2008).

1440. In defendant's murder case, the court did not err by omitting evidence of pornography found on the victim's computer because there was no showing by defendant that the pornographic images were related to the shooting, that the images were the subject of the argument that preceded the shooting, or that the images played any part whatsoever during the events leading up to the shooting. Eisenman v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 282 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 10 2008).

1441. Although defendant's proffered alternative perpetrator evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because identity was a material issue in the case and vigorously contested at defendant's aggravated robbery trial, and although there was no danger that the evidence would create a side issue that would unduly distract the jury from the main issues under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the evidence addressed a material issue in the case, the trial court's exclusion of the evidence was not error because defendant failed to show the required nexus between the alleged alternative perpetrator and the offense-at-issue; although the alleged alternative perpetrator's indictments and convictions indicated that he engaged in a spree of robberies overlapping the offense-at-issue, that evidence supported no conclusions other than that he was committing robberies around the time of the offense-at-issue, and defendant did not present evidence that the alleged alternative perpetrator's offenses were committed at or near the location of the offense-at-issue or present testimony from any of the witnesses identifying that individual as the robber. Dickson v. State, 246 S.W.3d 733, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9859 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1442. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of a gun found by the witness because its probative value was not outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice, when the witness testified that he found the gun around the same time as the aggravated robbery, lying on the road a few blocks away from the store, and this was approximately the same location where the officer observed defendant driving a car matching the description of the suspect's vehicle provided by police dispatchers at the time of the aggravated robbery and from which the officer observed defendant extend his hand and arm out of the window and then back into the car. Mouton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10076 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 20 2007).

1443. During defendant's murder trial, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding a crime scene investigator's testimony that drugs were found in the victim's apartment and a medical examiner's testimony that the victim had ingested marijuana and cocaine prior to the victim's death where there was nothing in the record that connected the possession and use of marijuana and cocaine to the victim's alleged violent acts. Moore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9512 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 5 2007).

1444. In defendant's murder case, although the court erred in excluding the testimony and notes of a licensed counselor who had counseled defendant hours before the murder because the testimony provided some insight into defendant's state of mind at the time of the murder, the error was harmless; defendant's expert's testimony concerning defendant's sanity at the time of the offense was considerably more direct and probative than the tangentially relevant testimony of the counselor. Bradshaw v. State, 244 S.W.3d 490, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9427 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

1445. Probative value of a photograph was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that (1) a photograph of defendant in possession of the same handgun used to commit the murder was highly probative of defendant having committed the murder, (2) while the photograph was prejudicial, it directly related to the charged offense of murder and the photograph did not have a great potential to impress the jury in an irrational way and would not have tempted the jury into a guilt finding on improper grounds, (3) the time involved in the introduction of the photograph was minimal and thus unlikely to have distracted the jury, and (4) the photograph was related to a disputed issue and the State had a need for the evidence, to connect defendant to the murder. Andrade v. State, 246 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9288 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1446. As defendant had an absolute right to make an offer of proof under Tex. R. Evid. 103 as to excluded testimony, the trial court erred when it prohibited defendant from making his offer, but because defendant did not raise an issue arguing error in this regard, an abatement to permit counsel to develop the appellate record would have served no purpose as it would not have resulted in the development of any information relevant to the appeal, and thus the error was harmless. Andrade v. State, 246 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9288 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1447. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in defendant's murder trial in admitting into evidence a photograph of defendant holding two handguns; the photograph was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, given that the State had the burden to prove that defendant caused the victim's death by shooting him with a deadly weapon and the photograph of defendant holding the murder weapon had a tendency to make the existence of a fact of consequence to the determination of the action. Andrade v. State, 246 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9288 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1448. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant and her mother because his allegations suggesting that the complainant and her mother lied about the assault because they took his personal belongings from the house while he was jailed did not fairly tend to raise an inference that the complainant and her mother had motive to testify falsely. McClendon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9300 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 29 2007).

1449. In a murder case, there was no abuse of discretion in the trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding the victim's drug use because that evidence was irrelevant and inadmissible; there was nothing in the record that connected the victim's possession and use of marijuana and cocaine to the victim's alleged violent acts. Moore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9036 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 14 2007).

1450. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the evidence was relevant because (1) a police officer testified that track marks on a person's arms were the result of heroin use; (2) during a raid on defendant's residence, police officers discovered 19.34 grams of heroin on the premises, along with numerous syringes that a police officer testified were commonly used to shoot heroin; and (3) evidence of track marks on defendant's arms made his alleged involvement with the criminal activity at the residence more probable than it would be without the evidence. Gomez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8853 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 9 2007).

1451. No offer of proof was made to documents excluded by the trial court, such that the contents of the documents and relevance could not be determined on appeal, and the alleged error was therefore not preserved. Roberts v. Davis, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8672 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 1 2007).

1452. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to further question two of the State's witnesses about defendant's duty or authority as a peace officer because he had already established that neither witness had any law enforcement training or education, and therefore the questions failed to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 701 (personal perception or knowledge) and Tex. R. Evid. 401 (relevance requiring both materiality and probativeness). King v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8766 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2007).

1453. Court did not address the hearsay objection under Tex. R. Evid. 801 as to certain exhibits because they were not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the resolution of the issues before the court, even if they fell under a hearsay exception; another exhibit contained an affidavit from an attorney in another case and contained the same information found in that case and had no bearing on the issues before the court. Southtex 66 Pipeline Co. v. Spoor, 238 S.W.3d 538, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8352, 168 Oil & Gas Rep. 68 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1454. Termination of the mother's parental rights was in the child's best interests, given that (1) the child's physical needs were great, (2) the mother's repeated drug use, including during the pregnancy, endangered the child and indicated that their relationship was not a proper one, (3) the mother was a poor parent to the child and her six other children at least in part due to her drug problem, (4) the trial court could have found that she would not provide a stable home for the child, (5) the child's foster parents wanted to adopt the child, which was relevant to the issue of best interests, (6) because the mother consistently refused to take drug tests, the trial court was entitled to believe that she still had a problem, despite her attempts at rehabilitation and several counseling sessions, and (7) while it might have been true that the mother was not as bad as some parents, it did not excuse her acts and omissions. In re J.A.B., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8294 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 18 2007).

1455. During a capital murder trial, the State admitted an unauthenticated letter, written by a third party and sent to defendant at the county jail for the purpose of impeaching defendant's trial court testimony that she never had sex with another woman; the letter was not relevant to anything at issue, was not proper impeachment, and the trial court erred in admitting the letter. Abdygapparova v. State, 243 S.W.3d 191, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8205 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

1456. Defense counsel's concise statement and examination of the victim's father was reasonably specific to have shown the trial court the substance of the excluded evidence and to preserve error for review, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33, Tex. R. Evid. 103; counsel made a reasonably specific summary of the evidence and argued the relevancy thereof, it was apparent by the State's Tex. R. Evid. 412 objection that it knew the precise nature of the excluded evidence, and the trial court was aware of the testimony defendant was trying to illicit by the nature of the trial court's ruling. Ladesic v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8106 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 11 2007).

1458. Testimony relating to the nature of the relationship between defendant and his wife was previously found to be relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and testimony about security measures taken during the serving of divorce papers related to the nature of their relationship, such that the testimony was relevant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court found that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Garcia v. State, 246 S.W.3d 121, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8051 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007), cert. denied, 555 U.S. 949, 129 S. Ct. 404, 172 L. Ed. 2d 295, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 7457 (2008).

1459. Witness's testimony of a conversation she had with the victim, defendant's wife, before the crime, when the victim was highly upset and crying, was admissible as an excited utterance under Tex. R. Evid. 803, plus defendant admitted that the statements were cumulative, and thus any error was harmless; because the statements related to the nature of the relationship between defendant and his wife, the statements were relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and as they were not merely an attack on defendant's character, the trial court therefore did not err in overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. Garcia v. State, 246 S.W.3d 121, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8051 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007), cert. denied, 555 U.S. 949, 129 S. Ct. 404, 172 L. Ed. 2d 295, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 7457 (2008).

1460. Statements made by the victim, defendant's wife, were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 803 because they went to her state of mind, and although defendant claimed that statements that she was afraid of him were not relevant, it had previously been determined that the circumstances surrounding their relationship were relevant under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a), and thus the court held that the statements were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401; given that the jury had been told of the "dicey" relationship between defendant and his wife, the trial court did not believe there was going to be any confusion of the issues, and the court agreed and held that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Garcia v. State, 246 S.W.3d 121, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8051 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007), cert. denied, 555 U.S. 949, 129 S. Ct. 404, 172 L. Ed. 2d 295, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 7457 (2008).

1461. Trial court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to photographs of the victim's injuries under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and the court assumed the photographs were presented to the jury in color; the State is required to prove serious bodily injury for aggravated assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann § 22.02(a)(1) and the photographs were offered into evidence for that purpose, the objected-to photographs depicted the victim's face cleaned up in preparation for surgery and showed her injuries in a less gruesome manner than described by witnesses, and the court concluded the photographs were relevant and not overly gruesome. Jones v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7920 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 4 2007).

1462. Although defendant argued that a portion of a videotape was not relevant, defendant's brief, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h), did not frame the contention as an issue nor did it present supported record citations and authorities, and thus the question was not properly before the court; even if the issue was raised, the evidence of defendant's demeanor and speech in defendant's case for driving while intoxicated would have been relevant, as in a trial for driving while intoxicated, evidence could include relevant photographs or videotapes. Lovington v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7816 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 28 2007).

1463. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting photographs of the victim's body in a capital murder case because they were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and were highly probative to show the victim's injuries and the specific circumstances of the murder. Gallo v. State, 239 S.W.3d 757, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1234 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1464. Trial court acted within its discretion in finding that the original weapons were unavailable because they had corroded and degraded and replicas were thus necessary to show the jury the state of the guns at the time of the offense; the original weapons were admissible and relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to a material issue because the jury was charged with finding whether defendant committed aggravated assault using or exhibiting a deadly weapon, and by admitting the gun as demonstrative evidence, the trial court allowed the jury to see examples of the weapons used during the offenses; the demonstrative weapons were the same models as the original ones, had no inflammatory attributes, and the trial court properly advised the jury on this issue, and defendant's reliance on the Best Evidence Rule was misguided because it applies only to writings or documents and the rule did not apply to weapons. Bang v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7680 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 25 2007).

1465. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.011, evidence of the post-incident impact on the victim was relevant and probative of whether the assault did, indeed, occur, where defendant never formally admitted at trial that the victim had been sexually assaulted by someone (even by someone other than himself); furthermore, the potential prejudice that the evidence might have engendered was not outweighed by its probative value. Warren v. State, 236 S.W.3d 844, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7636 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

1466. Videotape showing the route taken by defendant during a chase was not an experiment or a reconstruction that required expert explanation, but instead it was a videotape version of a print map showing defendant's efforts to avoid officers and was used to show the jury the route followed, and the jury was instructed that its consideration of the evidence was limited to that purpose; relevant to the issue of intent in defendant's trial for aggravated assault on a public servant with a deadly weapon finding, under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02, was the preceding flight and the court did not find that the admission of the evidence in question was error. Timmons v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7519 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 17 2007).

1467. In a personal injury action, the driver failed to produce the original photographs of her car, better copies of them, or some other evidence to rebut the suggestion that she deliberately produced photographs that did not accurately depict the damage, or she could have explained what happened to the originals, but she did not do so; given the motorist's testimony on a matter to which the photographs had particular relevance and the lack of an explanation from the driver for her failure to produce the photographs, a spoliation jury instruction was proper, for purposes of Tex. R. Civ. P. 277; additionally, the driver failed to comply with the trial court's order on the motion to compel evidence and failed to explain her noncompliance to the trial court's satisfaction, and the trial court had authority to sanction a party in this regard with a spoliation instruction. Conditt v. Morato, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7532 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 13 2007).

1468. In a drug case, evidence that there was conflicting information in the police report was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401 for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of the officers. Cameron v. State, 241 S.W.3d 15, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1120 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1469. Trial court should not have considered certain petitions on summary judgment because they did not appear to be certified; in any event, neither petition alleged what project the subcontractors in the current case worked on, and thus even if the court considered the petitions in its review of a denial of summary judgment, the information would not have been relevant to the disposition of the case, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 402. Souder v. Cannon, 235 S.W.3d 841, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7363 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

1470. For purposes of defendant's felony driving while intoxicated conviction, two exhibits consisting of certified copies of judgments in two of defendant's prior driving while intoxicated convictions were relevant and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting them. Nall v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7289 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 4 2007).

1471. Fact that Travis County called a Denton police department to say that defendant was incarcerated in Travis County for a theft offense, and the fact that defendant was released from Denton County in 2004 did not relieve defendant from his duty to report his change of address to his primary registration authority seven days prior to the change pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 62.055(a), and defendant did not show that he was prevented from reporting by jail authorities, but the evidence showed that either before he was jailed or after he was released, he changed his address without first providing notice to his registration authority, and the State's awareness of the portion of time that defendant spent in jail was irrelevant to the violation of his duty to report and irrelevant to the doctrines of equitable and judicial estoppel; because defendant did not register or attempt to do so, the State never had notice of his address for purposes of the statute and the doctrines of equitable and judicial estoppel did not apply, and the court further noted that defendant failed to provide the court with any relevant citations to the record and the appellate court was free to overrule the point as inadequately briefed. Kosick v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7284 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2007).

1472. The appropriate authorities were required to notify defendant of the applicable requirements when he was released from his incarceration on an indecency with a child offense under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11, and the notification had to cover defendant's responsibility to tell local authorities seven days prior to or after an intended change of address; defendant received proper notification upon his initial release for prison in 2002 and he had actual knowledge of his requirements, and although defendant argued that he was required to get additional notice in June 2004, he was in jail for theft, which is not a reportable conviction under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 62.001(5) requiring notice, and thus his evidence regarding a lack of notice after being released for the nonreportable conviction was irrelevant and the trial court did not err in excluding this evidence. Kosick v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7284 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2007).

1474. Victim's brother testified that he was riding in the car with defendant when they saw a police car turn onto the street going the same direction they were driving; defendant became very nervous and when the police attempted to stop them, defendant sped away; when the victim's brother asked defendant why he did not stop, defendant told him there was a warrant for his arrest for touching the victim; thus, defendant did not show that his flight from the police was connected to some other transaction, and not with the indecency with a child offense, and, therefore, the trial court properly overruled defendant's objection that his flight from the police was not relevant to his indecency with a child offense. Mestas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6947 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 29 2007).

1475. Although clients argued that a law firm waived its argument concerning the current value of stock by failing to object to the jury charge, the firm preserved the issue by raising it in a post-judgment motion; because the firm did not request that the jury be instructed to deduct the current value of the stock and did not object to the omission of such an instruction, the court considered the evidence in light of the charge given, and because the jury was not given instructions about the calculations to use, all evidence of the stock's fair market value, however calculated, was relevant to the inquiry. Akin, Gump, Strauss, Hauer & Feld, L.L.P. v. Nat'l Dev. & Research Corp., 232 S.W.3d 883, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6954 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

1476. In a child abuse case, an objection to relevance was properly overruled concerning testimony about the death of a victim's grandmother because it appeared that the prosecutor was merely trying to establish why she would not have been testifying at trial; the grandmother had been on the telephone when the victim was found to be unresponsive. Taylor v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6898 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 28 2007).

1477. Defendant claimed that the trial court's evidentiary rulings effectively prevented her from presenting her defense to capital murder, that the child victim's parents were the perpetrators of the crime, and the court analyzed the evidence to determine if the trial court's evidentiary rulings were clearly erroneous; the court found that (1) absent evidence that the children became involved in the physical disputes the parents previously had, the court was unable to hold that the trial court abused its discretion in excluding this evidence, and in any event, defendant did not raise her due process argument in this regard to the trial court, such that two related subpoints were not properly before the court, (2) certain excluded evidence did not add much, if anything, to the defense and did not prevent defendant from putting on a defense, such that defendant's due process rights were not violated, and (3) another witness statement was hearsay and did not meet any exceptions, and the exclusion of the statement in question did not prevent defendant from putting on a defense, and no indicia of reliability existed concerning the witness's statement, and defendant did not call this witness to testify. Stevens v. State, 234 S.W.3d 748, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6845 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

1478. In considering the factual sufficiency of defendant's capital murder conviction, the exact time of the fatal injury was disputed, and it might have occurred up to 48 hours before the child's death; thus, the events in the days immediately preceding the child's death were relevant and the court detailed them in its evidentiary review. Stevens v. State, 234 S.W.3d 748, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6845 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

1480. Defendant claimed that the trial court erred in admitting evidence of drugs and paraphernalia, but defendant cited no case law under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h) and thus the matter was waived; even if not waived, the trial court did not reversibly err because the evidence was seized contemporaneously with defendant's arrest, in plain sight, or as a result of his arrest and subsequent search, the trial court found the evidence relevant and that the probative value outweighed the evidence's prejudicial impact under Tex. R. Evid. 401, and this ruling was not outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Wilborn v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6700 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 22 2007).

1481. In defendant's capital murder case, evidence in the guilt-innocence phase that painted a picture of the victim as a young man with a promising future whose life defendant had ended prematurely was irrelevant and appealed to the jury's sympathies. However, the error was harmless; defendant admitted to participating in the shooting, and a witness testified that defendant shot the victim and grabbed the bag of codeine. Durand v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6535 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 16 2007).

1482. In this bench trial in which an employer challenged the reasonableness of the number of hours worked by the employee's attorney for attorney fee purposes under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the court was unable to find that the trial court abused its discretion by finding relevant settlement offers on the matter of whether the attorney's claim of the number of hours he worked was reasonable. Vernon v. CAC Distribs., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6294 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 9 2007).

1483. Decision refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant regarding the sexual abuse allegations against her father was affirmed because defendant failed to demonstrate that cross-examining the complainant regarding her allegations against her father was constitutionally required, and the district court's decision to limit the cross-examination did not violate the defendant's constitutional right to confront the witnesses against him; evidence demonstrating that the complainant had made allegations against her father, without more, would not have been relevant to a determination of whether the complainant fabricated her allegations against defendant, defendant failed to produce any evidence indicating that the complainant's prior allegations against her father were false, and the complainant's credibility had already been impeached through the testimony of one of the State's witnesses indicating that the complainant had made false allegations against other individuals while in therapy. Davis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6360 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 9 2007).

1484. Trial court did not violate defendant's due process rights during his trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child by excluding testimony of the complainant's neighbor and her adult son that concerned the complainant's threats to falsely accuse them of molestation where, in light of the remoteness in time and the dissimilarity between the alleged threats toward the neighbor and her son and the accusation in the charged offense, their testimony was not relevant because it was not probative regarding the complainant's credibility at the time of the instant offense. Billodeau v. State, 263 S.W.3d 318, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6404 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

1486. Defendant's trial objection to extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404 was that it was irrelevant, but the proper legal basis for the objection should have been that the evidence was offered to prove an extraneous uncharged offense not within the scope of the rule and was offered to show that defendant was a criminal generally, and thus he failed to make a proper objection at trial to preserve error for review, but in an abundance of caution, the court addressed defendant's complaint; defendant was charged with indecency with a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11 and the evidence of the extraneous offense defendant sought to exclude referred to an ongoing sexual relationship with the victim, a child under 17 years old, such that the evidence of the extraneous incident met the requirements of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2 and was admissible at trial. Jochims v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5905 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 26 2007).

1487. Evidence that a company pointed to involved events after a business employee signed the rental agreement in question, but this evidence was not relevant to whether the employee had the appearance of authority when he signed the agreement. Mission Linen Supply, Inc. v. Sandy's Signals, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5968 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 26 2007).

1489. Trial court erred by admitting into evidence a letter that was written to her while she was in jail because the letter was not relevant to defendant's capital murder trial, as the letter, sent to defendant by a man, living in another state and whom she had never met, outlining his sexual desires and fantasies with defendant and other women, did not tend to make anything as to defendant, much less her sexual orientation or whether she committed sexual assault, any more or less probable. Abdygapparova v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5806 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 25 2007).

1490. On appeal of a conviction of misdemeanor theft, the trial court did not err in sustaining the State's objection to the offender's question concerning profit margin in her inquiry as to the value of stolen retail property because the offender did not point to any offer of proof as required by Tex. R. Evid. 103, and the substance of the evidence she sought to offer was not apparent; thus, she forfeited her issue pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33; moreover, had she preserved her complaint, the trial court did not err; the offender complained that the trial court should not have sustained the State's relevance objection, but evidence that the victim had a profit margin did not tend to rebut the fact that the victim's sales price was at a fair market value. Smith v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5880 (Tex. App. Waco July 25 2007).

1491. Defense counsel lodged objections to extraneous evidence, but counsel did not urge an objection that the State failed to provide notice; the court agreed with the State that a trial objection regarding extraneous offenses that did not comport with the complaint raised on appeal did not preserve the contention for appellate review. Hohnstein v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5975 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 24 2007).

1492. Trial court did not err in admitting a 911 tape over defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in his murder trial; the tape was made immediately after boys found their mother's body and verified their testimony in many respects, the tape did not unfairly implicate defendant as he was not mentioned on the tape, and while dramatic, the tape was relevant in providing a framework for the State's evidence, and its relevance was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Chon Ki Yi v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5648 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 19 2007).

1493. Given that the finding of fraud, including under Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. § 27.01, was supported based on the owner's representation that the roof did not leak, it was irrelevant whether the evidence was sufficient to show that he did not intend to inspect the roof or make repairs to the space and the court did not need to address these other issues pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 47.1. Pierre v. Tilley, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5719 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 19 2007).

1494. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, the fact of the victim's discussion with her sister might well have been admitted to clarify certain matters as to how the information came to light in her family, rather than to prove an implied statement to the sister that defendant molested the victim, and given the relevance of the evidence for other purposes, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting it, and the court overruled defendant's claim that the trial court erred in admitting hearsay evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 801. Montgomery v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5682 (Tex. App. Dallas July 19 2007).

1496. Trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony in defendant's trial for attempted sexual assault; the expert was asked to describe in general, hypothetical terms behaviors that might be exhibited by a child who had been subjected to sexual abuse trauma, and the fact that the jury could have drawn a comparison between the expert's hypothetical child and the victim did not mean that the expert's testimony amounted to a direct comment on the victim's credibility; the expert's testimony was circumstantial evidence that something traumatic happened to the victim, and the fact that the evidence in some measure corroborated the victim's testimony did not make it any less relevant. Sanchez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5691 (Tex. App. Austin July 19 2007).

1497. In defendant's trial for aggravated assault on a public servant in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02(a)(2), the trial court did not err in allowing the victim to display his ankle injury to the jury, given that (1) the injury had probative force because it showed that the victim sustained bodily injury, one of the elements the State had to prove, (2) the State needed to show the injury because there were no pictures thereof, (3) nothing suggested that the injury was inflammatory, (4) the presentation of the injury did not distract from the main issue, was not misleading, did not take much time, and was not needlessly repetitive, and (5) nothing suggested that the jury was going to give undue weight to the evidence; after considering all the factors under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court held that the probative value of the injury was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Aguirre v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5556 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 18 2007).

1499. In a fraud action brought by the principals of a home health business against an investor, the testimony of the investor's prior business partner was admissible pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as proof of the investor's motive in seeking involvement with the business, his intent to commit fraud by association with the business, and his plan for gaining control over the business's financial affairs and siphoning off the business's assets. The prior business partner testified that he had also sued the investor for fraud under circumstances very similar to those in the underlying case. Rogers v. Alexander, 244 S.W.3d 370, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5103 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

1500. In a capital murder case, evidence of appellant's gang affiliation was properly admitted pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 402 because it was relevant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice as described in Tex. R. Evid. 403; there was ample evidence connecting appellant to the gang and their plan regarding the victim, and it included the gang's violent activities. Moreover, the evidence was not admitted to show that the murder was gang activity, but that it was predictable that a homicide would occur as the result of the conspiracy, in which some participants were violent gang members, to rob the victim. Arroyo v. State, 239 S.W.3d 282, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5111 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007).

1501. Assuming arguendo that testimony regarding money found in defendant's glove box was evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404, the evidence was relevant to assist the jury in assessing a defense witness's testimony and his credibility, as the jury could have determined that it was highly unlikely that defendant would have loaned his car that contained a large sum of money to this witness for a week as he claimed. Blanco v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5008 (Tex. App. El Paso June 28 2007).

1502. Defense counsel never invoked Tex. R. Evid. 403 or claimed that the probative value of evidence was outweighed by prejudice, and a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection was not implicitly contained in a relevancy objection, which counsel did make, and thus the probative value/prejudice argument was not preserved for appeal. Blanco v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5008 (Tex. App. El Paso June 28 2007).

1503. Two photographs of defendant's tattoos were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to show a connection between defendant and the evidence of chemical precursors to drugs found in a backpack and were admissible on the element of possession in defendant's trial for possession of certain chemicals with intent to manufacture a controlled substance, to wit, methamphetamine, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.124, and the evidence also served to corroborate an officer's testimony that defendant acknowledged that the backpack was his; the jury could have disbelieved the officer's testimony but still found the requisite link between defendant and the backpack, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in finding the evidence admissible. Owen v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5083 (Tex. App. Austin June 27 2007).

1504. Defendant contended that the issue for the court was whether reversible error occurred because the jury heard defendant's wife's testimony regarding possible other crimes under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), which could not have been disregarded, however, a mistrial could only be granted where there had been error first, and in this case, it would have been the jury hearing inadmissible evidence; defendant did not request or obtain a ruling on the admissibility of the evidence other than based on his motion in limine, and the trial court's ruling on that motion did not address the admissibility of the evidence, but only that a hearing would have to be held on admissibility before the State would be free to mention such matters; defendant's brief also did not challenge or address the admissibility of the statement in question, either in terms of relevance or unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and without demonstrating that the statement in question was inadmissible, defendant's contentions that the trial court violated the motion in limine and the statement could not have been disregarded by the jury did not demonstrate that the trial court erred in denying his mistrial motion. Nitsche v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4926 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 26 2007).

1506. In defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, where identity was an issue, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting several witnesses to disclose evidence of defendant's Oklahoma burglary at trial, and the acts undertaken during both offenses did not matter because the focus was on the identity between the weapons taken by defendant during the Oklahoma offense and later used at the Texas offense, and thus the extraneous burglary and the property taken during it was relevant to an element in dispute; because evidence of extraneous offenses was admissible to prove identity under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and evidence of the Oklahoma burglary furthered that purpose at bar, there was no abuse of discretion found. Edwards v. State, 228 S.W.3d 450, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4848 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

1507. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault on a child case, even if the trial court erred by admitting a statement defendant made to a witness regarding young women, the error was harmless; by the time the comment was admitted, the jury had already heard the victim's detailed testimony describing the sexual assault and defendant's wife's testimony regarding defendant's admission that he engaged in, at least, some sexual contact with the victim. Silva v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4720 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 19 2007).

1508. Evidence of gang affiliation was properly admitted as relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 402 since it was offered to show a motive for a murder; the evidence was not limited under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and the probative value substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Rodrigues v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4441 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 7 2007).

1509. Defendant complained that the State did not produce a chain of custody for the videotape and the baseball bat; however, those exhibits were properly authenticated and there was no evidence that they had been tampered with; defendant also contended that her statements on the videotape and the testimony regarding the bat were irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, but the evidence was relevant if it had any tendency to make the existence of any fact of consequence more or less probable than it would be without the evidence; thus, the evidence was relevant, and the trial court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress that evidence. Barnes v. State, 2007

Tex. App. LEXIS 4502 (Tex. App. Austin June 7 2007).

1510. In a capital-murder trial, the perpetrator's videotaped statement, which was relevant and probative to the State's case, was not improperly admitted over the perpetrator's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection, since the perpetrator did not overcome the presumption that the evidence was more probative than prejudicial since he admitted his direct involvement in causing at least one of the victim's stab wounds and starting the fire in her bedroom. Mata v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4505 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 7 2007).

1511. Defendant's death sentence after being convicted of capital murder was appropriate, in part because the trial court did not err in admitting autopsy photographs since the medical examiner used the autopsy photographs to help explain his testimony about the victim's gunshot wounds. Saldano v. State, 232 S.W.3d 77, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 698 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1232, 128 S. Ct. 1446, 170 L. Ed. 2d 278, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 2119 (2008).

1512. In defendant's murder trial, testimony that a witness bought drugs from defendant out of his apartment was relevant because it rebutted the suggestion that defendant had no interest in any of the drugs that might have been stolen from the apartment, and the evidence was not subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because (1) the testimony went to defendant's motive, (2) the testimony consisted of only two questions, (3) the State needed to establish a motive, and (4) the evidence was not likely to impress the jury in some irrational way. Freeman v. State, 230 S.W.3d 392, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3965 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

1513. In a case involving injury to a child, there was no error in the State's admission of a golf club, similar to one found in defendant's apartment, to show that it could have been the type of weapon used to inflict injuries to a victim; the club had some probative value as demonstrative evidence. Lynch v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4107 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 23 2007).

1514. Defendant's wife's statements were testimonial because they served to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution, and thus an officer's testimony about the wife's out of court statements violated the Confrontation Clause, and the trial court erred in admitting them; because the officer was the only witness to testify at defendant's trial and the officer's testimony regarding the wife's statements provided evidence critical to establishing the elements of the offense of assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.01, the court was unable to find that the error did not contribute to defendant's conviction, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2. Zapata v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3844 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 17 2007).

1515. In a strict product liability action, the trial court properly excluded evidence regarding the drug use and prior kidnapping conviction of the deceased, an individual involved in a vehicle accident, because the evidence added nothing to the central issue of the trial, the design defect of a seat belt buckle, and the risk of unfair prejudice greatly outweighed the probative value of the evidence. The vehicle manufacturer did not establish that the exclusion of the evidence probably resulted in an incorrect judgment. AlliedSignal, Inc. v. Moran, 231 S.W.3d 16, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3883, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17758 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2007).

1516. In a case involving the sexual abuse of a child, a trial court did not err by allowing the introduction of evidence that a young victim saw defendant having sexual relations with his own sister around the time of an alleged abuse incident because this was relevant since it was similar to the charged offense; moreover, it rebutted a defensive theory that family members had conspired to frame defendant. Belt v. State, 227 S.W.3d 339, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3749 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

1517. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault case, the mere fact the complainant might have had intercourse with defendant's nephew did not rebut the scientific proof provided by the State showing a probability of greater than 99.99 percent that defendant fathered the complainant's child. More importantly, paternity of the child did not bear on defendant's guilt. Reagan v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3589 (Tex. App. El Paso May 10 2007).

1518. Defendant objected to certain evidence on relevancy grounds, but not on grounds under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and nothing in the record indicated that the correct ground of exclusion was obvious to the trial judge or opposing counsel; because defendant's objection did not address the correct evidentiary basis for exclusion, which did not afford the trial judge a chance to rule on the issue, the argument was not preserved for appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33. Washington v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3699 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 10 2007).

1519. Trial court did not err in limiting the scope of defense counsel's cross-examination, for confrontation purposes; the court found that (1) certain testimony was cumulative under Tex. R. Evid. 403, (2) counsel's proffered question sought evidence to rebut testimony that the victim was a fun person, not to show another pertinent fact, such as defendant's assertion that he acted in self-defense, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404, and (3) whether the witness took a gun from defendant was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Jones v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3527 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 9 2007).

1520. In defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation with intent to commit sexual assault in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 30.02, evidence regarding defendant's prior sexual assault was relevant to prove the instant victim's lack of consent and defendant's intent to commit sexual assault only to the extent that the extraneous offense and the charged offense were shown to have been sufficiently similar to have invoked the doctrine of chances, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that the similarities warranted admission of the extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and that the probative value of the evidence outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice; however, the State failed to introduce all the proffered evidence regarding the similarities between the charged and extraneous offenses on which the relevance of the extraneous offense depended, and had defendant moved to strike and the trial court overruled the motion, it was possible that reversible error would have been presented, but defendant did not renew the objection or move to strike, and the court had to conclude that any error in the admission of the testimony in question was not preserved for review. MacKenzie v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3465 (Tex. App. Austin May 3 2007).

1521. In a sexual assault case in which the complainants were an adult and a child, evidence that defendant possessed sex toys and nude photos was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 for the purpose of showing how defendant was grooming the complainants, and this evidence was not overly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Petronella v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3198 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 26 2007).

1522. Trial court properly excluded evidence of extraneous acts under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) related to defendant's codefendant, as even if it was relevant, it was inadmissible for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that the evidence, which did not amount to a "signature act" by codefendant, carried little probative weight and was highly prejudicial. Moore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3209 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 26 2007).

1523. Assuming without deciding that certain evidence was relevant for a purpose other than to show character conformity, its relevance had to not be substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice; any relevance of the evidence of alleged prior violence and false police reports was outweighed by its danger of unfair prejudice, given that (1) the probative value, assuming there was some, was very limited, and (2) the jury was exposed to defendant's theory that the victim had a motive to lie, and thus the trial court did not err in excluding this evidence. Hudson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2965 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 19 2007).

1524. Because defendant only objected to evidence on relevance grounds, and no separate Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection was specifically made to the trial court, that claim was waived. Sapp v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2875

(Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 17 2007).

1525. Application for a protective order was some evidence that the victim no longer wanted a relationship with defendant and that the encounter between the two was not consensual, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the document over a relevancy objection in defendant's attempted sexual assault trial. Sapp v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2875 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 17 2007).

1526. Admission of another's indictment was relevant to material issues in the termination trial, whether the mother engaged in a course of endangering conduct and whether termination was in the child's best interests, and given that relevant evidence was admissible, the trial court did not err in admitting this testimony. In re G.C.F., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2680 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 5 2007).

1527. In a father's termination case, the mother and father had a relationship and the mother had the requisite personal knowledge under Tex. R. Evid. 602 to testify as to whether the father was complying with his service plan; the issue was relevant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, as to whether his parental rights were to be terminated and the admission of the mother's testimony was not error. In re G.C.F., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2680 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 5 2007).

1528. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony of a witness regarding defendant's admission that he had committed another murder because it was relevant to the issue of intent to rebut the defensive theory of accident in defendant's capital murder trial. Bookman v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2681 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 5 2007).

1529. Although a patient made an offer of proof, the patient failed to make any argument as to why evidence of a surgeon's reputation in the medical community and alleged mistreatment of other patients was improperly excluded or why it should have been admitted, and the patient failed to specify the purpose for which the evidence was offered; because both steps were required to avoid waiver, the patient failed to preserve certain issues for review. Montgomery v. Varon, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2582 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 3 2007).

1530. Patient's claim that an expert's testimony concerning a radiologist's alleged mistreatment and misdiagnosis of patients other than the patient was not properly preserved for review, because although the patient included some evidence in this regard in an offer of proof, the patient failed to state why the evidence was improperly excluded or why it should have been admitted, and the patient failed to specify the purpose for which the evidence was offered; in any event, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding this evidence given that the expert's testimony in one aspect amounted to pure speculation and the patient did not establish how the testimony was material to the radiologist's interpretation of certain scans, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding the testimony was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, or that even if relevant, its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Montgomery v. Varon, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2582 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 3 2007).

1531. In defendant's trial for possession of more than 200 grams but less than 400 grams of a prohibited substance, methamphetamine, the court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, given that (1) counsel seemed to have a particular strategy, and nothing suggested that defendant was eligible for community supervision or that counsel was denied access to information, (2) there was nothing to suggest that certain evidence was relevant, (3) it was not shown or alleged that had counsel filed certain motions, the trial would have been affected, (4) defendant's brief failed to specify what defendant now alleged to have been the proper course of action, and the matter was inadequately briefed, and (5) an instructed verdict would have been improper, given the evidence that supported the State's version, and counsel was not ineffective for failing to do a useless thing. Duck

v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2587 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 3 2007).

1532. No objection was lodged to the improper inquiry into a witness's extensive criminal history, the trial court had no chance to rule on its relevance, and it was clear that the failure to object waived error; because no objection was made, there was no error on the trial court's part in permitting the cross-examination to continue. Duck v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2587 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 3 2007).

1533. In defendant's trial for attempted sexual assault, the trial court erred in admitting evidence of a prior conviction of indecency with a child, which was an extraneous offense, and while the conviction might have been relevant, such did not make it admissible, given that (1) the evidence was unnecessary because the acts currently charged spoke for themselves, (2) the probative value of the extraneous conviction was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial impact for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, as the evidence had the potential for improperly influencing the jury and more than just a small amount of attention was focused on the extraneous crime, (3) given the victim's testimony, the need for the extraneous conviction was slight, and (4) the evidence was used in a way to illustrate a modus operandi, such that the use of the prior conviction had the risk of confusion or misinterpretation. Bjorgaard v. State, 220 S.W.3d 555, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2514 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

1534. Admission of an extraneous conviction amounted to harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); while there was enough evidence to convict defendant of attempted sexual assault without the conviction, there was some contradictory evidence and the error involved the introduction of evidence, a prior conviction for indecency with a child, that was inherently inflammatory; although the trial court gave a limiting instruction, the relevance of the evidence was suspect and the court had little choice but to recognize the high likelihood that the prior conviction influenced one or more of the jurors. Bjorgaard v. State, 220 S.W.3d 555, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2514 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

1535. Court recognizes a distinction between relevance and admissibility: to be admissible, evidence must be relevant, but not all relevant evidence is admissible. Bjorgaard v. State, 220 S.W.3d 555, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2514 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

1536. Presence of defendant's DNA in a database was relevant to show how defendant became the focus of a police investigation for aggravated sexual assault. Mata v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2319 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2007).

1537. While the court strongly questioned the State's need for including the evidence, allowing testimony that defendant's DNA profile was found in a database was not an abuse of discretion on the trial court's part for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403; the court found that (1) although relevant to show how police focused their attention on defendant, the evidence was not necessary to show a fact of consequence in proving defendant committed the aggravated sexual assault, (2) the testimony had the potential to impress the jury in an irrational manner, but the testimony that the database was analogous to a fingerprint database that held government employees' fingerprints prevented the court from reaching the conclusion that the jury was irrationally impressed, and (3) the time the State needed to develop the evidence was minimal. Mata v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2319 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2007).

1538. Defendant objected that certain photographs and his wallet were irrelevant and should not have been admitted into evidence; however, defendant did not attempt to explain how the wallet and pictures harmed him, other than to generally say that harm was evidenced by his lengthy punishment. That explanation is insufficient; thus, defendant's complaints with regard to those exhibits were overruled. Arnold v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2187 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 22 2007).

1539. Evidence was factually sufficient to support defendant's capital murder conviction; the testimony of the doctors, that the death of the baby was not an accident, was compelling and the evidence of how defendant interacted with his own children had little if any relevance to his conduct with the baby. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2256 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 22 2007).

1540. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the trial court did not err in admitting testimony that defendant molested the child victim's cousin; the cousin's testimony served to rebut defendant's conspiracy theory and lack of opportunity theory in his trial for indecency with a child, and although the testimony regarding defendant's extraneous offense would have been inadmissible character evidence if offered to prove that defendant acted in conformity therewith in the present case, the cousin's testimony was relevant for at least two permissible purposes. Maldonado v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2276 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 22 2007).

1541. Trial court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to the admission of a police "money log" from defendant's arrest, as the form showed that the cataloging process described by a detective was what happened, and an unknown signature at the bottom of the form did not place the accuracy of the report by the seizing officers in question, nor did the signature affect the log's relevance, which tended to prove that defendant was involved in buying or selling amounts of contraband for purposes of defendant's trial for unlawful possession of cocaine with intent to distribute; Tex. R. Evid. 803 did not require a business record to be sponsored by its custodian, as defendant claimed. Dixon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2110 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 20 2007).

1542. Certain exhibits of handguns were relevant in defendant's trial for aggravated robbery and aggravated assault, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, to the determination of defendant's guilt; while the handguns might not have actually been used in the robbery, they tended to make it more probable that defendant was able to arm himself and codefendants on the night in question. Denton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1706 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 7 2007).

1543. Absent a showing of relevance, coupled with a Tex. R. Evid. 404 exception, the Texas Rules of Evidence do not permit the defendant to show prior specific acts to demonstrate that the victim is a bad person. Oliver v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1732 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 7 2007).

1544. Defendant's use of a knife was a threat of force, for purposes of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 9.04 and there was no evidence that the victim used or attempted to use unlawful force on the day of the incident and thus the history of altercations between the parties did not tend to show that defendant was legally justified in threatening the victim under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 9.31(a); furthermore, defendant did not argue any exceptions to the general rule prohibiting testimony about prior specific acts under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and thus defendant failed to show of the evidence was relevant to the charged conduct under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02 and the exclusion of the evidence was not error. Oliver v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1732 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 7 2007).

1545. Even though the trial court erred by admitting into evidence during defendant's aggravated sexual assault trial photographs of defendant, his co-defendant, and his roommate having sex, appearing to be intoxicated, and flashing a gang sign, the error was harmless because: (1) the photographs of defendant and the two others partying were not scandalous or shocking, but were innocuous in comparison to the photographs of the complainant and other women, who were naked and unconscious; (2) except for one comment during closing arguments, the State did not emphasize the evidence; (3) there was very little contemporaneous testimony concerning the photographs when they were admitted into evidence; and (4) the jury was manifestly able to consider the probative evidence and separate it from marginally relevant evidence because it acquitted the co-defendant and convicted defendant of the lesser-included offense of sexual assault. Casey v. State, 215 S.W.3d 870, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 230 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1546. Appellate court considers rulings on relevance and Tex. R. Evid. 403 objections under an abuse of discretion standard. Gore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1124 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 15 2007).

1547. In a driving while intoxicated case, a court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the portion of a videotape that contained defendant's statements regarding Xanax and Valium because defendant's statement that he took the medications was in response to a question by the officer, and the question was relevant as a predicate inquiry to the administration of a field sobriety test. Layton v. State, 263 S.W.3d 179, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1191 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

1548. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in admitting the testimony of a probation officer, but because defendant failed at first to object to the officer's expertise or lack thereof, the trial court did not have a chance to assess the complaint, and defendant's objections to a question and answer preserved only the asserted complaints of relevance and invading the jury's province, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33, and there was no reason for a late objection to the officer's lack of expertise; notwithstanding any preservation issues, the record showed no abuse of discretion by the trial court in admitting the officer's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the trial court could have found that the officer was qualified, given the officer's experience, to testify on the subject matter. Merito v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 827 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 1 2007).

1549. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by requiring appellant, who was on trial for capital murder, to display his gang-related tattoo to the jury because the tattoos were admissible to prove the "criminal street gang" element of the offense, and their probative value was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Garza v. State, 213 S.W.3d 338, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 98 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1550. In defendant's murder trial, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of defendant's connection to a street gang, as it was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403; the evidence was relevant to rebut the claim that defendant was not a violent person and tended to make it more probable that defendant was willing to use deadly force in situations where defendant was not directly threatened with serious injury or death, and defendant's willingness to use deadly force made it more probable than not that defendant was not acting in self defense when the victim was shot; the likelihood that the evidence impressed the jury in an irrational way was slight, the evidence was not graphic and defendant never admitted to being a gang member, the State's need for the evidence was high, and the time needed to develop the evidence was minimal. Alvarez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 386 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 18 2007).

1551. Photograph of the complainant's children was relevant to the case where, at trial, the complainant and her sister testified the complainant's two young daughters were in the car at the time of the shooting, while other witnesses claimed they did not see the girls in the car. The photograph showed the girls' size at the time of the offense and allowed the jury to evaluate whether the children would be visible in the car, particularly if they had ducked down when the shooting began. Brown v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 237 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 12 2007).

1552. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child conviction, evidence that those who interviewed the child were trained to ask open-ended and non-leading questions was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and made defendant's theory of fabrication less likely, and thus was not improperly admitted. Gauna v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11128 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 29 2006).

1553. Defendant's conviction for aggravated robbery was appropriate because extraneous-offense evidence was relevant since the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence compellingly served to make it more probable that the identification of the robber as defendant was accurate. Leija v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS

10966 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 21 2006).

1554. Defendant did not attempt to introduce evidence showing that a witness was unavailable or that defendant made diligent attempts to contact the witness, and thus defendant failed to establish prejudice, for speedy trial purposes, based on the unavailability of the witness, as well as the materiality and relevance of the witness's testimony; although defendant asserted the missing witness would have impeached an officer's testimony by countering assertions that the witness was intoxicated, this line of testimony was already deemed irrelevant. Davies v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11159 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 21 2006).

1555. In an aggravated robbery case, the court properly allowed the State to present a witness's testimony that defendant had robbed her at gunpoint at a time when defendant's witness testified that he was working for her because the testimony had significant potential value to prove that defendant's alibi witness was not truthful; in light of the instructions given, the evidence did not have the potential to impress the jury in an irrational way, and no other evidence except the witness's significantly assisted the State in contradicting the account of defendant's whereabouts. Davis v. State, 214 S.W.3d 101, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10866 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2006).

1556. Extraneous offense testimony was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the issue of identity and was admissible to prove that defendant posed as a police officer and sexually assaulted a prostitute; the facts of the charged offense and the extraneous offenses showed a pattern of conduct sufficiently distinctive to constitute a signature. Page v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2521 (Dec. 20, 2006).

1557. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a continuance and by excluding the transcript of an expert's pretrial testimony because the expert's testimony was irrelevant to the knowledge of consent issue in defendant's trial for debit card abuse in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 32.31(b)(1)(A) and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 31.07(a); what the expert suggested regarding defendant's manic episode was not relevant to whether defendant believed at the time of the offense that the victim consented to defendant's use of the ambulance and debit card, there is no analogy to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) that makes mental illness evidence relevant to prosecutions for debit card abuse and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, and the expert's testimony did not tend to negate the culpable mental state for the offense but provided an excuse or explanation for defendant's intentional acts. Fleece v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10631 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 14 2006).

1558. Evidence of other contraband that police officers found in the room and evidence of the drugs found on the person of defendant's girlfriend, found while executing a search warrant was admissible when defendant was charged with possession of methadone that was found in the room because the evidence tended to establish the requisite affirmative link to the contraband. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10721 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 14 2006).

1559. Testimony about when and how defendant left the state tended to show that it was more likely defendant left in response to the victim's outcry and defendant's departure made the existence of some consciousness of guilt more probable, such that the evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401; although defendant testified to intending to return, defendant did not and acknowledged leaving a school maintenance job because of the allegations, and the trial court did not err in finding that the value of the testimony about defendant's departure was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Horton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10521 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 7 2006).

1560. Because defendant made no objection based on relevance, defendant forfeited the complaint for failure to comply with Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Horton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10521 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 7

1561. In an aggravated assault and aggravated sexual assault case, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony of a victim's former sexual partner that the victim had not engaged in sadomasochistic activities with her former partner prior to or after defendant's assault as it was relevant to determine whether she consented to sexual encounter and to having defendant brand his initials on her buttocks. Reed v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10107 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 22 2006).

1562. Although a medical study referred to by a doctor in his testimony at defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 involved females older than the complainant and under different circumstances, the evidence was relevant because the doctor was in the best position to explain to the jury why the genitalia of sexually abused victims often exhibited no physical signs of penetration, and he tied the study to his earlier conclusion that he was not surprised about the lack of physical evidence of penetration in the complainant's genital examination, which assisted the trier of fact to understand the lack of physical evidence; the testimony showed that the farther away in time the examination was from the abuse, the less likely there would be physical evidence of penetration, and, accordingly, the trial court properly admitted the testimony. Whitfield v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9726 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 9 2006).

1563. Trial court did not err in admitting extraneous sexual offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404 as such was admissible to show opportunity and an essential element, and by presenting his activities on the day in question to show a lack of opportunity to commit the crime, defendant opened the door to admission of the evidence. Morales v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11350 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 9 2006).

1564. In defendant's trial for the capital murder of his 14-month-old stepdaughter, the trial court did not err by admitting autopsy photographs because photographs were relevant and probative because they revealed the nature and extent of the stepdaughter's injuries which were not otherwise apparent and established the intentional and knowing manner in which she was killed. Dismuke v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9613 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 7 2006).

1565. Because a corporation conceded that it did not test a car seat for rollovers, that issue was not rendered more or less probable if the corporation also failed to do rollover testing of high chairs or strollers, under Tex. R. Evid. 401. In re Graco Children's Prods., 210 S.W.3d 598, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 1073, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 87 (Tex. 2006).

1566. In the slaughterhouses' appeal of the trial court's issuance of a permanent injunction and award of expenses to the State, pursuant to Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 433.099, the appellate court rejected the slaughterhouses' claim that the trial court erred by admitting the State's exhibits, which included photographs depicting conditions both inside and outside the slaughterhouse during the inspections, because evidence that tends to make the slaughterhouses' past or continued violations more or less probable was relevant to the issue of whether conduct constituting violations should be enjoined and was admissible, as provided in Tex. R. Evid. 401. Qaddura v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9209 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 26 2006).

1567. In a robbery case, evidence from a videotape that defendant convinced an accomplice to claim the gun was his was properly admitted because defendant's participation was hotly contested at trial, the State needed to show the relationship between the two men and to show that defendant had influence over the accomplice, the evidence showed that defendant had a significant effect on the accomplice, and it supported testimony that defendant planned the robbery; in addition, the time spent introducing the evidence and developing the link was not substantial, taking approximately fifty pages of a twelve-hundred sixty-six page record on guilt/innocence. Smith v.

State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9116 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 24 2006).

1568. In defendant's criminal street gang case, defendant's prior conviction for aggravated assault, as well as other extraneous offenses, was properly admitted because evidence showing that defendant stabbed an African-American security guard who interfered when defendant and several other men were beating a Hispanic man was both relevant and highly probative; although the evidence was prejudicial in that it rebutted the defense effort to portray defendant as reformed, the jury had already heard graphic testimony from numerous witnesses about the assault, providing ample proof of defendant's propensity for brutal behavior. Chaddock v. State, 203 S.W.3d 916, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8861 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

1569. Where defendant was charged with intoxication manslaughter and aggravated assault following a vehicular accident, the State's chemist was permitted to give expert testimony concerning the presence of a cocaine metabolite in defendant's blood and the effect of cocaine withdrawal; the evidence was relevant to the State's theory that defendant was fatigued and sleepy, because he was suffering withdrawal from cocaine. Bannister v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8522 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 29 2006).

1570. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the State argued that defendant's conduct in providing a police officer with a false name was admissible as evidence of consciousness of guilt, and the trial court could have reasonably believed that the evidence was relevant to show defendant's knowledge that a crime had been committed and that defendant was a likely suspect in the aggravated assault. Gray v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8128 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 14 2006).

1571. Trial court did not err in permitting the State to question defendant about an extraneous offense because defendant opened the door to the admission of the evidence that defendant was the aggressor in an altercation in prison when defendant claimed not to be the aggressor in the present altercation, in defendant's trial for aggravated assault; the extraneous offense evidence that defendant allegedly assaulted an inmate became relevant to rebut defendant's defense. Gray v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8128 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 14 2006).

1572. Defendant objected to the introduction of an autopsy photograph under relevance and prejudice grounds, and the objection was sufficient to preserve error because the specific grounds were apparent from the context of the objection. Lewis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8141 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 13 2006).

1573. Tex. R. Evid. 401 is "helpful" to determine relevancy under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a). Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1574. Although defendant claimed that a trial court erred in not allowing him to cross-examine his arresting officer concerning another officer's relationship with a former girlfriend of defendant, there was no evidence presented of any bias or prejudice on the part of the arresting officer, only that six months after the incident he became aware that a fellow officer was dating a woman who had a relationship with defendant; having established no possible bias or prejudice, defendant had not shown that the evidence was relevant or that the trial judge abused his discretion by failing to allow testimony of the post-arrest knowledge obtained by the arresting officer. Waldrop v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8017 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 7 2006).

1575. Evidence of defendant's prior conviction for delivering drugs was admissible where, through his questioning of a defense witness, defense counsel had sought to paint defendant as a "white knight" not involved with drugs, thereby creating a false impression before the jury; by doing so, defendant opened the door to testimony to correct that false impression, and the prosecutor could only correct that false impression by cross-examination of the witness who created it. Jones v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7917 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 5 2006).

1576. Counsel could have anticipated that evidence of prior incarcerations and past drug activity would have come in anyway, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), given that the current offense of felony murder under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02(b)(3) arose out of a drug transaction, and thus evidence related to defendant's past involvement with drugs was directly related to the offense and was relevant; the court also found that had counsel objected, it was unlikely that the trial court would not have allowed the evidence to be admitted and the court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel in this regard. Saint James v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7649 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2006).

1577. Compensatory and exemplary damage award entered in favor of the property owner was proper because the evidence that showed his neighbor's consultant harassed and intimidated the owner was relevant, as required by Tex. R. Evid. 401, to the issue of whether the neighbor or her agent maintained a nuisance with malice; the record contained evidence that the consultant, on the neighbor's behalf, went beyond "litigation tactics" in attempting to harass and intimidate the property owner and third parties, as part of a scheme to maintain the nuisance and delay the litigation. Reed v. Hepker, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7654 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2006).

1578. Trial court properly excluded evidence of the apartment owner's prior lawsuit with the city because the evidence was not relevant to the question of whether or not the on-site apartment manager violated city ordinances when she did not have a certificate of occupancy displayed for the complex. Vargas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7688 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 31 2006).

1579. Court disagreed that counsel was ineffective, and while counsel failed to call the authors of letters from treatment centers, the court presumed that the trial court was aware of the letters' contents and defendant failed to show how the authors would have testified to additional facts that would have been relevant to sentencing for possession of a controlled substance and fraudulent use or possession of identifying information; defendant did not overcome the presumption that counsel acted reasonably or that the result would have been different had the authors testified; the authors appeared to have presumed that defendant could have been put back on community supervision, but after the trial court adjudicated guilt, defendant was not eligible for such because the trial court found habitual offender notices true, for purposes of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.42. Jamison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7826 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2006).

1580. Defendant failed to preserve, pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, a complaint on the issue of an extraneous arrest and incarceration in alleged violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); while defendant objected on grounds of relevance and Tex. R. Evid. 403, defendant did not object on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 404, and the other objections did not address the correct evidentiary basis for the exclusion of the testimony and did not comport with the point of error raised on appeal. Jones v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7690 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 30 2006).

1581. During a murder trial, the victim's mother identified a photograph of her son taken before the murder; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photograph; the mother's identification had probative value in identifying the son as the victim. Brown v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7556 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25 2006).

1582. While defendant should have been allowed to question the arresting officer based on the field sobriety test manual regarding the horizontal gaze nystagmus test, the disallowance was not harmful under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because it did not prevent defendant from arguing that the horizontal gaze nystagmus test was improperly administered. Howell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7558 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25 2006).

1583. Defendant's oral statements about a dream containing details of the victim's murder were properly admitted into evidence because they were inculpatory admissions that were probative of his guilt; the statements revealed his knowledge of details about the crime scene that had not been released to the public, particularly the location and position of the body inside the business; the probative value of defendant's statements was strong because they constituted an admission against interest, revealing defendant's knowledge of the crime scene details not disclosed to the public; the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because the time used to develop the evidence during trial was relatively brief, the State's need for the evidence was high as the only other evidence linking defendant to the murder was DNA evidence, and it was the only direct evidence of defendant's intent to kill the victim rather than just sexually assault her. Dossett v. State, 216 S.W.3d 7, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7428 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

1584. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault, defendant's theory of defense was that the victim consented to the sexual encounter, and thus defendant placed his intent in issue and the extraneous offense evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to show his intent; although defendant claimed the extraneous evidence was too remote, the court noted that Tex. R. Evid. 404 did not impose time limits, and thus the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence over defendant's objection. Hernandez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7540 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 23 2006).

1585. Summary judgment was granted to a psychiatrist in an action brought under the Texas Liability and Improvement Act, because experts did not establish causation based on the act of prescribing a drug to a patient, who later committed embezzlement and other forms of debauchery allegedly due to taking medication for attention deficit disorder; the evidence did not show that a psychiatrist had knowledge of an alleged propensity towards addictive behavior, expert testimony based on this conclusion was merely speculation and conjecture, and a trial court did not abuse the patient's due process rights by failing to consider the evidence under those circumstances. Price v. Divita, 224 S.W.3d 331, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6929 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

1586. Trial court did not err in admitting blood alcohol concentration (BAC) evidence from tests that were taken 2 hours after defendant hit a pedestrian without expert testimony of retrograde extrapolation because other evidence was presented to jury from which it could decide if defendant was intoxicated at the time of the accident; defendant admitted to drinking, a officer testified that he observed signs of intoxication and administered sobriety tests, and defendant's BAC of 0.18 was over twice the amount determined by the legislature for a person to be intoxicated per se in Texas under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.01(2)(B); defendant's BAC was only one piece in the "evidentiary puzzle" for the jury's consideration and, as such, was relevant to the issue of intoxication and admissible. Christ v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6585 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

1587. Evidence of a judgment that terminated defendant's parental rights to three of her children after the date that she allegedly murdered her newborn infant was relevant at her capital murder trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, and had relevance apart from mere proof of character conformity in compliance with Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), because an extraneous offense/bad act that took place subsequent to the offense for which a defendant was on trial did not make the extraneous offense/bad act inadmissible per se; furthermore, the judgment was introduced by the State after defendant had testified that the infant's death on the night in question was not the result of any intentional or knowing conduct on defendant's part, and the termination judgment contained findings by the trial judge that defendant "knowingly" placed or allowed her other children to remain in conditions dangerous to their physical or emotional well-being, which at least arguably made it more probable that defendant's acts or omissions on the night in question were done either intentionally or knowingly. Fergerson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6589 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

1588. In an injury to a child case, testimony about whether defendant cried when he saw the mother while he was at Navy Boot Camp tended to show what his relationship with the mother was like before she became pregnant; testimony about defendant's sexual relationship with the mother before, during, and after her pregnancy tended to show how defendant's physical relationship with the mother deteriorated after she became pregnant and gave birth; and testimony about defendant's indifference about whether the mother kept the baby or not tended to show defendant's apathy or malice towards the child; all of that evidence supported the State's theory about defendant's motive, and was therefore relevant. Lopez v. State, 200 S.W.3d 246, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9199 (Tex. App.

Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

1589. Trial court did not err in admitting into evidence during the punishment phase of defendant's trial for possession of less than one gram of a controlled substance in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.115 a photograph of defendant's tattoo suggesting gang-related activity; such evidence was relevant because it related to defendant's character, which was admissible during the punishment phase pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1). Lecourias v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6442 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 20 2006).

1590. Where defendant was on trial for possessing or transporting chemicals with the intent to manufacture methamphetamine, the trial court did not err in admitting photographs which showed a vapor cloud spraying from canisters found in defendant's car over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection as they were not so alarming in nature that they would have clouded the jury's mind with fear; instead, they provided a visual depiction of the disposal methods described through police testimony, and were relevant to police officers' belief that the canisters contained anhydrous ammonia. Daigger v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5846 (Tex. App. Austin July 7 2006).

1591. Trial court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel because his counsel's objection was not beyond the scope of reasonable trial strategy. Goshorn v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5453 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 27 2006).

1592. In a driving while intoxicated case, a court erred in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the arresting officer with a field sobriety test manual concerning the horizontal gaze nystagmus test because the portion of the manual regarding whether optokinetic nystagmus, which was not caused by alcohol consumption, might be caused by watching quickly moving objects was relevant. Howell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5343 (Tex. App. Austin June 23 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7558 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25, 2006).

1593. In defendant's capital murder trial, autopsy photographs showed the wounds that caused the deaths of the victims, and thus the photographs were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 in the guilt/innocence phase. Singleton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5318 (Tex. App. Dallas June 22 2006).

1594. Judgment convicting defendant of aggravated sexual assault, indecency with a child by exposure, and indecency with a child by contact was affirmed; the trial court did not err in refusing to admit the testimony of a doctor who defendant had not designated as an expert where the doctor's testimony was not direct rebuttal to a nurse's testimony; the doctor's testimony was on a collateral issue and was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Cunningham v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5400 (Tex. App. Eastland June 22 2006).

1595. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, evidence of defendant's medical condition, including that she had lupus and allergies, was properly excluded on the basis that there was no expert medical testimony as to what effect the medicines that she was taking would have on a person's conduct or condition, or on a person's normal use of mental and physical faculties; the proffered evidence was properly subject to a relevancy objection because it was a self-serving, sympathy-provoking recitation of her health and current medication without any showing of a link or nexus to any fact that is of consequence. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

1596. In defendant's murder case, evidence of the history of physical abuse in the relationship between defendant and the victim was relevant and properly admitted; the extraneous-offense evidence rebutted defendant's claim of accident and showed that he intended to cause death, serious bodily injury, or bodily injury; in addition, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Brown v. State,

1597. In a case involving indecency with a child, a trial court erred by admitting photographs of the victim showing weight gain; however, the error was harmless considering the amount of inculpatory evidence against defendant. Dehart v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5111 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 14 2006).

1598. Because defendant's brief did not explain how a witness was qualified as an expert on blood alcohol concentration or how the testing methodology was scientifically reliable and relevant based on its similarity to the facts in issue, given the jury charge of intoxication in defendant's driving while intoxicated trial, the court had no basis to find that the trial court abused its discretion in excluding the testimony for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Evans v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5027 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 13 2006).

1599. In defendant's sexual abuse of a child trial, expert testimony was relevant to correct defendant's potentially misleading argument, the expert was not permitted to give an opinion that the victim was sexually abused, and the expert was limited to testifying about whether the physical examination ruled out the possibility of abuse; because there was no indication that the expert's testimony was unfairly prejudicial or confusing, the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Estes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5028 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 13 2006).

1600. Appellate court held the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding a statement defendant's mother made to the wounded officer that it was the drugs that made defendant shoot the officer as it was a collateral issue and not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Townsend v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4929 (Tex. App. Eastland June 8 2006).

1601. During defendant's trial for intoxication manslaughter, testimony about the difference between punishment for murder and intoxication manslaughter was relevant because it gave the jury complete information about how the punishment range for a particular criminal offense varies when a mental state is proven; defendant claimed that the collision was an accident or a mistake. Hackler v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4995 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 8 2006).

1602. In defendant's retaliation trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 36.06(a)(1)(A), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the State's objection because the evidence defendant sought as to an officer's nicknames was irrelevant to the case; the contention that defendant's statements to the officer were justifiable because of the effect the nicknames had on him was not valid and did not excuse the fact that defendant committed retaliation, and there was no evidence that defendant's substantial rights were affected under Tex. R. App. P. 44. Garcia v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4708 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 1 2006).

1603. Trial court did not err when it allowed the introduction of defendant's threatening statement to a jailor relating to his release from prison under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07. § 3(a); this statement was highly relevant in assessing punishment for the attempted murder of police officers, and it was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Espinosa v. State, 194 S.W.3d 703, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4611 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

1604. Testimony of a witness not named in an indictment did not constitute irrelevant victim impact testimony because her reaction to witnessing the shooting of a police officer was admissible as circumstances of the crime under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a). Espinosa v. State, 194 S.W.3d 703, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4611 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

1605. Court properly limited defense counsel's cross-examination of a State's witness where his question regarding whether the prosecutor told the witness she needed a different attorney was not relevant and did not reveal evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that was of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Roda v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4475 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 25 2006).

1606. Considering the conflict in the testimony concerning when a letter from defendant to his wife was written, the trial court's determination that the letter was relevant to defendant's trial for assault did not constitute a clear abuse of discretion. Hernandez v. State, 205 S.W.3d 555, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4426 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

1607. In defendant's trial on charges of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence concerning the victim's emotional stability because although defendant sought to introduce evidence for the stated purpose of showing that the victim was a troubled teen falsifying the charge to get attention from her mother, the evidence was not relevant in that it did not show a motive to lie, or show bias or prejudice. Baker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4308 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 18 2006).

1608. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that alleged threats made more than a year after defendant fled were not relevant to his state of mind at the time he fled. Reyes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4160 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 16 2006).

1609. In defendant's murder trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02, regarding testimony of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) of an unrelated alleged murder, while the materiality of the testimony was problematic, the error, if any, was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); defendant injected this killing in defendant's cross-examination of a witness, and defendant was not free to complain of invited error. Shabazz v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4025 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 11 2006).

1610. Notes written by defendant entitled "Plausible Deniability" were relevant during his murder trial because they demonstrated that he was so zealous to conceal evidence of the crime that he made a schedule for doing so; the title alone was significant, and the notes appeared to outline a schedule for obtaining supplies, dismembering the victim's body, and cleaning the scene. Williams v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4251 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 11 2006).

1611. In an aggravated assault of a peace officer case, the trial court did not err in admitting the photographs of the officer, whose injuries were the basis for the arrest warrant, as the State did not wilfully withhold the photographs, defendant did not contend that he was surprised or otherwise disadvantaged by the introduction of the photographs, and whether defendant assaulted the officer was not at issue. Dunklin v. State, 194 S.W.3d 14, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3596 (Tex. App. Tyler 2006).

1612. Earlier threats were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to support defendant's claim that defendant fled due to the threat, but the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that alleged threats made more than one year after defendant fled were not relevant to defendant's state of mind when defendant fled. Reyes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3649 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 27 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4160 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 16, 2006).

1613. Because a witness testified to a sexual assault for three pages of the record before defendant objected, defendant forfeited the complaint, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; the court noted that defendant's complaint at trial was to relevance, but on appeal it was regarding prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and the court assumed without deciding that defendant's complaint on appeal comported with the trial objection. Pippillion v.

State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3347 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 26 2006).

1614. In a criminal prosecution for misdemeanor driving while intoxicated, the trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias. The issues defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hasty or jump to conclusions at the crime scene without conducting a proper investigation. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

1615. Because an employee's request for relief from a contempt order based on an injunction was still pending before an appellate court at the time of trial, the contempt judgment against the employee was not final and therefore was inadmissible against the employee under Tex. R. Evid. 609(e); ultimately, the appellate court had determined that the trial court's injunction order was not clear and the court rejected appellees' attempt to parse the contempt proceedings and circumvent the final disposition of the contempt judgment, and therefore the trial court erred in admitting such evidence of contempt and the employee's resulting incarceration, as this information was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, and this error probably resulted in an improper judgment under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a) and was prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because evidence of the contempt proceeding presented the jury with a clear indication of the judge's opinion, and it was too great of a risk that the evidence irreparably influenced the jury's decision. Houston v. Millennium Ins. Agency, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3156 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 20 2006).

1616. Because an employee's request for relief from a contempt order based on an injunction was still pending before an appellate court at the time of trial, the contempt judgment against the employee was not final and therefore was inadmissible against the employee. Houston v. Millennium Ins. Agency, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3156 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 20 2006).

1617. Trial court properly admitted the autopsy photographs of defendant's infant son because the injuries that caused the child's death were not immediately apparent and the photographs were relevant as required under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Martinez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2985 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 13 2006).

1618. Because defendant's trial objection, that evidence was irrelevant and prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, was different from defendant's appeal objection, that evidence was being used to improperly impeach a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 609, defendant waived error. Bedwell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3248 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 13 2006).

1619. Because defendant's trial objection, that evidence was irrelevant and prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, was different from defendant's appeal objection, that evidence was being used to improperly impeach a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 609, defendant waived error. Bedwell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3248 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 13 2006).

1620. Photographs used by defendant's opponent in a mayoral election referring to defendant's automobile accident were properly excluded from his trial on an intoxication assault charge because the tactics used by defendant's opponent were irrelevant to the issue of defendant's guilt. Rodriguez v. State, 191 S.W.3d 428, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2841 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

1621. Because defendant did not raise the issue of self-defense under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 9.31(a), defendant failed to establish that his wife's prior acts were relevant, and thus the court rejected defendant's claim that the trial court erred in excluding extraneous offense evidence against his wife in defendant's trial for misdemeanor assault involving family violence. McRay v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2746 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 6 2006).

1622. Because questions sought information about the adult eyewitnesses and the juveniles at the playground where the aggravated assault took place, and sought no information about the adult victim or the victim's relationship with defendant, the trial court correctly held that the questions sought irrelevant evidence, and the court overruled defendant's claim that the trial court erred in excluding evidence of the relationship with the juveniles. Crochette v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2767 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 6 2006).

1623. Trial court did not err in permitting the motorist to testify over objection about the effects of the injuries on the motorist's ability to work; the evidence was relevant to the motorist's claims for pain and suffering and physical impairment. Nat'l Freight, Inc. v. Snyder, 191 S.W.3d 416, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2833 (Tex. App. Eastland 2006).

1624. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted autopsy photographs of the victim where the photographs were taken before the autopsy procedure began and showed the condition of the body as it was received from the hospital; the photographs showed the bullet wound that testimony indicated was the cause of death, they illustrated that the victim was not otherwise bruised or injured as he would have been if there had been a fight before he was shot, and they showed no more than the nature of the victim's injury. Gray v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2363 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 29 2006).

1625. Defendant's testimony that others, while armed, threatened to immediately send people to harm defendant's family was sufficiently probative on the issue of whether the others threatened imminent death or serious bodily injury, for purposes of defendant's duress defense under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 8.05(a), and the fact that the testimony did not provide more detail about the specifics of the threatened harm went to the weight of the testimony, not its admissibility. Hernandez v. State, 191 S.W.3d 370, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2533 (Tex. App. Waco 2006).

1626. Messages retrieved from a murder victim's voicemail were not hearsay under Tex. R. Evid. 801 and were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because they were not offered to prove the truth of the matters asserted therein and they assisted the jury in establishing the time of the victim's death. White v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2224 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 23 2006).

1627. While the trial court's ruling accurately reflected the general limits placed on impeachment, the court found that defendant's wife, the victim, opened the door to impeachment evidence concerning her earlier plea in a domestic violence case because her testimony left a false impression concerning her past criminal history, and thus, the trial court's reliance on the general rule concerning remote evidence was misplaced in this case, and the trial court abused its discretion; the wife's denial was directly relevant to the offense charged of family violence and the defense raised to that charge, and the State was free to offer extrinsic evidence rebutting her statement. Winegarner v. State, 188 S.W.3d 379, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2163 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

1628. Trial court did not err in admitting testimony regarding a threatening phone call made to a store manager, one of the victims, because the testimony had the effect of making defendant's identity more probable than if it had not been admitted, and thus was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401; the evidence was more probative than prejudicial given that the trial court minimized the prejudicial effect by refusing to allow the manager to testify of being told that defendant had connections to the mafia and the trial court gave limiting instructions. Garcia v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2041 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 16 2006).

1629. During defendant's trial for indecent exposure, the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of evidence that defendant walked around nude in front of his stepdaughters, masturbated in the presence of his stepdaughter, and inappropriately touched his stepdaughter because the evidence was probative to show defendant's intent and motive to sexually gratify himself in the presence of others and to rebut his defensive theory of mistake. Tennison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2120 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 16 2006).

1630. During defendant's trial for indecent exposure, the trial court properly excluded evidence that the victim called the police regarding various disturbances at her residence on several occasions following the report of exposure because the decision was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; the trial court maintained broad discretion to impose reasonable limits on cross-examination to avoid harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, endangering the witness, and the injection of cumulative and collateral evidence, and, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), specific instances of conduct, other than conviction of a crime, when offered to attack the witness's credibility could not be explored on cross-examination. Tennison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2120 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 16 2006).

1631. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of defendant's extraneous offense of failure to appear; defendant was aware of the trial setting but did not appear, which was indicative of flight, and the failure to appear had some relevance apart from character conformity under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it tended to show defendant's consciousness of guilt. Mieth v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1895 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 9 2006).

1632. Trial court did not err when it admitted evidence that defendant had been seen selling drugs a month before her indicted offense of being a felon in possession of a firearm because the testimony, elicited from a witness present when the indicted offense was committed, was relevant and tended to make the existence of defendant's intent to possess a firearm more likely than not, as the witness testified that he knew of five prior occasions on which defendant sold crack cocaine and also commented that drug dealers were often armed to protect themselves from being robbed. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

1633. In an action in which a trial court awarded more than $ 2 million to a pedestrian for injuries she sustained when she was struck by a city transit bus driven by an employee of a transit authority contractor, the trial court did not err when it admitted into evidence the graphic photographs of the pedestrian's injuries; even though the driver objected to the admission of the photographs, any error was waived by the failure to object to testimony of the conditions depicted in those photographs; at trial, witnesses testified they saw the pedestrian in the crosswalk when she was struck and dragged by the bus, and the orthopedic trauma surgeon who treated the pedestrian when she arrived at the hospital and amputated her leg testified, without objection, about the nature and extent of her injuries. Castro v. Cammerino, 186 S.W.3d 671, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1765 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

1634. Evidence that defendant was involved in a homosexual relationship with a woman was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 in defendant's forgery trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 32.21 and the probative value of that evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403; the court was not convinced that the influence on the jury was indelible, the State used very little time to develop the evidence, and the State needed the evidence in order to prove either of its two theories of forgery, which made the evidence relevant. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1719 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 2 2006).

1635. Autopsy photographs, depicting one victim and her fetus, were properly admitted in defendant's capital murder trial; the photographs were relevant to a contested issue in the case, whether the fetus was alive or dead at the time of the victim's death, and the trial court performed the proper balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and did not abuse its discretion. Rogers v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1609 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 1 2006).

1636. In an aggravated sexual assault case, testimony regarding the victim's sexual behavior after he was placed in foster care was relevant because it had a tendency to make more or less probable a fact of consequence at the guilt stage, specifically, whether defendant committed the crime at all. Pittillo v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1646 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 1 2006).

1637. District court judge did not err in ordering disclosure of the names and addresses of other insured property owners whose claims were handled by the investigator that denied the insured homeowner's water damage claim because Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.3(e)(5) specifically provided that a party could discover any bias of the witness and did not contain any requirement that an expert's credibility must be an issue for evidence of the expert's potential bias to be discoverable; further, the insurer failed to show the names and addresses were not relevant as provided in Tex. R. Evid. 401 or that they were within any constitutionally protected zone of privacy. In re Kemper Lloyds Ins. Co., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1602 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 28 2006).

1638. In a resisting arrest case, counsel was ineffective where, inter alia, counsel failed to investigate or interview defendant in detail about his criminal history or his prior contacts with the arresting officer; failed to seek discovery from the State; failed to file and obtain rulings on a motion in limine to require the State to raise extraneous matters outside the presence of the jury; failed to prepare defendant to testify; failed to object to evidence of inadmissible extraneous matters during the guilt phase; invited evidence of unadjudicated arrests during the punishment phase; and failed to object to failure of the punishment-phase charge to include a reasonable doubt instruction. Walker v. State, 195 S.W.3d 250, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1381 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

1639. Because much of the State's case termination of parental rights action under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 161.001(1)(E) was founded on the contention that one of the parents had abused one child, while the other did not prevent the abuse, the autopsy photographs were relevant to show that the child sustained multiple injuries that were not accidental, and the trial court could have found that the relevance of the photographs were not substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. In re P.M., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1429 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 22, 2006).

1640. Defendant's extraneous contacts with another supposedly minor child on the Internet were clearly relevant to show that defendant, although he claimed he thought the minor child at issue was an adult who was just "playing with him," repeatedly contacted female children and wanted to engage in sexual relations with them; thus, the extraneous contacts were relevant to show defendant's knowledge, intent, and lack of mistake, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and while the acts were prejudicial, the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Newberry v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1360 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 17 2006).

1641. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding certain testimony as irrelevant in a hearing on defendant's motion for a new trial, considering the evidence in light of the remand order, the trial testimony, and the motion for a new trial record. Alvarado v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1183 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 15 2006).

1642. In a capital murder case, a court properly admitted photographs of the victim's corpse where the photographs were probative of the crime scene and the injuries received by the victim, they were necessary for the State in developing its case, and, because they were not overly gruesome, the photographs did not pose the potential of impressing the jury in some irrational way. Shuffield v. State, 189 S.W.3d 782, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 365 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1643. In a capital murder case, a court did not err by excluding testimony in mitigation of punishment regarding a history of family sexual abuse of multiple generations of children in defendant's family because the fact that others in defendant's family were abused did not by itself make him more or less morally culpable for the crime for which he was on trial, nor did it, by itself, make a jury's finding of mitigation any more or less probable than it would have been without the evidence. Shuffield v. State, 189 S.W.3d 782, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 365 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1644. State argued that evidence regarding a burglary of a victim's home, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), explained defendant's motive to invade another's home armed, and was relevant to show that defendant and accomplices sexually assaulted other victims and murdered one of them to get revenge; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the challenged evidence was relevant to the issue of motive in defendant's capital murder case. Russell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1296 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 15 2006).

1645. Evidence of abuse of three older children was relevant not only to support the trial court's endangerment finding under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 161.001(1)(E), but also to support the best-interest determination. Rochelle v. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1141 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 9 2006).

1646. Where defendant was convicted of intoxication manslaughter, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence of his prior driving record at the punishment phase; the evidence was relevant to sentencing, because it gave the jury a complete picture of defendant's driving history. Bernal v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1002 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 8 2006).

1647. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child by sexual contact, evidence of defendant's flight was relevant to show guilt. Howard v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1083 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 8 2006).

1648. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence because the evidence was not sufficient to show a nexus between the crime charged and the alleged alternate perpetrators. Michaelwicz v. State, 186 S.W.3d 601, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 952 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

1649. Because a police officer's testimony concerning the environment and activities in and around the club at which defendant was arrested explained why the police officers were there and how defendant became a suspect, defense counsel's failure to object to that evidence was not sufficient to establish ineffective assistance of counsel; subject to certain exceptions not applicable to defendant's case, an officer's testimony explaining how he happened to be at the scene of a crime or accident would almost always be relevant. LeBleu v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 887 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 1 2006).

1650. For purposes of U.S. Const. amend. VI and Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow defendant to question a witness about another charge because the testimony established that that crime was unrelated to the instant offense and the trial court's ruling did not prevent defendant from pursuing all relevant avenues of cross-examination with the witness; an unrelated offense for which there was no evidence demonstrating the witness's involvement was not relevant. Gongora v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2531 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 1 2006).

1651. Because another crime was not related to the instant crime, and because the commission of that offense had no bearing on the plea agreement reached with one person, testimony about the the other crime was not relevant to defendant's trial, and the trial court's ruling did not violate defendant's federal confrontation rights and the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it prohibited this testimony. Gongora v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2531 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 1 2006).

1652. In a homeowner's breach of contract action against a contractor, the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony of the homeowner's expert witness because the witness's testimony, based on firsthand observations and accompanied by the knowledge and experience of his subcontractors and an outside expert, was reliable. Facundo v. Solis, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 318 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 12 2006).

1654. Certain requested findings were not relevant to the cause of action for breach of contract, and thus there was no error in the trial court's failure to make the findings. Coldwell Banker Whiteside Assocs. v. Ryan Equity Partners, Ltd., 181 S.W.3d 879, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 135 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

1655. In a breach of contract case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a motion to compel discovery; the documents sought, which were tax returns, did not constitute relevant information because the terms of the parties' contract did not give rise to the duties alleged. Wakeland v. Wakeland, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 4 2006).

1656. In a murder case, the prosecutor's affidavit regarding trial strategy was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401and Tex. R. Evid. 602 at a new trial hearing because it addressed the issue of effective assistance and included some statements made from personal knowledge; defendant did not seek to limit the scope of the affidavit pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 105(a). Shanklin v. State, 190 S.W.3d 154, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10675 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

1657. Where defendant, a large Caucasian man, was accused of burglarizing the homes of two Hispanic families, photographs of defendant's tattoos were admissible as evidence of defendant's selfishness and his impact on the victims. The photographs were not admissible to establish that defendant's race would make him more likely to engage in future criminal conduct. Hicks v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10663 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 28 2005).

1658. Because an investigator's notes were not helpful in determining the truth or falsity of any fact relevant to the lawsuit for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, they were not relevant and not admissible; furthermore, the notes were inadmissible because they memorialized out-of-court observations of a third party's interview of the victim and were hearsay within hearsay under Tex. R. Evid. 805. Khoshayand v. State, 179 S.W.3d 779, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10404 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

1659. Court rejected defendant's claim that the trial court erred in admitting a photograph of the victim's head after the shooting, showing the bullet entry; the court found no actual reference to the photograph in testimony, and given that the court had to presume the probative value outweighed any prejudicial effect, the court was unable to say that the picture inflamed the jurors to convict on an irrational basis, considering that the picture was not enlarged, gory, or gruesome, and the evidence was relevant and could have aided the jury in understanding the testimony regarding the victim's wound and death. Whitmire v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9593 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 17 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 183 S.W.3d 522, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 170 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

1660. State's cross-examination of defendant could have been construed two ways, and the record supported the state's assertion that the line of questioning was an attempt to connect defendant to the handgun used in the crime, which represented an appropriate line of inquiry relevant to the issue of whether the handgun belonged to defendant, which was relevant to the issue of whether her husband first threatened her with the handgun and whether she was the first to employ deadly force. Johnson v. State, 181 S.W.3d 760, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9441 (Tex. App. Waco 2005).

1661. Trial court did not err under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) in admitting evidence at punishment regarding defendant's admission to a hospital after the guilty verdict, which was described as malingering, and defendant's conduct in jail once discharged from the hospital, which involved acting like defendant was unable to do anything personally, although defendant later walked into court unassisted. Johnson v. State, 181 S.W.3d 760, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9441 (Tex. App. Waco 2005).

1662. In a hearing to revoke defendant's community supervision, the State was permitted to introduce evidence of the underlying offense of cruelty to animals; the evidence was relevant to whether defendant was entitled to a reduced sentence. Davis v. State, 181 S.W.3d 426, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9093 (Tex. App. Waco 2005).

1663. In a hearing to revoke defendant's community supervision, the State was permitted to introduce evidence of the underlying offense of cruelty to animals; the evidence was relevant to whether defendant was entitled to a reduced sentence. Davis v. State, 181 S.W.3d 426, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9093 (Tex. App. Waco 2005).

1664. In a negligence action arising from an oil field accident, the trial court did not err in excluding, as irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, a letter written by an OSHA investigator; the letter was not equivalent to a regulation or standard, and there was no evidence that witnesses who testified at trial had spoken with the investigator. Carrillo v. Star Tool Co., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8992 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2005).

1665. Defendant faced an indictment that did not identify a victim and charged a drug offense of cocaine possession, and, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a), a witness's punishment phase testimony in the form of victim-impact and victim-character testimony regarding an extraneous offense was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the determination of the appropriate sentence for defendant's case. Haley v. State, 173 S.W.3d 510, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1621 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

1666. Pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant's trial objection based only on Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403 waived any objection beyond those based on those rules, but even if the court considered defendant's argument as a Tex. R. Evid. 702 argument, there still was no error; the doctor testified that the findings of the physical examination were consistent with abuse allegations, that frequently there were no physical signs of abuse, and that the examination results did not prove that any abuse occurred at all, and the testimony was relevant to the issue of whether the victim was abused and thus the trial court did not err in finding that the testimony would have aided the jury and was not overly prejudicial under the circumstances. Segura v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7783 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 23 2005).

1667. Trial court did not err, in connection with defendant's trial for aggravated kidnapping in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 20.04(a)(4), in allowing the State to introduce unadjudicated extraneous offense evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a); given the relevance of the extraneous offenses that involved similar circumstances as the charged offense and the victim identifications of defendant, no arguable issue was raised regarding the trial court's decision to admit the evidence. Barraza v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7553 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 14 2005).

1668. In a murder case, the trial court was within its discretion in denying the admission of evidence regarding the gang membership of four State's witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as it was highly prejudicial: the only purpose for allowing the gang membership testimony was to show bias, and it was not relevant. Barlow v. State, 175 S.W.3d 839, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7110 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

1669. In a prosecution of defendant juvenile for felony murder, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit a picture of the scene of an intersection where a motor vehicle accident occurred; the photograph was taken approximately two months after the accident had occurred; a defense witness testified that he did not go the scene of the intersection on the night of the accident; as a result, the witness could not testify that the picture taken months later accurately depicted the intersection on the night of the accident. In re E.B.M., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS

7255 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2005).

1670. In a murder trial, defendant waived his Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 403 objections to the portion of a surveillance videotape that depicted the victim's wife kneeling and crying over the victim's body after defendant had fled the store. Two witnesses testified, without objection, regarding actions depicted on the videotape and verbally conveyed the same imagery. Fernandez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7068 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 30 2005).

1671. Trial court did not err in admitting into evidence extraneous offense evidence, specifically, nine other images of children engaged in types of sexual conduct, because (1) a jury could find beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant knowingly and intentionally possessed the additional nine images of child pornography; (2) the extraneous offenses made it more probable that defendant intentionally possessed the one image for which he was indicted; (3) the extraneous offenses were relevant to rebut the defensive theory of mistake; and (4) the probative value of the evidence outweighed the possibility of unfair prejudice. Boyd v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6907 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 25 2005).

1672. Court properly admitted defendant's statement regarding his involvement in a Mexican drug organization which was relevant as to whether he knew the marijuana was concealed in the car, it also demonstrated motive and intent, and the testimony was corroborating in that it tended to connect defendant to the offense. Mora v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6975 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 25 2005).

1673. Defendant's claim that a trial court erred in excluding evidence in the guilt/innocence phase of his murder trial that his co-offender died in an unrelated armed confrontation with police, on the ground that how he died was not relevant, was resolved against him because, even assuming that the trial court erred in excluding the evidence that the roommate died in an armed confrontation with police, any error was harmless, as similar evidence was introduced by defendant when he testified. Perez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6814 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 23 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 2897, 165 L. Ed. 2d 924, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 4763, 74 U.S.L.W. 3703 (U.S. 2006).

1674. Court knows of no authority that obligates a trial court to admit irrelevant evidence. Pasley v. Pasley, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6680 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 18 2005).

1675. Trial court did not err in finding that payments or gifts made by a corporation to a father's children were irrelevant to the issue of whether the father breached his fiduciary duties arising from his status as executor of the mother's estate and trustee of the trusts; stockholders did not personally own the assets of the corporation. Pasley v. Pasley, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6680 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 18 2005).

1676. Because drugs and a large sum of cash recovered from defendant's safe went to establish defendant's intent to deliver methamphetamine, the evidence of the money was relevant, under Tex. R. Evid. 401, to whether defendant committed the offense; the probative value of the evidence was high, and because it was unlikely that the admission of the money improperly suggested that jurors were to make a decision based on emotion, the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Ortiz v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6721 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 18 2005).

1677. In a case of indecency with a child, the admission of irrelevant evidence at punishment that the victim's brother also abused the victim was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the victim testified that defendant did not know of the brother's abuse and because proper evidence of defendant's conduct warranted the sentence imposed. Dustman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6588 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 17 2005).

1678. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant against the victim, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); the evidence of prior threats of violence was relevant, apart from character conformity, to establish motive and intent and to rebut the theory that the victim committed suicide, and under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the prejudicial effect did not outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Orozco v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6473 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 15 2005).

1680. In a trial for manufactured methamphetamine, there was no error in the admission of evidence concerning a subsequent arrest, seven months later, for possession of chemicals with intent to manufacture methamphetamine. That evidence tended to make less probable defendant's argument that he possessed items used to manufacture methamphetamine solely for use in bartering for drugs; thus, the evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid 401 and 402. Tarpley v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6289 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 10 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8782 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 24, 2005).

1681. In a trial for arson based on defendant's setting fire to a piece of cloth in the gas tank of his ex-girlfriend's car, it was not error to exclude the ex-girlfriend's testimony concerning her new boyfriend. The relevancy was not readily apparent, given that neither the girlfriend nor her new boyfriend was present when the arson was committed. Flores v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6255 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 8 2005).

1682. Documents relating to purchases of a vehicle were properly admitted in a trial for possession of marihuana that was found in a false compartment in the vehicle because the documents were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to prove the chain of custody, possession, or ownership of the vehicle from two prior owners to defendant. Trevino v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6139 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 4 2005).

1683. Defendant's conviction for indecent exposure was proper where defendant did not contend, nor did the court find, that he filed a motion requiring the State to elect any one occurrence upon which to base its conviction. Thus, the trial court did not err in admitting the objected-to evidence or in denying his request for a limiting instruction because the evidence was not extraneous offense evidence. Routt v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6180 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 4 2005).

1684. Defendant's conviction for murder was proper pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 403 because the district court did not err by admitting evidence regarding her alleged interest in pornography. The email and photos related to her depiction of the level of her voluntary involvement in the general course of her sexual relationship with the victim and their relationship in general, which also bore on her version of the events on the day of the shooting, including whether they had a dispute about those activities while she feared for her safety. Pierce v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6229 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 3 2005).

1685. Trial court did not err in admitting an officer's testimony of the numerous weapons found in the apartment where defendant was arrested because defendant was charged with attempted capital murder, and the evidence of the amount and type of weapons showed it was more probable than not that defendant was familiar with weapons and practiced in the use of sophisticated weaponry, and thus the evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to refute defendant's claim of accident, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); furthermore, the court did not find that the evidence was more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Jones v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5876

(Tex. App. Dallas July 28 2005).

1686. With respect to breach of contract and promissory estoppel claims, a letter written in connection with the settlement of an unrelated lawsuit was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 as proof of an agreement to pay a claimed sum; hence, it was not barred by Tex. R. Evid. 408. MG Bldg. Materials, Ltd. v. Moses Lopez Custom Homes, Inc., 179 S.W.3d 51, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5796 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

1687. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, certain testimony did not amount to any evidence at all as to the company's lost profits or out of pocket damages because there was no evidence as to the basis of the witness's opinions and conclusions, and thus there was no summary judgment evidence raising a fact issue as to these damages. El Dorado Motors, Inc. v. Koch, 168 S.W.3d 360, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5816 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

1688. Admission of photos of a sexual assault victim, depicting her at the age she was when the assults allegedly occurred, was relevant to give a perspective on the victim's credibility. Baker v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5842 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 26 2005).

1689. Evidence of an extraneous assault offense that defendant allegedly committed against his wife after her aggravated kidnapping and six days before his trial on that charge was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) for the purpose of showing his intent to inflict bodily injury on his wife where defendant's intent was a fact of consequence because the indictment included an allegation that he intended to commit murder or to inflict bodily injury when he abducted his wife. Furthermore, evidence of defendant's subsequent alleged assault of his wife was relevant because his subsequent conduct made it more probable that he intended to inflict bodily injury on his wife during the charged offense. Simoneaux v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5628 (Tex. App. Tyler July 20 2005).

1690. Court did not err by admitting evidence concerning the circumstances of a prior sexual assault conviction where defendant encountered the victims in the parking lot of their residences, waited for the victims to return to their rooms, approached them under the guise of needing help, and made advances toward raping them but ejaculated before penetration. Because intent was a material element of the offense on which the State carried the burden of proof, the probative value of the witness's testimony was high and was not overcome by the danger of unfair prejudice. Fields v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5494 (Tex. App. Austin July 14 2005).

1691. While defendant's hospital records, which indicated that he had a history of alcohol abuse, were irrelevant and should not have been admitted at his trial for driving while intoxicated, the error was harmless because the records did not have a substantial or injurious effect on the jury's verdict and did not affect defendant's substantial rights. Young v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5571 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 14 2005).

1692. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence of alleged misconduct that occurred months after the abuse and change in behavior of the child because the evidence was irrelevant, and another exhibit was properly excluded, despite the fact that it related to events that occurred before the incident in question, because the allegations were distinguished from the trauma that a physician testified could have explained the child's change in behavior. Even assuming the evidence should have been admitted, any error from the exclusion was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the jury heard testimony from the victim and an outcry witness and the exclusion of the evidence did not have a substantial effect on the jury's verdict, which found defendant guilty of indecency with a child by contact in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11. Patterson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5260 (Tex. App. Austin July 8 2005).

1693. Defendant answered trial counsel's question regarding a witness's alleged drug use on the record, and thus counsel preserved the issue for appeal pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(2); however, the trial court's decision to exclude defendant's testimony was not unreasonable, and counsel did not demonstrate how the purported evidence about the witness's drug use was relevant to the defense under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Edwards v. State, 178 S.W.3d 139, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5132 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

1694. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defense counsel to cross-examine a witness about pending criminal charges because defendant did not establish a nexus between the witness's testimony and the charges; the trial court permitted defense counsel to cross-examine the witness outside of the jury's presence and concluded that the cross-examination was not relevant, and thus the trial court's ruling limiting cross-examination did not constitute an impermissible restriction of defendant's Sixth Amendment rights under the Confrontation Clause. Singh v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5142 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 30 2005).

1695. In a trial for indecency with a child, the trial court properly admitted evidence of a prior indecency conviction. The current charge arose from defendant's exposing himself, and he argued that he had merely forgotten to zip his pants; the extraneous offense evidence therefore tended to make a fact of consequence--whether defendant had or lacked intent to arouse or gratify sexual desire--more or less probable. Arp v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4535 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 15 2005).

1696. Evidence of juvenile appellant's negative drug test was properly found to be unreliable where his probation officer failed to test his urine sample for adulterants that could produce a false negative because she was out of the necessary supplies. Furthermore, the evidence had low probative value to rebut appellant's marijuana possession charge and was outweighed by the risk of jury confusion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because an undercover officer testified that he saw appellant take approximately two puffs from a marijuana cigar, and appellant's expert testified that if appellant had only smoked such a small amount of marijuana, there was only a 15 percent chance that he would have tested positive for marijuana on a urinalysis test. In re J.A.C., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4519 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 14 2005).

1697. In a murder trial, evidence was properly admitted, under Tex. R. Evid. 401 -- 404, of a shooting incident that occurred eight days after the murder. The extraneous offense evidence was relevant to the development of the case and was admissible to show the development of the investigation and defendant's intent or knowledge regarding the gun; as to prejudice, the evidence was presented almost matter-of-factly and included no injuries, disturbing photographs, or emotional testimony. Gonzales v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4532 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 14 2005).

1698. Although it could not be said that defendant's act of kicking out the window of a police officer's patrol car after he was arrested for burglary of a habitation was so intertwined with the charged offense to make it admissible as same-transaction contextual evidence, or that defendant's act was material to an issue in the case, even if the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the officer's testimony, the admission of the evidence did not have a substantial and injurious effect on the jury's verdict and therefore did not affect defendant's substantial rights because there was substantial evidence of his guilt. Franklin v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4401 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 9 2005).

1699. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of prior statements made to police by two individuals whom the State contended were with defendant at the time of a shooting where evidence that both individuals made statements that defendant admitted to being involved in a freeway shooting and later recanted them was relevant because the statements, even if recanted, indicated that the witnesses had knowledge that a freeway shooting had occurred and showed the witnesses' willingness to implicate defendant in order to exonerate themselves, thus making the State's theory that all three men were involved more probable than the theory would have been without the evidence. Furthermore, defendant had not demonstrated that the negative attributes of the statements substantially outweighed their probative value because the State had made clear that the statements had been recanted so that the jury was not given the impression that the witnesses still maintained that defendant had admitted the shooting to them. Dinh Tan Ho v. State, 171 S.W.3d 295, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4405 (Tex. App.

1700. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of a bullet hole in a car allegedly involved in a freeway shooting because the existence of the bullet hole in the car had a tendency to make the fact that the car was involved in the shooting more probable and was thus relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Furthermore, evidence of the bullet hole was not unfairly prejudicial because there was no definitive evidence that the bullet hole occurred during another shooting at a caf, as defendant alleged, and because the jury did not even know about the cafe shooting. Dinh Tan Ho v. State, 171 S.W.3d 295, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4405 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

1701. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection to the testimony concerning his citizenship status as inadmissible, because United States citizenship status was relevant to an objective determination of defendant's ability to understand English because if it could be established that a person was a United States citizen, it was more probable that he knew the English language. Indeed, the context of the citizenship question surrounded defendant's ability to understand English, and within such context, the State pointed out that defendant was answering questions before the interpreter had a chance to rephrase them in Spanish. Magallon v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4474 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 9 2005).

1702. In a murder case in which defendant shot and killed one of the occupants of a car that approached his house, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence of marijuana blunts in the victim's car because that evidence was irrelevant. Richardson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4342 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 8 2005).

1703. In a murder case in which defendant shot and killed one of the occupants of a car that approached his house, a rifle belonging to defendant's brother was relevant evidence because the trial court's charge authorized the jury to convict defendant under the law of parties and the rifle showed the context in which the shooting occurred. Richardson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4342 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 8 2005).

1704. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant's statement under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) where it appeared that it believed that the portion of the statement in which defendant admitted to threatening a prostitute with a box cutter referred to the complainant because the statement corroborated the complainant's testimony and was relevant to the issue of consent. Furthermore, the statement was not inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it strengthened the State's case on the consent issue and because, while the acts described in the statement were probably distasteful to at least some, if not all, of the jury members, they were not any more inflammatory than the charged offense. Marc v. State, 166 S.W.3d 767, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4228 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

1705. Court did not err by admitting an investigation videotape into evidence because, although the content of the video might have been unpleasant to view, it depicted the reality of the brutal crime committed, it contained material that was the subject of testimony presented during the State's case in chief, and it was probative of the fact and manner of the victim's death and defendant's culpable mental state. Ramirez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4185 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 1 2005).

1706. Defendant's convictions for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. §§ 21.11(a)(1), 22.021(a)(B)(iii)-(iv), 22.021(a)(2)(A)(ii) (Supp. 2004-05) were affirmed because the trial court did not err in admitting DNA evidence found on the victim because the location of defendant's DNA was consistent with the victim's account of the attack and the DNA evidence was clearly relevant in determining the credibility of the victim's accusation. Also, the DNA evidence was not unfairly prejudicial because it provided circumstantial proof of the offense charged; and the State's need for the evidence was great because there were no witnesses that could disprove defendant's contention that his DNA was innocently transferred onto the victim, but the discovery of his DNA on top of a fresh bruise served to dispute his theory. Rivera v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3997 (Tex.

App. Austin May 26 2005).

1707. Trial court did not err in excluding two exhibits, and although defendant claimed that the exclusion of the exhibits impaired defendant's right to cross-examine the victim, defendant did not explain how this was true in that the trial court allowed defendant to fully question the victim regarding the exhibits; defendant cited no portions of the exhibits that referred to any facts in the case, supported a conspiratorial fabrication regarding the victim's allegations, or could not have been brought to the jury's attention through questions addressed to the victim, and defendant's predicate for introducing the exhibits failed to establish either that they had any relevance to issues in the case or were otherwise admissible, for example, under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Ford v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4046 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2005).

1708. In a robbery trial, the court did not have to admit evidence of the complainant's prior conviction for misdemeanor assault against defendant's nephew. Contrary to defendant's argument, the two-year-old conviction was not relevant to show that the complainant ran from his apartment because he feared a physical confrontation. Allison v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4055 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2005).

1709. Trial court did not err in not admitting an entire tape that included threatening phone calls from the victim, defendant's former wife, because defendant sought to admit the entire tape, and the messages on the tape that were unidentified had no relevance as to the victim and her alleged motives, and lacked a proper predicate for admission under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 404(b). Davis v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3649 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2005).

1710. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's objection to testimony regarding whom an officer had named as the "defendant" in the case, which defendant claimed was unfairly prejudicial because it had the prejudicial effect of telling the jury that he was the subject of investigation from the very beginning and that he had to be guilty, because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony was relevant to the jury's evaluation of the complainant's allegations. Nor could it be said that the probative value of the testimony was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because the officer's testimony was not the type of testimony that would suggest that the jury make a decision on an improper basis. Dunbar v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3676 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2005).

1711. Although a driver had the right under U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1 and Tex. Const. art. I, § 19 to cross-examine the officer who arrested him for driving while intoxicated after he was involved in an auto accident, the administrative law judge (ALJ) who suspended his driver's license was within her discretion to limit questioning on relevancy grounds pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 because the record showed that when the officer was asked by the ALJ if he had taken the driver's driving and possible culpability in causing the accident into consideration for probable cause to arrest him, the officer responded negatively. Because the officer did not take the fault of the accident into consideration in determining probable cause for intoxication, the issue was irrelevant. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Burrer, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3534 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 11 2005).

1712. Where the State had already established on direct examination that the complainant was serving a deferred adjudication probation during one point in her relationship with defendant, any further inquiry would not have made the existence of any fact of consequence to the determination of defendant's alleged offense more or less probable than it was without the evidence, and such testimony was not relevant to any bias, motive, or interest to help the State, making it an impermissible method of impeachment; accordingly, the trial court was within its discretion to limit the question posed by defendant's counsel on cross-examination. Crook v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3485 (Tex. App. Dallas May 6 2005).

1713. In a case of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony of the complaining witness and two other children about extraneous acts by defendant; although defendant argued that the testimony was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was not necessary to prove elements of the offense that were essentially uncontested, such as identity, intent, plan, preparation, and opportunity, the evidence was relevant under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2 to show defendant's intentions toward the complaining witness. Nesby v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3379 (Tex. App. Austin May 5 2005).

1714. Evidence that there was no fence on a claimed property line in recent years was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because it made the alleged continuous existence of a fence during a previous 10-year period, proof of which was required for adverse possession under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 16.026(a), less probable. Melendez v. De Leon, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3360 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 4 2005).

1715. Court presumed that photographs were relevant because defendant did not argue otherwise at trial or in the brief. Adame v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3277 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 29 2005).

1716. In an aggravated assault trial, the fact that defendant was known to carry guns did not pertain to prior bad acts and was relevant to the disputed issue of whether defendant was in fact carrying a gun on the night in question. Morga v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2975 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 20 2005).

1717. Trial court did not err in admitting defendant's intoxilyzer test results into evidence in the absence of retrograde extrapolation evidence on defendant's claim that the results were irrelevant under Rule 401 because the results of breath tests were relevant without retrograde extrapolation evidence. Trillo v. State, 165 S.W.3d 763, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2792 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

1718. In an action for subsurface trespass brought by oil and gas lessors against their lessee, the trial court did not err by admitting into evidence an internal memorandum written by an employee of the lessee more than 20 years earlier where the memo was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 on the ground that its recommendation to drill despite title problems could have helped the jury to decide whether the lessee was reasonable in delaying its development of a tract of land because of title problems with another tract. Furthermore, language in the memo about "illiterate Mexicans" was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the memo could not be considered an appeal to prejudice in language clear and strong, especially because it was written by an employee of the lessee and did not ask the jury to decide the case on an improper basis. Mission Res., Inc. v. Garza Energy Trust, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2650 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 7 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 166 S.W.3d 301, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3443, 160 Oil & Gas Rep. 1144 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2005).

1719. Child victim's mother's testimony was relevant to show that defendant placed the victim in fear, which was essential to proving that defendant was guilty of the charged offense under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 29.02; thus, the testimony that the family moved from their house because the victim was scared was relevant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401. Smith v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2723 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 7 2005).

1720. In defendant's murder case, where the State wholly failed to present any evidence, direct or circumstantial, that defendant had any knowledge that his wife was a beneficiary under the victim's life insurance policy, the State's insurance motive evidence was irrelevant and should have been excluded from the consideration of the jury by the trial court. Eby v. State, 165 S.W.3d 723, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2580 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

1721. Photographs of a murder victim were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and were not unduly prejudicial to defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because a photograph of the victim lying in an ambulance immediately after firefighters removed her body from a burning house was both material and probative, as it established her condition at the crime scene, and because a photograph of her face taken during autopsy was also material and probative of the fact that the autopsy was performed on the same person removed from the crime scene by ambulance. The numerous autopsy photographs were also probative of the victim's cause of death, a material element in the offense of capital murder, and although the detail in the photographs was graphic, each served the purpose of illustrating the nature and extent of the victim's injuries. Vargas v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2417 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2005).

1722. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of two prior extraneous acts in defendant's trial on charges of possession of pseudoephedrine with the intent to manufacture methamphetamine because there was no direct evidence of defendant's intent, and intent could not necessarily be inferred from the act itself. The evidence of the prior extraneous act in which defendant was found with fresh track marks in his arm was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because methamphetamine use and addiction was highly probative regarding commission of the charged offense, and the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show intent, plan, and absence of mistake. Fulfer v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2449 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 31 2005).

1723. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by ruling that a witness's testimony that he sold a gun to defendant's friend was relevant and that its probative value was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 403. Even if the gun was not the one used in the murders, the testimony was some evidence of the friend's interest in weapons of the sort used to commit the murders. Scott v. State, 165 S.W.3d 27, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2168 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

1725. Judgment in favor of property owner and surface lessee and sublessee was reversed because their expert's opinion that the mineral lessee and seismic company's employee started a barn fire by carelessly disposing of a cigarette was based entirely on assumptions and was not supported by evidence. The expert's testimony was conclusory and speculative, thus it was not relevant evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 401. W. Atlas Int'l v. Randolph, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2199 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 24 2005).

1726. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault, defendant's statement about robbing someone was part of a continuum of activity beginning with his presence in the victim's apartment. The statement was offered to assist the jury in identifying defendant as the perpetrator; the trial court properly admitted the statement. Williams v. State, 161 S.W.3d 680, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2014 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

1727. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting into evidence several items of bloody clothing worn by the victim; although defendant pleaded guilty, the evidence of the victim's extensive bleeding was properly admitted because it indicated the gravity of defendant's crime and was relevant to assessing punishment. Cervantez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1949 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 15 2005).

1728. Existence of a bullet hole in the car in which defendant was riding had a tendency to make the fact that the car was involved in a freeway shooting more probable, and thus was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401; there was no evidence that the bullet hole occurred during a cafe shooting and the jury never heard any mention of the cafe shooting during the guilt-innocence phase of defendant's murder trial, and thus the bullet hole evidence could not have been unfairly prejudicial to defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and the evidence was properly admitted. Dinh Tan Ho v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2111 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 15 2005), opinion withdrawn by,

1729. In a drug case, in light of the offense charged and the evidence adduced at trial, the evidence that defendant possessed a bogus license did not unfairly prejudice the jury or confuse the issues. Accordingly, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence. Gregory v. State, 159 S.W.3d 254, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1660 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

1730. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of drug paraphernalia found in a vehicle outside a residence in which police arrested defendant because the State demonstrated that the evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the issue of defendant's intent to deliver crack cocaine by connecting a woman in the residence to the vehicle in which the contraband was found. With the connection between the contraband in the vehicle and the residence, along with scales, razor blades, and testimony that defendant was seen directing traffic in front of the location, the evidence had a tendency to prove that defendant possessed crack cocaine with intent to deliver. Guy v. State, 160 S.W.3d 606, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1289 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

1731. Trial court did not err in admitting a photograph of the victim in a praying position in connection with defendant's murder trial. The court presumed the photograph was relevant because defendant did not object to relevancy at trial, the photograph was relevant to identifying the victim, and defendant gave no explanation as to how the photograph was unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Castillo v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1382 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 15 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1624, 164 L. Ed. 2d 339, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2567, 74 U.S.L.W. 3543 (U.S. 2006).

1732. State was properly allowed to present evidence of defendant's gang affiliation in defendant's murder trial, given that the evidence was relevant both to the State's theory and defendant's defense and put the circumstances of the crime in context for the jury. The evidence was relevant of motive to show an intent to kill and was permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and furthermore, the danger of any unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Castillo v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1382 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 15 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1624, 164 L. Ed. 2d 339, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2567, 74 U.S.L.W. 3543 (U.S. 2006).

1733. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence during the sentencing phase that a gun used in the commission of the assault on the victim was operable even though the jury had not found that defendant had possessed a deadly weapon during the guilt phase of the trial as the trial court could have reasonably believed that it was relevant and would be helpful for the jury to know whether the pistol was capable of being fired since it was available for defendant's use in the midst of a volatile situation. Kerr v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1081 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 10 2005).

1734. Where defendant was tried for aiding seven men escape from prison, evidence of the post-escape crimes committed by the seven men bore heavily upon defendant's character and moral blameworthiness; the evidence was admissible to help the jury determine an appropriate sentence for defendant's crimes. Rodriguez v. State, 163 S.W.3d 115, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1084 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

1735. Trial court did not err by excluding proffered evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) to show that defendant was in psychiatric hospital at the time of his arrest for sexual assault in order to show his state of mind following the commission of the offense because even though defendant's mental state during and after the offense might have been relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the jury's determination of an appropriate punishment, his location at the time of his arrest and his mental state were not one and the same. Furthermore, defendant was not prohibited from introducing direct evidence of his mental condition because he could have offered significantly more relevant testimony to establish a diminished mental capacity by testifying as to whether he had ever been treated for drug addiction or mental illness and by calling the doctor who certified him competent to stand trial to testify to the significant mental deficits noted in his competency evaluation of defendant. Lamb v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 879 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 3 2005).

1736. In the absence of any request to limit the scope of a prosecutor's affidavit, the court upheld the trial court's ruling under Tex. R. Evid. 105(a) because parts of the material in the affidavit were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 as they recounted the prosecutors' recollection regarding voir dire in defendant's theft trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 31.03(a), and the affidavit was not inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403; the trial court was the fact finder and there was less danger that it was influenced by improper suggestion. Biagas v. State, 177 S.W.3d 161, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 947 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

1737. Trial court erred in admitting evidence that was probative only of defendant's character and propensity to sexually assault children because the extraneous offense against a different victim did not fall within the false impression exception, nor was the evidence relevant to prove a material issue such as motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake, however, the error was harmless because it probably did not influence the jury or had only a slight influence on its verdict. The alleged victim testified that defendant sexually assaulted her, which was corroborated by the pediatric nurse who examined her, one inmate testified that he heard defendant acknowledge sexually assaulting the victim and a second inmate testified, without objection, that defendant boasted of having sex with minor girls. Tipton v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 871 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 2 2005).

1738. Trial court erred in overruling defendant's relevance objections under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 402 to testimony regarding injuries sustained by motorists and passengers in other vehicles as a result of a collision involving defendant's vehicle, as the testimony was relevant to the force of impact and the speed and manner in which defendant was driving and, thus, to the issue of whether she was driving while intoxicated. Allcott v. State, 158 S.W.3d 73, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 786 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

1739. There was no abuse of discretion by not allowing the witness to testify about the victim's alleged history of prostitution in defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault because defendant did not argue that the excluded testimony satisfied the minimum requirement of relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, nor had defendant argued that if the excluded testimony was relevant, it properly fell within the confines of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b). Orellana v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 380 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 20 2005).

1740. In an employment discrimination action, the trial court did not err in determining that evidence of executive compensation was relevant. U.S. Auto. Ass'n v. Brite, 161 S.W.3d 566, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 367 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

1741. Defendant's taped statements were properly authenticated under Tex. R. Evid. 901 because the detective participating in the taped conversation testified he was the operator of the recording equipment, it was functioning properly, and that the recording accurately reflected the conversation. Additionally, the tape statements were relevant because they contained defendant's version of the events. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the statements at his trial. Raveiro v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 218 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 13 2005).

1742. During defendant's robbery trial, the trial court properly engaged in the balancing test required by Tex. R. Evid. 403 when it admitted into evidence two extraneous offenses that occurred after the robbery and after defendant had been arrested because the contested evidence was relevant to the issue of whether defendant, by his appearance, language, and conduct, placed the victim in fear of imminent bodily injury at the time that he stole beer from the victim's convenience store and because his subsequent conduct showed his ability to place another in fear of imminent bodily injury, it was, therefore, relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Furthermore, the evidence, which was that defendant had kicked out the back window of the patrol car and, while being taken to jail, had kicked a deputy, was admissible as same transaction contextual evidence. Hayden v. State, 155 S.W.3d 640, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 243 (Tex. App. Eastland 2005).

1743. In a joint trial on the offense of sexual assault, a trial court's decision to admit a portion of a videotape showing one co-defendant's presence during the accidental overdose of a friend was not erroneous because the trial court repeatedly instructed the jury that defendant was not there. Klock v. State, 177 S.W.3d 53, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

1744. Trial court's decision to exclude testimony from a former prisoner regarding confinement conditions during sentencing was not erroneous because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony would not have been helpful to the jury in determining the appropriate sentence in a sexual assault case; moreover, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony went beyond the scope of any door opened by the State. Klock v. State, 177 S.W.3d 53, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

1745. In an aggravated sexual assault case, a court properly excluded a defense witness's testimony where it described prison life as he had observed it several years before, rather than present prison life, and the court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony was not helpful to determining an appropriate sentence. Zunker v. State, 177 S.W.3d 72, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 320 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

1746. Where defendant was charged with the murder of her ex-boyfriend's new girlfriend, the trial court did not err in admitting into evidence a letter written by defendant to her ex-boyfriend. In the letter, defendant described the intensity of her feelings for him and her concern about the possibility of his philandering. Defendant's statements proved that she had a motive to kill the complainant. Harris v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 346 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 13 2005).

1747. Trial court did not err in admitting into evidence the booking photograph of defendant because the photograph was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, given that defendant asserted self-defense and the photograph was introduced to rebut this claim, and there was no unfair risk of prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the photograph was strongly probative, did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational way, the evidence was addressed for only a brief period of time, and the classification of the photograph as a "booking photograph" did not reveal additional prejudicial facts about defendant. Hajjar v. State, 176 S.W.3d 554, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11824 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

1748. In an indecency with a child case, because intent to satisfy sexual appetite was an element of the crime, the victim's younger sister's testimony that defendant had "french" kissed her when he took her alone for a ride and asked that she not tell anyone was relevant; thus, the trial court properly allowed it. Further, this evidence showing that defendant acted inappropriately with another young girl was highly probative, making the fact of defendant's sexual contact with the victim more probable, gave credibility to the victim's complaint, and diminished defendant's credibility. Mejia v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11615 (Tex. App. Tyler Dec. 22 2004).

1749. Because the trial court did not improperly admit extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) of other acts of sexual misconduct, it did not err in failing to grant the male individual's motion for a new trial. The evidence was probative, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Civ. Evid. 402, of the intent, plan, and scheme of the male individual in reference to the female individual's abuse, the evidence was fair, not misleading, and was helpful to the jury pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, and defendant failed to show harm pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a). Olivarez v. Doe, 164 S.W.3d 427, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11055 (Tex. App. Tyler 2004).

1750. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, a court did not err by excluding a portion of the testimony of an attorney representing the victim's mother who was present at a custody hearing involving the victim because something occurring at the custody hearing had no probative value in showing who committed a sexual assault that occurred a month before the hearing. Additionally, even if the testimony was somehow relevant, the trial court could have reasonably decided that its admission would lead to unfair prejudice, greatly mislead the jury, and confuse the issues with which the jury was presented. Holmes v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10661 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 30 2004).

1751. In the punishment phase of defendant's murder case, autopsy photographs were properly admitted because they supplied complete information regarding the nature of the wounds, that information was helpful to the court in devising an appropriate sentence, and they were probative as to the extent and nature of the injuries. Therefore, the autopsy photographs were relevant and were not unduly prejudicial. Williams v. State, 176 S.W.3d 476, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

1752. Certain OSHA exhibits were properly admitted as they were relevant to the operator's design defect claim, because to establish a design defect in the forklift, the operator bore the burden of establishing there was a safer alternative design for the product, Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 82.005(a)(1). The operator contended the forklift would have been safer had it been designed with a door to hold him in the forklift's compartment as the forklift dropped over the edge of the loading dock, and to counter this claim, the manufacturer was permitted to introduce evidence tending to show that inclusion of a door in the design of the forklift was not a safer alternative design. Costilla v. Crown Equip. Corp., 148 S.W.3d 736, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10163 (Tex. App. Dallas 2004).

1753. In defendant's manslaughter case, the trial judge did not err in excluding evidence that a toxicology report revealed that a passenger had cocaine in her system at the time of her death where the evidence was not relevant because defendant presented no evidence that the driver used drugs on the day of the accident, and the fact that the passenger had cocaine in her system did not mean that the driver in the same car likewise had used cocaine. Tijerina v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9539 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 28 2004).

1754. Photographs of a murder victim related to defendant's prior robbery were not overly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 401 in connection with defendant's murder trial; the photographs were introduced for the purpose of tailoring an appropriate sentence, and the sentence given by the jury contradicted the assertion that the photographs influenced the jury. Toledo v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9596 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 28 2004).

1755. Through testimony, defendant went beyond a simple plea of not guilty and made intent a material issue in defendant's murder trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02, and thus the trial court did not err in finding, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), defendant's prior assault of the victim, committed in the same manner as the charged offense, was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to defendant's intent and to rebut the defensive theory; the substantial similarity between the prior assault and the charged offense rendered the extraneous offense evidence highly probative, which outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403. McCottry v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9432 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 27 2004).

1756. Defendant's blood test results were obtained properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 402 because they tended to make it more probable that defendant was intoxicated at the time he drove because the test results provided evidence that he had consumed alcohol. The jury did not need to establish defendant's exact blood alcohol at the time he drove, rather the jury only needed to believe beyond a reasonable doubt that either his blood alcohol concentration was 0.08 or more, or that he failed to have the normal use of his mental or physical faculties by reason of the introduction of alcohol. Gattis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9284 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 21 2004).

1757. Trial court erred under Tex. R. Evid. 401 in excluding a witness's testimony that the driver of the vehicle in which defendant had been riding when she was arrested had provided the witness with cocaine from a small bottle just like what was found in the vehicle; the evidence would have allowed the jury to infer that the cocaine belonged to the driver, not defendant. The error was not of constitutional dimension under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because defendant was able to present a defense. Ray v. State, 148 S.W.3d 218, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9165 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004), reversed by 178 S.W.3d 833, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1965 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

1758. In an aggravated assault case, a court properly admitted evidence of a witness that she miscarried after jumping out a window because it was relevant to show the witness's physical and emotional state during and following the assault. Smith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9172 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 19 2004).

1759. What training might have been required of other professionals not administering a field sobriety test could not be said to be relevant, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, to the determination of whether defendant was intoxicated, as defined in Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.01(2)(B), and thus the trial court properly sustained the State's relevancy objection to defendant's cross-examination; any improper limitation of cross-examination would have violated Tex. Const. art. I, § 10, and thus it was subject to harmless error analysis, and in this case, even if error occurred, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(a) because any error did not contribute to defendant's conviction of driving while intoxicated, given that two breath tests indicated twice the alcohol concentration of legal intoxication. Bailey v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9143 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 15 2004).

1760. Testimony regarding the dismissal of a charge on an extraneous offense during the punishment phase of defendant's trial for capital murder, where the prosecutor made the comment that a previous case may have been dismissed because of who the victim was, was relevant in that the fact that prosecutors and courts sometimes dismissed cases due to the less than ideal credibility of the victim or identification witness may have aided the jury in deciding whether defendant had committed this unadjudicated offense for which the charge against him was dismissed. Threadgill v. State, 146 S.W.3d 654, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1730 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004), cert. denied, 132 S. Ct. 1095, 181 L. Ed. 2d 984, 2012 U.S. LEXIS 871 (2012).

1761. Deed, when coupled with other testimony concerning the property, rendered more probable the fact that the school district owned the property, and thus the decision to overrule defendant's objection to the admission of the deed on the basis of relevance pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 was not an abuse of discretion in connection with defendant's trial for possessing a controlled substance (cocaine) in a drug-free zone. Johnson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8847 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 1 2004).

1762. Defendant's argument that the trial court erred in admitting the officer's testimony about the manufacture and distribution of Ecstasy in general and specifically about the use of Ecstacy at rave parties were not preserved for appellate review because defendant made a global objection to the testimony claiming that the evidence was not relevant and lacked probative value, defendant failed to point to which objection applied to which portion of the testimony, and failed to identify which topics were admissible, which ones were not and on which particular objection he relied. Galindo v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8834 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 30 2004).

1763. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting autopsy photographs of the victim because the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the photographs, as they corroborated the testimony of a medical examiner, and showed no more than the effect of the wounds upon the victim's body. Davis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7987 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2004).

1764. Substantial evidence pursuant to Tex. Gov't Code Ann. § 2001.174 supported an order of the Public Utility Commission of Texas that raised the fuel factor component of the price-to-beat for an affiliated retail electric provider (AREP) because the Commission linked the measurement of the adequacy of the fuel factor to reflect significant changes in market price and the mechanism to correct inadequacies, and concluded that the New York Mercantile Exchange (NYMEX) was sufficient for both tasks, and because the Commission did not err in barring the order's opponents from presenting relevant evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 401 where evidence regarding the AREP's purchase price and any windfall profits resulting from the fuel-factor adjustment did not bear on whether the NYMEX index had changed the requisite amount. Furthermore, the fuel-factor increase did not violate a set limit on the price-to-beat under Tex. Util. Code Ann. § 39.202 because the adjustments under § 39.202(l) were not limited by § 39.202(p). City of Alvin v. PUC of Tex., 143 S.W.3d 872, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7685 (Tex. App. Austin 2004).

1765. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence that defendant had sexually assaulted another woman approximately three months prior to the instant assault where the state was not allowed to use the extraneous sexual assault evidence until defendant had presented his defensive theory of consent in his testimony. Martin v. State, 144 S.W.3d 29, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7755 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2004), affirmed by 173 S.W.3d 463, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1618 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

1766. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of five extraneous acts in connection with defendant's burglary with intent to commit assault trial in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 30.02(a) because (1) the acts were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), given that (a) they assisted the trier of fact in determining defendant's intent, (b) defendant's intent was a fact of consequence, (c) defendant's previous conduct made it more probable that defendant entered the house with the intent to commit assault, and thus evidence of the conduct was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, (d) defendant made intent a contested issue given defendant's cross-examination of witnesses, and (e) even if the trial court erred in finding that the acts were relevant, the error was harmless by defendant's questioning of a State's witness, and (2) the trial court did not err in finding, under Tex. R. Evid. 403, that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because (a) the evidence was inherently probative because it provided proof of defendant's intent, (b) any potential to impress the jury in some irrational way was minor and not compelling enough to exclude the evidence, (c) the testimony of the acts was limited in comparison to the rest of the State's evidence, and (d) the acts assisted the jurors to determine defendant's intent at the time of the act. Boudreaux v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7562 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 24 2004).

1767. It was within the trial court's discretion to conclude that the excluded evidence, the use of force and injuries defendant suffered in prison in 1999, was not relevant in defendant's criminal case of possession of a deadly weapon in a penal institution; defendant admitted that none of the guards involved in the present criminal case, including the one who allegedly planted the shank, were involved in the civil rights action, and defendant failed to show that any of the guards involved in the instant case had anything to do with the alleged incident in 1999. Shelby v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7186 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 12 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 135, 163 L. Ed. 2d 138, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 7005, 74 U.S.L.W. 3205 (U.S. 2005).

1768. In a capital murder case, a court did not err by admitting bullet fragments where there was a weapon already connected to the crime, there was no dispute that the accomplice had the gun that evening, the fragments recovered from the apartment were similar both in appearance and in chemical composition to those recovered from the victim's body, defendant was admittedly at the apartment once that evening and at the complex a second time, he did not accounted for a sizeable portion of his own time line, and all the jury had to infer was that he and the accomplice test-fired the weapon in contemplation of using it in the robbery. Jacques v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7264 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 12 2004).

1769. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding three autopsy photographs relevant in the culpability phase of defendant's trial for reckless endangerment of a child. The photographs aided the medical examiner in explaining the manner of the child's death; although they depicted horrific wounds on the nude body of the child and were no doubt disturbing to the jurors, they showed how small the child was in comparison to the size of the wounds and teeth marks left by a tiger and illustrated the power and ferocity of the tiger more than any mere verbal description could. Hranicky v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7212 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 12 2004).

1770. Defendant was not entitled to have his murder conviction overturned based on his claim that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because counsel did not object to the introduction of the photographs of the shooting victim, defendant's nephew where such evidence was relevant and defendant did not show that the probative value of such evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. Goodwin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6692 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 23 2004).

1771. Questions of relevance should be left largely to the trial court, relying on its own observations and experience, and will not be reversed absent an abuse of discretion. Day v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Austin July 15 2004).

1772. In a child sexual abuse case, where defendant sought to introduce evidence of letters written by one of the victims, which allegedly discussed sexual topics, to show that the victim was not innocent, a trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to admit the letters since the letters were written after the abuse had occurred. Whitehorn v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6373 (Tex. App. Waco July 14 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 67, 163 L. Ed. 2d 92, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 6247, 74 U.S.L.W. 3203 (U.S. 2005).

1773. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting an expert's testimony as to why victims in general change their minds concerning prosecution of domestic abuse where the testimony was relevant to help the jury understand why the victim initially contacted the police about the assault and then later filed three affidavits of nonprosecution. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5548 (Tex. App. Eastland June 24 2004).

1774. Recovery of the murder weapon and the circumstances surrounding its recovery were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 in connection with defendant's trial for capital murder, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403 that this evidence was not unfairly prejudicial. Avila v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5549 (Tex. App. Eastland June 24 2004).

1775. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that testimony describing the crime scene and pictures showing the crime scene were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 in connection with defendant's trial for capital murder; moreover, because evidence that gang graffiti found near the bodies was not new and was not linked to the murders in the case, the error, if any, in the admission of such evidence was not reversible error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2. Avila v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5549 (Tex. App. Eastland June 24 2004).

1776. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's gang membership or evidence of the victims' gang affiliation in connection with defendant's trial for capital murder because the gangs involved were rivals, defendant had experienced difficulties with the rival gang in the past, the evidence showing gang membership was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to show defendant's motive for the murders, and the trial court could reasonably have determined that the probative value of such evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 or the potential character conformity inference. Avila v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5549 (Tex. App. Eastland June 24 2004).

1777. Trial court did not err in excluding the testimony of a certain witness in connection with defendant's trial for aggravated robbery in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 29.03 because the testimony did not make the existence of any fact that was of consequence to the determination of aggravated robbery more or less probable pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, and thus, the evidence was not relevant and not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402; the testimony did not raise any inference that the officers who testified at trial had a motive to testify falsely. Hadamek

v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5587 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 24 2004).

1778. When an inmate was charged with harassment by persons in certain correctional facilities for throwing urine and feces at two correctional officers, the officers' testimony about how they felt when defendant engaged in this conduct was circumstantial evidence relevant to the element of whether defendant had the intent to harass and alarm and annoy another person, so it could not be said that it was not relevant, under Tex. R. Evid. 401, or admissible, under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Wheatly v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5671 (Tex. App. Waco June 23 2004).

1779. Defendant argued that the trial court erred by excluding evidence relating to his strained marital relationship with the victim because that evidence was probative of his state of mind and motivation at the time of his actions; however, because the only conduct elements potentially implicated for the crime of aggravated assault were the nature of the conduct and the result of the conduct, the circumstances surrounding the conduct were not relevant and were properly excluded. Novillo v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5086 (Tex. App. Austin June 10 2004).

1780. In a possession and manufacture of methamphetamine case, admission of evidence regarding defendant's arrest in another county was proper as issues of who was in care, custody, or control of the clandestine laboratory equipment and the methamphetamine, and of defendant's intent and knowledge, were in dispute, and that he had the same type of equipment used in the manufacture on his own property in the other county was therefore relevant to those issues. Tullos v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5186 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 9 2004).

1781. During the punishment phase of a criminal trial where defendant was charged with endangering a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence from defendant's ex-boyfriend who was convicted of sexually assaulting defendant's daughter since the probative value of the confession was not substantially outweighed by its prejudice. Naivar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4883 (Tex. App. Tyler May 28 2004).

1782. Fact that a witness might have suffered a shoulder injury as a result of the accident did not tend to make the parents' allegation that their son suffered a shoulder injury as a result of the accident more or less probable than it would be without the evidence; thus, the witness's testimony was irrelevant under Tex. Evid. R. 401 and was properly excluded. Therefore, the trial court did not err in denying the parents' motion for a new trial. McGaffigan v. Mora, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4697 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 26 2004).

1783. Relevance of an allegation of sexual assault on a minor made over two years after the one at bar, without more, was extremely minimal, and under those circumstances, the trial court did not err in excluding the evidence. Keith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4450 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 18 2004).

1784. Relevance of an allegation of sexual assault on a minor made over two years after the one at bar, without more, was extremely minimal, and under those circumstances, the trial court did not err in excluding the evidence. Keith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4450 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 18 2004).

1785. In revoking community supervision, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection to a police officer's testimony regarding his conduct in evading arrest by using a vehicle, as the evidence was relevant to sentencing. Cooper v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4334 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 13 2004).

1786. Witness's testimony that defendant discharged a firearm at passing vehicles as defendant fled the scene of an assault was admissible both as evidence of defendant's intent and as same transaction contextual evidence; such evidence was relevant. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4367 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 13

1787. Defendant's convictions and sentences for aggravated sexual assault and sexual assault were confirmed because the trial court, which repeatedly instructed the jury that they could not consider videotapes showing one of defendant's co-defendants abusing a person on two occasions other than the sexual assault, did not err in admitting the videotape. Klock v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4377 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 13 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 177 S.W.3d 53, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

1788. Defendant's convictions and sentences for aggravated sexual assault and sexual assault were confirmed because the trial court did not err by excluding the testimony of an ex-convict as to what the conditions of prison life would be like for defendant and his co-defendants. Klock v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4377 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 13 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 177 S.W.3d 53, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

1789. In defendant's burglary case, although the testimony of the victims regarding illegal drugs taken during the robbery was of only slight probative value, it was relevant for purposes of sentencing because it pertained to the circumstances of the offense, and therefore, the trial court erred by excluding it. In addition, although the victims denied any involvement in drug-related activities, the jury should have been allowed to assess their credibility and demeanor and the jury may have considered those circumstances in assessing defendant's sentence; therefore, the error was harmful. McKaine v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3777 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 29 2004), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 170 S.W.3d 285, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7147 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2005).

1790. Trial court did not err in admitting the victim's testimony about incidents of property damage that were not included in the stalking indictment, which included testimony that someone piled her trash in front of her door, flipped her breaker box, flooded her yard, damaged her yard decorations, pulled down an outside light fixture, cut her satellite cable, and spray-painted her gate, because (1) the evidence was not improper character evidence under Tex. Evid. R. 404(a) as the victim never claimed that defendant committed the acts; and (2) the victim's testimony that the offenses against her property had occurred was relevant to establishing her state of mind at the time of the events in the stalking indictment. Marsh v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3620 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 22 2004).

1791. In defendant's trial for sexual assault on a child, the trial court properly refused to admit evidence about another man who allegedly occasionally visited the child's mother; this evidence was irrelevant. Helton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3391 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 15 2004).

1792. Defendant's argument that the trial court erred in admitting three autopsy photos as being more prejudicial than probative, was overruled because the appellate court could not see how the autopsy photos led to a verdict founded on inappropriate emotions; the photos were graphic, but the appellate court could understand the State's need to fully develop evidence of the manner of death. Torres v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3441 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 15 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 908, 125 S. Ct. 1597, 161 L. Ed. 2d 283, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2298, 73 U.S.L.W. 3530 (2005).

1793. In a sexual assault case, a court properly allowed an expert to testify regarding sexual abuse where, although the State did not tie the testimony to the facts of the case, the testimony was relevant, it had a relatively close association with the evidence, and it was better for the expert not to tie his or her testimony too tightly to the particular child victim, but instead, to limit the import of such testimony to general characteristics and empirically obtained data, so that the jury could draw its own conclusions. Carey v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3188 (Tex.

App. Texarkana Apr. 8, 2004).

1794. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err by admitting the kitchen knife used in the assault into evidence because the knife was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to prove the allegation that defendant used or exhibited a deadly weapon, and was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it did not have an undue tendency to suggest that a decision be made on an improper basis. Hardy v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3214 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 8 2004).

1795. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err permitting the victim's stepfather to testify that he saw defendant in the parking lot of the family's apartment complex a few weeks after the victim made her outcry where that evidence tended to corroborate the victim's testimony and was not, in itself, evidence of misconduct or bad character. The prosecutors' description of defendant as a "sexual predator" was a logical inference from his overall behavior as shown by the victim's testimony. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2878 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 927, 125 S. Ct. 1652, 161 L. Ed. 2d 489, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2556, 73 U.S.L.W. 3556 (2005).

1796. In a firefighter's action alleging intentional failure to implement relief granted to him by a grievance examiner, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence of a demand letter because it was irrelevant. City of Houston v. Jackson, 135 S.W.3d 891, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2942 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004), reversed by 192 S.W.3d 764, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 258, 49 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 492, 152 Lab. Cas. (CCH) P60178 (Tex. 2006).

1797. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit evidence about defendant's prior relationship with a victim in defendant's trial for sexual assault, as an investigation had been conducted, and the investigation of sexual exploitation was determined to be without merit. As such, the evidence was irrelevant. Beckett v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2991 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 125 S. Ct. 2551, 162 L. Ed. 2d 276, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 4535, 73 U.S.L.W. 3709 (U.S. 2005).

1798. In an assault case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to an extraneous assault offense as being not relevant, unfairly prejudicial, and based on hearsay where the evidence was relevant because it tended to make it more probable that the victim's father was a credible witness; without the evidence, the jury was presented with the impression that he was being evasive and that he was racially biased against defendant. The probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by its prejudicial effect because the evidence presented a reason for the witness's feelings toward defendant, and the extraneous offense was not hearsay because it was not offered to prove that defendant had assaulted the victim in the past; rather, the evidence was admitted to prove that the victim's father disapproved of defendant because of his belief that defendant had assaulted the victim in the past. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2775 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 30 2004).

1799. In drug and robbery case, although defendant's relevancy objection to evidence of the other thefts sufficiently apprised the trial court of the nature of his complaint, where defendant did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and obtain a ruling as to whether the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, nor ask for a limiting instruction, defendant waived at trial any complaint over admission of evidence of extraneous thefts. Loftin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2651 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 25 2004).

1800. Tex. R. Evid. 401 definition of relevant evidence is not a perfect fit in the punishment context. Mendoza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2486 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 18 2004).

1801. In a prosecution for murder, the medical records of defendant's shooting victims were properly admitted at the sentencing phase; the medical records were relevant to the circumstances of the murder and provided evidence of bad acts for which defendant could be held criminally responsible. Mendoza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS

2486 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 18 2004).

1802. In a prosecution for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, because the consequential fact in the case was the unauthorized use of the owner's car, that some other car may have been wrecked by the witness at a different time was of no relevance to the issue to be decided. Thus, there was no error in excluding a picture of the other car. Kirksey v. State, 132 S.W.3d 49, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2448 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2004).

1803. In trial for the aggravated kidnapping of a two-year-old girl, the trial court's decision to admit the evidence about defendant purchasing a condom the night before the kidnapping was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. The evidence about defendant's condom purchase tended to make the existence of a material fact, that defendant had planned to sexually assault the victim during the kidnapping, more probable than it would have been without the evidence; thus, the evidence was relevant and admissible. Howe v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2417 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 16 2004).

1804. In a prosecution for intentionally and knowingly causing serious bodily injury to a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.04, evidence that defendant had personal knowledge that his girlfriend, the child's mother, had a fight with her sister and that anger management classes resulted did not appear to meet the relevance test of Tex. R. Evid. 401; further, defendant failed to reveal the "meaningful" defense that he was deprived of presenting by virtue of the excluded evidence. Ortiz v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2246 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 11 2004).

1805. Trial court's evidentiary rulings were not an abuse of discretion, as the evidence admitted in a dialysis service provider's action against a self-insurer, seeking recovery for services rendered, was relevant to the claims made by each party pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401; other payment plans, other providers' acceptance of the rates provided by Blue Cross, and other lawsuits filed by the provider were relevant to the reasonable value of the services rendered under the provider's quantum meruit claim. H.E. Butt Grocery Co. v. Rencare, Ltd., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1005 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 4 2004).

1806. In a probate proceeding where the testator's wife contested the testator's daughter inventory of property, the first exhibit the daughters sought to admit into evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401; without either that exhibit or the second exhibit in evidence before the trial court, the trial court could not determine the community property agreement's validity and whether the agreement was enforceable, which were both issues of consequence to the determination of the declaratory judgment action. Haugen v. Olson, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10495 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 15 2003).

1807. In a sexual assault case, a court did not err by refusing to admit entries from the victim's diary, because the diary contained no reference to the sexual assault and the entries were not relevant, except as an effort to show a general untruthful character. West v. State, 121 S.W.3d 95, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 8506 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

1808. In a sexual assault case, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit a diary entry of the victim at trial because the diary entry, describing a kiss with a boy at school, lacked probative value. West v. State, 121 S.W.3d 95, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 8506 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

1809. Testimony of a witness that a defendant stated that if he found out who helped his wife move out of their apartment, he was going to kill that person, was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to show the defendant's mental state a few days prior to the commission of a murder; the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because its prejudicial effect was related to its probative value rather than to an unrelated matter. Saxer v. State, 115 S.W.3d 765, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 7512 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2003).

1810. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence that a defendant ingested methamphetamine shortly before a murder was committed because the jury could have inferred from the evidence that the defendant's reasoning was altered, the evidence was offered to show the defendant's mental state rather than as character evidence, and the trial court engaged in a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test and did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence. Saxer v. State, 115 S.W.3d 765, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 7512 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2003).

1811. Trial court did not err in admitting the consumer's expert's testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 702 in connection with a products liability case; the expert properly focused the examination on the finished product, and thus the analysis of the composition of the final product was sufficiently tied to the facts of the case so that it aided the jury in resolving the factual dispute and thus was relevant. Johnson Controls Battery Group, Inc. v. Runnels, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10956 (Tex. App. Tyler May 21 2003).

1812. In a capital murder trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.03(a), the trial court did not err in admitting the expert testimony of an FBI agent because the agent's testimony was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to rebut defendant's defensive theory of insanity. Resendiz v. State, 112 S.W.3d 541, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 97 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003), cert. denied, Resendiz v. Texas, 541 U.S. 1032, 124 S. Ct. 2098, 158 L. Ed. 2d 713, 2004 U.S. LEXIS 3274 (2004).

1813. Videotape that was offered as evidence about "the system" and was not offered as information about the capital defendant, or about how the capital defendant might be handled, was not relevant evidence that was admissible during the proceedings against the capital defendant; Tex. R. Evid. 401 defines relevant evidence as evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Sells v. State, 121 S.W.3d 748, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 63 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003), cert. denied, 540 U.S. 986, 124 S. Ct. 511, 2003 U.S. LEXIS 8067 (2003).

1814. There were sufficient similarities between aggravated robbery with a deadly weapon, the offense with which defendant was charged, and the extraneous offenses of aggravated sexual assault/aggravated kidnapping and kidnapping, to uphold the trial court's determination that the extraneous offense evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 404(b). Booker v. State, 103 S.W.3d 521, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 611 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

1815. In making the initial determination of admissibility of evidence, Texas courts must apply the principles set forth in the evidentiary rules governing relevancy under Tex. R. Evid. 401- 403; to meet the relevancy test, the proffered evidence must, first, have probative value, and second, be of consequence to some issue in the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Ramsey v. Reagan, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 276 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 16 2003).

1816. Trial court properly excluded evidence of a witness's mental health problems under Tex. R. Evid. 401 where there was no reasonable logical nexus connecting the ability of the witness to observe the details of an assault and communicate those details to the police and the witness's mental health problems. The evidence concerning the mental health problems of the witness was therefore not relevant. Goodwin v. State, 91 S.W.3d 912, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8455 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

1817. Although plaintiffs claimed that the information requested, which the company claimed was a trade secret, was relevant, they had to show more; a plaintiff must also show the information is necessary for a fair adjudication of their claims. Schmidt v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28596 (E.D. Tex. July 31 2002).

1818. Subject to certain exceptions, all relevant evidence is admissible in a criminal prosecution under Tex. R. Evid. 402, and 401; "relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Haliburton v. State, 80 S.W.3d 309, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4822 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

1819. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence that the two men, who defendant was with when he was arrested, were involved in a robbery a short time before the arrest, because it was within the zone of reasonable disagreement whether the robbery was so intertwined with the stop and arrest that the jury's understanding of the offense would have been obscured without it. Haliburton v. State, 80 S.W.3d 309, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4822 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

1820. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting testimony, in defendant's trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 7.01(a) and Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 7.02(a)(2) for being a party to his wife's murder, as to defendant's statement regarding researching how to make a silencer for a gun on the ground that it was relevant to a fact of consequence as set forth in Tex. R. Evid. 401. Guevara v. State, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 8520 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 26 2001), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 103 S.W.3d 549, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 960 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2003).

1821. According to the rules of evidence, relevant evidence means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Pack v. Crossroads, Inc., 53 S.W.3d 492, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 5061 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2001).

1822. Evidence of defendant's prior history of sexual assault against a child victim was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 as "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37. McCulloch v. State, 39 S.W.3d 678, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 1327 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2001).

1823. Defendant's death sentence for capital murder was vacated where the probative value of the admission of a photograph under Tex. R. Evid. 401 of the victim in her casket was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Reese v. State, 33 S.W.3d 238, 2000 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 108 (Tex. Crim. App. 2000).

1824. Officer's testimony that the quantity of marijuana recovered from the defendant's vehicle indicated that it was possessed for resale rather than for personal use was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 401. Gallegos v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 5042 (Tex. App. Dallas July 9 1999).

1825. Where defendant was convicted of sexual assault, trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 in admitting testimony from the victim and his sister of the effect of the assault on the victim; testimony of an inflammatory or sympathetic nature will not bar its admissibility if it is relevant to the issue at trial, and the issue need not be contested. Ranels v. State, 1996 Tex. App. LEXIS 2867 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 20 1996).

1826. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 402, finding a piece of evidence to be relevant is the first step in a trial court's determination of whether the evidence should be admitted before the jury. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

1827. In defendant's trial on two counts of indecency with a child, testimony from defendant's ex-wife that defendant occasionally paraded around in front of his minor daughters, the complainants, in the nude with an erection was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and, thus, admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402, and its prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the State had to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant had contact with the complainants and the contact was done for his sexual gratification, and because the evidence was relevant to prove sexual motive in as much as the manner that defendant acted around his own children was the only proof of defendant's possible sexual motive if the touching did in fact occur. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

1828. Relevancy is defined to be that which conduces to the proof of a pertinent hypothesis--a pertinent hypothesis being one which, if sustained would logically influence the issue. Hence it is relevant to put in evidence any circumstance which tends to make the proposition at issue more or less probable. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

1829. In deciding whether a particular piece of evidence is relevant, a trial court judge should ask whether a reasonable person, with some experience in the real world, would believe that a particular piece of evidence is helpful in determining the truth or falsity of any fact that is of consequence to the lawsuit. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

1830. Once a proponent of an item of evidence shows that the evidence is logically relevant to some issue in the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, it is admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 unless the opponent of the evidence demonstrates that it should be excluded because of some other provision, whether constitutional, statutory, or evidentiary. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

1831. Court properly admitted autopsy photos because, although they were gruesome, they were no more gruesome than the injuries that defendant inflicted upon the victim when he committed the offense of intoxication manslaughter. Each of the six photographs depicted a different view of the victim and showed the different injuries that she suffered, and the State did not offer a large number of photographs, nor were the photographs it offered cumulative of the victim's injuries. Booth v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2351, 2014 WL 887286 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 28 2014).

1832. As a police officer had reasonable suspicion to detain defendant based upon the information in the NCIC system, such that ownership of the vehicle was not relevant to the detention, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence regarding the actual ownership of the vehicle that defendant was in when he was stopped. Thornton v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2273, 2014 WL 813745 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 27 2014).

1833. During defendant's trial for DWI, the court erred in admitting evidence of a passenger's possession of marijuana and possession of drug paraphernalia because the State failed to explain how evidence of the passenger's drug possession made it more probable that defendant was intoxicated. Brewer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1992, 2014 WL 709549 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 21 2014).

Evidence : Relevance : Routine Practices

1834. In a case in which a client sued an attorney and a law firm for breach of fiduciary duty, fraud, negligence (legal malpractice), and negligent misrepresentation, which was premised on the contention that the trial judge in the underlying action did not tell the attorney the parties would be limited to five days to try the case, the equal inference rule did not apply, and the trial court erred in granting no-evidence summary judgment on that ground because the record as a whole contained sufficient circumstantial evidence to enable a reasonable juror to infer that the alleged conversation in which the judge told the attorney he would limit trial time did not occur. The judge's testimony that it was his habit or practice not to limit the time to try a case, not to engage in substantive conversations about a case with only one side, and not to discuss pending cases in social settings, was evidence tending to make it less probable the purported conversation with the attorney occurred, and the pretrial history of the underlying litigation, together with the judge's testimony, taken as a whole and viewed in the light most favorable to the client, was sufficient to raise a fact issue on whether the judge made the alleged comment to the attorney. Total Clean, Llc v. Cox Smith Matthews, Inc., 330 S.W.3d 657, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8369 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 20 2010).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : General Overview

1835. At defendant's criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, a witness was permitted to testify that defendant said that he had given the victim a vaginal exam; Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not apply, because the testimony was not about an extraneous act or offense. Since the testimony constituted evidence that defendant admitted touching the victim's sexual organ, it was not more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Babineaux v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3632, 2011 WL 1833123 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2011).

1836. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401 in determining that defendant could not cross-examine the mother of the victims as to the details of a prior sexual assault she allegedly suffered as a child. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9524, 2010 WL 4901389 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 30 2010).

1837. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 401 objection to a family counselor's testimony because the evidence was relevant, as the counselor's testimony identified some behavioral manifestations of sexual abuse and how the victim exhibited some of those behaviors. Berzley v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6463, 2010 WL 3159875 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 11 2010).

1838. There was no abuse of discretion in allowing the testimony of the State's expert, a clinical supervisor and therapist, regarding the effects of sexual abuse on children, because the expert's generic testimony was connected to the facts of the case through the complainant's testimony, and the admission of the testimony, if erroneous, did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict. Bullock v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8872, 2009 WL 3838861 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 18 2009).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Rape Shield Laws

1839. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by precluding defense counsel from asking a witness whether she saw the child victim play with her sexual organs based on Tex. R. Evid. 412 because the testimony was not enough to make it probable that a three-year-old child masturbating in some vague way two days before the assault caused the presence of physical trauma two days later. In addition, the incomplete information was of minimal probative value, even if relevant. Turner v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12690, 2013 WL 5614311 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 10 2013).

1840. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because, with regard to the victim's alleged prior sexual behavior, other than her involvement, there was no similarity between those incidents and the current allegations against defendant currently, Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, and 412(b). Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Crimes : General Overview

1841. In a trial for child sexual assault, testimony about extraneous acts was properly admitted from a complainant, defendant's stepdaughter, because the testimony concerning two sexual encounters was relevant, under Tex. R. Evid. 401, as to defendant's intent to engage in the charged offenses and the states of mind of defendant and the stepdaughter. Miller v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6227 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 4 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Crimes : Child Molestation Cases

1842. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a case in which defendant was convicted of continuous sexual abuse of a child, his two daughters, by allowing evidence of computer searches for child pornography on defendant's laptop because the complained-of testimony showed that defendant viewed the father-daughter relationship as a sexual one; his viewing of child pornography, particularly father-daughter pornography, was relevant circumstantial evidence of his intent to arouse or gratify his sexual desire. Watkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1512, 2013 WL 531062 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 14 2013).

1843. In a trial for indecency with a child by contact there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, in admitting evidence of prior convictions for attempting the same offense. The evidence was relevant to defendant's intent in the charged interaction. Hernandez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 851, 2010 WL 391850 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 5 2010).

Evidence : Relevance : Spoliation

1844. Employee who claimed sexual harassment was not entitled to a spoliation instruction as to two computer hard drives that were destroyed 11 months before and the month of her termination; she failed to show that the hard drives contained material or relevant information. She failed to identify a single document that she suspected was altered or explain the factual basis for her suspicions; when deposing the authors of the documents, she did not investigate the falsification allegations. Hunicke v. Seafarers Int'l Union, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6794 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 4 2013).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : General Overview

1845. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a forensic chemist's testimony regarding the results of gunshot residue tests on the ground that the tests were administered too long after the shooting to be reliable because the trial court was entitled to accept the testimony before it and determine that the test was reliable; the expert testified that the gunshot residue test was reliable after four hours but that the state of the evidence may have degraded; the trial court also knew the details of the testing performed on the four individuals, with the ultimate results consistent with the testimony concerning the test methodology; even if the admission was in error, it was harmless error, given the overwhelming evidence in the case and the fact that the testimony concerning the gunshot residue was not emphasized and was not crucial to defendant's conviction. Saunders v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3383 (Tex. App. Austin May 8 2008).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Autopsies

1846. Probative value of the two autopsy photographs substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice because defendant stated that he did not intentionally hurt the six-year-old child, but the medical examiner testified that neither of the two fatal injuries that the child sustained could have been caused accidentally or unintentionally; and the extent of the child's brain injury could not be determined from looking at the outside of his head. West v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9612 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 1 2013).

1847. In a murder trial, there was no error in admitting autopsy photographs because they were highly probative to show the full extent of the victim's injuries and portrayed no more than the gruesomeness of the injuries inflicted. Salazar v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4983, 2012 WL 2357744 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 21 2012).

1848. Trial court did not err in admitting a color photograph of a murder victim taken at her autopsy, which depicted a side shot of her from the neck up and showed a placard placed beside her body bearing a unique autopsy number, because the photo was not gruesome, and because the State needed to identify the person in the photo as that of the victim. The probative value of the photo was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Bibbs v. State, 371 S.W.3d 564, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4677, 2012 WL 2135561 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 13 2012).

1849. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting an autopsy photograph depicting a murder victim's brain after it was removed from his body where the photograph had probative value because it showed the extent of the victim's injury and helped the jury understand how blunt force trauma-which other evidence showed came in the form of defendant's having kicked the victim in the head-caused the victim's death. Because the photograph had probative value and was not unnecessarily gruesome, the danger of unfair prejudice does did outweigh its probative value. Malone v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8602, 2011 WL 5118820 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 27 2011).

1850. In a murder trial involving a child victim, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 in admitting an autopsy photograph because it demonstrated the scope and extent of the child's injuries and the cause of death. It was not cumulative because it showed injuries to the victim's neck and head from a side view, whereas two other photographs showed injuries from a frontal view. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1045 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

1851. Under Tex. R. Evid. 103(a) and Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), a murder defendant waived the argument that autopsy photos were not relevant because an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not preserve error under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Williams v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6397 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 9 2007).

1852. Trial court properly admitted autopsy photographs of a murder victim because they did no more than visually depict what the medical examiner's testimony had already described, which was that the victim died of multiple gunshot wounds, and the probative value of the autopsy photographs was not substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect because they were neither gruesome nor unnecessarily graphic, and because minimal time was spent on actually introducing the photographs following the medical examiner's testimony. While the manner of the victim's death was not disputed, the circumstances surrounding it were disputed, and the photographs lent visual support to the witnesses' description of those events. Johnson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6256 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 8 2007).

1853. In an assault trial, it was proper to admit an autopsy photo of a child victim in a manslaughter conviction alleged for enhancement; although the photograph may have been disturbing, it depicted nothing more than the reality of the crime committed; it was therefore relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and any danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid 403. Aragon v. State, 229 S.W.3d 716, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 871 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

1854. In a murder trial, autopsy photographs showing a fatal cut in the victim's neck did not have to be excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 401, even though identity and cause of death were undisputed, because the photographs were relevant to defendant's disputed claim of self-defense and, although gruesome, depicted nothing more than the nature of the victim's injuries. Hernandez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10395 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 6 2006).

1855. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401, autopsy photographs were properly admitted in a murder trial because there was some probative value in helping the jury understand the nature of the victim's wounds and they helped to show that the victim was shot in the back, an issue that was relevant to defendant's claim of self defense. Davila v. State,

2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5230 (Tex. App. Dallas June 20 2006).

1856. In a trial for attempted murder, it was proper to admit an autopsy report regarding a different victim, which included details about the angle of the wound and photographs of the body. The evidence was relevant because it tended to refute defendant's argument that someone else shot the victim. Adams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8999 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 12 2004).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Blood Alcohol

1857. Blood test results were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 in a trial for intoxication manslaughter, even if no one specifically tied the presence of amphetamine and methamphetamine in defendant's blood to lack of normal use, because the failure of proof would not render the evidence irrelevant but insufficient. Dunn v. State, 176 S.W.3d 880, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8334 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Blood & Bodily Fluids

1858. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting into evidence several items of bloody clothing worn by the victim; although defendant pleaded guilty, the evidence of the victim's extensive bleeding was properly admitted because it indicated the gravity of defendant's crime and was relevant to assessing punishment. Cervantez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1949 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 15 2005).

1859. Testimony regarding a physician's ability to detect semen on clothing versus skin was properly admitted in a child sexual assault trial. Whether sperm was found on the victim's skin or clothing and a physician's method of viewing and collecting sperm directly related to physical evidence that would make guilt or innocence more or less probable. Croft v. State, 148 S.W.3d 533, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8398 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Daubert Standard

1860. Evidence of juvenile appellant's negative drug test was properly found to be unreliable where his probation officer failed to test his urine sample for adulterants that could produce a false negative because she was out of the necessary supplies. Furthermore, the evidence had low probative value to rebut appellant's marijuana possession charge and was outweighed by the risk of jury confusion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because an undercover officer testified that he saw appellant take approximately two puffs from a marijuana cigar, and appellant's expert testified that if appellant had only smoked such a small amount of marijuana, there was only a 15 percent chance that he would have tested positive for marijuana on a urinalysis test. In re J.A.C., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4519 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 14 2005).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : DNA

1861. Defendant's motion to suppress the DNA evidence was properly denied because there was sufficient authentication evidence through the victim's sexual assault kit's markings and witness testimony showing that the kit was what it purported to be, and there was no affirmative evidence that the victim's samples were commingled, altered, or tampered with prior to their submission for DNA testing in April 2003. Dossett v. State, 216 S.W.3d 7, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7428 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

1862. Defendant's convictions for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. §§ 21.11(a)(1), 22.021(a)(B)(iii)-(iv), 22.021(a)(2)(A)(ii) (Supp. 2004-05) were affirmed because the trial court did not err in admitting DNA evidence found on the victim because the location of defendant's DNA was consistent with the victim's account of the attack and the DNA evidence was clearly relevant in determining the credibility of the victim's accusation. Also, the DNA evidence was not unfairly prejudicial because it provided circumstantial proof of the offense charged; and the State's need for the evidence was great because there were no witnesses that could disprove defendant's contention that his DNA was innocently transferred onto the victim, but the discovery of his DNA on top of a fresh bruise served to dispute his theory. Rivera v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3997 (Tex. App. Austin May 26 2005).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Sobriety Tests

1863. In a driving while intoxicated case, a court erred in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the arresting officer with a field sobriety test manual concerning the horizontal gaze nystagmus test because the portion of the manual regarding whether optokinetic nystagmus, which was not caused by alcohol consumption, might be caused by watching quickly moving objects was relevant. Howell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5343 (Tex. App. Austin June 23 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7558 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25, 2006).

1864. Trial court did not err in admitting defendant's intoxilyzer test results into evidence in the absence of retrograde extrapolation evidence on defendant's claim that the results were irrelevant under Rule 401 because the results of breath tests were relevant without retrograde extrapolation evidence. Trillo v. State, 165 S.W.3d 763, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2792 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

1865. Exclusion of an intoxilyzer test result was an abuse of discretion because: (1) the intoxilyzer results were probative of intoxication under both the per se and impairment definitions of intoxication; (2) the results were not unfairly prejudicial because the evidence related directly to the charged driving while intoxicated offense; and (3) for the same reason, a jury could not be distracted away from the charged offense regardless of the required time to present the results. State v. Mechler, 153 S.W.3d 435, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 5 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Toxicology

1866. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the results of the blood test showing that defendant had a prescription drug in his system because the evidence was relevant during defendant's driving under the influence trial, as it assisted the jury in determining whether defendant's intoxication was due to the drug. Armstrong v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2041, 2012 WL 864778 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 15 2012).

1867. Where defendant was charged with intoxication manslaughter and aggravated assault following a vehicular accident, the State's chemist was permitted to give expert testimony concerning the presence of a cocaine metabolite in defendant's blood and the effect of cocaine withdrawal; the evidence was relevant to the State's theory that defendant was fatigued and sleepy, because he was suffering withdrawal from cocaine. Bannister v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8522 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 29 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : General Overview

1868. Defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated was proper because the statutory-warning form did not constitute improper "bolstering" of the officer's earlier testimony. Although the form confirmed the officer's testimony that defendant had refused to provide a blood sample and had refused to sign the form, it also contained the statutory warnings themselves, a physical description of defendant, identifying information such as defendant's date of birth and driver's license number, and information concerning the date and time of the alleged offense. Condarco v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10741 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 27 2013).

1869. On a charge of unlawful possession of a firearm, the trial court properly did not allow defendant to impeach the State's witness by explaining that the witness testified to the same effect in an earlier trial arising from the same events and that the prior jury found that defendant did assault the witness. The court reasoned in part that the prior jury's finding was not relevant. Macias v. State, 136 S.W.3d 702, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4193 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : Specific Instances

1870. Defendant did not point to any evidence that the victim's mother hit the victim order to get the victim to lie about being sexually assaulted; evidence that the mother had allegedly hit the victim, without more, was irrelevant to the mother's veracity. Coleman v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6691, 2014 WL 2809064 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 19 2014).

1871. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for the Class A misdemeanor offense of assault causing bodily injury in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant regarding past accusations of spousal abuse where the complainant's character for truthfulness was not attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise as required by Tex. R. Evid. 608; instead, during cross-examination, defendant attempted to inquire into prior accusations of abuse that the complainant made against her ex-husband for the purpose of attacking the complainant's credibility, and, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, Tex. R. Evid. 402, Tex. R. Evid. 608, the probative value of the evidence sought to be admitted was extremely low, particularly because defense counsel admitted during trial that he had no evidence that the complainant lied about the abuse and that the accusations occurred a long time ago. Sullivan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1394 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2008).

1872. In a sexual assault case, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit a diary entry of the victim at trial because the diary entry, describing a kiss with a boy at school, lacked probative value. West v. State, 121 S.W.3d 95, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 8506 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bias, Motive & Prejudice

1873. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defense counsel's relevance objection to a question posed to defendant's girlfriend regarding whether members of the Nigerian community generally preferred to handle themselves matters that were otherwise appropriate for law enforcement because it was relevant to the question of whether defendant's witnesses were biased against the State. Agbogwe v. State, 414 S.W.3d 820, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 29 2013).

1874. In a criminal prosecution for misdemeanor driving while intoxicated, the trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias. The issues defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hasty or jump to conclusions at the crime scene without conducting a proper investigation. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : General Overview

1875. During defendant's trial for indecent exposure, the trial court properly excluded evidence that the victim called the police regarding various disturbances at her residence on several occasions following the report of exposure because the decision was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; the trial court maintained broad discretion to impose reasonable limits on cross-examination to avoid harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, endangering the witness, and the injection of cumulative and collateral evidence, and, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), specific instances of conduct, other than conviction of a crime, when offered to attack the witness's credibility could not be explored on cross-examination. Tennison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2120 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 16 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : Inadmissibility

1876. Because defendant presented no evidence showing the relevance of the witness's prior misdemeanor conviction or the circumstances surrounding his alleged dismissal from the sheriff's department, the trial court did not err by limiting her cross-examination of him. Sheffield v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12789, 2013 WL 5638878 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 15 2013).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Mental Incapacity

1877. In a sexual assault of a child case, the evidence of the victim's emotional problems was not relevant or admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 as the evidence could not be used to impeach her because there was no suggestion that her emotional problems could impair her ability to recall events or would compromise her credibility. Lester v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9728, 2011 WL 6238157 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 14 2011).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Conduct

1878. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of two witnesses concerning the victim's prior sexual history because it did not make it more or less probable that defendant touched the victim's breast and therefore was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. In addition, the evidence was properly excluded because it was an attempt to impeach the victim through the inquiry of specific instance of conduct, which was improper under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8246, 2012 WL 4497999 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 28 2012).

1879. In defendant's trial for four counts of sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by refusing to admit evidence of specific instances of conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) to show that the victim's father had also been indicted for aggravated sexual assault of a child. For purposes of relevance under Tex. R. Evid. 401, defendant failed to show how the offense made more probable the existence of any motive, bias, or interest on the part of the witness; in fact, the evidence posed a risk of confusing or misleading the jury. Harris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9999 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 16 2010).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Inconsistent Statements

1880. Trial court erred by admitting into evidence a letter that was written to her while she was in jail because the letter was not relevant to defendant's capital murder trial, as the letter, sent to defendant by a man, living in another state and whom she had never met, outlining his sexual desires and fantasies with defendant and other women, did not tend to make anything as to defendant, much less her sexual orientation or whether she committed sexual assault, any more or less probable. Abdygapparova v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5806 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 25 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : General Overview

1881. Although a driver had the right under U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1 and Tex. Const. art. I, § 19 to cross-examine the officer who arrested him for driving while intoxicated after he was involved in an auto accident, the administrative law judge (ALJ) who suspended his driver's license was within her discretion to limit questioning on relevancy grounds pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 because the record showed that when the officer was asked by the ALJ if he had taken the driver's driving and possible culpability in causing the accident into consideration for probable cause to arrest him, the officer responded negatively. Because the officer did not take the fault of the accident into consideration in determining probable cause for intoxication, the issue was irrelevant. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Burrer, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3534 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 11 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Cross-Examination : General Overview

1882. Court did not abuse its discretion by not allowing the patient's counsel to pose certain questions, because counsel provided an extensive cross-examination of the doctor concerning his opinion that the patient had a behavioral abnormality that made him likely to commit a predatory act of sexual violence, and courts were allowed discretion to control testimony to avoid confusing the jury. In re Romo, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13495 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2013).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Cross-Examination : Scope

1883. In a drug trial, there was no error in limiting defendant's cross-examination of a detective as to (1) payments made to an informant who was admittedly in the country illegally, (2) whether or not those payments were reported to the Internal Revenue Service, and (3) whether or not the detective sought or received permission from federal authorities to have the informant in the country working as an agent of law enforcement. Defendant failed to show how the evidence sought was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, to the claimed purpose of showing bias and a motive to lie. Perez-gonzalez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3045, 2010 WL 1645062 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 26 2010).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : General Overview

1884. Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of defendant's expert as irrelevant as to whether the trooper was lawfully discharging an official duty when defendant drove at him because the expert's opinion regarding the justification for the use of force was not based on any information regarding the trooper's encounter with defendant. Ramos v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6818 (Tex. App. Austin June 26 2014).

1885. In a sexual assault case, the jury was to determine whether defendant penetrated the child's sexual organ and an expert properly relied on a case study to support his opinion that penetration of the child's sexual organ could have occurred even in the absence of physical evidence of penetration; therefore, the discussion of the study served to make the fact of penetration more probable in light of the expert's medical examination findings. Allen v. State, 436 S.W.3d 815, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6465, 2014 WL 2619438 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 13 2014).

1886. Medical records were properly excluded in a medical malpractice action because no expert testified that the child's twin's records were significant to an opinion on the cause of the child's death or the standard of care, the expert did not list the twin's records among the records he had reviewed in formulating his opinions, nor did he discuss the twin's hospitalization in his testimony. Woodard v. Sherwood, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11923 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 23 2013).

1887. Relevancy objection was properly overruled pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 702 in a case involving sexual abuse of a child because defense counsel had previously cross-examined the nurse practitioner about her experience with false allegations of sexual abuse and circumstances involving the absence of physical findings; thus, the redirect of the nurse practitioner regarding statistics of confirmed cases of sexual abuse where there were no physical findings was relevant. Cortez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5854, 2010 WL 2889670 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 22 2010).

1888. In a wrongful death action in which respondents alleged that a halogen lamp, purchased from a retailer, caused a fire, the testimony of respondents' expert was legally insufficient to support causation. While the expert lay a general foundation for the dangers of halogen lamps, the expert's specific causation theory amounted to little more than speculation. Wal-mart Stores, Inc. v. Merrell, 313 S.W.3d 837, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 447, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 869 (Tex. 2010).

1889. In a driving while intoxicated case, evidence of defendant's use of prescription medications was not relevant because there was no evidence as to the dosage, the exact times of ingestion, or the half-life of the drug; a lay juror was not in a position to determine whether the drugs, taken more than 12 hours before arrest, would have any effect on defendant's intoxication. Without expert testimony to provide the foundation required to admit scientific evidence, the testimony regarding defendant's use of prescription medications was not relevant. Layton v. State, 280 S.W.3d 235, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 149 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1890. In a suit challenging a real estate tax assessment, the trial court properly allowed expert testimony from the taxpayer's appraiser. The testimony was relevant, within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 702 because the appraiser found a reasonable number of comparable properties, made appropriate adjustments, and compared the median appraisal value of those properties to the appraisal value applied to the property at issue, as required by Tex. Tax Code § 42.26. Harris County Appraisal v. Hartman Reit Operating P'ship, L.P., 186 S.W.3d 155, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

1891. In an action arising from a car fire, a verdict against car manufacturer was reversed because there was no evidence that the fire and death were caused by a defect that allowed gas to siphon from the fuel system. The difficulty was that there were significant conflicts in and between testimony by plaintiff's two experts as to nature of the leak, one of whom opined that gasoline had siphoned from the rear hose but offered no basis; opinion testimony that was conclusory or speculative was not relevant evidence. GMC v. Iracheta, 161 S.W.3d 462, 2005 Tex. LEXIS 304, 48 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 529, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17372 (Tex. 2005).

1892. Judgment in favor of property owner and surface lessee and sublessee was reversed because their expert's opinion that the mineral lessee and seismic company's employee started a barn fire by carelessly disposing of a cigarette was based entirely on assumptions and was not supported by evidence. The expert's testimony was conclusory and speculative, thus it was not relevant evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 401. W. Atlas Int'l v. Randolph, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2199 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 24 2005).

1893. Affidavits of expert witnesses offered in support of homeowners' motion against summary judgment in an action seeking losses for a house fire failed to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, 702, and 703, as the testimony was a pyramid of inferences lacking probative force because it was based on assumed facts that varied from the actual undisputed facts. Rayon v. Energy Specialties, Inc., 121 S.W.3d 7, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9160 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Admissibility

1894. Expert's deposition testimony and accompanying report did not constitute admissible evidence, because the deposition testimony and report were conclusory and lacked indicia of reliability. Schronk v. Laerdal Med. Corp., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9916 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 8 2013).

1895. In a trial of inmate's civil commitment as a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.062, the trial court properly excluded the inmate's expert's testimony that one of the victims had recanted pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 702, because such evidence represented a collateral attack on the underlying convictions, which had not been set aside. In re Barron, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8495, 2013 WL 3487385 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 11 2013).

1896. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault and endangering a child in permitting a State witness to testify as an expert witness where the witness's expertise fit with the subject matter at issue, which was whether the damages to the victims' vehicles were consistent with their accounts of how the damage occurred. The witness had seventeen years of experience in the automotive industry and thirteen years of experience as an estimator for damaged vehicles, and his testimony did not involve a complex subject, but rather consisted of matching up paint transfer and damages to the victims' vehicles with damages to defendant's truck. Ibarra v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 169, 2013 WL 123705 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 10 2013).

1897. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of the sexual assault nurse examiner who examined the child victim during the course of the State's investigation because she was deemed an expert in sexual abuse examinations, so her expert testimony could be helpful to the jury, including to explain why physical evidence would not necessarily be present on the body of a sexual assault complainant. The nurse merely reported the events of the examination and her clinical findings, and she did not offer an opinion as to whether the victim had been sexually assaulted and did not comment on the victim's veracity. Owens v. State, 381 S.W.3d 696, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7922, 2012 WL 4098990 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 19 2012).

1898. Court properly allowed an expert witness to testify about the similarity of physical evidence recovered from the crime scene because the tapes from the crime scene and defendant's home were offered to show that because the tapes were similar, it was more likely that they came from a common source, and if they came from a common source, it was more likely that the tape in defendant's home came from the packaging for the marijuana in the murder victim's home. The testimony showed the similarities of the tapes and was therefore relevant to show that defendant was at the crime scene and had a motive for shooting the victims. Robinson v. State, 368 S.W.3d 588, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483, 2012 WL 593558 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

1899. In the proceeding to commit respondent as a sexually violent predator (SVP), the trial court did not abuse its discretion by restricting respondent's cross-examination of one of the State's experts, because the doctor's subjective feelings concerning the verdict in respondent's attempted aggravated sexual assault case was not a fact of consequence in respondent's SVP case for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401. Respondent could not challenge the facts of his final convictions in the SVP proceeding, and attempted aggravated sexual assault of a child was one of his predicate convictions under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002(8)(A). In re Dees, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9807 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 15 2011).

1900. Property owners' expert's testimony was properly admitted because the expert's opinion was that the owners' property flooded because of an increase in elevation of the development relative to the owners' property; that testimony was neither speculative nor otherwise unreliable. The expert specifically testified the increase in elevation altered historical surface water drainage patterns, and his testimony was based on his own visual inspection of the property where he noted diversions from the historical drainage patterns due to increases in elevation, as well as a drainage area map used by the company that constructed the development. Marin Real Estate Partners., L.P. v. Vogt, 373 S.W.3d 57, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9259, 2011 WL 5869520 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 23 2011).

1901. Property owners' appraiser's testimony was properly admitted because the appraiser specifically stated he developed his estimate based on the one-acre tract as a property independent from the nineteen-acre tract. To develop his estimate, he researched comparable sales in an attempt to find the best comparison possible and he also prepared his appraisal using the "highest and best use" analysis, which required the appraiser to consider what was the potential best use for the property being appraised. Marin Real Estate Partners., L.P. v. Vogt, 373 S.W.3d 57, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9259, 2011 WL 5869520 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 23 2011).

1902. In a case involving the civil commitment of a sexually violent predator, to the extent that a patient complained about the foundational data used by experts in reaching their opinions, the complaint was not preserved for appellate review because no objection was made to the use of records or actuarial tests. To the extent that the patient challenged the expert opinions as baseless and not relevant, the testimony of the experts was not conclusory or speculative; the experts testified that they based their opinions on the facts and date gathered from the records they reviewed, their interviews with the patient, the risk assessment conducted, and the actuarial tests administered. In re Mason, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8531 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 27 2011).

1903. During appellant's civil commitment trial, the trial court did not err by excluding an expert's testimony that appellant did not commit the crimes for which he had been convicted because the issue of whether appellant had been wrongfully convicted was not at issue. In re Commitment of Hinkle, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2011).

1904. Defendant was not entitled under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) to offer evidence of diminished capacity because his experts' reports, which did not address the standard for recklessness under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 6.03(c) or knowledge under § 6.03(a), could not support a claim that defendant was guilty only of manslaughter under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.04(a), rather than murder under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02. Thus, the experts' testimony was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 702. Quick v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 680, 2011 WL 286155 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2011).

1905. Expert's opinions in a products liability case on how a fire started were subjective and conclusory because they were unsupported by testing; thus, they were not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, were not based on a reliable foundation under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and constituted no evidence that an alleged design defect in a dryer caused the fire. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 298 S.W.3d 631, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 1041, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 179 (Tex. 2009).

1906. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly denied defendant's witness's testimony relating to the field of false confessions because the witness's testimony could not have assisted the jury in understanding the evidence or in making a determination of a fact issue. He did not intend to offer an opinion as to the truth or falsity of defendant's confession, and during cross-examination defendant admitted the truth of the portions of his confession that he earlier claimed were inaccurate. Munoz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6475, 2009 WL 2517664 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 19 2009).

1907. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of fourteen in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the rebuttal testimony of the State's expert who testified that the complainant's "normal" behavior would not necessarily negate sexual abuse; the testimony was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because it directly rebutted the defense witnesses' testimony and because it tended to make less probable the defense contention that observed interactions between the complainant and defendant suggested a normal relationship. Briones v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5944, 2009 WL 2356626 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 30 2009).

1908. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a forensic chemist's testimony regarding the results of gunshot residue tests on the ground that the tests were administered too long after the shooting to be reliable because the trial court was entitled to accept the testimony before it and determine that the test was reliable; the expert testified that the gunshot residue test was reliable after four hours but that the state of the evidence may have degraded; the trial court also knew the details of the testing performed on the four individuals, with the ultimate results consistent with the testimony concerning the test methodology; even if the admission was in error, it was harmless error, given the overwhelming evidence in the case and the fact that the testimony concerning the gunshot residue was not emphasized and was not crucial to defendant's conviction. Saunders v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3383 (Tex. App. Austin May 8 2008).

1909. In a tax dispute regarding valuation, an expert's premise that an underground storage tank (UST), once installed, became salvage material was a faulty absolute and likely rendered his valuation of the USTs, which represented the largest deviation in the valuations, unreliable; unreliable testimony did not constitute evidence. Harris County Appraisal Dist. v. Sigmor Corp., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2456 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 3 2008).

1910. When the appellate court in a sexual assault trial improperly evaluated the qualifications of a proposed defense expert, a certified legal nurse consultant, under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), 401, 402, and 702, and did not evaluate the reliability of the consultant's proposed testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and did not give proper deference to the trial judge's decision not to allow her to testify as an expert, the appellate court's judgment was vacated, and case was remanded to allow the appellate court to conduct a proper analysis. Vela v. State, 209 S.W.3d 128, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2384 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1911. Probation officer was properly allowed to testify that defendant was not a suitable candidate for community supervision because suitability is a matter relevant to sentencing under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) when a defendant seeks placement on community supervision; the court noted that the trial judge still had operate within the bounds of Tex. R. Evid. 401. Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Criminal Trials

1912. Defendant was not was denied the right to present a full defense when the trial court refused to allow his DNA expert to testify regarding lab bias because the expert's proposed testimony was not relevant to the issues before the jury; absent any evidence of lab bias, the substance of the proposed testimony-that context could influence experts and that all human beings had bias-was more appropriate for cross-examination than for expert testimony. Millage v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3801, 2014 WL 1407331 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 8 2014).

1913. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault and endangering a child in permitting a State witness to testify as an expert witness where the witness's expertise fit with the subject matter at issue, which was whether the damages to the victims' vehicles were consistent with their accounts of how the damage occurred. The witness had seventeen years of experience in the automotive industry and thirteen years of experience as an estimator for damaged vehicles, and his testimony did not involve a complex subject, but rather consisted of matching up paint transfer and damages to the victims' vehicles with damages to defendant's truck. Ibarra v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 169, 2013 WL 123705 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 10 2013).

1914. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by admitting a pediatrician's testimony where: (1) the pediatrician, a specialist in child maltreatment, had published research in the area of maltreatment, particularly in the area of child abuse; (2) the pediatrician had personally examined over one thousand children and was considered an expert in the area of sexual abuse; and (3) the pediatrician's ten-page curriculum vitae, which was admitted into evidence without objection, reflected her extensive training, skills, education, experience, and publications in the area of child sexual abuse. The prosecutor specifically requested the pediatrician's opinion based on her training and experience, as well as her examinations of children who had made a delayed outcry, for an opinion on why sexually abused children might delay outcry, which did not require a greater or more specific degree of expertise in the psychology or sociology of sexually abused children than possessed by the pediatrician, and the pediatrician's testimony would assist the jury in understanding why children might delay reporting sexual abuse. Salinas v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7828, 2009 WL 3210941 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

1915. In a case in which defendant was convicted of intentionally causing serious bodily injury to his stepson, causing his death, and intentionally or knowingly concealing the body, the trial court did not err by completely excluding the testimony of a defense expert pathologist who was board certified in both clinical and anatomical pathology, but was not a forensic pathologist, where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the defense did not demonstrate that the pathologist was sufficiently qualified in the sub-speciality of forensic pathology and that his methodology, without accessing or viewing the corpse, was not scientifically reliable; defendant did not demonstrate to the trial court that the pathologist had any experience with strangulations or decomposed bodies. Crunk v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7329, 2009 WL 2973474 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 17 2009).

1916. In the penalty phase of a capital murder trial, there was no error in allowing testimony about Texas prison conditions in general and that violence could occur within the Texas prison system; an issue for the jury's determination was future dangerousness; therefore, the testimony was relevant to whether defendant would have opportunities to commit violent acts in prison. Lucero v. State, 246 S.W.3d 86, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 219 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

1917. In a sexual assault case, a court properly allowed an expert to testify regarding sexual abuse where, although the State did not tie the testimony to the facts of the case, the testimony was relevant, it had a relatively close association with the evidence, and it was better for the expert not to tie his or her testimony too tightly to the particular child victim, but instead, to limit the import of such testimony to general characteristics and empirically obtained data, so that the jury could draw its own conclusions. Carey v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3188 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 8, 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Daubert Standard

1918. When the appellate court in a sexual assault trial improperly evaluated the qualifications of a proposed defense expert, a certified legal nurse consultant, under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), 401, 402, and 702, and did not evaluate the reliability of the consultant's proposed testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and did not give proper deference to the trial judge's decision not to allow her to testify as an expert, the appellate court's judgment was vacated, and case was remanded to allow the appellate court to conduct a proper analysis. Vela v. State, 209 S.W.3d 128, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2384 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Helpfulness

1919. At defendant's trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a licensed professional counselor who treated sex offenders; the expert's testimony about grooming for a sexual offense was relevant to assist the jury in understanding defendant's behavior. Cox v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8890 (Tex. App. Waco July 18 2013).

1920. Trial court did not err by excluding opinion testimony from the officer because his opinion on the difficulty of obtaining a conviction when the victim of a sexual assault suffered from mental impairments did not make any of the facts the jury had to determine more or less probable, and therefore the evidence was not relevant. Myles v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4911, 2012 WL 2357426 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 21 2012).

1921. Trial court did not err by permitting a doctor to testify regarding patterns of disclosure of sexual abuse by children under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the doctor was qualified by virtue of her education, knowledge, training, and experience, and because the testimony would aid the jury in understanding why the victim waited four years before telling her father about the sexual assault; the doctor testified that it was common for a child to delay making an outcry to an adult if the perpetrator had threatened to harm someone the child loved. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7915, 2010 WL 3783946 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 29 2010).

1922. Because forgery was not pleaded as an affirmative defense under Tex. R. Civ. P. 94 in a suit for a constructive trust, handwriting evidence was not helpful and thus was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 702. Estate of Wallis, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3710, 2010 WL 1987514 (Tex. App. Tyler May 19 2010).

1923. In a trial for child sexual assault, a State medical expert did not testify that the victim was truthful or that sexual abuse victims, as a class, were truthful. To the contrary, the expert properly testified, under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 702, that, although not definitive, the complainant's physical condition was consistent with the abuse later described. Reyes v. State, 274 S.W.3d 724, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5921 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2008).

1924. Although a medical study referred to by a doctor in his testimony at defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 involved females older than the complainant and under different circumstances, the evidence was relevant because the doctor was in the best position to explain to the jury why the genitalia of sexually abused victims often exhibited no physical signs of penetration, and he tied the study to his earlier conclusion that he was not surprised about the lack of physical evidence of penetration in the complainant's genital examination, which assisted the trier of fact to understand the lack of physical evidence; the testimony showed that the farther away in time the examination was from the abuse, the less likely there would be physical evidence of penetration, and, accordingly, the trial court properly admitted the testimony. Whitfield v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9726 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 9 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Qualifications

1925. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child younger than 14 years old case, where a doctor's testimony and opinions were based on his experience and training as a physician at the child advocacy center, his educational and professional background was relevant to prove his expertise in the evaluation and treatment of child victims and to lay the predicate for his testimony; thus, without a showing of harm, evidence, like the doctor's curriculum vitae, was properly admitted to assist the jury in making its determination as it served a relevant purpose beyond solely bolstering the witness and any extraneous information included on the curriculum vitae had only slight effect. Walker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8452 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 21 2010).

1926. Trial court did not err by permitting a doctor to testify regarding patterns of disclosure of sexual abuse by children under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the doctor was qualified by virtue of her education, knowledge, training, and experience, and because the testimony would aid the jury in understanding why the victim waited four years before telling her father about the sexual assault; the doctor testified that it was common for a child to delay making an outcry to an adult if the perpetrator had threatened to harm someone the child loved. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7915, 2010 WL 3783946 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 29 2010).

1927. When the appellate court in a sexual assault trial improperly evaluated the qualifications of a proposed defense expert, a certified legal nurse consultant, under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), 401, 402, and 702, and did not evaluate the reliability of the consultant's proposed testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and did not give proper deference to the trial judge's decision not to allow her to testify as an expert, the appellate court's judgment was vacated, and case was remanded to allow the appellate court to conduct a proper analysis. Vela v. State, 209 S.W.3d 128, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2384 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Opinion Testimony : General Overview

1928. In a breach of lease case relating to oil and gas leases, a previous lessee contended that testimony that wells had not been fully developed was conclusory and was unable to support a judgment; the testimony did not change the evidence, which showed that the previous lessee complied with a contract by drilling at least two wells that produced in paying quantities. Exxon Corp. v. Emerald Oil & Gas Co., L.C., 2009 Tex. LEXIS 113, 52 Tex. Sup.

Ct. J. 467 (Tex. 2009).

1929. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the State's expert to give expert opinion testimony as to the truthfulness of the complaining witness. The defense opened the door to the testimony by questioning the expert about the manipulation of children who make allegations of sexual abuse. Johnson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7412 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 7 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Opinion Testimony : Personal Perceptions

1930. There was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 701 in allowing the State to ask defendant's wife, on cross-examination, whether she believed the complainants had someone else shoot them, just to get her husband in trouble. The trial court could have found that the question was grounded in the wife's objective perceptions and not on speculation about the complainants' state of mind and that this opinion was helpful to eliminate a possible alternative theory of the crime. Harris v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6794, 2011 WL 3717046 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 25 2011).

1931. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to further question two of the State's witnesses about defendant's duty or authority as a peace officer because he had already established that neither witness had any law enforcement training or education, and therefore the questions failed to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 701 (personal perception or knowledge) and Tex. R. Evid. 401 (relevance requiring both materiality and probativeness). King v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8766 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2007).

1932. Where defendant used a car jack to strike the hood of the complainant's SUV, the arresting officer was permitted to testify that $1500 was the estimated cost of repairing the damage based on his years of experience with criminal mischief cases; the officer also testified that the body shop's repair estimate was $ 1,530.01. Barnes v. State, 248 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4261 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Personal Knowledge

1933. Trial court did not err by excluding an agent's testimony concerning the identity of the tipster because the agent stated he did not know but only had ideas as to who the tipster was. Ivie v. State, 407 S.W.3d 305, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4876 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 18 2013).

1934. In defendant's evading arrest case, the court properly excluded a defense witness's testimony because the proffered testimony that it was "standard operating procedure" for law enforcement agencies in general to routinely make video and audio recordings of police pursuits was not germane. The witness did not have personal knowledge as to the standard procedures of the Corpus Christi Police Department regarding recordings of police pursuits. Gomez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1700 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 5 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Presentation of Evidence

1935. Because the trial court could reasonably decide that the existence of a pending driving while intoxicated charge was not relevant to show bias, and because the trial court could have decided that the possibility of prejudice from the testimony to the proceedings outweighed the probative value of the excluded testimony, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by disallowing defendant to recall the victim during the presentation of defendant's case to the jury. Smith v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5338, 2011 WL 2732270 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 13 2011).

Family Law : Child Custody : Awards : General Overview

1936. In a child custody proceeding, evidence about the relationship that the mother's boyfriend had with his own child had some relevance in determining the best interests of the children at issue because the testimony showed that the boyfriend would be involved in their lives. In re Marriage of Ivers, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3800 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 30 2004).

Family Law : Child Custody : Procedures

1937. In a custody dispute, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, in excluding evidence that the brother of one parent was a registered sex offender and that the brother had contact with the child. Goodson v. Castellanos, 214 S.W.3d 741, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 364 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

Family Law : Family Protection & Welfare : Elderly Persons : Abuse, Endangerment & Neglect

1938. In the trial on an employee's claim of retaliatory discharge under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 242.133, the trial court properly excluded the employee's previous employment history under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because reasons provided by previous employers for termination were not relevant. Senior Living Props., L.L.C. v. Cole, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7610 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 19 2007).

Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : Involuntary Termination : General Overview

1939. Had the Texas Department of Child Protective Services sought termination of the mother's parental rights due at least in part to her alleged failure to comply with the trial court's orders, then the transcript of the adversary hearing might have arguably been relevant, but, because the Department abandoned that ground, and the trial court did not charge the jury on that ground, the transcript had no tendency to make any fact of consequence more or less probable; thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the transcript of the adversary hearing from evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 401. In the Interest of T.T.F., 331 S.W.3d 461, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9599 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 2 2010).

1940. In a termination of parental rights proceeding arising from the death of a sibling, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 when the trial court admitted the recordings of the parent's phone calls from jail to home on the night of the sibling's death and admitted evidence of the parent's prior criminal convictions, some of which were more than 10 years old. Murray v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 294 S.W.3d 360, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6372 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 13 2009).

Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : Involuntary Termination : Child Abuse

1941. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence concerning sexual abuse allegations made against the father because the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services did not seek to terminate the father's parental rights based on those allegations, the Department did not contend that the allegations were true, and the trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction concerning the evidence. J.H. v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4434, 2011 WL 2297723 (Tex. App. Austin June 9 2011).

Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : Involuntary Termination : Procedure

1942. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of a pending assault charge against the father because it was relevant in determining whether termination of the father's rights was in the best interest of the child.. Defendant failed to show that its admission confused or misled the jury, was cumulative of other evidence, or unfairly prejudiced the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 403; a key issue in the trial was defendant's criminal history, and the pending charge was only a small fraction of that history. Davis v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1315, 2012 WL 512674 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 15 2012).

Governments : Legislation : Sunday Closing Laws

1943. Trial court erred in excluding from jury consideration evidence of discriminatory enforcement of the Blue Law, former Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 9001; however, the error was harmless in that there was no hint of any reason that constituted the kind of invidious enforcement that gave rise to constitutional protection. Wolf v. State, 661 S.W.2d 765, 1983 Tex. App. LEXIS 5456 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 1983).

Governments : Local Governments : Employees & Officials

1944. In a trial for assault on a public servant, testimony that defendant was a convicted felon and in possession of drugs and a handgun was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 401, because it was relevant to motive. Thurman v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 135 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 10 2007).

1945. In a firefighter's action alleging intentional failure to implement relief granted to him by a grievance examiner, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence of a demand letter because it was irrelevant. City of Houston v. Jackson, 135 S.W.3d 891, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2942 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004), reversed by 192 S.W.3d 764, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 258, 49 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 492, 152 Lab. Cas. (CCH) P60178 (Tex. 2006).

Governments : Local Governments : Ordinances & Regulations

1946. There was substantial evidence that the driver's violation of the ordinance occurred within the city limits because the administrative law judge could have reasonably inferred from the evidence that the sergeant witnessed the driver peel out inside the city limits or it could have taken judicial notice of the fact that the incident took place in the city. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Botsford, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2649, 2014 WL 902567 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 7 2014).

1947. In a challenge to the facial validity of an ordinance, discovery regarding the government interests at stake and the city's prior enforcement of the ordinance was not relevant. Patterson v. City of Bellmead, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3136, 2013 WL 1188929 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 21 2013).

Immigration Law : Duties & Rights of Aliens : Discrimination

1948. Illegal immigrant status of defendant driver should not have been admitted in a wrongful death and survival action stemming from a multi-fatality vehicular accident. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, the evidence was not relevant to claims of negligent hiring and negligent entrustment, even if the employer's failure to screen and thus its failure to discover the driver's inability to work in the United States furnished a condition that made the accident possible, because the driver's immigration status did not cause the collision. TXI Transp. Co. v. Hughes, 306 S.W.3d 230, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 212, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 431 (Tex. 2010).

Immigration Law : Immigrants : General Overview

1949. In a wrongful death and survival action, evidence of the deceased worker's illegal immigrant status was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403. Although immigration status could be a relevant consideration in determining pecuniary loss damages, the usefulness was limited and was not made less speculative by testimony about an immigration raid. Republic Waste Servs. v. Martinez, 335 S.W.3d 401, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 540, 79 A.L.R.6th 745 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 20 2011).

Labor & Employment Law : Discrimination : Age Discrimination : Proof : Circumstantial Evidence

1950. In an age discrimination case, the employee's averment that a supervisor and a company vice president repeatedly made comments to him about his age and asked when he was going to retire was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to determining the motivating factor for the employee's discharge. Clemons v. Tex. Concrete Materials, Ltd., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8394, 160 Lab. Cas. (CCH) P61072 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 19 2010).

Labor & Employment Law : Discrimination : Harassment : Sexual Harassment : Burdens of Proof : Employee Burdens

1951. Employee who claimed sexual harassment was not entitled to a spoliation instruction as to two computer hard drives that were destroyed 11 months before and the month of her termination; she failed to show that the hard drives contained material or relevant information. She failed to identify a single document that she suspected was altered or explain the factual basis for her suspicions; when deposing the authors of the documents, she did not investigate the falsification allegations. Hunicke v. Seafarers Int'l Union, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6794 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 4 2013).

Labor & Employment Law : Discrimination : Retaliation : General Overview

1952. In an employment retaliation case, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403 in admitting a report of the employer's internal investigation of sexual harassment, which was initiated by the employee's memo detailing the sexual harassment of another employee. The report provided evidence that the employee engaged in a protected activity and was also relevant to credibility. Tex. Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Williams, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1178, 2010 WL 797145 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 19 2010).

Labor & Employment Law : Occupational Safety & Health : General Overview

1953. In a negligence action arising from an oil field accident, the trial court did not err in excluding, as irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, a letter written by an OSHA investigator; the letter was not equivalent to a regulation or standard, and there was no evidence that witnesses who testified at trial had spoken with the investigator. Carrillo v. Star Tool Co., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8992 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2005).

Legal Ethics : Client Relations : General Overview

1954. Upon entry of an agreed final divorce decree, the husband filed a motion for new trial in which he alleged his attorney lacked the authority to sign a settlement agreement on his behalf while he was in federal prison. The trial court did not abuse its discretion when it excluded an exhibit consisting of an engagement letter between the husband and his attorney, because the husband failed to explain how the letter made it more probable that the presumption of authority to settle could be overcome. Phillips v. Phillips, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15275, 2013 WL 6726819 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 19 2013).

Legal Ethics : Client Relations : Confidentiality of Information

1955. Disqualification of opposing counsel in a suit affecting the parent-child relationship was proper because the product of the risk and the consequences was great enough that the representation was adverse, and there was a reasonable probability that the representation would have violated the rule pertaining to confidential information where opposing counsel had represented a family member of a father's fiancee in a previous custody case, and her medical history was relevant to a child's best interest. In re C.G.H., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8202, 2013 WL 3377421 (Tex. App. Tyler July 3 2013).

Real Property Law : Adverse Possession : General Overview

1956. Evidence that there was no fence on a claimed property line in recent years was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because it made the alleged continuous existence of a fence during a previous 10-year period, proof of which was required for adverse possession under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 16.026(a), less probable. Melendez v. De Leon, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3360 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 4 2005).

Real Property Law : Eminent Domain Proceedings : Procedure

1957. In an eminent domain proceeding in which a land planner designated as an expert by the owner testified that the owner could not achieve full compliance with the town's zoning ordinances after the State's condemnation and that the owner would be required to demolish all of its buildings, the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the land planner's opinion about the allegedly required demolition of the owner's buildings because his opinion was impermissibly speculative and conjectural. Reversal was required because there was a reasonable probability that the inadmissible evidence that characterized the demolition of the owner's buildings as a certainty, rather than a market-affecting factor, improperly influenced the jury's verdict on remainder damages. State v. Little Elm Plaza, Ltd., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8880 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 25 2012).

Real Property Law : Eminent Domain Proceedings : Valuation

1958. At least part of an acceptable method of calculating partial-taking damages required determining the market value of the landowners' entire tract of land before the taking; thus, the testimony of the landowners' appraisal expert as to the property's pre-taking value was relevant, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony. State v. Petropoulos, 346 S.W.3d 525, 2011 Tex. LEXIS 416, 54 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1133 (Tex. 2011).

1959. Expert testimony valuing property on which a large natural gas processing plant had been built as vacant rural residential property was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and was unreliable under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the expert failed to explain why the existing use of the property would not be presumed as the highest and best use, did not offer fair market value of the land based on its condition at the time of the condemnation, and did not account for all relevant factors affecting valuation. Enbridge Pipeline (east Texas) L.P. v. Avinger Timber, L.L.C., 326 S.W.3d 390, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8629, 172 Oil & Gas Rep. 722 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 27 2010).

Real Property Law : Property Valuation

1960. Defendant's offer to purchase permanently damaged property for its full value was not relevant to the fair market value of the property. Therefore, the offer should not have been admitted and there was no evidence for the jury's finding that there was no diminution of value. Mieth v. Ranchquest, Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4601 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 177 S.W.3d 296, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2079 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

Tax Law : State & Local Taxes : Personal Property Tax : Tangible Property : General Overview

1961. In a tax dispute regarding valuation, an expert's premise that an underground storage tank (UST), once installed, became salvage material was a faulty absolute and likely rendered his valuation of the USTs, which represented the largest deviation in the valuations, unreliable; unreliable testimony did not constitute evidence. Harris County Appraisal Dist. v. Sigmor Corp., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2456 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 3 2008).

Tax Law : State & Local Taxes : Real Property Tax : General Overview

1962. In a suit challenging a real estate tax assessment, the trial court properly allowed expert testimony from the taxpayer's appraiser. The testimony was relevant, within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 702 because the appraiser found a reasonable number of comparable properties, made appropriate adjustments, and compared the median appraisal value of those properties to the appraisal value applied to the property at issue, as required by Tex. Tax Code § 42.26. Harris County Appraisal v. Hartman Reit Operating P'ship, L.P., 186 S.W.3d 155, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Torts : Business Torts : Negligent Hiring & Supervision : General Overview

1963. Illegal immigrant status of defendant driver should not have been admitted in a wrongful death and survival action stemming from a multi-fatality vehicular accident. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, the evidence was not relevant to claims of negligent hiring and negligent entrustment, even if the employer's failure to screen and thus its failure to discover the driver's inability to work in the United States furnished a condition that made the accident possible, because the driver's immigration status did not cause the collision. TXI Transp. Co. v. Hughes, 306 S.W.3d 230, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 212, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 431 (Tex. 2010).

Torts : Damages : Compensatory Damages : Lost Income : Award Calculations

1964. In a wrongful death and survival action, evidence of the deceased worker's illegal immigrant status was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403. Although immigration status could be a relevant consideration in determining pecuniary loss damages, the usefulness was limited and was not made less speculative by testimony about an immigration raid. Republic Waste Servs. v. Martinez, 335 S.W.3d 401, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 540, 79 A.L.R.6th 745 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 20 2011).

Torts : Damages : Punitive Damages : Conduct Supporting Awards

1965. Trial court improperly admitted evidence that the decedent's widow would put any punitive damages she received from the corporation that owned and operated the cemetery into a trust to pay for funerals for persons who could not afford them because it was not relevant to proving any of the factors to be considered when determining the amount of punitive damages or to penalizing or punishing the corporation. Serv. Corp. Int'l v. Guerra, 348 S.W.3d 221, 2011 Tex. LEXIS 417, 54 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1191 (Tex. 2011).

1966. In a case arising from a fatal vehicle accident, a petition for a writ of mandamus was granted in relation to the discovery of financial records in a gross negligence case because the records sought were not duplicative of balance sheets produced; the balance sheets were not audited or certified, and they did not contain an affidavit or statement that they represented the net worth of a truck owner and an employer; evidence of net worth was relevant to this lawsuit and discoverable because punitive damages were sought under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 41.003(a). In re Brewer Leasing, Inc., 255 S.W.3d 708, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3021 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2008).

Torts : Malpractice & Professional Liability : Healthcare Providers

1967. Summary judgment was granted to a psychiatrist in an action brought under the Texas Liability and Improvement Act, because experts did not establish causation based on the act of prescribing a drug to a patient, who later committed embezzlement and other forms of debauchery allegedly due to taking medication for attention deficit disorder; the evidence did not show that a psychiatrist had knowledge of an alleged propensity towards addictive behavior, expert testimony based on this conclusion was merely speculation and conjecture, and a trial court did not abuse the patient's due process rights by failing to consider the evidence under those circumstances. Price v. Divita, 224 S.W.3d 331, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6929 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Torts : Negligence : Causation : General Overview

1968. Driver's consumption of alcohol was relevant to the element of causation in his negligence suit against a trucker because the trucker presented evidence that the accident could have been avoided had the driver steered his vehicle to the right to avoid the trucker's trailer, and in failing to do so, the driver caused the accident. PPC Transp. v. Metcalf, 254 S.W.3d 636, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3291 (Tex. App. Tyler 2008).

Torts : Products Liability : Design Defects

1969. In a product liability case involving an allegedly defective surge protector, the trial court properly ordered discovery relating to a recall of a predecessor product that caused overheating and fires, but erred in allowing discovery of complaints regarding models that were not similar to the model in question and in failing to limit the scope of the requests as to time and locale. In re Am. Power Conversion Corp., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5310, 2012 WL 2584290 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 5 2012).

1970. Discovery order in a product liability case requiring the manufacturer to produce documents about protective systems on several model years was not overbroad; evidence about similar products was relevant under Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.3(a), Tex. R. Evid. 401 to a safer alternative design as contemplated by Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 82.005, and the manufacturer did not meet its burden under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.4(a), 199.6 of showing that the time parameters were burdensome or otherwise presenting proof to support its objections. In re Exmark Mfg. Co., 299 S.W.3d 519, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8469 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 30 2009).

Torts : Products Liability : Negligence

1971. In an action arising from a car fire, a verdict against car manufacturer was reversed because there was no evidence that the fire and death were caused by a defect that allowed gas to siphon from the fuel system. The difficulty was that there were significant conflicts in and between testimony by plaintiff's two experts as to nature of the leak, one of whom opined that gasoline had siphoned from the rear hose but offered no basis; opinion testimony that was conclusory or speculative was not relevant evidence. GMC v. Iracheta, 161 S.W.3d 462, 2005 Tex. LEXIS 304, 48 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 529, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17372 (Tex. 2005).

1972. Certain OSHA exhibits were properly admitted as they were relevant to the operator's design defect claim, because to establish a design defect in the forklift, the operator bore the burden of establishing there was a safer alternative design for the product, Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 82.005(a)(1). The operator contended the forklift would have been safer had it been designed with a door to hold him in the forklift's compartment as the forklift dropped over the edge of the loading dock, and to counter this claim, the manufacturer was permitted to introduce evidence tending to show that inclusion of a door in the design of the forklift was not a safer alternative design. Costilla v. Crown Equip. Corp., 148 S.W.3d 736, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10163 (Tex. App. Dallas 2004).

Torts : Transportation Torts : Rail Transportation : Federal Employers' Liability Act

1973. In an action under the the Federal Employers Liability Act, in the absence of any evidence that a railroad employee had a genetic predisposition to such injuries, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding testimony that genetics was a cause of degenerative disc disease. BNSF Ry. Co. v. Phillips, 434 S.W.3d 675, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5533 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 22 2014).

Transportation Law : Private Vehicles : Traffic Regulation : Speed Limits : Drag Racing

1974. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for racing on a highway in admitting photographs that showed images of high performance additions to defendant's car, including the type of engine and several after-market additions, where the arresting officer testified the additions were commonly added to high-performance vehicles owned by racers to enhance a vehicle's overall performance. Based on the arresting officer's testimony, the photographs were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the alleged racing charge because the photographs had a tendency to make the determination that defendant was racing more or less probable by showing his car had high performance additions commonly used by racing vehicles. Sony v. State, 307 S.W.3d 348, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8688 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 11 2009).

Workers' Compensation & SSDI : Administrative Proceedings : Evidence : Medical Evidence

1975. Jury properly found that an employee did not sustain a compensable injury because the State offered expert medical opinion that the employee's injury was a neuropathic stress fracture caused by pre-existing diabetes, which he had difficulty controlling, and not arising out of the employee's employment. Lyons v. State Office of Risk Mgmt., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6651, 2009 WL 2596053 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2009).

Workers' Compensation & SSDI : Administrative Proceedings : Judicial Review : General Overview

1976. When the workers' compensation administrative record was admitted into evidence under Tex. Lab. Code Ann. § 410.306(b), redacted documents properly could have been excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 401 as irrelevant in part and under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because of the likelihood of confusion; thus, the trial court adequately informed the jury of the appeals panel's decision under Tex. Lab. Code Ann. § 410.304(b). Fort Worth Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Seifert, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1575, 2010 WL 730362 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 3 2010).

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Jurisdiction : Personal Jurisdiction & In Rem Actions : In Personam Actions : General Overview

1. In an appeal from the denial of a special appearance, the court rejected a foreign manufacturer's argument that some exhibits were irrelevant in that they related to other companies, which the opposing party asserted were predecessors. The court determined that the opposing party met its initial burden of pleading sufficient allegations to bring the manufacturer within the provisions of the Texas long-arm statute and therefore that the relevancy argument was without merit. Ho Wah Genting Kintron Sdn Bhd v. Leviton Mfg. Co., 163 S.W.3d 120, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1414, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17391 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

Civil Procedure : Pleading & Practice : Service of Process : Methods : General Overview

2. Bill of review was denied in a paternity case because a purported father waived his argument regarding substituted service under Tex. R. Civ. P. 106 based on statements that his attorney made to the trial court; further, due to the waiver, the issue relating to substituted service was not preserved for appellate review. Moreover, since actual notice was not required for substituted service to be effective, evidence regarding actual notice was not heard as it was not relevant and did not affect the substantial rights of the parties. Thomas v. Wheeler, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5617 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 29 2008).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Disclosures : Sanctions

3. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow damage evidence in a condemnation case under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 because the evidence in question was not disclosed under Tex. R. Civ. P. 194; there was no good cause shown due to counsel's inadvertence, and an owner would have been prejudiced thereby; moreover, cross-examination on this issue was properly excluded since it was not relevant to the case. Harris County v. Inter Nos, Ltd., 199 S.W.3d 363, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3849 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Methods : Stipulations

4. In a personal injury case, a trial court did not err in admitting evidence of negligence because, even though there was a stipulation to the issues of negligence and proximate cause, an employer and an employee did not stipulate to the manner in which responsibility should be apportioned between them. Additionally, they did not stipulate to the employee's liability for exemplary damages. Matbon, Inc. v. Gries, 288 S.W.3d 471, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 268 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 15 2009).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Relevance

5. In a case stemming from a house fire and the resulting product liability lawsuit filed by real parties in interest against the manufacturer of a computer power supply/surge protector and others, the trial court abused its discretion in ordering the manufacturer to produce certain of its back up power supply products, discovery produced in relation to another lawsuit, and other documents because real parties failed to establish a correlation between the specific model they had purchased and another of the manufacturer's product lines, failed to show that their request was not narrowly tailored to include only relevant materials, and failed to show that the litigation information they sought was relevant. In re Am. Power Conversion Corp., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9369, 2012 WL 5507111 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 14 2012).

6. In a product liability case involving an allegedly defective surge protector, the trial court properly ordered discovery relating to a recall of a predecessor product that caused overheating and fires, but erred in allowing discovery of complaints regarding models that were not similar to the model in question and in failing to limit the scope of the requests as to time and locale. In re Am. Power Conversion Corp., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5310, 2012 WL 2584290 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 5 2012).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Evidence

7. Corporation provided an assignment document in a breach of contract dispute in its supplemental response to a concrete company's motions for summary judgment. A trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence because the evidence was relevant. All Metals Fabricating, Inc. v. Ramer Concrete, Inc., 338 S.W.3d 557, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1654 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 12 2009).

Civil Procedure : Judgments : Relief From Judgment : Motions for New Trials

8. Employer was properly denied a new trial on its claim that the trial court erred by excluding a witness's testimony that the former employee who was complaining of sexual harassment by a coworker had regularly injected sexual discussions into the work environment because the trial court's belief that the testimony had no relevance other than to unfairly prejudice the jury was not arbitrary or unreasonable. Waffle House, Inc. v. Williams, 314 S.W.3d 1, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 843, 100 Fair Empl. Prac. Cas. (BNA) 451 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

Civil Procedure : Remedies : Damages : Compensatory Damages

9. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow damage evidence in a condemnation case under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 because the evidence in question was not disclosed under Tex. R. Civ. P. 194; there was no good cause shown due to counsel's inadvertence, and an owner would have been prejudiced thereby; moreover, cross-examination on this issue was properly excluded since it was not relevant to the case. Harris County v. Inter Nos, Ltd., 199 S.W.3d 363, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3849 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review

10. Bill of review was denied in a paternity case because a purported father waived his argument regarding substituted service under Tex. R. Civ. P. 106 based on statements that his attorney made to the trial court; further, due to the waiver, the issue relating to substituted service was not preserved for appellate review. Moreover, since actual notice was not required for substituted service to be effective, evidence regarding actual notice was not heard as it was not relevant and did not affect the substantial rights of the parties. Thomas v. Wheeler, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5617 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 29 2008).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Harmless Error Rule

11. Where a former employee alleged that a former employer terminated the employee because the employee refused to drive a truck without a required permit and a jury found in favor of the employer, any error in excluding seven overweight permits as irrelevant was harmless because the excluded permits were not relevant to the first jury question since whether the truck was overweight on the day in question was not relevant to whether the employee was discharged, and the jury did not reach the remaining questions. Nezat v. Tucker Energy Servs., 437 S.W.3d 541, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6518, 38 I.E.R. Cas. (BNA) 1033 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2014).

12. In a negligence case arising from a fire at a condominium complex, speculative testimony regarding the adequacy of plumbing work was irrelevant and inadmissible and no showing of expert qualifications was made under Tex. R. Evid. 702; however, the trial court's error in admitting the testimony was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44. Richmond Condos. v. Skipworth Commer. Plumbing, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5977 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 26 2007).

Civil Procedure : Eminent Domain Proceedings : Experts

13. In an eminent domain proceeding in which a land planner designated as an expert by the owner testified that the owner could not achieve full compliance with the town's zoning ordinances after the State's condemnation and that the owner would be required to demolish all of its buildings, the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the land planner's opinion about the allegedly required demolition of the owner's buildings because his opinion was impermissibly speculative and conjectural. Reversal was required because there was a reasonable probability that the inadmissible evidence that characterized the demolition of the owner's buildings as a certainty, rather than a market-affecting factor, improperly influenced the jury's verdict on remainder damages. State v. Little Elm Plaza, Ltd., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8880 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 25 2012).

14. In an action arising from the State's partial taking of owners' property for use in a highway project, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the State's pretrial motion to exclude the expert testimony of the owners' designated real estate appraiser where his testimony was relevant because the market value of the whole property prior to the taking was a fact of consequence to the determination of the disputed element of the measure of damages. Moreover, the owners met their burden to show that the appraiser's expert testimony was reliable because he provided data of comparable sales with a variety of possible uses for the property and also testified that he performed a feasibility study on the possible uses for the property considering such factors as the impervious cover limitations, and although the State's experts provided conflicting testimony of the property's highest and best use as an office building and the property's market value based on four different land sales with a different unit of comparison, it was for the jury to resolve the conflicting evidence of the experts to determine the market value of the whole property prior to the taking. State v. Petropoulos, 346 S.W.3d 619, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3021 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 28 2009).

Computer & Internet Law : General Overview

15. Court properly admitted the contents of social networking web pages because there was sufficient circumstantial evidence to support a finding that the exhibits were what they purported to be -- web pages the contents of which defendant was responsible for. There were numerous photographs of defendant with his unique arm, body, and neck tattoos, as well as his distinctive eyeglasses and earring, and there was a reference to the victim's death and the music from his funeral. Tienda v. State, 358 S.W.3d 633, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 244 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012).

Computer & Internet Law : Criminal Offenses : General Overview

16. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, 404 in admitting a video of a social networking page, on which defendant was depicted holding a gun. The evidence was relevant because a witness testified that the gun in the video was the same gun the witness saw defendant use in the murder; it wass unlikely that the jury would have felt compelled to convict defendant of murder simply because he acted like a "bad boy" and brandished a weapon on camera. Brumfield v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10137, 2010 WL 5187690 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 23 2010).

17. In a trial for a murder by ligature strangulation, there was no error in admitting exhibits relating to defendant's use of an erotic asphyxiation Web site, in part because images of unrelated sexual activity and nudity were eliminated, leaving only those images showing ligature and manual strangulation that defendant had viewed in the five weeks before the murder; the State was able to tie some of the viewings to the dates that defendant visited other female homeowners and realtors, in order to show intent and motive in the murder of the female victim during an ostensible viewing of her home. Russo v. State, 228 S.W.3d 779, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4499 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Procedural Due Process : Scope of Protection

18. In a case where a former girlfriend's request for a final protective order was granted, a former boyfriend's due process rights were not violated because he was not deprived of the opportunity to present evidence. The boyfriend was able to confront and cross-examine the girlfriend, even though a trial court did limit questioning regarding threats made against the boyfriend by an acquaintance of the girlfriend, because those questions had nothing to do with whether family violence had occurred in the past or was likely to occur in the future. Ford v. Harbour, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1796, 2009 WL 679672 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 17 2009).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Assistance of Counsel

19. Ineffective assistance of counsel in violation of U.S. Const. amend. VI was shown where defendant's counsel failed to object to evidence that one of two women who died after being run over by defendant's truck was pregnant; evidence of her pregnancy was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 402 because the fact that the woman was pregnant did not tend to make it more or less probable that defendant had the requisite intent to injure her and there was no evidence that defendant in fact even was aware of the woman's pregnancy. White v. Thaler, 610 F.3d 890, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 13329 (5th Cir. Tex. 2010).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Confrontation

20. Defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confrontation was not violated by the exclusion of testimony regarding mishandling of evidence at the crime lab where the excluded testimony was not directed at the credibility or qualifications of the witnesses, but was offered to prove that there were problems with the identification and handling of evidence in general at the crime lab. A witness testified that she was unaware of mishandling in defendant's case and did not believe the evidence had been mishandled; therefore, the evidence was irrelevant because the witness did not testify that there were problems with the handling of the evidence in defendant's case. Pope v. State, 161 S.W.3d 114, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11529 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

21. Judgment convicting and sentencing defendant of first degree felony offense of aggravated sexual assault of a child was reversed and remanded for a new trial, where the trial court erred in excluding evidence that defendant met with the victim, since he believed she was in danger of being molested by her cousin, and the improper limitation of defendant's cross-examination was an error of constitutional magnitude and harmful. Cooper v. State, 95 S.W.3d 488, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8498 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2002).

22. Judgment convicting and sentencing defendant of first degree felony offense of aggravated sexual assault of a child was reversed and remanded for a new trial, where the trial court erred in excluding evidence that defendant met with the victim, since he believed she was in danger of being molested by her cousin, and the improper limitation of defendant's cross-examination was error of constitutional magnitude and harmful. Cooper v. State, 95 S.W.3d 488, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8498 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Manufacture : General Overview

23. In a trial for manufactured methamphetamine, there was no error in the admission of evidence concerning a subsequent arrest, seven months later, for possession of chemicals with intent to manufacture methamphetamine. That evidence tended to make less probable defendant's argument that he possessed items used to manufacture methamphetamine solely for use in bartering for drugs; thus, the evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid 401 and 402. Tarpley v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6289 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 10 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8782 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 24, 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : General Overview

24. Evidence of trace quantities of controlled substances that were found in defendant's car during the same search in which the methadone was found was relevant and admissible because it was visible in a baggie and on a scale, and the baggie was found in the location where the trooper had seen defendant secret something. Lamkin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6484, 2010 WL 3170647 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 12 2010).

25. In a drug case, the trial court did not err in refusing to allow defendant's girlfriend to testify that another person had stated that the contraband belonged to him; the proffered evidence was not relevant, under Tex. R. Evid. 402, to whether defendant possessed a controlled substance with intent to deliver it, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112(a), and defendant offered no independent facts corroborating the hearsay statement under Tex. R. Evid. 803(24). Menton v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7799 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 22 2005).

26. In a trial for heroin possession, gang-membership evidence was relevant because it was specifically linked to the case and was not used as character conformity evidence. The expert testified about defendant's affiliation with a gang and about the gang's trade being the trafficking of heroin, primarily by using a female's body cavity to transport the contraband, and having that female accompanied by a gang member; that evidence was relevant to the offense, which was charged after defendant entered the country with a woman who was carrying heroin in her vaginal cavity. Ojeda v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8557 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 24 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Simple Possession : General Overview

27. In a driving while intoxicated trial, evidence that cocaine was located in plain view next to the driver's seat in the vehicle defendant was driving was relevant to prove the State's allegation in the indictment that defendant was intoxicated, and, because the possession of cocaine evidence went to a material element of the State's case, it was not an extraneous offense. Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2064, 2013 WL 765711 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 28 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : General Overview

28. In an aggravated assault case, a court properly admitted evidence of a witness that she miscarried after jumping out a window because it was relevant to show the witness's physical and emotional state during and following the assault. Smith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9172 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 19 2004).

29. Defendant argued that the trial court erred by excluding evidence relating to his strained marital relationship with the victim because that evidence was probative of his state of mind and motivation at the time of his actions; however, because the only conduct elements potentially implicated for the crime of aggravated assault were the nature of the conduct and the result of the conduct, the circumstances surrounding the conduct were not relevant and were properly excluded. Novillo v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5086 (Tex. App. Austin June 10 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Aggravated Offenses

30. In a trial for aggravated assault on a public servant, it was proper to admit a rifle and associated photographs to show that defendant had access to the rifle, which was located in the same room. Airheart v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3235, 2012 WL 1431762 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 25 2012).

31. In a case alleging aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, defendant's right to present a defensive theory that some other person perpetrated the offense against a child was not denied when a trial court refused to allow him to question witnesses about a previously filed child abuse complaint because there was no nexus shown between this complaint and the charged offense; defendant was the only adult present when the injuries were sustained, the prior investigation ruled out abuse by a grandparent, and it was not relevant in showing that the mother, or any other adult, could have abused the child. Hernandez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6815 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 23 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Simple Offenses

32. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding expert psychological testimony who allegedly would have testified that as a result of his mental defects defendant was incapable of forming the necessary mens rea to commit an assault because defendant's amnesia was caused by his head injury, which occurred after the assault, and therefore could not be relevant to his intent at the time of the assault. In addition, the expert's report only noted that defendant told the expert that he had post-traumatic stress disorder, and nothing suggested that the expert himself confirmed the diagnosis. Iniquez v. State, 374 S.W.3d 611, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5436, 2012 WL 2742632 (Tex. App. Austin July 6 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Coercion : General Overview

33. When an inmate was charged with harassment by persons in certain correctional facilities for throwing urine and feces at two correctional officers, the officers' testimony about how they felt when defendant engaged in this conduct was circumstantial evidence relevant to the element of whether defendant had the intent to harass and alarm and annoy another person, so it could not be said that it was not relevant, under Tex. R. Evid. 401, or admissible, under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Wheatly v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5671 (Tex. App. Waco June 23 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : General Overview

34. In a child abuse trial, the child's foster mother was properly allowed to testify that when she changed dressings in the child's vaginal area, the child said that her daddy had touched her there. The evidence rebutted the father's defense that the child's burns were accidental, arguably supported a finding that there was a pattern of abuse, and was not explicit in a way that would impress the jury in an irrational and indelible way. Wooten v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4296 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Children : General Overview

35. In a trial for injury to a child, defendant's letters to his girlfriend while awaiting trial were relevant because they contained apologies, some specific and bordering on admissions, and also contained attempts to persuade the girlfriend to recant, both circumstances indicating consciousness of guilt. Pizano v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7459, 2013 WL 3155954 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 20 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Children : Elements

36. Defendant's posts on a social media website regarding his attitude toward children were relevant, although attenuated, in the case charging him with injury to a child. Copeland v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14675, 2013 WL 6388585 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 5 2013).

37. In a murder trial involving a child victim, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 in admitting an autopsy photograph because it demonstrated the scope and extent of the child's injuries and the cause of death. It was not cumulative because it showed injuries to the victim's neck and head from a side view, whereas two other photographs showed injuries from a frontal view. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1045 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Domestic Assault

38. In a trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02 for assault with a deadly weapon on a family member, evidence that the complainant's parent had a gun was properly excluded as irrelevant because the fact had no bearing on who had access to the gun and did not make it less likely that defendant assaulted the complainant with a gun; therefore, limiting defendant's cross-examination of the complainant on that issue did not violate Tex. Const. art. I, § 10. Dancy v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9806 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 13 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Robbery : General Overview

39. Because the robberies occurred in the same geographic area within a relatively brief time frame, and all were committed by an assailant who covered his hands with socks or gloves, and whose face was completely covered by a similar covering, leaving only the eyes exposed, there are sufficient common characteristics between each of the robberies, that the extraneous offenses were relevant to prove identity and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 404(b). Heigelmann v. State, 362 S.W.3d 763, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1670, 2012 WL 688427 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 2 2012).

40. In a trial for capital murder arising from a robbery and shooting, it was reversible error to admit evidence that defendant committed an armed robbery of a grocery store a month after the charged murder because any probative value as to intent under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Jackson v. State, 320 S.W.3d 873, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6572 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2010).

41. In a robbery trial, the court did not have to admit evidence of the complainant's prior conviction for misdemeanor assault against defendant's nephew. Contrary to defendant's argument, the two-year-old conviction was not relevant to show that the complainant ran from his apartment because he feared a physical confrontation. Allison v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4055 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Stalking : General Overview

42. In a stalking case, the trial court did not err by allowing the cross-examination of a defense witness regarding whether she was aware that defendant had been charged with a crime following an alleged domestic violence incident with the victim and whether she was aware that he had violated a protective order and assaulted his former wife; this evidence was relevant to defendant's good character after the witness testified that she had called the victim and asked her to give defendant another chance. Allen v. State, 218 S.W.3d 905, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2527 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Involuntary Manslaughter : General Overview

43. In an intoxication manslaughter with a deadly weapon case, an enhanced videotape of the accident revealed that it was highly probative of the fact and manner of an officer's death; thus, it was clearly relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Adams v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1165 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 15 2007).

44. In defendant's manslaughter case, the trial judge did not err in excluding evidence that a toxicology report revealed that a passenger had cocaine in her system at the time of her death where the evidence was not relevant because defendant presented no evidence that the driver used drugs on the day of the accident, and the fact that the passenger had cocaine in her system did not mean that the driver in the same car likewise had used cocaine. Tijerina v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9539 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 28 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : General Overview

45. In a trial for defendant's murder of his wife, evidence that he remarried a month after being released on bond was relevant to motive. Davis v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8372, 2011 WL 5026403 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 20 2011).

46. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, 404 in admitting a video of a social networking page, on which defendant was depicted holding a gun. The evidence was relevant because a witness testified that the gun in the video was the same gun the witness saw defendant use in the murder; it wass unlikely that the jury would have felt compelled to convict defendant of murder simply because he acted like a "bad boy" and brandished a weapon on camera. Brumfield v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10137, 2010 WL 5187690 (Tex. App.

Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 23 2010).

47. In a murder trial, shell casings that were retrieved from defendant's residence prior to the charged offense were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402 because they were circumstantial evidence of a connection between defendant and the murder weapon. Quesada v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1011 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 8 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6181 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 19, 2006).

48. In a trial for murder and robbery, evidence that a gun was taken in a prior robbery was same transaction contextual evidence and was relevant to show preparation for the planned robbery and murder at issue. The evidence was not unduly prejudicial, given the other evidence that the stolen gun was the murder weapon. Hill v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8474 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 22 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Capital Murder : General Overview

49. State established that the flight evidence was relevant to show defendant's consciousness of guilt for the capital murder because defendant admitted to going on the run after the shooting, the police had a warrant to arrest him for capital murder, and, when the police tried to arrest him in a parking lot using marked vehicles, he led them on a high-speed chase. Goldsmith v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 754, 2014 WL 261007 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 23 2014).

50. State established that the flight evidence was relevant to show defendant's consciousness of guilt for the capital murder because defendant admitted to going on the run after the shooting, the police had a warrant to arrest him for capital murder, and, when the police tried to arrest him in a parking lot using marked vehicles, he led them on a high-speed chase. Goldsmith v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 754, 2014 WL 261007 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 23 2014).

51. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, 404(b) in admitting the extraneous offense evidence of an aggravated robbery that defendant and an accomplice allegedly committed six days prior to the murder because it was reasonable to conclude that the evidence went directly to the issue of intent, given that the extraneous robbery occurred less than a week prior to the shooting and had several similarities to the charged offense. Maxwell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9036, 2010 WL 4595702 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 12 2010).

52. In a trial for capital murder arising from a robbery and shooting, it was reversible error to admit evidence that defendant committed an armed robbery of a grocery store a month after the charged murder because any probative value as to intent under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Jackson v. State, 320 S.W.3d 873, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6572 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2010).

53. In a capital murder case, a trial court did not err by refusing to allow the introduction of evidence that a victim had drugs in his system because any probative value the evidence might have had was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 403. The appellate court rejected defendant's argument that the evidence was relevant to the issue of the previous relationship between defendant and the victim and to show the condition of defendant's mind at the time of the offense. Anderson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6809, 2009 WL 2915011 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 27 2009).

54. In a capital murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 402 in admitting testimony from witnesses who had encounters with defendant either six months or three months before the offense; the evidence was not too remote to be relevant. Russo v. State, 228 S.W.3d 779, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4499 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Capital Murder : Elements

55. Evidence of a judgment that terminated defendant's parental rights to three of her children after the date that she allegedly murdered her newborn infant was relevant at her capital murder trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, and had relevance apart from mere proof of character conformity in compliance with Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), because an extraneous offense/bad act that took place subsequent to the offense for which a defendant was on trial did not make the extraneous offense/bad act inadmissible per se; furthermore, the judgment was introduced by the State after defendant had testified that the infant's death on the night in question was not the result of any intentional or knowing conduct on defendant's part, and the termination judgment contained findings by the trial judge that defendant "knowingly" placed or allowed her other children to remain in conditions dangerous to their physical or emotional well-being, which at least arguably made it more probable that defendant's acts or omissions on the night in question were done either intentionally or knowingly. Fergerson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6589 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : First-Degree Murder : General Overview

56. In defendant's murder case, the court properly admitted testimony regarding the victim having worked for defendant as a prostitute because the witness testified that the cycle of violence evolved from "slapping" to the point of "pretty brutal beatings." That testimony tended to show that defendant was violent toward the victim in the past and that his violence toward her was escalating; therefore, the testimony was relevant to the charge of murder. Wilson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 604, 2010 WL 323537 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 28 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Fleeing & Eluding : General Overview

57. In defendant's evading arrest case, the court properly allowed testimony concerning typical behavior during a traffic stop because the testimony that very few people fled when a squad car initiated a stop by activating its lights was relevant to the offense of evading arrest, and went to defendant's intent. The fact that most people pulled over after the police initiated a stop made it more probable that defendant intentionally disregarded the officer's attempt to pull him over. Spencer v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2227, 2013 WL 1282307 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 6 2013).

58. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child by sexual contact, evidence of defendant's flight was relevant to show guilt. Howard v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1083 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 8 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Fleeing & Eluding : Consciousness of Guilt

59. At defendant's trial for robbery, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony regarding his efforts to resist arrest because evidence relevant to his flight from the scene was a circumstance indicative of guilt. Johnson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 471, 2014 WL 222929 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 16 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Riot, Rout & Unlawful Assembly

60. In a case where defendant was convicted of violating Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 71.02, evidence of violent gang activities that were wholly unconnected to defendant was properly admitted into evidence because it was relevant, and the probative value of such was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Huan Huu Nguyen v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6263 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18 2008).

61. Defendant did not object to testimony about gang affiliation during the guilt-innocence phase of a murder trial and therefore failed to preserved error under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Vasquez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2952 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 2008).

62. In a trial for heroin possession, gang-membership evidence was relevant because it was specifically linked to the case and was not used as character conformity evidence. The expert testified about defendant's affiliation with a gang and about the gang's trade being the trafficking of heroin, primarily by using a female's body cavity to transport the contraband, and having that female accompanied by a gang member; that evidence was relevant to the offense, which was charged after defendant entered the country with a woman who was carrying heroin in her vaginal cavity. Ojeda v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8557 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 24 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Burglary & Criminal Trespass : Burglary : Elements

63. In a burglary trial, there was no error in the admission of evidence that defendant had, in his possession when he was arrested, items taken in a subsequent burglary from the same victim; the evidence was admissible to rebut a line of questioning directed at burglaries that occurred after defendant was in custody. Ellis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 414 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 24 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Child Pornography : General Overview

64. In defendant's child pornography case, it was within the zone of reasonable disagreement as to whether each of the pieces of evidence objected to possessed some relevance to matters of consequence because defendant denied that he had any connection to the child pornography found within his townhouse or that he had shown pornography to a child. Each of the items arguably served to tie defendant to the computer equipment in question as well as to the child pornography thereon. Checo v. State, 402 S.W.3d 440, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7029 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 11 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

65. In an aggravated assault and aggravated sexual assault case, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 402, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony of a victim's former sexual partner that the victim had not engaged in sadomasochistic activities with her former partner prior to or after defendant's assault as it was relevant to determine whether she consented to sexual encounter and to having defendant brand his initials on her buttocks. Reed v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10107 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 22 2006).

66. At the punishment phase of a trial for the sexual assault of an 11-year-old child, evidence that should have been allowed under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 § 3(a)(1) to show circumstances and for mitigation included that the victim frequently called defendant and that she lied about her age. Eaves v. State, 141 S.W.3d 686, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4728 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

67. In the sentencing phase of defendant's sexual assault case, a court properly excluded testimony regarding prison conditions and defendant's potential status of being "fresh meat" in prison where the witness's testimony was elicited specifically to educate the jury on what defendant's prison experiences would be, and the testimony would not have been helpful to the jury in determining the appropriate sentence. Zunker v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4376 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 13 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 177 S.W.3d 72, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 320 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

68. Evidence of sperm located on a victim's clothing after a sexual assault was not relevant at trial because there was no evidence that defendant ejaculated during the crime. Davis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3815 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 29 2004).

69. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by taking judicial notice of defendant's birth date where the alleged discrepancy regarding defendant's date of birth was not reflected in the appellate record, and as to the age difference, the victim testified without objection that she was 14 years old and that defendant told her he was 35 years old. The jury could also draw its own conclusions from the appearance of the victim and defendant in the courtroom. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2878 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 927, 125 S. Ct. 1652, 161 L. Ed. 2d 489, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2556, 73 U.S.L.W. 3556 (2005).

70. In defendant's trial on two counts of indecency with a child, testimony from defendant's ex-wife that defendant occasionally paraded around in front of his minor daughters, the complainants, in the nude with an erection was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and, thus, admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402, and its prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the State had to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant had contact with the complainants and the contact was done for his sexual gratification, and because the evidence was relevant to prove sexual motive in as much as the manner that defendant acted around his own children was the only proof of defendant's possible sexual motive if the touching did in fact occur. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

71. Testimony of a sexual assault nurse examiner was relevant, even thought the examination took place two years after the last alleged act of child sexual abuse, because it refuted defense questioning of other witnesses about the absence of trauma or physical evidence to establish that the alleged acts occurred. Kaizer v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7271 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 13 2013).

72. In a trial for indecency with a child, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 in admitting testimony about the complainant's delayed outcry. The trial court was within its discretion to find that fear of defendant by his son was relevant because it explained the complainant's fear of defendant, which was the proffered reason for her prior denial when the son reported the abuse and for the complainant's delayed outcry. Welch v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2692, 2011 WL 1364970 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 12 2011).

73. In a trial for child sexual assault, statements about a phone conversation between defendant and his priest and testimony from a forensic examiner who interviewed the complainant were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 to rebut defendant's claim that the complainant fabricated the allegation. Gutierrez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8952, 2010 WL 4484350 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2010).

74. In a trial for sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, defendant failed to preserve an argument, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33, regarding testimony that the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services (DFPS) had "reason to believe" the allegations; the appellate argument under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was not presented in the court below through an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Todd v. State, 242 S.W.3d 126, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9053 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

75. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault case, the mere fact the complainant might have had intercourse with defendant's nephew did not rebut the scientific proof provided by the State showing a probability of greater than 99.99 percent that defendant fathered the complainant's child. More importantly, paternity of the child did not bear on defendant's guilt. Reagan v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3589 (Tex. App. El Paso May 10 2007).

76. In an aggravated sexual assault case, a biologist's testimony regarding possible DNA testing of defendant's nephew to compare his DNA with that of complainant's child was properly excluded because the biologist testified that it would not have affected the testing she conducted on defendant's DNA that included a greater than 99.99 percent probability that he was the biological father of the complainant's child. Because the evidence was speculative, mere conjecture, and irrelevant, the testimony was properly excluded. Reagan v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3589 (Tex. App. El Paso May 10 2007).

77. In a trial for indecency with a child, it was proper to exclude evidence of conduct by the complainant's mother, such as extramarital affairs and involvement in pornography and drug abuse, because the probative value in establishing a motive for the complainant to make false accusations against defendant was low. Jimenez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6538 (Tex. App. Waco July 26 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : Elements

78. Complainant testified that defendant fondled and kissed her in an escalating fashion when she was between the ages of six and 10, that he felt her under her clothes when she was 10, and that he had sexual intercourse with her when she was 13. Because the testimony was relevant to the state of mind of the complainant and defendant, as well as to the previous and subsequent relationship between the complainant and defendant, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, the trial court did not err in admitting the extraneous offense evidence. Parker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8834 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 12 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : General Overview

79. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding part of defendant's employer's testimony concerning the employer's son's prescription medication and a videotape of defendant's 2000 arrest for driving while intoxicated because the evidence was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to whether defendant was guilty of the charged crimes of driving while intoxicated and evading arrest. Peavey v. State, 248 S.W.3d 455, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1818 (Tex. App. Austin 2008).

80. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, evidence of defendant's medical condition, including that she had lupus and allergies, was properly excluded on the basis that there was no expert medical testimony as to what effect the medicines that she was taking would have on a person's conduct or condition, or on a person's normal use of mental and physical faculties; the proffered evidence was properly subject to a relevancy objection because it was a self-serving, sympathy-provoking recitation of her health and current medication without any showing of a link or nexus to any fact that is of consequence. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

81. Evidence of a police officer's administration of a modified alphabet test to defendant suspected of driving while intoxicated (DWI) was properly admitted because it was highly probative of whether defendant had the normal use of her mental faculties. The evidence did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational but indelible way because intoxication and, more specifically, defendant's loss of her normal mental or physical faculties was among the issues that a jury had to consider in a DWI trial, and, furthermore, the evidence was addressed for only a very brief period of time. Bergman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3046 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 21 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence

82. In defendant's DWI case, he objected to the State's introduction of his blood-test results and extrapolation testimony because the blood draw occurred two hours after he was arrested and therefore was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402 to whether he had the normal use of his faculties at the time of the alleged offense. The trial court overruled the objection. Crenshaw v. State, 378 S.W.3d 460, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1254, 2012 WL 4372284 (Tex. Crim. App. Sept. 26 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence

83. In a driving while intoxicated case, a trial court did not err by admitting a DIC-24 form into evidence because it was relevant to prove that defendant refused to submit to the taking of a specimen of his breath and that defendant was provided with the required information under Tex. Transp. Code Ann. § 724.015 before his specimen was requested. Frnka v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7095, 2009 WL 2882939 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 9 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : Elements

84. In a driving while intoxicated trial, evidence that cocaine was located in plain view next to the driver's seat in the vehicle defendant was driving was relevant to prove the State's allegation in the indictment that defendant was intoxicated, and, because the possession of cocaine evidence went to a material element of the State's case, it was not an extraneous offense. Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2064, 2013 WL 765711 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 28 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Weapons : Possession : General Overview

85. Trial court did not err when it admitted evidence that defendant had been seen selling drugs a month before her indicted offense of being a felon in possession of a firearm because the testimony, elicited from a witness present when the indicted offense was committed, was relevant and tended to make the existence of defendant's intent to possess a firearm more likely than not, as the witness testified that he knew of five prior occasions on which defendant sold crack cocaine and also commented that drug dealers were often armed to protect themselves from being robbed. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Weapons : Use : Commission of Another Crime : Elements

86. In a trial for failing to stop and render aid, evidence of the complainant's intoxication was properly excluded because the complainant's intoxication or sobriety when he was struck or his degree of fault in the accident was not relevant. Soto v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10071, 2012 WL 6049112 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 6 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Brady Materials : Brady Claims

87. It was not reversible Brady error to exclude evidence that one of the officers involved in a search was later convicted of theft of property from crime scenes because the State disclosed the fact of the conviction and there was no evidence that the officer had anything to do with the money in the current case. Ramirez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8144, 2014 WL 3735290 (Tex. App. Dallas July 28 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : Tangible Objects : Scope

88. In defendant's trial for indecency with a child by contact in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11, the trial court properly ruled that certain letters to and from the victim that were in the possession of the prosecution were not discoverable under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 39.14 nor admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 because they were not relevant to the issues at trial and were not exculpatory. Shaw v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5109, 2009 WL 1896068 (Tex. App. Austin July 3 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Eyewitness Identification : Photo Identifications

89. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, the statement by the witness that she was afraid to select the photo of defendant in the photo lineup was relevant and admissible because it showed that she identified defendant as the person that perpetrated the victim's murder. Benavides v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4971, 2012 WL 2353731 (Tex. App. Dallas June 21 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Suppression of Evidence

90. Trial court did not err by denying defendant's motion to suppress statements made by correctional officers and witnesses because the testimony was not illegally obtained; because the jury was the exclusive judge of the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony, the trial court did not err by denying the motion. Macon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 211 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 11 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

91. Defendant did not show that his trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to raise a relevance objection because testimony about defendant's remarks to the victim was relevant in that it revealed the victim's motive for distancing himself from defendant and helped to explain his reticence to involve himself with defendant. Perkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15003, 2013 WL 6569874 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 12 2013).

92. Defendant failed to prove that defense counsel was ineffective because she opened the door under Tex. R. Evid. 402 to damaging character evidence about his gang membership during his robbery trial. The record was silent as to counsel's trial strategy; the record did not show that counsel knew defendant was a gang member or that defendant's tattoos were indicative of gang membership. Huerta v. State, 359 S.W.3d 887, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 852, 2012 WL 311677 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 2 2012).

93. During defendant's trial for delivering more than one gram but less than four grams of cocaine, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112, his trial counsel did not provide ineffective assistance by failing to object to certain portions of an undercover narcotics officer's testimony where counsel might have made the strategic decision to not object because he reasonably believed such an objection (whether on relevancy, confrontation, or other grounds) would likely be overruled by the trial court because such testimony was arguably admissible; the record indicated that the complained-of testimony was being offered as background information so that the jury could understand why the undercover officer was not surprised to see defendant appear at the motel room where the officer was working, even though the officer had initially been scheduled to meet a different suspected drug dealer, and such evidence could be considered relevant by a trial court, which could then choose to admit such evidence over any evidentiary objection under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Henderson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9843 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 20 2007).

94. Even if trial counsel should have objected to testimony from a murder victim's parent, defendant admitted shooting the victim three times; therefore, it was unlikely that the outcome of the trial would have been different if trial counsel had objected to the relevance of the evidence; defendant therefore failed to show that counsel was ineffective in failing to object. Kearse v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9828 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 19 2007).

95. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to an officer's statement that people associated with methamphetamine labs were dangerous because the statement provided support for the reasonableness of the officers' protective sweep and initial detention of the suspects; the probative value was not outweighed by any danger that the jurors would infer that defendant was dangerous because "dangerousness" was not an element of the crimes charged. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

96. In a trial for aggravated robbery, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to evidence that showed the complainant suffered actual serious bodily injury rather than that he was threatened and placed in fear of imminent bodily injury or death. The contextual evidence admitted to prove the crime was clearly admissible because it placed the offense in its proper setting so that the jury could evaluate it. Washington v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11809 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 30 2004).

97. In a driving while intoxicated case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to a recording of defendant's postarrest phone conversation where, during the conversation, defendant was argumentative and used offensive language; the conversation was relevant because it provided a physical exemplar of defendant's demeanor and manner of speech, which could have been used by the jury as evidence of defendant's intoxication level. Campbell v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3509 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Confrontation

98. Judgment convicting and sentencing defendant of first degree felony offense of aggravated sexual assault of a child was reversed and remanded for a new trial, where the trial court erred in excluding evidence that defendant met with the victim, since he believed she was in danger of being molested by her cousin, and the improper limitation of defendant's cross-examination was an error of constitutional magnitude and harmful. Cooper v. State, 95 S.W.3d 488, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8498 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2002).

99. Judgment convicting and sentencing defendant of first degree felony offense of aggravated sexual assault of a child was reversed and remanded for a new trial, where the trial court erred in excluding evidence that defendant met with the victim, since he believed she was in danger of being molested by her cousin, and the improper limitation of defendant's cross-examination was error of constitutional magnitude and harmful. Cooper v. State, 95 S.W.3d 488, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8498 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Admission of Codefendant Statements

100. Fact that defendant's spouse confessed to the unadjudicated offense of possession of marijuana did not make it any more or less probable that defendant was a party to the offense; thus, it was proper to exclude the spouse's admission. Moore v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5823, 2014 WL 2521537 (Tex. App. Tyler May 30 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Cross-Examination

101. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine an officer about the confidential informant because the disallowed questions were not relevant to the issue of defendant's guilt or innocence, as the State did not rely on events related to obtaining the search warrant in proving defendant's guilt. Nwaogu v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4588, 2013 WL 1490489 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 11 2013).

102. Defendant failed to show an abuse by the trial court in excluding evidence where he did not show the exclusion of relevant and reliable evidence, Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, that formed such a vital part of his case that its exclusion effectively precluded him from presenting a defense, U.S. Const. amends. VI, XIV. Houston v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5276, 2012 WL 2511588 (Tex. App. Dallas July 2 2012).

103. In a stalking case, the trial court did not err by allowing the cross-examination of a defense witness regarding whether she was aware that defendant had been charged with a crime following an alleged domestic violence incident with the victim and whether she was aware that he had violated a protective order and assaulted his former wife; this evidence was relevant to defendant's good character after the witness testified that she had called the victim and asked her to give defendant another chance. Allen v. State, 218 S.W.3d 905, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2527 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

104. Although defendant claimed that a trial court erred in not allowing him to cross-examine his arresting officer concerning another officer's relationship with a former girlfriend of defendant, there was no evidence presented of any bias or prejudice on the part of the arresting officer, only that six months after the incident he became aware that a fellow officer was dating a woman who had a relationship with defendant; having established no possible bias or prejudice, defendant had not shown that the evidence was relevant or that the trial judge abused his discretion by failing to allow testimony of the post-arrest knowledge obtained by the arresting officer. Waldrop v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8017 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 7 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Prison Attire & Restraints

105. Video (but not audio) of defendant's interview with a detective was properly excluded because the jury could discern that defendant was in custody, given the venue; his ill-fitting, monochrome jail uniform with the name of a county jail stenciled on the back; and a plastic identification bracelet. The court deferred to the trial court's finding that the probative value was diminished by the State's ability to recreate defendant's pantomime of the events in question through its witness. State v. Pringle, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7671 (Tex. App. Tyler June 25 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Impeachment

106. Where the State had already established on direct examination that the complainant was serving a deferred adjudication probation during one point in her relationship with defendant, any further inquiry would not have made the existence of any fact of consequence to the determination of defendant's alleged offense more or less probable than it was without the evidence, and such testimony was not relevant to any bias, motive, or interest to help the State, making it an impermissible method of impeachment; accordingly, the trial court was within its discretion to limit the question posed by defendant's counsel on cross-examination. Crook v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3485 (Tex. App. Dallas May 6 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : General Overview

107. Trial court did not violate defendant's due process right to introduce additional evidence to establish that an alternative perpetrator committed a murder because evidence of the alternative perpetrator's prior crimes did not demonstrate the required nexus between the crime charged and the alternative perpetrator because the evidence did not tend to connect the alternative perpetrator to the murder of the victim. Villa v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1025 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 13 2008).

108. In a case alleging aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, defendant's right to present a defensive theory that some other person perpetrated the offense against a child was not denied when a trial court refused to allow him to question witnesses about a previously filed child abuse complaint because there was no nexus shown between this complaint and the charged offense; defendant was the only adult present when the injuries were sustained, the prior investigation ruled out abuse by a grandparent, and it was not relevant in showing that the mother, or any other adult, could have abused the child. Hernandez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6815 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 23 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Self-Defense

109. In a case in which a jury found defendant guilty of the offense of murder, the trial court did not err in excluding defendant's testimony regarding the specifics about the "immoral teachings" that he believed his children's grandmother and the complainant had been exposing the children to because defendant did not explain, nor was a reviewing court able to discern, how any testimony about the contents of any "immoral teachings" would have had any tendency to make his self-defense claim more or less probable. Washington v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4434, 2009 WL 40168 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 8 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Limiting Instructions

110. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the trial court did not err in declining to strike the previously admitted evidence of the knife and a witness's testimony about the knife because the knife was relevant, it was admitted into evidence before the witness testified, and a photograph showed the exact location where the knife was found. Because the evidence was properly admitted, the trial court did not err by refusing defendant's request for a limiting instruction. Jones v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9570, 2009 WL 4856420 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 17 2009).

111. In drug and robbery case, although defendant's relevancy objection to evidence of the other thefts sufficiently apprised the trial court of the nature of his complaint, where defendant did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and obtain a ruling as to whether the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, nor ask for a limiting instruction, defendant waived at trial any complaint over admission of evidence of extraneous thefts. Loftin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2651 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 25 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Evidence

112. When defendant pleaded guilty to intoxication manslaughter in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.08(a), the doctrines of double jeopardy and collateral estoppel did not preclude the trial court at sentencing from determining that defendant's prior offense involved alcohol even though the State had reduced the charge in the prior case from driving while intoxicated (DWI) to obstruction of a highway or other passageway; double jeopardy did not attach, because there were no common factual elements between DWI and obstruction of a highway or other passageway. Under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) and Tex. R. Evid. 401-402, the trial court was permitted to consider all relevant evidence at sentencing. Cherian v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8646, 2010 WL 4244002 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 28 2010).

113. In a sentencing trial for felony assault to a family member, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 when the trial court admitted testimony from defendant's wife about the circumstances of a prior assault and guilty plea. The testimony was relevant punishment evidence because it illustrated defendant's propensity for family violence and that he was not deterred by his earlier conviction. Murchison v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7481, 2009 WL 3050823 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 24 2009).

114. Probation officer was properly allowed to testify that defendant was not a suitable candidate for community supervision because suitability is a matter relevant to sentencing under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) when a defendant seeks placement on community supervision; the court noted that the trial judge still had operate within the bounds of Tex. R. Evid. 402. Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

115. In a case of indecency with a child, the admission of irrelevant evidence at punishment that the victim's brother also abused the victim was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the victim testified that defendant did not know of the brother's abuse and because proper evidence of defendant's conduct warranted the sentence imposed. Dustman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6588 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 17 2005).

116. In a joint trial on the offense of sexual assault, a trial court's decision to admit a portion of a videotape showing one co-defendant's presence during the accidental overdose of a friend was not erroneous because the trial court repeatedly instructed the jury that defendant was not there. Klock v. State, 177 S.W.3d 53, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

117. Trial court's decision to exclude testimony from a former prisoner regarding confinement conditions during sentencing was not erroneous because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony would not have been helpful to the jury in determining the appropriate sentence in a sexual assault case; moreover, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony went beyond the scope of any door opened by the State. Klock v. State, 177 S.W.3d 53, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

118. In an aggravated sexual assault case, a court properly excluded a defense witness's testimony where it described prison life as he had observed it several years before, rather than present prison life, and the court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony was not helpful to determining an appropriate sentence. Zunker v. State, 177 S.W.3d 72, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 320 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

119. At the punishment phase of a trial for the sexual assault of an 11-year-old child, evidence that should have been allowed under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 § 3(a)(1) to show circumstances and for mitigation included that the victim frequently called defendant and that she lied about her age. Eaves v. State, 141 S.W.3d 686, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4728 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

120. In the sentencing phase of defendant's sexual assault case, a court properly excluded testimony regarding prison conditions and defendant's potential status of being "fresh meat" in prison where the witness's testimony was elicited specifically to educate the jury on what defendant's prison experiences would be, and the testimony would not have been helpful to the jury in determining the appropriate sentence. Zunker v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4376 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 13 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 177 S.W.3d 72, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 320 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Victim Statements

121. Even if trial counsel should have objected to testimony from a murder victim's parent, defendant admitted shooting the victim three times; therefore, it was unlikely that the outcome of the trial would have been different if trial counsel had objected to the relevance of the evidence; defendant therefore failed to show that counsel was ineffective in failing to object. Kearse v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9828 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 19 2007).

122. Where defendant was convicted of sexual assault, trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 in admitting testimony from the victim and his sister of the effect of the assault on the victim; testimony of an inflammatory or sympathetic nature will not bar its admissibility if it is relevant to the issue at trial, and the issue need not be contested. Ranels v. State, 1996 Tex. App. LEXIS 2867 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 20 1996).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : General Overview

123. In defendant's indecency with a child case, the court properly excluded evidence that a boyfriend of the victims' mother was a registered sex offender because evidence of the boyfriend's registered-sex-offender status would only have been relevant if the identity of the alleged perpetrator of the offenses was an issue in the case. However, evidence of an alternative perpetrator was not relevant to the determination of whether the alleged offenses occurred. Shaw v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9038 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 3 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : Civil Commitments

124. Admission of evidence of a sex offender's 1975 murder conviction during a proceeding to commit him as a sexually violent predator was not error because the conviction and the facts surrounding his nonsexual criminal history were relevant to the issue of whether he suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence. In re Martinez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13512, 2013 WL 5874583 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2013).

125. In a trial of inmate's civil commitment as a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.062, the trial court properly excluded the inmate's expert's testimony that one of the victims had recanted pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 702, because such evidence represented a collateral attack on the underlying convictions, which had not been set aside. In re Barron, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8495, 2013 WL 3487385 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 11 2013).

126. In a case in which a sex offender was civilly committed after a jury found him to be a sexually violent predator, the trial court could have reasonably determined that the opinion of the State's expert concerning the sex offender's risk of recidivism was admissible as relevant evidence because the expert's explanation of the term "likely" was consistent with how dictionaries commonly defined that term and with the Texas Supreme Court's construction of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.003(a)(2). In re Weatherread, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9757 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 29 2012).

127. Sex offender's civil commitment as a sexually violent predator was proper where it could not be said that the testimony of one of the State's experts lacked probative value because, using evidence-based support, the expert had presented a professional opinion expressing a reasoned judgment based upon established research and techniques for his profession and not the mere ipse dixit of a credentialed witness. Moreover, the sex offender's claim that the testimony of another of the State's experts amounted to no evidence because it contained significant analytical gaps was not supported by the record, which reflected that the expert had described the factors he considered, and had explained why he felt those factors significant. In re Weatherread, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9757 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 29 2012).

128. Trial court erred by excluding defendant's sole expert witness, a forensic psychiatrist, from testifying at trial concerning his commitment to outpatient treatment under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.081 on the basis of his supposed disbelief in the existence of "behavioral abnormality" because the psychiatrist's opinion was based on his methodology, which he explained and applied to the particular facts of the case, including the commission of repeated sexual assault against elderly nursing home patients; the improperly excluded testimony related to a critical issue that was submitted to the jury, namely whether defendant suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence. The error was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1 because the psychiatrist's testimony was the only evidence defendant had favoring a finding that he would not likely reoffend, and defendant's risk of reoffending was one of the central disputed issues. In re Commitment of Winkle, 362 S.W.3d 241, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1820, 2012 WL 746298 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 8 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : Classification

129. Admission of evidence of a sex offender's 1975 murder conviction during a proceeding to commit him as a sexually violent predator was not error because the conviction and the facts surrounding his nonsexual criminal history were relevant to the issue of whether he suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence. In re Martinez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13512, 2013 WL 5874583 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2013).

130. Finding that respondent was a sexually violent predator (SVP) was proper under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002(5) because there was no error in failing to allow respondent's counsel to question a witness on the interpretation of the SVP statute, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.001-851.151. The questions respondent was not allowed to ask did not address a fact of consequence that would have made the doctor's prognosis more or less probable. In re Hill, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1881 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 28 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : Registration

131. Based on his conviction for first-degree felony offense burglary of a habitation with intent to commit sexual assault, defendant did not show why it was reasonable for him to believe that the findings of fact and conclusions of law established he was not required to comply with sex-offender registration, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 62.001(5)(D); it was within the trial court's discretion to determine that the findings of fact and conclusions of law were not relevant evidence. Durham v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7301 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 13 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : Evidence

132. Trial court erred by excluding defendant's sole expert witness, a forensic psychiatrist, from testifying at trial concerning his commitment to outpatient treatment under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.081 on the basis of his supposed disbelief in the existence of "behavioral abnormality" because the psychiatrist's opinion was based on his methodology, which he explained and applied to the particular facts of the case, including the commission of repeated sexual assault against elderly nursing home patients; the improperly excluded testimony related to a critical issue that was submitted to the jury, namely whether defendant suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence. The error was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1 because the psychiatrist's testimony was the only evidence defendant had favoring a finding that he would not likely reoffend, and defendant's risk of reoffending was one of the central disputed issues. In re Commitment of Winkle, 362 S.W.3d 241, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1820, 2012 WL 746298 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 8 2012).

133. In an indecency with a child case, the court committed reversible error in the admission of sex toys because there was no suggestion that sex toys were used in any way related to the complainant, and the State emphasized those items in providing a detailed description of each item, making certain to emphasize their graphic nature by carrying them in a single plastic tub, pointing out the testifying officer's wearing of gloves, and repeatedly apologizing to the jury for the graphic nature of those items. Warr v. State, 418 S.W.3d 617, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2538 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 15 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

134. Defendant's statements to police which contradicted other evidence presented at trial were relevant and admissible to show his consciousness of guilt. Although the tapes contained references to drugs, crime, nicknames, extraneous offenses and bad acts, defendant did not specify where these references could be found in the three hour tapes. Ross v. State, 154 S.W.3d 804, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11407 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

135. Defendant's conviction of intoxication manslaughter was upheld where he waived the issue of relevance of the photograph of the victim's charred body; the only objection made in the district court went to probative value and unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Anderson v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10122 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 2 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

136. Where defendant was convicted for two counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child with a deadly weapon, his claim that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to admit evidence of the child's promiscuity over the State's relevance and Tex. R. Evid. 402 objections was not preserved for review. Defendant did not seek to offer evidence of the child's promiscuity at trial; by withdrawing a line of questioning on the subject, defendant prevented the trial court from ruling on the issue. Riley v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2830, 2014 WL 1016240 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 13 2014).

137. Because at trial defense counsel did not object to pictures of his tattoos on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 402 and 403, defendant's complaint on appeal was not preserved. Mejia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6862, 2012 WL 3525641 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2012).

138. Trial court did not err by admitting testimony from two witnesses about defendant's past use and sale of methamphetamine under Tex. R. Evid. 404 because defendant's relevance objection did not preserve his Rule 404 complaints and because he lodged no objection to the testimony about his past use and sale of methamphetamine by one of the witnesses. Norris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 108, 2012 WL 34453 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 4 2012).

139. Defendant failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion during the punishment phase of the trial by admitting extraneous offense evidence to which jeopardy had attached, because none of the objections were based on a double-jeopardy violation, and the undisputed facts showed that defendant's claim of a double jeopardy violation was not clearly apparent on the face of the record, when the facts establishing double jeopardy were disputed. Williams v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9561, 2010 WL 4910243 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 2 2010).

140. In a driving while intoxicated case, even though defendant made several challenges to the trial court's admission of a DC-24 form into evidence, because the only objection made at trial was for relevance, that was the only issue preserved for appellate review. Frnka v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7095, 2009 WL 2882939 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 9 2009).

141. Defendant failed to preserve an issue for review because defendant made an objection, early in the complainant's testimony, that questions regarding the complainant's cancer treatment were irrelevant and unfairly prejudicial, that objection was overruled, and defendant did not at that time request a continuing objection nor lodge any further objection. The prosecutor went on to ask the complainant nine more questions about her cancer treatment, and the complainant responded with details about her treatment, including its nature and frequency, without any objections from defendant as to relevance or unfair prejudice. Thierry v. State, 288 S.W.3d 80, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1043 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

142. Defendant did not object to testimony about gang affiliation during the guilt-innocence phase of a murder trial and therefore failed to preserved error under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Vasquez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2952 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 2008).

143. In a trial for sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, defendant failed to preserve an argument, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33, regarding testimony that the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services (DFPS) had "reason to believe" the allegations; the appellate argument under Tex. R. Evid. 702 was not presented in the court below through an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Todd v. State, 242 S.W.3d 126, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9053 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

144. Although defendant on trial for sexually molesting his stepdaughter objected to the admission of the report of the sexual assault nurse examiner as improper bolstering and a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403, defendant did not identify at trial which Texas Rule of Evidence, if any, was violated by the admission of the nurse's report. As such, he failed to preserve his objection for appeal. Rivas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4395 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 6 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : General Overview

145. In drug and robbery case, although defendant's relevancy objection to evidence of the other thefts sufficiently apprised the trial court of the nature of his complaint, where defendant did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and obtain a ruling as to whether the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, nor ask for a limiting instruction, defendant waived at trial any complaint over admission of evidence of extraneous thefts. Loftin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2651 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 25 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : Admission of Evidence

146. During defendant's criminal trial for burglary of a building, the trial court overruled defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 402 relevancy objection to testimony about his methamphetamine addiction. The Court of Appeals of Texas held that the failure to reassert his earlier objection waived the issue for appellate review in accordance with Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Greenlee v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9438 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 19 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

147. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence because the trial court's decision to admit evidence of defendant's knowledge that he was prohibited from owning a firearm fell within the zone of reasonable disagreement. Tran v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2387, 2014 WL 859674 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 4 2014).

148. Court did not abuse its discretion in the exclusion of the proffered evidence because the excluded testimony failed to establish the existence of "bad blood" between defendant and the alleged victim. Tran v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2387, 2014 WL 859674 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 4 2014).

149. In a criminal solicitation of a minor for sexual assault case, under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the defense witness's testimony about the veracity of the chat room logs because it was irrelevant as he could not say whether the State's or defendant's version of the chat logs was an accurate version of the actual chat sessions. Pudasaini v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5582, 2011 WL 2905592 (Tex. App. Dallas July 21 2011).

150. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by prohibiting defendant from questioning his daughter about the victim's use of marijuana because whether the victim used drugs over a month earlier would not rebut the toxicology report showing no drugs in her system at the time she was killed. Mcghee v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 15 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

151. In a case of indecency with a child, the admission of irrelevant evidence at punishment that the victim's brother also abused the victim was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the victim testified that defendant did not know of the brother's abuse and because proper evidence of defendant's conduct warranted the sentence imposed. Dustman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6588 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 17 2005).

152. Trial court should have excluded as irrelevant and prejudicial a BB gun that was found in a defendant's truck and that was not used during the charged burglary. The error was harmless, however, because the court did not have fair assurances that the mind of an average juror would have found the State's case less persuasive had the BB gun not been admitted. Moreno v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4487 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 9 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6371 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 11, 2005).

153. Judgment convicting and sentencing defendant of first degree felony offense of aggravated sexual assault of a child was reversed and remanded for a new trial, where the trial court erred in excluding evidence that defendant met with the victim, since he believed she was in danger of being molested by her cousin, and the improper limitation of defendant's cross-examination was an error of constitutional magnitude and harmful. Cooper v. State, 95 S.W.3d 488, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8498 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2002).

154. Judgment convicting and sentencing defendant of first degree felony offense of aggravated sexual assault of a child was reversed and remanded for a new trial, where the trial court erred in excluding evidence that defendant met with the victim, since he believed she was in danger of being molested by her cousin, and the improper limitation of defendant's cross-examination was error of constitutional magnitude and harmful. Cooper v. State, 95 S.W.3d 488, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8498 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

155. Trial court's alleged error in permitting the complainant to testify as to the punishment he would like defendant to receive had no more than a very slight effect on the jury's determination of punishment; presuming there was error, such error was harmless. Hines v. State, 396 S.W.3d 706, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2000, 2013 WL 748755 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 28 2013).

156. In a driving while intoxicated (DWI) case, it was error to admit the entirety of defendant's driving record because it contained evidence of extraneous offenses beyond the prior DWI convictions that were elements of a charged offense. However, the error was harmless because evidence of guilt was ample. Bridges v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9104, 2011 WL 5557534 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 16 2011).

157. Because a crayon drawing found in the victim's clothes during the autopsy did not provide a small nudge toward proving or disproving some fact of consequence, the drawing was irrelevant and inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 402; however, under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), admission of the drawing was harmless error as the evidence against defendant was substantial and the drawing was not so emotionally charged that it prevented the jury from rationally considering the evidence before it. Soto v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8360, 2011 WL 5000393 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 20 2011).

158. In a capital murder trial, any error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 in admitting a drawing by a witness to the shooting that showed both the shooting and the immediate aftermath was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the events depicted in the drawing were testified to by several other witnesses, surveillance videos showed defendant's actions, and defendant confessed. Petty v. State, 346 S.W.3d 200, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5494 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 19 2011).

159. In an indecency with a child case, the court erred by admitting extraneous offense evidence due to the lack of similarity between the extraneous offenses and the charged offenses, the duration in time of twenty years between the offenses, and the lack of evidence concerning a continuing course of conduct by defendant. The extraneous acts did not take place in defendant's home and defendant did not ask the witness to touch himself or defendant.

Crocker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9432, 2009 WL 4725299 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 11 2009).

160. Trial court abused its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's prior burglary arrest pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) where the tendency of the evidence was to show defendant was a bad person or that his character conformed to that of a person from whom criminal conduct might be expected. However, the error did not influence the jury, or had but a slight effect on its verdict of guilt, because the State's presentation of the alleged burglary, although factually detailed, was brief and received only passing mention in closing argument, and because the propensity and potency of the evidence to characterize defendant as a criminal was blunted by the previous, unopposed, admission of evidence of his prior conviction for manslaughter. Tello v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8401, 2009 WL 3518006 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 30 2009).

161. In a sexual assault of a child case, the court reversibly erred by admitting extraneous acts evidence because defendant's practice of not using a condom while engaged in consensual sex with an adult companion, or informing the companion of his HIV positive status, had the practical effect of prejudicing any defense raised by defendant regarding the complainant's credibility. Such an effect would have been detrimental to defendant, who sought to discredit the complainant by pointing out factual variances in his outcries, and by suggesting that the complainant was motivated to fabricate the assault to avoid being schooled in an alternative education program. Lopez v. State, 288 S.W.3d 148, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2050 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 26 2009).

162. Trial court erred by admitting an extraneous offense of marijuana possession under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in a case involving unlawful possession of a weapon because it was irrelevant where defendant did not challenge the legality of a search; however, the error was harmless since defendant's sole defensive theory was negated by his admission to police. Defendant contended that he had no knowledge of gun found under the driver's seat of a vehicle, but he told a police officer that searched the vehicle that there was a weapon inside. Provencio v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6073 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 11 2008).

163. In a trial for aggravated robbery, it was error to admit testimony from an officer that people in the area commonly did not call police when they found a gun; however, the error in admitting the irrelevant evidence was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44 because the evidence of guilt, while not overwhelming, was substantial; defendant admitted to involvement, and the complainant's testimony placed the gun squarely in defendant's hands during a robbery. Brown v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1406 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 28 2008).

164. During the guilt-innocence phase of defendant's murder trial, the trial court erred under Tex. R. Evid. 104 in admitting evidence regarding the theft of a rifle from the store where defendant worked based on the State's proffer where although the proffer might well have identified defendant as one of several possible suspects in the theft, it fell short of providing legally sufficient evidence to allow the trier of fact to reasonably find that defendant committed the offense because, based on the proffer, the only link between defendant and the theft was that he was one of possibly 14 managers with a key to the gun locker and that he "mentioned" that the store was selling a small child's rifle; furthermore, the erroneous admission of the extraneous offense evidence had a substantial and injurious effect or influence on the jury's verdict, thereby affecting defendant's substantial rights pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 44. Fischer v. State, 235 S.W.3d 470, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8378 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

165. In defendant's capital murder case, evidence in the guilt-innocence phase that painted a picture of the victim as a young man with a promising future whose life defendant had ended prematurely was irrelevant and appealed to the jury's sympathies. However, the error was harmless; defendant admitted to participating in the shooting, and a witness testified that defendant shot the victim and grabbed the bag of codeine. Durand v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6535 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 16 2007).

166. Even though the trial court erred by admitting into evidence during defendant's aggravated sexual assault trial photographs of defendant, his co-defendant, and his roommate having sex, appearing to be intoxicated, and flashing a gang sign, the error was harmless because: (1) the photographs of defendant and the two others partying were not scandalous or shocking, but were innocuous in comparison to the photographs of the complainant and other women, who were naked and unconscious; (2) except for one comment during closing arguments, the State did not emphasize the evidence; (3) there was very little contemporaneous testimony concerning the photographs when they were admitted into evidence; and (4) the jury was manifestly able to consider the probative evidence and separate it from marginally relevant evidence because it acquitted the co-defendant and convicted defendant of the lesser-included offense of sexual assault. Casey v. State, 215 S.W.3d 870, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 230 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

Evidence : Authentication : General Overview

167. In defendant's stalking case, a reasonable fact finder could have found that the telephone number the victim attributed to defendant was his telephone number, and that defendant sent the electronic communications attributed to him by the State and depicted in the challenged exhibits. Accordingly, the challenged exhibits were relevant, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting them. Manuel v. State, 357 S.W.3d 66, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7152 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 31 2011).

Evidence : Competency : Attorneys

168. In a failing to change a driver's license address case, defense counsel's testimony that he told the prosecutor before trial that defendant was a student, and therefore had two addresses, was relevant to rebut the suggestion that defendant, represented by counsel, should somehow have personally communicated the information to the prosecution; the error was not harmless because the officer admitted that if defendant had told him he was a student he would not have given him a ticket. Callahan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3817 (Tex. App. Dallas May 28 2008).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Admissibility

169. In a driving while intoxicated case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to a recording of defendant's postarrest phone conversation where, during the conversation, defendant was argumentative and used offensive language; the conversation was relevant because it provided a physical exemplar of defendant's demeanor and manner of speech, which could have been used by the jury as evidence of defendant's intoxication level. Campbell v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3509 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2004).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Photographs

170. At defendant's murder trial, the court did not err by admitting an autopsy photograph depicting the bullet lodged in the tissue at the back of the victim's neck; the photograph was relevant to the cause of death--a gunshot wound to the head, and manner of death--homicide. Barr v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1714, 2014 WL 641351 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 14 2014).

171. In a murder trial, any error was harmless from the admission of photographs showing unusual items found during a search of defendant's home, including a plastic manikin torso and head suspended by a noose around its neck and replica human skulls; the jury had the means to discern whether the items in the photographs represented an obsession with violence or merely poor taste and a penchant for collecting strange things. Kirk v. State, 421 S.W.3d 772, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 788, 2014 WL 252086 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 23 2014).

172. In a murder trial, any error was harmless from the admission of photographs showing unusual items found during a search of defendant's home, including a plastic manikin torso and head suspended by a noose around its neck and replica human skulls; the jury had the means to discern whether the items in the photographs represented an obsession with violence or merely poor taste and a penchant for collecting strange things. Kirk v. State, 421 S.W.3d 772, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 788, 2014 WL 252086 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 23 2014).

173. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 402, the exclusion of the photographs of a witness based on irrelevance was within the trial court's discretion because defense counsel did not establish that the photographs depicted gang activity and only stated that it could show gang signs. Oliva v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8940, 2011 WL 5428965 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2011).

174. Picture of spinner rims was properly admitted because it aided the jury in understanding the police officers' testimony about the improvements that defendant made to the rental car he drove for approximately one week; that was helpful to the jury by enabling them to determine if the installation of spinner rims tended to demonstrate defendant's control over the rental car. In addition, a photograph of the spinner rims that were actually installed on the rental car would have been relevant for the same reason and admissible at trial. Rollins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9891 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 31, 2009).

175. In a murder case, autopsy photographs were properly admitted because the State had to prove that defendant caused the victim's death by shooting him with a deadly weapon, and a doctor's testimony described the type of injuries the victim received, the extent of those injuries, and the cause of his death. Additionally, although the photographs were somewhat gruesome, they were not enlarged. Ramirez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6640, 2009 WL 4377427 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2009).

176. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly allowed photographs of the victim to be admitted because the medical examiner who performed the autopsy stated that photographs of the child's body before and during the autopsy would assist him in describing his findings to the jury, the testimony was probative of the child's condition at the time defendant brought the child to a witness's house, and the testimony demonstrated the scope and extent of the child's injuries and the cause of death. Williams v. State, 294 S.W.3d 674, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4201 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 11 2009).

177. In a driving while intoxicated case, a booking photograph of defendant was not excluded from evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was not unfairly prejudicial; even though the picture was not flattering, it did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational way. Moreover, it was relevant to show defendant's condition near the time of arrest. Hester v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9242 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 15 2008).

178. In a capital murder case, the court properly admitted two photographs because the photographs bolstered a State witness's testimony that testifying as a "snitch" had detrimental consequences -- injury to his sister, the photographs presented little, if any, prejudice to defendant because no party suggested to the jury that defendant was connected to the stabbing of the witness's sister, and the time involved in the introduction of the two photographs was minimal and unlikely to distract the jury from considering the charged offense when compared to having the witness's sister testify before the jury. Padron v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6175 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2008).

179. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs of the victim at the crime scene because some of the photographs were used by the experts to explain the manner of the death and the amount of force used by defendant when hitting the victim with the baseball bat, tending to disprove his self-defense claim; other photographs, along with the testimony of the blood-spatter expert, addressed the absence of any struggle between the victim and defendant and that the victim was either on his knees or on the ground while being beaten, while some photographs depicted the brutality of the crime and the severity of the injuries and were probative of the manner of the victim's death. Grayson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2210 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 27 2008).

180. During a murder trial, the victim's mother identified a photograph of her son taken before the murder; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photograph; the mother's identification had probative value in identifying the son as the victim. Brown v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7556 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25 2006).

181. Photographs of a murder victim were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and were not unduly prejudicial to defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because a photograph of the victim lying in an ambulance immediately after firefighters removed her body from a burning house was both material and probative, as it established her condition at the crime scene, and because a photograph of her face taken during autopsy was also material and probative of the fact that the autopsy was performed on the same person removed from the crime scene by ambulance. The numerous autopsy photographs were also probative of the victim's cause of death, a material element in the offense of capital murder, and although the detail in the photographs was graphic, each served the purpose of illustrating the nature and extent of the victim's injuries. Vargas v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2417 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2005).

182. Court properly admitted autopsy photos because, although they were gruesome, they were no more gruesome than the injuries that defendant inflicted upon the victim when he committed the offense of intoxication manslaughter. Each of the six photographs depicted a different view of the victim and showed the different injuries that she suffered, and the State did not offer a large number of photographs, nor were the photographs it offered cumulative of the victim's injuries. Booth v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2351, 2014 WL 887286 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 28 2014).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Statements Against Interest

183. In a drug case, the trial court did not err in refusing to allow defendant's girlfriend to testify that another person had stated that the contraband belonged to him; the proffered evidence was not relevant, under Tex. R. Evid. 402, to whether defendant possessed a controlled substance with intent to deliver it, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112(a), and defendant offered no independent facts corroborating the hearsay statement under Tex. R. Evid. 803(24). Menton v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7799 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 22 2005).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Statements of Child Abuse

184. Evidence of bathing incident between defendant and his niece was admissible, Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, 404(b), as it showed the nature of defendant's relationship with and mindset towards his niece, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 Gragert v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3948, 2011 WL 2027955 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 24 2011).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Statements by Party Opponents : General Overview

185. In a medical malpractice case, the probative value of statements from superseded pleadings regarding two nonsuited doctors was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because counsel, representing the parents of an injured child, first alluded to the doctor's party status, thus opening the door to rebuttal, and the statements, which were made by the parents, constituted admissions by party-opponents under Tex. R. Evid. 801, and were not hearsay. Bay Area Healthcare Group, Ltd. v. McShane, 239 S.W.3d 231, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 527, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 866 (Tex. 2007).

Evidence : Hearsay : Rule Components : General Overview

186. Messages retrieved from a murder victim's voicemail were not hearsay under Tex. R. Evid. 801 and were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because they were not offered to prove the truth of the matters asserted therein and they assisted the jury in establishing the time of the victim's death. White v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2224 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 23 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Rule Components : Truth of Matter Asserted

187. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by not permitting defendant to cross-examine a detective about statements allegedly made by a third party during the murder investigation because the statements could not provide defendant with a defense to the capital murder charge unless the jury believed the statements, as they were offered to prove that the third party, not defendant, was the last person to see the victim alive. Therefore, the statements were hearsay, and because defendant did not argue that they were admissible under a hearsay exception, they were inadmissible. Tilford v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5933, 2011 WL 3273543 (Tex. App. El Paso July 29 2011).

Evidence : Inferences & Presumptions : Inferences

188. In a trial for possession hydromorphone, it was proper to admit unsealed and opened vials of medicine to support an inference that defendant's possession was not a one-time mistake. Moore v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5823, 2014 WL 2521537 (Tex. App. Tyler May 30 2014).

Evidence : Judicial Notice

189. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by taking judicial notice of defendant's birth date where the alleged discrepancy regarding defendant's date of birth was not reflected in the appellate record, and as to the age difference, the victim testified without objection that she was 14 years old and that defendant told her he was 35 years old. The jury could also draw its own conclusions from the appearance of the victim and defendant in the courtroom. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2878 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 927, 125 S. Ct. 1652, 161 L. Ed. 2d 489, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2556, 73 U.S.L.W. 3556 (2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Curative Admissibility

190. In a case alleging aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, defendant was not allowed to question witnesses regarding a previous child abuse complaint against the same child since it was not relevant or material to the offense, and a mother could not have been questioned about specific instances of conduct; moreover, the mother's testimony during direct examination did not leave a misleading impression with the jury which needed clarification under Tex. R. Evid. 107; the focus of the prior investigation was a grandmother, who was not a witness in the case. Hernandez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6815 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 23 2007).

191. Evidence of defendant's prior conviction for delivering drugs was admissible where, through his questioning of a defense witness, defense counsel had sought to paint defendant as a "white knight" not involved with drugs, thereby creating a false impression before the jury; by doing so, defendant opened the door to testimony to correct that false impression, and the prosecutor could only correct that false impression by cross-examination of the witness who created it. Jones v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7917 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 5 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

192. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not err by allowing the prosecutor's questions regarding the possible exchange of sexual favors for forgiveness of a drug debt; the evidence was admissible to show the relationship between defendant and the victim. Whitmire v. State, 183 S.W.3d 522, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 170 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

193. No reversible error was presented under Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, and 404(b) by an arresting officer's testimony that defendant told the officer during a traffic stop about defendant's prior arrests because the videotape of the stop, including defendant's own statement of the arrests, was admitted without objection under R. 402, 403, and 404(b). Tunstall v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6336 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 10 2005).

194. Defendant's statements to police which contradicted other evidence presented at trial were relevant and admissible to show his consciousness of guilt. Although the tapes contained references to drugs, crime, nicknames, extraneous offenses and bad acts, defendant did not specify where these references could be found in the three hour tapes. Ross v. State, 154 S.W.3d 804, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11407 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

195. Defendant argued that the trial court erred by excluding evidence relating to his strained marital relationship with the victim because that evidence was probative of his state of mind and motivation at the time of his actions; however, because the only conduct elements potentially implicated for the crime of aggravated assault were the nature of the conduct and the result of the conduct, the circumstances surrounding the conduct were not relevant and were properly excluded. Novillo v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5086 (Tex. App. Austin June 10 2004).

196. Defendant did not establish the relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, of certain evidence regarding the alleged sexual relationship between the two victims, who were step-brothers, as a material issue in the case in which he was found guilty of two counts of fondling/indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, so as to justify admission of evidence of an alleged victim's sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); thus, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Hale v. State, 140 S.W.3d 381, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

197. Defendant did not establish the relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, of certain evidence regarding the alleged sexual relationship between the two victims, who were step-brothers, as a material issue in the case in which he was found guilty of two counts of fondling/indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, so as to justify admission of evidence of an alleged victim's sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); thus, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Hale v. State, 140 S.W.3d 381, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

198. Subject to certain exceptions, all relevant evidence is admissible in a criminal prosecution under Tex. R. Evid. 402 and 401; "relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Haliburton v. State, 80 S.W.3d 309, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4822 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

199. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence that the two men, who defendant was with when he was arrested, were involved in a robbery a short time before the arrest, because it was within the zone of reasonable disagreement whether the robbery was so intertwined with the stop and arrest that the jury's understanding of the offense would have been obscured without it. Haliburton v. State, 80 S.W.3d 309, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4822 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

200. In defendant's trial on two counts of indecency with a child, testimony from defendant's ex-wife that defendant occasionally paraded around in front of his minor daughters, the complainants, in the nude with an erection was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and, thus, admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402, and its prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the State had to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant had contact with the complainants and the contact was done for his sexual gratification, and because the evidence was relevant to prove sexual motive in as much as the manner that defendant acted around his own children was the only proof of defendant's possible sexual motive if the touching did in fact occur. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

201. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 402, finding a piece of evidence to be relevant is the first step in a trial court's determination of whether the evidence should be admitted before the jury. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

202. Once a proponent of an item of evidence shows that the evidence is logically relevant to some issue in the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, it is admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 unless the opponent of the evidence demonstrates that it should be excluded because of some other provision, whether constitutional, statutory, or evidentiary. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Preliminary Questions : General Overview

203. In making the initial determination of admissibility of evidence, Texas courts must apply the principles set forth in the evidentiary rules governing relevancy under Tex. R. Evid. 401-403; to meet the relevancy test, the proffered evidence must, first, have probative value, and second, be of consequence to some issue in the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Ramsey v. Reagan, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 276 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 16 2003).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Preliminary Questions : Weight & Credibility of Evidence

204. During the guilt-innocence phase of defendant's murder trial, the trial court erred under Tex. R. Evid. 104 in admitting evidence regarding the theft of a rifle from the store where defendant worked based on the State's proffer where although the proffer might well have identified defendant as one of several possible suspects in the theft, it fell short of providing legally sufficient evidence to allow the trier of fact to reasonably find that defendant committed the offense because, based on the proffer, the only link between defendant and the theft was that he was one of possibly 14 managers with a key to the gun locker and that he "mentioned" that the store was selling a small child's rifle; furthermore, the erroneous admission of the extraneous offense evidence had a substantial and injurious effect or influence on the jury's verdict, thereby affecting defendant's substantial rights pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 44. Fischer v. State, 235 S.W.3d 470, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8378 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Rulings on Evidence

205. Court did not err in excluding all of defendant's proffered evidence at sentencing, because defendant did not separate the admissible evidence from the inadmissible evidence. Fegans v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588, 2010 WL 1571217 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 8 2010).

206. On appeal of a conviction of misdemeanor theft, the trial court did not err in sustaining the State's objection to the offender's question concerning profit margin in her inquiry as to the value of stolen retail property because the offender did not point to any offer of proof as required by Tex. R. Evid. 103, and the substance of the evidence she sought to offer was not apparent; thus, she forfeited her issue pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33; moreover, had she preserved her complaint, the trial court did not err; the offender complained that the trial court should not have sustained the State's relevance objection, but evidence that the victim had a profit margin did not tend to rebut the fact that the victim's sales price was at a fair market value. Smith v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5880 (Tex. App. Waco July 25 2007).

207. Where defendant used a car jack to strike the hood of the complainant's SUV, the arresting officer was permitted to testify that $1500 was the estimated cost of repairing the damage based on his years of experience with criminal mischief cases; the officer also testified that the body shop's repair estimate was $ 1,530.01. Barnes v. State, 248 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4261 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

208. In a personal injury suit arising from an automobile accident, evidence regarding the defense expert's alleged bias was not material to the outcome of the case. The trial court's exclusion of this evidence did not cause the rendition of an improper judgment. Gill v. Slovak, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8876 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 27 2005).

209. Trial court did not err in not admitting an entire tape that included threatening phone calls from the victim, defendant's former wife, because defendant sought to admit the entire tape, and the messages on the tape that were unidentified had no relevance as to the victim and her alleged motives, and lacked a proper predicate for admission under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 404(b). Davis v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3649 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2005).

210. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1) in excluding an exhibit that was offered to show that a lienholder was in voluntary compliance with the rules and regulations of the Texas Board of Professional Engineers and the former Texas Engineering Practice Act on the grounds that it was irrelevant because the exhibit did not specify that the lienholder had a licensed engineer as a regular, full-time employee or address the appropriate time period. Centurion Planning Corp. v. Seabrook Venture II, 176 S.W.3d 498, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11079 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

211. As a police officer had reasonable suspicion to detain defendant based upon the information in the NCIC system, such that ownership of the vehicle was not relevant to the detention, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence regarding the actual ownership of the vehicle that defendant was in when he was stopped. Thornton v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2273, 2014 WL 813745 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 27 2014).

Evidence : Relevance : Character Evidence

212. Defendant failed to prove that defense counsel was ineffective because she opened the door under Tex. R. Evid. 402 to damaging character evidence about his gang membership during his robbery trial. The record was silent as to counsel's trial strategy; the record did not show that counsel knew defendant was a gang member or that defendant's tattoos were indicative of gang membership. Huerta v. State, 359 S.W.3d 887, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 852, 2012 WL 311677 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 2 2012).

213. Court did not err by refusing to allow defense counsel to cross-examine a police officer about prior incidents in which the officer allegedly used excessive force because the officer's character was not an essential element of the charge, claim, or defense to attempting to take a weapon from a peace officer, and the proffered testimony was not material because it did not address any fact of importance to the outcome of the action. Rico v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4141, 2009 WL 1623343 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 11 2009).

214. In a trial for interfering with the lawful custody of a child, proffered character testimony was irrelevant on its face because whether defendants had ever helped other children in the past was not evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that was of consequence more or less probable. Little v. State, 246 S.W.3d 391, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1126 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2008).

Evidence : Relevance : Compromise & Settlement Negotiations

215. With respect to breach of contract and promissory estoppel claims, a letter written in connection with the settlement of an unrelated lawsuit was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 as proof of an agreement to pay a claimed sum; hence, it was not barred by Tex. R. Evid. 408. MG Bldg. Materials, Ltd. v. Moses Lopez Custom Homes, Inc., 179 S.W.3d 51, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5796 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

216. In a drug case, in light of the offense charged and the evidence adduced at trial, the evidence that defendant possessed a bogus license did not unfairly prejudice the jury or confuse the issues. Accordingly, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence. Gregory v. State, 159 S.W.3d 254, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1660 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

217. Appellant's conviction for felony theft was affirmed because the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence where nothing about the other individual's arrest for the January 30 break-in made any facts of consequence to the determination of appellant's guilt or innocence in the January 25 theft any more or less probable. Graves v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6522 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 17 2014).

218. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's shirts with gun shot residue particles on them because the evidence was relevant, as the shirts were collected from defendant's vehicle two days after the murder. The evidence was not prejudicial because it showed defendant's connection to a discharged weapon, directly or indirectly, at some point in time. Burks v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3243, 2014 WL 1285731 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2014).

219. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's apology to the alleged victim because the apology was indicative of a consciousness of guilt and, thus, was highly probative and not outweighed by any danger of unfair prejudice. Smith v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11678 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 17 2013).

220. Court properly admitted evidence that defendant's girlfriend purchased a silver .38 caliber revolver shortly before the victim's death because a codefendant testified that defendant had used a silver gun, and another witness testified that defendant was carrying a "chrome .38, snub-nose revolver" on the day the victim was killed. The inherent probative force of the evidence concerning the guns was its tendency to show that defendant was the shooter, and although the evidence was prejudicial, it was not unfairly prejudicial. Buckley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2246 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 7 2013).

221. Trial court properly admitted a sex offender's prior written statements in his sexually violent predator commitment proceeding because the statements were relevant apart from their tendency to prove the sex offender's stipulated convictions. The prior inconsistent statements were neither unduly prejudicial nor cumulative of the matters that the sex offender admitted in his requests for admissions. In re Commitment of Bath, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7586, 2012 WL 3860631 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 6 2012).

222. Because at trial defense counsel did not object to pictures of his tattoos on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 402 and 403, defendant's complaint on appeal was not preserved. Mejia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6862, 2012 WL 3525641 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2012).

223. In a murder case, the court properly admitted photographs of defendant's tattoos because the "REDRUM" and revolver tattoos were especially probative of defendant's intent and attitude relevant to his defense and testimony that he would never point a gun at someone else first. Given defendant's own counsel's indication that everyone had tattoos and criminal records, on both sides, there was no indication the evidence unfairly aroused the jury's hostility or sympathy. Luckett v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6686, 2012 WL 3241802 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 10 2012).

224. Determination of the identity of the person fleeing from the police officer was a fact of significant consequence to the determination of the action, and an extraneous offense may be admissible, to show the identity of the accused, Tex. R. Evid. 403(b); therefore, evidence pertaining to identity was relevant and the trial court's decision to deny defendant's objection on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 401 was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. White v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5271 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 29 2012).

225. Determination of the identity of the person fleeing from the police officer was a fact of significant consequence to the determination of the action, and an extraneous offense may be admissible, to show the identity of the accused, Tex. R. Evid. 403(b); therefore, evidence pertaining to identity was relevant and the trial court's decision to deny defendant's objection on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 401 was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. White v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5271 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 29 2012).

226. Defendant was free to present other evidence of the complainant's purported financial hardship, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the State's objection to introduction of evidence relating to the complainant's civil suit against a railroad company because it was not relevant and did not give rise to an inference of bias. West v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3612, 2012 WL 1606239 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 8 2012).

227. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's gang affiliation during the guilt phase of his trial because the evidence was relevant and admissible to show defendant's motive and to rebut his self-defense theory. The probative value of the evidence outweighed any unfair prejudice, and the State did not devote an excessive amount of time to presenting the evidence. Rodriguez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10156 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 22 2011).

228. Defendant was not prevented from showing that the victim and other family members were biased and had a motive to testify against him because there was animosity between the victim's family and defendant, but the trial court did not err in not admitting evidence of the victim's family's use of drugs as the behavior that was criticized because it was not admissible under the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test and was not shown to be relevant to any issue in the case under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

229. Photographs of the victim wearing an allegedly sexually suggestive T-shirt were excludable under either Tex. R. Evid. 402 as irrelevant or Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the probative value of the photographs was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

230. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant, after committing the charged offense and on the same day, had ordered two minor girls walking down a street to get in his van where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence regarding defendant's encounter with the minor girls was relevant and admissible because that evidence revealed defendant's true plans about his encounter with the victim on the day he committed the offense. The trial judge could have reasonably concluded that the inherent probative force of the evidence, along with the State's need for the evidence, substantially outweighed the danger of any unfair prejudice to defendant, and the presentation of the extraneous offense evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Frank v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 762, 2011 WL 379041 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 2 2011).

231. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of a prior robbery during defendant's aggravated robbery trial because: (1) it was committed the evening prior to the instant robbery; (2) defendant and his accomplice acted together in both robberies; (3) both robberies were committed against lone, older women using surprise, speed, and strength through force or the threat of force; and (4) both robberies were committed while using the same vehicle as a means of escape. Therefore, the probative value of the evidence was great, as it showed that defendant and his accomplice acted together in a continuing criminal enterprise and rebutted defendant's theory that he was not a party to the instant robbery but was merely present in the vehicle while it occurred. Davis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6949, 2010 WL 3341514 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2010).

232. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the probative value of the child victim's mother's testimony outweighed any prejudicial effect because the testimony, identifying defendant as the individual who left bite marks on the victim when they were playing, was relevant and probative of the relationship between defendant and the victim. Samora v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6759, 2010 WL 3279536 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2010).

233. In a murder case, evidence of defendant's drug dealing was properly admitted because, according to a witness, defendant and the victim were rival drug dealers, and proof of motive was important to the State's case because the State was unable to produce an eyewitness who actually saw defendant shoot the victim. The time spent attempting to prove that defendant sold illegal drugs was not out of proportion to the time required to present such evidence. Koy Timon Moore v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7847 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

234. In a capital murder case, a trial court did not err by refusing to allow the introduction of evidence that a victim had drugs in his system because any probative value the evidence might have had was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 403. The appellate court rejected defendant's argument that the evidence was relevant to the issue of the previous relationship between defendant and the victim and to show the condition of defendant's mind at the time of the offense. Anderson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6809, 2009 WL 2915011 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 27 2009).

235. In defendant's tampering with a witness case, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence that the victim's father had recently kicked her out of his house because it was uncontested that defendant had previously threatened to kick the victim out if she became pregnant. That evidence served to establish a motive, if any, for the victim to make false accusations against defendant; the additional evidence regarding the victim's father's decision to kick her out, if true, did not lend any additional weight to that theory. Davis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6685 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 26 2009).

236. In a sexual assault of a child case, evidence that defendant had been subjected to unusual sexual events in his youth and that he related those events to the sexual assault of the child tended to rebut a contention that any contact with the child's penis was simply an accident, and therefore, the evidence was properly admitted. Additionally, the evidence took no additional time to develop initially, and was mentioned again during the trial only when defendant took the stand and denied making some of the statements. Watterson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2938, 2009 WL 1148751 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 29 2009).

237. Court erred in failing to instruct the jury to disregard the State's reference to plea negotiations because, given the manner in which the State's question to defendant was posed, one could reasonably interpret it as disclosing that plea negotiations had occurred, that potential offers were made and rejected, and that defendant's desires presented the major obstacle to arriving at a bargain. Bowley v. State, 280 S.W.3d 530, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1448 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 2 2009).

238. Defendant complained that the admission of evidence that he had left a note containing his name, jail address, and other information in the women's room was irrelevant and prejudicial; however, the trial court determined that the probative value of the evidence was substantial. Further, any evidence of an extraneous act was admissible during the punishment phase, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07. Wilson v. State,

2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9395 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 17 2008).

239. In a driving while intoxicated case, a booking photograph of defendant was not excluded from evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was not unfairly prejudicial; even though the picture was not flattering, it did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational way. Moreover, it was relevant to show defendant's condition near the time of arrest. Hester v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9242 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 15 2008).

240. In an aggravated assault case, a trial court did not err by allowing a victim's father to testify during the guilt/innocence phase of the case because his brief testimony, which included basic information about himself, the victim, the evening of the shooting, and the victim's condition, was relevant and not overly prejudicial. Sanchez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9072 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 4 2008).

241. In defendant's drug case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting in evidence the shotgun found on the back seat of the vehicle that defendant was driving just before his arrest because the probative value of the shotgun was considerable and significantly necessary to the State's case because it was a link tending to show that defendant knowingly possessed the cocaine. Additionally, the evidence of the shotgun was relevant to prove defendant's knowledge that he possessed narcotics. Harris v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9090 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 4 2008).

242. In a case where defendant was convicted of violating Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 71.02, evidence of violent gang activities that were wholly unconnected to defendant was properly admitted into evidence because it was relevant, and the probative value of such was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Huan Huu Nguyen v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6263 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18 2008).

243. In a capital murder case, the court properly admitted two photographs because the photographs bolstered a State witness's testimony that testifying as a "snitch" had detrimental consequences -- injury to his sister, the photographs presented little, if any, prejudice to defendant because no party suggested to the jury that defendant was connected to the stabbing of the witness's sister, and the time involved in the introduction of the two photographs was minimal and unlikely to distract the jury from considering the charged offense when compared to having the witness's sister testify before the jury. Padron v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6175 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2008).

244. Items seized at the scene of a house fire were relevant under Tex. R. Evid 401, 402, 403, 404(b) to show that the fire started as a result of the cooking of methamphetamine on the stove and that the debris found in the burned house pertained to the use or manufacture of illegal drugs; defendant failed to establish that the trial court abused its discretion or that the determination fell outside of the zone of reasonable disagreement. Dentler v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5708 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2008).

245. In defendant's robbery case, the State properly presented evidence of an extraneous robbery because the offenses occurred within three miles of one another and within a six-day time period, both took place late in the morning in large retail parking lots, and both acts were perpetrated quickly, snatching purses from unaccompanied females walking or standing in the parking lots; additionally, the testimony rebutted defendant's theories of alibi and that one victim's brief opportunity to view the perpetrator led to a mistaken identification; therefore, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. Evans v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 477 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 22 2008).

246. In defendant's murder case, the court properly allowed the State to reveal defendant's tattoos because the evidence was relevant to support the State's theory that defendant was a gang member who murdered rival gang members in retaliation; in addition, given the other evidence indicating defendant's admitted gang membership, the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial. Reyes v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 293 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 16 2008).

247. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of a gun found by the witness because its probative value was not outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice, when the witness testified that he found the gun around the same time as the aggravated robbery, lying on the road a few blocks away from the store, and this was approximately the same location where the officer observed defendant driving a car matching the description of the suspect's vehicle provided by police dispatchers at the time of the aggravated robbery and from which the officer observed defendant extend his hand and arm out of the window and then back into the car. Mouton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10076 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 20 2007).

248. In defendant's murder case, although the court erred in excluding the testimony and notes of a licensed counselor who had counseled defendant hours before the murder because the testimony provided some insight into defendant's state of mind at the time of the murder, the error was harmless; defendant's expert's testimony concerning defendant's sanity at the time of the offense was considerably more direct and probative than the tangentially relevant testimony of the counselor. Bradshaw v. State, 244 S.W.3d 490, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9427 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

249. In a capital murder case, evidence of appellant's gang affiliation was properly admitted pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 402 because it was relevant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice as described in Tex. R. Evid. 403; there was ample evidence connecting appellant to the gang and their plan regarding the victim, and it included the gang's violent activities. Moreover, the evidence was not admitted to show that the murder was gang activity, but that it was predictable that a homicide would occur as the result of the conspiracy, in which some participants were violent gang members, to rob the victim. Arroyo v. State, 239 S.W.3d 282, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5111 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007).

250. In a medical malpractice case, the probative value of statements from superseded pleadings regarding two nonsuited doctors was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because counsel, representing the parents of an injured child, first alluded to the doctor's party status, thus opening the door to rebuttal, and the statements, which were made by the parents, constituted admissions by party-opponents under Tex. R. Evid. 801, and were not hearsay. Bay Area Healthcare Group, Ltd. v. McShane, 239 S.W.3d 231, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 527, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 866 (Tex. 2007).

251. Evidence of gang affiliation was properly admitted as relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 402 since it was offered to show a motive for a murder; the evidence was not limited under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and the probative value substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Rodrigues v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4441 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 7 2007).

252. In a driving while intoxicated case, a court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the portion of a videotape that contained defendant's statements regarding Xanax and Valium because defendant's statement that he took the medications was in response to a question by the officer, and the question was relevant as a predicate inquiry to the administration of a field sobriety test. Layton v. State, 263 S.W.3d 179, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1191 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

253. Evidence of other contraband that police officers found in the room and evidence of the drugs found on the person of defendant's girlfriend, found while executing a search warrant was admissible when defendant was charged with possession of methadone that was found in the room because the evidence tended to establish the requisite affirmative link to the contraband. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10721 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec.

254. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence relating to the search of the girlfriend and the discovery of the crack pipe because under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the evidence was relevant to the issue of whether the contraband and drug paraphernalia were present in the house and tended to prove an affirmative link between defendant and the methadone, and therefore the evidence was relevant to show defendant's knowledge or intent to possess the methadone. The probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because it had high probative value in affirmatively linking defendant to the methadone. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2526 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 14, 2006).

255. In a trial for indecency with a child, it was proper to exclude evidence of conduct by the complainant's mother, such as extramarital affairs and involvement in pornography and drug abuse, because the probative value in establishing a motive for the complainant to make false accusations against defendant was low. Jimenez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6538 (Tex. App. Waco July 26 2006).

256. In an aggravated assault case, a court properly admitted evidence of another collision caused by defendant because defendant claimed his reckless driving was the product of intoxication, failure to wear glasses, and mechanical problems with his vehicle; the motorcycle accident evidence, when combined with the other evidence admitted at trial, rebutted that defense by showing a pattern of behavior during the course of what was essentially a single event or transaction. Gattis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5668 (Tex. App. Austin June 29 2006).

257. In defendant's murder case, evidence of the history of physical abuse in the relationship between defendant and the victim was relevant and properly admitted; the extraneous-offense evidence rebutted defendant's claim of accident and showed that he intended to cause death, serious bodily injury, or bodily injury; in addition, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Brown v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5163 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

258. During defendant's trial for being a felon in possession of a firearm, the trial court did not err in allowing a witness to testify regarding defendant's prior drug dealing because the risk of convicting defendant solely on the fact that she was a drug dealer did not substantially outweigh the probative value of establishing her state of mind. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

259. Defense counsel's lack of an objection to evidence that defendant put his hands over his front pockets during his pat-down, ran from the police, and discarded "little white bags" while in flight did not establish ineffective assistance of counsel because the evidence was relevant to show defendant's motive for striking a police officer and the reason for his flight, and the fact that the bags were never found did not make the officer's testimony inadmissible for lack of relevance or probativeness; furthermore, the evidence might also have been viewed as same transaction contextual evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the events surrounding the stop, flight, and arrest were so connected that they formed an indivisible criminal transaction. LeBleu v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 887 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 1 2006).

260. Court did not err by admitting evidence concerning the circumstances of a prior sexual assault conviction where defendant encountered the victims in the parking lot of their residences, waited for the victims to return to their rooms, approached them under the guise of needing help, and made advances toward raping them but ejaculated before penetration. Because intent was a material element of the offense on which the State carried the burden of proof, the probative value of the witness's testimony was high and was not overcome by the danger of unfair prejudice. Fields v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5494 (Tex. App. Austin July 14 2005).

261. In an injury to a child case where defendant contested his guilt by claiming that he did not injure the child but that she fell, the trial court did not err in permitting the State to introduce evidence that defendant had previously committed an extraneous offense against another young child as it may have been helpful to the jury to rebut defendant's defensive theory and show that he injured the victim. Furthermore, evidence of the extraneous offense was not of such a nature as to impair the efficacy of a limiting instruction: the evidence showed that the child involved in the extraneous offense was not seriously injured but, at most, had bruises on her face from defendant's hands. Harrell v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4578 (Tex. App. Eastland June 16 2005).

262. In a trial for indecency with a child, the trial court properly admitted evidence of a prior indecency conviction. The current charge arose from defendant's exposing himself, and he argued that he had merely forgotten to zip his pants; the extraneous offense evidence therefore tended to make a fact of consequence--whether defendant had or lacked intent to arouse or gratify sexual desire--more or less probable. Arp v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4535 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 15 2005).

263. In a murder trial, evidence was properly admitted, under Tex. R. Evid. 401 -- 404, of a shooting incident that occurred eight days after the murder. The extraneous offense evidence was relevant to the development of the case and was admissible to show the development of the investigation and defendant's intent or knowledge regarding the gun; as to prejudice, the evidence was presented almost matter-of-factly and included no injuries, disturbing photographs, or emotional testimony. Gonzales v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4532 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 14 2005).

264. Trial court should have excluded as irrelevant and prejudicial a BB gun that was found in a defendant's truck and that was not used during the charged burglary. The error was harmless, however, because the court did not have fair assurances that the mind of an average juror would have found the State's case less persuasive had the BB gun not been admitted. Moreno v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4487 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 9 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6371 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 11, 2005).

265. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's objection to testimony regarding whom an officer had named as the "defendant" in the case, which defendant claimed was unfairly prejudicial because it had the prejudicial effect of telling the jury that he was the subject of investigation from the very beginning and that he had to be guilty, because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony was relevant to the jury's evaluation of the complainant's allegations. Nor could it be said that the probative value of the testimony was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because the officer's testimony was not the type of testimony that would suggest that the jury make a decision on an improper basis. Dunbar v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3676 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2005).

266. In a drug trial, evidence that defendant was from Saudi Arabia and had attended flight school was admissible because the State had to affirmatively link defendant to drugs found in an apartment he did not lease. When viewed with defendant's flight school identification, the evidence was relevant to show that defendant was established in the apartment. Himat v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3152 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 27 2005).

267. Evidence of a police officer's administration of a modified alphabet test to defendant suspected of driving while intoxicated (DWI) was properly admitted because it was highly probative of whether defendant had the normal use of her mental faculties. The evidence did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational but indelible way because intoxication and, more specifically, defendant's loss of her normal mental or physical faculties was among the issues that a jury had to consider in a DWI trial, and, furthermore, the evidence was addressed for only a very brief period of time. Bergman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3046 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 21 2005).

268. In an action for subsurface trespass brought by oil and gas lessors against their lessee, the trial court did not err by admitting into evidence an internal memorandum written by an employee of the lessee more than 20 years earlier where the memo was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 on the ground that its recommendation to drill despite title problems could have helped the jury to decide whether the lessee was reasonable in delaying its development of a tract of land because of title problems with another tract. Furthermore, language in the memo about "illiterate Mexicans" was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the memo could not be considered an appeal to prejudice in language clear and strong, especially because it was written by an employee of the lessee and did not ask the jury to decide the case on an improper basis. Mission Res., Inc. v. Garza Energy Trust, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2650 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 7 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 166 S.W.3d 301, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3443, 160 Oil & Gas Rep. 1144 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2005).

269. Photographs of a murder victim were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and were not unduly prejudicial to defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because a photograph of the victim lying in an ambulance immediately after firefighters removed her body from a burning house was both material and probative, as it established her condition at the crime scene, and because a photograph of her face taken during autopsy was also material and probative of the fact that the autopsy was performed on the same person removed from the crime scene by ambulance. The numerous autopsy photographs were also probative of the victim's cause of death, a material element in the offense of capital murder, and although the detail in the photographs was graphic, each served the purpose of illustrating the nature and extent of the victim's injuries. Vargas v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2417 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2005).

270. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, a court did not err by excluding a portion of the testimony of an attorney representing the victim's mother who was present at a custody hearing involving the victim because something occurring at the custody hearing had no probative value in showing who committed a sexual assault that occurred a month before the hearing. Additionally, even if the testimony was somehow relevant, the trial court could have reasonably decided that its admission would lead to unfair prejudice, greatly mislead the jury, and confuse the issues with which the jury was presented. Holmes v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10661 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 30 2004).

271. Evidence of a personal injury plaintiff's alcohol consumption in the months before the accident was properly admitted when it bore directly upon the degree of pain and anguish suffered as a result of the accident; according to the plaintiff's pain management expert, use of alcohol was important to pain management because of its exacerbating effect and bearing on treatment methodology. The alcohol evidence was highly probative in that it related to the fair and reasonable compensation for the mental anguish experienced by the pedestrian as a result of the accident. Fitz v. San Antonio Hospitality Invs., Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3507 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2004).

272. Defendant's conviction of intoxication manslaughter was upheld where he waived the issue of relevance of the photograph of the victim's charred body; the only objection made in the district court went to probative value and unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Anderson v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10122 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 2 2003).

273. Appellant's contention that his actions, while criminally insane, were not relevant to the finding required for recommitment under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 574.035 and that their admission at his recommitment hearing was unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 402 and Tex. R. Evid. 403 was rejected because the determination of whether a person should remain committed because of a mental illness required more than a snapshot of a single year in the person's life and required a psychological history. Campbell v. State, 118 S.W.3d 788, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 6671 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2003), appeal dismissed by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2376 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 16, 2004).

274. In making the initial determination of admissibility of evidence, Texas courts must apply the principles set forth in the evidentiary rules governing relevancy under Tex. R. Evid. 401-403; to meet the relevancy test, the proffered evidence must, first, have probative value, and second, be of consequence to some issue in the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Ramsey v. Reagan, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 276 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 16 2003).

275. Where defendant was convicted of sexual assault, trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 in admitting testimony from the victim and his sister of the effect of the assault on the victim; testimony of an inflammatory or sympathetic nature will not bar its admissibility if it is relevant to the issue at trial, and the issue need not be contested. Ranels v. State, 1996 Tex. App. LEXIS 2867 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 20 1996).

Evidence : Relevance : Liability Insurance

276. Mistrial was properly granted in a manslaughter/criminally negligent homicide prosecution after the prosecutor asked defendant's expert about a finding by defendant's insurer that defendant was at fault because the question was manifestly improper under Tex. R. Evid. 401-403. What the insurer concluded had very little probative value on the question of whether defendant caused the fatal accident, and it was extremely prejudicial, likely to confuse and mislead the jury, and lead to time-consuming collateral litigation. Ex parte Wheeler, 203 S.W.3d 317, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1968 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Evidence : Relevance : Pleas & Related Statements

277. Court erred in failing to instruct the jury to disregard the State's reference to plea negotiations because, given the manner in which the State's question to defendant was posed, one could reasonably interpret it as disclosing that plea negotiations had occurred, that potential offers were made and rejected, and that defendant's desires presented the major obstacle to arriving at a bargain. Bowley v. State, 280 S.W.3d 530, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1448 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 2 2009).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

278. Although the evidence from the neighbor's apartment was not same transaction contextual evidence and the trial court abused its discretion in admitting it, the error was harmless given that the extent of the other evidence for defendant's guilt because the State found the marijuana hidden in defendant's truck, an officer observed defendant exit the apartment building appearing to hide something under his shirt, and defendant chose to lead police on a high-speech chase instead of submitting to the traffic stop. Gonzalez v. State, 510 S.W.3d 10, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8934 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

279. Evidence of methamphetamine found at the murder scene was properly admitted because it was relevant to establish a motive for defendant's actions and to rebut her claim of accidentally shooting the victim; there was no evidence presented that defendant was in possession of the drugs, and the evidence was admissible because the jury could infer that the prior relationship between the victim and defendant was one that involved drugs. Taylor v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7282 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 3 2014).

280. In defendant's murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting testimony as evidence of identity because, in both offenses, a green vehicle blocked the roadway and a young man approached the blocked-in vehicle with a "silver" handgun. The witness identified defendant as the "young man" from her aggravated robbery, and he used an accomplice's mother's vehicle to commit that offense; the challenged evidence made defendant's identity more probable, took little time to develop, and supported the element of identity. Torres v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9134 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 1 2012).

281. Because the robberies occurred in the same geographic area within a relatively brief time frame, and all were committed by an assailant who covered his hands with socks or gloves, and whose face was completely covered by a similar covering, leaving only the eyes exposed, there are sufficient common characteristics between each of the robberies, that the extraneous offenses were relevant to prove identity and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 404(b). Heigelmann v. State, 362 S.W.3d 763, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1670, 2012 WL 688427 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 2 2012).

282. Trial court did not err by admitting testimony from two witnesses about defendant's past use and sale of methamphetamine under Tex. R. Evid. 404 because defendant's relevance objection did not preserve his Rule 404 complaints and because he lodged no objection to the testimony about his past use and sale of methamphetamine by one of the witnesses. Norris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 108, 2012 WL 34453 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 4 2012).

283. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's gang affiliation during the guilt phase of his trial because the evidence was relevant and admissible to show defendant's motive and to rebut his self-defense theory. The probative value of the evidence outweighed any unfair prejudice, and the State did not devote an excessive amount of time to presenting the evidence. Rodriguez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10156 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 22 2011).

284. In a driving while intoxicated (DWI) case, it was error to admit the entirety of defendant's driving record because it contained evidence of extraneous offenses beyond the prior DWI convictions that were elements of a charged offense. However, the error was harmless because evidence of guilt was ample. Bridges v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9104, 2011 WL 5557534 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 16 2011).

285. In a trial for the aggravated kidnapping of a former girlfriend, extraneous acts evidence from another former girlfriend was relevant to rebut the defense theories that the current charges were exaggerated and that the witness testified to an admission by defendant because of her relationship with the complainant. Vela v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6917, 2011 WL 3821045 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2011).

286. At defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation based on evidence showing that defendant and his brother broke into a mobile home and stole a TV set, the trial court ruled that evidence of two extraneous burglaries committed by his brother was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402, probative, and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). The appellate court held that defendant was not harmed by the admission of the evidence because it was not unduly emphasized by the State, and it did not have a substantial effect on the jury's verdict. Crutchfield v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4959, 2011 WL 2638402 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2011).

287. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant, after committing the charged offense and on the same day, had ordered two minor girls walking down a street to get in his van where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence regarding defendant's encounter with the minor girls was relevant and admissible because that evidence revealed defendant's true plans about his encounter with the victim on the day he committed the offense. The trial judge could have reasonably concluded that the inherent probative force of the evidence, along with the State's need for the evidence, substantially outweighed the danger of any unfair prejudice to defendant, and the presentation of the extraneous offense evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Frank v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 762, 2011 WL 379041 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 2 2011).

288. When police officers responded to a domestic disturbance call at the residence of defendant and his wife, she told the officers that defendant had repeatedly struck her with a cane and held a gun to her head during an argument. At defendant's trial for assault, he did not object to the officers' testimony describing the discovery and seizure of the weapon; the evidence was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 as same transaction contextual evidence. Smith v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 859, 2011 WL 350434 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2011).

289. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of a prior robbery during defendant's aggravated robbery trial because: (1) it was committed the evening prior to the instant robbery; (2) defendant and his accomplice acted together in both robberies; (3) both robberies were committed against lone, older women using surprise, speed, and strength through force or the threat of force; and (4) both robberies were committed while using the same vehicle as a means of escape. Therefore, the probative value of the evidence was great, as it showed that defendant and his accomplice acted together in a continuing criminal enterprise and rebutted defendant's theory that he was not a party to the instant robbery but was merely present in the vehicle while it occurred. Davis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6949, 2010 WL 3341514 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2010).

290. In an indecency with a child case, the court erred by admitting extraneous offense evidence due to the lack of similarity between the extraneous offenses and the charged offenses, the duration in time of twenty years between the offenses, and the lack of evidence concerning a continuing course of conduct by defendant. The extraneous acts did not take place in defendant's home and defendant did not ask the witness to touch himself or defendant. Crocker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9432, 2009 WL 4725299 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 11 2009).

291. In a sexual assault case, a court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence that defendant had threatened a witness not to testify because defendant threatened to accuse the witness and his wife of sexually abusing defendant's girlfriend's children if the witness testified against him. The testimony was relevant to show defendant's consciousness of guilt. Ramsey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9449, 2009 WL 4755175 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 10 2009).

292. Trial court abused its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's prior burglary arrest pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) where the tendency of the evidence was to show defendant was a bad person or that his character conformed to that of a person from whom criminal conduct might be expected. However, the error did not influence the jury, or had but a slight effect on its verdict of guilt, because the State's presentation of the alleged burglary, although factually detailed, was brief and received only passing mention in closing argument, and because the propensity and potency of the evidence to characterize defendant as a criminal was blunted by the previous, unopposed, admission of evidence of his prior conviction for manslaughter. Tello v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8401, 2009 WL 3518006 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 30 2009).

293. Trial court erroneously admitted a 1993 judgment convicting defendant of misdemeanor assault where the judgment was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it had no relevance apart from proof of character conformity. Moreover, evidence of the conviction was not available for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the record contained no evidence that the victim of the assault was female, and there was thus no proof that it was a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude. Tello v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8401, 2009 WL 3518006 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 30 2009).

294. In a murder case, evidence of defendant's drug dealing was properly admitted because, according to a witness, defendant and the victim were rival drug dealers, and proof of motive was important to the State's case because the State was unable to produce an eyewitness who actually saw defendant shoot the victim. The time spent attempting to prove that defendant sold illegal drugs was not out of proportion to the time required to present such evidence. Koy Timon Moore v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7847 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

295. In a sentencing trial for felony assault to a family member, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 when the trial court admitted testimony from defendant's wife about the circumstances of a prior assault and guilty plea. The testimony was relevant punishment evidence because it illustrated defendant's propensity for family violence and that he was not deterred by his earlier conviction. Murchison v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7481, 2009 WL 3050823 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 24 2009).

296. In a burglary trial, reversible error occurred when the State introduced evidence that the complainant's girlfriend was suffering from mental retardation and that defendant engaged in sex with her shortly after the alleged burglary. The evidence was not relevant to alibi under Tex. R. Evid. 402 because, contrary to the State's argument, defendant did not assert a defense of alibi by stating that he did not remember on which Friday night he went to a bar with the complainant and then to the complainant's home. Rodriguez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6335, 2009 WL 5821033 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 13 2009).

297. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted evidence of an aggravated robbery because the defensive claims that defendant raised by his statements placed the intent element of his capital murder offense at issue, which entitled the State to rebut defendant's claimed lack of intent with evidence of his unadjudicated extraneous offense of the aggravated robbery. Gomez v. Tex., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4521, 2009 WL 1688233 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 18 2009).

298. During defendant's criminal trial for the sexual asault of a child, the State was permitted to introduce extraneous offense evidence that defendant encouraged the victim's involvement in several crimes to rebut defense counsel's opening remarks that defendant was a positive influence on the victim. The trial court determined the extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to correct the false impression created by the defense; the extraneous offense evidence was relevent for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, because it tended to make less probable defendant's argument that he was encouraging the victim to be a decent and productive citizen. Ytuarte v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3056, 2009 WL 1232327 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 6 2009).

299. In a sexual assault of a child case, evidence that defendant had been subjected to unusual sexual events in his youth and that he related those events to the sexual assault of the child tended to rebut a contention that any contact with the child's penis was simply an accident, and therefore, the evidence was properly admitted. Additionally, the evidence took no additional time to develop initially, and was mentioned again during the trial only when defendant took the stand and denied making some of the statements. Watterson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2938, 2009 WL 1148751 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 29 2009).

300. In a sexual assault of a child case, the court reversibly erred by admitting extraneous acts evidence because defendant's practice of not using a condom while engaged in consensual sex with an adult companion, or informing the companion of his HIV positive status, had the practical effect of prejudicing any defense raised by defendant regarding the complainant's credibility. Such an effect would have been detrimental to defendant, who sought to discredit the complainant by pointing out factual variances in his outcries, and by suggesting that the complainant was motivated to fabricate the assault to avoid being schooled in an alternative education program. Lopez v. State, 288 S.W.3d 148, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2050 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 26 2009).

301. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting the victim's videotaped statement because defendant raised the issue of self-defense. A witness testified that in defendant's altercation with the victim, the victim was the aggressor and defendant tried to resist retaliating; as a result of that testimony, defendant's alleged assault of the victim was relevant rebuttal evidence to prove that defendant acted with the requisite intent. In re B.H., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1852, 2009 WL 692613 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 18 2009).

302. In an aggravated sexual assault case, a trial court did not err by admitting evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) regarding defendant's commission of indecency with a child because defendant opened the door to such when his wife testified that it was physically impossible for him to have committed the assault due to their close living quarters. Moreover, the evidence was relevant to rebut allegations of lack of opportunity and fabrication.

Isenberger v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9224 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 11 2008).

303. Trial court erred by admitting an extraneous offense of marijuana possession under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in a case involving unlawful possession of a weapon because it was irrelevant where defendant did not challenge the legality of a search; however, the error was harmless since defendant's sole defensive theory was negated by his admission to police. Defendant contended that he had no knowledge of gun found under the driver's seat of a vehicle, but he told a police officer that searched the vehicle that there was a weapon inside. Provencio v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6073 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 11 2008).

304. In defendant's robbery case, the State properly presented evidence of an extraneous robbery because the offenses occurred within three miles of one another and within a six-day time period, both took place late in the morning in large retail parking lots, and both acts were perpetrated quickly, snatching purses from unaccompanied females walking or standing in the parking lots; additionally, the testimony rebutted defendant's theories of alibi and that one victim's brief opportunity to view the perpetrator led to a mistaken identification; therefore, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. Evans v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 477 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 22 2008).

305. In a fraud action brought by the principals of a home health business against an investor, the testimony of the investor's prior business partner was admissible pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as proof of the investor's motive in seeking involvement with the business, his intent to commit fraud by association with the business, and his plan for gaining control over the business's financial affairs and siphoning off the business's assets. The prior business partner testified that he had also sued the investor for fraud under circumstances very similar to those in the underlying case. Rogers v. Alexander, 244 S.W.3d 370, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5103 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

306. Where defendant was alleged to have committed a sexual assault against a thirteen-year-old child, the trial court was permitted to admit the child's testimony of defendant's use and sale of marijuana; the evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402 to show defendant's attempt to cultivate a relationship with the child by bringing him to his house to smoke marijuana. Valdez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4612 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 12 2007).

307. In a burglary trial, there was no error in the admission of evidence that defendant had, in his possession when he was arrested, items taken in a subsequent burglary from the same victim; the evidence was admissible to rebut a line of questioning directed at burglaries that occurred after defendant was in custody. Ellis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 414 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 24 2007).

308. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence relating to the search of the girlfriend and the discovery of the crack pipe because under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the evidence was relevant to the issue of whether the contraband and drug paraphernalia were present in the house and tended to prove an affirmative link between defendant and the methadone, and therefore the evidence was relevant to show defendant's knowledge or intent to possess the methadone. The probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because it had high probative value in affirmatively linking defendant to the methadone. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2526 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 14, 2006).

309. Complainant testified that defendant fondled and kissed her in an escalating fashion when she was between the ages of six and 10, that he felt her under her clothes when she was 10, and that he had sexual intercourse with her when she was 13. Because the testimony was relevant to the state of mind of the complainant and defendant, as well as to the previous and subsequent relationship between the complainant and defendant, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, the trial court did not err in admitting the extraneous offense evidence. Parker

v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8834 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 12 2006).

310. Evidence of a judgment that terminated defendant's parental rights to three of her children after the date that she allegedly murdered her newborn infant was relevant at her capital murder trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, and had relevance apart from mere proof of character conformity in compliance with Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), because an extraneous offense/bad act that took place subsequent to the offense for which a defendant was on trial did not make the extraneous offense/bad act inadmissible per se; furthermore, the judgment was introduced by the State after defendant had testified that the infant's death on the night in question was not the result of any intentional or knowing conduct on defendant's part, and the termination judgment contained findings by the trial judge that defendant "knowingly" placed or allowed her other children to remain in conditions dangerous to their physical or emotional well-being, which at least arguably made it more probable that defendant's acts or omissions on the night in question were done either intentionally or knowingly. Fergerson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6589 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

311. In an aggravated assault case, a court properly admitted evidence of another collision caused by defendant because defendant claimed his reckless driving was the product of intoxication, failure to wear glasses, and mechanical problems with his vehicle; the motorcycle accident evidence, when combined with the other evidence admitted at trial, rebutted that defense by showing a pattern of behavior during the course of what was essentially a single event or transaction. Gattis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5668 (Tex. App. Austin June 29 2006).

312. In defendant's murder case, evidence of the history of physical abuse in the relationship between defendant and the victim was relevant and properly admitted; the extraneous-offense evidence rebutted defendant's claim of accident and showed that he intended to cause death, serious bodily injury, or bodily injury; in addition, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Brown v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5163 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

313. In a murder trial, there was no error in allowing a witness to testify that he had seen defendant in possession of a gun four to five years before the murders. Springsteen v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2340 (Tex. Crim. App. May 24 2006).

314. Trial court did not err when it admitted evidence that defendant had been seen selling drugs a month before her indicted offense of being a felon in possession of a firearm because the testimony, elicited from a witness present when the indicted offense was committed, was relevant and tended to make the existence of defendant's intent to possess a firearm more likely than not, as the witness testified that he knew of five prior occasions on which defendant sold crack cocaine and also commented that drug dealers were often armed to protect themselves from being robbed. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

315. During defendant's trial for being a felon in possession of a firearm, the trial court did not err in allowing a witness to testify regarding defendant's prior drug dealing because the risk of convicting defendant solely on the fact that she was a drug dealer did not substantially outweigh the probative value of establishing her state of mind. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

316. Defense counsel's lack of an objection to evidence that defendant put his hands over his front pockets during his pat-down, ran from the police, and discarded "little white bags" while in flight did not establish ineffective assistance of counsel because the evidence was relevant to show defendant's motive for striking a police officer and the reason for his flight, and the fact that the bags were never found did not make the officer's testimony inadmissible for lack of relevance or probativeness; furthermore, the evidence might also have been viewed as same transaction contextual evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the events surrounding the stop, flight, and arrest were so connected that they formed an indivisible criminal transaction. LeBleu v. State, 2006 Tex. App.

LEXIS 887 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 1 2006).

317. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not err by allowing the prosecutor's questions regarding the possible exchange of sexual favors for forgiveness of a drug debt; the evidence was admissible to show the relationship between defendant and the victim. Whitmire v. State, 183 S.W.3d 522, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 170 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

318. No reversible error was presented under Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, and 404(b) by an arresting officer's testimony that defendant told the officer during a traffic stop about defendant's prior arrests because the videotape of the stop, including defendant's own statement of the arrests, was admitted without objection under R. 402, 403, and 404(b). Tunstall v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6336 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 10 2005).

319. Court did not err by admitting evidence concerning the circumstances of a prior sexual assault conviction where defendant encountered the victims in the parking lot of their residences, waited for the victims to return to their rooms, approached them under the guise of needing help, and made advances toward raping them but ejaculated before penetration. Because intent was a material element of the offense on which the State carried the burden of proof, the probative value of the witness's testimony was high and was not overcome by the danger of unfair prejudice. Fields v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5494 (Tex. App. Austin July 14 2005).

320. In an injury to a child case where defendant contested his guilt by claiming that he did not injure the child but that she fell, the trial court did not err in permitting the State to introduce evidence that defendant had previously committed an extraneous offense against another young child as it may have been helpful to the jury to rebut defendant's defensive theory and show that he injured the victim. Furthermore, evidence of the extraneous offense was not of such a nature as to impair the efficacy of a limiting instruction: the evidence showed that the child involved in the extraneous offense was not seriously injured but, at most, had bruises on her face from defendant's hands. Harrell v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4578 (Tex. App. Eastland June 16 2005).

321. In a trial for indecency with a child, the trial court properly admitted evidence of a prior indecency conviction. The current charge arose from defendant's exposing himself, and he argued that he had merely forgotten to zip his pants; the extraneous offense evidence therefore tended to make a fact of consequence--whether defendant had or lacked intent to arouse or gratify sexual desire--more or less probable. Arp v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4535 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 15 2005).

322. In a murder trial, evidence was properly admitted, under Tex. R. Evid. 401 -- 404, of a shooting incident that occurred eight days after the murder. The extraneous offense evidence was relevant to the development of the case and was admissible to show the development of the investigation and defendant's intent or knowledge regarding the gun; as to prejudice, the evidence was presented almost matter-of-factly and included no injuries, disturbing photographs, or emotional testimony. Gonzales v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4532 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 14 2005).

323. Trial court should have excluded as irrelevant and prejudicial a BB gun that was found in a defendant's truck and that was not used during the charged burglary. The error was harmless, however, because the court did not have fair assurances that the mind of an average juror would have found the State's case less persuasive had the BB gun not been admitted. Moreno v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4487 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 9 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6371 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 11, 2005).

324. Appellant's contention that his actions, while criminally insane, were not relevant to the finding required for recommitment under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 574.035 and that their admission at his recommitment hearing was unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 402 and Tex. R. Evid. 403 was rejected because the determination of whether a person should remain committed because of a mental illness required more than a snapshot of a single year in the person's life and required a psychological history. Campbell v. State, 118 S.W.3d 788, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 6671 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2003), appeal dismissed by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2376 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 16, 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

325. Information in defendant's driver's license record was properly admitted because it confirmed that his driver's license number was used to pawn rings on the day of the robbery, and it showed defendant's height, which indicated he was the person who had held a gun; the evidence supported a fact of consequence-that defendant participated in the robbery. Deleon v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9009 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 14 2014).

326. Although the evidence from the neighbor's apartment was not same transaction contextual evidence and the trial court abused its discretion in admitting it, the error was harmless given that the extent of the other evidence for defendant's guilt because the State found the marijuana hidden in defendant's truck, an officer observed defendant exit the apartment building appearing to hide something under his shirt, and defendant chose to lead police on a high-speech chase instead of submitting to the traffic stop. Gonzalez v. State, 510 S.W.3d 10, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8934 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

327. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in excluding as irrelevant his proffered evidence that he had hepatitis B and the complainant did not because he did not offer direct evidence that he had hepatitis B at the time of the 2010 sexual assault; the actual evidence of his hepatitis B infection was his statement to the complainant's mother sometime in 2003 that he was infected. Liriano v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8772 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 12 2014).

328. Evidence of methamphetamine found at the murder scene was properly admitted because it was relevant to establish a motive for defendant's actions and to rebut her claim of accidentally shooting the victim; there was no evidence presented that defendant was in possession of the drugs, and the evidence was admissible because the jury could infer that the prior relationship between the victim and defendant was one that involved drugs. Taylor v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7282 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 3 2014).

329. Appellant's conviction for felony theft was affirmed because the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence where nothing about the other individual's arrest for the January 30 break-in made any facts of consequence to the determination of appellant's guilt or innocence in the January 25 theft any more or less probable. Graves v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6522 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 17 2014).

330. Where a former employee alleged that a former employer terminated the employee because the employee refused to drive a truck without a required permit and a jury found in favor of the employer, any error in excluding seven overweight permits as irrelevant was harmless because the excluded permits were not relevant to the first jury question since whether the truck was overweight on the day in question was not relevant to whether the employee was discharged, and the jury did not reach the remaining questions. Nezat v. Tucker Energy Servs., 437 S.W.3d 541, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6518, 38 I.E.R. Cas. (BNA) 1033 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2014).

331. Because a mandatory settlement credit did not have to be pleaded as an affirmative defense, the trial court did not err in admitting the settlement agreement into evidence; the existence and amount of the settlement were facts of consequence in the case. Dalworth Restoration, Inc. v. Rife-Marshall, 433 S.W.3d 773, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5271, 2014 WL 1941822 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 15 2014).

332. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's shirts with gun shot residue particles on them because the evidence was relevant, as the shirts were collected from defendant's vehicle two days after the murder. The evidence was not prejudicial because it showed defendant's connection to a discharged weapon, directly or indirectly, at some point in time. Burks v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3243, 2014 WL 1285731 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2014).

333. At defendant's murder trial, the court did not err by admitting an autopsy photograph depicting the bullet lodged in the tissue at the back of the victim's neck; the photograph was relevant to the cause of death--a gunshot wound to the head, and manner of death--homicide. Barr v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1714, 2014 WL 641351 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 14 2014).

334. Defendant's conviction for driving while intoxicated was appropriate because testimony that defendant showed signs of impairment consistent with the use of hydrocodone supplied a logical connection between defendant's admitted use of hydrocodone and his driving. As such, that testimony was relevant; because the challenged evidence was relevant and reliable, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the videorecording of defendant's statement and the expert's testimony. Everitt v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1667, 2014 WL 586100 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 13 2014).

335. State established that the flight evidence was relevant to show defendant's consciousness of guilt for the capital murder because defendant admitted to going on the run after the shooting, the police had a warrant to arrest him for capital murder, and, when the police tried to arrest him in a parking lot using marked vehicles, he led them on a high-speed chase. Goldsmith v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 754, 2014 WL 261007 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 23 2014).

336. State established that the flight evidence was relevant to show defendant's consciousness of guilt for the capital murder because defendant admitted to going on the run after the shooting, the police had a warrant to arrest him for capital murder, and, when the police tried to arrest him in a parking lot using marked vehicles, he led them on a high-speed chase. Goldsmith v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 754, 2014 WL 261007 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 23 2014).

337. At defendant's trial for robbery, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony regarding his efforts to resist arrest because evidence relevant to his flight from the scene was a circumstance indicative of guilt. Johnson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 471, 2014 WL 222929 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 16 2014).

338. Defendant's conviction for continuous sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 was appropriate even though the trial court erred in admitting a chart stating a timeline of the sexual assault incidents testified to by the complainant because the error was harmless. The jury heard testimony from the complainant regarding the incidents of abuse summarized on the chart and defendant did not argue that the chart was inaccurate or misleading. Castillo v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 200, 2014 WL 61035 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 8 2014).

339. Taxing Authorities' legal theory concerning abandonment of ownership rights had to fail because none of the Taxing Authorities' evidence concerning activities or conditions on the property was relevant to the trial court's inquiry of who was entitled to the excess proceeds. Dallas County City of Grand Prairie v. Sides, 430 S.W.3d 649, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5042, 2014 WL 1847415 (Tex. App. Dallas May 8 2014).

340. Defendant did not show that his trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to raise a relevance objection because testimony about defendant's remarks to the victim was relevant in that it revealed the victim's motive for distancing himself from defendant and helped to explain his reticence to involve himself with defendant.

Perkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15003, 2013 WL 6569874 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 12 2013).

341. Defendant's posts on a social media website regarding his attitude toward children were relevant, although attenuated, in the case charging him with injury to a child. Copeland v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14675, 2013 WL 6388585 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 5 2013).

342. At defendant's trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a licensed professional counselor who treated sex offenders; the expert's testimony about grooming for a sexual offense was relevant to assist the jury in understanding defendant's behavior. Cox v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8890 (Tex. App. Waco July 18 2013).

343. Where defendant was convicted of multiples counts of aggravated sexual assault, attempted aggravated sexual assault, and indecency with a child, the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony of the two sexual assault nurse examiners. The testimony of the nurses as to the children's accounts of abuse by their grandfather tended to make more probable the fact that the abuse actually took place; accordingly, the evidence was relevant. Trevino v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8618 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 11 2013).

344. In a misappropriation of trade secrets action, the court did not err in excluding appellees' prior pleadings in which they accused 16 parties of conspiring to steal trade secrets; the minimal relevance of the pleadings was substantially outweighed by the risk of distracting the factfinder from the issues by provoking speculation regarding the disposition or settlement of the cases against the former defendants. Southwestern Energy Prod. Co. v. Berry-Helfand, 411 S.W.3d 581, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8549, 182 Oil & Gas Rep. 798 (Tex. App. Tyler July 10 2013).

345. Based on his conviction for first-degree felony offense burglary of a habitation with intent to commit sexual assault, defendant did not show why it was reasonable for him to believe that the findings of fact and conclusions of law established he was not required to comply with sex-offender registration, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 62.001(5)(D); it was within the trial court's discretion to determine that the findings of fact and conclusions of law were not relevant evidence. Durham v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7301 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 13 2013).

346. In defendant's child pornography case, it was within the zone of reasonable disagreement as to whether each of the pieces of evidence objected to possessed some relevance to matters of consequence because defendant denied that he had any connection to the child pornography found within his townhouse or that he had shown pornography to a child. Each of the items arguably served to tie defendant to the computer equipment in question as well as to the child pornography thereon. Checo v. State, 402 S.W.3d 440, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7029 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 11 2013).

347. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine an officer about the confidential informant because the disallowed questions were not relevant to the issue of defendant's guilt or innocence, as the State did not rely on events related to obtaining the search warrant in proving defendant's guilt. Nwaogu v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4588, 2013 WL 1490489 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 11 2013).

348. To the extent that records of other injuries or medical conditions showed a personal injury claimant had back pain before a slip and fall incident, the records were relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402. Absent evidence of other litigation, the medical evidence was not overly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and the admission of irrelevant medical records unrelated to back pain was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1) because the judgment did not turn on records regarding unrelated conditions. Sparks v. Exxon Mobil Corp., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4206 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 2 2013).

349. Evidence of tenants' activities on commercial premises was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 to establish damages claimed by the tenants and to rebutting the landlord's assertions that the tenants did not have a legitimate operation. Rhey v. Redic, 408 S.W.3d 440, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3054, 2013 WL 1150197 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 20 2013).

350. Court properly admitted evidence that defendant's girlfriend purchased a silver .38 caliber revolver shortly before the victim's death because a codefendant testified that defendant had used a silver gun, and another witness testified that defendant was carrying a "chrome .38, snub-nose revolver" on the day the victim was killed. The inherent probative force of the evidence concerning the guns was its tendency to show that defendant was the shooter, and although the evidence was prejudicial, it was not unfairly prejudicial. Buckley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2246 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 7 2013).

351. In defendant's evading arrest case, the court properly allowed testimony concerning typical behavior during a traffic stop because the testimony that very few people fled when a squad car initiated a stop by activating its lights was relevant to the offense of evading arrest, and went to defendant's intent. The fact that most people pulled over after the police initiated a stop made it more probable that defendant intentionally disregarded the officer's attempt to pull him over. Spencer v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2227, 2013 WL 1282307 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 6 2013).

352. Finding that respondent was a sexually violent predator (SVP) was proper under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002(5) because there was no error in failing to allow respondent's counsel to question a witness on the interpretation of the SVP statute, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.001-851.151. The questions respondent was not allowed to ask did not address a fact of consequence that would have made the doctor's prognosis more or less probable. In re Hill, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1881 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 28 2013).

353. Trial court's alleged error in permitting the complainant to testify as to the punishment he would like defendant to receive had no more than a very slight effect on the jury's determination of punishment; presuming there was error, such error was harmless. Hines v. State, 396 S.W.3d 706, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2000, 2013 WL 748755 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 28 2013).

354. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of two boys under the age of fourteen, the trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to offer evidence the testimony of a psychologist that one of the children was living with a sex offender several years earlier because it was not relevant to the offense charged under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Bullock v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1491, 2013 WL 593829 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 14 2013).

355. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of two boys under the age of fourteen, the trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to offer evidence regarding disturbances at the children's home because he did not explain how these events were relevant to the sexual assault offenses being tried against him under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Bullock v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1491, 2013 WL 593829 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 14 2013).

356. At defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver a controlled substance, cocaine, in a drug free zone, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of weapons found at the location where defendant was arrested; it was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 to show that the weapons were used for protection of the drugs. Blue v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1231, 2013 WL 489998 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 7 2013).

357. Defendant failed to show how excluded evidence about his relative's death in jail was relevant to any fact of consequence because he offered the evidence to show his purported fear of law enforcement and explain his flight from the officer; however, the proffered evidence merely demonstrated that his relative died while he was incarcerated in the county jail. Defendant offered no evidence that the death resulted from any actions or wrongdoing by law enforcement officials. Sheppard v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10638, 2012 WL 6698963 (Tex.

App. Austin Dec. 21 2012).

358. In a case in which a sex offender was civilly committed after a jury found him to be a sexually violent predator, the trial court could have reasonably determined that the opinion of the State's expert concerning the sex offender's risk of recidivism was admissible as relevant evidence because the expert's explanation of the term "likely" was consistent with how dictionaries commonly defined that term and with the Texas Supreme Court's construction of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.003(a)(2). In re Weatherread, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9757 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 29 2012).

359. In a case stemming from a house fire and the resulting product liability lawsuit filed by real parties in interest against the manufacturer of a computer power supply/surge protector and others, the trial court abused its discretion in ordering the manufacturer to produce certain of its back up power supply products, discovery produced in relation to another lawsuit, and other documents because real parties failed to establish a correlation between the specific model they had purchased and another of the manufacturer's product lines, failed to show that their request was not narrowly tailored to include only relevant materials, and failed to show that the litigation information they sought was relevant. In re Am. Power Conversion Corp., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9369, 2012 WL 5507111 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 14 2012).

360. In defendant's murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting testimony as evidence of identity because, in both offenses, a green vehicle blocked the roadway and a young man approached the blocked-in vehicle with a "silver" handgun. The witness identified defendant as the "young man" from her aggravated robbery, and he used an accomplice's mother's vehicle to commit that offense; the challenged evidence made defendant's identity more probable, took little time to develop, and supported the element of identity. Torres v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9134 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 1 2012).

361. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because little boys comparing private parts was not similar to the sexual acts charged against defendant. Therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit it. Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

362. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because evidence of the victim being in contact with a registered sex offender did not demonstrate a relevant alternative source of sexual knowledge. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit it. Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

363. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because, with regard to the victim's alleged prior sexual behavior, other than her involvement, there was no similarity between those incidents and the current allegations against defendant currently, Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, and 412(b). Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

364. Complainant's letter noted the apartment complex where she lived with her family and appellant, and thus the letter was relevant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, in connecting appellant to where the aggravated sexual assaults took place. Conteh v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8440, 2012 WL 4788386 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

365. In defendant's DWI case, he objected to the State's introduction of his blood-test results and extrapolation testimony because the blood draw occurred two hours after he was arrested and therefore was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402 to whether he had the normal use of his faculties at the time of the alleged offense. The trial court overruled the objection. Crenshaw v. State, 378 S.W.3d 460, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1254, 2012 WL 4372284 (Tex. Crim. App. Sept. 26 2012).

366. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of the sexual assault nurse examiner who examined the child victim during the course of the State's investigation because she was deemed an expert in sexual abuse examinations, so her expert testimony could be helpful to the jury, including to explain why physical evidence would not necessarily be present on the body of a sexual assault complainant. The nurse merely reported the events of the examination and her clinical findings, and she did not offer an opinion as to whether the victim had been sexually assaulted and did not comment on the victim's veracity. Owens v. State, 381 S.W.3d 696, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7922, 2012 WL 4098990 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 19 2012).

367. Escrow agreement and the letter to the property owner's predecessor were relevant and had probative value regarding one of the disputed issues in the owner's trespass action, namely whether the owner consented to the entry of waste beneath its tracts by the operator of neigboring the wastewater disposal facility . Fpl Farming Ltd. v. Envtl. Processing Sys., L.C., 383 S.W.3d 274, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7769, 178 Oil & Gas Rep. 510, 2012 WL 4017388 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 13 2012).

368. Trial court properly admitted a sex offender's prior written statements in his sexually violent predator commitment proceeding because the statements were relevant apart from their tendency to prove the sex offender's stipulated convictions. The prior inconsistent statements were neither unduly prejudicial nor cumulative of the matters that the sex offender admitted in his requests for admissions. In re Commitment of Bath, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7586, 2012 WL 3860631 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 6 2012).

369. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the complained-of evidence, regarding the trustee's tax filings, "perceptual capacity," financial skills, purported medical treatments, or alleged use of alcohol and narcotics was not relevant to a determination of a reasonable and necessary attorney's fee. Lesikar v. Moon, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7311, 2012 WL 3776365 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

370. Appellant failed to meet his burden under the test for ineffective assistance, given that (1) he did not offer any authority or argument, under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(i), showing that the trial court would have erred in overruling an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, (2) the trial court did overrule appellant's relevance objection under Tex. R. Evid. 402 as to a deputy's testimony, (3) appellant did not raise the issue on appeal, although he claimed that one reason counsel should have objected on relevancy grounds was to preserve the issue for appeal, and (4) counsel's failure to object might have been sound trial strategy, as the testimony was brief, counsel already objected to relevance of the testimony, and a later objection was successful and the trial court instructed the jury to disregard the testimony concerning whether committing a crime was something to be expected from persons with a certain disease; the court could not say that counsel's failure to further object was ineffective assistance. Ozuna v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6858, 2012 WL 3525635 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2012).

371. In a murder case, the court properly admitted photographs of defendant's tattoos because the "REDRUM" and revolver tattoos were especially probative of defendant's intent and attitude relevant to his defense and testimony that he would never point a gun at someone else first. Given defendant's own counsel's indication that everyone had tattoos and criminal records, on both sides, there was no indication the evidence unfairly aroused the jury's hostility or sympathy. Luckett v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6686, 2012 WL 3241802 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 10 2012).

372. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in admitting, over defense counsel's objections, evidence of photographic lineups featuring a second suspect because the evidence was relevant as it showed that the victims picked defendant out of 12 different photographs rather than just six.

Hendershot v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6632 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 9 2012).

373. On appeal from his convictions for compelling prostitution, sexual assault of a child, and sexual performance of a child, the appellate court found that the admission of photographs of items seized from a trash can outside of the studio were admissible because they were relevant and the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Although the evidence might not have pertained directly to the complainant, proof of the activities at the studio was relevant to whether, in employing the complainant at the studio, defendant intended that she engage in sexual performance and prostitution. Wilkerson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5656, 2012 WL 2877623 (Tex. App. Dallas July 16 2012).

374. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding expert psychological testimony who allegedly would have testified that as a result of his mental defects defendant was incapable of forming the necessary mens rea to commit an assault because defendant's amnesia was caused by his head injury, which occurred after the assault, and therefore could not be relevant to his intent at the time of the assault. In addition, the expert's report only noted that defendant told the expert that he had post-traumatic stress disorder, and nothing suggested that the expert himself confirmed the diagnosis. Iniquez v. State, 374 S.W.3d 611, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5436, 2012 WL 2742632 (Tex. App. Austin July 6 2012).

375. Defendant failed to show an abuse by the trial court in excluding evidence where he did not show the exclusion of relevant and reliable evidence, Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, that formed such a vital part of his case that its exclusion effectively precluded him from presenting a defense, U.S. Const. amends. VI, XIV. Houston v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5276, 2012 WL 2511588 (Tex. App. Dallas July 2 2012).

376. Determination of the identity of the person fleeing from the police officer was a fact of significant consequence to the determination of the action, and an extraneous offense may be admissible, to show the identity of the accused, Tex. R. Evid. 403(b); therefore, evidence pertaining to identity was relevant and the trial court's decision to deny defendant's objection on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 401 was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. White v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5271 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 29 2012).

377. Determination of the identity of the person fleeing from the police officer was a fact of significant consequence to the determination of the action, and an extraneous offense may be admissible, to show the identity of the accused, Tex. R. Evid. 403(b); therefore, evidence pertaining to identity was relevant and the trial court's decision to deny defendant's objection on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 401 was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. White v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5271 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 29 2012).

378. Trial court did not err by excluding opinion testimony from the officer because his opinion on the difficulty of obtaining a conviction when the victim of a sexual assault suffered from mental impairments did not make any of the facts the jury had to determine more or less probable, and therefore the evidence was not relevant. Myles v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4911, 2012 WL 2357426 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 21 2012).

379. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, the statement by the witness that she was afraid to select the photo of defendant in the photo lineup was relevant and admissible because it showed that she identified defendant as the person that perpetrated the victim's murder. Benavides v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4971, 2012 WL 2353731 (Tex. App. Dallas June 21 2012).

380. In a fraudulent transfer case, the exclusion of title insurance evidence and various documents as irrelevant and potentially confusing under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 was not error; moreover, any error that might have occurred was harmless. Hahn v. Love, 394 S.W.3d 14, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4702, 2012 WL 2153675 (Tex. App.

Houston 1st Dist. June 14 2012).

381. Evidence at trial showed that the amount found on defendant during booking was 0.15 grams and was found in a one-dollar bill, and although the amount and packaging of cocaine found on each male were similar, they were not identical; in addition, the officer testified that suspects typically transported narcotics in bills of money such that the trial court did not err in excluding the evidence. Arreola v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4166, 2012 WL 1868680 (Tex. App. Eastland May 24 2012).

382. Defendant was free to present other evidence of the complainant's purported financial hardship, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the State's objection to introduction of evidence relating to the complainant's civil suit against a railroad company because it was not relevant and did not give rise to an inference of bias. West v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3612, 2012 WL 1606239 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 8 2012).

383. In this murder trial, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting autopsy evidence and finding it was relevant for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, given that (1) the medical examiner testified that the photographs would help him explain his findings and would help the jury understand the victim's injuries, (2) the testimony and autopsy report concerned the cause of death, which was relevant, and (3) the photographs, while not entirely clear, appeared to depict only the initial condition of the body and not autopsy mutilation; the court's analysis was the same whether or not a third photograph was admitted and shown to the jury. Jones v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2381, 2012 WL 1004735 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 27 2012).

384. Erroneous admission of irrelevant photographs of a dent in appellant's vehicle and shell casings on his porch did not influence the jury or had only a slight effect, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that neither were discussed at voir dire, most of the State's argument addressed the self-defense claim, and to the extent references to appellant's driving and shooting habits could have related to the photographs, they could have also related to the testimony of another witness. Dyke v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2181, 2012 WL 954625 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 21 2012).

385. Pictures of shell casings on appellant's porch and the dent in his truck did not make any fact of consequence, here the claim of self-defense, more or less probable, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402; one officer testified that it was found that the dent had nothing to do with the shooting, and given that the evidence suggested appellant shot the victim from inside his truck and one shell casing was found in the vehicle, there was little to no relevance the casings on the porch could have had to the offense, and thus the pictures were improperly admitted. Dyke v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2181, 2012 WL 954625 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 21 2012).

386. Because appellant did not offer argument or authority on his claims under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, 404(b) and his claims for due process and due course of law, the complaints were inadequately briefed and presented nothing for review. Keate v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117, 2012 WL 896200 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 16 2012).

387. Grant of summary judgment in favor of the company men and others in the employee's defamation action was proper because expert testimony about bankruptcy was not relevant to any element of the defamation claims, nor was the bankruptcy testimony relevant to any element of the employee's other pleaded claims. Thus, the expert was property struck as an expert witness. Bell v. Bennett, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2097, 2012 WL 858603 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 15 2012).

388. Court properly allowed an expert witness to testify about the similarity of physical evidence recovered from the crime scene because the tapes from the crime scene and defendant's home were offered to show that because the tapes were similar, it was more likely that they came from a common source, and if they came from a common source, it was more likely that the tape in defendant's home came from the packaging for the marijuana in the murder victim's home. The testimony showed the similarities of the tapes and was therefore relevant to show that defendant was at the crime scene and had a motive for shooting the victims. Robinson v. State, 368 S.W.3d 588, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483, 2012 WL 593558 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

389. Court properly admitted the contents of social networking web pages because there was sufficient circumstantial evidence to support a finding that the exhibits were what they purported to be -- web pages the contents of which defendant was responsible for. There were numerous photographs of defendant with his unique arm, body, and neck tattoos, as well as his distinctive eyeglasses and earring, and there was a reference to the victim's death and the music from his funeral. Tienda v. State, 358 S.W.3d 633, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 244 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012).

390. Court rejected appellant's Brady claim because the trial court could have found that the witness's role in gathering evidence in appellant's case was not a material fact concerning appellant's defense, plus the involvement of the witness in other cases was not shown to be material or relevant to appellant's case for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402; appellant never claimed that the State did not establish a proper chain of custody, the State's case against appellant was strong, and the State did not call the witness during the trial. Anderson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10038, 2011 WL 6743297 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 21 2011).

391. In the proceeding to commit respondent as a sexually violent predator (SVP), the trial court did not abuse its discretion by restricting respondent's cross-examination of one of the State's experts, because the doctor's subjective feelings concerning the verdict in respondent's attempted aggravated sexual assault case was not a fact of consequence in respondent's SVP case for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402. Respondent could not challenge the facts of his final convictions in the SVP proceeding, and attempted aggravated sexual assault of a child was one of his predicate convictions under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002(8)(A). In re Dees, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9807 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 15 2011).

392. In a sexual assault of a child case, the evidence of the victim's emotional problems was not relevant or admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 as the evidence could not be used to impeach her because there was no suggestion that her emotional problems could impair her ability to recall events or would compromise her credibility. Lester v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9728, 2011 WL 6238157 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 14 2011).

393. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in admitting pornographic photographs and videos seized from defendant's home; the evidence was relevant because it served to demonstrate defendant's intent, demonstrate defendant's identity, and bolster the victim's testimony, the credibility of which had been attacked. Pallm v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9402, 2011 WL 6043025 (Tex. App. Tyler Nov. 30 2011).

394. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 402, the exclusion of the photographs of a witness based on irrelevance was within the trial court's discretion because defense counsel did not establish that the photographs depicted gang activity and only stated that it could show gang signs. Oliva v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8940, 2011 WL 5428965 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2011).

395. Appellate court correctly determined that the trial court did not improperly comment on the weight of the evidence in its answer to a jury question, because the trial court merely responded to the jury's question concerning a subject identified by the jury alone; the trial court merely provided a correct statement of law that family members with relevant evidence were not prohibited from testifying, and from this, the jury could have permissibly inferred either that none of the available family members could provide relevant information or that the petitioner did not call the available family members to testify because they would supply evidence unfavorable to him. Lucio v. State, 353

S.W.3d 873, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1514 (Tex. Crim. App. Nov. 9 2011).

396. Because a crayon drawing found in the victim's clothes during the autopsy did not provide a small nudge toward proving or disproving some fact of consequence, the drawing was irrelevant and inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 402; however, under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), admission of the drawing was harmless error as the evidence against defendant was substantial and the drawing was not so emotionally charged that it prevented the jury from rationally considering the evidence before it. Soto v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8360, 2011 WL 5000393 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 20 2011).

397. Evidence of one's sexual orientation may be relevant to show bias under unique circumstances when coupled with a logical connection to one's motive to testify in a certain manner, but that was not the case here, and the evidence of the victim's sexual orientation was inadmissible and irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402; furthermore, under these circumstances when there was no connection between the victim's relationship with her female friend and any motive for her to exaggerate the incident involving appellant juvenile, any de minimis probative value of that information would be substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice in putting the victim on trial for her sexual orientation. In re O.O.A., 358 S.W.3d 352, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7416 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 13 2011).

398. Evidence of inflammatory statements in materials found in defendant's room tended to show he had an interest in gangs, drugs, and sexual assault; this evidence was admissible as relevant. Stephenson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7434, 2011 WL 4027721 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 12 2011).

399. Company president's arrest and behavior thereafter had nothing to do with the intent of the parties concerning the execution of their agreements or the termination of one agreement; the president's basis for terminating, not his reason, was what was relevant, and the testimony about the arrest was irrelevant, plus presented a clear danger of unfair prejudice, even though the court did not condone the president's actions. Nichols v. State, 349 S.W.3d 612, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7253 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 6 2011).

400. In defendant's stalking case, a reasonable fact finder could have found that the telephone number the victim attributed to defendant was his telephone number, and that defendant sent the electronic communications attributed to him by the State and depicted in the challenged exhibits. Accordingly, the challenged exhibits were relevant, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting them. Manuel v. State, 357 S.W.3d 66, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7152 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 31 2011).

401. Trial court had discretion to find that appellant's conduct of laughing and blowing kisses to a rival gang member posed a great danger to the community and caused the death of an innocent bystander, plus appellant's reluctance to cooperate showed his disregard for the value of life; this evidence was relevant to appellant's character and for assessing punishment, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), and that persons might have considered appellant's conduct as legitimate and innocent did not affect the relevance of the evidence. Brown v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7170, 2011 WL 3849106 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2011).

402. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, evidence of appellant's conduct prior to the shooting and during the police interview was relevant to assessing punishment under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), plus the evidence's potential to have an overwhelming effect on the jury was limited by an instruction, and it did not appear that the evidence required an inordinate amount of time to develop; because the evidence spoke directly to appellant's character and his lack of concern for others, the evidence was necessary to help the jury determine punishment, and the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Brown v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7170, 2011 WL 3849106 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2011).

403. In a dispute concerning whether a workers' compensation claimant who was injured while driving home had been paid for driving other employees, the trial court reasonably could have excluded deposition testimony from two company executives based on relevance under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 and/or personal knowledge under Tex. R. Evid. 602. The executives did not know the claimant and were not present when he was hired, and testimony regarding the tax treatment of the payments was not material to whether the per diem payments were for driving. Tex. Prop. & Cas. Ins. Guar. Ass'n v. Brooks, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7269, 2011 WL 3890405 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2011).

404. In a criminal solicitation of a minor for sexual assault case, under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the defense witness's testimony about the veracity of the chat room logs because it was irrelevant as he could not say whether the State's or defendant's version of the chat logs was an accurate version of the actual chat sessions. Pudasaini v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5582, 2011 WL 2905592 (Tex. App. Dallas July 21 2011).

405. In an action against a trucking company for wrongful death, which arose from a collision between the decedent's vehicle and an 18-wheel truck, the court erred in admitting two positive drug tests of the truck driver because one drug test occurred four years prior to the accident and the second test occurred eight months after the accident; the evidence was not relevant. Tornado Trucking, Inc. v. Dodd, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5123, 2011 WL 2641272 (Tex. App. Waco July 6 2011).

406. At defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation based on evidence showing that defendant and his brother broke into a mobile home and stole a TV set, the trial court ruled that evidence of two extraneous burglaries committed by his brother was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402, probative, and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). The appellate court held that defendant was not harmed by the admission of the evidence because it was not unduly emphasized by the State, and it did not have a substantial effect on the jury's verdict. Crutchfield v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4959, 2011 WL 2638402 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2011).

407. There was no evidence that a handgun being in a backpack had any relevance to the commission of the offense of murder or to appellant's self-defense claim, and for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, the trial court did not err in excluding testimony concerning how to safely carry a handgun. Knapper v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4782, 2011 WL 2503463 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 23 2011).

408. Trial court improperly admitted evidence that the decedent's widow would put any punitive damages she received from the corporation that owned and operated the cemetery into a trust to pay for funerals for persons who could not afford them because it was not relevant to proving any of the factors to be considered when determining the amount of punitive damages or to penalizing or punishing the corporation. Serv. Corp. Int'l v. Guerra, 348 S.W.3d 221, 2011 Tex. LEXIS 417, 54 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1191 (Tex. 2011).

409. During appellant's civil commitment trial, the trial court did not err by excluding an expert's testimony that appellant did not commit the crimes for which he had been convicted because the issue of whether appellant had been wrongfully convicted was not at issue. In re Commitment of Hinkle, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2011).

410. Because appellant's statements in his January 2nd letter were found by the trial court to be libel per se, the anonymous letter was wholly irrelevant to the issue of whether appellant's prior letter defamed appellee. Hancock v. Variyam, 345 S.W.3d 157, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4647 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 16 2011).

411. Evidence of the decedent's unredacted will did not tend to make the likelihood that the decedent forged the quitclaim deeds more probable or less probable than it would be without this evidence; thus, it was properly

excluded. Kingsley v. Beck, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4294, 2011 WL 2225537 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 7 2011).

412. Defendant was not prevented from showing that the victim and other family members were biased and had a motive to testify against him because there was animosity between the victim's family and defendant, but the trial court did not err in not admitting evidence of the victim's family's use of drugs as the behavior that was criticized because it was not admissible under the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test and was not shown to be relevant to any issue in the case under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

413. Photographs of the victim wearing an allegedly sexually suggestive T-shirt were excludable under either Tex. R. Evid. 402 as irrelevant or Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the probative value of the photographs was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

414. Evidence of bathing incident between defendant and his niece was admissible, Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, 404(b), as it showed the nature of defendant's relationship with and mindset towards his niece, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 Gragert v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3948, 2011 WL 2027955 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 24 2011).

415. Court remanded the cause for a jury trial on only the amount of the attorney's fees, and any evidence concerning property owners' claims for trespass, or any other claims, was irrelevant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402. Ogu v. C.I.A. Servs., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1979, 2011 WL 947008 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 17 2011).

416. Court acted within its discretion in concluding that the complainant's alleged prior use of alcohol with her mom was not relevant to whether the complainant could accurately recollect events that took place when she was not staying in her mother's home, because such testimony would not be relevant to the complainant's ability to recollect the events of the crimes alleged, which occurred when the complainant was staying with defendant, not her mother, during spring break. Vega v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1852, 2011 WL 882329 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 15 2011).

417. Testimony concerning matters disposed of by summary judgment in a dispute between a condominium association and a unit owner was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402. Bosch v. Cedar Vill. Townhomes Homeowners Ass'n, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 804, 2011 WL 346317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 3 2011).

418. When police officers responded to a domestic disturbance call at the residence of defendant and his wife, she told the officers that defendant had repeatedly struck her with a cane and held a gun to her head during an argument. At defendant's trial for assault, he did not object to the officers' testimony describing the discovery and seizure of the weapon; the evidence was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 as same transaction contextual evidence. Smith v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 859, 2011 WL 350434 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2011).

419. In defendant's murder case, whether the complainant used drugs over a month earlier did not rebut the toxicology report showing no drugs in her system at the time she was shot, and thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding the evidence irrelevant. The only evidence defendant offered was testimony that defendant's daughter would not stay with them after her grandfather's funeral because of the complainant's drug use. Mcghee v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 675 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2011).

420. In an eminent domain proceeding, the trial court abused its discretion in excluding evidence of the prior owner's environmental remediation agreement. Exclusion of the evidence was harmful, because it was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401-402 to the jury's determination of the market value of the property. Caffe Ribs, Inc. v. State, 328 S.W.3d 919, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10188 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 28 2010).

421. In a product liability action against a tire manufacturer, the trial court was within its discretion in excluding evidence regarding nylon cap plies; while the addition of a nylon cap ply might have prevented injury to a mother and children, a father did not demonstrate why evidence of the way tires were manufactured 12 years after the manufacture of the tire at issue would have been relevant to the feasibility of adding nylon cap plies in 1997. Hathcock v. Hankook Tire Am. Corp., 330 S.W.3d 733, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10032 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 17 2010).

422. When defendant pleaded guilty to intoxication manslaughter in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.08(a), the doctrines of double jeopardy and collateral estoppel did not preclude the trial court at sentencing from determining that defendant's prior offense involved alcohol even though the State had reduced the charge in the prior case from driving while intoxicated (DWI) to obstruction of a highway or other passageway; double jeopardy did not attach, because there were no common factual elements between DWI and obstruction of a highway or other passageway. Under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) and Tex. R. Evid. 401-402, the trial court was permitted to consider all relevant evidence at sentencing. Cherian v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8646, 2010 WL 4244002 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 28 2010).

423. Although defendant contended that the trial court erred in sustaining the State's objection when defendant offered the ticket and booking information pertaining to an individual arrested on the night and at the location where defendant was arrested, defendant provided no argument for the relevance of the excluded evidence, other than asserting that such evidence allegedly impeached the arresting officer's testimony regarding the basis for the arrest of the other person. Because the evidence was not relevant to the issues in this case, the trial court did not err in excluding it. Howard v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8362, 2010 WL 4069330 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 19 2010).

424. During a civil commitment hearing, the trial court did not err in sustaining the State's relevancy objection to a question to a psychologist concerning whether a diagnosis of pedophilia predisposed a person to commit acts of sexual violence because the psychologist had not diagnosed respondent with pedophilia. In re Commitment of Robertson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7421 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

425. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the probative value of the child victim's mother's testimony outweighed any prejudicial effect because the testimony, identifying defendant as the individual who left bite marks on the victim when they were playing, was relevant and probative of the relationship between defendant and the victim. Samora v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6759, 2010 WL 3279536 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2010).

426. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence about the bullet damage to the interior of a particular home. The evidence was relevant to rebut defendant's theory that he merely fired a gun into the air to deter and stop a man whom he believed to be a burglar, and the evidence was not particularly inflammatory or of such a nature as to distract, confuse, or be given undue weight by the jury. Richardson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6659, 2010 WL 3245443 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18 2010).

427. Evidence of trace quantities of controlled substances that were found in defendant's car during the same search in which the methadone was found was relevant and admissible because it was visible in a baggie and on a scale, and the baggie was found in the location where the trooper had seen defendant secret something. Lamkin v.

State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6484, 2010 WL 3170647 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 12 2010).

428. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 404(b), the trial court could have reasonably determined that the testimony about appellant's pretrial supervision and having been found competent to stand trial in a separate case was relevant rebuttal testimony that appellant was motivated to commit the underlying offenses to demonstrate that he was not competent to stand trial in the other case. Espinosa v. State, 328 S.W.3d 32, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6341 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 5 2010).

429. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by prohibiting defendant from questioning his daughter about the victim's use of marijuana because whether the victim used drugs over a month earlier would not rebut the toxicology report showing no drugs in her system at the time she was killed. Mcghee v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 15 2010).

430. Ineffective assistance of counsel in violation of U.S. Const. amend. VI was shown where defendant's counsel failed to object to evidence that one of two women who died after being run over by defendant's truck was pregnant; evidence of her pregnancy was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 402 because the fact that the woman was pregnant did not tend to make it more or less probable that defendant had the requisite intent to injure her and there was no evidence that defendant in fact even was aware of the woman's pregnancy. White v. Thaler, 610 F.3d 890, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 13329 (5th Cir. Tex. 2010).

431. Court acted within its discretion in admitting the challenged testimony, because evidence that defendant wore a shirt commemorating a notorious gang founder with a violent history was relevant to explain his motive for urging his accomplice to shoot the store employee. Carey v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4876, 2010 WL 2573846 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 29 2010).

432. Because forgery was not pleaded as an affirmative defense under Tex. R. Civ. P. 94 in a suit for a constructive trust, handwriting evidence was not helpful and thus was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 702. Estate of Wallis, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3710, 2010 WL 1987514 (Tex. App. Tyler May 19 2010).

433. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court properly prohibited defendant from cross-examining several witnesses about whether the victim had made accusations against others of sexual assault because the probative value of the excluded evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice; accusations against third parties, even other members of the victim's family or household, of different and separate sexual assaults were inconsequential and not probative of the accusations against defendant. Hubbard v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3408, 2010 WL 1818950 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 7 2010).

434. Photographs of defendant, his car, and its contents were relevant, as the identity of the convenience store robber was a fact of consequence in this aggravated robbery case and the evidence obtained at another store made the determination of whether defendant was the robber more probable, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3387, 2010 WL 1780138 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 5 2010).

435. Court did not err in excluding all of defendant's proffered evidence at sentencing, because defendant did not separate the admissible evidence from the inadmissible evidence. Fegans v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2588, 2010 WL 1571217 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 8 2010).

436. Even if appellant adequately briefed her points, there was no abuse of discretion in the trial court's evidentiary rulings, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, 601, 802 and Tex. R. App. P. 44.1. Pool v. Diana, 2010 Tex.

App. LEXIS 2208 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 24 2010).

437. During defendant's trial for unlawful possession of a firearm and possession of cocaine, the trial court, without abusing its discretion, could have determined that the fact that defendant's adult daughter previously possessed and disposed of a handgun was not probative of any fact of consequence to the determination of defendant's guilt; the court could have determined that any relevance the evidence possessed was substantially outweighed by the danger of confusion of the issues involved in defendant's prosecution. Taylor v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2024, 2010 WL 1027534 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 22 2010).

438. During defendant's murder trial, the court did not err in admitting a transcript of defendant's conversation with a codefendant because it was highly probative to establish a motive and identity for participating in the murder; evidence of defendant's payment for the commission of the murder, as well as defendant's association with gang assassins, was relevant to show that defendant assisted in the murder and defendant's intent to do so. Reta v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1482, 2010 WL 724395 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2010).

439. Court did not err in excluding the expert testimony regarding the genuineness of the testator's signature on the beneficiary designation forms, because the claimant admitted that she did not raise the issue of forgery regarding these signatures, and the evidence from the handwriting expert regarding the issue had no relationship to any issue in the constructive trust suit. In the Estate of Wallis, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1441, 2010 WL 702267 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 26 2010).

440. In defendant's felony murder case, the court properly allowed the victim's daughter to testify to her relationship with her father because the gist of the witness's testimony set up the circumstances immediately leading up to the murder, and was relevant to show the probative circumstances of the crime. Arguably, the two questions regarding the relationship between the victim and the witness were necessary to establish the connection between them, as well as the victim's actions immediately prior to his death. Flores v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 822, 2010 WL 411747 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 4 2010).

441. In defendant's murder case, the court properly admitted testimony regarding the victim having worked for defendant as a prostitute because the witness testified that the cycle of violence evolved from "slapping" to the point of "pretty brutal beatings." That testimony tended to show that defendant was violent toward the victim in the past and that his violence toward her was escalating; therefore, the testimony was relevant to the charge of murder. Wilson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 604, 2010 WL 323537 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 28 2010).

442. Picture of spinner rims was properly admitted because it aided the jury in understanding the police officers' testimony about the improvements that defendant made to the rental car he drove for approximately one week; that was helpful to the jury by enabling them to determine if the installation of spinner rims tended to demonstrate defendant's control over the rental car. In addition, a photograph of the spinner rims that were actually installed on the rental car would have been relevant for the same reason and admissible at trial. Rollins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9891 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 31, 2009).

443. To corroborate an accomplice's testimony, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.14, the State offered the testimony of one witness and defendant's parole officer; because the officer's identification testimony identified defendant as the male robber in the photographs taken during the robbery, the testimony tended to make it more probable, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, that he was the male robber, and thus the testimony was relevant and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence as relevant. Mendez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9785, 2009 WL 5150071 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 30 2009).

444. Defendant's parole officer's identification testimony substantively contributed to make the existence of a fact, that defendant was the male robber depicted in photographs, more likely, and the evidence was offered in an effort to corroborate accomplice-witness testimony, and thus the officer's testimony did not constitute improper bolstering. Mendez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9785, 2009 WL 5150071 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 30 2009).

445. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the trial court did not err in declining to strike the previously admitted evidence of the knife and a witness's testimony about the knife because the knife was relevant, it was admitted into evidence before the witness testified, and a photograph showed the exact location where the knife was found. Because the evidence was properly admitted, the trial court did not err by refusing defendant's request for a limiting instruction. Jones v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9570, 2009 WL 4856420 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 17 2009).

446. In a sexual assault case, a court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence that defendant had threatened a witness not to testify because defendant threatened to accuse the witness and his wife of sexually abusing defendant's girlfriend's children if the witness testified against him. The testimony was relevant to show defendant's consciousness of guilt. Ramsey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9449, 2009 WL 4755175 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 10 2009).

447. Trial court erroneously admitted a 1993 judgment convicting defendant of misdemeanor assault where the judgment was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it had no relevance apart from proof of character conformity. Moreover, evidence of the conviction was not available for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the record contained no evidence that the victim of the assault was female, and there was thus no proof that it was a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude. Tello v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8401, 2009 WL 3518006 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 30 2009).

448. In a driving while intoxicated case, a trial court did not err by admitting a DIC-24 form into evidence because it was relevant to prove that defendant refused to submit to the taking of a specimen of his breath and that defendant was provided with the required information under Tex. Transp. Code Ann. § 724.015 before his specimen was requested. Frnka v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7095, 2009 WL 2882939 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 9 2009).

449. In a driving while intoxicated case, even though defendant made several challenges to the trial court's admission of a DC-24 form into evidence, because the only objection made at trial was for relevance, that was the only issue preserved for appellate review. Frnka v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7095, 2009 WL 2882939 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 9 2009).

450. In defendant's tampering with a witness case, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence that the victim's father had recently kicked her out of his house because it was uncontested that defendant had previously threatened to kick the victim out if she became pregnant. That evidence served to establish a motive, if any, for the victim to make false accusations against defendant; the additional evidence regarding the victim's father's decision to kick her out, if true, did not lend any additional weight to that theory. Davis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6685 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 26 2009).

451. In a murder case, autopsy photographs were properly admitted because the State had to prove that defendant caused the victim's death by shooting him with a deadly weapon, and a doctor's testimony described the type of injuries the victim received, the extent of those injuries, and the cause of his death. Additionally, although the photographs were somewhat gruesome, they were not enlarged. Ramirez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6640, 2009 WL 4377427 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2009).

452. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly denied defendant's request for a social worker to testify as to a recommendation for the children's placement because there was ample testimony presented by others with firsthand knowledge that the child's mother was a bad parent, and the social worker's recommendation did not have any direct or logical connection to the proposition that some other adult caused the injury to the child. Munoz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6475, 2009 WL 2517664 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 19 2009).

453. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly denied defendant's witness's testimony relating to the field of false confessions because the witness's testimony could not have assisted the jury in understanding the evidence or in making a determination of a fact issue. He did not intend to offer an opinion as to the truth or falsity of defendant's confession, and during cross-examination defendant admitted the truth of the portions of his confession that he earlier claimed were inaccurate. Munoz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6475, 2009 WL 2517664 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 19 2009).

454. Evidence that defendant did not comprehend the reasons for his wife's arrest and that his speech was slurred would tend to make it more probable that he was intoxicated, such that the evidence was relevant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402. Hernandez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6356, 2009 WL 2476523 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 13 2009).

455. In defendant's trial for indecency with a child by contact in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11, the trial court properly ruled that certain letters to and from the victim that were in the possession of the prosecution were not discoverable under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 39.14 nor admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 because they were not relevant to the issues at trial and were not exculpatory. Shaw v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5109, 2009 WL 1896068 (Tex. App. Austin July 3 2009).

456. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted evidence of an aggravated robbery because the defensive claims that defendant raised by his statements placed the intent element of his capital murder offense at issue, which entitled the State to rebut defendant's claimed lack of intent with evidence of his unadjudicated extraneous offense of the aggravated robbery. Gomez v. Tex., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4521, 2009 WL 1688233 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 18 2009).

457. Court did not err by refusing to allow defense counsel to cross-examine a police officer about prior incidents in which the officer allegedly used excessive force because the officer's character was not an essential element of the charge, claim, or defense to attempting to take a weapon from a peace officer, and the proffered testimony was not material because it did not address any fact of importance to the outcome of the action. Rico v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4141, 2009 WL 1623343 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 11 2009).

458. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly allowed photographs of the victim to be admitted because the medical examiner who performed the autopsy stated that photographs of the child's body before and during the autopsy would assist him in describing his findings to the jury, the testimony was probative of the child's condition at the time defendant brought the child to a witness's house, and the testimony demonstrated the scope and extent of the child's injuries and the cause of death. Williams v. State, 294 S.W.3d 674, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4201 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 11 2009).

459. During defendant's criminal trial for the sexual asault of a child, the State was permitted to introduce extraneous offense evidence that defendant encouraged the victim's involvement in several crimes to rebut defense counsel's opening remarks that defendant was a positive influence on the victim. The trial court determined the extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to correct the false impression created by the defense; the extraneous offense evidence was relevent for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, because it tended to make less probable defendant's argument that he was encouraging the victim to be a decent and productive citizen.

Ytuarte v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3056, 2009 WL 1232327 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 6 2009).

460. In an indecency with a child case, the court committed reversible error in the admission of sex toys because there was no suggestion that sex toys were used in any way related to the complainant, and the State emphasized those items in providing a detailed description of each item, making certain to emphasize their graphic nature by carrying them in a single plastic tub, pointing out the testifying officer's wearing of gloves, and repeatedly apologizing to the jury for the graphic nature of those items. Warr v. State, 418 S.W.3d 617, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2538 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 15 2009).

461. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting the victim's videotaped statement because defendant raised the issue of self-defense. A witness testified that in defendant's altercation with the victim, the victim was the aggressor and defendant tried to resist retaliating; as a result of that testimony, defendant's alleged assault of the victim was relevant rebuttal evidence to prove that defendant acted with the requisite intent. In re B.H., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1852, 2009 WL 692613 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 18 2009).

462. In a dispute concerning the location of an express access easement, the parties both purchased land owned by the original grantor; the trial court did not err by excluding all evidence of defendants' proposed location for the easement because it showed that the easement was to be located through property that was not part of the original tract. The excluded evidence was irrelevant for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402. Shed, L.L.C. v. Edom Wash 'N Dry, L.L.C., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1853, 2009 WL 692609 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 18 2009).

463. Corporation provided an assignment document in a breach of contract dispute in its supplemental response to a concrete company's motions for summary judgment. A trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence because the evidence was relevant. All Metals Fabricating, Inc. v. Ramer Concrete, Inc., 338 S.W.3d 557, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1654 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 12 2009).

464. In defendant's evading arrest case, the court properly excluded a defense witness's testimony because the proffered testimony that it was "standard operating procedure" for law enforcement agencies in general to routinely make video and audio recordings of police pursuits was not germane. The witness did not have personal knowledge as to the standard procedures of the Corpus Christi Police Department regarding recordings of police pursuits. Gomez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1700 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 5 2009).

465. Defendant limited one issue to the admissibility of a sexual assault nurse examiner's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 and he did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 or request a balancing test; thus, the court limited its review solely to determining whether the nurse's testimony had any relevance to the issues contested at trial in defendant's sexual assault trial. Shackelford v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1441, 2009 WL 508478 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 3 2009).

466. In a case arising from a car accident, the evidence was legally insufficient to support an award of past medical care expenses because Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 41.0105 limited the recovery to the amount actually paid or incurred by or on behalf of an injured party; an amount that had been written off could not have been recovered. Because the evidence here did not relate to the amount of damages sustained under a proper measure of damages, the evidence was both irrelevant and legally insufficient to support the judgment; however, due to undisputed facts, a voluntary remittitur was suggested. De Escabedo v. Haygood, 283 S.W.3d 3, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1101 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 18 2009).

467. Victim testified that her mother was not present when the sexual assaults by defendant occurred and the mother testified that she continued her relationship with defendant because she thought the case would not come to trial, not because she believed the assaults never occurred; thus, the mother's continuing relationship with defendant was not relevant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, to the issue of whether the victim was telling the truth in defendant's aggravated sexual assault trial, and whether or not the mother believed the assaults occurred was not relevant to whether the victim was telling the truth, as the testimony of a child sexual abuse victim was alone sufficient to support a conviction, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.07 Vazquez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1058 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 17 2009).

468. Defendant failed to preserve an issue for review because defendant made an objection, early in the complainant's testimony, that questions regarding the complainant's cancer treatment were irrelevant and unfairly prejudicial, that objection was overruled, and defendant did not at that time request a continuing objection nor lodge any further objection. The prosecutor went on to ask the complainant nine more questions about her cancer treatment, and the complainant responded with details about her treatment, including its nature and frequency, without any objections from defendant as to relevance or unfair prejudice. Thierry v. State, 288 S.W.3d 80, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1043 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

469. In a driving while intoxicated case, evidence of defendant's use of prescription medications was not relevant because there was no evidence as to the dosage, the exact times of ingestion, or the half-life of the drug; a lay juror was not in a position to determine whether the drugs, taken more than 12 hours before arrest, would have any effect on defendant's intoxication. Without expert testimony to provide the foundation required to admit scientific evidence, the testimony regarding defendant's use of prescription medications was not relevant. Layton v. State, 280 S.W.3d 235, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 149 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

470. In a personal injury case, a trial court did not err in admitting evidence of the deaths of two motorists because it was relevant to show the jury why they did not testify at trial. Matbon, Inc. v. Gries, 288 S.W.3d 471, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 268 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 15 2009).

471. In a personal injury case, a trial court did not err in admitting evidence of events that occurred after an accident because it was relevant to the jury's consideration of the factors under Alamo Nat'l Bank v. Kraus, 616 S.W.2d 908 (Tex. 1981), in the context of exemplary damages. Matbon, Inc. v. Gries, 288 S.W.3d 471, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 268 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 15 2009).

472. In a personal injury case, a trial court did not err in admitting evidence of negligence because, even though there was a stipulation to the issues of negligence and proximate cause, an employer and an employee did not stipulate to the manner in which responsibility should be apportioned between them. Additionally, they did not stipulate to the employee's liability for exemplary damages. Matbon, Inc. v. Gries, 288 S.W.3d 471, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 268 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 15 2009).

473. In an aggravated assault case where insanity was an issue, a trial court did not err by excluding the testimony of a psychiatrist regarding defendant's mental condition in 2007 as irrelevant because the psychiatrist did not have any information regarding defendant's mental state in 2005 when the crime was committed. Likewise, records of defendant's visit to an emergency room in 2007 where he saw the psychiatrist were properly excluded for the same reason. Wiley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 225, 2008 WL 5501149 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 14 2009).

474. In a case in which a jury found defendant guilty of the offense of murder, the trial court did not err in excluding defendant's testimony regarding the specifics about the "immoral teachings" that he believed his children's grandmother and the complainant had been exposing the children to because defendant did not explain, nor was a reviewing court able to discern, how any testimony about the contents of any "immoral teachings" would have had any tendency to make his self-defense claim more or less probable. Washington v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4434, 2009 WL 40168 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 8 2009).

475. Evidence that defendant failed to appear in 1999 and that his bond was forfeited was relevant and admissible as evidence of guilt, and defendant failed to present any evidence showing that his failure to appear was not flight from prosecution, plus he presented no argument that the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403; thus, he did not show that the trial court abused its discretion or committed reversible error in admitting the evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Pratte v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9716 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 31 2008).

476. During defendant's criminal trial for burglary of a building, the trial court overruled defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 402 relevancy objection to testimony about his methamphetamine addiction. The Court of Appeals of Texas held that the failure to reassert his earlier objection waived the issue for appellate review in accordance with Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Greenlee v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9438 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 19 2008).

477. Defendant complained that the admission of evidence that he had left a note containing his name, jail address, and other information in the women's room was irrelevant and prejudicial; however, the trial court determined that the probative value of the evidence was substantial. Further, any evidence of an extraneous act was admissible during the punishment phase, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07. Wilson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9395 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 17 2008).

478. In an aggravated sexual assault case, a trial court did not err by admitting evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) regarding defendant's commission of indecency with a child because defendant opened the door to such when his wife testified that it was physically impossible for him to have committed the assault due to their close living quarters. Moreover, the evidence was relevant to rebut allegations of lack of opportunity and fabrication. Isenberger v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9224 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 11 2008).

479. In an aggravated assault case, a trial court did not err by allowing a victim's father to testify during the guilt/innocence phase of the case because his brief testimony, which included basic information about himself, the victim, the evening of the shooting, and the victim's condition, was relevant and not overly prejudicial. Sanchez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9072 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 4 2008).

480. In defendant's drug case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting in evidence the shotgun found on the back seat of the vehicle that defendant was driving just before his arrest because the probative value of the shotgun was considerable and significantly necessary to the State's case because it was a link tending to show that defendant knowingly possessed the cocaine. Additionally, the evidence of the shotgun was relevant to prove defendant's knowledge that he possessed narcotics. Harris v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9090 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 4 2008).

481. Court properly sustained the prosecutor's relevance objections because defense counsel did not limit his questions specifically to the assault victim's experience during the period surrounding the incident in question; the questions regarding whether Paxil could be used to treat "obsessive/compulsive disorder" and whether its side effects included "agitation and anxiety"--were asked in a general fashion, not about the victim's own experience on the medication. Scott v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9142 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 4 2008).

482. In defendant's indecency with a child case, the court properly excluded evidence that a boyfriend of the victims' mother was a registered sex offender because evidence of the boyfriend's registered-sex-offender status would only have been relevant if the identity of the alleged perpetrator of the offenses was an issue in the case. However, evidence of an alternative perpetrator was not relevant to the determination of whether the alleged offenses occurred. Shaw v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9038 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 3 2008).

483. Evidence of defendant's association with white supremacists and racist beliefs was relevant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, because it provided the motive for defendant's violent sexual assault on the victim; based on defendant's use of racial slurs before and during the incident, the court could not say the trial court abused its discretion in finding such evidence relevant for the purpose of demonstrating motive. Tuck v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8525 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 30 2008).

484. Defendant argued that a deputy's employment of the horizontal gaze nystagmus test was not reliable for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and the testimony was not only not helpful to the jury, but was misleading and unfairly prejudicial, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, 702, but defendant's objection, which referred broadly to the deputy's administration of the test, was not specific enough to have informed the trial court of the basis of the argument defendant now raised on appeal so as to have afforded the trial court the opportunity to rule on it, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 103; thus, defendant waived error, if any. Gowin v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6873 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 17 2008).

485. In a breach of contract suit by former employees of a corporation, the admission of certain documents on the corporation's operators' misappropriation counterclaim was proper as they were relevant in establishing the amount of reimbursement sought by the operators due to an employee's actions in falsifying customer invoices, which required the operators to reimburse the customers. Tucker v. Inter-American Oil Works, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6944 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 11 2008).

486. Given that Tex. R. Evid. 402 provided that evidence that was not relevant was not admissible, the court first had to determine if the evidence was relevant. South Plains Lamesa R.R. v. Heinrich, 280 S.W.3d 357, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6038 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2008).

487. In a family violence protective order hearing, the victim's violation of her alcohol probation terms was irrelevant for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402 to the issue of whether defendant had committed dating violence in the past or whether it was likely that he would do so in the future. The trial court did not err by excluding the evidence which was offered to impeach the victim's credibility. Mercer v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5794 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 31 2008).

488. Items seized at the scene of a house fire were relevant under Tex. R. Evid 401, 402, 403, 404(b) to show that the fire started as a result of the cooking of methamphetamine on the stove and that the debris found in the burned house pertained to the use or manufacture of illegal drugs; defendant failed to establish that the trial court abused its discretion or that the determination fell outside of the zone of reasonable disagreement. Dentler v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5708 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2008).

489. Trial court did not err in permitting the State to raise gang-related evidence at defendant's robbery trial, given that (1) although defendant claimed the gang-related testimony was inadmissible because it was irrelevant, the case law defendant relied upon was inapposite, (2) because evidence of defendant's gang affiliation was relevant to show his motive for the robbery, rather than mere conformity with character, it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402, 404, (3) the fact that the victim was unsure whether defendant was a particular gang member did not render the gang-related evidence inadmissible, the jury was the judge of the credibility of the witnesses, and the jury could have inferred that defendant was affiliated with or a member of a particular gang, and (4) the trial court did not err in finding that the potential character conformity inference did not substantially outweigh the relevant purpose of showing motive, as defendant's gang affiliation was not only relevant but critical to show the motive for his crime. Spencer v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5524 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 24 2008).

490. In a failing to change a driver's license address case, defense counsel's testimony that he told the prosecutor before trial that defendant was a student, and therefore had two addresses, was relevant to rebut the suggestion that defendant, represented by counsel, should somehow have personally communicated the information to the prosecution; the error was not harmless because the officer admitted that if defendant had told him he was a student he would not have given him a ticket. Callahan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3817 (Tex. App. Dallas May 28 2008).

491. In defendant's child sexual assault case, the trial court did not err by determining that details of alleged abuse by another person were not relevant to the determination of whether defendant sexually assaulted the child, and that such details did not tend to make the existence of a material fact more or less probable; the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it ruled that the details of any alleged previous abuse by the other person were not relevant. Bargas v. State, 252 S.W.3d 876, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3443 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

492. Driver's consumption of alcohol was relevant to the element of causation in his negligence suit against a trucker because the trucker presented evidence that the accident could have been avoided had the driver steered his vehicle to the right to avoid the trucker's trailer, and in failing to do so, the driver caused the accident. PPC Transp. v. Metcalf, 254 S.W.3d 636, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3291 (Tex. App. Tyler 2008).

493. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit evidence of a doctor's scrubs in this medical malpractice case because there was no evidence that the patient ever saw the doctor wearing scrubs or that he relied on the language on the scrubs in forming a belief that the doctor or the hospital and its parent company were holding the doctor out as an agent, and there was no evidence that the patient's wife was influenced by the language on the scrubs. Farlow v. Harris Methodist Fort Worth Hosp., 284 S.W.3d 903, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9836, 64 A.L.R.6th 741 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

494. In a medical malpractice case, there was no evidence that anyone saw or relied on a hospital wall plaque in forming a belief as to whether a doctor was an agent of a hospital and its parent company, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit this evidence for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402; moreover, the evidence, even if considered to show an affirmative holding out by the hospital and its parent company of doctors as employees, was negated by evidence that the hospital and company included language in its admissions paperwork specifically disclaiming any such relationship. Thus, even if the trial court erred, the court could not say that error, cumulatively or individually, resulted in the rendition of an improper judgment under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1). Farlow v. Harris Methodist Fort Worth Hosp., 284 S.W.3d 903, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9836, 64 A.L.R.6th 741 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

495. Records showing that defendant obtained hydrocodone and other prescriptions many times in the past from different doctors made it more probable that, when defendant was unable to get a doctor to refill his prescription, he knowingly asked a co-worker to refill it through fraudulent means, and thus the trial court did not err in finding that the records were relevant for purposes of defendant's conviction of possession of a controlled substance, dihydrocodeinone (hydrocodone), by fraud, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.129(a); considering that the only direct evidence of defendant's culpable mental state was the co-worker's testimony and she was impeached, the trial court could have found (1) that the probative force of and the State's need for the records were considerable, (2) the records were not inflammatory and did not suggest a decision on an improper basis, (3) the records would not have misled the jury, and (4) the probative value of the records was not substantially outweighed by the countervailing factors specified in Tex. R. Evid. 403. Starn v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2402 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 3 2008).

496. Sole issue at trial was whether the mother's parental rights were to be terminated, and termination of parental rights merely clears the way for the possibility of an adoption, which would have to be decided in a separate proceeding and which, as all parties agreed, would not necessarily have resulted in adoption by the foster parents, and thus the court agreed that the merits of a prospective adoptive home were irrelevant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, Tex. R. Evid. 402, to the issue of whether the mother's parental rights were to be terminated. Bennett v.

Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2420 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 3 2008).

497. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs of the victim at the crime scene because some of the photographs were used by the experts to explain the manner of the death and the amount of force used by defendant when hitting the victim with the baseball bat, tending to disprove his self-defense claim; other photographs, along with the testimony of the blood-spatter expert, addressed the absence of any struggle between the victim and defendant and that the victim was either on his knees or on the ground while being beaten, while some photographs depicted the brutality of the crime and the severity of the injuries and were probative of the manner of the victim's death. Grayson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2210 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 27 2008).

498. In defendant's trial for retaliation, aggravated kidnapping, and aggravated assault, the fact that defendant had also locked another girlfriend in the same trunk in the past made it more probable that he had done the same to his current ex-girlfriend, and the first girlfriend's testimony that she did not feel free to leave him tended to rebut his claim that his ex-girlfriend remained with him voluntarily, and thus the first girlfriend's testimony was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence over a Tex. R. Evid. 402 objection; because the first and third factors under Tex. R. Evid. 403 weighed heavily in favor of admissibility, given that the jury was drawn away from the indicted offenses only briefly and the testimony was compelling and supported the ex-girlfriend's claims, and the second and fourth factors were neutral, the trial court did not err in finding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of this evidence. Stephenson v. State, 255 S.W.3d 652, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2072 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

499. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding part of defendant's employer's testimony concerning the employer's son's prescription medication and a videotape of defendant's 2000 arrest for driving while intoxicated because the evidence was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to whether defendant was guilty of the charged crimes of driving while intoxicated and evading arrest. Peavey v. State, 248 S.W.3d 455, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1818 (Tex. App. Austin 2008).

500. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for the Class A misdemeanor offense of assault causing bodily injury in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant regarding past accusations of spousal abuse where the complainant's character for truthfulness was not attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise as required by Tex. R. Evid. 608; instead, during cross-examination, defendant attempted to inquire into prior accusations of abuse that the complainant made against her ex-husband for the purpose of attacking the complainant's credibility, and, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, Tex. R. Evid. 402, Tex. R. Evid. 608, the probative value of the evidence sought to be admitted was extremely low, particularly because defense counsel admitted during trial that he had no evidence that the complainant lied about the abuse and that the accusations occurred a long time ago. Sullivan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1394 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2008).

501. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's gang affiliation during the punishment phase of trial, under the First Amendment of the United States Constitution right to associate, because the State sufficiently established that defendant was a member of a gang and that the gang engaged in violent and illegal activities, including fighting and assaults within the jail facility; evidence of defendant's gang membership was relevant at the punishment phase for its probative bearing on defendant's character. Cantu v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1028 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 13 2008).

502. Trial court did not violate defendant's due process right to introduce additional evidence to establish that an alternative perpetrator committed a murder because evidence of the alternative perpetrator's prior crimes did not demonstrate the required nexus between the crime charged and the alternative perpetrator because the evidence did not tend to connect the alternative perpetrator to the murder of the victim. Villa v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS

1025 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 13 2008).

503. In an action involving a fire and who was the cause of it, a proper foundation had not been laid to qualify an expert to testify whether he had any criticism of the plumbing company's work and the admission of testimony that an individual was not seeking to recover anything from the plumbing company was irrelevant since none of it even remotely related to whether the plumbing company was liable for the fire; however, those errors were harmless since they did not cause the rendition of an improper verdict and therefore, a reversal was not required. Richmond Condos. v. Skipworth Commer. Plumbing, Inc., 245 S.W.3d 646, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 963 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

504. In defendant's murder case, the court properly allowed the State to reveal defendant's tattoos because the evidence was relevant to support the State's theory that defendant was a gang member who murdered rival gang members in retaliation; in addition, given the other evidence indicating defendant's admitted gang membership, the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial. Reyes v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 293 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 16 2008).

505. During defendant's trial for delivering more than one gram but less than four grams of cocaine, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112, his trial counsel did not provide ineffective assistance by failing to object to certain portions of an undercover narcotics officer's testimony where counsel might have made the strategic decision to not object because he reasonably believed such an objection (whether on relevancy, confrontation, or other grounds) would likely be overruled by the trial court because such testimony was arguably admissible; the record indicated that the complained-of testimony was being offered as background information so that the jury could understand why the undercover officer was not surprised to see defendant appear at the motel room where the officer was working, even though the officer had initially been scheduled to meet a different suspected drug dealer, and such evidence could be considered relevant by a trial court, which could then choose to admit such evidence over any evidentiary objection under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Henderson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9843 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 20 2007).

506. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of a gun found by the witness because its probative value was not outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice, when the witness testified that he found the gun around the same time as the aggravated robbery, lying on the road a few blocks away from the store, and this was approximately the same location where the officer observed defendant driving a car matching the description of the suspect's vehicle provided by police dispatchers at the time of the aggravated robbery and from which the officer observed defendant extend his hand and arm out of the window and then back into the car. Mouton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10076 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 20 2007).

507. In defendant's murder case, although the court erred in excluding the testimony and notes of a licensed counselor who had counseled defendant hours before the murder because the testimony provided some insight into defendant's state of mind at the time of the murder, the error was harmless; defendant's expert's testimony concerning defendant's sanity at the time of the offense was considerably more direct and probative than the tangentially relevant testimony of the counselor. Bradshaw v. State, 244 S.W.3d 490, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9427 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

508. Trial court erred in admitting photograph of sexual items, namely a penis pump, a package of "Wet N Wild" condoms, a bottle of flavored personal lubricant, and various issues of Playboy (R) magazine, that were found in defendant's duffle bag where none of the items had a tendency to make the existence of any fact that was of consequence to the determination of defendant's action in taking a sexually compromising photograph of the child victim more probable than it would have been without the evidence. Young v. State, 242 S.W.3d 192, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9350 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007).

509. In a murder case, there was no abuse of discretion in the trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding the victim's drug use because that evidence was irrelevant and inadmissible; there was nothing in the record that connected the victim's possession and use of marijuana and cocaine to the victim's alleged violent acts. Moore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9036 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 14 2007).

510. Appellant's aggravated sexual assault conviction was upheld because it was not an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of the complainant's kissing and flirting with another person at a party under a "rape shield" law since, inter alia, (1) evidence of the complainant's sexual conduct with another man, whether a stranger or not, was not evidence of consent with appellant, and (2) appellant provided no support for the argument that the evidence was probative of the complainant's "motive and bias" in testifying about whether the encounter with appellant was consensual. Barrera v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8662 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 31 2007).

511. In a drug case, evidence that there was conflicting information in the police report was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of the officers. Cameron v. State, 241 S.W.3d 15, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1120 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

512. Trial court should not have considered certain petitions on summary judgment because they did not appear to be certified; in any event, neither petition alleged what project the subcontractors in the current case worked on, and thus even if the court considered the petitions in its review of a denial of summary judgment, the information would not have been relevant to the disposition of the case, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 402. Souder v. Cannon, 235 S.W.3d 841, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7363 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

513. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, because there was no evidence suggesting that defendant intended the register under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 62.055(a) but the police or jailers prevented him from doing so after his arrest, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit evidence of the incarceration; even if the evidence was improperly excluded, defendant was unable to show harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44, given that the jury was presented with ample evidence showing that defendant violated the mens rea element of the statute. Kosick v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7284 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2007).

514. In a case alleging aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, defendant was not allowed to question witnesses regarding a previous child abuse complaint against the same child since it was not relevant or material to the offense, and a mother could not have been questioned about specific instances of conduct; moreover, the mother's testimony during direct examination did not leave a misleading impression with the jury which needed clarification under Tex. R. Evid. 107; the focus of the prior investigation was a grandmother, who was not a witness in the case. Hernandez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6815 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 23 2007).

515. Defendant claimed that the trial court's evidentiary rulings effectively prevented her from presenting her defense to capital murder, that the child victim's parents were the perpetrators of the crime, and the court analyzed the evidence to determine if the trial court's evidentiary rulings were clearly erroneous; the court found that (1) absent evidence that the children became involved in the physical disputes the parents previously had, the court was unable to hold that the trial court abused its discretion in excluding this evidence, and in any event, defendant did not raise her due process argument in this regard to the trial court, such that two related subpoints were not properly before the court, (2) certain excluded evidence did not add much, if anything, to the defense and did not prevent defendant from putting on a defense, such that defendant's due process rights were not violated, and (3) another witness statement was hearsay and did not meet any exceptions, and the exclusion of the statement in question did not prevent defendant from putting on a defense, and no indicia of reliability existed concerning the witness's statement, and defendant did not call this witness to testify. Stevens v. State, 234 S.W.3d 748, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6845 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

516. In defendant's capital murder case, evidence in the guilt-innocence phase that painted a picture of the victim as a young man with a promising future whose life defendant had ended prematurely was irrelevant and appealed to the jury's sympathies. However, the error was harmless; defendant admitted to participating in the shooting, and a witness testified that defendant shot the victim and grabbed the bag of codeine. Durand v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6535 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 16 2007).

517. Decision refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant regarding the sexual abuse allegations against her father was affirmed because defendant failed to demonstrate that cross-examining the complainant regarding her allegations against her father was constitutionally required, and the district court's decision to limit the cross-examination did not violate the defendant's constitutional right to confront the witnesses against him; evidence demonstrating that the complainant had made allegations against her father, without more, would not have been relevant to a determination of whether the complainant fabricated her allegations against defendant, defendant failed to produce any evidence indicating that the complainant's prior allegations against her father were false, and the complainant's credibility had already been impeached through the testimony of one of the State's witnesses indicating that the complainant had made false allegations against other individuals while in therapy. Davis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6360 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 9 2007).

518. In a negligence case arising from a fire at a condominium complex, speculative testimony regarding the adequacy of plumbing work was irrelevant and inadmissible and no showing of expert qualifications was made under Tex. R. Evid. 702; however, the trial court's error in admitting the testimony was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44. Richmond Condos. v. Skipworth Commer. Plumbing, Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5977 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 26 2007).

519. On appeal of a conviction of misdemeanor theft, the trial court did not err in sustaining the State's objection to the offender's question concerning profit margin in her inquiry as to the value of stolen retail property because the offender did not point to any offer of proof as required by Tex. R. Evid. 103, and the substance of the evidence she sought to offer was not apparent; thus, she forfeited her issue pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33; moreover, had she preserved her complaint, the trial court did not err; the offender complained that the trial court should not have sustained the State's relevance objection, but evidence that the victim had a profit margin did not tend to rebut the fact that the victim's sales price was at a fair market value. Smith v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5880 (Tex. App. Waco July 25 2007).

520. Because the trial court acted within its discretion in dismissing the patient's claims that the doctor was negligent in deciding to perform the surgery without attempting more conservative treatment and in failing to provide adequate follow-up care, the patient was not entitled to submit evidence in support of those claims. Bryan v. Watumull, 230 S.W.3d 503, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5789 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

521. In a fraud action brought by the principals of a home health business against an investor, the testimony of the investor's prior business partner was admissible pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as proof of the investor's motive in seeking involvement with the business, his intent to commit fraud by association with the business, and his plan for gaining control over the business's financial affairs and siphoning off the business's assets. The prior business partner testified that he had also sued the investor for fraud under circumstances very similar to those in the underlying case. Rogers v. Alexander, 244 S.W.3d 370, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5103 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

522. In a capital murder case, evidence of appellant's gang affiliation was properly admitted pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 402 because it was relevant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice as described in Tex. R. Evid. 403; there was ample evidence connecting appellant to the gang and their plan regarding the victim, and it included the gang's violent activities. Moreover, the evidence was not admitted to show that the murder was gang activity, but that it was predictable that a homicide would occur as the result of the conspiracy, in which some participants were violent gang members, to rob the victim. Arroyo v. State, 239 S.W.3d 282, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5111 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007).

523. Where defendant was alleged to have committed a sexual assault against a thirteen-year-old child, the trial court was permitted to admit the child's testimony of defendant's use and sale of marijuana; the evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402 to show defendant's attempt to cultivate a relationship with the child by bringing him to his house to smoke marijuana. Valdez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4612 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 12 2007).

524. Evidence of gang affiliation was properly admitted as relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 402 since it was offered to show a motive for a murder; the evidence was not limited under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and the probative value substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Rodrigues v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4441 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 7 2007).

525. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault case, the mere fact the complainant might have had intercourse with defendant's nephew did not rebut the scientific proof provided by the State showing a probability of greater than 99.99 percent that defendant fathered the complainant's child. More importantly, paternity of the child did not bear on defendant's guilt. Reagan v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3589 (Tex. App. El Paso May 10 2007).

526. In an aggravated sexual assault case, a biologist's testimony regarding possible DNA testing of defendant's nephew to compare his DNA with that of complainant's child was properly excluded because the biologist testified that it would not have affected the testing she conducted on defendant's DNA that included a greater than 99.99 percent probability that he was the biological father of the complainant's child. Because the evidence was speculative, mere conjecture, and irrelevant, the testimony was properly excluded. Reagan v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3589 (Tex. App. El Paso May 10 2007).

527. In a sexual assault case in which the complainants were an adult and a child, evidence that defendant possessed sex toys and nude photos was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 for the purpose of showing how defendant was grooming the complainants, and this evidence was not overly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Petronella v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3198 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 26 2007).

528. In a father's termination case, the mother and father had a relationship and the mother had the requisite personal knowledge under Tex. R. Evid. 602 to testify as to whether the father was complying with his service plan; the issue was relevant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, as to whether his parental rights were to be terminated and the admission of the mother's testimony was not error. In re G.C.F., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2680 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 5 2007).

529. Admission of another's indictment was relevant to material issues in the termination trial, whether the mother engaged in a course of endangering conduct and whether termination was in the child's best interests, and given that relevant evidence was admissible, the trial court did not err in admitting this testimony. In re G.C.F., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2680 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 5 2007).

530. Defendant's use of a knife was a threat of force, for purposes of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 9.04 and there was no evidence that the victim used or attempted to use unlawful force on the day of the incident and thus the history of altercations between the parties did not tend to show that defendant was legally justified in threatening the victim under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 9.31(a); furthermore, defendant did not argue any exceptions to the general rule prohibiting testimony about prior specific acts under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and thus defendant failed to show of the evidence was relevant to the charged conduct under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02 and the exclusion of the evidence was not error. Oliver v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1732 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 7 2007).

531. Even though the trial court erred by admitting into evidence during defendant's aggravated sexual assault trial photographs of defendant, his co-defendant, and his roommate having sex, appearing to be intoxicated, and flashing a gang sign, the error was harmless because: (1) the photographs of defendant and the two others partying were not scandalous or shocking, but were innocuous in comparison to the photographs of the complainant and other women, who were naked and unconscious; (2) except for one comment during closing arguments, the State did not emphasize the evidence; (3) there was very little contemporaneous testimony concerning the photographs when they were admitted into evidence; and (4) the jury was manifestly able to consider the probative evidence and separate it from marginally relevant evidence because it acquitted the co-defendant and convicted defendant of the lesser-included offense of sexual assault. Casey v. State, 215 S.W.3d 870, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 230 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

532. In an intoxication manslaughter with a deadly weapon case, an enhanced videotape of the accident revealed that it was highly probative of the fact and manner of an officer's death; thus, it was clearly relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Adams v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1165 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 15 2007).

533. In a driving while intoxicated case, a court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the portion of a videotape that contained defendant's statements regarding Xanax and Valium because defendant's statement that he took the medications was in response to a question by the officer, and the question was relevant as a predicate inquiry to the administration of a field sobriety test. Layton v. State, 263 S.W.3d 179, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1191 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

534. Employer was properly denied a new trial on its claim that the trial court erred by excluding a witness's testimony that the former employee who was complaining of sexual harassment by a coworker had regularly injected sexual discussions into the work environment because the trial court's belief that the testimony had no relevance other than to unfairly prejudice the jury was not arbitrary or unreasonable. Waffle House, Inc. v. Williams, 314 S.W.3d 1, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 843, 100 Fair Empl. Prac. Cas. (BNA) 451 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

535. Trial court did not err by denying defendant's motion to suppress statements made by correctional officers and witnesses because the testimony was not illegally obtained; because the jury was the exclusive judge of the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony, the trial court did not err by denying the motion. Macon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 211 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 11 2007).

536. Evidence of other contraband that police officers found in the room and evidence of the drugs found on the person of defendant's girlfriend, found while executing a search warrant was admissible when defendant was charged with possession of methadone that was found in the room because the evidence tended to establish the requisite affirmative link to the contraband. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10721 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 14 2006).

537. In an aggravated assault and aggravated sexual assault case, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 402, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony of a victim's former sexual partner that the victim had not engaged in sadomasochistic activities with her former partner prior to or after defendant's assault as it was relevant to determine whether she consented to sexual encounter and to having defendant brand his initials on her buttocks. Reed v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10107 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 22 2006).

538. Although a medical study referred to by a doctor in his testimony at defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 involved females older than the complainant and under different circumstances, the evidence was relevant because the doctor was in the best position to explain to the jury why the genitalia of sexually abused victims often exhibited no physical signs of penetration, and he tied the study to his earlier conclusion that he was not surprised about the lack of physical evidence of penetration in the complainant's genital examination, which assisted the trier of fact to understand the lack of physical evidence; the testimony showed that the farther away in time the examination was from the abuse, the less likely there would be physical evidence of penetration, and, accordingly, the trial court properly admitted the testimony. Whitfield v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9726 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 9 2006).

539. In the slaughterhouses' appeal of the trial court's issuance of a permanent injunction and award of expenses to the State, pursuant to Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 433.099, the appellate court rejected the slaughterhouses' claim that the trial court erred by admitting the State's exhibits, which included photographs depicting conditions both inside and outside the slaughterhouse during the inspections, because evidence that tends to make the slaughterhouses' past or continued violations more or less probable was relevant to the issue of whether conduct constituting violations should be enjoined and was admissible, as provided in Tex. R. Evid. 402. Qaddura v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9209 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 26 2006).

540. Where defendant was charged with intoxication manslaughter and aggravated assault following a vehicular accident, the State's chemist was permitted to give expert testimony concerning the presence of a cocaine metabolite in defendant's blood and the effect of cocaine withdrawal; the evidence was relevant to the State's theory that defendant was fatigued and sleepy, because he was suffering withdrawal from cocaine. Bannister v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8522 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 29 2006).

541. Although defendant claimed that a trial court erred in not allowing him to cross-examine his arresting officer concerning another officer's relationship with a former girlfriend of defendant, there was no evidence presented of any bias or prejudice on the part of the arresting officer, only that six months after the incident he became aware that a fellow officer was dating a woman who had a relationship with defendant; having established no possible bias or prejudice, defendant had not shown that the evidence was relevant or that the trial judge abused his discretion by failing to allow testimony of the post-arrest knowledge obtained by the arresting officer. Waldrop v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8017 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 7 2006).

542. Evidence of defendant's prior conviction for delivering drugs was admissible where, through his questioning of a defense witness, defense counsel had sought to paint defendant as a "white knight" not involved with drugs, thereby creating a false impression before the jury; by doing so, defendant opened the door to testimony to correct that false impression, and the prosecutor could only correct that false impression by cross-examination of the witness who created it. Jones v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7917 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 5 2006).

543. During a murder trial, the victim's mother identified a photograph of her son taken before the murder; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photograph; the mother's identification had probative value in identifying the son as the victim. Brown v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7556 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25 2006).

544. While defendant should have been allowed to question the arresting officer based on the field sobriety test manual regarding the horizontal gaze nystagmus test, the disallowance was not harmful under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because it did not prevent defendant from arguing that the horizontal gaze nystagmus test was improperly administered. Howell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7558 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25 2006).

545. Sufficient evidence supported defendant's conviction of the murder of his roommate under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02 where conflicting evidence was presented and the jury chose to reject defendant's testimony and credit the consistent testimony of two disinterested witnesses who stated they saw defendant repeatedly stab the victim and who were familiar with the roommates; also, expert testimony on eyewitness misidentification was properly excluded because even if the expert's testimony was reliable and relevant, the expert did not apply his abstract theories to the specific facts of the case; therefore the excluded expert testimony would have had little probative effect and was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Rodriguez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS

6650 (Tex. App. Dallas July 27 2006).

546. Trial court did not err in admitting blood alcohol concentration (BAC) evidence from tests that were taken 2 hours after defendant hit a pedestrian without expert testimony of retrograde extrapolation because other evidence was presented to jury from which it could decide if defendant was intoxicated at the time of the accident; defendant admitted to drinking, a officer testified that he observed signs of intoxication and administered sobriety tests, and defendant's BAC of 0.18 was over twice the amount determined by the legislature for a person to be intoxicated per se in Texas under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.01(2)(B); defendant's BAC was only one piece in the "evidentiary puzzle" for the jury's consideration and, as such, was relevant to the issue of intoxication and admissible. Christ v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6585 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

547. Evidence of a judgment that terminated defendant's parental rights to three of her children after the date that she allegedly murdered her newborn infant was relevant at her capital murder trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, and had relevance apart from mere proof of character conformity in compliance with Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), because an extraneous offense/bad act that took place subsequent to the offense for which a defendant was on trial did not make the extraneous offense/bad act inadmissible per se; furthermore, the judgment was introduced by the State after defendant had testified that the infant's death on the night in question was not the result of any intentional or knowing conduct on defendant's part, and the termination judgment contained findings by the trial judge that defendant "knowingly" placed or allowed her other children to remain in conditions dangerous to their physical or emotional well-being, which at least arguably made it more probable that defendant's acts or omissions on the night in question were done either intentionally or knowingly. Fergerson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6589 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

548. Finding in favor of the patient in his medical malpractice action against the medical center was proper because the medical center failed to prove, as required by Tex. R. Evid. 402, that subsequent medical records and related expert testimony were relevant to show that the medical center's negligence did not cause the patient's ulcer; those records and testimony were also not admitted because of the potential to confuse and mislead the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and the medical center did not show that the probative value of the evidence outweighed the potential to confuse and mislead the jury; as a result, the medical center presented nothing for review, Tex. R. App. P. 38.1. Columbia Med. Ctr. Subsidiary, L.P. v. Meier, 198 S.W.3d 408, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6368 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

549. In a driving while intoxicated case, a court erred in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the arresting officer with a field sobriety test manual concerning the horizontal gaze nystagmus test because the portion of the manual regarding whether optokinetic nystagmus, which was not caused by alcohol consumption, might be caused by watching quickly moving objects was relevant. Howell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5343 (Tex. App. Austin June 23 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7558 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25, 2006).

550. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, evidence of defendant's medical condition, including that she had lupus and allergies, was properly excluded on the basis that there was no expert medical testimony as to what effect the medicines that she was taking would have on a person's conduct or condition, or on a person's normal use of mental and physical faculties; the proffered evidence was properly subject to a relevancy objection because it was a self-serving, sympathy-provoking recitation of her health and current medication without any showing of a link or nexus to any fact that is of consequence. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

551. In defendant's murder case, evidence of the history of physical abuse in the relationship between defendant and the victim was relevant and properly admitted; the extraneous-offense evidence rebutted defendant's claim of accident and showed that he intended to cause death, serious bodily injury, or bodily injury; in addition, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Brown v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5163 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

552. In defendant's retaliation trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 36.06(a)(1)(A), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the State's objection because the evidence defendant sought as to an officer's nicknames was irrelevant to the case; the contention that defendant's statements to the officer were justifiable because of the effect the nicknames had on him was not valid and did not excuse the fact that defendant committed retaliation, and there was no evidence that defendant's substantial rights were affected under Tex. R. App. P. 44. Garcia v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4708 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 1 2006).

553. In defendant's trial on charges of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence concerning the victim's emotional stability because although defendant sought to introduce evidence for the stated purpose of showing that the victim was a troubled teen falsifying the charge to get attention from her mother, the evidence was not relevant in that it did not show a motive to lie, or show bias or prejudice. Baker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4308 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 18 2006).

554. Because a witness testified to a sexual assault for three pages of the record before defendant objected, defendant forfeited the complaint, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; the court noted that defendant's complaint at trial was to relevance, but on appeal it was regarding prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and the court assumed without deciding that defendant's complaint on appeal comported with the trial objection. Pippillion v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3347 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 26 2006).

555. Messages retrieved from a murder victim's voicemail were not hearsay under Tex. R. Evid. 801 and were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because they were not offered to prove the truth of the matters asserted therein and they assisted the jury in establishing the time of the victim's death. White v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2224 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 23 2006).

556. Trial court did not err when it admitted evidence that defendant had been seen selling drugs a month before her indicted offense of being a felon in possession of a firearm because the testimony, elicited from a witness present when the indicted offense was committed, was relevant and tended to make the existence of defendant's intent to possess a firearm more likely than not, as the witness testified that he knew of five prior occasions on which defendant sold crack cocaine and also commented that drug dealers were often armed to protect themselves from being robbed. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

557. During defendant's trial for being a felon in possession of a firearm, the trial court did not err in allowing a witness to testify regarding defendant's prior drug dealing because the risk of convicting defendant solely on the fact that she was a drug dealer did not substantially outweigh the probative value of establishing her state of mind. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

558. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child by sexual contact, evidence of defendant's flight was relevant to show guilt. Howard v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1083 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 8 2006).

559. Trial court's restrictions on a witness's testimony were within its discretion where the court was avoiding needless consumption of time because defendant was asking questions about what the witness did not consider to be a violation of the restrictive covenants at issue in the case, whether the witness had protested the value assigned to his own property for property tax purposes, and whether individuals could enforce deed restrictions; those lines of questioning were either irrelevant to the legal question of whether defendant had violated the applicable deed restrictions or improperly called for a legal conclusion. Daniels v. Balcones Woods Club, Inc., 2006

Tex. App. LEXIS 957 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2006).

560. In a homeowner's breach of contract action against a contractor, the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony of the homeowner's expert witness because the witness's testimony, based on firsthand observations and accompanied by the knowledge and experience of his subcontractors and an outside expert, was reliable; because the testimony was properly admitted, it could be considered probative evidence on which to base a judgment favoring the homeowner. Facundo v. Solis, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 318 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 12 2006).

561. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not err by allowing the prosecutor's questions regarding the possible exchange of sexual favors for forgiveness of a drug debt; the evidence was admissible to show the relationship between defendant and the victim. Whitmire v. State, 183 S.W.3d 522, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 170 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

562. Under Tex. R. Evid. 402 and Tex. R. Evid. 403, parties were allowed to present material and relevant evidence unless it was overly prejudicial, and there was no violation of Rule 403 in the admission of an empty ceramic heater box with dimensions different than the fan box allegedly used in the commission of a theft because the state used the heater box only for the purpose of demonstrating the approximate dimensions of the fan box, the testimony made clear that the actual box used had varying dimensions from the heater box, the jury was able to view the dimensions of the replica fan box presented by defendant, and the trial court did not err in finding that the probative value outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Onwukwe v. State, 186 S.W.3d 81, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9603 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

563. In a negligence action arising from an oil field accident, the trial court did not err in excluding, as irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, a letter written by an OSHA investigator; the letter was not equivalent to a regulation or standard, and there was no evidence that witnesses who testified at trial had spoken with the investigator. Carrillo v. Star Tool Co., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8992 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2005).

564. In a personal injury suit arising from an automobile accident, evidence regarding the defense expert's alleged bias was not material to the outcome of the case. The trial court's exclusion of this evidence did not cause the rendition of an improper judgment. Gill v. Slovak, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8876 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 27 2005).

565. In a drug case, the trial court did not err in refusing to allow defendant's girlfriend to testify that another person had stated that the contraband belonged to him; the proffered evidence was not relevant, under Tex. R. Evid. 402, to whether defendant possessed a controlled substance with intent to deliver it, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112(a), and defendant offered no independent facts corroborating the hearsay statement under Tex. R. Evid. 803(24). Menton v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7799 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 22 2005).

566. In a case of indecency with a child, the admission of irrelevant evidence at punishment that the victim's brother also abused the victim was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the victim testified that defendant did not know of the brother's abuse and because proper evidence of defendant's conduct warranted the sentence imposed. Dustman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6588 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 17 2005).

567. In a trial for manufactured methamphetamine, there was no error in the admission of evidence concerning a subsequent arrest, seven months later, for possession of chemicals with intent to manufacture methamphetamine. That evidence tended to make less probable defendant's argument that he possessed items used to manufacture methamphetamine solely for use in bartering for drugs; thus, the evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid 401 and 402. Tarpley v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6289 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 10 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8782 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 24, 2005).

568. Defendant's conviction for indecent exposure was proper where defendant did not contend, nor did the court find, that he filed a motion requiring the State to elect any one occurrence upon which to base its conviction. Thus, the trial court did not err in admitting the objected-to evidence or in denying his request for a limiting instruction because the evidence was not extraneous offense evidence. Routt v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6180 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 4 2005).

569. With respect to breach of contract and promissory estoppel claims, a letter written in connection with the settlement of an unrelated lawsuit was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 as proof of an agreement to pay a claimed sum; hence, it was not barred by Tex. R. Evid. 408. MG Bldg. Materials, Ltd. v. Moses Lopez Custom Homes, Inc., 179 S.W.3d 51, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5796 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

570. Court did not err by admitting evidence concerning the circumstances of a prior sexual assault conviction where defendant encountered the victims in the parking lot of their residences, waited for the victims to return to their rooms, approached them under the guise of needing help, and made advances toward raping them but ejaculated before penetration. Because intent was a material element of the offense on which the State carried the burden of proof, the probative value of the witness's testimony was high and was not overcome by the danger of unfair prejudice. Fields v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5494 (Tex. App. Austin July 14 2005).

571. Testimony of a witness provided evidence relevant to one of the offenses, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 38.12(a)(4), with which defendant was charged, and thus the trial court did not err in admitting this relevant evidence pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 402, and the court agreed with the State that the testimony did not constitute an extraneous offense. Crook v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5075 (Tex. App. El Paso June 30 2005).

572. In a trial for indecency with a child, the trial court properly admitted evidence of a prior indecency conviction. The current charge arose from defendant's exposing himself, and he argued that he had merely forgotten to zip his pants; the extraneous offense evidence therefore tended to make a fact of consequence--whether defendant had or lacked intent to arouse or gratify sexual desire--more or less probable. Arp v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4535 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 15 2005).

573. In a murder trial, evidence was properly admitted, under Tex. R. Evid. 401 -- 404, of a shooting incident that occurred eight days after the murder. The extraneous offense evidence was relevant to the development of the case and was admissible to show the development of the investigation and defendant's intent or knowledge regarding the gun; as to prejudice, the evidence was presented almost matter-of-factly and included no injuries, disturbing photographs, or emotional testimony. Gonzales v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4532 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 14 2005).

574. In a robbery trial, the court did not have to admit evidence of the complainant's prior conviction for misdemeanor assault against defendant's nephew. Contrary to defendant's argument, the two-year-old conviction was not relevant to show that the complainant ran from his apartment because he feared a physical confrontation. Allison v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4055 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2005).

575. Trial court did not err in not admitting an entire tape that included threatening phone calls from the victim, defendant's former wife, because defendant sought to admit the entire tape, and the messages on the tape that were unidentified had no relevance as to the victim and her alleged motives, and lacked a proper predicate for admission under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 404(b). Davis v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3649 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2005).

576. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's objection to testimony regarding whom an officer had named as the "defendant" in the case, which defendant claimed was unfairly prejudicial because it had the prejudicial effect of telling the jury that he was the subject of investigation from the very beginning and that he had to be guilty, because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony was relevant to the jury's evaluation of the complainant's allegations. Nor could it be said that the probative value of the testimony was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because the officer's testimony was not the type of testimony that would suggest that the jury make a decision on an improper basis. Dunbar v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3676 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2005).

577. Where the State had already established on direct examination that the complainant was serving a deferred adjudication probation during one point in her relationship with defendant, any further inquiry would not have made the existence of any fact of consequence to the determination of defendant's alleged offense more or less probable than it was without the evidence, and such testimony was not relevant to any bias, motive, or interest to help the State, making it an impermissible method of impeachment; accordingly, the trial court was within its discretion to limit the question posed by defendant's counsel on cross-examination. Crook v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3485 (Tex. App. Dallas May 6 2005).

578. In a drug trial, evidence that defendant was from Saudi Arabia and had attended flight school was admissible because the State had to affirmatively link defendant to drugs found in an apartment he did not lease. When viewed with defendant's flight school identification, the evidence was relevant to show that defendant was established in the apartment. Himat v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3152 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 27 2005).

579. Evidence of a police officer's administration of a modified alphabet test to defendant suspected of driving while intoxicated (DWI) was properly admitted because it was highly probative of whether defendant had the normal use of her mental faculties. The evidence did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational but indelible way because intoxication and, more specifically, defendant's loss of her normal mental or physical faculties was among the issues that a jury had to consider in a DWI trial, and, furthermore, the evidence was addressed for only a very brief period of time. Bergman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3046 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 21 2005).

580. In an action for subsurface trespass brought by oil and gas lessors against their lessee, the trial court did not err by admitting into evidence an internal memorandum written by an employee of the lessee more than 20 years earlier where the memo was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 on the ground that its recommendation to drill despite title problems could have helped the jury to decide whether the lessee was reasonable in delaying its development of a tract of land because of title problems with another tract. Furthermore, language in the memo about "illiterate Mexicans" was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the memo could not be considered an appeal to prejudice in language clear and strong, especially because it was written by an employee of the lessee and did not ask the jury to decide the case on an improper basis. Mission Res., Inc. v. Garza Energy Trust, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2650 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 7 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 166 S.W.3d 301, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3443, 160 Oil & Gas Rep. 1144 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2005).

581. Photographs of a murder victim were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and were not unduly prejudicial to defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because a photograph of the victim lying in an ambulance immediately after firefighters removed her body from a burning house was both material and probative, as it established her condition at the crime scene, and because a photograph of her face taken during autopsy was also material and probative of the fact that the autopsy was performed on the same person removed from the crime scene by ambulance. The numerous autopsy photographs were also probative of the victim's cause of death, a material element in the offense of capital murder, and although the detail in the photographs was graphic, each served the purpose of illustrating the nature and extent of the victim's injuries. Vargas v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2417 (Tex. App.

Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2005).

582. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting into evidence several items of bloody clothing worn by the victim; although defendant pleaded guilty, the evidence of the victim's extensive bleeding was properly admitted because it indicated the gravity of defendant's crime and was relevant to assessing punishment. Cervantez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1949 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 15 2005).

583. In a drug case, in light of the offense charged and the evidence adduced at trial, the evidence that defendant possessed a bogus license did not unfairly prejudice the jury or confuse the issues. Accordingly, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence. Gregory v. State, 159 S.W.3d 254, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1660 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

584. Trial court erred in overruling defendant's relevance objections under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 402 to testimony regarding injuries sustained by motorists and passengers in other vehicles as a result of a collision involving defendant's vehicle, as the testimony was relevant to the force of impact and the speed and manner in which defendant was driving and, thus, to the issue of whether she was driving while intoxicated. Allcott v. State, 158 S.W.3d 73, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 786 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

585. In a joint trial on the offense of sexual assault, a trial court's decision to admit a portion of a videotape showing one co-defendant's presence during the accidental overdose of a friend was not erroneous because the trial court repeatedly instructed the jury that defendant was not there. Klock v. State, 177 S.W.3d 53, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

586. Trial court's decision to exclude testimony from a former prisoner regarding confinement conditions during sentencing was not erroneous because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony would not have been helpful to the jury in determining the appropriate sentence in a sexual assault case; moreover, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony went beyond the scope of any door opened by the State. Klock v. State, 177 S.W.3d 53, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

587. In an aggravated sexual assault case, a court properly excluded a defense witness's testimony where it described prison life as he had observed it several years before, rather than present prison life, and the court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony was not helpful to determining an appropriate sentence. Zunker v. State, 177 S.W.3d 72, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 320 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

588. Defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confrontation was not violated by the exclusion of testimony regarding mishandling of evidence at the crime lab where the excluded testimony was not directed at the credibility or qualifications of the witnesses, but was offered to prove that there were problems with the identification and handling of evidence in general at the crime lab. A witness testified that she was unaware of mishandling in defendant's case and did not believe the evidence had been mishandled; therefore, the evidence was irrelevant because the witness did not testify that there were problems with the handling of the evidence in defendant's case. Pope v. State, 161 S.W.3d 114, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11529 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

589. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1) in excluding an exhibit that was offered to show that a lienholder was in voluntary compliance with the rules and regulations of the Texas Board of Professional Engineers and the former Texas Engineering Practice Act on the grounds that it was irrelevant because the exhibit did not specify that the lienholder had a licensed engineer as a regular, full-time employee or address the appropriate time period. Centurion Planning Corp. v. Seabrook Venture II, 176 S.W.3d 498, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11079 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

590. Because the trial court did not improperly admit extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) of other acts of sexual misconduct, it did not err in failing to grant the male individual's motion for a new trial. The evidence was probative, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Civ. Evid. 402, of the intent, plan, and scheme of the male individual in reference to the female individual's abuse, the evidence was fair, not misleading, and was helpful to the jury pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, and defendant failed to show harm pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a). Olivarez v. Doe, 164 S.W.3d 427, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11055 (Tex. App. Tyler 2004).

591. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, a court did not err by excluding a portion of the testimony of an attorney representing the victim's mother who was present at a custody hearing involving the victim because something occurring at the custody hearing had no probative value in showing who committed a sexual assault that occurred a month before the hearing. Additionally, even if the testimony was somehow relevant, the trial court could have reasonably decided that its admission would lead to unfair prejudice, greatly mislead the jury, and confuse the issues with which the jury was presented. Holmes v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10661 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 30 2004).

592. In a murder case, the trial court did not err by excluding defendant's rebuttal evidence that his codefendant, a State's witness, sexually assaulted another witness's daughter because it had no relevance to the daughter's opinion as to the codefendant's credibility and because, even if it did, any probative value as to that issue was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Dennis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10377 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 18 2004).

593. In defendant's manslaughter case, the trial judge did not err in excluding evidence that a toxicology report revealed that a passenger had cocaine in her system at the time of her death where the evidence was not relevant because defendant presented no evidence that the driver used drugs on the day of the accident, and the fact that the passenger had cocaine in her system did not mean that the driver in the same car likewise had used cocaine. Tijerina v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9539 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 28 2004).

594. Defendant's blood test results were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 402 because they tended to make it more probable that defendant was intoxicated at the time he drove because the test results provided evidence that he had consumed alcohol. The jury did not need to establish defendant's exact blood alcohol at the time he drove, rather the jury only needed to believe beyond a reasonable doubt that either his blood alcohol concentration was 0.08 or more, or that he failed to have the normal use of his mental or physical faculties by reason of the introduction of alcohol. Gattis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9284 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 21 2004).

595. In an aggravated assault case, a court properly admitted evidence of a witness that she miscarried after jumping out a window because it was relevant to show the witness's physical and emotional state during and following the assault. Smith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9172 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 19 2004).

596. Defendant's aggravated robbery conviction was proper pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 402 and 404(b) where the trial court did not err by admitting evidence concerning the aggravated robbery in which defendant obtained the vehicle used in the charged offense because the evidence concerning the vehicle constituted same transaction contextual evidence indivisibly connected to the charged offenses and therefore was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402 and 404(b). Lamb v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5886 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 1 2004).

597. Theft report prepared by the store's loss and prevention officer did not constitute improper bolstering, because at most, the report merely corroborated the testimony of the loss and prevention officer. Ramirez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5977 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2004).

598. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that photographs from a medical article were relevant to illustrate the testimony of a treating physician who believed that a nine-year-old child had been sexually abused due to the lack of hymen tissue where the photographs depicted the absence of a hymen due to repeated penetration versus the presence of hymen tissue. Salazar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5520 (Tex. App. Austin June 24 2004).

599. Trial court did not err in excluding the testimony of a certain witness in connection with defendant's trial for aggravated robbery in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 29.03 because the testimony did not make the existence of any fact that was of consequence to the determination of aggravated robbery more or less probable pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, and thus, the evidence was not relevant and not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402; the testimony did not raise any inference that the officers who testified at trial had a motive to testify falsely. Hadamek v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5587 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 24 2004).

600. When an inmate was charged with harassment by persons in certain correctional facilities for throwing urine and feces at two correctional officers, the officers' testimony about how they felt when defendant engaged in this conduct was circumstantial evidence relevant to the element of whether defendant had the intent to harass and alarm and annoy another person, so it could not be said that it was not relevant, under Tex. R. Evid. 401, or admissible, under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Wheatly v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5671 (Tex. App. Waco June 23 2004).

601. Defendant argued that the trial court erred by excluding evidence relating to his strained marital relationship with the victim because that evidence was probative of his state of mind and motivation at the time of his actions; however, because the only conduct elements potentially implicated for the crime of aggravated assault were the nature of the conduct and the result of the conduct, the circumstances surrounding the conduct were not relevant and were properly excluded. Novillo v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5086 (Tex. App. Austin June 10 2004).

602. Trial court did not err in allowing testimony on defendant's breath test results because the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, in Stewart v. State, held that evidence of breath test results was probative and admissible. Lopez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5045 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 9 2004).

603. Defendant's convictions and sentences for aggravated sexual assault and sexual assault were confirmed because the trial court did not err by excluding the testimony of an ex-convict as to what the conditions of prison life would be like for defendant and his co-defendants. Klock v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4377 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 13 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 177 S.W.3d 53, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

604. Defendant's convictions and sentences for aggravated sexual assault and sexual assault were confirmed because the trial court, which repeatedly instructed the jury that they could not consider videotapes showing one of defendant's co-defendants abusing a person on two occasions other than the sexual assault, did not err in admitting the videotape. Klock v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4377 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 13 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 177 S.W.3d 53, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 317 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

605. Evidence of sperm located on a victim's clothing after a sexual assault was not relevant at trial because there was no evidence that defendant ejaculated during the crime. Davis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3815 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 29 2004).

606. Evidence of a personal injury plaintiff's alcohol consumption in the months before the accident was properly admitted when it bore directly upon the degree of pain and anguish suffered as a result of the accident; according to the plaintiff's pain management expert, use of alcohol was important to pain management because of its exacerbating effect and bearing on treatment methodology. The alcohol evidence was highly probative in that it related to the fair and reasonable compensation for the mental anguish experienced by the pedestrian as a result of the accident. Fitz v. San Antonio Hospitality Invs., Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3507 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2004).

607. In a driving while intoxicated case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to a recording of defendant's postarrest phone conversation where, during the conversation, defendant was argumentative and used offensive language; the conversation was relevant because it provided a physical exemplar of defendant's demeanor and manner of speech, which could have been used by the jury as evidence of defendant's intoxication level. Campbell v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3509 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2004).

608. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by taking judicial notice of defendant's birth date where the alleged discrepancy regarding defendant's date of birth was not reflected in the appellate record, and as to the age difference, the victim testified without objection that she was 14 years old and that defendant told her he was 35 years old. The jury could also draw its own conclusions from the appearance of the victim and defendant in the courtroom. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2878 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 927, 125 S. Ct. 1652, 161 L. Ed. 2d 489, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2556, 73 U.S.L.W. 3556 (2005).

609. In drug and robbery case, although defendant's relevancy objection to evidence of the other thefts sufficiently apprised the trial court of the nature of his complaint, where defendant did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and obtain a ruling as to whether the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, nor ask for a limiting instruction, defendant waived at trial any complaint over admission of evidence of extraneous thefts. Loftin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2651 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 25 2004).

610. In a prosecution for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, because the consequential fact in the case was the unauthorized use of the owner's car, that some other car may have been wrecked by the witness at a different time was of no relevance to the issue to be decided. Thus, there was no error in excluding a picture of the other car. Kirksey v. State, 132 S.W.3d 49, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2448 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2004).

611. Defendant did not establish the relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, of certain evidence regarding the alleged sexual relationship between the two victims, who were step-brothers, as a material issue in the case in which he was found guilty of two counts of fondling/indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, so as to justify admission of evidence of an alleged victim's sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); thus, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Hale v. State, 140 S.W.3d 381, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

612. Defendant did not establish the relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, of certain evidence regarding the alleged sexual relationship between the two victims, who were step-brothers, as a material issue in the case in which he was found guilty of two counts of fondling/indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, so as to justify admission of evidence of an alleged victim's sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); thus, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Hale v. State, 140 S.W.3d 381, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

613. Defendant's conviction of intoxication manslaughter was upheld where he waived the issue of relevance of the photograph of the victim's charred body; the only objection made in the district court went to probative value and unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Anderson v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10122 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 2 2003).

614. Only relevant evidence is admissible at trial under Tex. R. Evid. 402; relevant evidence is defined as evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Baggett v. State, 110 S.W.3d 704, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 5849 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2003).

615. In making the initial determination of admissibility of evidence, Texas courts must apply the principles set forth in the evidentiary rules governing relevancy under Tex. R. Evid. 401-403; to meet the relevancy test, the proffered evidence must, first, have probative value, and second, be of consequence to some issue in the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Ramsey v. Reagan, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 276 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 16 2003).

616. Subject to certain exceptions, all relevant evidence is admissible in a criminal prosecution under Tex. R. Evid. 402 and 401; "relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Haliburton v. State, 80 S.W.3d 309, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4822 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

617. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence that the two men, who defendant was with when he was arrested, were involved in a robbery a short time before the arrest, because it was within the zone of reasonable disagreement whether the robbery was so intertwined with the stop and arrest that the jury's understanding of the offense would have been obscured without it. Haliburton v. State, 80 S.W.3d 309, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 4822 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

618. Where defendant was convicted of sexual assault, trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 in admitting testimony from the victim and his sister of the effect of the assault on the victim; testimony of an inflammatory or sympathetic nature will not bar its admissibility if it is relevant to the issue at trial, and the issue need not be contested. Ranels v. State, 1996 Tex. App. LEXIS 2867 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 20 1996).

619. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 402, finding a piece of evidence to be relevant is the first step in a trial court's determination of whether the evidence should be admitted before the jury. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

620. Court properly admitted autopsy photos because, although they were gruesome, they were no more gruesome than the injuries that defendant inflicted upon the victim when he committed the offense of intoxication manslaughter. Each of the six photographs depicted a different view of the victim and showed the different injuries that she suffered, and the State did not offer a large number of photographs, nor were the photographs it offered cumulative of the victim's injuries. Booth v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2351, 2014 WL 887286 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 28 2014).

621. As a police officer had reasonable suspicion to detain defendant based upon the information in the NCIC system, such that ownership of the vehicle was not relevant to the detention, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence regarding the actual ownership of the vehicle that defendant was in when he was stopped. Thornton v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2273, 2014 WL 813745 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 27 2014).

622. During defendant's trial for DWI, the court erred in admitting evidence of a passenger's possession of marijuana and possession of drug paraphernalia because the State failed to explain how evidence of the passenger's drug possession made it more probable that defendant was intoxicated. Brewer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1992, 2014 WL 709549 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 21 2014).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : General Overview

623. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 402 in determining that defendant could not cross-examine the mother of the victims as to the details of a prior sexual assault she allegedly suffered as a child. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9524, 2010 WL 4901389 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 30 2010).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Rape Shield Laws

624. Where defendant was convicted for two counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child with a deadly weapon, his claim that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to admit evidence of the child's promiscuity over the State's relevance and Tex. R. Evid. 402 objections was not preserved for review. Defendant did not seek to offer evidence of the child's promiscuity at trial; by withdrawing a line of questioning on the subject, defendant prevented the trial court from ruling on the issue. Riley v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2830, 2014 WL 1016240 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 13 2014).

625. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because, with regard to the victim's alleged prior sexual behavior, other than her involvement, there was no similarity between those incidents and the current allegations against defendant currently, Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, and 412(b). Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

626. In a trial for sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, there was no error in excluding evidence as to whether the complainant had engaged in sexual conduct with a younger cousin, whether the complainant allowed one or more pets to play with the complainant's sexual organs, whether the complainant's parent had told an employee about fearing that the complainant would accuse the parent's new romantic partner of molestation, or whether the complainant's parent kept pornography in the home. Todd v. State, 242 S.W.3d 126, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9053 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

627. Appellant's aggravated sexual assault conviction was upheld because it was not an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of the complainant's kissing and flirting with another person at a party under a "rape shield" law since, inter alia, (1) evidence of the complainant's sexual conduct with another man, whether a stranger or not, was not evidence of consent with appellant, and (2) appellant provided no support for the argument that the evidence was probative of the complainant's "motive and bias" in testifying about whether the encounter with appellant was consensual. Barrera v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8662 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 31 2007).

628. Defendant did not establish the relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, of certain evidence regarding the alleged sexual relationship between the two victims, who were step-brothers, as a material issue in the case in which he was found guilty of two counts of fondling/indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, so as to justify admission of evidence of an alleged victim's sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); thus, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Hale v. State, 140 S.W.3d 381, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

629. Defendant did not establish the relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, of certain evidence regarding the alleged sexual relationship between the two victims, who were step-brothers, as a material issue in the case in which he was found guilty of two counts of fondling/indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, so as to justify admission of evidence of an alleged victim's sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); thus, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Hale v. State, 140 S.W.3d 381, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Crimes : General Overview

630. Evidence of sperm located on a victim's clothing after a sexual assault was not relevant at trial because there was no evidence that defendant ejaculated during the crime. Davis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3815 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 29 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Crimes : Child Molestation Cases

631. In a trial for indecency with a child by contact there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, in admitting evidence of prior convictions for attempting the same offense. The evidence was relevant to defendant's intent in the charged interaction. Hernandez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 851, 2010 WL 391850 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 5 2010).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Autopsies

632. In a murder trial involving a child victim, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 in admitting an autopsy photograph because it demonstrated the scope and extent of the child's injuries and the cause of death. It was not cumulative because it showed injuries to the victim's neck and head from a side view, whereas two other photographs showed injuries from a frontal view. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1045 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

633. In a trial for attempted murder, it was proper to admit an autopsy report regarding a different victim, which included details about the angle of the wound and photographs of the body. The evidence was relevant because it tended to refute defendant's argument that someone else shot the victim. Adams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8999 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 12 2004).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Blood Alcohol

634. In a personal injury suit stemming from a collision between a motorist and a bicyclist, evidence of the bicyclist's intoxication was rebuttably presumed to be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 because the bicyclist's vigilance, judgment and reactions were at issue; contrary to the bicyclist's assertions, the motorist did not base her allegations of contributory negligence solely on evidence of intoxication, but offered testimony that the bicyclist suddenly veered in front of her; moreover, the bicyclist 's alcohol consumption prior to the accident bore on the weight afforded to his recollection of events. Ticknor v. Doolan, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6717 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 27 2006).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Blood & Bodily Fluids

635. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting into evidence several items of bloody clothing worn by the victim; although defendant pleaded guilty, the evidence of the victim's extensive bleeding was properly admitted because it indicated the gravity of defendant's crime and was relevant to assessing punishment. Cervantez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1949 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 15 2005).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Sobriety Tests

636. In a driving while intoxicated case, a court erred in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the arresting officer with a field sobriety test manual concerning the horizontal gaze nystagmus test because the portion of the manual regarding whether optokinetic nystagmus, which was not caused by alcohol consumption, might be caused by watching quickly moving objects was relevant. Howell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5343 (Tex. App. Austin June 23 2006), substituted opinion at, opinion withdrawn by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7558 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25, 2006).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Toxicology

637. Where defendant was charged with intoxication manslaughter and aggravated assault following a vehicular accident, the State's chemist was permitted to give expert testimony concerning the presence of a cocaine metabolite in defendant's blood and the effect of cocaine withdrawal; the evidence was relevant to the State's theory that defendant was fatigued and sleepy, because he was suffering withdrawal from cocaine. Bannister v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8522 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 29 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : General Overview

638. Although defendant on trial for sexually molesting his stepdaughter objected to the admission of the report of the sexual assault nurse examiner as improper bolstering and a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403, defendant did not identify at trial which Texas Rule of Evidence, if any, was violated by the admission of the nurse's report. As such, he failed to preserve his objection for appeal. Rivas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4395 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 6 2007).

639. In a personal injury suit arising from an automobile accident, evidence regarding the defense expert's alleged bias was not material to the outcome of the case. The trial court's exclusion of this evidence did not cause the rendition of an improper judgment. Gill v. Slovak, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8876 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 27 2005).

640. On a charge of unlawful possession of a firearm, the trial court properly did not allow defendant to impeach the State's witness by explaining that the witness testified to the same effect in an earlier trial arising from the same events and that the prior jury found that defendant did assault the witness. The court reasoned in part that the prior jury's finding was not relevant. Macias v. State, 136 S.W.3d 702, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4193 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : Specific Instances

641. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for the Class A misdemeanor offense of assault causing bodily injury in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant regarding past accusations of spousal abuse where the complainant's character for truthfulness was not attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise as required by Tex. R. Evid. 608; instead, during cross-examination, defendant attempted to inquire into prior accusations of abuse that the complainant made against her ex-husband for the purpose of attacking the complainant's credibility, and, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, Tex. R. Evid. 402, Tex. R. Evid. 608, the probative value of the evidence sought to be admitted was extremely low, particularly because defense counsel admitted during trial that he had no evidence that the complainant lied about the abuse and that the accusations occurred a long time ago. Sullivan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1394 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2008).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Mental Incapacity

642. In a sexual assault of a child case, the evidence of the victim's emotional problems was not relevant or admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 as the evidence could not be used to impeach her because there was no suggestion that her emotional problems could impair her ability to recall events or would compromise her credibility. Lester v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9728, 2011 WL 6238157 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 14 2011).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : General Overview

643. Trial court's restrictions on a witness's testimony were within its discretion where the court was avoiding needless consumption of time because defendant was asking questions about what the witness did not consider to be a violation of the restrictive covenants at issue in the case, whether the witness had protested the value assigned to his own property for property tax purposes, and whether individuals could enforce deed restrictions; those lines of questioning were either irrelevant to the legal question of whether defendant had violated the applicable deed restrictions or improperly called for a legal conclusion. Daniels v. Balcones Woods Club, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 957 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Cross-Examination : Scope

644. In a drug trial, there was no error in limiting defendant's cross-examination of a detective as to (1) payments made to an informant who was admittedly in the country illegally, (2) whether or not those payments were reported to the Internal Revenue Service, and (3) whether or not the detective sought or received permission from federal authorities to have the informant in the country working as an agent of law enforcement. Defendant failed to show how the evidence sought was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, to the claimed purpose of showing bias and a motive to lie. Perez-gonzalez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3045, 2010 WL 1645062 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 26 2010).

645. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow damage evidence in a condemnation case under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 because the evidence in question was not disclosed under Tex. R. Civ. P. 194; there was no good cause shown due to counsel's inadvertence, and an owner would have been prejudiced thereby; moreover, cross-examination on this issue was properly excluded since it was not relevant to the case. Harris County v. Inter Nos, Ltd., 199 S.W.3d 363, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3849 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : General Overview

646. In a driving while intoxicated case, evidence of defendant's use of prescription medications was not relevant because there was no evidence as to the dosage, the exact times of ingestion, or the half-life of the drug; a lay juror was not in a position to determine whether the drugs, taken more than 12 hours before arrest, would have any effect on defendant's intoxication. Without expert testimony to provide the foundation required to admit scientific evidence, the testimony regarding defendant's use of prescription medications was not relevant. Layton v. State, 280 S.W.3d 235, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 149 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

647. In a suit challenging a real estate tax assessment, the trial court properly allowed expert testimony from the taxpayer's appraiser. The testimony was relevant, within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 702 because the appraiser found a reasonable number of comparable properties, made appropriate adjustments, and compared the median appraisal value of those properties to the appraisal value applied to the property at issue, as required by Tex. Tax Code § 42.26. Harris County Appraisal v. Hartman Reit Operating P'ship, L.P., 186 S.W.3d 155, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Admissibility

648. In a trial of inmate's civil commitment as a sexually violent predator under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.062, the trial court properly excluded the inmate's expert's testimony that one of the victims had recanted pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 702, because such evidence represented a collateral attack on the underlying convictions, which had not been set aside. In re Barron, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8495, 2013 WL 3487385 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 11 2013).

649. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault and endangering a child in permitting a State witness to testify as an expert witness where the witness's expertise fit with the subject matter at issue, which was whether the damages to the victims' vehicles were consistent with their accounts of how the damage occurred. The witness had seventeen years of experience in the automotive industry and thirteen years of experience as an estimator for damaged vehicles, and his testimony did not involve a complex subject, but rather consisted of matching up paint transfer and damages to the victims' vehicles with damages to defendant's truck. Ibarra v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 169, 2013 WL 123705 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 10 2013).

650. Sex offender's civil commitment as a sexually violent predator was proper where it could not be said that the testimony of one of the State's experts lacked probative value because, using evidence-based support, the expert had presented a professional opinion expressing a reasoned judgment based upon established research and techniques for his profession and not the mere ipse dixit of a credentialed witness. Moreover, the sex offender's claim that the testimony of another of the State's experts amounted to no evidence because it contained significant analytical gaps was not supported by the record, which reflected that the expert had described the factors he considered, and had explained why he felt those factors significant. In re Weatherread, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9757 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 29 2012).

651. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of the sexual assault nurse examiner who examined the child victim during the course of the State's investigation because she was deemed an expert in sexual abuse examinations, so her expert testimony could be helpful to the jury, including to explain why physical evidence would not necessarily be present on the body of a sexual assault complainant. The nurse merely reported the events of the examination and her clinical findings, and she did not offer an opinion as to whether the victim had been sexually assaulted and did not comment on the victim's veracity. Owens v. State, 381 S.W.3d 696, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7922, 2012 WL 4098990 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 19 2012).

652. Court properly allowed an expert witness to testify about the similarity of physical evidence recovered from the crime scene because the tapes from the crime scene and defendant's home were offered to show that because the tapes were similar, it was more likely that they came from a common source, and if they came from a common source, it was more likely that the tape in defendant's home came from the packaging for the marijuana in the murder victim's home. The testimony showed the similarities of the tapes and was therefore relevant to show that defendant was at the crime scene and had a motive for shooting the victims. Robinson v. State, 368 S.W.3d 588, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483, 2012 WL 593558 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

653. In the proceeding to commit respondent as a sexually violent predator (SVP), the trial court did not abuse its discretion by restricting respondent's cross-examination of one of the State's experts, because the doctor's subjective feelings concerning the verdict in respondent's attempted aggravated sexual assault case was not a fact of consequence in respondent's SVP case for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402. Respondent could not challenge the facts of his final convictions in the SVP proceeding, and attempted aggravated sexual assault of a child was one of his predicate convictions under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.002(8)(A). In re Dees, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9807 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 15 2011).

654. During appellant's civil commitment trial, the trial court did not err by excluding an expert's testimony that appellant did not commit the crimes for which he had been convicted because the issue of whether appellant had been wrongfully convicted was not at issue. In re Commitment of Hinkle, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2011).

655. Court did not err in excluding the expert testimony regarding the genuineness of the testator's signature on the beneficiary designation forms, because the claimant admitted that she did not raise the issue of forgery regarding these signatures, and the evidence from the handwriting expert regarding the issue had no relationship to any issue in the constructive trust suit. In the Estate of Wallis, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1441, 2010 WL 702267 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 26 2010).

656. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly denied defendant's witness's testimony relating to the field of false confessions because the witness's testimony could not have assisted the jury in understanding the evidence or in making a determination of a fact issue. He did not intend to offer an opinion as to the truth or falsity of defendant's confession, and during cross-examination defendant admitted the truth of the portions of his confession that he earlier claimed were inaccurate. Munoz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6475, 2009 WL 2517664 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 19 2009).

657. In a tax dispute regarding valuation, an expert's premise that an underground storage tank (UST), once installed, became salvage material was a faulty absolute and likely rendered his valuation of the USTs, which represented the largest deviation in the valuations, unreliable; unreliable testimony did not constitute evidence. Harris County Appraisal Dist. v. Sigmor Corp., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2456 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 3 2008).

658. When the appellate court in a sexual assault trial improperly evaluated the qualifications of a proposed defense expert, a certified legal nurse consultant, under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), 401, 402, and 702, and did not evaluate the reliability of the consultant's proposed testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and did not give proper deference to the trial judge's decision not to allow her to testify as an expert, the appellate court's judgment was vacated, and case was remanded to allow the appellate court to conduct a proper analysis. Vela v. State, 209 S.W.3d 128, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2384 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

659. Court did not err in admitting a utility company's expert testimony as to the market value of the condemned property in which he did not factor in the improvements that were over 4000 feet from the power lines in assessing damages because, inter alia, the landowners' own expert relied upon several articles that specifically stated the negative impact of power lines to a property diminished with increased distance and disappeared beyond 500 feet. Utley v. LCRA Transmission Servs. Corp., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9129 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 25 2006).

660. Probation officer was properly allowed to testify that defendant was not a suitable candidate for community supervision because suitability is a matter relevant to sentencing under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) when a defendant seeks placement on community supervision; the court noted that the trial judge still had operate within the bounds of Tex. R. Evid. 402. Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

661. Sufficient evidence supported defendant's conviction of the murder of his roommate under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02 where conflicting evidence was presented and the jury chose to reject defendant's testimony and credit the consistent testimony of two disinterested witnesses who stated they saw defendant repeatedly stab the victim and who were familiar with the roommates; also, expert testimony on eyewitness misidentification was properly excluded because even if the expert's testimony was reliable and relevant, the expert did not apply his abstract theories to the specific facts of the case; therefore the excluded expert testimony would have had little probative effect and was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Rodriguez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6650 (Tex. App. Dallas July 27 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Criminal Trials

662. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault and endangering a child in permitting a State witness to testify as an expert witness where the witness's expertise fit with the subject matter at issue, which was whether the damages to the victims' vehicles were consistent with their accounts of how the damage occurred. The witness had seventeen years of experience in the automotive industry and thirteen years of experience as an estimator for damaged vehicles, and his testimony did not involve a complex subject, but rather consisted of matching up paint transfer and damages to the victims' vehicles with damages to defendant's truck.

Ibarra v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 169, 2013 WL 123705 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 10 2013).

663. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by admitting a pediatrician's testimony where: (1) the pediatrician, a specialist in child maltreatment, had published research in the area of maltreatment, particularly in the area of child abuse; (2) the pediatrician had personally examined over one thousand children and was considered an expert in the area of sexual abuse; and (3) the pediatrician's ten-page curriculum vitae, which was admitted into evidence without objection, reflected her extensive training, skills, education, experience, and publications in the area of child sexual abuse. The prosecutor specifically requested the pediatrician's opinion based on her training and experience, as well as her examinations of children who had made a delayed outcry, for an opinion on why sexually abused children might delay outcry, which did not require a greater or more specific degree of expertise in the psychology or sociology of sexually abused children than possessed by the pediatrician, and the pediatrician's testimony would assist the jury in understanding why children might delay reporting sexual abuse. Salinas v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7828, 2009 WL 3210941 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

664. In a case in which defendant was convicted of intentionally causing serious bodily injury to his stepson, causing his death, and intentionally or knowingly concealing the body, the trial court did not err by completely excluding the testimony of a defense expert pathologist who was board certified in both clinical and anatomical pathology, but was not a forensic pathologist, where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the defense did not demonstrate that the pathologist was sufficiently qualified in the sub-speciality of forensic pathology and that his methodology, without accessing or viewing the corpse, was not scientifically reliable; defendant did not demonstrate to the trial court that the pathologist had any experience with strangulations or decomposed bodies. Crunk v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7329, 2009 WL 2973474 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 17 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Daubert Standard

665. When the appellate court in a sexual assault trial improperly evaluated the qualifications of a proposed defense expert, a certified legal nurse consultant, under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), 401, 402, and 702, and did not evaluate the reliability of the consultant's proposed testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and did not give proper deference to the trial judge's decision not to allow her to testify as an expert, the appellate court's judgment was vacated, and case was remanded to allow the appellate court to conduct a proper analysis. Vela v. State, 209 S.W.3d 128, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2384 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Helpfulness

666. At defendant's trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a licensed professional counselor who treated sex offenders; the expert's testimony about grooming for a sexual offense was relevant to assist the jury in understanding defendant's behavior. Cox v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8890 (Tex. App. Waco July 18 2013).

667. Trial court did not err by excluding opinion testimony from the officer because his opinion on the difficulty of obtaining a conviction when the victim of a sexual assault suffered from mental impairments did not make any of the facts the jury had to determine more or less probable, and therefore the evidence was not relevant. Myles v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4911, 2012 WL 2357426 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 21 2012).

668. Trial court did not err by permitting a doctor to testify regarding patterns of disclosure of sexual abuse by children under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the doctor was qualified by virtue of her education, knowledge, training, and experience, and because the testimony would aid the jury in understanding why the victim waited four years before telling her father about the sexual assault; the doctor testified that it was common for a child to delay making an outcry to an adult if the perpetrator had threatened to harm someone the child loved. Fletcher v. State, 2010

Tex. App. LEXIS 7915, 2010 WL 3783946 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 29 2010).

669. Because forgery was not pleaded as an affirmative defense under Tex. R. Civ. P. 94 in a suit for a constructive trust, handwriting evidence was not helpful and thus was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 702. Estate of Wallis, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3710, 2010 WL 1987514 (Tex. App. Tyler May 19 2010).

670. In an aggravated assault case where insanity was an issue, a trial court did not err by excluding the testimony of a psychiatrist regarding defendant's mental condition in 2007 as irrelevant because the psychiatrist did not have any information regarding defendant's mental state in 2005 when the crime was committed. Likewise, records of defendant's visit to an emergency room in 2007 where he saw the psychiatrist were properly excluded for the same reason. Wiley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 225, 2008 WL 5501149 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 14 2009).

671. Although a medical study referred to by a doctor in his testimony at defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under the age of 14 involved females older than the complainant and under different circumstances, the evidence was relevant because the doctor was in the best position to explain to the jury why the genitalia of sexually abused victims often exhibited no physical signs of penetration, and he tied the study to his earlier conclusion that he was not surprised about the lack of physical evidence of penetration in the complainant's genital examination, which assisted the trier of fact to understand the lack of physical evidence; the testimony showed that the farther away in time the examination was from the abuse, the less likely there would be physical evidence of penetration, and, accordingly, the trial court properly admitted the testimony. Whitfield v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9726 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 9 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Qualifications

672. Trial court did not err by permitting a doctor to testify regarding patterns of disclosure of sexual abuse by children under Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the doctor was qualified by virtue of her education, knowledge, training, and experience, and because the testimony would aid the jury in understanding why the victim waited four years before telling her father about the sexual assault; the doctor testified that it was common for a child to delay making an outcry to an adult if the perpetrator had threatened to harm someone the child loved. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7915, 2010 WL 3783946 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 29 2010).

673. When the appellate court in a sexual assault trial improperly evaluated the qualifications of a proposed defense expert, a certified legal nurse consultant, under Tex. R. Evid. 104(a), 401, 402, and 702, and did not evaluate the reliability of the consultant's proposed testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and did not give proper deference to the trial judge's decision not to allow her to testify as an expert, the appellate court's judgment was vacated, and case was remanded to allow the appellate court to conduct a proper analysis. Vela v. State, 209 S.W.3d 128, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2384 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : General Overview

674. Trial court's restrictions on a witness's testimony were within its discretion where the court was avoiding needless consumption of time because defendant was asking questions about what the witness did not consider to be a violation of the restrictive covenants at issue in the case, whether the witness had protested the value assigned to his own property for property tax purposes, and whether individuals could enforce deed restrictions; those lines of questioning were either irrelevant to the legal question of whether defendant had violated the applicable deed restrictions or improperly called for a legal conclusion. Daniels v. Balcones Woods Club, Inc., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 957 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Opinion Testimony : Personal Perceptions

675. In a driving while intoxicated case, testimony from defendant's mother on the issue of whether defendant was intoxicated was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the mother did not personally observe a traffic stop or defendant's interaction with an arresting officer; the mother did not acquire personal knowledge at the time of the event. Because the testimony was not relevant, defendant's argument that her due process right to present a complete defense was violated was not addressed. Hartin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2765, 2009 WL 1076799 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2009).

676. Where defendant used a car jack to strike the hood of the complainant's SUV, the arresting officer was permitted to testify that $1500 was the estimated cost of repairing the damage based on his years of experience with criminal mischief cases; the officer also testified that the body shop's repair estimate was $ 1,530.01. Barnes v. State, 248 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4261 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Personal Knowledge

677. In a driving while intoxicated case, testimony from defendant's mother on the issue of whether defendant was intoxicated was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the mother did not personally observe a traffic stop or defendant's interaction with an arresting officer; the mother did not acquire personal knowledge at the time of the event. Because the testimony was not relevant, defendant's argument that her due process right to present a complete defense was violated was not addressed. Hartin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2765, 2009 WL 1076799 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2009).

678. In defendant's evading arrest case, the court properly excluded a defense witness's testimony because the proffered testimony that it was "standard operating procedure" for law enforcement agencies in general to routinely make video and audio recordings of police pursuits was not germane. The witness did not have personal knowledge as to the standard procedures of the Corpus Christi Police Department regarding recordings of police pursuits. Gomez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1700 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 5 2009).

Family Law : Child Custody : Procedures

679. In a custody dispute, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 402 in excluding evidence that the brother of one parent was a registered sex offender and that the brother had contact with the child. Goodson v. Castellanos, 214 S.W.3d 741, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 364 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

Family Law : Family Protection & Welfare : Cohabitants & Spouses : Abuse, Endangerment & Neglect

680. In a case where a former girlfriend's request for a final protective order was granted, a former boyfriend's due process rights were not violated because he was not deprived of the opportunity to present evidence. The boyfriend was able to confront and cross-examine the girlfriend, even though a trial court did limit questioning regarding threats made against the boyfriend by an acquaintance of the girlfriend, because those questions had nothing to do with whether family violence had occurred in the past or was likely to occur in the future. Ford v. Harbour, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1796, 2009 WL 679672 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 17 2009).

Family Law : Family Protection & Welfare : Elderly Persons : Abuse, Endangerment & Neglect

681. In the trial on an employee's claim of retaliatory discharge under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 242.133, the trial court properly excluded the employee's previous employment history under Tex. R. Evid. 402 because reasons provided by previous employers for termination were not relevant. Senior Living Props., L.L.C. v. Cole, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7610 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 19 2007).

Family Law : Family Protection & Welfare : Involuntary Commitment

682. Appellant's contention that his actions, while criminally insane, were not relevant to the finding required for recommitment under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 574.035 and that their admission at his recommitment hearing was unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 402 and Tex. R. Evid. 403 was rejected because the determination of whether a person should remain committed because of a mental illness required more than a snapshot of a single year in the person's life and required a psychological history. Campbell v. State, 118 S.W.3d 788, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 6671 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2003), appeal dismissed by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2376 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 16, 2004).

Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : Involuntary Termination : General Overview

683. In a termination of parental rights proceeding arising from the death of a sibling, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 when the trial court admitted the recordings of the parent's phone calls from jail to home on the night of the sibling's death and admitted evidence of the parent's prior criminal convictions, some of which were more than 10 years old. Murray v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 294 S.W.3d 360, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6372 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 13 2009).

Immigration Law : Duties & Rights of Aliens : Discrimination

684. Illegal immigrant status of defendant driver should not have been admitted in a wrongful death and survival action stemming from a multi-fatality vehicular accident. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, the evidence was not relevant to claims of negligent hiring and negligent entrustment, even if the employer's failure to screen and thus its failure to discover the driver's inability to work in the United States furnished a condition that made the accident possible, because the driver's immigration status did not cause the collision. TXI Transp. Co. v. Hughes, 306 S.W.3d 230, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 212, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 431 (Tex. 2010).

Labor & Employment Law : Occupational Safety & Health : General Overview

685. In a negligence action arising from an oil field accident, the trial court did not err in excluding, as irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, a letter written by an OSHA investigator; the letter was not equivalent to a regulation or standard, and there was no evidence that witnesses who testified at trial had spoken with the investigator. Carrillo v. Star Tool Co., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8992 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2005).

Real Property Law : Eminent Domain Proceedings : Procedure

686. In an eminent domain proceeding in which a land planner designated as an expert by the owner testified that the owner could not achieve full compliance with the town's zoning ordinances after the State's condemnation and that the owner would be required to demolish all of its buildings, the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the land planner's opinion about the allegedly required demolition of the owner's buildings because his opinion was impermissibly speculative and conjectural. Reversal was required because there was a reasonable probability that the inadmissible evidence that characterized the demolition of the owner's buildings as a certainty, rather than a market-affecting factor, improperly influenced the jury's verdict on remainder damages. State v. Little Elm Plaza, Ltd., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8880 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 25 2012).

Real Property Law : Eminent Domain Proceedings : Valuation

687. Court did not err in admitting a utility company's expert testimony as to the market value of the condemned property in which he did not factor in the improvements that were over 4000 feet from the power lines in assessing damages because, inter alia, the landowners' own expert relied upon several articles that specifically stated the negative impact of power lines to a property diminished with increased distance and disappeared beyond 500 feet. Utley v. LCRA Transmission Servs. Corp., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9129 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 25 2006).

Real Property Law : Nonmortgage Liens : Mechanics' Liens

688. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1) in excluding an exhibit that was offered to show that a lienholder was in voluntary compliance with the rules and regulations of the Texas Board of Professional Engineers and the former Texas Engineering Practice Act on the grounds that it was irrelevant because the exhibit did not specify that the lienholder had a licensed engineer as a regular, full-time employee or address the appropriate time period. Centurion Planning Corp. v. Seabrook Venture II, 176 S.W.3d 498, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11079 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

Real Property Law : Property Valuation

689. Defendant's offer to purchase permanently damaged property for its full value was not relevant to the fair market value of the property. Therefore, evidence or the offer should not have been admitted and there was no evidence for the jury's finding that there was no diminution of value. Mieth v. Ranchquest, Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4601 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 177 S.W.3d 296, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2079 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

Tax Law : State & Local Taxes : Personal Property Tax : Tangible Property : General Overview

690. In a tax dispute regarding valuation, an expert's premise that an underground storage tank (UST), once installed, became salvage material was a faulty absolute and likely rendered his valuation of the USTs, which represented the largest deviation in the valuations, unreliable; unreliable testimony did not constitute evidence. Harris County Appraisal Dist. v. Sigmor Corp., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2456 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 3 2008).

Tax Law : State & Local Taxes : Real Property Tax : General Overview

691. In a suit challenging a real estate tax assessment, the trial court properly allowed expert testimony from the taxpayer's appraiser. The testimony was relevant, within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, and 702 because the appraiser found a reasonable number of comparable properties, made appropriate adjustments, and compared the median appraisal value of those properties to the appraisal value applied to the property at issue, as required by Tex. Tax Code § 42.26. Harris County Appraisal v. Hartman Reit Operating P'ship, L.P., 186 S.W.3d 155, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Torts : Business Torts : Negligent Hiring & Supervision : General Overview

692. Illegal immigrant status of defendant driver should not have been admitted in a wrongful death and survival action stemming from a multi-fatality vehicular accident. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, the evidence was not relevant to claims of negligent hiring and negligent entrustment, even if the employer's failure to screen and thus its failure to discover the driver's inability to work in the United States furnished a condition that made the accident possible, because the driver's immigration status did not cause the collision. TXI Transp. Co. v. Hughes, 306 S.W.3d 230, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 212, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 431 (Tex. 2010).

Torts : Damages : Compensatory Damages : Medical Expenses

693. In a case arising from a car accident, the evidence was legally insufficient to support an award of past medical care expenses because Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 41.0105 limited the recovery to the amount actually paid or incurred by or on behalf of an injured party; an amount that had been written off could not have been recovered. Because the evidence here did not relate to the amount of damages sustained under a proper measure of damages, the evidence was both irrelevant and legally insufficient to support the judgment; however, due to undisputed facts, a voluntary remittitur was suggested. De Escabedo v. Haygood, 283 S.W.3d 3, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1101 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 18 2009).

Torts : Damages : Punitive Damages : Award Calculations : Factors

694. In a personal injury case, a trial court did not err in admitting evidence of events that occurred after an accident because it was relevant to the jury's consideration of the factors under Alamo Nat'l Bank v. Kraus, 616 S.W.2d 908 (Tex. 1981), in the context of exemplary damages. Matbon, Inc. v. Gries, 288 S.W.3d 471, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 268 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 15 2009).

Torts : Damages : Punitive Damages : Conduct Supporting Awards

695. Trial court improperly admitted evidence that the decedent's widow would put any punitive damages she received from the corporation that owned and operated the cemetery into a trust to pay for funerals for persons who could not afford them because it was not relevant to proving any of the factors to be considered when determining the amount of punitive damages or to penalizing or punishing the corporation. Serv. Corp. Int'l v. Guerra, 348 S.W.3d 221, 2011 Tex. LEXIS 417, 54 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1191 (Tex. 2011).

Torts : Intentional Torts : Defamation : Elements : Libel

696. Because appellant's statements in his January 2nd letter were found by the trial court to be libel per se, the anonymous letter was wholly irrelevant to the issue of whether appellant's prior letter defamed appellee. Hancock v. Variyam, 345 S.W.3d 157, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4647 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 16 2011).

Torts : Malpractice & Professional Liability : Healthcare Providers

697. Because the trial court acted within its discretion in dismissing the patient's claims that the doctor was negligent in deciding to perform the surgery without attempting more conservative treatment and in failing to provide adequate follow-up care, the patient was not entitled to submit evidence in support of those claims. Bryan v. Watumull, 230 S.W.3d 503, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5789 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

Torts : Negligence : General Overview

698. Evidence of a personal injury plaintiff's alcohol consumption in the months before the accident was properly admitted when it bore directly upon the degree of pain and anguish suffered as a result of the accident; according to the plaintiff's pain management expert, use of alcohol was important to pain management because of its exacerbating effect and bearing on treatment methodology. The alcohol evidence was highly probative in that it related to the fair and reasonable compensation for the mental anguish experienced by the pedestrian as a result of the accident. Fitz v. San Antonio Hospitality Invs., Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3507 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2004).

Torts : Negligence : Causation : General Overview

699. Driver's consumption of alcohol was relevant to the element of causation in his negligence suit against a trucker because the trucker presented evidence that the accident could have been avoided had the driver steered his vehicle to the right to avoid the trucker's trailer, and in failing to do so, the driver caused the accident. PPC Transp. v. Metcalf, 254 S.W.3d 636, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3291 (Tex. App. Tyler 2008).

Torts : Negligence : Defenses : Contributory Negligence : Procedure : General Overview

700. In a personal injury suit stemming from a collision between a motorist and a bicyclist, evidence of the bicyclist's intoxication was rebuttably presumed to be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402 because the bicyclist's vigilance, judgment and reactions were at issue; contrary to the bicyclist's assertions, the motorist did not base her allegations of contributory negligence solely on evidence of intoxication, but offered testimony that the bicyclist suddenly veered in front of her; moreover, the bicyclist 's alcohol consumption prior to the accident bore on the weight afforded to his recollection of events. Ticknor v. Doolan, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6717 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 27 2006).

Torts : Premises Liability & Property : Trespass : Defenses : Consent

701. Escrow agreement and the letter to the property owner's predecessor were relevant and had probative value regarding one of the disputed issues in the owner's trespass action, namely whether the owner consented to the entry of waste beneath its tracts by the operator of neigboring the wastewater disposal facility . Fpl Farming Ltd. v. Envtl. Processing Sys., L.C., 383 S.W.3d 274, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7769, 178 Oil & Gas Rep. 510, 2012 WL 4017388 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 13 2012).

Torts : Products Liability : Design Defects

702. In a product liability case involving an allegedly defective surge protector, the trial court properly ordered discovery relating to a recall of a predecessor product that caused overheating and fires, but erred in allowing discovery of complaints regarding models that were not similar to the model in question and in failing to limit the scope of the requests as to time and locale. In re Am. Power Conversion Corp., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5310, 2012 WL 2584290 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 5 2012).

Tex. Evid. R. 403, Part 1 of 2

THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH August 16, 2020

Rule 403 Excluding Relevant Evidence for Prejudice, Confusion, or Other Reasons

The court may exclude relevant evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by a danger of one or more of the following: unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, misleading the jury, undue delay, or needlessly presenting cumulative evidence.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Supporting Materials : General Overview

1. Affidavits of expert witnesses offered in support of homeowners' motion against summary judgment in an action seeking losses for a house fire failed to meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, 702, and 703, as the testimony was a pyramid of inferences lacking probative force because it was based on assumed facts that varied from the actual undisputed facts. Rayon v. Energy Specialties, Inc., 121 S.W.3d 7, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9160 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review

2. Objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not preserved by an argument that photographs had no probative value. Smith v. East, 411 S.W.3d 519, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1753, 2013 WL 692456 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 22 2013).

Computer & Internet Law : Criminal Offenses : General Overview

3. In a trial for defendant's online harassment of a psychic, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 in admitting evidence that before and after the offense, defendant sent the victim a condom and panties because it showed intent to harm the victim, rather than to test her psychic abilities, when masquerading online as her hairdresser. Taylor v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2279, 2012 WL 955383 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 22 2012).

Computer & Internet Law : Criminal Offenses : Child Pornography

4. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of a grandchild, there was no error in admitting evidence of child pornography seized from defendant's computer because the evidence rebutted defendant's testimony that defendant would not abuse the victim because the victim was a blood relative and that defendant did not have the same type of urge for children. Garreans v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 852 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 5 2008).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Confrontation

5. Out-of-court statements were non-testimonial and did not violate the Confrontation Clause because the statements were non-hearsay statements made by a co-conspirator; moreover, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding the probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Agyin v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13337 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 30 2013).

6. At defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court erred because it refused to allow defendant to cross-examine the State's witnesses in violation of the Sixth Amendment and the Fourteenth Amendment regarding the complainant's sexual assault of his younger sister. The balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not authorize exclusion of the impeachment evidence, because Tex. R. Evid. 101(c) established that the Constitution of the United States controlled over a conflicting evidentiary rule or civil statute. Johnson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1515, 2013 WL 531079 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 14 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : General Overview

7. In a drug trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), Rule 608(a) in excluding evidence, offered to show bias, that an officer was investigated for planting drugs on a defendant in an unrelated case because the allegations were determined to be unfounded. Brown v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5432, 2010 WL 2772488 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 14 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Manufacture : General Overview

8. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of two prior extraneous acts in defendant's trial on charges of possession of pseudoephedrine with the intent to manufacture methamphetamine because there was no direct evidence of defendant's intent, and intent could not necessarily be inferred from the act itself. The evidence of the prior extraneous act in which defendant was found with fresh track marks in his arm was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because methamphetamine use and addiction was highly probative regarding commission of the charged offense, and the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show intent, plan, and absence of mistake. Fulfer v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2449 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 31 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : General Overview

9. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in performing its Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test regarding evidence of trace quantities of controlled substances that were found in defendant's car during the same search in which the methadone was found and finding that the evidence was admissible because: (1) the evidence made the fact that defendant knew the pill bottle contained contraband more probable; (2) defendant's possession of the baggie and the scale dusted with methamphetamine and cocaine was necessary to prove scienter; (3) the evidence had little potential to impress the jury in an irrational way; (4) since all of the contraband was discovered during the same search of defendant's car, little extra time was spent by the State to develop the evidence; and (5) the State's need for the evidence was great, as it needed to link defendant to the knowing possession of the methadone in the pill bottle by showing that defendant knowingly possessed other contraband at the time of his arrest. Lamkin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6484, 2010 WL 3170647 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 12 2010).

10. In a drug trial, even if it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to admit 19 bags containing an untested substance into evidence, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because there was still overwhelming evidence that the narcotics found in defendant's possession amounted to more than four grams: 20 of the 39 bags found in defendant's possession tested positive for heroin, and their combined weight totaled 4.094 grams. Cantu v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3355, 2010 WL 1817804 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 5 2010).

11. In a cocaine possession trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in excluding evidence tending to show that a detective did not immediately file charges against defendant for all of the drugs found in his possession during an earlier search, despite defendant's claim that the evidence showed illegal police conduct as well as bias and lack of credibility. The district court could have found that the probative value was unclear and the time needed to develop the evidence significant. Perez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3407, 2010 WL 1818944 (Tex. App. Austin May 5 2010).

12. In trial for possession of methamphetamine, extraneous offense evidence pertaining to other controlled substances and illegal narcotics found at the same time as the methamphetamine was properly admitted because it was relevant to an affirmative links analysis and was not likely to impress a jury in an irrational but nevertheless indelible way, given that the evidence supporting the charged offense was far more damaging. Johnson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7773 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 27 2007).

13. In a trial for heroin possession, gang-membership evidence was not unduly prejudicial. The State's closing argument made it clear to the jury that the gang evidence was being used to show motive, intent, and knowledge; the State did not inflame the jury by mentioning the gang membership. Ojeda v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8557 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 24 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Intent to Distribute : Elements

14. In a drug trial, video excerpts from a seized camera were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, because they were material to the issues of possession-with-intent-to-deliver a controlled substance and a deadly weapon finding, in that they placed defendant in a drug house around the money and guns. They were not unduly prejudicial because they did not show actual drug dealing. Mincey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2825, 2009 WL 1058734 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 21 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Simple Possession : General Overview

15. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting extraneous-offense evidence during defendant's trial on a charge of possession of less than one gram of cocaine because the extraneous offense, which was committed while defendant was on bail awaiting the instant trial, also involved possession of cocaine thereby establishing defendant's familiarity with the substance and the jury was given an appropriate limiting instruction; the extraneous offense involved over six grams of cocaine. Baker v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11745, 2013 WL 12297784 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 18 2013).

16. In a driving while intoxicated trial, evidence that cocaine was located in plain view next to the driver's seat in the vehicle defendant was driving was relevant to prove the State's allegation in the indictment that defendant was intoxicated, and, because the possession of cocaine evidence went to a material element of the State's case, it was not an extraneous offense. Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2064, 2013 WL 765711 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 28 2013).

17. In a possession of marijuana case, the trial court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as it served to illustrate defendant's involvement in a transaction that started at the residence and included depictions of behavior that tended to show his awareness of the contents (drugs) in the back of the vehicle. As there was great inherent probative force of the complained-of evidence, in that it served to place the charged offense in its proper perspective, the trial court did not err in finding that the probative force of the evidence substantially outweighed any prejudicial effect pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403. Duarte v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5837 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : General Overview

18. There was no error in admitting evidence of prior assault by defendant. Jeter v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8945 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 18 2013); Bazile v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9385, 2010 WL 4813786 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2010); White v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5604, 2010 WL 2803018 (Tex. App. Eastland July 15 2010).

19. In an assault trial arising from an incident in which defendant was bounced from a bar, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403 in admitting evidence that defendant was taking prescription medication to control temper. Dudzik v. State, 276 S.W.3d 554, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9073 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

20. In defendant's trial for causing serious bodily injury to a child, the trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 by admitting hospital and autopsy photographs of the child because they were admitted during the testimony of both the treating physician and the medical examiner who performed the autopsy, both testified as to the child's injuries, and the autopsy photographs, coupled with the examiner's testimony, provided crucial evidence of the severe force used by defendant to inflict the child's injuries. Rodriguez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 460 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 25 2007).

21. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting into evidence photographs of the complainant's injuries where defendant was charged with aggravated assault causing serious bodily injury under

Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02(a)(1). The photographs, which showed multiple cuts and bruises on the complainant's face, his apparent blood-soaked hair, and a cut on his thumb, were relevant to show the nature of the wounds and were not particularly shocking or gruesome. Siale v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5153 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 30 2005).

22. Defendant argued that the trial court erred by excluding evidence relating to his strained marital relationship with the victim because that evidence was probative of his state of mind and motivation at the time of his actions; however, because the only conduct elements potentially implicated for the crime of aggravated assault were the nature of the conduct and the result of the conduct, the circumstances surrounding the conduct were not relevant and were properly excluded. Novillo v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5086 (Tex. App. Austin June 10 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Aggravated Offenses

23. In a trial for aggravated assault on a public servant, it was proper to admit a rifle and associated photographs to show that defendant had access to the rifle, which was located in the same room. Airheart v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3235, 2012 WL 1431762 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 25 2012).

24. For purposes of defendant's aggravated assault convictions, the photographs of the crime scene were admissible because their probative value was not substantially outweighed by their prejudicial value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as the photographs showed the injuries defendant inflicted on the victims, and they helped the jury to determine whether serious bodily injury resulted from the shooting. Hernandez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 344, 2012 WL 135675 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 18 2012).

25. In a trial for aggravated assault on a public servant, testimony from defendant's wife about his assault on her earlier the same evening was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Given vivid video evidence showing the uncontrolled violent nature of defendant's conduct, the wife's description was not likely to unduly impress the jury in an irrational, indelible way. Hester v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9311, 2009 WL 4597948 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 8 2009).

26. In an aggravated assault case, a trial court did not err by admitting photographs of a victim's injuries over a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the inherent probative force of the photographs was considerable since they provided context for the offense; moreover, they were relevant and necessary for the prosecution to aid the jury in understanding the testimony regarding the extent of the victim's injuries. Even if the photographs were in color, the images were not of such a horrifying or appalling nature that a juror of normal sensitivity would have had difficulty rationally deciding the critical issues of the case after viewing any of them individually or cumulatively; further, they could not have possibly distracted the jury from the issue at hand, the jury was not misled, and the time involved in the introduction of the photographs was minimal. Houston v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4357, 2009 WL 1677860 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 4 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Simple Offenses

27. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding expert psychological testimony who allegedly would have testified that as a result of his mental defects defendant was incapable of forming the necessary mens rea to commit an assault because defendant's amnesia was caused by his head injury, which occurred after the assault, and therefore could not be relevant to his intent at the time of the assault. In addition, the expert's report only noted that defendant told the expert that he had post-traumatic stress disorder, and nothing suggested that the expert himself confirmed the diagnosis. Iniquez v. State, 374 S.W.3d 611, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5436, 2012 WL 2742632 (Tex. App. Austin July 6 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : General Overview

28. In a trial for injuring a baby by shaking her, the use of a doll during trial was appropriate for: (1) a detective to demonstrate how defendant had shaken a doll during an interview; (2) defendant to be cross-examined following his testimony that he would grow frustrated and angry and that his bouncing of the baby would grow more intense; and (3) the State to summarize the evidence in closing arguments. The use was not unduly prejudicial because it related to defendant's actions, and the doll was shown to be similar to the doll used during the interview. Moore v. State, 154 S.W.3d 703, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11125 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

29. In a child abuse trial, the child's foster mother was properly allowed to testify that when she changed dressings in the child's vaginal area, the child said that her daddy had touched her there. The evidence rebutted the father's defense that the child's burns were accidental, arguably supported a finding that there was a pattern of abuse, and was not explicit in a way that would impress the jury in an irrational and indelible way. Wooten v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4296 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2004).

30. Burglary defendant's statement that his three children were waiting next door was properly admitted. The fact that he left the children unattended while engaged in a burglary was prejudicial, but to his credit, the statement also displayed his concern for the welfare of the children; the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Carter v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3394 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 15 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Children : Elements

31. Even though the trial court erred by admitting defendant's posts to a social media website regarding his attitude toward children as they were unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the error was harmless given the strength of the evidence against defendant and the fact that the presentation of the evidence consumed less than half a page of the record. Copeland v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14675, 2013 WL 6388585 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 5 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Custodial Interference

32. In defendant's prosecution for interference with child custody under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 25.03(a)(1), evidence that he continued to pay child support after July 2006 was relevant and not unfairly prejudicial as it tended to rebut his claim that he and the complainant had reconciled and that he believed that the divorce decree was void. Long v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9804 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 9 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Domestic Assault : Penalties

33. In the punishment phase of a domestic assault trial, evidence of an unprosecuted and recanted allegation of sexual assault by defendant's daughter was more probative than prejudicial, even though the offense was remote in time, because it provided another example of a criminal act that defendant might have committed against a household member and helped show a pattern of conduct that might have informed the jury's decision about whether to place him on community supervision. Sanders v. State, 422 S.W.3d 809, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1090, 2014 WL 325028 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 30 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Endangerment : General Overview

34. During the punishment phase of a criminal trial where defendant was charged with endangering a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence from defendant's ex-boyfriend who was convicted of sexually assaulting defendant's daughters, and the probative value of the confession was not substantially outweighed by its prejudice. Naivar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4883 (Tex. App. Tyler May 28 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Kidnapping : General Overview

35. In an aggravated kidnapping case, an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was properly overruled because of the probative value of a folding knife found in a truck; this supported the State's allegation that the kidnapping was aggravated, and there was little or no danger of confusion of the issues. Moreover, evidence of checks was probative to identify appellant as a participant in the kidnapping, and an argument that the trial court failed to conduct the Rule 403 balancing test before admitting the challenged evidence was rejected because the judge was presumed to have engaged in the required balancing test when Rule 403 was invoked. Padilla v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8519 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 11 2012).

36. In a kidnapping trial, evidence that the complainant bought Oxycontin from defendant before the complainant learned of her pregnancy was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 403 because it was relevant to the defenses of immunity, necessity, and defense of third person, which were based on a claim that the complainant was endangering and abusing or neglecting her unborn child by consuming Oxycontin while pregnant. Scroggs v. State, 396 S.W.3d 1, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3769, 2010 WL 1993676 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 19 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Robbery : General Overview

37. In a robbery trial, it was proper to admit evidence that that defendant associated with a man carrying the same kind of identification card as used by one of the robbers because no evidence showed that jurors would know what the card was or that they could infer the holder was a convicted felon by possessing it; the evidence explained how police connected the suspects in a traffic stop to the robbery at a nightclub. Robinson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 365, 2012 WL 130616 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 18 2012).

38. In a trial for the robbery of a pickup truck, the trial court properly admitted a police chase video of the robbers' pickup along with testimony about the chase, even though defendant was not in the truck, as well as evidence of three handguns found in the pickup; the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Hawkins v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6439 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 20 2006).

39. In a trial for robbery, extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 because the similarity in the offenses made the evidence compelling as to identity. In both robberies, the assailants drove into an apartment complex parking lot, wore shirts bearing Houston police insignia, claimed to be police officers, and searched Hispanic male victims; money was taken in both robberies with a silver pistol. Casique v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6517 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 16 2005).

40. In a robbery trial, admission was proper of extraneous acts evidence, including defendant's escape, aggravated assault on a police officer, aggravated assault, and unauthorized use of two vehicles. The evidence was not more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Russell v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3703 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 13 2005).

41. In an aggravated robbery case, the trial court did not err in admitting the witnesses' extraneous offenses testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) for the purpose of proving identity over defendant's objection because (1) defendant placed his identity in issue with the testimony of two alibi witnesses and the testimony of another individual, that he, and not defendant, was the robber; and (2) the danger of unfair prejudice from the witnesses' testimony was minimal because the jury was instructed that the witnesses' testimony could only be considered for the limited purposes set out in Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Chatman v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5410 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 17 2004).

42. Evidence that defendant had previously carried a black gun was admissible in an aggravated robbery case where it tended to identify defendant as the perpetrator in a crime where a black handgun was used; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 where it had relevance beyond its value as character evidence, and it was not necessarily prejudicial because the previous handgun possession could have been lawful. Page v. State, 125 S.W.3d 640, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10198 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Robbery : Armed Robbery : General Overview

43. In a trial for aggravated robbery, there was no error in admitting an unadjudicated extraneous robbery offense because the similarities made it highly relevant. The two aggravated robberies of older complainants occurred within 20 minutes and three miles of each other and involved an unidentified accomplice, a request for an unknown individual, use of a silver/chrome gun, forced entry, and forcing the complainants to lie on the floor. Villar v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11084 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 29 2013).

44. In a robbery trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403 in admitting evidence that after the robbery, someone stole the complainant's tools from the complainant's vehicle and set the vehicle on fire. The extraneous offenses were contextual evidence that helped to explain why the police became involved in the case that led to the investigation of the underlying facts and how the police ultimately arrested defendant for robbery. Flores v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6539 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 16 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Fraud : False Pretenses : General Overview

45. Appellate court did not consider whether a trial court erred by failing to exclude evidence of a forgery under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in a case involving the misapplication of fiduciary property where defendant's motion in limine did not preserve the issue for review; although the motion in limine referred to Rule 403, defendant's later objection during trial did not refer to "unfair prejudice" or Rule 403. Martinez v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9963 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 21 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Involuntary Manslaughter : General Overview

46. In a homicide trial, there was no error in admitting evidence of defendant's gang membership. Under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, the evidence was admissible to explain defendant's anger at the victim's alleged false claim regarding prison time and gang affiliation. McCallum v. State, 311 S.W.3d 9, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 440 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 27 2010).

47. In an intoxication manslaughter with a deadly weapon case, an enhanced videotape of the accident revealed that it was highly probative of the fact and manner of an officer's death; thus, it was clearly relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Adams v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1165 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 15 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : General Overview

48. In a murder case, the court erred by failing to require the State to redact portions of defendant's recorded statement admitting he had previously been in prison three times, but the error was harmless because the statement had no more than a slight effect on the jury's verdict. Barley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13313, 2013 WL 5827728 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 29 2013).

49. In a murder case, a trial court did not err by admitting autopsy photographs because they were probative of the issue of whether a death where a victim was run over by a car was an intentional killing with multiple injuries inflicted. The probative value of the photographs was not substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect; none of the photos showed any mutilation to the body caused by the medical examiner's examination. Ogle v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1084, 2013 WL 453257 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 6 2013).

50. In a trial for defendant's murder of his cousin, no error resulted from allowing a relative to testify that, in the days before the shooting, defendant was angry with the victim for not bailing him out of jail. The testimony demonstrated defendant's motive, and evidence of the reason defendant was in jail--a stabbing--was excluded. Nieto v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8787 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 18 2012).

51. In a murder trial, it was proper to admit evidence of defendant's character trait of offering to handle the problems of other people with a firearm and a specific extraneous bad act to demonstrate this character trait because the evidence was probative to rebut the defense that only a third person, and not defendant, had a motive to harm the complainant. Williams v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

52. In a trial for a murder that occurred in a game room, there was no error in admitting evidence that minutes before the murder defendant approached the game room and left. That evidence was of an extraneous offense because it showed only that defendant and an accomplice were denied entry. Dronso v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3720, 2012 WL 1624065 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 10 2012).

53. In a murder trial, evidence relating to an alleged alternative perpetrator was properly excluded on the basis that there was an insufficient nexus between the alleged alternative and the offense, notwithstanding the theory that the alleged alternative had a motive to want the victim (a witness to a previous shooting) dead, his alleged involvement in a shotgun shooting in the same neighborhood just a few days earlier, and his presence in the area near the time the charged murder occurred. Caldwell v. State, 356 S.W.3d 42, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8437 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 21 2011).

54. In a trial for defendant's murder of his wife, evidence that he remarried a month after being released on bond was relevant to motive. Davis v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8372, 2011 WL 5026403 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 20 2011).

55. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting the testimony of a forensic anthropologist regarding the science of toolmark analysis; the expert opined that toolmarks on bone fragments found in defendant's yard were consistent with being made by either a hunting knife or a saw, that the bone fragments had characteristics consistent with being human, and that they showed no signs of healing, indicating that the cuts occurred at or near the time of death. Shepherd v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 133, 2011 WL 166893 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 11 2011).

56. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, 404 in admitting a video of a social networking page, on which defendant was depicted holding a gun. The evidence was relevant because a witness testified that the gun in the video was the same gun the witness saw defendant use in the murder; it wass unlikely that the jury would have felt compelled to convict defendant of murder simply because he acted like a "bad boy" and brandished a weapon on camera. Brumfield v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10137, 2010 WL 5187690 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 23 2010).

57. In a murder trial, no error occurred when the trial court admitted tape-recorded phone conversations that included defendant's statements regarding illegal drug use after the victim's hospitalization; its probative value outweighed its unfairly prejudicial effect, as it suggested defendant's lack of remorse or concern about the victim. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9519 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 5 2007).

58. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not err by admitting testimony that the cadaver dogs alerted on the scent of human remains because the evidence was not more prejudicial than probative of whether defendant had disposed of the murder victim's body where he said that he did, and the evidence did not point to other suspects. Trejos v. State, 243 S.W.3d 30, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4045 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

59. In a trial for a "shaken-baby" murder, any error arising from the admission of an investigator's opinion on guilt was harmless. Although defendant objected to the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 403 during the prosecution's re-direct, the same question and answer had come in without objection during the defense's prior cross-examination. San Martin Adriano v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7140 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2005).

60. Where defendant was charged with the murder of her ex-boyfriend's new girlfriend, the trial court did not err in admitting into evidence a letter written by defendant to her ex-boyfriend in which she described the intensity of her feelings for him and her concern about the possibility of his philandering. Defendant's statements proved that she had a motive to kill the complainant; the prejudice of the letter did not substantially outweigh its probative value. Harris v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 346 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 13 2005).

61. In a trial for murder and robbery, evidence that a gun was taken in a prior robbery was same transaction contextual evidence and was relevant to show preparation for the planned robbery and murder at issue. The evidence was not unduly prejudicial, given the other evidence that the stolen gun was the murder weapon. Hill v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8474 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 22 2004).

62. Where defendant's cell mate described what defendant had told him about the instant murder and also about another killing, the trial court had not erred in admitting the evidence of the other shooting because the extreme degree of similarity between the two murders made the evidence of the other murder highly probative. In addition, without evidence of defendant's involvement in the other murder, it would have been more difficult for the jury to resolve whether the cell mate was a credible witness. Corona v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5042 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 9 2004).

63. In defendant's murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting three autopsy photographs where the three objected-to autopsy photographs were the only photographs that documented the internal autopsy findings of the entry wounds, the fractures caused by the gunshots, the proximity of the wounds to each other and to the body, and the trajectories of the bullets. The photographs were highly relevant to explain the manner of death by documenting the entrance wounds, the proximity of the wounds to each other, the trajectory of the bullets, and the resulting fractures, and the jury would not have been prejudiced in some irrational, but nevertheless indelible way by viewing autopsy photos of the deceased's head under those circumstances. Hall v. State, 137 S.W.3d 847, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4402 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

64. In a criminal prosecution for murder, autopsy photographs of the victim were admissible to establish the victim's cause of death. The photographs had a high probative value, were not excessively gruesome, and owed any disturbing nature to the crime itself. Troncoso v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2578 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar.

24, 2004).

65. In a prosecution for murder, the medical records of defendant's shooting victims were properly admitted at the sentencing phase; the medical records were relevant to the circumstances of the murder and provided evidence of bad acts for which defendant could be held criminally responsible. The probative value of the medical records was not substantially outweighed by the danger of undue prejudice. Mendoza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2486 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 18 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Capital Murder : General Overview

66. In a murder trial, there was no error in admitting extraneous offense evidence regarding a robbery/shooting that occurred ten minutes before the murder or regarding an assault that occurred as the suspects drove away from the robbery victim's apartment. The other offenses bore bear striking similarities to the offense for which defendant was convicted and were relevant to the hotly contested issue of identity. Mason v. State, 416 S.W.3d 720, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13527, 2013 WL 5861492 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 31 2013).

67. Accomplice's testimony that he and defendant were involved in another aggravated robbery of a taxi cab driver four days before the murder was not inadmissible because it tended to make defendant's theory that he was not the responsible party much less probable, the trial court gave a limiting instruction, an insignificant amount of time was needed to develop the evidence, and it was needed to show defendant's intent to commit a robbery and his intent to kill. Stephens v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10188 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 14 2013).

68. In a capital murder trial, it was proper to admit testimony about defendant's prior act of pulling out a gun during a disagreement with the complainant because it was relevant to show defendant's hostility or ill will toward the complainant and his motive to later kill her. It was not necessary to show that the complainant was threatened in the prior incident. Jackson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10062, 2012 WL 6049074 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 6 2012).

69. In a trial for capital murder in the course of a burglary, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to admit an autopsy photograph of the victim's unborn fetus because there was little probative value in relation to the offense, as to which the death of the fetus was not an element, and other evidence was admitted of the pregnancy and the fetus's death. Rolle v. State, 367 S.W.3d 746, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2699 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 5 2012).

70. In a murder trial, Tex. R. Evid. 403 permitted the admission of audio recordings from defendant's telephone calls from the county jail because they tended to show defendant's relationship with the victims (a girlfriend and her daughter) and defendant's suspicions; as to prejudice, defendant spoke about his "swinger" lifestyle, sexual and drug-related activities, and his volatile relationships with various individuals in much greater detail during extensive video-recorded interviews. Mckee v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2421, 2012 WL 1021446 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 28 2012).

71. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, 404(b) in admitting the extraneous offense evidence of an aggravated robbery that defendant and an accomplice allegedly committed six days prior to the murder because it was reasonable to conclude that the evidence went directly to the issue of intent, given that the extraneous robbery occurred less than a week prior to the shooting and had several similarities to the charged offense. Maxwell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9036, 2010 WL 4595702 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 12 2010).

72. In a trial for capital murder arising from a robbery and shooting, it was reversible error to admit evidence that defendant committed an armed robbery of a grocery store a month after the charged murder because any probative value as to intent under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R.

Evid. 403. Jackson v. State, 320 S.W.3d 873, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6572 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2010).

73. In a capital murder case, a trial court did not err by refusing to allow the introduction of evidence that a victim had drugs in his system because any probative value the evidence might have had was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 403. The appellate court rejected defendant's argument that the evidence was relevant to the issue of the previous relationship between defendant and the victim and to show the condition of defendant's mind at the time of the offense. Anderson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6809, 2009 WL 2915011 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 27 2009).

74. In a capital murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting evidence of actions taken by witnesses while interacting with defendant (taking precautionary measures, staying away from defendant, checking on a child, or calling family, friends or police) or their expressions of concern; the witnesses' testimony provided significant background information about the circumstances under which the events occurred. Russo v. State, 228 S.W.3d 779, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4499 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

75. In a murder trial, photographs of the deceased were properly introduced into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403, even though they showed the gruesome appearance of the body, which was badly burned in arson, because the photographs showed the position of stab wounds that caused death; although graphic, the photographs did not inject any additional, intangible, or inappropriate emotional element into the case such that the trial court should have necessarily excluded these photographs. Ledbetter v. State, 208 S.W.3d 723, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10040 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

76. In defendant's capital murder case, a court did not err by admitting testimony about defendant's confession where the trial court properly concluded that the evidence was a significant part of the State's case because defendant's confession linked him to the store at the time of the robbery and murder, making it more likely that he left his fingerprint on the cash drawer at the time of the offense. Webber v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 15 2004).

77. Where defendant was charged with capital murder in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.03, two witnesses placed defendant at the scene of the crime, but their testimony conflicted, and defendant developed evidence of a relationship to suggest an innocent reason for the presence of defendant at the crime scene and the presence of his DNA under the victim's fingernails, therefore, the State's introduction of evidence of a highly similar extraneous capital murder committed by defendant when he was a juvenile was affirmed because: (1) based on testimony elicited by the defense about a relationship between defendant and the victim, identity was an issue under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and thus, the extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and (2) because all of the factors weighed in favor of the admission of the extraneous offense evidence, its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice and the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Ortiz v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 2242 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 13 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Capital Murder : Elements

78. Because the Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) evidence was relevant in identifying defendant and showing his intent to commit capital murder, and the evidence was not so prejudicial as to overcome the effectiveness of the limiting instruction, under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the extraneous offense evidence. Castoreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3636 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 9 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Felony Murder : General Overview

79. In a felony murder trial, with driving while intoxicated as the underlying felony, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting a post-collision photograph showing part of the interior of the car defendant was driving, including a deceased passenger lying in the passenger seat. Alami v. State, 333 S.W.3d 881, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 135 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 6 2011).

80. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 in allowing an accomplice to testify about two prior attempted robberies by defendant and the same accomplices. The testimony was relevant to prove that the group's plan was to rob an Hispanic man whom they believed to be carrying cash and to prove that defendant was the member of the group who carried the gun, rebutting the defensive theory that he was not the shooter. Howard v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1388 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 26 2010).

81. In a trial for felony murder, it was error to admit extraneous offense evidence relating to attempted extortion; the offense, a threat made against an accomplice to her family, was only distantly related to the charged offense and the danger of unfair prejudice substantially outweighed the probative value. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

82. In a trial for felony murder, it was error to admit extraneous offense evidence that at the time of arrest defendant was returning to a hotel after attempting to steal a car; the evidence, unlike other evidence of car theft, did not tend to show flight and added nothing to a showing of consciousness of guilt and therefore was more prejudicial than probative; the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because it was unlikely that the admission had a substantial effect on the verdict, given all of the evidence before the jury. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

83. In a trial for felony murder, there was no error in the admission of extraneous offense evidence relating to forgery of documents, automobile theft, and possession of a firearm as the evidence was relevant and probative. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : First-Degree Murder : General Overview

84. In defendant's murder case, the court did not err by omitting evidence of pornography found on the victim's computer because there was no showing by defendant that the pornographic images were related to the shooting, that the images were the subject of the argument that preceded the shooting, or that the images played any part whatsoever during the events leading up to the shooting. Eisenman v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 282 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 10 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Voluntary Manslaughter : General Overview

85. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a text message purportedly sent by defendant to the victim because the trial court could have properly concluded that the State needed the message before the jury to establish the consensual sexual relationship between defendant and the victim in order to show that her shouting rape was a reckless act that she should have realized would likely elicit a violent response from her husband, whom she knew carried a firearm, and not a true cry for help. Roberson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6421, 2010 WL 3075612 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 5 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Bail Jumping & Failure to Appear

86. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 by admitting evidence that defendant failed to appear for a previous trial date; defendant's failure to appear was not the type of misconduct that had a great unfair prejudicial danger. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8218 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 17 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Cruelty to Animals : General Overview

87. In an animal cruelty case, defendant did not preserve an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), regarding the prejudicial effect of testimony from a neighbor who found dog carcasses and drag marks on his property. That argument did not comport with a relevance objection at trial, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Holz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2017, 2010 WL 1041068 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 23 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Fleeing & Eluding : General Overview

88. In a trial for evading arrest with a motor vehicle, it was proper to admit into evidence a video showing the lighting "pursuit package" on a patrol car because the evidence was relevant to the defensive theory that defendant did not know the officer was a police officer at all prior to his arrest. Carter v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12266, 2013 WL 5460043 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 27 2013).

89. In a fleeing and eluding case, a trial court did not err by allowing the State to introduce evidence of an unadjudicated offense during the punishment phase of the trial. Evidence that defendant previously ran from police had probative value, it was not inherently inflammatory, it did not take long to present, and the prejudicial effect of the evidence did not unduly outweigh its probative value. Crumpton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6753 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

90. In a trial for evading arrest, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, or 404 in the admission of evidence that defendant placed a marijuana cigar on the pavement outside his motor vehicle while fleeing from a deputy sheriff. The evidence was relevant because it helped to prove that defendant intentionally fled; it was not submitted to show that defendant acted in conformity with his character because it indicated a motive; and it was highly probative in establishing intent, an essential element of the charge. Slaughter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8694 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 3 2006).

91. In a trial for evading arrest, evidence that defendant was on parole at the time was probative of his motive to get away from the police officer and made less probable the defensive argument that defendant was not aware the police were behind him; the risk of undue prejudice was minimized by the fact that the jury was not told what crime led to the parole status. Steele v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1532, 2014 WL 580200 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 12 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Fleeing & Eluding : Consciousness of Guilt

92. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence of flight because an eyewitness who was at the house during the shooting, testified that defendant shot the complainant, in comparison to the inherently graphic testimony given by the medical examiner, the evidence of flight had little tendency to influence the jury in an irrational way, and the State needed to introduce the evidence of flight. Goldsmith v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 754, 2014 WL 261007 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 23 2014).

93. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence of flight because an eyewitness who was at the house during the shooting, testified that defendant shot the complainant, in comparison to the inherently graphic testimony given by the medical examiner, the evidence of flight had little tendency to influence the jury in an irrational way, and the State needed to introduce the evidence of flight. Goldsmith v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 754, 2014 WL 261007 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 23 2014).

94. At defendant's trial for robbery, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony regarding his efforts to resist arrest because evidence relevant to his flight from the scene was a circumstance indicative of guilt. The testimony encompassed only a few pages of the multiple-volume reporter's record and was not emphasized by the State; the probative value of the testimony was not outweighed by any danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading the jury, undue delay, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. Johnson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 471, 2014 WL 222929 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 16 2014).

95. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault, there was no error in admitting evidence that defendant, after being confronted by the victim's mother and fleeing to a nearby apartment complex, was seen fleeing from the complex, in which a fire had been started. A reasonable inference from the evidence was that defendant started the fire to aid his flight from the apartment complex; thus, the evidence was of value in establishing consciousness of guilt. Craft v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 199, 2012 WL 112527 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 11 2012).

96. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, evidence that defendant was driving a vehicle that matched the description of the vehicle involved in the shooting and that he attempted to flee from officers when one of them tried to pull him over was probative of his consciousness of guilt. The prejudicial effect of the evidence of defendant's flight did not outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Owens v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2871, 2011 WL 1435499 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 14 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Money Laundering : General Overview

97. In a trial for money laundering, the trial court properly allowed extraneous offense evidence that defendant had been stopped on one occasion with more than $67,000 in his van and on another with more than 80 pounds of marijuana in his vehicle. The extraneous acts were relevant to show that defendant, although he claimed not to know about money hidden in the van on the current charge, repeatedly carried large amounts of cash and drugs hidden in his vehicle; the extraneous acts were not rendered inadmissible merely because they occurred after the charged offense. Stallworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 993 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 9 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Resisting Arrest : General Overview

98. In a case of resisting arrest or transportation, the probative value of a videotape of defendant's struggle with a police officer after a traffic stop, which was relevant in establishing force and intent, was not substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of defendant's use of curse words. Hartis v. State, 183 S.W.3d 793, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10330 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Riot, Rout & Unlawful Assembly

99. Admission of defendant's gang affiliation was not inadmissible under this rule because the State's purpose was to show that defendant's statement to the witness was in fact a threat and without the evidence the jury would have been less able to understand defendant's statement as a credible threat. Simmang v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS

11529 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 11 2013).

100. Trial court did not err by finding that probative value of the sergeant's testimony regarding the Mexican Mafia and defendant's membership in the organization did not outweigh its prejudicial effect on defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it countered defendant's testimony that he shot two victims under the influence of sudden passion and provided an explanation to the jury as to why defendant shot the victims even though they were fighting with another man and not defendant. The testimony about the Mexican Mafia's reputation for violence and defendant's membership in the organization countered the testimony of defendant's friends and family that he was a non-violent and peaceful person. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5228 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2013).

101. Trial court did not err by finding that probative value of a lay witness's testimony regarding the Mexican Mafia and defendant's membership in the organization did not outweigh its prejudicial effect on defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was spoke to defendant's character, explained why defendant shot the two victims even though he did not know them and did not seem to have any personal motive for doing so, and it countered the testimony of defendant's family and friends that he was a non-violent and peaceful person. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5228 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2013).

102. Admitting extraneous acts of gang violence during the punishment stage of a murder trial was proper under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07; the probative value of the evidence gang membership was not substantially outweighed by its prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Clark v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1430 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 27 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Witness Tampering

103. Assault defendant failed to request notice of other crimes and acts evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and therefore could not complain of the adequacy of the State's notice; moreover, the notice gave her reasonable notice of a neighbor's expected testimony that defendant sought to bribe her to say that the victim struck defendant first. Additionally, this bribery evidence was relevant as consciousness of guilt and was not unfairly prejudicial. Cavazos v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5045, 2014 WL 1881691 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 8 2014).

104. Evidence of defendant's alleged witness tampering--phone calls offering the witness money not to testify--was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404, as evidence of consciousness of guilt in a burglary trial. Livingston v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9054, 2011 WL 5535332 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 15 2011).

105. In a trial for child sexual assault, the complainant's parent was properly allowed to testify that, after the parent discovered defendant, a pastor, watching an R-rated movie with the complainant, defendant threatened to take away the parent's children, house, business, and car if the parent did not sign some papers and that when the parent refused, defendant told the parent to commit suicide; the disputed statement was probative of defendant's state of mind and consciousness of guilt and was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 401, Tex. R. Evid. 403. Hinson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 554 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 24 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Arson : General Overview

106. In a trial for first-degree arson resulting in the death of defendant's spouse, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting autopsy photographs. There were four moderately-sized photographs, which were probative to depict the injuries received as a result of the fire; they did not depict any mutilation caused by the autopsy. Orr v. State, 306 S.W.3d 380, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1196 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 18 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Burglary & Criminal Trespass : General Overview

107. In a criminal trial for burglary, the court did not err by allowing a police officer to testify as to the contents of defendant's van. The testimony was needed to show that defendant was in recent possession of stolen property; the testimony was not character evidence of other crimes or wrong acts. Middleton v. State, 187 S.W.3d 134, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 578 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Burglary & Criminal Trespass : Burglary

108. In a burglary trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 404(b), 403 in admitting evidence of an extraneous burglary in order to show intent. The prior burglary was near in time and location to the charged burglary. Martinez v. State, 304 S.W.3d 642, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 413 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 21 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Burglary & Criminal Trespass : Burglary : Elements

109. In a burglary trial, there was no error in the admission of evidence that defendant had, in his possession when he was arrested, items taken in a subsequent burglary from the same victim; the evidence was admissible to rebut a line of questioning directed at burglaries that occurred after defendant was in custody. Ellis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 414 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 24 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Forgery : General Overview

110. In a trial for felony murder, there was no errorr in the admission of extraneous offense evidence relating to forgery of documents; the evidence was relevant in order to show motive, relationship of the parties, and consciousness of guilt; the fact that defendant had equipment to produce fake checks was unlikely to make an unfair impression on the jury. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Larceny & Theft : General Overview

111. In a theft case arising from defendant's failure to complete a construction contract, evidence that defendant had done the same thing to another person was not excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the testimony was very compelling to prove defendant's intent to commit theft, rather than a failure to perform due to circumstances out of his control. The evidence was quickly and clearly presented such that it did not take too much time and was not confusing; moreover, the testimony was not so outrageous that it would affect the jury in an indelible way, and a jury instruction likely would not have had any effect. Gill v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9261 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 11 2008).

112. In a trial for theft of services, the trial court did not err in allowing evidence regarding the deposit of checks into defendant's account and the subsequent debits to that account when those checks were returned. The checks were important proof to establish the manner in which defendant attempted to falsely inflate the balance of the account and established defendant's knowledge that checks written on the account would not have sufficient funds to cover them. Ingram v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 42 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 5 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Larceny & Theft : Elements

113. In defendant's trial for theft for transferring $6,000 from her employer to her credit card accounts, the trial court did not err in excluding testimony regarding the bitterness of her divorce and the possibility that her ex-husband was attempting to make her look bad or was trying to reduce the amounts owed on the cards, because there was no evidence of any nexus between the ex-husband and the crime. Emmert v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6624, 2014 WL 2807987 (Tex. App. Dallas June 18 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Racketeering : General Overview

114. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence multiple extraneous offenses during defendant's trial on charges of engaging in organized criminal activity because the evidence, namely the letterhead, testimony about the ongoing mortgage fraud, the forged signature on the articles of incorporation and diverted money, was all admissible as evidence to establish the existence of the combination, its members and its ongoing criminal activities, which were elements of the offense; the diversion of money was also admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as evidence of motive, knowledge and intent, common scheme or plan, or absence of mistake. The court further held that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect. Marriott v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5804, 2010 WL 2869781 (Tex. App. Waco July 21 2010).

115. Objection to extraneous offense evidence was not successful because testimony that stolen parts were removed from defendant's residence after his arrest, along with testimony that defendant had purchased stolen parts, was probative evidence of the elements of the offense of engaging in organized criminal activity; the testimony was evidence relevant to the element of combination and the collaboration in carrying on criminal activities, and the probative value of this evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. The evidence tended to prove defendant had the intent to establish, maintain, or participate in a combination or in the profits of a combination, an essential element of the offense of engaging in organized criminal activities. Marban v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6760, 2009 WL 2618343 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : General Overview

116. Even if the sexually-explicit pictures found at defendant's residence were relevant to show "intent to arouse," they failed the Tex. R. Evid. 403 test because the controversy was not defendant's intent to gratify himself, it was whether the incident the victims described in fact occurred, and the graphic images were of a nature that a limiting instruction would not likely have been effective; therefore, the trial court abused its discretion by admitting them into evidence. Thrift v. State, 134 S.W.3d 475, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2584 (Tex. App. Waco 2004), *aff'd,*176 S.W.3d 221, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1862 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Child Pornography : General Overview

117. In a trial for possession of child pornography, there was no error in admitting evidence of defendant's semen on two articles of children's clothing because it was relevant to rebut his defensive theory that it was his wife who downloaded the child pornography in order to obtain an advantage in their divorce proceedings. Mestas v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8543 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 5 2014).

118. Admission of extraneous-offense evidence, regarding defendant's two encounters with children in public restrooms, did not affect defendant's substantial rights because testimony regarding the encounters did not consume an inordinate amount of time during trial, the State focused the majority of its closing argument on the evidence establishing the charged offenses, and the trial court gave a limiting instruction. Hoard v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11760 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 18 2013).

119. In defendant's pornography case, the chat logs had probative value, and the entire exchange between the prosecutor and a witness constituted no more than ten lines of testimony in the reporters' record. There was a need for the evidence to establish defendant's control over and use of the computer equipment, which also contained pornographic images of children for which he was being prosecuted. Checo v. State, 402 S.W.3d 440, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7029 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 11 2013).

120. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence testimony about voluminous pornographic images found on defendant's computer under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the testimony was probative as it assisted the jury in determining that the images did not arrive there by accident or mistake; (2) the State needed the testimony to rebut defensive theories; (3) limiting instructions were given; and (4) the amount of time required to develop the evidence was relatively short. Bethards v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5603, 2011 WL 2937875 (Tex. App. Waco July 20 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Obscenity : General Overview

121. In an indecent exposure case, a court properly admitted evidence where defendant's comment about a prior incident to the undercover officer was compelling evidence that he intended to expose himself to gratify his sexual desire, not just to urinate. In addition, the State spent only a few pages of the trial record developing the evidence regarding the prior incident, and the evidence was not of such a nature that the jury would have been likely to disregard an instruction to consider it only on the issue of defendant's intent rather than as evidence that he was a criminal generally. Elkin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5832 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 1 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

122. Defendant was entitled to a new trial on two counts of aggravated sexual abuse of a child where the trial court reversibly erred by admitting the testimony of the officer and a child protective services investigator regarding the victim's prior statements because it was inadmissible impeachment evidence of the victim's trial testimony, during which she recanted her allegations against defendant; the error was not harmless because without the investigator's testimony, the State would not have proven penetration. Klein v. State, 191 S.W.3d 766, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2790 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

123. In a trial for indecency with a child, testimony from a parole officer that defendant was restricted from contact with children was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the testimony was highly probative of intent; it indicated that defendant knew that contact with a child was prohibited and thus showed that his questionable behavior around the victim did not have an alternative explanation. Turner v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 944 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 2 2006).

124. In defendant's indecency with a child case, although the extraneous offense evidence of other sexual offenses against young boys was inadmissible to confront false-impression evidence, the State's alternate reason, that the extraneous offense evidence was admissible to rebut defensive theories propounded by defendant, was a proper basis for the admission of the extraneous offense evidence. Blackwell v. State, 193 S.W.3d 1, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 903 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

125. In defendant's indecency with a child case, defendant's extraneous sexual offenses were admissible to rebut the defensive theory that he lacked the intent to have sexual contact with the victim because, by asserting that defendant was a regular parent who did a good job of raising two other young boys, he impliedly suggested that he lacked the intent to have sexual contact with the victim. Blackwell v. State, 193 S.W.3d 1, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 903 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

126. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's having solicited the third party to have sexual intercourse with the minor; the State needed the evidence because defendant denied having any type of sexual contact with the victim and contended she was fabricating the allegations against him. The factors weighed in favor of admissibility; and the trial court gave a limiting instruction, minimizing any impermissible inference of character conformity. Comeaux v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3748 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 17 2005).

127. In a trial for sexual assault, defendant failed to object on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 403 to an expert witness's use of the term "survivor" when describing the procedures involved in administering a sexual assault examination. Defendant therefore waived that issue on appeal. King v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2568 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 6 2005).

128. Admission of both a transcript and tape of a conversation between defendant and the victim during punishment phase after defendant pleaded guilty to aggravated sexual assault of a child was proper, as the admission of the tape and transcript was more probative than prejudicial; the telephone conversation showed, among other things, defendant's relationship with the victim, and his lack of remorse. Maynard v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 666 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 27 2005).

129. In an indecency with a child case, because intent to satisfy sexual appetite was an element of the crime, the victim's younger sister's testimony that defendant had "french" kissed her when he took her alone for a ride and asked that she not tell anyone was relevant; thus, the trial court properly allowed it. Further, this evidence showing that defendant acted inappropriately with another young girl was highly probative, making the fact of defendant's sexual contact with the victim more probable, gave credibility to the victim's complaint, and diminished defendant's credibility. Mejia v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11615 (Tex. App. Tyler Dec. 22 2004).

130. In a trial for child sexual assault, the victim's medical records, containing her statement about prior incidents, were properly admitted. The evidence was probative of both the previous relationship between defendant and the victim and of defendant's state of mind; the evidence is not graphically prejudicial, providing no details of the purported prior incident. Perez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11395 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 16 2004).

131. In a defendant's trial for indecency with his granddaughter, testimony was properly admitted from defendant's stepdaughter that he had "messed around" with her and her sister, after defendant testified in his own defense and denied sexually abusing his two stepdaughters or ever having had a similar problem in his life. Green v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8523 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 23 2004).

132. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence that defendant had sexually assaulted another woman approximately three months prior to the instant assault where the state was not allowed to use the extraneous sexual assault evidence until defendant had presented his defensive theory of consent in his testimony. Martin v. State, 144 S.W.3d 29, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7755 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2004), affirmed by 173 S.W.3d 463, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1618 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

133. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, although the sexually explicit images that defendant showed to the victim had the potential to impress the jury, they were not so prejudicial as to affect the jury in an irrational manner. While sexually related misconduct and misconduct involving children was inherently inflammatory, the computer images did not create a grave potential for the jury to find defendant guilty on an improper basis; thus, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, the probative value of the images was not substantially outweighed by their unfair prejudice, and they were admissible into evidence. Pinson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6916 (Tex. App. El Paso July 29 2004).

134. Where defendant was charged with two counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child, photographs of the genitalia of the two victims photographs depicting penetrating trauma to the genitalia of the two complainants was admissible as the photographs were not gruesome, and they actually served a medical purpose since they helped explain and illustrate the doctor's findings that one child suffered "penetrative vaginal trauma." Umphres v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5737 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 25 2004).

135. In a sexual assault case, court properly admitted photographs of injuries to the victim where the photographs were of average size, in color, and few in number, the injuries had been testified to by the victim, but because they had healed by the time of trial, there were no other available means to demonstrate that they had been sustained, as no other witnesses testified to having observed the injuries, and although the victim was naked in the photographs and the pictures were close-up shots, that was necessary given the nature of the injuries, i.e., a series of bites on the genital area. Thus, the probative value of the four photographs outweighed their potentially prejudicial effect. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

136. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by taking judicial notice of defendant's birth date where the alleged discrepancy regarding defendant's date of birth was not reflected in the appellate record, and as to the age difference, the victim testified without objection that she was 14 years old and that defendant told her he was 35 years old. The jury could also draw its own conclusions from the appearance of the victim and defendant in the courtroom. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2878 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 927, 125 S. Ct. 1652, 161 L. Ed. 2d 489, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2556, 73 U.S.L.W. 3556 (2005).

137. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err in permitting the victim's stepfather to testify that defendant told him that he, defendant, did not know the victim's age and was sorry about what had happened where, although defendant's statements fell short of an express confession of guilt, they could reasonably have been understood as an admission of improper conduct given the circumstances under which they were made. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2878 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 927, 125 S. Ct. 1652, 161 L. Ed. 2d 489, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2556, 73 U.S.L.W. 3556 (2005).

138. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err in permitting the victim's stepfather to testify that he saw defendant in the parking lot of the family's apartment complex a few weeks after the victim made her outcry where that evidence tended to corroborate the victim's testimony and was not, in itself, evidence of misconduct or bad character. The prosecutors' description of defendant as a "sexual predator" was a logical inference from his overall behavior as shown by the victim's testimony. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2878 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 927, 125 S. Ct. 1652, 161 L. Ed. 2d 489, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2556, 73 U.S.L.W. 3556 (2005).

139. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, a court did not err in admitting evidence of defendant's physical abuse of the complainant where, once the trial court determined that the physical assault evidence was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, it was incumbent upon defendant to ask the trial court to exclude the evidence by its authority under Tex. R. Evid. 403, on the ground that the probative value of the evidence was nevertheless substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice; defendant did not object, and it was presumed from the record that the trial court conducted the balancing test and found the evidence more probative than prejudicial. Joseph v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2945 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 1, 2004).

140. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, a court did not err in the sentencing phase, by admitting a videotape depicting him engaging in sexual activity with an unidentified adult female where the State's attempt to establish defendant's character for sexual depravity was a legitimate purpose for permitting the videotape to be shown. Moreover, even if the trial court committed error in permitting the videotape to be played to the jury, the record did not necessarily establish that defendant suffered harm from its admission; as a result of a prior felony conviction, the applicable punishment range for the conviction for indecency with a child was enhanced to the range of 5 to 99 years or life. Chambers v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2693 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 25 2004).

141. In defendant's trial on two counts of indecency with a child, testimony from defendant's ex-wife that defendant occasionally paraded around in front of his minor daughters, the complainants, in the nude with an erection was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and, thus, admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402, and its prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the State had to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant had contact with the complainants and the contact was done for his sexual gratification, and because the evidence was relevant to prove sexual motive in as much as the manner that defendant acted around his own children was the only proof of defendant's possible sexual motive if the touching did in fact occur. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Adults : Elements

142. Probative value of the prior sexual assault was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because the evidence was very compelling regarding the issue of consent as the two assaults were very similar to each other, the trial court gave a limiting instruction, the presentation of the evidence took less than a complete day of the trial, and the State needed the evidence to show that the sexual assault against the instant victim was without her consent. Morales v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 312, 2014 WL 108770 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 10 2014).

143. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of his wife, who recanted in her trial testimony, there was no error in allowing the State to impeach the victim with a prior inconsistent statement about how she broke her nose six months before the charged assault; to the extent that defendant argued the evidence was inadmissible under under Tex. R. Evid. 403, he did not object on that basis in the trial court and the issue was waived under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Davis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 352 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 18 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

144. In defendant's trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child under fourteen years of age, evidence from two of the victim's cousins that defendant also molested them while they were visiting defendant and sleeping in the same bed with the victim was contextual and therefore admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b). Doss v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5702 (Tex. App. Dallas May 28 2014).

145. In a case in which defendant was found guilty of two counts of indecency with a child for the sexual abuse of his granddaughter, a prior victim's testimony that defendant, a family friend, sexually assaulted her when she was seven years old was probative to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication and was admissible. Bible v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8354 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 10 2013).

146. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a case in which defendant was convicted of continuous sexual abuse of a child, his two daughters, by admitting the testimony of an investigator for the district attorney's office over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because defendant's viewing of child pornography, specifically father-daughter pornography-even on a different computer than the one he used when he lived with his family-tended to corroborate the victims' testimony, and because the investigator's testimony had little potential to impress on the jury in some irrational way, as the State offered only the testimony about the searches, not the images or videos found on defendant's laptop. Moreover, the investigator's testimony took very little time to develop, and the State needed the evidence of defendant's searches for "daddy" plus "daughter" plus "images" or "videos" to lend credibility to other testimony. Watkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1512, 2013 WL 531062 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 14 2013).

147. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault on a child, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting into evidence a videotape depicting defendant and his ex-wife acting out a father/daughter fantasy. Richert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7719 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

148. Defendant did not preserve a challenge under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to testimony regarding other acts of child sexual abuse because his only objection was under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Richert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7719 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

149. In a trial for indecency with a child, there was no reversible error in admitting a statement by the complainant's mother about her personal feelings of guilt when she learned that the child's extra money did not come from stealing, for which she had been punished; any error was harmless because the comment was very brief and was unrelated to defendant's guilt, it was not emphasized by either side, and there was substantial evidence of guilt. Santos v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3360, 2012 WL 1501074 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 30 2012).

150. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, the evidence of harsh discipline imposed by defendant on his four children, including the victim of the aggravated sexual assaults, was admissible because it had significant probative value as that evidence served to explain to the jury how defendant perpetrated frequent sexual assaults on his young daughter over a period of years. Soria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3345, 2012 WL 1570969 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 27 2012).

151. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not err when it ruled that the videotape showing the struggle that occurred when the police removed defendant from his jail cell was irrelevant in the context of defendant's aggravated sexual assault charge against the child victim. Lopez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 676, 2012 WL 256103 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 26 2012).

152. In defendant's sexual assault on a child case, the victim's testimony about her extraneous sexual encounters with defendant was not likely to create such prejudice in the juror's minds that they would be unable to consider the evidence for its proper purpose because the portions of her testimony detailing the prior sexual activities were short, and prior to the testimony and in the jury charge, the trial court specifically instructed the jury about how to consider evidence concerning the prior sexual encounters. Chang Hyeong Lee v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3623, 2011 WL 1833142 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2011).

153. In a trial for indecency with a child, there was no error under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 1.04 in excluding evidence that a third person known to the complainant's mother had sex offender status. That evidence could have been found more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because there was no evidence that the third person had any opportunity to molest the complainant. Welch v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2692, 2011 WL 1364970 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 12 2011).

154. In a situation where a few factors weighed against admitting the testimony of two witnesses who were also abused as children by defendant, and a few factors weighed in favor of admitting their testimony, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the witnesses' testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because 1) without their testimony, the State's case would have basically come down to the victim's word against defendant's word; 2) the evidence did not tend to confuse or distract the jury as their testimony was straightforward and directly relevant to whether defendant abused the victim; 3) their testimony concerned matters easily comprehensible by laypeople; 4) the evidence was not given undue weight by the jury as the witnesses were on the stand for relatively brief periods of time; and 5) the evidence was not too time-consuming or repetitive. Gaytan v. State, 331 S.W.3d 218, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 444 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 21 2011).

155. In a trial for child sexual assault, admitting testimony about a phone conversation between defendant and his priest did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 because defendant's statements that he was getting help and had confessed were probative of guilt, the testimony likely did not impress the jury in an irrational way, and the evidence was necessary to rebut defendant's claim that the complainant fabricated the allegation. Gutierrez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8952, 2010 WL 4484350 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2010).

156. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting testimony from a forensic examiner who interviewed the complainant. The testimony was probative as it served to rebut defendant's claim that the complainant fabricated her allegations, and it did not tempt the jury to find defendant guilty on improper grounds. Gutierrez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8952, 2010 WL 4484350 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2010).

157. In a trial for sexual assault of a child there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403) when the trial court admitted extraneous-act evidence about defendant's inappropriate interaction with another student in order to rebut a defense theory of fabrication. The State's need could be found considerable, as there were no witnesses or physical evidence, and the tendency to suggest a verdict on an improper basis was counterbalanced to some extent by the trial court's limiting instruction. James v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1337, 2010 WL 654522 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 24 2010).

158. In a child sexual assault case involving a victim who was 10 at the time of the offenses and 24 at the time of trial, evidence of extraneous offenses was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 to rebut defensive theories that defendant lacked opportunity and that the complainant fabricated his allegations. Given the similarities of action, place, and modus operandi, the time differential alone did not render the evidence irrelevant or lacking in probative value. Villa v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6965, 2009 WL 2914255 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2009).

159. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection was properly overruled; a miniature dildo possessed significant probative value based on one child's allegations, the presence of condoms in a married couple's home was not prejudicial, and the prejudicial value of an adult magazine was limited since there was other evidence of pornography in the home. Rousseau v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 380, 2009 WL 141857 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 22 2009).

160. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting evidence that guns and ammunition were found at the site of defendant's arrest because the evidence was probative of the victims' fear of defendant. The evidence did not divert the attention of the jury from the indicted offenses, given that it was admitted at the end of a multi-day trial in which the jury heard the details of numerous sexual assaults on several children. Harms v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8982 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 25 2008).

161. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting victim testimony about uncharged incidents. The evidence showed defendant's state of mind and the previous and subsequent relationship with the victims. Flores v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6580 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 27, 2008).

162. In a trial for child sexual abuse, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 when the trial court admitted evidence of extraneous assaults on defendant's spouse, which helped to establish the complainant's belief that defendant's threats were serious. Consuelo v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6203 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 15 2008).

163. In defendant's trial for sexual indecency with a child, evidence that defendant offered the victim cocaine and that they smoked it together in a hotel room where the assault took place was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because there was no showing that defendant's cocaine use had the potential to impress the jury in some irrational, indelible way. Madrid v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5834 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2008).

164. In a sexual assault of a child case. did not abuse its discretion by admitting extraneous offense evidence that defendant used cocaine at the time of the offense as it was same transaction contextual evidence that the State had to introduce. The record did not show that the evidence of defendant's cocaine usage had the potential to impress the jury in some irrational, indelible way, and any prejudice suffered by defendant was to some degree counterbalanced by the complainant's drug usage and her admission she had used it before. Madrid v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5838 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2008).

165. In defendant's child sexual assault case, the court properly allowed evidence that defendant "gave" the victim to his drug dealer in lieu of payment because, although the testimony about what the drug dealer did to her and defendant's involvement might have inflamed the jury, the incident, although heinous, paled in comparison to the victim's graphic testimony about defendant's repeated sexual assaults of her, and the brief testimony about the incident with the drug dealer was followed by a specific limiting instruction Sanders v. State, 255 S.W.3d 754, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3413 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

166. Although the medical records detailing the sexual assault of the 10-year-old complainant were cumulative because they contained the same information that the complainant had already testified to, they were not needlessly cumulative within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 403; thus, the trial court properly overruled defendant's cumulative evidence objection. Davidson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9178 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 25 2006).

167. In a sexual assault of a child case, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, extraneous offense evidence involving previous sexual contacts between defendant and the complainant, was probative of the state of mind of defendant and the complainant, and illustrated the nature of the relationship between complainant and defendant; also, evidence of past sexual contact between the complainant and defendant placed the underlying allegations in the broader context of the relationship between the two and aided in explaining acts that would not otherwise appear plausible; thus, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not err in concluding that the probative value of the evidence of the extraneous offenses was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice and in admitting the complainant's testimony about them. Parker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8834 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 12 2006).

168. In a trial for indecency with a child, it was proper to exclude evidence of conduct by the complainant's mother, such as extramarital affairs and involvement in pornography and drug abuse, because the probative value in establishing a motive for the complainant to make false accusations against defendant was low. Jimenez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6538 (Tex. App. Waco July 26 2006).

169. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted expert testimony regarding sadism because the alleged abuse was sadistic in nature, the expert's testimony regarding sadism shed light on such relevant issues as how the abuse might have injured and psychologically affected the victims, how the victims might have been threatened and placed in fear, and whether any behavior the victims engaged in with each other might have been coerced. Hatter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4516 (Tex. App. Austin May 26 2006).

170. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining the admission of the photographs was not substantially more prejudicial than probative because the complainant could not recall the precise dates on which defendant had intercourse with her, but she testified that he had sex with her on the days he photographed her. Thus, the photographs established that the acts of sexual abuse occurred during a period that was 30 or more days in duration, a necessary element of the crime of continuous sexual abuse of a child. Moreno v. State, 409 S.W.3d 723, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8744 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 16 2013).

171. In an inmate's trial for the sexual assault of another inmate while both were in a trustee unit, evidence that defendant told the victim he had been in prison and was probably going back did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 because he was already incarcerated, and the evidence explained why the victim feared defendant, although the victim was larger. Esparza v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9175, 2014 WL 4179435 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 20 2014).

172. In a sexual assault case alleging use of a date rape drug, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 in admitting testimony from women other than the complainant who claimed to have been drugged by defendant. Corbo v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7809, 2009 WL 5551376 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 24 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : General Overview

173. Evidence of a police officer's administration of a modified alphabet test to defendant suspected of driving while intoxicated (DWI) was properly admitted because it was highly probative of whether defendant had the normal use of her mental faculties. The evidence did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational but indelible way because intoxication and, more specifically, defendant's loss of her normal mental or physical faculties was among the issues that a jury had to consider in a DWI trial, and, furthermore, the evidence was addressed for only a very brief period of time. Bergman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3046 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 21 2005).

174. Trial court properly admitted intoxilyzer test results for tests that were administered approximately one hour after defendant's stop and which indicated that defendant had consumed alcohol because they tended to make it more probable that defendant was intoxicated at the time of driving under both the per se and impairment definitions of intoxication. Furthermore, the test results were not unfairly prejudicial because they related directly to a charged offense, and, as a result, the jury could not be distracted away from the charged offense regardless of the required time to present the results. Trillo v. State, 165 S.W.3d 763, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2792 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

175. Where defendant was tried for driving while intoxicated, the trial court did not err by admitting the breath test evidence taken approximately eighty minutes after she stopped driving showing a BAC level of 0.160 and 0.154. The breath test results were not unfairly prejudicial because the evidence related directly to the charged offense of DWI. Stewart v. State, 162 S.W.3d 269, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1088 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

176. Balancing all the factors, the appellate court found there was not a clear disparity between the degree of prejudice of defendant's Intoxilyzer results and their probative value. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence of the results of the Intoxilyzer without extrapolation. Adams v. State, 156 S.W.3d 152, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 567 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

177. In a trial for felony driving while intoxicated (DWI), a trial court did not violate Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.01 or Tex. R. Evid. 403 when it allowed the prosecution to refer to a stipulation in which defendant admitted to two prior DWI convictions while the indictment was being read to the jury, during voir dire, and in opening and closing arguments, because the prior convictions were elements of a felony DWI offense, and art. 36.01 suggested by negative implication that the jurisdictional elements of an offense could be read from an indictment to a jury. Hollen v. State, 117 S.W.3d 798, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 302 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003).

178. Where defendant offered to stipulate that jurisdictional convictions existed, the probative value of evidence of the same convictions was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, and under Tex. R. Evid. 403, admission of defendant's prior DWI convictions was error; thus, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07(2)(a), the conviction should not be based on the assumption that the accused was a criminal generally or that he was a person of bad character. Robles v. State, 85 S.W.3d 211, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 97 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence

179. In weighing the factors under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's blood alcohol concentration (BAC) without extrapolating back to the time of the offense. The BAC made it more likely that defendant had an illegal amount of alcohol in her blood at the time of the accident; the test results also helped the State establish that defendant's symptoms were due to intoxication and not the aftereffects of the crash; and the results spoke directly to the charged offense and did not impact the jury in an irrational way. Hernandez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3115, 2011 WL 1631011 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 27 2011).

180. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant failed to preserve an error based on Tex. R. Evid. 403 relating to a trial court's decision to grant the State's motion in limine, which sought to exclude the quantitative results of a portable breath test. Defendant did not attempt to offer the evidence, and he did not object to the trial testimony. Bookman v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6012 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 6 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Hit & Run Accidents : General Overview

181. In a trial for failing to stop and give information after a motor vehicle accident, defendant's objection to testimony about a wreck with a semi on relevance grounds was not sufficient to require a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test. Dudley v. State, 205 S.W.3d 82, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8564 (Tex. App. Tyler 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Vehicular Homicide : Elements

182. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's blood alcohol test results into evidence during her intoxication manslaughter trial because: (1) the results were probative on the issue of whether defendant was intoxicated, as she denied consuming any alcohol; (2) the result was the only direct evidence establishing that defendant had consumed alcohol; (3) it was not unfairly prejudicial because it related directly the an element of the charged offense; and (4) the time to present the evidence was relatively short. Damon v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4017, 2011 WL 2112807 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 26 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Weapons : General Overview

183. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony that the pistol used in the shooting was stolen despite defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the record showed that the probative force and need for the evidence was low, and there was a slight tendency that the evidence would suggest an improper basis for decision, distract the jury from the main issue, or would be given undue weight. The evidence took very little time to present and was not cumulative. Codina v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6550, 2010 WL 3192966 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 13 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Weapons : Possession : General Overview

184. Trial court did not err by allowing the State to present evidence that defendant was in possession of a weapon the day before the murder under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because that evidence made it more probable that defendant used that gun to cause the victim's death. The evidence did not suggest a decision on an improper basis, nor did it have the tendency to confuse or distract the jury, and it did not take an inordinate amount of time to present to the jury. Benitez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9871, 2011 WL 6306643 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 15 2011).

185. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting evidence that guns and ammunition were found at the site of defendant's arrest because the evidence was probative of the victims' fear of defendant. The evidence did not divert the attention of the jury from the indicted offenses, given that it was admitted at the end of a multi-day trial in which the jury heard the details of numerous sexual assaults on several children. Harms v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8982 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 25 2008).

186. In a trial for possession of marihuana and a bulletproof vest, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted 11 firearms into evidence during the guilt/innocence phase of trial over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection; the evidence was both probative and necessary as a circumstance tending to affirmatively link defendant to the bulletproof vest and marihuana, thereby helping to make more probable a fact of consequence: his knowing and intentional possession of those items. Hargrove v. State, 211 S.W.3d 379, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6160 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Interrogation : General Overview

187. Probative value of defendant's statement was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given the inability of the victims to positively identify defendant and the risk that a jailhouse informant's testimony could have made him appear less than credible. Malone v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1786, 2010 WL 851409 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 11 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Interrogation : Noncustodial Confessions & Statements

188. Motion to suppress statements given to hospital personnel after a police officer was killed was properly denied because they were not statements given as the result of an interrogation; moreover, the the probative value of the statements was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice since they were probative of defendant's intent and of whether defendant knew that the victim was a police officer at the time of the shooting. Escamilla v. State, 143 S.W.3d 814, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1032 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 950, 125 S. Ct. 1697, 161 L. Ed. 2d 528, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2827, 73 U.S.L.W. 3569 (2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Subpoenas : Challenges & Modifications

189. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by quashing defendant's subpoena of the school principal because her testimony would not have been material, as the evidence was undisputed that defendant was absent from the scene at the school when the social worker made the decision and notified the other family members that the children would be removed. Wyatt v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1308, 2012 WL 512654 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 16 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Preliminary Proceedings : Pretrial Diversion : Violations

190. In a case involving a revocation of deferred adjudication community supervision, a trial court did not err in considering all of the violations alleged by the State because defendant failed to make an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Campbell v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3009, 2009 WL 1161785 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Bail : General Overview

191. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the evidence of defendant's bond papers for unrelated misdemeanor offenses from a house adjacent to the house where the shooting occurred was relevant and probative because (1) it established or suggested that the dwelling next to the murder scene was defendant's house or home base, which was a contested issue; and (2) it buttressed the State's argument that defendant's flight to Mexico was indicative of guilt; in addition, because the charged offense of murder was so weighty, it was unlikely that any impression that evidence might have made on the jury would overcome their judgment; furthermore, the amount of time needed to develop the evidence was low, and the need for the evidence was high as it placed defendant near the scene of the shooting and explained his flight to Mexico. Arroyo v. State, 259 S.W.3d 831, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1519 (Tex. App. Tyler 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Eyewitness Identification : Fair Identification Requirement

192. In an aggravated robbery case, balancing the prejudicial nature of the evidence against its probative value, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting an eyewitness's tentative identification testimony where the State presented other probative identification evidence, the victim identified defendant as the robber, but defendant attacked their identification based on their initial statements to police that the robber was Hispanic. Accordingly, the State needed the witness's tentative identification testimony to help prove the contested issue of identity. McKnight v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4205 (Tex. App. Dallas June 1 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Eyewitness Identification : Photo Identifications

193. Identification of defendant by the witness who stated that she was afraid to identify defendant from a photo lineup was highly probative evidence for the State in the murder case, and while certainly prejudicial to defendant, it was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Benavides v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4971, 2012 WL 2353731 (Tex. App. Dallas June 21 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Joinder & Severance : Severance of Offenses

194. In a murder trial, there was no "effective denial" of defendant's severance right when the trial court admitted evidence of the purported attempt to dispose of the body. Although relevant to a severed charge for tampering with evidence, the evidence was also relevant to the murder charge and under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not unduly prejudicial, given that it was clear that defendant did not physically participate in transporting or disposing of the body. King v. State, 189 S.W.3d 347, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2100 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Guilty Pleas : Admissibility at Trial

195. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant's letter to an officer regarding his plea agreement because the statements were not covered by Tex. R. Evid. 410. In addition, the letter's probative value was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the letter was probative of whether defendant committed the charged offense; (2) given the brevity and clarity of the letter and the fact that it was directly related to the charged offense, the amount of time required to develop it was negligible; and (3) the letter was important to the prosecution's case and had a significant tendency to make defendant's guilt more probable. Willis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5931, 2010 WL 2935772 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 28 2010).

196. In a murder trial, no harm occurred when the trial court admitted tape-recorded phone conversations that included defendant's statement about a plea offer on an unrelated offense; defendant's remark was in the middle of the State's first tape-recorded conversation, it was not singled out at trial, and the State did not attempt to introduce other evidence regarding the previous offense. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9519 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 5 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Sentencing

197. Defendant failed to prove that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to 214 pages of allegedly improper character evidence contained in the presentence investigation report because: (1) defendant failed to rebut the presumption that his counsel's decisions were reasonable, as there was no evidence from counsel explaining his actions; (2) defendant did not show that counsel's performance was deficient as he cited no authority supporting his argument that the number of statements was unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403; and (3) defendant failed to show that his 20-year sentence for intoxication manslaughter would have been different, as defendant was drunk when he drove over 90 miles per hour on a highway, hitting two cars and killing the victim. Sanchez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 822, 2013 WL 328954 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 29 2013).

198. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the State's offer of four extraneous offenses during sentencing and affirmatively stipulating to their admissibility because the record was silent concerning counsel's reasons for not objecting and counsel could have concluded that an objection would have been overruled. Crocker v. State, 441 S.W.3d 306, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 643, 2013 WL 269122 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 24 2013).

199. Where the record was silent as to why defense counsel elected not to object during the penalty phase of trial to the admission of evidence concerning defendant's assaults of his girlfriend, a reviewing court could not say that counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the evidence on the ground that its relevance was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Arnolie v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2673 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 5 2012).

200. In a case in which a jury had convicted a habeas corpus applicant of possession of a controlled substance, methamphetamine, in the amount of 200 grams or more, but less than 400 grams, applicant demonstrated that trial counsel was deficient at the punishment stage of trial because counsel failed to: (1) object to a DEA agent's testimony on the dangers and societal costs caused by methamphetamine constituted deficient performance; (2) request pre-trial notice of the State's experts; (3) determine that a DEA agent would testify about methamphetamine addiction; (4) properly object to the agent's testimony about addiction and the number of people who could get high from the methamphetamine that applicant possessed; and (5) call an expert in rebuttal. During the punishment stage of trial, the prosecutors asked for a life sentence, relying heavily on the objectionable testimony that was introduced during both phases of trial, and because applicant had received a life sentence, the maximum sentence available for her offense, she had shown that there was a reasonable probability--one sufficient to undermine confidence in the result--that the outcome at the punishment stage would have been different but for her counsel's deficient performance. Ex Parte Lane, 303 S.W.3d 702, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1750 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

201. Habeas petitioner's counsel's failure to object to the admission of evidence that the petitioner had used and sold illegal drugs roughly 10 years before his arrest for sex crimes was not relevant to the jury's sentencing determination. Any probative value the petitioner's involvement with illegal drugs may have had with respect to determining the appropriate length of the petitioner's sentence was far outweighed by the danger that it would give rise to unfair prejudice. Ward v. Dretke, 420 F.3d 479, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 16596 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1621, 164 L. Ed. 2d 334, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2520, 74 U.S.L.W. 3543 (U.S. 2006).

202. Habeas petitioner's counsel's failure to object to the admission during the jury's sentencing determination of images of adult bestiality taken from the petitioner's computer. The images did not form part of the factual basis for the charges to which the petitioner had plead guilty, and had no relevance to the jury's sentencing determination apart from demonstrating the depths of depravity to which the petitioner had sunk; even if the evidence were relevant in some tangential way to the determination of his sentence, it was highly probable that considerations of unfair prejudice would have sufficed to keep this evidence from the jury. Ward v. Dretke, 420 F.3d 479, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 16596 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1621, 164 L. Ed. 2d 334, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2520, 74 U.S.L.W. 3543 (U.S. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Tests

203. In a trial for aggravated-sexual assault of a child, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to evidence of extraneous acts against the same victim because the evidence was probative of defendant's relationship with the victim (his nephew), increased the probability that defendant would have felt sufficiently confident to assault the victim on the date charged, and helped explain why there was a delay in the victim's outcry. Burke v. State, 371 S.W.3d 252, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8368, 2011 WL 5023008 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 20 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

204. In case where defendant was convicted of felony murder and intentionally or knowingly causing serious bodily injury to a child, her daughter, counsel's failure to object to the testimony of defendant's sister that she once observed defendant strike the child with a belt did not constitute ineffective assistance because the trial court could have concluded that the probative value of the sister's testimony was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice to defendant as the testimony was probative not only as to the type of discipline defendant imposed on the child but also as to defendant's credibility because she told an officer that she only physically disciplined the child with her hand. Sandoval v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8608 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 7 2014).

205. Defendant did not show that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to specifically include a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection in his objection to testimony because trial counsel reasonably could have concluded that the testimony described past criminal behavior and not just inchoate statements. Perkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15003, 2013 WL 6569874 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 12 2013).

206. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to evidence that defendant viewed pornography and consumed alcohol under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the failure to object could have been based on trial strategy and therefore the court had to presume counsel's performance was adequate. Weeks v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1428, 2013 WL 557015 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 14 2013).

207. In defendant's unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the admission of defendant's prior felonies because counsel could have concluded that it would be better for the jury to be aware that the prior convictions had been for nonviolent offenses such as failing to register as a sex offender than to have the jury potentially be concerned about a violent felon possessing a gun. Tapps v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2809 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 17 2008).

208. Even though it was error to admit evidence of defendant's prior conviction of felony driving while intoxicated (DWI), the inmate could not show that he was prejudiced, and therefore the inmate's petition for a writ of habeas corpus under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 11.072 was properly denied, because the convictions were read to the jury from the indictment at the beginning of the trial and in the jury charge and the indictment instructed the jury to disregard the previous convictions in deciding whether the inmate was guilty of the current DWI. Ex parte Thompson, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7190 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 30 2007).

209. Defense counsel was not ineffective for failing to request that the trial court conduct a balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the trial court rejected defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection, and therefore the court presumed that the trial court did conduct a balancing test. Hassenplug v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4998 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 28 2007).

210. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to the admission of photographs of defendant's nephew and testimony that the appearance of track-marks on one's inner arm indicated the use of intravenous drugs; even if the testimony was objectionable, no harm resulted from counsel's failure to object because there was no reasonable probability that the evidence contributed to the conviction. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

211. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object to an officer's statement that people associated with methamphetamine labs were dangerous because the statement provided support for the reasonableness of the officers' protective sweep and initial detention of the suspects; the probative value was not outweighed by any danger that the jurors would infer that defendant was dangerous because "dangerousness" was not an element of the crimes charged. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

212. In a murder case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to a witness' impeachment with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 607 because defendant did not show that the State called the witness with the primary intent of placing inadmissible substantive evidence in front of the jury. Torres v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10181 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2006).

213. In a murder case, as defendant offered no evidence that his counsel's decision not to request a limiting instruction and a corresponding jury instruction on reasonable doubt with respect to extraneous offense offenses introduced by the State fell below an objective standard of reasonableness under prevailing professional norms, he failed to show his counsel was ineffective; the decision not to do so could have been valid trial strategy. Given that defendant had previously testified in his defense that he had never before choked his wife, he could not show that the trial court would have committed an error in overruling a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection as the extraneous evidence could have been used to rebut a defensive theory. Mendez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6192 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 4 2005).

214. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child, defendant failed to show that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the introduction into evidence of his mental health records, which defendant claimed contained evidence of inadmissible extraneous bad conduct. Defendant was not prejudiced by the admission of the mental health records, because the victim's testimony alone was sufficient to support his conviction. Taylor v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4581 (Tex. App. Dallas May 20 2004).

215. In a driving while intoxicated case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to a recording of defendant's postarrest phone conversation where, during the conversation, defendant was argumentative and used offensive language; the conversation was relevant because it provided a physical exemplar of defendant's demeanor and manner of speech, which could have been used by the jury as evidence of defendant's intoxication level. Campbell v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3509 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 21 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Closing Arguments : General Overview

216. Defendant failed to preserve error as to improper jury argument about his arrest because he failed to raise that objection at trial and because other evidence about his arrest was admitted without objection. Gonzales v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4020 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 11 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Confrontation

217. In an assault case, there was no reversible error based on hearsay, relevance, undue prejudice, improper opinion, and violations of the confrontation clause because the challenged evidence had come in during other portions of the trial without objection. Hecht v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 521, 2009 WL 200979 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 29 2009).

218. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by limiting defendant's cross-examination of the child victim by prohibiting questions about prior molestation accusations and threats made by the victim to impeach his credibility because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and that the Confrontation Clause did not mandate its admission; the alleged false accusations the victim made towards others occurred over a year after the instant offense by defendant, there was no evidence at trial that the victim had a propensity to lie, and the victim denied making any threats or accusations; the victim's testimony concerning false accusations was likely to unduly prejudice and confuse the jury because the record indicated that his threats were not identical to his accusation against defendant. Billodeau v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4462 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 7 2007).

219. Officer testified as to statements defendant's wife and stepdaughter, the complainants, made in an alleged family violence situation; however, the admission of the hearsay statements did not violate the Confrontation Clause because both complainants testified; even if the State called the complainants to testify so that otherwise inadmissible prior inconsistent statements could be admitted, there was no harm committed because the jury had already heard the substance of the complainants' statements through a police officers' statements. Villarreal v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6304 (Tex. App. Austin July 21 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Due Process

220. In defendant's child sexual abuse case, defendant's right to present a defense was not violated by the exclusion of "alternative perpetrator" evidence because the fact that the "alternative perpetrator" abused his sister when she was between two and five years old, or that he admitted to sexually abusing children at his church, did not show that he committed any crime against the victim; defendant established no nexus between the "alternative perpetrator" and the crime charged, and the threat of confusing the jury with speculative, meager evidence was too high to properly admit the evidence. Ramirez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7156 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 15 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Cross-Examination

221. Trial court did not impermissibly restrict appellant's right to cross-examine the State's psychologist about his rate of error during proceedings to commit him as a sexually violent predator because it could have reasonably concluded that the jury would have been confused. In re Alexander, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12077, 2013 WL 5425557 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 26 2013).

222. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in limiting defendant's cross-examination of a child sexual assault complainant regarding his threats to falsely accuse a neighbor and her adult son of molestation where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and that the Confrontation Clause did not mandate its admission because the alleged threats, which the complainant denied having made, took place over a year after the instant offense by defendant, there was no evidence at trial that the complainant had a propensity to lie or a vengeful temper toward adults prior to or upon the complainant's allegation toward defendant, and the complainant's threats against the neighbor and her son were not identical, as defendant urged, to the complainant's accusation against defendant. Billodeau v. State, 263 S.W.3d 318, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6404 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

223. Court did not violate defendant's right to confrontation under the Sixth Amendment in a sexual assault on a child case by limiting cross examination of the victim and his mother about the victim's alleged behavioral problems because the evidence in question was not relevant to punishment under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07; in addition, because Tex. R. Evid. 403 fell within the exceptions to the Confrontation Clause, the trial court did not violate the Confrontation Clause in limiting defendant's cross examination. Dinger v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS

4767 (Tex. App. Tyler June 20 2007).

224. During defendant's trial for indecent exposure, the trial court properly excluded evidence that the victim called the police regarding various disturbances at her residence on several occasions following the report of exposure because the decision was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; the trial court maintained broad discretion to impose reasonable limits on cross-examination to avoid harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, endangering the witness, and the injection of cumulative and collateral evidence, and, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), specific instances of conduct, other than conviction of a crime, when offered to attack the witness's credibility could not be explored on cross-examination. Tennison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2120 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 16 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Judicial Discretion

225. Court of appeals failed to properly defer to a trial court's decision where the trial court was within its discretion to hold that the probative value of evidence of a handgun and of defendant's parole status was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given that the jury was not informed of the crime for which defendant was on parole, that the strength or weakness of the handgun's connection to defendant reflected equally on the issues of probative value and prejudice, and that there was reason to believe that the State had a significant need for the evidence. Powell v. State, 189 S.W.3d 285, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 681 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

226. Admission of photographic evidence is committed to the discretion of the trial court. Turner v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7903 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Motions for Mistrial

227. Trial court did not err in denying a mistrial in an aggravated assault case because an instruction to disregard was sufficient to cure any prejudice resulting from the prosecutor's asking a witness whether she was aware of other shootings that had taken place in the area and the witness' reply that she had heard about it; there was no Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) violation because defendant was not clearly implicated in an extraneous offense, and the question was not extremely inflammatory under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Holland v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Prison Attire & Restraints

228. Video (but not audio) of defendant's interview with a detective was properly excluded because the jury could discern that defendant was in custody, given the venue; his ill-fitting, monochrome jail uniform with the name of a county jail stenciled on the back; and a plastic identification bracelet. The court deferred to the trial court's finding that the probative value was diminished by the State's ability to recreate defendant's pantomime of the events in question through its witness. State v. Pringle, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7671 (Tex. App. Tyler June 25 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Credibility

229. Defendant was convicted for organized criminal activity based on gambling promotion, because he organized a raffle drawing to benefit his political campaign, his employees distributed and sold raffle tickets, and defendant deposited the ticket sales proceeds into his bank account. The trial court did not err by excluding evidence attacking the credibility of the State's witnesses who were defendant's former employees, because the jury was aware that all three witnesses had possible motives to make false accusations; the evidence tended to be needlessly cumulative, risked confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. Evans v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1430, 2014 WL 425613 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2014).

230. Court properly limited cross-examination of a witness because defendant's attempt to use an instance during an officer's career in which he wrote "phantom" warning citations was nothing more than an instance of wrongdoing in his life and was not shown to bear on his general reputation for truthfulness. There was nothing which revealed that the act of wrongdoing created a bias on the part of the officer against defendant or caused the officer to have a motive to testify untruthfully. McMillon v. State, 294 S.W.3d 198, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Impeachment

231. Trial court did not err during defendant's trial for indecency with a child when it allowed the prosecutor, for the limited purpose of impeachment, to question the victim's mother about her knowledge of defendant's prior convictions for aggravated sexual assault of two other children because the mother's testimony on direct examination by defendant's counsel that she had no reason to suspect that defendant would abuse her children opened the door and put at issue her credibility. Delacruz v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13492, 2013 WL 5890796 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 31 2013).

232. Because a witness's testimony was admissible only to rebut defendant's statement of good conduct with minors, a court should have given an instruction to use the testimony only in assessing defendant's credibility, not as proof that he committed the offense or as proof of a plan to have a sexual relationship with the victim. Daggett v. State, 187 S.W.3d 444, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2127 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

233. In an assault case, a trial court did not err by excluding evidence regarding a victim's suspicions that defendant was seeing another woman because, although the issue was properly preserved when defense counsel established the general subject matter of the intended cross-examination, the evidence did not show evidence of a mental condition; moreover, the evidence was cumulative at any rate because the victim had given direct testimony about mental illness. Mumphrey v. State, 155 S.W.3d 651, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 370 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

234. Where defendant was tried for murdering the victim in exchange for his wife's promise for a share of the insurance proceeds, the State's failure to charge the wife was irrelevant to the credibility of the State's key witness, defendant's girlfriend. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the proffered impeachment evidence. Day v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Austin July 15 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Presentation

235. Defendant was not entitled to any relief as to his conviction for burglary of a habitation because Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 provided that defendant waived the right to challenge the admission of the evidence of his accomplice's conviction for the burglary at defendant's trial by arguing at trial that the evidence of the accomplice's conviction was not relevant and raising the different argument on appeal that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because its prejudicial effect outweighed its probative value. Evans v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 2705 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 15 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Sequestration

236. Defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to the presence of the complainants at the punishment phase of trial did not comport with his appellate argument under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. arts. 36.06, 36.03 and Tex. R. Evid. 614, as required to preserve the issue. Reed v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1650, 2012 WL 662327 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 29 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : General Overview

237. Court properly excluded defendant's "alternative perpetrator" evidence because, although defendant suggested that the testimony of a witness raised the possibility that the child was injured before the time that defendant babysat for her, the testimony by the other witnesses offered no corroboration to that theory. To the extent that the proffered evidence would have been even marginally relevant to the defense theory, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that its probative value was substantially outweighed by confusing the issues or misleading the jury. Contreras v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 91, 2009 WL 50601 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 8 2009).

238. Although defendant's proffered alternative perpetrator evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because identity was a material issue in the case and vigorously contested at defendant's aggravated robbery trial, and although there was no danger that the evidence would create a side issue that would unduly distract the jury from the main issues under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the evidence addressed a material issue in the case, the trial court's exclusion of the evidence was not error because defendant failed to show the required nexus between the alleged alternative perpetrator and the offense-at-issue. Dickson v. State, 246 S.W.3d 733, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9859 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Right to Present

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Alibi

239. Officer was properly allowed to testify that defendant's alibi witness had stated that defendant was his boyfriend; the legitimate basis for the introduction of that statement was its impeachment value as a prior inconsistent statement indicating a closer emotional tie between the witness and defendant than the witness had admitted; the reviewing court was unconvinced that the suggestion of homosexuality impressed the jury in some irrational way and unfairly prejudiced the defense. McKay v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6736 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2006).

240. Extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 to refute defendant's alibi. Casique v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6517 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 16 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Burdens of Proof

241. In a murder trial, alternative perpetrator evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because defendant did not contend that the proffered evidence even identified a particular alternative perpetrator, much less that the asserted perpetrator committed some act directly connecting him or her with the murder. Mendez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7652, 2009 WL 3127483 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 30 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Diminished Capacity

242. Defendant who killed his brother with a hammer and who presented evidence of mental illness under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) was not then entitled to argue to the jury that defendant did not have the capacity to intentionally or knowingly perform the act. This evidence still had to meet the admissibility requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Jackson v. State, 160 S.W.3d 568, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 568 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Necessity

243. In defendant's aggravated kidnapping case, the court did not err by excluding evidence going to her professed motive to "protect her son" because the evidence would have interjected into trial an emotionally charged set of collateral issues with great potential to confuse and mislead the jury. Additionally, defendant failed to present legally sufficient evidence that she "reasonably believed" kidnapping the child was "immediately necessary" to avoid "imminent harm." Dewalt v. State, 307 S.W.3d 437, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 423 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 22 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Right to Present

244. Defendant failed to preserve for review her claim that she was deprived of her right to present a complete defense under the Sixth Amendment due to the fact that the trial court excluded from evidence a videotaped interview with the victim because at trial defendant relied on Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) but never asserted her right to present a complete defense and did not cite the Holmes case; her attorney's statement at the end of his bill of exception that defendant was denied her constitutional rights was insufficient preserve the Holmes issue for appeal. Even if the issue had been preserved, defendant failed to show that any constitutional error occurred because the trial court excluded the videotape based on Tex. R. Evid. 403 and the substance of the defense, that the videotape would have enabled the jury to judge whether the victim initially failed to implicate her mother because she was truly afraid, was presented to the jury, through cross-examination of the victim and a caseworker. Sanchez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10169, 2011 WL 6916418 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 28 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Self-Defense

245. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence of defendant's prior assault of another victim during his trial on charges of aggravated assault and manslaughter under Tex. R> Evid. 403 because it had high probative value on the issue of whether defendant was the aggressor in the instant offense. The prior crime was similar to the charged offenses and occurred only six months before the charged crimes. Render v. State, 347 S.W.3d 905, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6623 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 18 2011).

246. In an assault trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) in admitting evidence of an assault that defendant committed against his common-law wife to rebut his theory of self-defense. White v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5604, 2010 WL 2803018 (Tex. App. Eastland July 15 2010).

247. Because the extraneous-offense evidence was relevant to disprove defendant's claim of self-defense, the appellate court could not say the trial court abused its discretion in admitting the evidence on that basis; the foregoing evidence was probative and not substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice, where the extraneous offenses were similar to the charged offense and were therefore probative on the critical point at issue, defendant's status as an aggressor. Diogu v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7123 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 10 2004), appeal dismissed by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 184 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 12, 2006).

248. In the assault trial of a father who shot his son, the trial court properly excluded a post-shooting psychological evaluation of the son, and any evidence of the son's violent nature that surfaced after the shooting was at best only minimally relevant and was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or confusion of the issues concerning the father's assertion of self-defense. Iverson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7007 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 2 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Scienter : General Overview

249. In a trial for intoxication manslaughter, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in excluding expert testimony on defendant's mental state. Bayas v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5306, 2011 WL 2714114 (Tex. App. El Paso July 13 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Scienter : General Intent

250. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous assaults where they had sufficient similarities to the charged offense to have been introduced to show intent, and under the doctrine of chances those offenses had a multiplicative effect where each additional offense made the issue of intent more compelling, and the prejudicial effect of the evidence did not outweigh its probative value. Rickerson v. State, 138 S.W.3d 528, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4884 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Scienter : Knowledge

251. Trial court did not err in admitting items used in the manufacture of methamphetamine and amphetamine in the case against defendant for possession of amphetamine as these items went to the issue of knowledge or criminal intent which was an element in the possession case; thus the probative value of the items were not outweighed by their potential for prejudice. Popp v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 631 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 26 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Scienter : Specific Intent

252. Photographs of a victim who was shot in the eye, shown with her eyelid closed, were properly admitted because their prejudicial weight, if any, did not overcome their probative value with regard to the issue of transferred intent. Tucker v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6588 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 30 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Curative Instructions

253. In a case in which defendant was convicted of robbery under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 29.02, although defendant argued that the trial court erred in admitting over defense objection evidence of an extraneous offense, the robbery of another bank, during the State's case-in-chief, defendant did not explain in his briefing, nor did a reviewing court find evidence in the record, that a federal agent's fleeting reference to the other robbery was so inflammatory that it could not have been cured by the trial court's instruction. Accordingly, any possible error in admitting the testimony about the other robbery was cured by the trial court's instruction to disregard. Johnson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3337, 2009 WL 1331857 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 14 2009).

254. Trial court did not err in denying a mistrial in an aggravated assault case because an instruction to disregard was sufficient to cure any prejudice resulting from the prosecutor's asking a witness whether she was aware of other shootings that had taken place in the area and the witness' reply that she had heard about it; there was no Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) violation because defendant was not clearly implicated in an extraneous offense, and the question was not extremely inflammatory under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Holland v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Limiting Instructions

255. In drug and robbery case, although defendant's relevancy objection to evidence of other thefts sufficiently apprised the trial court of the nature of his complaint, where defendant did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and obtain a ruling as to whether the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, nor ask for a limiting instruction, defendant waived at trial any complaint over admission of evidence of extraneous thefts. Loftin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2651 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 25 2004).

256. Defendant was not entitled to any relief as to his conviction for burglary of a habitation because Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 provided that defendant waived the right to challenge the admission of the evidence of his accomplice's conviction for the burglary at defendant's trial by arguing at trial that the evidence of the accomplice's conviction was not relevant and raising the different argument on appeal that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R.

Evid. 403 because its prejudicial effect outweighed its probative value. Evans v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 2705 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 15 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Particular Instructions : Use of Particular Evidence

257. On review of appellant's conviction for aggravated sexual assault of a child, claims that the trial court erred under Tex. R. Evid. 403, by admitting evidence of threats the appellant made to child, were waived for failure to object at trial, and even if the claims had been preserved for review, limiting instructions given to the jury overruled any unfair prejudice. Mark v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 879 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 30 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Alternatives : Probation : Eligibility

258. FBI agent's testimony was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) as it reflected defendant's ongoing relationship, or defendant's willingness to maintain an ongoing relationship, with a known fugitive and was probative of defendant's character and suitability for community supervision, but it was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Jeffs v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3779, 2012 WL 1660612 (Tex. App. Austin May 10 2012).

259. In an aggravated sexual assault case, a trial court did not err by allowing evidence during the punishment phase under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) that defendant had molested another young girl 10 years after the crimes for which he was convicted because such evidence was useful in deciding if he was a good candidate for probation. The testimony of the girl who was the victim of the extraneous offense was sufficient to prove the occurrence of that assault, and the jury assessed only a mid-range punishment. Jackson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6443, 2009 WL 2517306 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 19 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Appeals : Appealability

260. By failing to object, defendant waived any error in the admission of evidence of a prior conviction for aggravated robbery at the punishment phase of trial. Williams v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6191, 2014 WL 2592991 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 10 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Appeals : Standards of Review : General Overview

261. In the sentencing phase of a trial for possession of cocaine, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to admit testimony from an officer on the impact of cocaine use on the community. However, the error was harmless because defendant was sentenced to 30 years when the range 5 to 99 years, there was abundant evidence on which the jury could have based its assessment of punishment, and the negative impact of drug use on the community was common knowledge. Rowell v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3386, 2009 WL 1364351 (Tex. App. Austin May 14 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Capital Punishment : General Overview

262. Even if a reverend's testimony regarding how the death penalty was carried out, how it affected those who assisted in carrying it out, and how it affected the families of the crime victims could be viewed as marginally relevant, the trial court was within its discretion to exclude it under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the evidence was not particularized to defendant, and therefore the trial court might have reasonably concluded that the risk of confusing and distracting the jury substantially outweighed any probative value the evidence might have had. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Capital Punishment : Aggravating Circumstances

263. Trial court did not err by admitting during sentencing an audio recording of jokes defendant told his brother on the telephone while in jail over his First Amendment objection because it was within the zone of reasonable disagreement that the evidence was indicative of defendant's character and thus relevant to the issue of future dangerousness; the jocks, which defendant told after raping, beating, and murdering a 15-year-old girl showed that he found the topics of violence and disrespect towards women to be humorous. The evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because it had a tendency to make the existence of defendant's future dangerousness more probable, and it was not so prejudicial that there was a clear disparity between the degree of prejudice and its probative value. Davis v. State, 329 S.W.3d 798, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Capital Punishment : Mitigating Circumstances

264. In a capital murder case, a court did not err by excluding testimony in mitigation of punishment regarding a history of family sexual abuse of multiple generations of children in defendant's family because the fact that others in defendant's family were abused did not by itself make him more or less morally culpable for the crime for which he was on trial, nor did it, by itself, make a jury's finding of mitigation any more or less probable than it would have been without the evidence. Shuffield v. State, 189 S.W.3d 782, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 365 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

265. Victim impact testimony was admissible as relevant to a mitigation special issue under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as the testimony was neither prejudicial nor cumulative. Jackson v. State, 992 S.W.2d 469, 1999 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 42 (Tex. Crim. App. 1999).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Guidelines : Adjustments & Enhancements : Criminal History

266. Appellant waived error in the State's admission of juvenile adjudications during the punishment phase of trial without prior identification. Defense counsel stipulated to appellant's identity for prior convictions and her objection to admission of the prior offenses based on Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 was overruled. Lynch v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1095 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 8 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Evidence

267. Admission during the punishment phase of a recorded jailhouse phone conversation between defendant and his brother was proper where it was probative with regard to a punishment determination, as it allowed the jury to gauge defendant's acceptance of responsibility for the crime by showing he was willing to allow his own brother to take responsibility for his crime, even if it meant his brother would be arrested. Given the force of the other evidence of bad acts presented at the punishment phase, the admission of the phone recording was not likely to create such unfair prejudice in the minds of the jurors that they sentenced defendant in a way disproportionate to his crime and past criminal history. Scales v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1744 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 19 2014).

268. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of toys and pictures from defendant's computer under because the evidence regarding the toys was relevant to determine defendant's sentence, photographs of the toys standing alone were innocuous, and the computer photographs were of young males in various states of undress and were more probative than prejudicial in determining defendant's punishment. Fiala v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8860 (Tex. App. Dallas July 17 2013).

269. Trial court did not err during the punishment phase in refusing to exclude evidence of the bad acts (gang involvement and possessing contraband) defendant committed in prison before his conviction was reversed because the evidence was relevant and was not unfairly prejudicial. That defendant engaged in bad acts while in prison revealed aspects of his character, and he failed to suggest that the State focused much attention upon or spent much time discussing the acts' setting. Nunez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5480 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 1 2013).

270. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial for intoxication assault, the trial court did not err by admitting a statement probative of defendant's general attitude of selfishness because the statement was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to show defendant's character and helpful to the jury in determining whether she was a good candidate for community supervision. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection, because the State needed the statement to counter testimony from family and friends as to defendant's sweet nature and tender-heartedness. Ford v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8034, 2012 WL 4243715 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 20 2012).

271. Where the record was silent as to why defense counsel elected not to object during the penalty phase of trial to the admission of evidence concerning defendant's assaults of his girlfriend, a reviewing court could not say that counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the evidence on the ground that its relevance was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Arnolie v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2673 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 5 2012).

272. Sheriff's deputy, who was a member of a gang suppression unit, provided expert testimony that certain of defendant's tattoos were common to members of a gang, provided sound evidence of defendant's gang membership, and testified that the gang that defendant was a member of was a criminal street gang with a purpose of engaging in activities to make money for its members; thus, under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(l), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence during the punishment phase of the trial that defendant was a gang member or had been a gang member, and the evidence was neither irrelevant nor unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Horton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1528, 2011 WL 742654 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 3 2011).

273. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony of three of defendant's sisters that he sexually assaulted them and a fourth sister when they were children and defendant was a juvenile, even though the acts had occurred between forty-four and sixty years before trial, because Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) contained no time restriction on punishment evidence, and because the sisters' testimony was quite probative of the punishment issue before the jury-the appropriate sentence for a particular defendant in a particular case-as it demonstrated a pattern of conduct over many years. The sisters' testimony did not occupy an undue amount of time, and it did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational, but nevertheless indelible way. Rodriguez v. State, 345 S.W.3d 504, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 834 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 2 2011).

274. Testimony from the victim's girlfriend regarding the victim's violent tendencies towards her and his history of drug use was not admissible during the punishment phase of the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it would result in the jury focusing its attention on the victim's character rather than on defendant's personal responsibility and moral culpability. King v. Tex., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 729, 2011 WL 381743 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 2 2011).

275. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), the trial court did not err in admitting (1) the evidence of an accomplice's previous robbery as the evidence was relevant to defendant's culpability in the robbery at a bank because it reflected poorly on defendant's decision to associate with the accomplice that day, especially when combined with other evidence showing defendant's knowledge that the accomplice had previously shot someone, which was especially true when considering defendant's strategy of minimizing his role in the robbery to request a lenient sentence; (2) the photographs of the girlfriend's injuries caused by defendant even if they also displayed injuries caused by his mother; and (3) a detective's testimony regarding defendant's tattoos and gang membership as the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Collins v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 392, 2011 WL 167223 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 13 2011).

276. Even if the trial court abused its discretion by admitting evidence depicting bestiality during the punishment phase of the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the error was harmless given the volume of the child pornography-related evidence considered by the jury and the lack of emphasis that the State placed on the bestiality images from defendant's laptop. The evidence during the guilt phase overwhelmingly supported the jury's determination that defendant possessed and promoted child pornography, and because defendant testified during the punishment phase, the jury had the opportunity to judge his credibility, his admission that email accounts were his, and his excuses of his behavior; the trial court also included an extraneous offensive limiting instruction. Crosthwait v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9967 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 16 2010).

277. At defendant's sentencing hearing after his guilty plea to two counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child and one count of indecency with a child, a taped statement's probative value outweighed any prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because defense counsel claimed that defendant's guilty plea indicated his willingness to accept responsibility for his conduct but the statement indicated that defendant initially denied responsibility and tried to blame others, including his wife, for the incident. Hernandez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8538, 2010 WL 4148359 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 21 2010).

278. Upon defendant's conviction for aggravated assault of a child, the trial court did not err in concluding that defendant's 1970 youth conviction for interstate transport of a stolen vehicle was relevant to the jury's determination of an appropriate punishment and admissible under Tex. Crim. Proc. Code Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a). Because the probative value of the evidence of the conviction was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to defendant, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling his Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. Foxworth v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7190, 2010 WL 3431598 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 1 2010).

279. There was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403 when the trial court admitted, at the punishment phase of a murder trial, a video of sexual acts involving defendant and the victim, his wife, who was unconscious due to alleged intoxication, because the video countered defendant's assertions of sudden passion and that he was law abiding until the murder. Skolnik v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5509, 2010 WL 2783872 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 15 2010).

280. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence during sentence a recording of a telephone conversation defendant had while he was in jail waiting for his murder trial to begin because the conversation, during which defendant threatened to kill a man or break the man's nose, was relevant, as it illustrated defendant's propensity for violence and that he was not deterred by his earlier convictions, the instant victim's murder, or by being incarcerated. The evidence did not have an undue effect on the jury's decision under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the comments were the only evidence of defendant's propensity to commit further violence following the victim's murder and therefore the State's need for the evidence was high; (2) the entire conversation was only 15 minutes long and the comments constituted only a few seconds of the conversation; and (3) although the State requested the jury sentence defendant to 99 years' confinement or life in prison, the jury sentenced him to 40 years' confinement. Walker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5376, 2010 WL 2698782 (Tex. App. Dallas July 9 2010).

281. Even without medical evidence to verify it, defendant's volunteered statement to a police officer that he was HIV positive had probative value to show he was infected by the HIV virus when he sexually assaulted a child victim and was relevant as a circumstance of the offense that the jury could consider in assessing punishment under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1). Lewis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4545 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 16 2010).

282. During the punishment phase of a robbery trial, there was no error in admitting evidence that defendant displayed a firearm at the robbed food store some months before the robbery. Although the record was silent as to whether the trial court performed a balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court could have properly decided that the probative value of the testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Onyeche v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3659, 2010 WL 1946772 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 13 2010).

283. In the punishment phase of a manslaughter trial, there was no error under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) or Tex. R. Evid. 403 when the trial court admitted a picture of a person who was not present on the night of the charged offense, who was holding a weapon that was not involved in the charged offense. Zuniga v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 419 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 26 2010).

284. In defendant's drug case, the court properly admitted evidence of defendant's gang affiliation at sentencing because the presentation of the evidence took only a short time and the probative value of the evidence was high. Defendant's prior admission of his affiliation with a prison gang and the reputation of that gang for commission of offenses, both inside prison and in the general community, was a factor that the jury was entitled to consider in determining defendant's propensity for further criminal activity should he be released from incarceration. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8078, 2009 WL 3335282 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 16 2009).

285. In a fleeing and eluding case, a trial court did not err by allowing the State to introduce evidence of an unadjudicated offense during the punishment phase of the trial. Evidence that defendant previously ran from police had probative value, it was not inherently inflammatory, it did not take long to present, and the prejudicial effect of the evidence did not unduly outweigh its probative value. Crumpton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6753 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

286. In a case where defendant failed to register as a sex offender, a trial court did not err by allowing the victim of the underlying offense to testify during the punishment phase because the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403; the victim's testimony helped the jury determine the appropriate sentence, and the details of the offense provided the jury with probative information of defendant's character. Moreover, the State needed the evidence to explain why defendant was required to follow the registration process, and the victim's testimony was only concerning the facts of the crime. Turner v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5246, 2009 WL 1959240 (Tex. App. Dallas July 9 2009).

287. In a case where defendant failed to register as a sex offender, defendant failed to preserve error based on a trial court's alleged failure to conduct a balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403 before admitting testimony from the victim of the underlying offenses during the punishment stage of the trial because there was no evidence in the record that the trial court refused to perform the balancing test or that defendant objected to a refusal. Turner v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5246, 2009 WL 1959240 (Tex. App. Dallas July 9 2009).

288. During the punishment phase of defendant's murder trial, the trial court acted within her discretion by excluding evidence that the victim was a registered sex offender. This kind of comparative evidence offered to mitigate defendant's punishment by showing that the victim's life was of little value was unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Hayden v. State, 296 S.W.3d 549, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 510 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

289. Trial court did not err during the punishment phase by admitting testimony from a sheriff's deputy about defendant's gang involvement under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 61.02 because the deputy's testimony that defendant's tattoos had distinctive meanings and were common in a particular gang supplied sound evidence of defendant's gang membership, and was probative of defendant's character. The deputy also testified about the character and reputation of the gang. Elizondo v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 809, 2009 WL 276754 (Tex. App.

Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 5 2009).

290. Court properly admitted at punishment defendant's medical records showing that he had been HIV positive since 1991 because the evidence showed that defendant knew of his HIV status at the time he attempted to engage the victim in sexual conduct, and it was a viable concern at the punishment stage of a trial for attempted sexual performance of a child. Atkins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5407 (Tex. App. Dallas July 23 2008).

291. Defendant's convictions for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon and assault of a public servant, which were entered upon his guilty pleas to a jury, were upheld where there was no error by the trial court under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 or Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting a videotape into evidence during the punishment phase of both offenses showing defendant committing the assault on a public servant, a police officer, because the State's right to introduce the videotape was not restricted by defendant's guilty plea; although defendant argued that the videotape was unnecessarily cumulative because he pled guilty and that its admission was for the purpose of obtaining a greater sentence, and although the two victims, defendant's girlfriend and the officer, testified about the circumstances surrounding the offenses, because the jury had to determine what punishment to assess, a video recording could provide a more panoramic representation of the evidence, and, thus, could be more helpful to the jury in assessing punishment than oral testimony. Perez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 509 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 23 2008).

292. In the punishment phase of a kidnapping trial, defendant failed to demonstrate error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in the admission of extraneous evidence of the victim's murder because defendant's brief lacked any analysis of the four Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors. Leffew v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 389 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 17 2008).

293. In a case in which defendant was charged with driving while intoxicated, the probative value of testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or misleading the jury where it appeared that the trial court admitted the testimony from a probation officer, a county counseling services employee, and an assistant county attorney to give the jury complete information about the punishment options for driving while intoxicated so that it could tailor the sentence to the particular offense, and none of the testimony from the three witnesses suggested to the jury that defendant was eligible for jury recommended probation, nor did the testimony suggest to the jury that it should reach its decision on an improper basis, such as an emotional one; even if the trial court had erred by admitting the testimony, defendant had not shown reversible error because he had not demonstrated that he received a longer sentence or was harmed by the admission of the testimony concerning the conditions of and his eligibility for probation. Ivey v. State, 250 S.W.3d 121, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8283 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

294. In an assault trial, there was no error in admitting opinion evidence at the sentencing phase relating to defendant's gang membership; the expert opinion testimony that certain of defendant's tattoos had distinctive meanings and were common in certain gangs supplied sound evidence of gang membership, which was relevant to defendant's character. Garcia v. State, 239 S.W.3d 862, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8307 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

295. In a case of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, a penitentiary packet showing that defendant previously had been convicted of two burglary offenses was admissible at punishment in accordance with Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3, and the trial court could have found under Tex. R. Evid. 403 that the relevant and probative information in the packet outweighed its prejudicial effect. Latchie v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6127 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 2 2007).

296. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of prior extraneous acts of indecency with minors during sentencing because the language of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) established that the conduct described by the witnesses was relevant to the assessment of defendant's punishment; the three witnesses described conduct by defendant that was similar to his conduct against the victim, and given that similarity, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Rodriguez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4618 (Tex. App. Eastland June 14 2007).

297. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding from evidence during sentencing the plea-bargained punishments assessed against defendant's nontestifying accomplices because the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as public policy favored the conclusion of litigation by compromise and settlement. Eichelberger v. State, 232 S.W.3d 225, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4331 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

298. Evidence of defendant's commission of an offense similar to the ones for which she pleaded guilty, allegedly committed during the pendency of the indictment, was clearly relevant to the issue of whether community supervision was appropriate; the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was greatly reduced because the judge was sitting as the trier of fact, and the court rejected the argument that the evidence was unfair in that it contributed to the punishment assessed. Terrell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9780 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 10 2006).

299. In defendant's trial for helping his son and six other inmates escape from prison, evidence that the escapees were on a month-long crime spree while evading the police was relevant at sentencing and was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Rather than confusing the issues, the evidence served to further the jury's understanding of the issues by explaining the circumstances surrounding the escape. Rodriguez v. State, 203 S.W.3d 837, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1931 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

300. Probation officer was properly allowed to testify that defendant was not a suitable candidate for community supervision because suitability is a matter relevant to sentencing under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) when a defendant seeks placement on community supervision; the court noted that the trial judge still had operate within the bounds of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Ellison v. State, 201 S.W.3d 714, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1689 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

301. Evidence of a prior conviction was properly admitted during the sentencing phase of a trial for burglary of a habitation because defendant failed to preserve a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection; moreover, any evidence deemed relevant to sentencing was admissible during this stage of the trial. Chavez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7878 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2006).

302. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by ruling that the probative value of the weapon, a knife, outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice and that the knife was not merely cumulative of other evidence; the size of the knife was relevant to sentencing, and because the photograph did not convey its size, the State had a need to offer the knife itself into evidence. Griffith v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5757 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 29 2006).

303. Trial court did not err when it allowed the introduction of defendant's threatening statement to a jailor relating to his release from prison under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07. § 3(a); this statement was highly relevant in assessing punishment for the attempted murder of police officers, and it was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Espinosa v. State, 194 S.W.3d 703, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4611 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

304. Where defendant was convicted of intoxication manslaughter, the trial court did not err by admitting defendant's driving record that showed his involvement in two non-injury traffic accidents; evidence of defendant's prior traffic accidents was relevant to sentencing; the probative value of the driving record was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Bernal v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1002 (Tex. App. San Antonio

Feb. 8 2006).

305. Where defendant, a large Caucasian man, was accused of burglarizing the homes of two Hispanic families, photographs of defendant's tattoos were admissible as evidence of defendant's selfishness and his impact on the victims. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to raise an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Hicks v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10663 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 28 2005).

306. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err during the punishment phase of trial by admitting extraneous offense testimony under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 as it would have been impracticable for the witness to avoid describing the extraneous offenses when she narrated the events that lead to defendant's prior misdemeanor assault conviction; the testimony was highly probative of defendant's character and thus instrumental in giving complete information to the jury so that it could tailor an appropriate sentence. Lamb v. State, 186 S.W.3d 136, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9994 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

307. Habeas petitioner's counsel's failure to object to the admission during the jury's sentencing determination of images of adult bestiality taken from the petitioner's computer. The images did not form part of the factual basis for the charges to which the petitioner had plead guilty, and had no relevance to the jury's sentencing determination apart from demonstrating the depths of depravity to which the petitioner had sunk; even if the evidence were relevant in some tangential way to the determination of his sentence, it was highly probable that considerations of unfair prejudice would have sufficed to keep this evidence from the jury. Ward v. Dretke, 420 F.3d 479, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 16596 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1621, 164 L. Ed. 2d 334, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2520, 74 U.S.L.W. 3543 (U.S. 2006).

308. In a murder case, the trial court did not err in allowing testimony during punishment regarding racial language on a tattoo; defendant's unfair prejudice argument lacked merit because defendant's tattoo was relevant to the issue of motive and defendant did not ask for a limiting instruction. Woodward v. State, 170 S.W.3d 726, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5255 (Tex. App. Waco 2005).

309. Where defendant was tried for aiding seven men escape from prison, evidence of the post-escape crimes committed by the seven men bore heavily upon defendant's character and moral blameworthiness. The evidence was admissible to help the jury determine an appropriate sentence for defendant's crimes; and the trial court's decision to admit the evidence did not lay outside the "zone of reasonable disagreement." Rodriguez v. State, 163 S.W.3d 115, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1084 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

310. In an indecency and sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence at punishment as the testimony by a prior complainant was highly probative, given the similarity of the allegations she made to the allegations of the victim in the current offenses, and the State needed the extraneous offense evidence to show that defendant should not have received probation when defendant claimed that what happened with the victim was an isolated occurrence. Woods v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 711 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 27 2005).

311. Court properly admitted pre-autopsy photographs to the victim during the punishment phase of defendant's trial where, although unsettling, they were not particularly gruesome or horrible; instead, they appeared rather clinical given the setting and the posture of the body. Gallegos v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11516 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 22 2004).

312. In the punishment phase of defendant's murder case, autopsy photographs were properly admitted because they supplied complete information regarding the nature of the wounds, that information was helpful to the court in devising an appropriate sentence, and they were probative as to the extent and nature of the injuries. Therefore, the autopsy photographs were relevant and were not unduly prejudicial. Williams v. State, 176 S.W.3d 476, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

313. In the punishment phase of a trial for drug possession, evidence of a taped phone conversation, in which statements indicated defendant's involvement in the narcotics business, was properly admitted. The evidence was relevant to the sentence determination because it went directly to the scope of his involvement in the drug trade and manifested his intent to continue his drug "business" in the future, despite his pending drug charges. Given the other evidence of his involvement in the drug business, the recording was probative of continued involvement and was not unfairly prejudicial. Wiggins v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8835 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 30 2004).

314. In an assault case, evidence of lewd behavior was admissible at sentencing pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a), over defendant's Tex. Evid. R. 403 objection, because the evidence helped to define defendant's character for the jury and also helped to establish a pattern of continuing conduct. Webster v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 13 2004).

315. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, a court did not err in the sentencing phase, by admitting a videotape depicting him engaging in sexual activity with an unidentified adult female where the State's attempt to establish defendant's character for sexual depravity was a legitimate purpose for permitting the videotape to be shown. Moreover, even if the trial court committed error in permitting the videotape to be played to the jury, the record did not necessarily establish that defendant suffered harm from its admission; as a result of a prior felony conviction, the applicable punishment range for the conviction for indecency with a child was enhanced to the range of 5 to 99 years or life. Chambers v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2693 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 25 2004).

316. In a prosecution for murder, the medical records of defendant's shooting victims were properly admitted at the sentencing phase; the medical records were relevant to the circumstances of the murder and provided evidence of bad acts for which defendant could be held criminally responsible. The probative value of the medical records was not substantially outweighed by the danger of undue prejudice. Mendoza v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2486 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 18 2004).

317. Admission of aggravated assault conviction during the punishment phase of a DWI trial was upheld where, at sentencing, defendant objected under Tex. R. Evid. 403, but on appeal, he argued under Tex. R. Evid. 609; an objection raised on appeal would not be considered if it varied from the objection made at trial, and on appeal, defendant made no argument under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Flores v. State, 125 S.W.3d 744, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10584 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003).

318. As used in Tex. R. Evid. 403, unfair prejudice means the undue tendency of the evidence to suggest a decision on an improper basis. Davis v. State, 68 S.W.3d 273, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 1047 (Tex. App. Dallas 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Victim Statements

319. In a murder trial, the court did not err when it admitted victim impact evidence consisting of testimony and photographs that provided information about defendant's life and character, as the evidence had some tendency to remind the jury that he was a unique human being. Although the evidence emphasized that the victim was a good man and had a lot of good qualities, the evidence did not encourage the jury to engage in a worth comparison; the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice. Evans v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13748, 2013 WL 7985593 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 7 2013).

320. In an intoxication manslaughter case, victim impact evidence was properly admitted because the evidence regarding how one victim's death impacted her family and her friend's family illustrated the consequences that defendant's actions had on the victim's family and friends. Additionally, the testimony comprised about twenty pages, and the questions and answers were brief, to the point, and not needlessly cumulative. Mole v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2838, 2009 WL 1099433 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 23 2009).

321. In defendant's trial for the aggravated assault of his wife, the trial court erred in admitting a "day in the life" video depicting the wife's activities at a rehabilitation facility during the innocence/guilt phase of the trial because it constituted inadmissible victim-impact evidence in that it portrayed the physical and emotional effects of the crime upon the wife and her struggle in daily living. However, the error was harmless in light of defendant's admission that he hit his wife and the medical evidence that showed her injuries were consistent with being beaten multiple times with someone's hands. Petruccelli v. State, 174 S.W.3d 761, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6593 (Tex. App. Waco 2005).

322. In sentencing defendant after he had been found guilty of indecency with child younger than 17, the trial court did not err when it admitted the testimony of defendant's former step-daughter who testified that defendant had sexually abused her when she was a minor for many years until she ran away from home. The trial court could have properly determined evidence that defendant sexually assaulted his stepdaughter for 13 years remained highly probative of what an appropriate sentence would be. Rollings v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10580 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2004).

323. In a criminal appeal, defendant's claim that the State's presentation of victim-impact testimony was unfairly prejudicial did not comport with his relevancy objection at trial and presented nothing for review. Adams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3766 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 29 2004).

324. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting victim-impact evidence of the victim's parents in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403 because nothing in the record suggested that the State engaged in a comparison of the worth of defendant and the victim; the testimony came from immediate family members who related the uniqueness of the victim's character and the impact of his death on his family. Neither the tenor nor the volume of the evidence was such that it was unfairly prejudicial, nor would any prejudice resulting from the evidence substantially outweigh its probative value. Gutierrez v. State, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2211 (Tex. Crim. App. Apr. 21 2004).

325. Where defendant was convicted of sexual assault, trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403 in admitting testimony from the victim and his sister of the effect of the assault on the victim; testimony of an inflammatory or sympathetic nature will not bar its admissibility if it is relevant to the issue at trial, and the issue need not be contested. Ranels v. State, 1996 Tex. App. LEXIS 2867 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 20 1996).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Mental Incapacity

326. In a case where the patient murdered a woman, was found not guilty by reason of insanity, and was committed to a state hospital, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, because the evidence of the patient's past conduct was highly probative of his progress, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it allowed the State to introduce evidence of the patient's past acts that he committed while insane. Long v. State, 130 S.W.3d 419, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2182 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Presentence Reports

327. Defendant failed to prove that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to 214 pages of allegedly improper character evidence contained in the presentence investigation report because: (1) defendant failed to rebut the presumption that his counsel's decisions were reasonable, as there was no evidence from counsel explaining his actions; (2) defendant did not show that counsel's performance was deficient as he cited no authority supporting his argument that the number of statements was unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403; and (3) defendant failed to show that his 20-year sentence for intoxication manslaughter would have been different, as defendant was drunk when he drove over 90 miles per hour on a highway, hitting two cars and killing the victim. Sanchez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 822, 2013 WL 328954 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 29 2013).

328. In a trial for indecency with a child by contact there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, in admitting a presentence investigation report regarding defendant's lack of remorse because the testimony was minimal. Hernandez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 851, 2010 WL 391850 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 5 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : General Overview

329. In a civil commitment proceeding involving a sexually violent predator, testimony from a witness that sexual acts with a patient were not consensual was not cumulative; it constituted impeachment or rebuttal because it conflicted with the patient's testimony on this issue. In re Diaz, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6930, 2009 WL 2749958 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 31 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : Civil Commitments

330. In the sexually violent predator trial, the trial court did not err in admitting the offender's prior statement because the statement, which detailed his sexual history, had probative value regarding his behavioral abnormality, which was not outweighed by unfair prejudice. In re Commitment of Meyer, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1650, 2014 WL 580723 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 13 2014).

331. Details of a sex offender's 1975 murder conviction were property admitted during his sexually violent predator commitment proceeding because the State's expert explained the facts he considered in forming his opinions and how those facts affected his evaluation of the offender; the trial judge performed a balancing test and could have reasonably concluded the evidence assisted the jury in weighing the testimony and was not unfairly prejudicial, and it also gave the jury a limiting instruction explaining that the information reviewed by the experts was admitted only for the purpose of showing the basis of the expert's opinion. In re Martinez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13512, 2013 WL 5874583 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2013).

332. Trial court did not impermissibly restrict appellant's right to cross-examine the State's psychologist about his rate of error during proceedings to commit him as a sexually violent predator because it could have reasonably concluded that the jury would have been confused. In re Alexander, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12077, 2013 WL 5425557 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 26 2013).

333. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's objection to the State's use of the phrase "sexually violent predator" under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the use of the term was not intended to inflame the jury, as the term appeared in the charging statute, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.085, in the final judgment, order of commitment, supervision, and GPS tracking service requirements. Malone v. State, 405 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7766 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 26 2013).

334. In a case involving the civil commitment of a sexual predator, a patient failed to preserve an error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 relating to the details of his offenses because he did not object and obtain an adverse ruling each time the complained-of evidence was presented or obtain a running objection to the evidence; the patient did not waive error by waiting until the evidence was repeated to complain that it was prejudicial because it was needlessly cumulative. Even if the patient had preserved error regarding the experts' discussion of the details of the offenses, there was no unfair prejudice under Rule 403; the evidence assisted the jury in weighing each expert's testimony and opinion that each expert offered regarding the ultimate issue in the case. In re Ford, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2221, 2012 WL 983323 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 22 2012).

335. During appellant's civil commitment trial, the trial court erred by excluding the testimony of appellant's expert witness, based on its conclusion that the expert's testimony would confuse the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 403, because the trial court acknowledged that he qualified as an expert under Tex. R. Evid. 702, and, despite the trial court's belief that the expert would testify that behavioral abnormality did not exist, the offer of proof established that the expert would have told the jury that the ultimate issue in the case, whether appellant suffered from a behavioral abnormality that predisposed him to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence, could not be determined by scientific method alone. The error was not harmless because without the expert's testimony, the State's experts' testimony regarding their diagnoses of personality disorder and their scoring of the actuarial instruments went unchallenged by any expert in the field of psychiatry or psychology. In re Commitment of Hinkle, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2011).

336. Trial court acted within its discretion in allowing the experts to discuss the details of the patient's offenses and other bad acts he committed that were contained in the records they reviewed in determining that the patient was a sexually violent predator because having each expert explain which facts were considered and how those facts influenced his evaluation assisted the jury in weighing each expert's testimony and the opinion each offered regarding the ultimate issue in the case. In re Day, 342 S.W.3d 193, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3573 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 12 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Briefs

337. On appeal of defendant's murder conviction, his complaint that the trial court abused its discretion by overruling his Rule 403 objections to various exhibits was inadequately briefed. He failed to set forth the required balancing test or identify any portion of the test which the trial court failed to perform; he did not apply the law to any facts or present any legal arguments explaining how the trial court abused its discretion or how the evidence was prejudicial to his case. Green v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14355 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 22 2013).

338. Defendant's briefing was inadequate because beyond his assertions that each of the exhibits at issue violated this rule, he did not explain why he believed the exhibits should have been excluded. Haley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11450 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 5 2013).

339. Court questioned whether an issue under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was adequately briefed because defendant did not attempt to analyze the evidence in light of the appropriate balancing test and the specific factors considered on review. Miller v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6693 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 10 2012).

340. Defendant failed to adequately brief Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors. Garreans v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 852 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 5 2008). Leffew v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 389 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 17 2008). Sain v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9882 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 20 2007). San Martin Adriano v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7140 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2005). Hernandez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9713 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 2 2004). Smith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9341 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 21 2004). Torres v. State, 979 S.W.2d 668, 1998 Tex. App. LEXIS 1963 (Tex. App. San Antonio 1998).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : Evidence

341. In an indecency with a child case, the court committed reversible error in the admission of sex toys because there was no suggestion that sex toys were used in any way related to the complainant, and the State emphasized those items in providing a detailed description of each item, making certain to emphasize their graphic nature by carrying them in a single plastic tub, pointing out the testifying officer's wearing of gloves, and repeatedly apologizing to the jury for the graphic nature of those items. Warr v. State, 418 S.W.3d 617, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2538 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 15 2009).

342. In an assault case, there was no reversible error based on hearsay, relevance, undue prejudice, improper opinion, and violations of the confrontation clause because the challenged evidence had come in during other portions of the trial without objection. Hecht v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 521, 2009 WL 200979 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 29 2009).

343. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no reversible error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 from the admission of evidence that defendant was a former police officer. Nino v. State, 223 S.W.3d 749, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3519 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

344. Issues are inadequately briefed and presented nothing for appellate review because the brief merely contended that the trial court did not conduct a balancing test as is required by this rule before allowing admission of the evidence. Jackson v. State, 424 S.W.3d 140, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1170, 2014 WL 409946 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 4 2014).

345. The trial court allowed the State to conduct a height comparison between defendant and the prosecutor and defense counsel made only a general objection; defendant's claim that the comparison was irrelevant or highly prejudicial was not preserved for review. Jackson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6724 (Tex. App. Dallas July 28 2006).

346. Defendant failed to properly object to evidence that was admitted at trial concerning unindicted aggravated robberies, even though he filed a motion in limine, because he failed to make objections under Tex. R. Evid. 403 when the evidence was admitted at trial. Ashford v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2770 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 6 2006).

347. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, defendant forfeited his arguments that his blood test results were improperly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and that he was entitled to an instruction under Tex. R. Evid. 105(a). Although defendant objected when a blood-draw kit was offered into evidence, he failed to object when the report with the blood-test results was offered. Walker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1328 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 16 2006).

348. In a criminal prosecution for theft, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of the extraneous offenses suffered by the victim; because defendant did not raise a separate trial objection to the evidence based upon Tex. R. Evid. 403, this argument was not properly before the appellate court. Buttz v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 919 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 2 2006).

349. In a trial for aggravated robbery, defendant failed to preserve an issue under Tex. R. Evid. 403 regarding an extraneous offense because he did not specifically object on Rule 403(b) grounds. Jefferson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7288 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 31 2005).

350. In a trial for arson, defendant failed to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) as to the admission of evidence regarding his prior threats to kill the victim and her family. Although he had objected, under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404, to the admission of prior threats involving arson, he failed to object to a question broadening the scope to other threats. Flores v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6255 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 8 2005).

351. In a trial for sexual assault, defendant failed to object on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 403 to an expert witness's use of the term "survivor" when describing the procedures involved in administering a sexual assault examination. Defendant therefore waived that issue on appeal. King v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2568 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 6 2005).

352. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault, defendant objected to the court's admission of his statement concerning a robbery on the grounds of Tex. R. Evid. 404. As to defendant's argument that the robbery evidence was highly prejudicial, the appellate court was not required to engage in a Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis because no timely Rule 403 objection was made. Williams v. State, 161 S.W.3d 680, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2014 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

353. Ruling on a motion in limine did not preserve error with regard to a burglary defendant's argument that his failure to identify himself properly to a police officer was an extraneous offense and that a hotel registration card was hearsay. Defendant failed to specifically object to the admission of the evidence during the trial and thus waived his complaints. Rodriguez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1164 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 11 2005).

354. Defendant's claim that the prejudicial effect of testimony elicited during his trial for sexually assaulting his daughter from his stepdaughter that he sexually abused her as well substantially outweighed its probative value in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not preserved for appeal because defendant failed to object when, during the victim's testimony, after she had detailed what defendant had been doing to her, she testified that she found out defendant had been doing the same thing to his stepdaughter. Patron v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 902 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 3 2005).

355. Defendant failed to preserve error for review where counsel cited Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 611 as the basis for the objection to the testimony of the victim's parents at sentencing. It was unclear from the record which part of Rule 611 was the basis of the objection, and the issue on appeal was different from the objection at trial. Foust v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 12 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 4 2005).

356. Defendant's statements to police which contradicted other evidence presented at trial were relevant and admissible to show his consciousness of guilt. Although the tapes contained references to drugs, crime, nicknames, extraneous offenses and bad acts, defendant did not specify where these references could be found in the three hour tapes. Ross v. State, 154 S.W.3d 804, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11407 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

357. Where defendant did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 until after a witness to his sexual assault had finished testifying, defendant's rule 403 objection was untimely and preserved nothing for review. Rollings v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10580 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2004).

358. During the punishment phase of a criminal prosecution for possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver or manufacture, the trial court did not err by allowing testimony from a witness about an alleged plot by defendant to kill police officers as defendant failed to make a Tex. R. Evid. 403 complaint at trial; therefore, his complaint that the testimony was inadmissible because its probative value was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, was not preserved for review. Revill v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5654 (Tex. App. Tyler June 23 2004).

359. Defendant did not preserve her issue regarding whether extraneous offense evidence was prejudicial because she did not object at trial to the admission of the evidence, but rather objected to the State's failure to give notice of its intent to introduce such evidence. Jordan v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4593 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20 2004).

360. In a drug case, defense counsel's general objection to the trial court's exclusion of testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Thompson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4602 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20 2004).

361. In a criminal appeal, defendant's claim that the State's presentation of victim-impact testimony was unfairly prejudicial did not comport with his relevancy objection at trial and presented nothing for review. Adams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3766 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 29 2004).

362. Where defendant objected at trial to the admission of a video showing his jewelry box, which was ornamented with a picture of Hitler, but failed to make a specific Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection when the video was introduced into evidence, defendant waived his right to make a Tex. R. Evid. 403 argument on appeal in regard to the video of the jewelry box. Smith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1121 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 5 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 961, 125 S. Ct. 1726, 161 L. Ed. 2d 602, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2975, 73 U.S.L.W. 3593 (2005).

363. Defendant, who was convicted of aggravated robbery and aggravated kidnapping, failed to preserve for review a claim that admission of a letter defendant wrote violated Tex. R. Evid. 403, where he did not identify either specific portions of the letter that were inadmissible or specific Rule 403 grounds for exclusion; even if defendant's objection had been sufficiently specific, the admissions contained in the letter and its evidence about defendant's character were relevant and were not substantially outweighed by the letter's prejudicial effects. Diaz v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10681 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 18 2003).

364. Defendant's conviction of intoxication manslaughter was upheld where he waived the issue of relevance of the photograph of the victim's charred body; the only objection made in the district court went to probative value and unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Anderson v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10122 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 2 2003).

365. Defendant was not entitled to any relief as to his conviction for burglary of a habitation because Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 provided that defendant waived the right to challenge the admission of the evidence of his accomplice's conviction for the burglary at defendant's trial by arguing at trial that the evidence of the accomplice's conviction was not relevant and raising the different argument on appeal that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because its prejudicial effect outweighed its probative value. Evans v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 2705 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 15 2002).

366. Failure to identify the prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 constitutes inadequate briefing as provided in Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h). Torres v. State, 979 S.W.2d 668, 1998 Tex. App. LEXIS 1963 (Tex. App. San Antonio 1998).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

367. At the punishment phase of defendant's trial for robbery, the trial court admitted into evidence photographs of his wife after a domestic violence incident. Because defendant objected on the basis of relevance, his claim that the probative value of the photographs was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice was not preserved for review. Cordova v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9947 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 8 2013).

368. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the probative value of a photograph of his tattoo was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because at no time did he object to the prejudicial value of the photograph. Gossett v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9476 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2013).

369. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the probative value of a photograph of his tattoo was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because at no time did he object to the prejudicial value of the photograph. Gossett v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9475 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2013).

370. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the probative value of a photograph of his tattoo was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because at no time did he object to the prejudicial value of the photograph. Gossett v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9477 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2013).

371. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the probative value of a photograph of his tattoo was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because at no time did he object to the prejudicial value of the photograph. Gossett v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9479 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2013).

372. Defendant's conviction for DWI, third or more was proper because the trial court properly overruled his sole objection related to "unadjudicated offenses" and the evidence introduced by the State which did not consist of judgments of convictions was permitted as extraneous bad acts. Because no Tex. R. Evid. 403 arguments were raised below, they were unpreserved on appeal, Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Capps v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2770, 2013 WL 1091232 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 15 2013).

373. Objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not preserve a relevance argument. Whiddon v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2074 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 27 2013).

374. Defendant's contention that the probative value of video recordings showing sex acts between dancers and patrons of the adult establishment owned and operated by defendant were substantially outweighed by a danger of unfair prejudice was not preserved for appellate review because while defendant raised a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection in her motion in limine in her first trial but sought only to have the State approach the bench before mentioning or offering the video recordings in the instant trial. Coutta v. State, 385 S.W.3d 641, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8692 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 17 2012).

375. Defendant's relevancy objections did not preserve his argument that admission of extraneous offense evidence of uncharged sexual conduct violated Tex. R. Evid. 404; in any event, because the same evidence came in through other testimony without objection, any error was cured. Goodwin v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6918, 2012 WL 3590723 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 20 2012).

376. Because at trial defense counsel did not object to pictures of his tattoos on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 402 and 403, defendant's complaint on appeal was not preserved. Mejia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6862, 2012 WL 3525641 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2012).

377. Defendant failed to preserve for review his claim that the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the covers of commercial pornography video recording that were found in his home because the argument that the covers were more prejudicial than probative was preserved at trial, it was not argued on appeal. Although the argument that the covers improperly impeached the witness with other acts was argued on appeal, it was not preserved for review. Fletcher v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5429, 2012 WL 2783298 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 10 2012).

378. Defendant waived his complaint that the trial court should have undertaken a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test concerning photographs showing the condition of defendant's home because at trial defendant relied on his objection that the evidence was not relevant. Brown v. State, 381 S.W.3d 565, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5164 (Tex. App. Eastland June 28 2012).

379. Objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not preserve hearsay or confrontation objections to the admission of a letter that an accomplice received in jail. Green v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3611, 2012 WL 1606238 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 8 2012).

380. Defendant failed to preserve for review his claim that the trial court erred by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense during sentencing because at trial, defendant objected that the evidence was hearsay and admitting it denied defendant his right of confrontation, but on appeal he contended that the evidence was not relevant and that the probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Dirden v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2207, 2012 WL 983182 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 21 2012).

381. Defendant failed to preserve for review her claim that she was deprived of her right to present a complete defense under the Sixth Amendment due to the fact that the trial court excluded from evidence a videotaped interview with the victim because at trial defendant relied on Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) but never asserted her right to present a complete defense and did not cite the Holmes case. Sanchez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10169, 2011 WL 6916418 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 28 2011).

383. Because defendant failed to challenge on appeal the trial court's ruling that the probative value of evidence of a witness's juvenile adjudication for attempted capital murder 16 years earlier was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, he did not preserve the issue for review. The court further held that even if the trial court had erred, the error was harmless because self-defense, which defendant sought to prove by admitting the witness's juvenile adjudication, could not have been utilized to justify manslaughter. Marsh v. State, 343 S.W.3d 475, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4391 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 10 2011).

384. On appeal of defendant's conviction for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, he claimed the trial court abused its discretion by admitting evidence that two of the guns found in his apartment were stolen. Because the jury had already heard evidence from two different witnesses that the guns were stolen without any objection from defendant, his claim that the trial court abused its discretion in admitting this evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not preserved for review. Chenier v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 678, 2011 WL 286156 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2011).

385. Because defendant counsel did not specify any of the five grounds that served as a basis of objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 when objecting to an autopsy photograph, the alleged error was not preserved for appellate review. Conway v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 238 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 13 2011).

386. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the district court erred by excluding evidence regarding the motivation of the authorities to prosecute the case against him because he failed to objected on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) during the trial. Even assuming that defendant had preserved error, the trial court did not abuse its discretion because: (1) the proffered evidence had no relevance to the issue of whether defendant had committed the offense of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle; (2) the trial court could have found that the evidence would have put the officers and the police department on trial, confused the issues, and caused undue delay; and (3) there was considerable evidence showing that defendant committed the offense, particularly the videotape showing defendant entering the bait vehicle on three separate dates. Bishop v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7056, 2010 WL 3369845 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 26 2010).

387. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred allowing into evidence information about his alleged prior bad acts in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404 because defendant did not object each time the witness testified about defendant's purported extraneous bad acts, nor did he obtain a running objection from the trial court. Even if he had preserved the claim, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony because it fell within the purview of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, as the testimony described the history of the relationship between defendant and the child victim and established defendant's consistently hostile behavior or his statement of made as it related to the victim. Samora v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6759, 2010 WL 3279536 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2010).

388. It could be argued that defendant waived an objection under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 to evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403 because objections that the evidence was not fair and cumulative did not comport with the objection on appeal. McCallum v. State, 311 S.W.3d 9, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 440 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 27 2010).

389. In an aggravated assault case, an objection that photographs of dead cattle were irrelevant did not preserve for review a claim that they were prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Walls v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9783, 2009 WL 5150073 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 30 2009).

390. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve error relating to the admission of testimony from the mother of the victim that the family had moved many times to get away from defendant's violent behavior. Although defendant argued to a trial court that he had not opened the door to evidence of abuse by cross-examining the mother, he did not object that admission of the evidence violated Tex. R. Evid. 403, Tex. R. Evid. 404, and Tex. R. Evid. 405, as he argued on appeal. Gamble v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2134, 2009 WL 806879 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 27 2009).

391. Defendant failed preserve error because he failed to object under either Tex. Rs. Evid. 403 or 404 to admission of prior offenses; the State posed questions to defendant to clarify the nature of the prior convictions, and counsel objected neither to the court's ruling allowing the evidence nor to the procedure used to arrive at the ruling. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1032, 2009 WL 350608 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

392. In a drug trial, defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to evidence of extraneous violent conduct toward defendant's spouse was not sufficient under Tex. R. App. P. 33 to preserve error under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Huneycutt v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9975 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 21 2007).

393. In a drug trial, defendant failed, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, to preserve an argument that the trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in allowing the State to introduce evidence of weapons found at the scene; although defendant objected to the introduction of photos that allegedly depicted the weapons, defendant did not object initially when several witnesses testified regarding the weapons. Johns v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9125 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 21 2007).

394. Defendant failed to preserve for review his challenge to the admission into evidence of marijuana that was found inside his tractor trailer because, even though he objected to the lifting of the motion in limine, he never renewed an objection when the evidence was admitted; even if the challenge was preserved for review, it was without merit because the marijuana was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as the cocaine, which defendant was charged with possessing, and the marijuana were part of the same transaction; the marijuana was relevant as an officer testified that he smelled the odor of raw marijuana when he stopped the tractor trailer, and keeping evidence about the marijuana from the jury would deprive them of an understanding of the offense; the evidence of the marijuana was crucial when it came to evaluating the propriety of the officer's search of the truck. McMorris v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7202 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 31 2007).

395. Defendant's argument that evidence that marijuana was found along with the cocaine in the secret compartment in the trailer was improperly admitted into evidence was not preserved for appellate review because after objecting to lifting the motion in limine, defense counsel failed to object when the evidence was admitted; even if the argument had been preserved for review, it was without merit because it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as the cocaine and marijuana were part of the same transaction and the marijuana was crucial when it came to evaluating the propriety of the officer's search of the tractor trailer. Thomas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7203 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 31 2007).

396. On review of defendant's conviction for indecency with a child, he cited to various portions of the record where he allegedly requested the trial court to conduct a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test; defendant's relevancy objection was not sufficient to preserve the error for review. Ficarro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 26 2007).

397. Because defendant objected to a deputy's testimony on the ground that it was not relevant, her argument on appeal that the testimony was unfair or prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not preserved for review. Chase v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2270 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 22 2007).

398. In a trial for aggravated robbery, defendant did not preserve a complaint under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as to the admission of testimony about two bags containing drugs that were in defendant's possession at the time of arrest; counsel raised only a general objection concerning the extraneous nature of the evidence. Padrino v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 623 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 30 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

399. Evidence was properly admitted as possession of a certain amount of cash was relevant to the issue of possession of firearm, Tex. R. Evid. 403; trial counsel's relevance objection with respect to defendant's personal items failed to preserve error, Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, as to the prejudicial effect of defendant's testimony of the amount of cash in his possession. Tyson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5059, 2012 WL 2393083 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 26 2012).

400. Defendant did not preserve error for review by failing to object. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 324, 2009 WL 112774 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 15 2009). Smith v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2081 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 20 2008). Wilson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9261 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2007). Craig v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6027 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2007). Belt v. State, 227 S.W.3d 339, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3749 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007). Chavez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7878 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2006). Cotton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5445 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 27 2006). Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5032 (Tex. App. Dallas June 13 2006). Gonzales v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4020 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 11 2006). Galvan v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3197 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 20 2006). Galvan v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3197 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 20 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Jury Instructions

401. Reviewing court did not address defendant's arguments that it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to allow the State to introduce an out-of-court statement of its own witness in the guise of impeachment and that the error was compounded by the court's failure to give a limiting instruction. Defendant did not object to the admission on Rule

403 grounds, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), and did not request a limiting instruction, as required by Tex. R. Evid. 105(a). Galvan v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3197 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 20 2006).

402. It was not error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 for the trial court to allow the State to introduce an out-of-court statement of its own witness in the guise of impeachment, and the error was not compounded by the court's failure to give a limiting instruction. Defendant did not object to the admission on Rule 403 grounds, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), and did not request a limiting instruction, as required by Tex. R. Evid. 105(a). Galvan v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3197 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 20 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

403. Defense counsel preserved for review the issue of whether the trial court erred in admitting an extraneous offense because defense counsel emphasized what rules his request for a running objection was based on, and the trial court stated that the evidence was admitted as inextricably intertwined with the offense. Finney v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8317 (Tex. App. Dallas July 8 2013).

404. Defendant did not preserve a challenge under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to testimony regarding other acts of child sexual abuse because his only objection was under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Richert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7719 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

405. Defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to the presence of the complainants at the punishment phase of trial did not comport with his appellate argument under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. arts. 36.06, 36.03 and Tex. R. Evid. 614, as required to preserve the issue. Reed v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1650, 2012 WL 662327 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 29 2012).

406. Although defendant argued that the trial court erred by admitting certain photographs of him into evidence, defendant never specified that the photos were objectionable because they depicted "large" tattoos on his body. Because defendant failed to state the grounds for his objection to the photos with sufficient specificity, defendant waived this issue on appeal. Burton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5897, 2011 WL 3274012 (Tex. App. Tyler July 29 2011).

407. Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not invoked by a "not probative" argument. Therefore the issue was not preserved for appeal. Welch v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2692, 2011 WL 1364970 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 12 2011).

408. Defendant preserved an issue relating to the admission of autopsy photographs, even though he did not specifically invoke Tex. R. Evid. 403, because he objected on the basis that they were unfairly prejudicial and that they were needlessly cumulative, satisfying Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(A). Kilgore v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6904, 2009 WL 2707175 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 28 2009).

409. In an appeal from a kidnapping conviction, the court reviewed arguments relating to the admission of evidence, even though defendant failed to object, because defendant's complaints were apparent from the context of defendant's objections; therefore, Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 was satisfied. Leffew v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 389 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 17 2008).

410. Under Tex. R. App. P. 33, defendant failed to preserve an argument regarding a demonstration of his arms because at trial he conceded that he could be required to show the tattoos on his arms; objections that a requirement for defendant to bare his chest was "improper identification" and "improperly suggestive" did not comport with an appellate argument under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Melchor v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8434 (Tex.

App. El Paso Oct. 25 2007).

411. Under Tex. R. Evid. 103(a) and Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), a murder defendant waived the argument that autopsy photos were not relevant because an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not preserve error under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Williams v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6397 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 9 2007).

412. Although defendant on trial for sexually molesting his stepdaughter objected to the admission of the report of the sexual assault nurse examiner as improper bolstering and a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403, defendant did not identify at trial which Texas Rule of Evidence, if any, was violated by the admission of the nurse's report. As such, he failed to preserve his objection for appeal. Rivas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4395 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 6 2007).

413. In a trial for indecency with and sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve an argument under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 607 to the State's calling a witness who the State knew would testify adversely to its case, solely so that it could impeach its own witness with defendant's extraneous offense. Defendant raised only a general objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404 and thus was not specific, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Starnes v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3144 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 26 2007).

414. Because defendant did not raise Tex. R. Evid. 403 as a ground for excluding statements either during pretrial hearings or during trial, defendant failed to preserve the issue for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33. Cordero v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10087 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 17 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : General Overview

415. In a murder trial, defendant waived his Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 403 objections to the portion of a surveillance videotape that depicted the victim's wife kneeling and crying over the victim's body after defendant had fled the store. Two witnesses testified, without objection, regarding actions depicted on the videotape and verbally conveyed the same imagery. Fernandez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7068 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 30 2005).

416. Appellant waived error in the State's admission of juvenile adjudications during the punishment phase of trial without prior identification. Defense counsel stipulated to appellant's identity for prior convictions and her objection to admission of the prior offenses based on Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 was overruled. Lynch v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1095 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 8 2005).

417. In drug and robbery case, although defendant's relevancy objection to evidence of other thefts sufficiently apprised the trial court of the nature of his complaint, where defendant did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and obtain a ruling as to whether the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, nor ask for a limiting instruction, defendant waived at trial any complaint over admission of evidence of extraneous thefts. Loftin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2651 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 25 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : Admission of Evidence

418. During defendant's criminal trial for burglary of a building, the trial court overruled defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to the prejudicial effect of testimony about his methamphetamine addiction. The Court of Appeals of Texas held that the failure to reassert his earlier objection waived the issue for appellate review in accordance with Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Greenlee v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9438 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 19 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : Waiver Triggers Generally

419. Defendant on a drug delivery charge was estopped from raising on appeal any error in the admission of subsequent deliveries at the guilt phase because he admitted his guilt at the penalty phase of trial; further, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 or Tex. R. Evid. 404 because his counsel opened the door by suggesting that defendant was only a marginal participant in the drug trade and that the charged transaction constituted his sole involvement in the drug business. Houston v. State, 208 S.W.3d 585, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3056 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : General Overview

420. Eventhough Texas has long discouraged needless presentation of cumulative evidence, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, the mere fact that another witness may have given the same or substantially the same testimony is not the decisive factor, as recognized pursuant to Tex. R. Evid 103(a)(2), since error may not be predicated upon a ruling which excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected, and the substance of the objection was made known to the trial court by offer of proof; however, in this termination of parental rights case, the mother's attorney adequately described the substance of the proposed testimony, introduced the witness's letter and referenced the best interest of the children, and the appeals court found this showing sufficient under the circumstances, by considering whether the excluded testimony would have added substantial weight to the mother's case. In re N.R.C., 94 S.W.3d 799, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8566 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : General Overview

421. Trial court does not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs if they will help the jury to understand verbal testimony such as technical language used by a medical doctor in describing injuries sustained. Umphres v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5737 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 25 2004).

422. Where pictorial evidence will help the jury understand verbal testimony, such as the technical language used by a medical doctor in describing the injuries sustained by a victim of a crime, a trial court does not abuse its discretion in admitting these photographs. Troncoso v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2578 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 24, 2004).

423. Where pictorial evidence will help the jury understand verbal testimony, such as the technical language used by a medical doctor in describing the injuries sustained by a victim of a crime, a trial court does not abuse its discretion in admitting these photographs. Troncoso v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2578 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 24, 2004).

424. Trial court's determination to exclude evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 should be reviewed for a clear abuse of discretion. Martinez Sanchez v. State, 122 S.W.3d 347, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9836 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2003).

425. Questions of admissibility of evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 are assigned to the trial court and are reviewable on appeal only for abuse of discretion. Moreno v. State, 1 S.W.3d 846, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 6657 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 1999).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

426. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted the evidence of defendant's gang member because the evidence was relevant, the State's need for the evidence was great to establish defendant's motive for the shooting and to rebut his theory of self-defense, it directly related to the circumstances surrounding the shootings, and the time used to develop the evidence was not so great that it distracted the jury from considering the charged offense. Johnson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3618 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 3 2014).

427. Trial court's decision to overrule defendant's objection to exhibits was within the zone of reasonable disagreement because the evidence had probative value identifying defendant as a suspect; there was evidence that items stolen from the complainant during the sexual assault were collected from the owner of the stolen vehicle defendant was found driving, and a detective testified that he went to the home of the owner of the stolen vehicle and collected the exhibits. Reyes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11611 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 11 2013).

428. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence of another potential suspect because defendant made an offer of proof but did not tender any other evidence connecting his brother's alleged drug use or dealing to his murder. Honish v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5139 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 25 2013).

429. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 by allowing the State's use of defendant's investigator's bills to cross-examine defendant because while the evidence may have been prejudicial it was not unfairly prejudicial. Pardee v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6823, 2012 WL 3516485 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2012).

430. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence three series of photographs depicting the injuries suffered by the victim because their admission did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403, as: (1) the photos were black and white and did not show gruesome scenes; (2) the amount of time spent offering and discussing the photos did not unduly delay the trial; (3) while many of the photos were of the same area of the victim's body, they did not show the same degree of injury as they were taken at different times; and (4) the photos, showing the apparent anger of defendant by the lasting imprint his teeth on the victim's arm and head, went directly to the totality of the circumstances of the assault. Betliskey v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9150, 2010 WL 4644500 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 17 2010).

431. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when the State sought to introduce into evidence State's exhibit number 12 because there was nothing in the record to indicate that the trial court did not perform a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test or that the trial court refused to include its findings on the record. Kneeland v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9249 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 11 2008).

432. Trial court did not err by refusing to admit into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 two photographs of the victim's home, which showed two posters that defendant alleged showed that the victim and his brother glorified a lifestyle of drugs and violence, because the prejudicial effect of the photographs substantially outweighed the probative value. The court determined that: (1) the photographs of a movie poster and a human silhouette poster had little, if any, probative value as to whether defendant committed aggravated robbery; (2) the photographs would be prejudicial to the State in their potential to suggest that a person who hangs a movie poster in his house automatically identifies with the lifestyle portrayed in the film; (3) the time involved in the introduction of the photographs was minimal; and (4) defendant introduced a substantial amount of additional probative evidence to help support his defensive theory, including evidence that the victim and his brother were drug dealers, that they identified with a life of guns and violence, and that the incident was a drug deal gone bad, not a robbery. Conerly v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5517 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 24 2008).

433. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence defendant's book-in photograph because defendant did not object at trial or complain of an improperly suggestive photographic identification procedure by the State; the photograph was not prejudicial merely because defendant had an "angry look;" the photograph, which was used by a witness during her deposition to identify defendant as the perpetrator, was relevant as identity was an essential element of any criminal offense. King v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8766 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2007).

434. On defendant's petition for discretionary review under Tex. R. App. P. 66.3(c), the court held that the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the probative value of the breath test results was not substantially outweighed by the countervailing factors specified in Tex. R. Evid. 403: (1) the inherent probative force of the test results was considerable, as they showed that defendant had consumed a substantial amount of alcohol and therefore tended to make more probable defendant's intoxication when he was driving; (2) the results did not have a tendency to suggest decision on an improper basis, and did not have tendency to confuse or distract the jury from the main issues in the case; (3) the results did not have any tendency to be given undue weight by the jury, as a witness testified that the results could not be used to determine what defendant's breath alcohol concentration was at the time he was stopped; and (4) it was unlikely that presentation of the results would consume an inordinate amount of time or merely repeat evidence already admitted. Gigliobianco v. State, 210 S.W.3d 637, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2450 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

435. It was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to admit evidence of defendant's sexual relationship with a woman and evidence of an extraneous offense showing that defendant had child pornography on a second computer because the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the unfair prejudicial effect or by needless presentation of cumulative evidence; the evidence that defendant demanded that the woman present herself for sex in a manner resembling a young female child and that he displayed child pornography to her on his computer was probative because it served to rebut defendant's theory of lack of knowledge that the pornography was on his computer, it was unlikely that the impression was an irrational one, the time required to present the evidence weighed in favor of the State, and the State needed the evidence to show that defendant knowingly possessed child pornography. Zaratti v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7828 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 31 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Clearly Erroneous Review : Findings of Fact

436. Defendant could not appeal a drug conviction on the basis that the evidence was factually insufficient to support the jury's implied finding under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.23 that cocaine was lawfully seized. The court distinguished "sufficiency" from "admissibility," which related to the fairness of introducing evidence and its logical relevance under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Salazar v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7068 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 28, 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

437. Court properly admitted photographs regarding an extraneous offense during defendant's punishment phase showing injuries the victim sustained because an officer testified that the victim was "very frightened, very upset, scared" and unable to speak, and he testified that he noticed both of her arms were severely bleeding and skin was hanging off. Considering the record as a whole, defendant was not harmed as a result of the admission of the photos depicting the victim's injuries. Johnson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4905, 2011 WL 2566285 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 30 2011).

438. In a capital murder case, even if the trial court erred in admitting the testimony of defendant's former fiancee, the error was harmless as there was a great amount of properly admitted evidence to provide fair assurance that the jury's decision was not based on any improper extraneous evidence. This included evidence that defendant provided a large knife to his co-assailant, was present at the scene of the crime, provided him with liquor and viewed a violent movie with him before the murder, instructed him on how to more efficiently hold the knife provided, allowed him a safe harbor after the killing, concealed the weapon in his apartment, and allegedly participated in the stabbing of the victim. Elder v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5453 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July

439. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding autopsy photographs in a murder case where the State did not contest that the victim sustained a bullet wound to the front of his body, a medical examiner's testimony comprised convincing evidence to establish that the victim was shot in the front of the body, and the tattooing throughout the victim's body more likely than not would have inflamed the minds of the jurors. Moreover, any error was harmless because other evidence showed that the victim was not a law-abiding citizen and that he had previously threatened defendant and because the trial court assessed punishment at the lower end of the punishment range. Elizondo v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3680 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 12 2005).

440. While evidence that defendant was driving a stolen car when he committed a burglary was improperly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was not related to the indicted offenses, the error was harmless because there were several references to the stolen vehicle including defendant's counsel's closing statement, and the jury was instructed to consider extraneous offenses only if they found the defendant committed them, and then it might only be considered in determining the defendant's motive, opportunity, intent, plan, identity, knowledge or absence of mistake, if any, alleged against him in the indictment. Therefore, the admission did not affect defendant's substantial rights under Tex. R. Evid. 44.2(b). Heard v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10378 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 18 2004).

441. Trial court's failure to accept defendant's proposed stipulation, thus excluding evidence of defendant's prior conviction, was harmless as the primary offense was failure to register, and the conformity inference of the prior conviction was simply to show generally that defendant was a criminal. Because the indictment referred to the prior attempted indecency with a child conviction, the jury would have known the identity of the prior offense even if all further references to that offense had been excluded. Herring v. State, 147 S.W.3d 390, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1649 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

442. Testimony concerning defendant's plans following release from jail was minimal compared to the testimony concerning the charged offenses, and it did not influence the jury or had only a slight effect; therefore, any error was rendered harmless. Ellinberg v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2753 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

443. In an intoxication-manslaughter case, the trial court did not err in the admission of the dash camera video from the police vehicle because defendant admitted to drinking alcohol on the video at issue, but claimed that he had only had two beers -- a fact refuted by significant other evidence, including a witness's testimony about how much alcohol defendant had consumed before the accident; defendant did not overcome the presumption that the relevant video was more probative than prejudicial; and defendant did not argue that the impact of the evidence would not be rendered harmless by the substantial other evidence at trial of his intoxication. Calbas v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6666, 2014 WL 2809809 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 19 2014).

444. Even though the trial court erred by excluding a witness's testimony that the victim had performed oral sex on defendant two days before the sexual assault, as consent was at issue even before the witness testified and the evidence had probative value that outweighed the danger of undue prejudice, the error was harmless because defendant was able to produce considerable evidence that the victim had shown sexual interest in defendant before the assault. The witness testified that defendant and the victim had had sexually charged contact and had gone together into the witness's bedroom. Gotcher v. State, 435 S.W.3d 367, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6181, 2014 WL 2576061 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 10 2014).

445. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence, Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), given the evidence already accumulated against defendant, and any error was harmless. Hicks v. State, 419 S.W.3d 555, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14091, 2013 WL 6076468 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 18 2013).

446. In a robbery/murder trial, any error in admitting evidence of defendant's gang affiliation was harmless because a surviving witness unequivocally identified defendant. Vallejo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6952 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 6 2013).

447. In a child sexual abuse case, even if evidence that appellant spanked his daughters with a cable cord did not fall under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, the admission of the testimony was harmless and did not affect appellant's substantial rights where the daughters testified about the years of sexual abuse that they suffered. Appellant failed to preserve his Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objections in the trial court. Arellano-Sanchez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5438 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 2 2013).

448. Trial court's alleged error in permitting the complainant to testify as to the punishment he would like defendant to receive had no more than a very slight effect on the jury's determination of punishment; presuming there was error, such error was harmless. Hines v. State, 396 S.W.3d 706, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2000, 2013 WL 748755 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 28 2013).

449. In a murder trial, any error in admitting testimony that defendant brought a gun to an encounter with another person shortly before he shot the victim was harmless because the allegedly improperly admitted evidence was insignificant in comparison to eyewitness testimony and physical evidence that defendant pulled the slide back on the gun, which chambered a round, placed the gun to the victim's head, and fired it. Nieto v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8787 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 18 2012).

450. Error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was harmless when an autopsy photograph was admitted of a murder victim's unborn fetus because the State did not dwell on or emphasize the single color photograph depicting the intact fetus; there was other, unobjected-to evidence of the fetus's death; and, although there was no eyewitness testimony that defendant fired the shots, the photograph did not affect the determination of defendant's guilt. Rolle v. State, 367 S.W.3d 746, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2699 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 5 2012).

451. In a robbery trial, any error was harmless when the trial court allowed evidence of defendant's tattoos because an accomplice admitted he robbed the shoe store and testified that defendant was also involved in the robbery. Further, defendant's fingerprint was found on one of the shoe boxes handled by the robbers. Jefferson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 663, 2012 WL 234116 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 26 2012).

452. In a driving while intoxicated (DWI) case, it was error to admit the entirety of defendant's driving record because it contained evidence of extraneous offenses beyond the prior DWI convictions that were elements of a charged offense. However, the error was harmless because evidence of guilt was ample. Bridges v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9104, 2011 WL 5557534 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 16 2011).

453. Even though the trial court erred by allowing the State to introduce evidence that a witness had been threatened by an unknown person, as the evidence did nothing to bolster the witness's credibility and was highly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because it did not affect defendant's substantial rights given the other evidence of guilt, including numerous statements to others by defendant. Newland v. State, 363 S.W.3d 205, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4587, 2011 WL 2480312 (Tex. App. Waco June 15 2011).

454. In a sexual abuse case, the court's error in admitting defendant's statement to an officer that he had cocaine and alcohol problems and he sometimes did not remember things when he was drunk or high was harmless because defendant gave a written confession that he sexually abused the child, and the children gave statements detailing the abuse. Henriquez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4072, 2011 WL 2119679 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 26 2011).

455. Even if the trial court erred by denying defendant's request to present testimony from the victim's ex-wife about the victim's propensity for violence without engaging in the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test, the error was harmless because: (1) the trial court found that the ex-wife's testimony was too remote in time from the instant shooting; and (2) the ex-wife's testimony did not form a vital portion of defendant's case and its exclusion did not prevent defendant from presenting the substance of his self-defense claim. Defendant and others testified that the victim had previously gotten into fights. Hart v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3996, 2011 WL 2028216 (Tex. App. Dallas May 25 2011).

456. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a witness's testimony because whether the witness's testimony about an incident of intoxication unrelated to the current felony driving while intoxicated offense was relevant and admissible under the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; furthermore, even if the trial court erred in admitting the challenged testimony, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the State placed extremely little emphasis on the witness's testimony that he had previously seen defendant intoxicated. Snyder v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10203, 2010 WL 5541120 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 29 2010).

457. Trial court did not err by allowing cross-examination on whether the salon incident occurred where the jury was left only with evidence that the incident did not occur; even if there was error, it was harmless because defendant could not show how he was harmed by the question as the record contained no evidence showing that the incident occurred. Dye v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8012, 2010 WL 3833947 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 30 2010).

458. In a drug trial, even if it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to admit 19 bags containing an untested substance into evidence, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because there was still overwhelming evidence that the narcotics found in defendant's possession amounted to more than four grams: 20 of the 39 bags found in defendant's possession tested positive for heroin, and their combined weight totaled 4.094 grams. Cantu v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3355, 2010 WL 1817804 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 5 2010).

459. Admission of 12 autopsy photographs in a homicide case was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they were only marginally relevant, given that the cause of death and blood loss were not disputed, and they were highly detailed color photographs focusing on internal injuries and thus may have distracted the jurors. However, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because little attention was devoted to these exhibits after they were admitted in evidence. Brown v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 273, 2010 WL 138331 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 13 2010).

460. In a child abuse case, any error in allowing an officer to offer demonstrative evidence by striking a table in the courtroom with an electrical cord found in defendant's residence was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because defendant admitted biting and striking his children, and their bodies were literally covered with scars and lesions. In addition to seeing the photographs depicting the complainants' external injuries, the jury heard medical testimony describing the complainants' many broken bones, the complainants' malnutrition, and the adverse physiological and psychological consequences. Mojica v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5310, 2009 WL 1980942 (Tex. App. Austin July 8 2009).

461. In the sentencing phase of a trial for possession of cocaine, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to admit testimony from an officer on the impact of cocaine use on the community. However, the error was harmless because defendant was sentenced to 30 years when the range 5 to 99 years, there was abundant evidence on which the jury could have based its assessment of punishment, and the negative impact of drug use on the community was common knowledge. Rowell v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3386, 2009 WL 1364351 (Tex. App. Austin May 14 2009).

462. Hearsay testimony relating to a DNA results report that a detective had not personally prepared was harmless because a DNA analyst had testified without objection about the test results on the swabs contained in the victim's sexual assault kit; the detective's testimony was cumulative of the DNA analyst's testimony. Alvarez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3039, 2009 WL 1176440 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 30 2009).

463. In defendant's drug case, any error by the admission of testimony concerning the search warrant being assigned to the gang unit was harmless because, by the time the officer testified, the following evidence had already been admitted: defendant claimed membership in the past in two gangs, and defendant had gang membership tattoos and photographs of the tattoos were admitted into evidence. Cedillo v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9485 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 18 2008).

464. In a murder trial, no harm occurred when the trial court admitted tape-recorded phone conversations that included defendant's statement about a plea offer on an unrelated offense; defendant's remark was in the middle of the State's first tape-recorded conversation, it was not singled out at trial, and the State did not attempt to introduce other evidence regarding the previous offense. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9519 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 5 2007).

465. In defendant's capital murder case, evidence in the guilt-innocence phase that painted a picture of the victim as a young man with a promising future whose life defendant had ended prematurely was irrelevant and appealed to the jury's sympathies. However, the error was harmless; defendant admitted to participating in the shooting, and a witness testified that defendant shot the victim and grabbed the bag of codeine. Durand v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6535 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 16 2007).

466. Showing the jury photographs of a murder victim's internal organs, by themselves, without additional testimony, was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the photographs did nothing to depict the nature or location of the wound or to help the jury make its decision on an element of the charged offense when they had already seen the body and positioning of the gunshot wounds and heard testimony that the cause of death was multiple gunshot wounds; the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), however, because the photographs were merely cumulative in the context of the entire case. Williams v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6397 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 9 2007).

467. Evidence of defendant mentioning an attorney on the tape was inadmissible because its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and therefore it should have been suppressed; although the evidence had some probative value as evidence of defendant's speech pattern, the State did not have a distinct need for the evidence in light of other portions of the tape providing the same evidence; the error was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because the evidence of guilt was not overwhelming, as it consisted of only defendant's refusal to perform a breath test, his slow speech, and his poor performance on a horizontal gaze nystagmus test. Lajoie v. State, 237 S.W.3d 345, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4318 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

468. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to the admission of photographs of defendant's nephew and testimony that the appearance of track-marks on one's inner arm indicated the use of intravenous drugs; even if the testimony was objectionable, no harm resulted from counsel's failure to object because there was no reasonable probability that the evidence contributed to the conviction. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

469. Defendant was not entitled to reversal of a conviction for indecency with a child because of the admission of a confession that referred to other bad acts; any violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403 was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because the confession strongly supported the verdict and a proper limiting instruction was given. Diaz v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8084 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 12 2006).

Estate, Gift & Trust Law : Will Contests : General Overview

470. Nursing home records contained a number of facts the jury was entitled to consider and they were probative because they provided a general background from which jurors could understand the general status of the decedent's health in periods of time relevant to the contested will issues the jury was asked to decide; thus, the probate court could reasonably conclude that the probative value of the records outweighed any potential prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and admit those records into evidence. In the Estate of Kremer, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1726, 2011 WL 846137 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 10 2011).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : General Overview

471. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence the bra and shirt that the victim was wearing at the time of the stabbing under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they were admitted to show where the knife went into the victim's torso, which could orient the jury to the location and nature of the victim's wounds. Matez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4418 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 7 2007).

472. In an action in which a trial court awarded more than $ 2 million to a pedestrian for injuries she sustained when she was struck by a city transit bus driven by an employee of a transit authority contractor, the trial court did not err when it admitted into evidence the graphic photographs of the pedestrian's injuries; even though the driver objected to the admission of the photographs, any error was waived by the failure to object to testimony of the conditions depicted in those photographs; at trial, witnesses testified they saw the pedestrian in the crosswalk when she was struck and dragged by the bus, and the orthopedic trauma surgeon who treated the pedestrian when she arrived at the hospital and amputated her leg testified, without objection, about the nature and extent of her injuries; however, even if the driver's objection was not waived, the photographs were relevant and admissible as evidence of the driver's liability and the pedestrian's physical pain and suffering. Castro v. Cammerino, 186 S.W.3d 671, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1765 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

473. Where a picture of a murder victim's four children was nothing more than a typical snapshot of smiling children and no endearing description was written on it nor was there anything else which would have led the jury to decide the case on an emotional basis rather than on the other evidence presented at trial, it did not have to be excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Rivera v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Dallas July 15 2005).

474. In the punishment phase of a murder trial, a photograph of the victim's unborn child (which had been removed during the victim's autopsy) was inadmissible as the State did not need the photograph for any relevant purpose and it was substantially more prejudicial than probative; the photograph of the fetus had almost no probative value in that it added nothing helpful to the already-admitted testimony that the victim was pregnant, that defendant knew she was pregnant, and that the fetus died as a result of the victim's death. Erazo v. State, 144 S.W.3d 487, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1007 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

475. Based on defendant's own admission that color photographs that depicted the bruising of a larynx of a victim that was not externally visible, and because the photographs were relevant to that manner of death of the victim, which was manual strangulation, the probative value of the photographs outweighed the danger of any prejudice under the balancing test of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Ripkowski v. State, 61 S.W.3d 378, 2001 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 98 (Tex. Crim. App. 2001), writ of certiorari denied by 539 U.S. 916, 123 S. Ct. 2274, 156 L. Ed. 2d 133, 2003 U.S. LEXIS 4463, 71 U.S.L.W. 3758 (2003).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Admissibility

476. Demonstration in which the prosecutor instructed defendant to stab the air 20 times while the prosecutor positioned himself in the place of the murder victim was relevant because it raised an inference that defendant had a motive to murder his wife. Davis v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8372, 2011 WL 5026403 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 20 2011).

477. In a driving while intoxicated case, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 701, in admitting a CD to assist the arresting officer in explaining the effects of alcohol on a person's eyes with and without increased nystagmus. The exhibit was not offered as substantive evidence of intoxication but rather as a tool to help the arresting police officer explain the horizontal gaze nystagmus test. Redfearn v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7018, 2010 WL 3377796 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 26 2010).

478. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted autopsy photographs of the victim where the photographs were taken before the autopsy procedure began and showed the condition of the body as it was received from the hospital; the photographs showed the bullet wound that testimony indicated was the cause of death, they illustrated that the victim was not otherwise bruised or injured as he would have been if there had been a fight before he was shot, and they showed no more than the nature of the victim's injury. Gray v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2363 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 29 2006).

479. In a capital murder case, a court properly admitted photographs of the victim's corpse where the photographs were probative of the crime scene and the injuries received by the victim, they were necessary for the State in developing its case, and, because they were not overly gruesome, the photographs did not pose the potential of impressing the jury in some irrational way; the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the photographs. Shuffield v. State, 189 S.W.3d 782, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 365 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

480. State was properly allowed to demonstrate its version of defendant's murder of her husband in order to illustrate the state's theory that the multiple stabbing was planned rather than defensive; the demonstration was not more prejudical than probative because, although the demonstration may have impressed the jury, it did not do so in an irrational yet indelible way. Wright v. State, 178 S.W.3d 905, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9609 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

481. Court did not err by admitting an investigation videotape into evidence because, although the content of the video might have been unpleasant to view, it depicted the reality of the brutal crime committed, it contained material that was the subject of testimony presented during the State's case in chief, and it was probative of the fact and manner of the victim's death and defendant's culpable mental state. Ramirez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4185 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 1 2005).

482. In a murder trial, the trial court properly excluded a video reenactment that purported to establish that the victim could have exited defendant's car easily; it was offered to counter the State's position that the car was difficult to exit. The evidence was of little relevance because there were testimony and pictures on the same issue; further, such reenactments were highly prejudicial. Rossel v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1158 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 10 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1035, 163 L. Ed. 2d 872, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 186 (U.S. 2006).

483. Trial court did not err in allowing the State to play a 911 tape aloud to the jury, instead of admitting a written transcript of the 911 tape, during defendant's capital murder trial, which arose from a robbery, because although two of the robbery victims were excited and distraught on the 911 recording, they did not display such emotion as to inflame the jurors to act on emotion rather than on the evidence in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Sierra v. State, 157 S.W.3d 52, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11374 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

484. Court did not abuse its discretion when it allowed a videotape of the crime scene into evidence because the State offered several still photos of the victims and the crime scene, and the video presented a three dimensional perspective of the evidence already before the jury. Although the videotape was partially cumulative of the still photographs, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the probative value of the videotape was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Avila v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11021 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 8 2004).

485. In an injury to a child case, the trial court did err in admitting autopsy photos of one of the children as the danger of unfair prejudice was not substantially outweighed by the probative value of the photographs: the photos depicted the injuries suffered by the child, were not unnecessarily gruesome or cumulative, were introduced into evidence during the testimony of the medical examiner, and were used to aid him in explaining the cause of the child's death. Aranda v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10370 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 18 2004).

486. In defendant's manslaughter case, the trial judge did not err in admitting photographs of the accident scene where the photographs showed the condition and location of the victims' bodies at the scene; the photographs were the subject of trial testimony, including the other driver's testimony that at the time of the impact, the victim fell into his lap. Although graphic, the photographs were not so horrifying that after viewing them, any juror of normal sensitivity would have difficulty rationally deciding the critical issues. Tijerina v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9539 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 28 2004).

487. In a murder case, the trial judge did not err by admitting autopsy photographs as they were probative of the manner of the victim's death and assisted the jury in making its decision on punishment. In depicting the body's position at the crime scene and the location and angle of wounds as seen by the medical examiner at the autopsy, the photographs did not have the ability to impress the jury in some irrational, yet indelible way. Stubbs v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8916 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 6 2004).

488. In an aggravated robbery case, a court properly admitted a videotape showing the victim's wounds where the videotape was made three weeks after the attack, the video depicted no more than the injuries inflicted upon the victim, five photos, all admitted without objection, showed the victim in the intensive care unit, and the videotape was the only evidence offered by the State to show the actual injuries sustained by the victim. Allen v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6722 (Tex. App. Dallas July 23 2004).

489. In a sexual assault case, court properly admitted photographs of injuries to the victim where the photographs were of average size, in color, and few in number, the injuries had been testified to by the victim, but because they had healed by the time of trial, there were no other available means to demonstrate that they had been sustained, as no other witnesses testified to having observed the injuries, and although the victim was naked in the photographs and the pictures were close-up shots, that was necessary given the nature of the injuries, i.e., a series of bites on the genital area. Thus, the probative value of the four photographs outweighed their potentially prejudicial effect. Strong v. State, 138 S.W.3d 546, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

490. In defendant's murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting three autopsy photographs where the three objected-to autopsy photographs were the only photographs that documented the internal autopsy findings of the entry wounds, the fractures caused by the gunshots, the proximity of the wounds to each other and to the body, and the trajectories of the bullets. The photographs were highly relevant to explain the manner of death by documenting the entrance wounds, the proximity of the wounds to each other, the trajectory of the bullets, and the resulting fractures, and the jury would not have been prejudiced in some irrational, but nevertheless indelible way by viewing autopsy photos of the deceased's head under those circumstances. Hall v. State, 137 S.W.3d 847, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4402 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

491. Autopsy photographs are generally admissible unless they depict mutilation caused by the autopsy itself; Tex. R. Evid. 403 provides that even relevant evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury or by consideration of undue delay, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. Rayford v. State, 125 S.W.3d 521, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 842 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003), cert. denied, 543 U.S. 823, 125 S. Ct. 39, 160 L. Ed. 2d 35, 2004 U.S. LEXIS 5715, 73 U.S.L.W. 3207 (2004).

492. Trial court's exclusion of a tape was proper where it was reasonable for the trial court to conclude that the risks of confusing the jury substantially outweighed any probative value the video might have; under Tex. R. Evid. 403, relevant evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. Sells v. State, 121 S.W.3d 748, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 63 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003), cert. denied, 540 U.S. 986, 124 S. Ct. 511, 2003 U.S. LEXIS 8067 (2003).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Photographs

493. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the challenged photographs, because the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect, when the photographs illustrated the condition of the premises where defendant kept the mistreated, unattended animals. Graham v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8857, 2014 WL 3939957 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 13 2014).

494. In an intoxication-manslaughter case, defendant did not demonstrate that the trial court abused its discretion in admitting photographs of the decedent and the collision scene because the photographs were not cumulative, and each photograph was relevant and not unduly prejudicial. Calbas v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6666, 2014 WL 2809809 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 19 2014).

495. In a forgery case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a photograph showing the pickup truck defendant was driving when he returned to the store. The photograph was relevant because it was given to the local authorities to aid their investigation; defendant advanced no theory as to how the photograph unduly prejudiced him or led the jury to decide the case on an improper basis. Resendez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2587, 2014 WL 972297 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 6 2014).

496. At defendant's murder trial, the court did not err by admitting an autopsy photograph depicting the bullet lodged in the tissue at the back of the victim's neck; the photograph was relevant to the cause of death--a gunshot wound to the head, and manner of death--homicide. The autopsy photograph was also useful in assisting the medical examiner's testimony; the probative value was not outweighed by the prejudicial effect, because the photograph was not gruesome or enhanced in any way. Barr v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1714, 2014 WL

641351 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 14 2014).

497. In the murder case, the court did not abuse its discretion by sustaining the State's objection to a photograph showing the deceased's gang affiliation because the picture depicting a memorial to the deceased did not indicate he was violent and the photograph would have been cumulative. Wilson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 918, 2014 WL 310117 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2014).

498. In the murder case, the court did not abuse its discretion by sustaining the State's objection to a photograph showing the deceased's gang affiliation because the picture depicting a memorial to the deceased did not indicate he was violent and the photograph would have been cumulative. Wilson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 918, 2014 WL 310117 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2014).

499. In a murder trial, any error was harmless from the admission of photographs showing unusual items found during a search of defendant's home, including a plastic manikin torso and head suspended by a noose around its neck and replica human skulls; the jury had the means to discern whether the items in the photographs represented an obsession with violence or merely poor taste and a penchant for collecting strange things. Kirk v. State, 421 S.W.3d 772, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 788, 2014 WL 252086 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 23 2014).

500. In a murder trial, any error was harmless from the admission of photographs showing unusual items found during a search of defendant's home, including a plastic manikin torso and head suspended by a noose around its neck and replica human skulls; the jury had the means to discern whether the items in the photographs represented an obsession with violence or merely poor taste and a penchant for collecting strange things. Kirk v. State, 421 S.W.3d 772, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 788, 2014 WL 252086 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 23 2014).

501. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a photograph of defendant's back yard taken in 2006 because it showed defendant's knowledge and intent, as some lumber and a yellow chair were in defendant's backyard three years before similar items were added to the waste pile after defendant's encounter with an officer. Mellen v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12091, 2013 WL 5520369 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 26 2013).

502. In a murder trial, there was no error in admitting 14 photographs taken of the victim's remains at the crime scene and used in conjunction with a forensic anthropologist's testimony. Henderson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11883 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 19 2013).

503. In a prosecution for evading arrest, the trial court did not err by admitting the State's photographs over defendant's objection under this rule because defendant challenged the officer's version of the events, there was no other evidence except the officers' testimony to establish that defendant refused to comply, and the pictures were not gruesome. King v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11185 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 30 2013).

504. In a trial for the murder and sexual assault of a 78-year-old victim, there was no error in admitting crime scene photographs because they were accurate depictions of the scene and the body, corroborated testimony on the cause of death, and depicted the force used. Hardge v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11102 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 29 2013).

505. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting autopsy photographs because they were useful in assisting the medical examiner's testimony and they portrayed no more than the gruesomeness of the injuries inflicted by defendant and his accomplices. Maldonado v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9277 (Tex. App. Waco July 25 2013).

506. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting crime scene photographs because they corroborated an accomplice's testimony that regarding how defendant and the accomplice dragged the victim's body through the woods by his legs, the position of the body when they left it, and showed the single bullet wound. Maldonado v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9277 (Tex. App. Waco July 25 2013).

507. In a trial for the death of a three-year-old child, there was no error in admitting autopsy photographs because the close-ups of the fatal injuries to the child's brain showed the level of trauma, which was probative of defendant's intent. They were not unduly prejudicial. Copeland v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9101 (Tex. App. El Paso July 24 2013).

508. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence photographs of the victim taken in the hospital because they were visual representations of the officers' testimony regarding her condition, the mere fact that the photographs depicted the victim's badly bruised body did not automatically render them more prejudicial than probative, and they refuted defendant's claims that she never noticed anything wrong with the victim or that the bruising might have been caused by the efforts to resuscitate the victim. Sifuentes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8105 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 3 2013).

509. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting graphic photographs depicting the murder victim's injuries into evidence because they were probative of the manner of death and could be interpreted to indicate that the victim was shot twice in the back and that defendant planted the knife in the victim's hand, which was relevant to defendant's claim of self-defense. The court could not say that the probative value of the photographs was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because while the photographic depiction of the entrance wound was no doubt made more gruesome due to postmortem changes, that information was submitted to the jury solely by way of the autopsy report and the State did not focus on the condition of the wound. Rider v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5050 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 25 2013).

510. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting three autopsy photographs because they were highly probative of the manner of death and therefore did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403. The photos were used in progression to explain where and how the bullet entered the victim's body, the distance traveled, trajectory, and path of the bullet, and the mechanism of death. Wilson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4791 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 18 2013).

511. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photographs where they were pictures of the locations at which the assaults took place and pictures of the victim's injuries; none of the photographs were gruesome, the victim was clothed, and none were cumulative. Hill v. State, 392 S.W.3d 850, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 453, 2013 WL 174062 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 16 2013).

512. In defendant's murder case, the probative value of nine crime scene photographs outweighed their unfair prejudice because the photos did not show the victim's sexual organs and only showed his abdomen to the extent necessary to view the gunshot wound. The photos did nothing more than depict the crime scene, and they were unlikely to elicit an irrational decision. Gabriel v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10771, 2012 WL 6743557 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 31 2012).

513. Autopsy photographs were properly admitted into evidence because they illustrated the medical examiner's testimony about the murder victim's wounds and portrayed no more than the gruesomeness of the injuries inflicted by defendant. Henderson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9141 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 5 2012).

514. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a photograph of the victim's head after her body was discovered in the closet despite defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because it was probative of the injuries sustained by the victim, the single photograph did not require a great deal of time to present to the jury, and, though gruesome, depicted no more than the unpleasant, natural consequences of defendant's crime of murder. Hernandez-Sandoval v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7660, 2012 WL 3870306 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 6 2012).

515. In defendant's aggravated assault, family violence penalty trial, the trial court did not err in admitting two photos of the victim lying in a hospital bed, attached to a ventilator with I-Vs in her arm and with a brace on her neck over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. Mejias v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5616, 2012 WL 2866303 (Tex. App. Waco July 12 2012).

516. Where defendant entered a plea of guilty to four aggravated robberies, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs of defendant's tattoos as they were relevant to the jury's determination of his suitability for community supervision. Two of the tattoos indicated defendant's religious beliefs, one resembled knowledge, and another tattoo depicted a caretaker of death pouring down beer; nothing in the tattoos was so unfairly prejudicial that its exclusion was required under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Jackson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5221, 2012 WL 2445052 (Tex. App. Dallas June 28 2012).

517. In a murder trial, there was no error in admitting autopsy photographs because they were highly probative to show the full extent of the victim's injuries and portrayed no more than the gruesomeness of the injuries inflicted. Salazar v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4983, 2012 WL 2357744 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 21 2012).

518. Photograph of a murder victim taken at the crime scene after she had been shot by defendant was properly admitted where: (1) witnesses identified the picture as that of the victim; (2) the photo was not gruesome and showed no indication that the body had been posed or otherwise disturbed; and (3) the jury saw a video that showed the entire episode without objection. The photo simply depicted the result of a violent assault by one person, defendant, on another person, the victim, and the photo's probative value was not substantially outweighed by danger of unfair prejudice. Bibbs v. State, 371 S.W.3d 564, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4677, 2012 WL 2135561 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 13 2012).

519. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 by admitting autopsy photographs of the child victim that showed injuries to areas other than her vagina because: (1) they helped to disprove defendant's theory that the victim's injuries were the result of an accident that occurred prior to the day she died; (2) the photographs were not inflammatory as they were essential parts of the State's case against defendant and were addressed in a straightforward manner not designed to influence the jury in an emotional manner; (3) they were key evidence in proving the State's case and the fact that they documented the results of a particularly horrific crime did not make them overly inflammatory or likely to mislead the jury; and (4) the time involved in presenting the photographs to the jury and discussing them during the trial was minimal when compared to the overall length of the trial. Coe v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4169, 2012 WL 1899179 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2012).

520. In a manslaughter trial arising from a multi-vehicle collision, autopsy photographs of the five deceased victims were properly admitted during the guilt-innocence phase because they linked the victims to their individual autopsies; the single photograph of each deceased victim portrayed no more than the condition of the victim due to the injuries inflicted. Jones v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4104, 2012 WL 1861033 (Tex. App. Dallas May 23 2012).

521. In a trial for capital murder in the course of a burglary, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to admit an autopsy photograph of the victim's unborn fetus because there was little probative value in relation to the offense, as to which the death of the fetus was not an element, and other evidence was admitted of the pregnancy and the fetus's death. Rolle v. State, 367 S.W.3d 746, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2699 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 5 2012).

522. Error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was harmless when an autopsy photograph was admitted of a murder victim's unborn fetus because the State did not dwell on or emphasize the single color photograph depicting the intact fetus; there was other, unobjected-to evidence of the fetus's death; and, although there was no eyewitness testimony that defendant fired the shots, the photograph did not affect the determination of defendant's guilt. Rolle v. State, 367 S.W.3d 746, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2699 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 5 2012).

523. Where defendant entered a plea of guilty to intoxication manslaughter with a deadly weapon, the trial court did not err by admitting photographs depicting the victim's body at the scene of the collision. Because the photographs showed the violence of the impact and the injuries to the victim, the trial court could have properly determined that their prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh their probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Deas v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2066, 2012 WL 858627 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 15 2012).

524. Seven autopsy photographs were properly admitted in a murder trial, even though defendant did not contest the cause of death, because they showed the severely decomposed state of the corpse, which the jury could have concluded contradicted defendant's claim that he cared deeply about her and killed her in sudden passion. Cantu v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1639, 2012 WL 664939 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 1 2012).

525. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting autopsy photographs of the complainant's stab wounds, even though they graphs were gruesome, because the nature of the wounds was relevant to defendant's claim of self-defense. Crime scene photographs were not cumulative because they did not show the wounds on the victim's back. Mcpeters v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 854, 2012 WL 356184 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 2 2012).

526. In defendant's capital murder case, the trial court properly admitted autopsy photographs because they were not any more gruesome than what would be expected, the photographs tracked the doctor's testimony, and the photographs depicted the victim's bloody and bruised face and were vital to the State's case to the jury with regard to the manner and method of the victim's death. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 927, 2012 WL 361733 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 2 2012).

527. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting four photographs from the victim's autopsy because they helped the jury understand the extent of the victim's injuries, were demonstrative of defendant's intent, and did not constitute a large part of the pathologist's testimony and the State's case. The photographs were highly relevant and probative and not unfairly prejudicial. Ramirez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 455, 2012 WL 170996 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 19 2012).

528. For purposes of defendant's aggravated assault convictions, the photographs of the crime scene were admissible because their probative value was not substantially outweighed by their prejudicial value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as the photographs showed the injuries defendant inflicted on the victims, and they helped the jury to determine whether serious bodily injury resulted from the shooting. Hernandez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 344, 2012 WL 135675 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 18 2012).

529. Trial court did not err by admitting two crime scene photographs of the victim's body under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the photographs helped the State illustrate the paramedic's testimony by depicting both the crime scene and the victim's injuries; (2) the photographs were no more gruesome than the facts of the offense itself; and (3) the State did not spend a lot of time presenting the photographs to the jury. Suarez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6190 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 10 2011).

530. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence autopsy photographs of the victim under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they allowed the jury to compare defendant's description of the victim in his statement to the photographs, and aided the jury in understanding and evaluating the medical examiner's testimony. Tilford v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5933, 2011 WL 3273543 (Tex. App. El Paso July 29 2011).

531. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence six photographs of the baby's injuries under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they were important for the jury in understanding testimony offered by a pediatric surgeon and for forming their own conclusions regarding the cause of injury to the baby's genitals and leg. A key issue raised in the case was whether the baby's injury could have been inflicted by a small dog or whether it was caused by a sharp instrument in the hands of a person. Nadal v. State, 348 S.W.3d 304, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5104 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 7 2011).

532. In defendant's sexual assault on a child case, the court did not err by admitting two photographs of a box containing a used condom and condom wrapper because the photographs corroborated the victim's and the officer's testimony, there were only two black and white photographs offered, and those photographs were not gruesome. Chang Hyeong Lee v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3623, 2011 WL 1833142 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2011).

533. At defendant's criminal trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a videotape showing the layout of the apartment with a sign indicating no one was allowed to open the refrigerator; the evidence was necessary to prove the victim was outside defendant's apartment when he was shot and to develop defendant's motive by showing he was angry because he believed the victim was stealing beer from him. The presence of pornography or Nazi paraphernalia was not so inflammatory or prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as to outweigh the need of the State to present the video evidence. Amador v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3404, 2011 WL 1706474 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 5 2011).

534. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting four photographs of the victim's autopsy and the crime scene into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the photograph of the victim's injuries resulting from the gunshot was relevant and probative to show the location and state of the victim's body when it was discovered and the injuries inflicted on it; (2) the autopsy photographs were probative because they depicted the injuries defendant inflicted on the victim and illustrated the medical examiner's explanation of the victim's injuries; (3) the record showed that the admission of the photographs took very little time; and (4) the State needed the crime scene photographs to provide a necessary visual component that helped the jury understand the witnesses' testimony describing the victim's injuries and the manner in which she was discovered. The autopsy photographs were not cumulative of other evidence and were relevant to the manner and circumstances of the victim's death. Jiles v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3317, 2011 WL 1711228 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 3 2011).

535. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a photograph that showed a murder victim on the ground at the crime scene where, although some blood was visible on the victim's clothing and his chest was bared, the photograph was not gruesome, did not show a close-up of any injury, and merely depicted the victim in relation to his surroundings. The probative value of the photograph was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect. Acevedo v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2047, 2011 WL 1044402 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 23 2011).

536. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence several photographs of the victim at the scene of the murder based on Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) only two of the photographs could be considered close-ups, and none were autopsy photos; (2) the photographs corroborated the testimony of the responding officer and the pathologist at to the location and manner of the crime; and (3) a photograph of the victim's state of dress did not indicate that she was sexually assaulted and the State did not present any evidence at trial suggesting a sexual assault took place. Reese v. State, 340 S.W.3d 838, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1900 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 16 2011).

537. Trial court did not err in finding that the probative value of the photograph was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to defendant where the evidence was probative that defendant was the victim's assailant.

538. Photograph was properly admitted because the State offered a single crime scene photograph and no autopsy photographs, the picture was in color, the body was covered by a blanket except for the face, and the body had not been altered in any way, but depicted the scene of the crime as it existed when discovered by police. The fact that decomposition of the body had begun did not mean that the photograph depicted more than the nature of the crime. Mcghee v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 675 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2011).

539. In a felony murder trial, with driving while intoxicated as the underlying felony, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting a post-collision photograph showing part of the interior of the car defendant was driving, including a deceased passenger lying in the passenger seat. Alami v. State, 333 S.W.3d 881, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 135 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 6 2011).

540. In a murder case, photographs of a van that had been set on fire were not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and were relevant to establishing that the fire was intentionally set; defendant's counsel was not ineffective for not objecting to some of the photographs; and the extraneous offense of the burning of the van was admissible as same transaction contextual evidence and thus did not require a limiting instruction. Balderas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9752, 2010 WL 5621288 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 9 2010).

541. Even though the trial court erred by admitting three autopsy photographs that showed the surgical mutilation caused by the autopsy, the error was harmless because the medical examiner's testimony was brief and came four days before deliberations began, each set of autopsy photographs were admitted as a group, the medical examiner briefly explained what each photograph showed, and no particular emphasis was given to the offending photographs. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8313, 2010 WL 4053640 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 12 2010).

542. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the photographs and video recording of the victim's body being removed from her apartment because they were probative of the manner of the victim's death and the manner in which defendant tried to destroy evidence of his fingerprints on her body by setting fire to it. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7168, 2010 WL 3419184 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2010).

543. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a photograph of the victim taken at the crime scene because it was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403, even though it showed the victim at the time her body was discovered by police. The court held that: (1) the crime scene photo was relevant because it accurately reflected the location and state of the victim's body when it was discovered and the injuries inflicted on it; (2) it did not depict more than the nature of the crime and the nature of the gunshot wounds inflicted on the victim; and (3) only one photograph was introduced and very little time was needed to develop the evidence. Mcghee v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 15 2010).

544. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon and unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon by concluding that the probative value of photographs of one of the complainant's wounds was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or by admitting the photographs because the pictures were apparently introduced to help the complainant explain his multiple gunshot wounds and injuries, and, whether it was the State's intent or not, the pictures helped rebut defendant's self-defense argument because they, along with unobjected-to testimony by the second complainant, showed that a bullet entered his back. While the pictures were gruesome, they portrayed no more than the gruesomeness of the injuries defendant inflicted. Burleson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3250 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 29 2010).

545. There was no error under Tex. Rule Evid. 403 in admitting autopsy photographs into evidence to show both the stabbing injuries caused by defendant in killing the deceased and also burns caused to the deceased's body, including his genitalia, when defendant doused the body or the area around it with gasoline and set the body on fire. Bradford v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2839, 2010 WL 1224307 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 31 2010).

546. Balancing test under Tex. R. Evid 403 was sufficient where the judge responded affirmatively when the prosecutor asked if he wanted to look at autopsy photographs ahead of time, and the judge stated that he had engaged in a rule 403 balancing test. Bradford v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2839, 2010 WL 1224307 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 31 2010).

547. In a trial for capital murder, autopsy photographs were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they illustrated the medical examiner's testimony about the victim's wounds and did not depict the body during or post autopsy. Pabst v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1886 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 18 2010).

548. In defendant's felony murder case, a court properly admitted a photo of the victim prior to death because it demonstrated the victim's health and physical characteristics, the photo of the victim while alive furnished a basis of contrast and comparison with other photos showing the wounds inflicted by the assault, and the fact that several witnesses identified the victim did not necessarily reduce the probative value of the photo. Flores v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 822, 2010 WL 411747 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 4 2010).

549. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting photographs showing the victim's body and injuries from different angles and showing various views of the wounds because the photographs did nothing more than portray the consequences of defendant's actions. Tolopka v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 714 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 31 2010).

550. In defendant's murder case, the court properly admitted photographs depicting the condition of the victim's body as it was found in the lake because the photographs were relevant to show the circumstances of the killing and the crime scene at the time the victim's body was found. Although the photographs of the victim's body at the crime scene may be somewhat disturbing, their disturbing effect was due to the circumstances of the crime rather than any particular images depicted in the photographs. Wilson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 604, 2010 WL 323537 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 28 2010).

551. In the punishment phase of a manslaughter trial, there was no error under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) or Tex. R. Evid. 403 when the trial court admitted a picture of a person who was not present on the night of the charged offense, who was holding a weapon that was not involved in the charged offense. Zuniga v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 419 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 26 2010).

552. Admission of 12 autopsy photographs in a homicide case was error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they were only marginally relevant, given that the cause of death and blood loss were not disputed, and they were highly detailed color photographs focusing on internal injuries and thus may have distracted the jurors. However, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because little attention was devoted to these exhibits after they were admitted in evidence. Brown v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 273, 2010 WL 138331 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 13 2010).

553. In defendant's capital murder case, the court did not err by admitting photographs of the victims because the photographs were introduced to assist the medical examiner in explaining the injuries and to rebut defendant's self-defense argument. The photographs, particularly the close-ups of the bullet wounds, were gruesome; however, they portrayed no more than the gruesomeness of the injuries inflicted by defendant. Williams v. State, 301 S.W.3d 675, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1751 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

554. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in the admission of color autopsy photographs, which were necessary to a thorough examination of the victim's injuries. Fonseca v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9314, 2009 WL 4599971 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 8 2009).

555. Three of four autopsy photographs admitted into evidence in a murder case were not subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they were not unnecessarily gruesome. The other photo had at most a slight effect on the jury; thus, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Smith v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9297, 2009 WL 4547907 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 7 2009).

556. During defendant's murder trial, the trial court did not err in admitting into evidence certain autopsy photographs, because the probative value of the photographs was not substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403. The doctor used the photographs to explain the nature and extent of the complainant's internal injuries resulting from the blows from the bat; the photographs were no more gruesome than would be expected. Barnes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7931, 2009 WL 3248172 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

557. Autopsy photographs were properly admitted, under Tex. R. Evid. 403, in a capital murder because the sole contested issue was whether the victim was murdered or committed suicide, and the expert's testimony, aided by the photographs, was crucial to establishing that the victim was strangled. Kilgore v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6904, 2009 WL 2707175 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 28 2009).

558. In an intoxication manslaughter case, the court properly allowed photos of the scene because, while there were a large number of color photographs, there were no closeups of bodies, defendant's sister was covered, none of the pictures were gruesome, and there was no other way to adequately portray the events to the jury. Martinez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6631 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2009).

559. In a murder case, autopsy photographs were properly admitted because the State had to prove that defendant caused the victim's death by shooting him with a deadly weapon, and a doctor's testimony described the type of injuries the victim received, the extent of those injuries, and the cause of his death. Additionally, although the photographs were somewhat gruesome, they were not enlarged. Ramirez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6640, 2009 WL 4377427 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2009).

560. Nine photographs of injuries to a child were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the photographs were taken from different angles and locations, they were no more gruesome than the crime defendant committed, and they were not cumulative in nature. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5920, 2009 WL 2343259 (Tex. App. Dallas July 31 2009).

561. Court properly admitted autopsy photographs because, although the pictures were somewhat gruesome, and both were disagreeable to look at, they depicted nothing more than the reality of the brutal crime committed. The photographs were probative of defendant's use of a deadly weapon, the type of wounds sustained, and the brutality and seriousness of the crime, which bore on the issues of guilt and punishment. Rodriguez v. State, 398 S.W.3d 246, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4838, 2009 WL 1801264 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 25 2009).

562. In defendant's capital murder case, autopsy photographs were properly admitted because the photographs provided a necessary visual component to, and understanding of, the expert's testimony regarding the nature and extent of the victim's injuries. The photographs were probative because they showed the full extent and non-accidental nature of those injuries; thus, they were necessary for the State to develop its case. Nunez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4476, 2009 WL 1677821 (Tex. App. Dallas June 17 2009).

563. In defendant's capital murder case, photographs of the victim were not cumulative because one showed injuries to the child's neck and head from a side view, whereas two other photos showed injuries from a frontal view. Williams v. State, 294 S.W.3d 674, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4201 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 11 2009).

564. In a capital murder, case, autopsy photographs were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because their probative value substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice; they were used to show injuries not seen on the surface of a victim's body, and there was no danger that a jury would have attributed autopsy damage to defendant. Wiggins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4320, 2009 WL 1395928 (Tex. App. Dallas May 20 2009).

565. In defendant's murder case, the court properly admitted a photograph of the victim because, although the photo depicted the victim's bloodied face, his dentures (which had fallen out of his mouth), and a piece of his beard that had been detached from his face, the photo was the most comprehensive picture of the victim's blunt-trauma injuries, and its probative value was high. Even though it was probative, the picture was gruesome, meaning that it was disagreeable to look at; however, it depicted nothing more than the reality of the brutal crime. Wilson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2954 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 30 2009).

566. In defendant's capital murder case, an autopsy identification photograph of the victim was properly admitted at the guilt phase of trial because it was relevant and not cumulative of the autopsy photographs exhibiting the wounds. The complained-of picture was not particularly gruesome or detailed, it was not enhanced in any way, and it portrayed no more than the condition of the victim due to the injuries inflicted. Young v. State, 283 S.W.3d 854, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 979 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

567. Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors weighed in favor of admissibility of close-up photos of the victim because (1) the photos contained substantial probative value about the crime scene, the injuries received by the victim, and the State's theory that defendant's actions were intentional and not done in self-defense; (2) the photographs had very little potential to impress the jury in an irrational way because they were not overly gruesome; (3) the State took very little time in developing the testimony about the photos; and (4) the State needed the photos because there were no other close-up, crime-scene photos of the victim's wounds and the blood pattern from the wounds. Thus, the probative value of the photos was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice and the photos were admissible. Martinez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2274, 2009 WL 884785 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 3 2009).

568. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting crime-scene photographs despite defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the five photographs were not exactly alike, were not unnecessarily duplicative, took almost no time to introduce into evidence, and had very little, if any, potential to impress the jury in an irrational but indelible way. The photos were relevant to show the circumstances of the killing and the crime scene at the time. Hilliard v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2429, 2009 WL 838241 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

569. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting nine autopsy photographs despite defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because there was only one photograph of each gunshot wound showing its general location on the victim's torso and only one close-up view of it. The photographs were not duplicative and showed only the extent and nature of the wounds; the assistant medical examiner referred to all of the photographs during her testimony. Hilliard v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2429, 2009 WL 838241 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

570. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted a photograph of the decedent in his military uniform because the State offered the photograph so that the jury could identify what the victim looked like before he was murdered. The trial court even took steps to eliminate any prejudicial effect by admitting the photograph only after the State cropped the victim's medals off of his uniform, and little time was spent introducing and discussing the photograph. Gonzalez v. State, 296 S.W.3d 620, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1144 (Tex. App. El Paso

Feb. 19 2009).

571. Trial court did not err by admitting autopsy photos during the punishment phase of a murder trial because they were not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403; they had probative value, they did not show mutilation, the presentation of the photos constituted only a few pages of the record, and they were necessary to determine punishment. Defendant had entered a plea of guilty to the charge, but was before the jury seeking community supervision as punishment. Farnsworth v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1038, 2009 WL 349799 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

572. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting photographs depicting the wounds inflicted on the complainant's body alongside forensic equipment used to measure and locate those wounds. Although the photos were graphic and fully depicted the gravity of the offense suffered by the complainant, they were clinical rather than gratuitous; because each photo measured a different body part, there was no cumulative effect when viewing the photos as a complete series. Driver v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 778, 2009 WL 276539 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 5 2009).

573. During defendant's trial for murdering his wife, the trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 403 by admitting into evidence a picture that defendant described as his "mug shot" where the picture, which showed the head and shoulders of a shirtless defendant with red marks on his shoulder, arm, and upper chest, was offered to support his accomplice's testimony that she had continued having sex with defendant after the victim's death, and where defendant did not allege that the photo was taken for a previous offense. In addition, prior to the photo being admitted, testimony revealed that defendant had been taken into custody on the day the photo was taken, with defendant even conceding that it was taken while in police custody for the present offense, and the picture contained no overt markings specifically identifying it as a "mug shot," such as a chest plate depicting the name of the police department or case number. Vasquez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 377 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 22 2009).

574. In defendant's injury to a child case, the court did not err in admitting photographs of the child because a deputy testified to his initial observations of the child before being life-flighted to the burn center; the boy had a large knot on the left side of his head and blood coming out of his nose. The photos were clearly relevant and needed by the State to rebut defendant's statements denying causing any other injuries to the child and defendant's claim of accidental injury. Smith v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 401, 2009 WL 1941999 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 22 2009).

575. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted photographs because the exhibits constituted only two photographs and depicted nothing more than the reality of the brutal crime committed. The victim's body was clothed, and they were not extreme close-up shots. Badgett v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 342, 2009 WL 142324 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 21 2009).

576. In a capital murder case, a court did not err by admitting autopsy photographs because the photographs, which were taken after the bodies were cleaned, showed no mutilation, and they were not otherwise gruesome or wrenching in any way. Although there were nineteen challenged photographs, they were not duplicative of other evidence in the case or of each other, and the medical examiner spent a substantial amount of time discussing the challenged photographs, but that time was not unreasonable given the large number of injuries. Lopez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 296, 2009 WL 103332 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 15 2009).

577. In a driving while intoxicated case, a booking photograph of defendant was not excluded from evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was not unfairly prejudicial; even though the picture was not flattering, it did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational way. Moreover, it was relevant to show defendant's condition near the time of arrest. Hester v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9242 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 15 2008).

578. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a photograph of defendant holding a pistol during his trial for possessing more than four grams of cocaine with intent to deliver and for possessing more than four ounces of marihuana where the photograph was relevant because it made it more probable that defendant knowingly possessed both the contraband and the pistol, and where that relevance was not outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice because no significant amount of time was required to introduce the photograph. Furthermore, even though the photograph had the potential for impressing the jury in an improper way pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by suggesting that defendant was the sort of person who brandished a pistol during a telephone conversation, by linking defendant to the pistol found in the night stand of his motel room, albeit indirectly, the photograph was some evidence that defendant used the pistol to protect his drugs and money, and the State's only other evidence of such use, beyond defendant's simple possession of the weapon, was a police officer's testimony describing defendant's ambiguous movements when the officers entered his motel room. Rangel v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9008 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 5 2008).

579. In defendant's murder case, photographs of the victim's boyfriend's injuries were properly admitted because they assisted the doctor's descriptions of the boyfriend's injuries, and they were highly probative to show the full extent of the injuries the boyfriend suffered at the hands of defendant, who had claimed self-defense. Young v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 17, 2008).

580. In defendant's murder case, a photograph of the victim's body at the crime scene was properly admitted because the photograph was probative of both the manner of the victim's death and defendant's mental state, given that he argued self-defense. The State used very little time introducing the photograph, and while gruesome, it depicted nothing more than the reality of the brutal crime committed by defendant. Young v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 17, 2008).

581. In defendant's murder case, photographs of the victim's autopsy were properly admitted because the three photographs were necessary to assist the witness with explaining her testimony about the victim's stab wounds, especially given the fact that no one injury caused the victim's death. They were highly probative to show the full extent of the injuries defendant inflicted on the victim. Young v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 17, 2008).

582. In a driving while intoxicated case, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit the photographs allegedly showing the conditions of the road where the officer conducted the traffic stop because defendant's explanation for why he was swerving on the road was already before the jury, and the trial court could have concluded that photographs taken one year after the arrest were, at best, unnecessary and, at worst, could have misled the jury into believing the road conditions were worse than they actually were. Davis v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6459 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 20, 2008).

583. In the sentencing phase of defendant's drug case, the court properly admitted photographs showing a victim's injuries following his 1999 beating and the crime scene of that beating because the photographs were probative as to defendant's character and provided information to assist the jury in tailoring the appropriate sentence, the photographs had little, if any, tendency to suggest decision on an improper basis, and the State used the photographs as visual aids to supplement the beating victim's testimony as he described the incident. Aguilar v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6268 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18 2008).

584. In a capital murder case, the court properly admitted two photographs because the photographs bolstered a State witness's testimony that testifying as a "snitch" had detrimental consequences -- injury to his sister, the photographs presented little, if any, prejudice to defendant because no party suggested to the jury that defendant was connected to the stabbing of the witness's sister, and the time involved in the introduction of the two photographs was minimal and unlikely to distract the jury from considering the charged offense when compared to having the witness's sister testify before the jury. Padron v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6175 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2008).

585. Defendant's felony-murder conviction was proper because the admission was autopsy photographs was appropriate. The photographs were quite clinical in nature and the fracture and hemorrhaging would not have been visible to the jury without the photographs; it took little time to develop the evidence of the injuries. Bromon v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5886 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 5 2008).

586. Autopsy photographs of a murder victim were not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the photographs were 4 x 5 inches in size and were not particularly gruesome as no blood was evident from the photos and the victim's wound was clean. Nor did the photos depict mutilation of the victim caused by the autopsy itself. Avendano v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5832 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31, 2008).

587. In defendant's intoxication manslaughter case, the court properly admitted a photograph of the victim because the photograph showed the victim's condition at the scene of the accident, he was clothed and depicted lying face up on a flat board, and the photograph was not particularly gruesome. The photograph showed only some blood on the victim's face, and the victim's condition as depicted in the photograph was the subject of trial testimony. Villasana v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5462 (Tex. App. Dallas July 24 2008).

588. In defendant's murder case, the court properly admitted autopsy photographs because the medical examiner explained the contents of each photograph as it was projected onto a screen for the jury's view; the photos depicted mutilation to the body other than that caused by the gunshot wound, however, the witness distinguished for the jury the damage caused by the fatal gunshot from the marks that indicated life-saving attempts and the autopsy itself. Mata v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3476 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 14 2008).

589. There was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting four photographs depicting the scene of an aggravated assault and 11 autopsy photographs depicting the victim's injuries, even though the photographs were explicit, because when considered in light of the crime, they were not overly gruesome. Aviles v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3042 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 28 2008).

590. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs of the victim at the crime scene because some of the photographs were used by the experts to explain the manner of the death and the amount of force used by defendant when hitting the victim with the baseball bat, tending to disprove his self-defense claim; other photographs, along with the testimony of the blood-spatter expert, addressed the absence of any struggle between the victim and defendant and that the victim was either on his knees or on the ground while being beaten, while some photographs depicted the brutality of the crime and the severity of the injuries and were probative of the manner of the victim's death. Grayson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2210 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 27 2008).

591. In defendant's manslaughter case, the court properly admitted autopsy photographs because they provided a visual component to, and understanding of, the medical examiner's testimony about the extent and nature of the victim's injuries, not all of the photographs offered by the State were admitted by the trial court, and neither of the photographs showed any mutilation caused by the autopsy. Ashorali v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1976 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 19 2008).

592. In a murder trial, there was no error in admitting an eighth grade photograph of the 17-year-old victim, shown with several school friends, as proof of identity; the victim's parent testified that the picture depicted what the victim looked like just prior to death. Hornsby v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 345 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 16 2008).

593. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting photographs showing a gunshot wound to the head of the victim; the photographs were rather clinical in nature and relevant to the manner of death. Bounkhoun v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8784 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 5 2007).

594. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence defendant's book-in photograph because defendant did not object at trial or complain of an improperly suggestive photographic identification procedure by the State; the photograph was not prejudicial merely because defendant had an "angry look;" the photograph, which was used by a witness during her deposition to identify defendant as the perpetrator, was relevant as identity was an essential element of any criminal offense. King v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8766 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2007).

595. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting photographs of the victim's body in a capital murder case because they were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and were highly probative to show the victim's injuries and the specific circumstances of the murder. Gallo v. State, 239 S.W.3d 757, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1234 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

596. In a trial for intoxication assault arising from a car crash caused by defendant, there was no error in admitting photographs that showed, in graphic detail, the complainant's injuries, which included damage such that the complainant's liver was extruding from the complainant's body; the photographs were relevant to explain the nature of the injuries and the procedures used to treat the complainant, and, while undoubtedly explicit, they were not more emotionally loaded than any usual clinical photograph of a patient who sustained serious wounds. Strickland v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7383 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 11 2007).

597. In a capital murder case, photographs of skeletal remains as they were recovered from an excavation site, the remains in a body bag prior to autopsy, and the remains laid out on an autopsy table were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they showed defendant's culpable mental state, the reason no tissue injuries were found, and the cause of death. Moreover, the pictures were not so horrifying that a juror of normal sensitivity would have encountered difficulty in rationally deciding the issues of the case after reviewing them. Small v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6545 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2007).

598. Trial court properly admitted a photograph of a murder victim and his family because it was relevant to show a true appearance of the victim before his death, and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. While it showed the family smiling, the photograph was not the type that would impress the jury in an irrational but indelible way, no mention was made of the photograph during closing argument, and only one mention was made of the victim's children. Johnson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6256 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 8 2007).

599. In a murder trial, it was proper to admit an autopsy photograph of the victim's scalp pulled back, which exposed extensive hemorrhaging under the skull. The photograph did not depict mutilation caused by the autopsy, but the nature, location, and extent of the wounds, and was important in determining the manner of death because the wounds were separate from the gunshot wound, which was the cause of death. In re J.B.C., 233 S.W.3d 88, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5978 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

600. In defendant's capital murder case, photographs of the victim taken at the crime scene and at the autopsy were properly admitted because the photographs did not depict internal organs or show damage to the corpse resulting from the autopsy as opposed to the attack; that the wounds were inflicted by accomplices did not make the photographs unfairly prejudicial in the prosecution of defendant as a party to the murder. Randall v. State, 232

S.W.3d 285, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5860 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

601. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in the admission of gruesome photographs; it was precisely because they depicted the reality of the offense that they were powerful visual evidence, probative of various aspects of the State's case. Pecina v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3424 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 3 2007).

602. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, the State was permitted to admit evidence of pornographic photos taken from defendant's computer which depicted the kind of activity in which he was alleged to have engaged in; under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the probative value of the photographs substantially outweighed their prejudicial effect. Ficarro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 26 2007).

603. During defendant's criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 by determining that the probative value of the autopsy photographs of the three victims was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Although the photographs were gruesome, they depicted nothing more than the reality of the brutal crime committed. Confer v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2002 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 15 2007).

604. In a murder trial, photographs of the victim's burned body were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the crime scene photographs, while disturbing to view, merely depicted the gruesome reality of the injuries sustained. McKinney v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 95 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 9 2007).

605. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in the admission of a photograph of the victim's head showing the underlying soft tissue of the victim's skull; while graphic, the photograph was highly probative regarding the cause of death and defendant's intent, and the prejudicial effect, if any, was slight. Bigler v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10490 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 7 2006).

606. In a criminal trial for aggravated robbery, the trial court did not err by admitting gruesome photos of the victim; the State needed the photographs to explain the extent of the victim's injuries and the level of damage caused by the rifle bullet; the probative value of the photographs was not outweighed by their prejudicial effect. Hicks v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10375 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 4 2006).

607. In a murder trial, photographs of the deceased were properly introduced into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403, even though they showed the gruesome appearance of the body, which was badly burned in arson, because the photographs showed the position of stab wounds that caused death; although graphic, the photographs did not inject any additional, intangible, or inappropriate emotional element into the case such that the trial court should have necessarily excluded these photographs. Ledbetter v. State, 208 S.W.3d 723, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10040 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

608. Although defendant argued that the trial court erred in admitting an enlarged color autopsy photograph of the stab wounds on the murder victim's back, the photograph's probative value was not outweighed by its possible prejudicial effect because the photograph, although somewhat graphic, was not so gruesome or horrifying as to cause a juror of normal sensitivity to have difficulty rationally deciding the critical issues in the case, as the body and the wounds were clean, and the wounds, although large, were not gaping and did not show internal organs. Edwards v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8688 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 9 2006).

609. During a murder trial, the victim's mother identified a photograph of her son taken before the murder; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photograph; the mother's identification had probative value in identifying the son as the victim; because the photograph was not a gruesome autopsy or crime scene photograph, any danger of prejudice was slight. Brown v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7556 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25 2006).

610. In a murder case, autopsy photographs were properly admitted because, although the photographs were explicit, they were not particularly gruesome and the wounds were small pellet marks rather than large gunshot wounds or lacerations; the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the photographs. Terrazas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6696 (Tex. App. Austin July 28 2006).

611. Where defendant was on trial for possessing or transporting chemicals with the intent to manufacture methamphetamine, the trial court did not err in admitting photographs which showed a vapor cloud spraying from canisters found in defendant's car over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection as they were not so alarming in nature that they would have clouded the jury's mind with fear; instead, they provided a visual depiction of the disposal methods described through police testimony, and were relevant to police officers' belief that the canisters contained anhydrous ammonia. Daigger v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5846 (Tex. App. Austin July 7 2006).

612. In defendant's murder case, the court properly admitted photographs of the victim because the crime scene photographs illustrated that defendant attempted to destroy any incriminating evidence left in the victim's truck, the autopsy photographs did not depict any mutilation of the victim's body caused by the autopsy itself, and the photographs, which were taken from different angles, were not cumulative or repetitive. Henderson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5644 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 29 2006).

613. Pre-autopsy photographs were properly admitted in a murder trial; they illustrated the medical examiner's testimony and did not depict the body during or post autopsy; they displayed the bullet wound and condition of the body upon recovery and the result of the murder, dragging, and subsequent abandonment in the woods. Johnson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5214 (Tex. App. Dallas June 19 2006).

614. In a murder case, a court properly admitted autopsy photographs of the deceased because, although graphic, the photographs were probative of the manner in which the victim incurred the fatal injury and were necessary for the State in developing its case; although the photographs were explicit and gruesome, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting them, as the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the photographs. Brown v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5163 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

615. External autopsy photographs depicted a bruise behind the victim's ear and a bruise on her forehead; the photographs were approximately eight and a half by ten and three-fourths inches in size, were moderately close-up, were offered in color, and were not gruesome; also, the autopsy photographs showing bleeding under the victim's scalp and on her brain, although gruesome, showed a considerable amount of blood on the brain, and illustrated a doctor's testimony; thus, the probative value of the photographs was not substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect. Montgomery v. State, 198 S.W.3d 67, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3377 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

616. State argued that the burn evidence, which constituted other crimes evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), was admissible because in defendant's written statements, he stated that any injury that he inflicted on the victim, a 16-month old child, the night of her fatal injury was accidental; the burn evidence was relevant to show defendant's state of mind and his relationship with the victim and rebutted his claim of the accidental nature of the injury that resulted in her death; further, the testimony and photograph of the burn was not so graphic that it would have impressed the jury in an irrational, yet indelible way, and the State had a compelling need for the evidence because its case was entirely circumstantial, and defendant contested both his identity as the perpetrator and his state of mind. Montgomery v. State, 198 S.W.3d 67, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3377 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

617. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not err by admitting a photograph of the victim's head after the shooting; the photograph was not enlarged or changed in any way, and it was repetitive of another photograph. Whitmire v. State, 183 S.W.3d 522, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 170 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

618. Where defendant, a large Caucasian man, was accused of burglarizing the homes of two Hispanic families, photographs of defendant's tattoos were admissible as evidence of defendant's selfishness and his impact on the victims. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to raise an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Hicks v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10663 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 28 2005).

619. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting autopsy photographs in a capital murder trial where the photographs did not depict mutilation caused by the autopsy, but the nature, location, and extent of the wounds as testified to by the medical examiner who performed the victim's autopsy; thus, the photographs had the effect of illustrating the examiner's testimony. Frank v. State, 183 S.W.3d 63, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10647 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

620. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting crime scene photographs in a capital murder trial because the photographs provided strong visual evidence corroborating testimony of how the victim was murdered, the injuries inflicted, and the ultimate result of the events that took place on the date in question; although the photographs arguably depicted disagreeable realities, they depicted nothing more than the reality of the brutal crime committed and helped the jury to understand the verbal testimony. Frank v. State, 183 S.W.3d 63, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10647 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

621. In a murder case, the trial court did not err in admitting a poster-sized photograph of the victim into evidence; the trial court reasonably concluded that the larger image was helpful to the jury in understanding the victim's condition, and the gruesome nature of the photograph did not render it more prejudicial than probative. Williams v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8203 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 5 2005).

622. Autopsy photographs were properly admitted in a trial for a "shaken-baby" murder because they were described in the medical examiner's unchallenged testimony. San Martin Adriano v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7140 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2005).

623. In a trial for a "shaken-baby" murder, defendant failed to provide a clear and concise argument, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h), for his argument that photographs of the baby in her hospital bed should not have been admitted. He did not explain how, in his objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403, why the photographs were prejudicial. San Martin Adriano v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7140 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2005).

624. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, there was no error in admitting a video tape of defendant, even though he was handcuffed. The video was highly probative and not unduly prejudicial because it was limited to information that was otherwise admissible under Tex. Transp. Code Ann. § 724.061, defendant's refusal to submit to blood and breath tests, and also demonstrated appellant's physical condition and behavior close in time to the events at issue. Garcia v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6691 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 18 2005).

625. Trial court conducted an appropriate balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and did not abuse its discretion in admitting pre-autopsy photographs of manslaughter victims that were limited in number, showed very little blood, and were used by the medical examiner for the purpose of explaining the injuries suffered by the victims. Close-up photographs were used for identification and did not depict injuries, and none of the photographs depicted any inappropriate nudity. Winkle v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6250 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 8 2005).

626. In a criminal trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, the court did not abuse its discretion by admitting photographs of the crime scene that were taken during daylight hours. While the shooting actually occurred at night, the jury was made aware of the lighting differences. Rivera v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5459 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 14 2005).

627. Trial court did not err in admitting crime scene and autopsy photographs of the victim in defendant's trial for the murder of his wife because their probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury as provided in Tex. R. Evid. 403. The photographs were probative of the injury to the victim, the distance from the gun to the victim when fired, and the procedures followed by the medical examiner, and none of the photographs reflected the body after it had been opened for autopsy, nor did they show an excessive amount of blood. Dunn v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5412 (Tex. App. Dallas July 13 2005).

628. Pre-autopsy photographs including the victim's body in a hospital gown, the victim's nude body, upper and lower torso, and two photographs of the bullet wound, one close-up and one with the ear for reference, illustrated and clarified the medical examiner's description of the injuries, and the trial court therefore did not abuse its discretion in admitting them. The photographs were not gruesome, vulgar, or indecent, and they did not depict mutilation of the body caused by the autopsy. Smith v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5316 (Tex. App. Dallas July 7 2005).

629. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting into evidence photographs of the complainant's injuries where defendant was charged with aggravated assault causing serious bodily injury under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02(a)(1). The photographs, which showed multiple cuts and bruises on the complainant's face, his apparent blood-soaked hair, and a cut on his thumb, were relevant to show the nature of the wounds and were not particularly shocking or gruesome. Siale v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5153 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 30 2005).

630. Autopsy photographs of a murder victim were more probative than prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Although the photographs were shown on a screen, they were in black and white, limited in number, and except for the incision made by hospital personnel, assisted the jury in visualizing the wounds. Garcia v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4424 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 9 2005).

631. In a trial for burglary, a photograph of the victim's daughter was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403, even though the daughter was not present. The small, studio-quality photograph was not unduly prejudicial, and it was relevant because the victim, defendant's former girlfriend, testified that her conduct toward defendant was motivated by the desire to protect her young daughter from confrontation. Wight v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4334 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 7 2005).

632. Autopsy photographs in defendant's murder trial were not more prejudicial than they were probative because they were introduced during the coroner's testimony, and they were a small part of the overall evidence introduced during the entire trial. Holford v. State, 177 S.W.3d 454, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3602 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

633. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding autopsy photographs in a murder case where the State did not contest that the victim sustained a bullet wound to the front of his body, a medical examiner's testimony comprised convincing evidence to establish that the victim was shot in the front of the body, and the tattooing throughout the victim's body more likely than not would have inflamed the minds of the jurors. Moreover, any error was harmless because other evidence showed that the victim was not a law-abiding citizen and that he had previously threatened defendant and because the trial court assessed punishment at the lower end of the punishment range. Elizondo v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3680 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 12 2005).

634. Photographs of a murder victim were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and were not unduly prejudicial to defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because a photograph of the victim lying in an ambulance immediately after firefighters removed her body from a burning house was both material and probative, as it established her condition at the crime scene, and because a photograph of her face taken during autopsy was also material and probative of the fact that the autopsy was performed on the same person removed from the crime scene by ambulance. The numerous autopsy photographs were also probative of the victim's cause of death, a material element in the offense of capital murder, and although the detail in the photographs was graphic, each served the purpose of illustrating the nature and extent of the victim's injuries. Vargas v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2417 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2005).

635. Trial court erred by admitting certain photographs in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 403, and 901 because although the photographs that were found in defendant's kitchen the day after the alleged sexual assault that showed the victim naked and unconscious were properly admitted as they were essential to understanding the circumstances of the assault and tended to confirm her testimony; other photographs that showed unidentified men sexually assaulting another woman, and that showed defendant's house mate having sexual intercourse, and defendant urinating against the wall giving a gang sign were improperly admitted. There was no evidence that defendant took the other photographs or knew of their existence and they suggested an improper basis upon which to convict defendant. Casey v. State, 160 S.W.3d 218, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1807 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

636. In a capital murder case, a photograph of a victim and his family was admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was not cumulative, and the picture was used for identification because a gunshot wound had caused significant damage to the victim's face; moreover, an autopsy photograph of a portion of the victim's reconstructed face was also admissible because it was used to show the type of gunshot wound inflicted. Gonzales v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1705 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 3 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1372, 164 L. Ed. 2d 80, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 1407, 74 U.S.L.W. 3472 (U.S. 2006).

637. In a murder trial, it was not error to admit autopsy photographs of the victim's burnt, mutilated and decomposed body. Denoso v. State, 156 S.W.3d 166, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 878 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2005).

638. Trial court admitted an autopsy photograph of a murder victim in accordance with Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the photograph was used to identify the body and because there were no other such photographs before the jury. Furthermore, the photograph was not particularly gruesome, and it did not depict mutilation caused by the autopsy. Flores v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 456 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 20 2005).

639. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a murder case in admitting autopsy photographs showing the severity of the injuries to the victim's head, which she suffered after she was thrown off defendant's car. Although gruesome, the photographs reflected nothing more than the reality of the crime committed and were offered to document the injuries the medical examiner was describing. Foust v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 12 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 4 2005).

640. Trial court did not err by overruling defendant's objection to three autopsy photographs of a murder victim's body, which showed close-up views of a bullet entry wound on the victim's back, the large bruise on the front of his chest where the bullet tried to exit, and his bloodied face, in a case in which the photos were admitted during the State medical examiner's testimony and assisted him in describing his findings for the jury and illustrating to the jury the location and nature of the victim's wounds. The photos depicted the extent and nature of the victim's wounds and did not show any alteration to his body resulting from autopsy or medical procedures, and thus, were not unnecessarily gruesome or so inflammatory that they would be excludable from the capital murder trial on grounds that their probative value, to show circumstances of crime and to depict reality of offense, was substantially outweighed by danger of unfair prejudice in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Sierra v. State, 157 S.W.3d 52, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11374 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

641. Trial court did not err in admitting the four photographs of the victim at the crime scene because although the photographs may have been disturbing, they depicted nothing more than the reality of the crime committed. Barrera v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11917 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 3 2004).

642. In a trial for attempted murder, it was proper to admit an autopsy report regarding a different victim, which included details about the angle of the wound and photographs of the body. The autopsy report was highly technical and contained no inflammatory language likely to influence the jury in an irrational way; the photographs were not unnecessarily gruesome. Adams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8999 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 12 2004).

643. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder where defendant killed the deceased by hitting him repeatedly on the head with a hammer, the trial court did not err in admitting an autopsy photograph of the victim showing the floor of the cranial cavity and a hinge fracture. The photograph, while not pleasant to view, was not particularly gruesome. Turner v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7903 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2004).

644. Use of autopsy photographs to illustrate the testimony of medical examiners is consistently approved. Turner v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7903 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2004).

645. Admission of photographic evidence is committed to the discretion of the trial court. Turner v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7903 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2004).

646. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in defendant's murder case in allowing the admission into evidence of a photograph of the victim's upper body, which showed the gunshot wounds on the body, as it was the only photograph that was admitted to show the location of the wounds, the photograph was not more prejudicial than probative, and testimony regarding the same injuries would have been admissible. Hughes v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6267 (Tex. App. Tyler July 14 2004).

647. In a capital murder case, autopsy photographs of a dead police officer were admissible because their probative value was not greatly outweighed by the prejudicial impact on the jury; the photographs in question helped explain a medical examiner's testimony describing a victim's various wounds for which defendant was responsible. Escamilla v. State, 143 S.W.3d 814, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1032 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 950, 125 S. Ct. 1697, 161 L. Ed. 2d 528, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2827, 73 U.S.L.W. 3569 (2005).

648. Where defendant was charged with two counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child, photographs of the genitalia of the two victims photographs depicting penetrating trauma to the genitalia of the two complainants was admissible as the photographs were not gruesome, and they actually served a medical purpose since they helped explain and illustrate the doctor's findings that one child suffered "penetrative vaginal trauma." Umphres v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5737 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 25 2004).

649. Trial court does not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs if they will help the jury to understand verbal testimony such as technical language used by a medical doctor in describing injuries sustained. Umphres v. State,

2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5737 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 25 2004).

650. Where defendant contended that the bloody trail depicted in crime scene photographs would have had such an emotional impact on the jury that its decision would be based on emotion, the appellate court found that the trial court had not abused its discretion in admitting them since the amount of time devoted to developing the evidence was minimal, and the photographs did not depict any bodies and, although they depicted blood, they were not particularly gruesome. Corona v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5042 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 9 2004).

651. In a capital murder trial, the trial judge did not err in admitting a photograph of the victim's charred body. The photo was black and white and was the only photograph of the front part of the victim's body and, as such, was the only visual evidence illustrating the complete condition of the body when it was found; it was also relevant in that it aided in depicting the nature and extent of the victim's wounds and it was not so gruesome as to be unfairly prejudicial. Windland v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4709 (Tex. App. Dallas May 26 2004).

652. Trial judge abused his discretion in admitting a photograph of defendant's prior family assault victim where the State had other evidence of defendant's intent, specifically defendant's testimony that he had been convicted three times of similar assaults; the probative value of the photograph was not particularly compelling in light of his admission to the offense, and a limiting instruction would likely not have been effective because of the indelible impression photographic evidence of this nature leaves. Randolph v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4363 (Tex. App. Waco May 12 2004).

653. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting 14 autopsy photographs into evidence because they were relevant, as they accurately reflected the state of the victim's body when it was discovered and the injuries inflicted on him. None of the photographs were especially large, all were taken from different angles, and they were not gruesome simply because they showed the body in a state of decomposition. Gutierrez v. State, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2211 (Tex. Crim. App. Apr. 21 2004).

654. In a case involving the crime of intoxication manslaughter, a trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the pre-autopsy photograph of a victim during sentencing because its probative value was not substantially outweighed by its inflammatory nature where the evidence showed that the photograph was of average size, it was not a close-up shot, the victim had been cleaned of extraneous blood, and the victim was depicted in a sterile environment; the fact that the victim was nude and the picture was in color was not sufficient to preclude its admission into evidence, and, even if the decision to admit the photograph was erroneous, it was harmless because no substantial rights were affected since defendant failed to object to the admission of other postmortem photographs. Grindele v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2861 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 31 2004).

655. Appellate court could not say that the trial court erred in admitting photos of the decedent in defendant's murder trial, as the photos depicted the gunshot wounds that caused decedent's death, and they did not show mutilations caused by autopsy. Moraida v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2833 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 30 2004).

656. In a criminal prosecution for murder, autopsy photographs of the victim were admissible to establish the victim's cause of death. The photographs had a high probative value, were not excessively gruesome, and owed any disturbing nature to the crime itself. Troncoso v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2578 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 24, 2004).

657. Autopsy photographs are admissible unless they depict mutilations of the victim due to the autopsy itself. Troncoso v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2578 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 24, 2004).

658. Where pictorial evidence will help the jury understand verbal testimony, such as the technical language used by a medical doctor in describing the injuries sustained by a victim of a crime, a trial court does not abuse its discretion in admitting these photographs. Troncoso v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2578 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 24, 2004).

659. In a capital murder trial, photographs of other crimes committed by defendant were properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403, as they did not establish that defendant was insane at the time of a specific murder and the jury could have been confused; while the photographs were relevant to the issue of defendant's sanity, merely viewing the photographs would not necessarily have proven that defendant was legally insane, and their probative value was limited. Resendiz v. State, 112 S.W.3d 541, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 97 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003), cert. denied, Resendiz v. Texas, 541 U.S. 1032, 124 S. Ct. 2098, 158 L. Ed. 2d 713, 2004 U.S. LEXIS 3274 (2004).

660. Autopsy photographs are relevant to show the identity of the victim and the manner and means of death. Moreno v. State, 1 S.W.3d 846, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 6657 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 1999).

661. Photographs of bodies of murder victims were admissible at the trial of the murderers because the photos were used to show the wounds that were ascertained during the autopsy and the causes of death. Moreno v. State, 1 S.W.3d 846, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 6657 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 1999).

662. Court properly admitted autopsy photos because, although they were gruesome, they were no more gruesome than the injuries that defendant inflicted upon the victim when he committed the offense of intoxication manslaughter. Each of the six photographs depicted a different view of the victim and showed the different injuries that she suffered, and the State did not offer a large number of photographs, nor were the photographs it offered cumulative of the victim's injuries. Booth v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2351, 2014 WL 887286 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 28 2014).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Recordings

663. Where defendant was convicted of capital murder for shooting his wife and her lover, the trial court did not violate this rule by allowing the State to introduce a recorded call from a customer who called 9-1-1 after hearing gunshots; 9-1-1 calls are admissible in the guilt/innocence phase to provide a framework within which the particulars of the State's evidence may be developed. Mendoza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11728 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 18 2013).

664. Where defendant was convicted of capital murder for shooting his wife and her lover, the trial court's admission of a video recording of the bloody crime scene did not result in unfair prejudice or duplicate the medical examiner's testimony and crime scene photograph. Mendoza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11728 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 18 2013).

665. Trial court did not err by admitting a recording of a 9-1-1 call under this section because the call was not emotionally charged or otherwise inflammatory where the caller's behavior was consistent with any reasonable person tending to a severely injured party. Moreover, the call was admissible to provide a framework for the State to develop its case because the victim was unable to provide full information regarding the events after the incident due to a loss of consciousness. Woods v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9396 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 30 2013).

666. At defendant's trial for indecency with a child by contact, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to the portions of a recorded interview in which he admitted viewing pornography, masturbating, and having sexual urges toward children. The prejudicial impact of the evidence was low in light of the allegations against him, and defendant's description of his sexual urges toward children was relevant to the elements of the offense. Mattingly v. State, 382 S.W.3d 611, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8126, 2012 WL 4457713 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 26 2012).

667. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding from evidence video recordings appellants took of appellee because from the video, there was no way to know what had been edited out, and therefore the trial court could have determined that audio of appellee making harassing comments on various dates in 2006 could mislead the jury. Vaughn v. Drennon, 372 S.W.3d 726, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5488, 2012 WL 2833847 (Tex. App. Tyler July 11 2012).

668. No error resulted from the State's failure to mute a recording in which a detective told defendant "there is a time to quit," and said he needed to stop whatever types of issues he was having and that the police were watching him because the prejudicial effect of the statements was slight. Basinger v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3847, 2012 WL 1704322 (Tex. App. Dallas May 16 2012).

669. During defendant's trial for the felony offense of driving while intoxicated, the State was permitted to admit some audio portions of an video recording of defendant in the intoxilyzer room. Because the audio portion of the videotape informed the jury of defendant's level of impairment close in time to his operation of a motor vehicle, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Kelly v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1152 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 16 2011).

670. Recordings of telephone calls defendant made from jail, in which he admitted running from the police, were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Although the beginning portion of the recordings indicated defendant was an inmate, no date was mentioned, no information was provided regarding the length of defendant's stay in jail, and the testimony before the jury contained no references to defendant as an inmate or that he was in jail at the time of the calls. White v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2723 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 1 2010).

671. In a trial for aggravated assault on a public servant, there was no error in the admission of compilation exhibits in which the audio recording of defendant's conversation with a 911 operator was paired and played with videotapes of a pursuit taken from patrol cars; the exhibits were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they showed the timing of the events and demonstrated that defendant intentionally or knowingly aimed a vehicle at officers, even though the jury was advised through a detective's testimony that the synchronization of the audio track with the video tracks was not perfectly accurate. Jarrell v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6357 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 10 2007).

672. In a capital-murder trial, the perpetrator's videotaped statement, which was relevant and probative to the State's case, was not improperly admitted over the perpetrator's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection, since the perpetrator did not overcome the presumption that the evidence was more probative than prejudicial since he admitted his direct involvement in causing at least one of the victim's stab wounds and starting the fire in her bedroom. Mata v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4505 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 7 2007).

673. Where defendant pleaded guilty to three counts of sexual assault of a child and a fourth count of indecency with a child, at sentencing the jury was permitted to view seven pornographic videotapes that defendant took to the hotel and viewed before engaging in sexual acts with the victim; the jury could reasonably conclude that the tapes played a role in the sexual assault and showed defendant's sexual interests; the probative value of the videotapes was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9982 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 15 2006).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Visual Formats

674. Defendant's conviction for recklessly causing serious bodily injury to a child was appropriate because the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting into evidence a video recording of the infant while he was in the hospital. The video had probative value because it demonstrated the seriousness of the infant's brain injury and the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the video aided the jury's understanding of the mother's testimony regarding the long-term effects of the injury as it showed the infant's diminished ability to see or speak; further, the recording depicted nothing more emotional or graphic than the photographs. Holte v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12207, 2013 WL 5498134 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 1 2013).

675. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault on a child, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting into evidence a videotape depicting defendant and his ex-wife acting out a father/daughter fantasy. Richert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7719 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

676. In a capital murder case, a crime scene video was properly not excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was not duplicative of autopsy photographs; moreover, the fact that the video showed burns and nudity was not a sufficient reason for exclusion either. Even if the video was improperly admitted, it had a slight or no effect on the jury's verdict. Denson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5971, 2012 WL 3025845 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 25 2012).

677. Because defendant did not establish how the slower version videos and the single frame pictures were more prejudicial than the real-time video, the admission of that evidence did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403. Evans v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1991, 2012 WL 848142 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 14 2012).

678. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a video recording depicting the nature of the victim's injuries because it was relevant to proving serious bodily injury, an element of aggravated assault. The video was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) it communicated that the victim's injuries were serious in a non-technical way; (2) it was recorded a week before the trial and therefore was more current than other evidence; (3) it lasted only two minutes; and (4) it was only played once for the jury without sound. Rodriguez v. State, 352 S.W.3d 548, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8130 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 12 2011).

679. In a trial for aggravated assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 1001(a) in admitting a crime scene videotape that showed the bodies of two murdered individuals who were not the victims of the charged offense. The video gave the jury a three dimensional perspective in understanding the chaotic sequence of events on the night in question. Dotson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5255, 2011 WL 2714058 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 13 2011).

680. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the photographs and video recording of the victim's body being removed from her apartment because they were probative of the manner of the victim's death and the manner in which defendant tried to destroy evidence of his fingerprints on her body by setting fire to it. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7168, 2010 WL 3419184 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2010).

681. In a murder and assault trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by not moving exclude an in-store video of defendant's ammunition purchase because the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Julius v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8555, 2009 WL 3673089 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 5 2009).

682. In a drug trial, video excerpts from a seized camera were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, because they were material to the issues of possession-with-intent-to-deliver a controlled substance and a deadly weapon finding, in that they placed defendant in a drug house around the money and guns. They were not unduly prejudicial because they did not show actual drug dealing. Mincey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2825, 2009 WL 1058734 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 21 2009).

683. In a trial for aggravated assault on a public servant, there was no error in the admission of compilation exhibits in which the audio recording of defendant's conversation with a 911 operator was paired and played with videotapes of a pursuit taken from patrol cars; the exhibits were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they showed the timing of the events and demonstrated that defendant intentionally or knowingly aimed a vehicle at officers, even though the jury was advised through a detective's testimony that the synchronization of the audio track with the video tracks was not perfectly accurate. Jarrell v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6357 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 10 2007).

684. In a juvenile defendant's murder case, the court did not err by admitting a videotape of the crime scene, although nine photographs of the crime scene were also admitted, because an officer testified that the video depicted items not included in the photographs such as the path that the cab took once it left the pavement, some blood spatter on a house, a tennis shoe in the driveway, and the position of the body inside the cab. In re E.C.D., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1270 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 21 2007).

Evidence : Documentary Evidence : General Overview

685. In defendant's drug case, the court properly admitted a letter a witness received from defendant while they were both in jail for the offense because the letter was probative of defendant's relationship with the witness, as well as his guilt. Although the letter contained some derogatory racial language, the language was used by defendant to refer to himself, and other racial references were directed at the witness. Caballero v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10098, 2012 WL 6035259 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 5 2012).

686. In a sexual abuse case, any risk of unfair prejudice from the statements attributing the victim's suicidal thoughts to defendant's abusive conduct did not substantially outweigh the probative value of that evidence because nothing in the record reflects the jury was confused, misled, or unable to evaluate the probative force of any of the evidence. Further, the presentation of the letter did not take an inordinate amount of time, and it did not merely repeat evidence already admitted. Lofton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9664, 2011 WL 6225415 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 9 2011).

687. In a murder trial, photographs, which were used along with the forensic pathologist's testimony, were properly admitted since the photographs themselves were not particularly offensive, nor were they portrayed in any manner more gruesome than that of the injuries inflicted, and none of the photographs showed any injury resulting from autopsy procedures done to the body of the decedent. Braziel v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6101 (Tex. App. El Paso July 8 2004).

Evidence : Documentary Evidence : Completeness

688. In an intoxication manslaughter case, the trial court's decision to exclude the statements at issue did not violate the doctrine of optional completeness because the officer's testimony that people at the scene said they saw what happened did not leave a false impression with the jury, and the excluded statements were not necessary to fully understand the officer's testimony; he further testified that people were approaching him while he was laying the flare line on the scene and that he gave one person a stack of affidavits so that witnesses could begin writing down what they saw. The officer testified that he did not talk to every witness on the scene, thus informing the jury that not all witnesses testified at trial. Mole v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2838, 2009 WL 1099433 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 23 2009).

689. In defendant's murder case, the trial court properly excluded a psychiatrist's memo because the entirety of it was not on the same subject as the portion read aloud by the doctor during direct examination. The memo covered her entire conversation with defendant which took place over more than six hours, and much of the memo was not on the same subject as the portion read into evidence by the prosecutor. Whipple v. State, 281 S.W.3d 482, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6344 (Tex. App. El Paso 2008).

Evidence : Documentary Evidence : Writings : General Overview

690. In a forgery case, the trial court was within its discretion in admitting defendant's letter into evidence over her Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. The letter indicated a consciousness of guilt and had great probative value to the main issue at trial -- the identity of the forger. Shaw v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2543 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 30 2012).

Evidence : Hearsay : Credibility of Declarants : Impeachment Evidence

691. In a trial for defendant's murder of a stepchild, defendant was not entitled to introduce, as a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 801, a statement by the child's other parent about hating children because defendant called the other parent to the stand for the primary purpose of placing before the jury the inadmissible hearsay statement as substantive evidence of the other parent's guilt; any probative value the impeachment evidence might have had was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9519 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 5 2007).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Statements Against Interest

692. Declarant's statements were properly admitted as statements against interest because there were sufficient corroborating circumstances that clearly indicated the trustworthiness of the statements. The declarant made the statements in response to questions from his common law wife about his involvement in the robbery, the declarant's guilt was not inconsistent with defendants, and the testimony bore significant probative force and was valuable in proving the State's case in chief. Gonzalez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7084, 2011 WL 3849393 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 31 2011).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Statements of Child Abuse

693. Evidence of bathing incident between defendant and his niece was admissible, Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, 404(b), as it showed the nature of defendant's relationship with and mindset towards his niece, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 Gragert v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3948, 2011 WL 2027955 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 24 2011).

694. Where defendant was charged with multiple counts of indecency with a child by contact, the court properly excluded expert testimony that the complainants' allegations were the result of manipulation, peer pressure, and improper interview techniques. The court was not convinced that the study in question was reliable, and the probative value of the study was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Music v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7789 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 22 2005).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Confessions : General Overview

695. In defendant's capital murder case, a court did not err by admitting testimony about defendant's confession where the trial court properly concluded that the evidence was a significant part of the State's case because defendant's confession linked him to the store at the time of the robbery and murder, making it more likely that he left his fingerprint on the cash drawer at the time of the offense. Webber v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 15 2004).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Statements by Coconspirators : General Overview

696. Out-of-court statements were non-testimonial and did not violate the Confrontation Clause because the statements were non-hearsay statements made by a co-conspirator; moreover, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding the probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Agyin v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13337 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 30 2013).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Statements by Party Opponents : General Overview

697. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting statements that defendant made to a jailer where the evidence was admissible as an admission by a party-opponent, as it was offered to prove that defendant admitted guilt in the instant case-he was being held for murder and said he would have to limit himself to one murder every two years. The jailer's testimony clarified the circumstances surrounding the victim's shooting, directly contradicted defendant's theory of the case that his accomplices were wrongly accusing him of firing the gun so that they would receive a favorable deal in their own cases, and was not likely to impress the jury in some irrational but nevertheless indelible way. Haynes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7232 (Tex. App. Eastland June 13 2013).

698. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant's statement to a witness who had been in jail with him before the trial, that defendant was the "shooter," where the State did not offer the inmate's testimony as evidence of an extraneous offense separate and apart from the charged offense but, instead offered the evidence as proof that defendant fired the shots that killed the victim. The statement was an admission by a party-opponent, supported the allegation that defendant killed the victim, directly contradicted defendant's defensive theory that his accomplices only named him as the shooter to get a reduced sentence, and was not likely to impress the jury in some irrational but nevertheless indelible way. Haynes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7232 (Tex. App. Eastland June 13 2013).

699. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence statements defendant made in a letter concerning the murder because the statements were not hearsay under Tex. R. Evid. 801, as they were admissible as admissions of a party opponent. The statements were relevant because in the letter defendant did not claim, as he did at trial, that the shooting was accidental, and they were not inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403, as the statements supported the State's contention that defendant intentionally shot the victim, it related to defendant's state of mind which was a central issue at trial, and the letter was brief and not cumulative of other evidence. Benitez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9871, 2011 WL 6306643 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 15 2011).

700. In a medical malpractice case, the probative value of statements from superseded pleadings regarding two nonsuited doctors was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because counsel, representing the parents of an injured child, first alluded to the doctor's party status, thus opening the door to rebuttal, and the statements, which were made by the parents, constituted admissions by party-opponents under Tex. R. Evid. 801, and were not hearsay. Bay Area Healthcare Group, Ltd. v. McShane, 239 S.W.3d 231, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 527, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 866 (Tex. 2007).

Evidence : Hearsay : Rule Components : Truth of Matter Asserted

701. Trial court did not err by excluding evidence of the father's psychological evaluation, which included an evaluation of his predilection to pedophilia, because since the father's stated reason to admit the evidence could be accomplished by permitting the mother to testify concerning actions she took to investigate allegations of child abuse against the father in 2003, the trial court was within its discretion to find that there was no other purpose for which the evaluation could have been offered than for the truth of its contents. In addition, the trial court was within its discretion to decide that the evaluation itself would have been cumulative of the mother's testimony and that admitting it would have needlessly confused the jury. In the Interest of W.B.W., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5562, 2012 WL 2856067 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

702. In defendant's drug case, the court did not err by admitting a videotape of a witness's interrogation by police because it was introduced to "rebut the witness's claims that the police threatened and coerced her into falsely stating that defendant was at the parking lot in order to conduct the drug deal;" the trial court negated any tendency of the evidence to suggest to the jury that defendant was guilty, or to distract the jury from the coercion issue, by instructing the jury that it was not to consider the videotape for the truth of the matters asserted therein. Kennedy v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3424 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 8 2008).

703. Trial court's decision to allow a sheriff's office investigator to testify to statements that an assault/domestic violence victim made to her as extrinsic evidence of the victim's prior inconsistent statements was not an abuse of discretion where the victim unequivocally admitted making statements to the investigator, but when confronted with her prior statements, her answers in large part were not responsive and the trial court had to admonish her during her testimony for offering explanations rather than answers. The testimony of the investigator could have been admitted for the purpose of showing what the victim said rather than the truth of the matter stated, and defendant did not demonstrate that the testimony of the investigator was more probative than prejudicial. Sharp v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3216 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 20 2006).

Evidence : Inferences & Presumptions : Inferences

704. In a trial for possession hydromorphone, it was proper to admit unsealed and opened vials of medicine to support an inference that defendant's possession was not a one-time mistake. Moore v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5823, 2014 WL 2521537 (Tex. App. Tyler May 30 2014).

Evidence : Judicial Notice

705. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by taking judicial notice of defendant's birth date where the alleged discrepancy regarding defendant's date of birth was not reflected in the appellate record, and as to the age difference, the victim testified without objection that she was 14 years old and that defendant told her he was 35 years old. The jury could also draw its own conclusions from the appearance of the victim and defendant in the courtroom. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2878 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 927, 125 S. Ct. 1652, 161 L. Ed. 2d 489, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2556, 73 U.S.L.W. 3556 (2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Burdens of Proof : General Overview

706. In connection with defendant's trial for injury to a child causing bodily injury, the trial court did not err in admitting photographs of injuries to the child that defendant claimed were caused by a sibling's bite because it was a matter for the jury to determine whether certain injuries were consistent with a bite mark; the photographs were not unnecessarily inflammatory and the trial court properly applied the balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and found that they were admissible. Bondy v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5629 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 24 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Curative Admissibility

707. Trial court did not err during defendant's trial for indecency with a child when it allowed the prosecutor, for the limited purpose of impeachment, to question the victim's mother about her knowledge of defendant's prior convictions for aggravated sexual assault of two other children because the mother's testimony on direct examination by defendant's counsel that she had no reason to suspect that defendant would abuse her children opened the door and put at issue her credibility. Delacruz v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13492, 2013 WL 5890796 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 31 2013).

708. Defendant's statement to police that he had, 20 years earlier, been accused of improper conduct with his former stepdaughter, was not relevant to prove defendant's intent under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and it was unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Defendant did not "open the door" to admission of the statement, Tex. R. Evid. 107, by responding to a question by the State. However, given the evidence of guilt, the error was harmless. Cressman v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9849, 2012 WL 5974013 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 29 2012).

709. Evidence of defendant's prior conviction for delivering drugs was admissible where, through his questioning of a defense witness, defense counsel had sought to paint defendant as a "white knight" not involved with drugs, thereby creating a false impression before the jury; by doing so, defendant opened the door to testimony to correct that false impression, and the prosecutor could only correct that false impression by cross-examination of the witness who created it. Jones v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7917 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 5 2006).

710. It was not an error for the trial court to admit testimony that a computer was found at defendant's residence containing child pornography under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the State was merely walking through the door opened by defendant, and defendant's objection occurred well after the evidence was before the jury; during cross-examination by defense counsel, a witness identified the "pedophile"-laden computer and a pedophile website found on it, and two additional questions were asked about the computer; therefore, later testimony that the computer did in fact contain pornographic images was properly admitted. Hale v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7825 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2006).

711. Defendant on a drug delivery charge was estopped from raising on appeal any error in the admission of subsequent deliveries at the guilt phase because he admitted his guilt at the penalty phase of trial; further, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 or Tex. R. Evid. 404 because his counsel opened the door by suggesting that defendant was only a marginal participant in the drug trade and that the charged transaction constituted his sole involvement in the drug business. Houston v. State, 208 S.W.3d 585, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3056 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

712. In a criminal trial for burglary, the court did not err by allowing a police officer to testify as to the contents of defendant's van. The testimony was needed to show that defendant was in recent possession of stolen property; the testimony was not character evidence of other crimes or wrong acts. Middleton v. State, 187 S.W.3d 134, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 578 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

713. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not err by allowing the prosecutor's questions regarding the defendant's possible exchange of sexual favors for forgiveness of a drug debt; the evidence was admissible to show the relationship between defendant and the victim. Whitmire v. State, 183 S.W.3d 522, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 170 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

714. Where defendant, a large Caucasian man, was accused of burglarizing the homes of two Hispanic families, photographs of defendant's tattoos were admissible as evidence of defendant's selfishness and his impact on the victims. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to raise an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Hicks v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10663 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 28 2005).

715. Where defendant was charged with multiple counts of indecency with a child by contact, the court properly excluded expert testimony that the complainants' allegations were the result of manipulation, peer pressure, and improper interview techniques. The court was not convinced that the study in question was reliable, and the probative value of the study was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Music v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7789 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 22 2005).

716. No reversible error was presented under Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, and 404(b) by an arresting officer's testimony that defendant told the officer during a traffic stop about defendant's prior arrests because the videotape of the stop, including defendant's own statement of the arrests, was admitted without objection under R. 402, 403, and 404(b). Tunstall v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6336 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 10 2005).

717. In a criminal trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, the court did not abuse its discretion by admitting photographs of the crime scene that were taken during daylight hours. While the shooting actually occurred at night, the jury was made aware of the lighting differences. Rivera v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5459 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 14 2005).

718. Pre-autopsy photographs including the victim's body in a hospital gown, the victim's nude body, upper and lower torso, and two photographs of the bullet wound, one close-up and one with the ear for reference, illustrated and clarified the medical examiner's description of the injuries, and the trial court therefore did not abuse its discretion in admitting them. The photographs were not gruesome, vulgar, or indecent, and they did not depict mutilation of the body caused by the autopsy. Smith v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5316 (Tex. App. Dallas July 7 2005).

719. In a murder case, the trial court did not err in allowing testimony during punishment regarding racial language on a tattoo; defendant's unfair prejudice argument lacked merit because defendant's tattoo was relevant to the issue of motive and defendant did not ask for a limiting instruction. Woodward v. State, 170 S.W.3d 726, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5255 (Tex. App. Waco 2005).

720. Trial court properly admitted evidence of an extraneous assault offense under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) where defendant's wife's testimony on behalf of the defense was an attempt to show that her injury was caused by an accident, not the intentional actions of defendant. Thus, a videotape in which defendant admitted a prior assault on his wife made the defensive theory of accident less probable and was relevant to rebut the defensive theory of accident. Iroegbu v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5296 (Tex. App. Dallas July 6 2005).

721. In a child sexual assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting defendant's medical records for the purpose of showing that he had herpes, which the victim had contracted from the assault; the probative value of the medical records was not substantially outweighed, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, by the prejudicial impact. Eslora v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2564 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 6 2005).

722. Where defendant was charged with the murder of her ex-boyfriend's new girlfriend, the trial court did not err in admitting into evidence a letter written by defendant to her ex-boyfriend in which she described the intensity of her feelings for him and her concern about the possibility of his philandering. Defendant's statements proved that she had a motive to kill the complainant; the prejudice of the letter did not substantially outweigh its probative value. Harris v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 346 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 13 2005).

723. Defendant's statements to police which contradicted other evidence presented at trial were relevant and admissible to show his consciousness of guilt. Although the tapes contained references to drugs, crime, nicknames, extraneous offenses and bad acts, defendant did not specify where these references could be found in the three hour tapes. Ross v. State, 154 S.W.3d 804, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11407 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

724. Evidence admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36 must still meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Navarro v. State, 154 S.W.3d 795, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11429 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

725. In a robbery case, extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to establish defendant's identity, which was at issue because defense counsel had challenged the accuracy of the victim's identification of defendant, and the evidence was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because proper instructions were given. Thompson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11088 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 9 2004).

726. State may offer otherwise inadmissible evidence to "complete the picture" when a defendant has presented an incomplete picture of an incident. The admission of otherwise inadmissible evidence is limited, however, to evidence germane to the subject opened by the defendant and by Tex. R. Evid. 403's requirement that its probative value not be substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. Hernandez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8448 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 23 2004).

727. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous conduct concerning defendant's physical abuse of the victims of his sexual contact, as that abuse was relevant to show why the one victim was fearful of defendant and did not report the sexual abuse sooner; further, such evidence was admissible because its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Wade v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6786 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 28 2004).

728. Where defendant was tried for murdering the victim in exchange for his wife's promise for a share of the insurance proceeds, the State's failure to charge the wife was irrelevant to the credibility of the State's key witness, defendant's girlfriend. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the proffered impeachment evidence. Day v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Austin July 15 2004).

729. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in defendant's murder case in allowing the admission into evidence of a photograph of the victim's upper body, which showed the gunshot wounds on the body, as it was the only photograph that was admitted to show the location of the wounds, the photograph was not more prejudicial than probative, and testimony regarding the same injuries would have been admissible. Hughes v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6267 (Tex. App. Tyler July 14 2004).

730. Where defendant's cell mate described what defendant had told him about the instant murder and also about another killing, the trial court had not erred in admitting the evidence of the other shooting because the extreme degree of similarity between the two murders made the evidence of the other murder highly probative. In addition, without evidence of defendant's involvement in the other murder, it would have been more difficult for the jury to resolve whether the cell mate was a credible witness. Corona v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5042 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 9 2004).

731. Where defendant contended that the bloody trail depicted in crime scene photographs would have had such an emotional impact on the jury that its decision would be based on emotion, the appellate court found that the trial court had not abused its discretion in admitting them since the amount of time devoted to developing the evidence was minimal, and the photographs did not depict any bodies and, although they depicted blood, they were not particularly gruesome. Corona v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5042 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 9 2004).

732. In a drug case, defense counsel's general objection to the trial court's exclusion of testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Thompson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4602 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20 2004).

733. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child, defendant failed to show that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the introduction into evidence of his mental health records, which defendant claimed contained evidence of inadmissible extraneous bad conduct. Defendant was not prejudiced by the admission of the mental health records, because the victim's testimony alone was sufficient to support his conviction. Taylor v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4581 (Tex. App. Dallas May 20 2004).

734. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err by admitting the kitchen knife used in the assault into evidence because the knife was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to prove the allegation that defendant used or exhibited a deadly weapon, and was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it did not have an undue tendency to suggest that a decision be made on an improper basis. Hardy v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3214 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 8 2004).

735. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence the bloody clothing of defendant's companion, which was reasonably found to be relevant and not overly prejudicial because it illustrated the severity of the victim's wounds, supported the argument that the cuts were not made in self-defense but resulted from two individuals attacking one, and was no more gory than other evidence in the case. Ferguson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2884 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 30 2004).

736. Testimony concerning defendant's plans following release from jail was minimal compared to the testimony concerning the charged offenses, and it did not influence the jury or had only a slight effect; therefore, any error was rendered harmless. Ellinberg v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2753 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2004).

737. In a criminal prosecution for murder, autopsy photographs of the victim were admissible to establish the victim's cause of death. The photographs had a high probative value, were not excessively gruesome, and owed any disturbing nature to the crime itself. Troncoso v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2578 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 24, 2004).

738. Autopsy photographs are admissible unless they depict mutilations of the victim due to the autopsy itself. Troncoso v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2578 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 24, 2004).

739. Where pictorial evidence will help the jury understand verbal testimony, such as the technical language used by a medical doctor in describing the injuries sustained by a victim of a crime, a trial court does not abuse its discretion in admitting these photographs. Troncoso v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2578 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 24, 2004).

740. Where pictorial evidence will help the jury understand verbal testimony, such as the technical language used by a medical doctor in describing the injuries sustained by a victim of a crime, a trial court does not abuse its discretion in admitting these photographs. Troncoso v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2578 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 24, 2004).

741. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), evidence that the victim's debt to defendant resulted from a drug transaction; such evidence was relevant to motive and was not excessively prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Collier v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1955 (Tex. App. Tyler

Feb. 27 2004).

742. Where defendant objected at trial to the admission of a video showing his jewelry box, which was ornamented with a picture of Hitler, but failed to make a specific Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection when the video was introduced into evidence, defendant waived his right to make a Tex. R. Evid. 403 argument on appeal in regard to the video of the jewelry box. Smith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1121 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 5 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 961, 125 S. Ct. 1726, 161 L. Ed. 2d 602, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2975, 73 U.S.L.W. 3593 (2005).

743. Defendant's objections that the admission of a video showing racist and gang affiliation items in his home was improper because (1) it constituted hearsay, (2) was not a true and accurate depiction of the scene, and (3) was more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 were not sufficient to preserve error on "guilt by association" or First Amendment grounds. Smith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1121 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 5 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 961, 125 S. Ct. 1726, 161 L. Ed. 2d 602, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2975, 73 U.S.L.W. 3593 (2005).

744. In a drunk driving case, it was not error for the State to place defendant's stipulation of two prior convictions, which were jurisdictional elements of a felony offense, into evidence and to mention it in closing argument; the stipulation was evidence, could be received as such by the jury as the fact finder, and did not create a risk of unfair prejudice within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b). Shugart v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 427 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 15 2004).

745. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, in the context of implied consent, a refusal or purported refusal to take a breath or blood test, like any other evidence, can be admitted as relevant evidence, at the trial court's discretion, unless a defendant can overcome the statutory presumption of admissibility by showing undue prejudice or the like. State v. Marrs, 104 S.W.3d 914, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 3834 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2003).

746. Trial court's exclusion of a tape was proper where it was reasonable for the trial court to conclude that the risks of confusing the jury substantially outweighed any probative value the video might have; under Tex. R. Evid. 403, relevant evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. Sells v. State, 121 S.W.3d 748, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 63 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003), cert. denied, 540 U.S. 986, 124 S. Ct. 511, 2003 U.S. LEXIS 8067 (2003).

747. Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test is an inherent part of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Lucky v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 11 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2003).

748. Admission of knives recovered from defendant's truck did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403, because the prosecutor never mentioned to the jury that the double-edged knife that was recovered was illegal and the second knife was a swiss army knife and was not illegal, and thus, the jury would not be unfairly prejudiced against defendant simply because two apparently legal knives were recovered from his truck. Goldberg v. State, 95 S.W.3d 345, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 6114 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2002), cert. denied, 540 U.S. 1190, 124 S. Ct. 1436, 158 L. Ed. 2d 99, 2004 U.S. LEXIS 1219 (2004).

749. Admission of a notebook did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403; although it was very prejudicial because it exposed defendant's murderous fantasies to the jury, the need for the evidence was extremely great to establish both identity and motive and without the evidence the State would have had no evidence to explain why a seemingly normal teenager would commit such a senseless crime. Goldberg v. State, 95 S.W.3d 345, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 6114 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2002), cert. denied, 540 U.S. 1190, 124 S. Ct. 1436, 158 L. Ed. 2d 99, 2004

U.S. LEXIS 1219 (2004).

750. In trial for arson, trial court properly excluded evidence that a known fire-starter was thrown out of the burned restaurant a few days prior to the fire and was standing across the street watching it burn when neither defendant nor the fire investigators believed that the known fire-starter had the intellectual capacity to plan, organize, and carry out the arson and the evidence was offered only to show that the fire-starter was acting as an assistant to an unknown alternative perpetrator. Wiley v. State, 74 S.W.3d 399, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 67 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 949, 123 S. Ct. 415, 154 L. Ed. 2d 294, 2002 U.S. LEXIS 7625 (2002).

751. Officer's testimony that the quantity of marijuana recovered from the defendant's vehicle indicated that it was possessed for resale rather than for personal use was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 401. Gallegos v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 5042 (Tex. App. Dallas July 9 1999).

752. Pursuant to Tex. R. Crim. Evid. 403, expert testimony admitted from a law enforcement officer on the elements of a "jugging" offense was properly admitted where the cause involved the execution of a planned ambush upon two individuals as they returned from the bank with a substantial amount of money. The probative value of the expert testimony outweighed any risk of prejudice to defendant given that it was a direct attempt to assist the jury to understand the various pieces of evidence, the significance of each piece of evidence, and how these pieces all fit together to form the complete criminal episode. Foster v. State, 909 S.W.2d 86, 1995 Tex. App. LEXIS 1896 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 1995).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Judicial Intervention in Trials : Comments by Judges : Limitations

753. In a suit on a sworn account brought by a law firm to recover its legal fees, the trial court questioned the law firm's principal witness to establish that the underlying legal matter was settled. The trial court acted within its discretion in attempting to limit the jury's exposure to needless and possibly confusing or misleading evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 403; the trial court did not impermissibly comment on the weight of the evidence. Alam v. Wilshire & Scott, P.C., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5501 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 12 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Limited Admissibility

754. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated assault, an officer was permitted to testify that when he was talking to appellant he observed appellant take out a pistol and throw it on the ground. The evidence was not unfairly prejudicial, since the trial judge gave limiting instructions and did not allow the officer to testify that appellant had just fired the gun and was attempting to evade the police when they arrested him. Payne v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9785 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 4 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : General Overview

755. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated assault, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's prior acts of aggression; defendant made no objection on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 403, and therefore did not preserve the issue for review. Vidal v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1913 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 9 2006).

756. In a criminal prosecution for theft, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of the extraneous offenses suffered by the victim; because defendant did not raise a separate trial objection to the evidence based upon Tex. R. Evid. 403, this argument was not properly before the appellate court. Buttz v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 919 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 2 2006).

757. Defendant's claim that the prejudicial effect of testimony elicited during his trial for sexually assaulting his daughter from his stepdaughter that he sexually abused her as well substantially outweighed its probative value in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not preserved for appeal because defendant failed to object when, during the victim's testimony, after she had detailed what defendant had been doing to her, she testified that she found out defendant had been doing the same thing to his stepdaughter. Patron v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 902 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 3 2005).

758. Defendant failed to preserve error for review where counsel cited Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 611 as the basis for the objection to the testimony of the victim's parents at sentencing. It was unclear from the record which part of Rule 611 was the basis of the objection, and the issue on appeal was different from the objection at trial. Foust v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 12 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 4 2005).

759. Once a defendant objects to evidence on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court must weigh the probative value of the evidence against its potential for unfair prejudice. Lewis v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10408 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 11 2003).

760. Court found no Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to the evidence where appellant's objection was only, "it's an extraneous matter which has nothing to do with this case." Mark v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 879 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 30 2003).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Objections

761. In a murder case, the trial court did not err when it denied defendant the opportunity to question an eyewitness about her experience with burning people to establish her as an alternate perpetrator. With little details regarding the alleged past conduct, the trial court did not err in sustaining the State's relevancy objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the court could not determine whether the excluded testimony was sufficient to show a nexus between the crime charged and the alleged alternative perpetrator to avoid confusing the issues at trial. Dayne Adenauer White v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8107 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 27 2012).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Offers of Proof

762. In a capital murder case, a trial court did not err by excluding a digital video disk (DVD) containing defendant's statement because an inappropriate proffer was made since defendant did not identify which statements he thought were admissible for impeachment purposes; even if a proffer was made, the DVD was cumulative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the witness stated during his testimony and on the DVD that he had been pressured by the police during the interrogation and said things that they wanted to hear. Gonzalez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8954 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 3 2008).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Preliminary Questions : General Overview

763. In making the initial determination of admissibility of evidence, Texas courts must apply the principles set forth in the evidentiary rules governing relevancy under Tex. R. Evid. 401-403; to meet the relevancy test, the proffered evidence must, first, have probative value, and second, be of consequence to some issue in the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Ramsey v. Reagan, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 276 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 16 2003).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Rulings on Evidence

764. Where defendant was convicted of capital murder for shooting his wife and her lover, the trial court did not violate this rule by allowing the State to introduce a recorded call from a customer who called 9-1-1 after hearing gunshots; 9-1-1 calls are admissible in the guilt/innocence phase to provide a framework within which the particulars of the State's evidence may be developed. Mendoza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11728 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 18 2013).

765. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it did not exclude evidence of an extraneous murder pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403 where: (1) the extraneous offense evidence made defendant's identity as the murderer of the victim in the instant case more probable; (2) the pictures relating to the extraneous murder were some evidence of the similarity in the modus operandi of the attacks, which was highly probative; (3) the trial court instructed the jurors to limit their consideration of the extraneous offense evidence; and (4) the State's need for the evidence favored admissibility of the extraneous murder. The trial court was within the zone of reasonable disagreement when it implicitly ruled that the probative value of the extraneous murder was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. Mcgregor v. State, 394 S.W.3d 90, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6552, 2012 WL 3244196 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 9 2012).

766. In a personal injury suit arising from an automobile accident, evidence regarding the defense expert's alleged bias was not material to the outcome of the case. The trial court's exclusion of this evidence did not cause the rendition of an improper judgment. Gill v. Slovak, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8876 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 27 2005).

767. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 by excluding the testimony of a physician's expert where the record demonstrated a legitimate basis, the similarity in opinions and credentials, for the trial court's exclusion of the expert's testimony as needlessly cumulative of another expert's testimony. Due to the similarly in both experts' credentials and opinions, the record did not show that the exclusion of the testimony probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1). Welch v. McLean, 191 S.W.3d 147, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4231 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Weight & Sufficiency

768. Defendant's conviction for engaging in organized crime was proper because the nonaccomplice evidence placed defendant at or near the scene of the crime at or about the time of its commission under suspicious circumstances and because, although the forensic examiner testified that he did not know who actually sent or received the text messages, the circumstances were sufficient to allow a jury reasonably to find that defendant sent and received the messages. Because intent to commit forgery could not be inferred, the prior conviction showing strikingly similar facts made the existence of a material fact, that was, whether defendant possessed forged checks with the intent to defraud or harm another, more probable and defendant did not show that the trial court acted outside the zone of reasonable disagreement by balancing the factors in favor of admissibility, Tex. R. Evid. 403. Franklin v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8513 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 10 2012).

Evidence : Relevance : Character Evidence

769. In a murder trial, it was error to exclude evidence of defendant's peaceful character through a friend who had known him for almost 30 years. Turner v. State, 413 S.W.3d 442, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6619 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 9 2012).

770. Appellant's affiliation with the Aryan Brotherhood was relevant and the probative value of such evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because appellant's membership in the gang and his obligation to follow a higher-ranking member's orders were relevant to show appellant's motive for the crime. Evidence of appellant's membership in the Aryan Brotherhood was offered to show appellant's motive, was not introduced to show character conformity, did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 404, and was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Guffey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3293, 2012 WL 1470185 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 26

771. Evidence of the victim's extraneous offenses should have been allowed, Tex. R. Evid. 403, but because defendant denied hitting the victim with the baseball bat, he could not have employed the theory of self-defense for that part of the alleged assault; the trial court was free to disbelieve defendant's assertion that he only punched the victim once and that he did not hit him with the baseball bat, and the jury was free to believe the victim's testimony that defendant was the first aggressor. Tomasheski v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4709, 2010 WL 2512618 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 23 2010).

772. There was no evidence that at the time of the altercation defendant and his brother were defending their mother against a violent act by the stepfather; under the circumstances presented, considering the other evidence of stepfather's violence admitted, the trial court did not err in excluding the specific evidence of the stepfather's violence toward the mother at defendant's trial for murdering the stepfather. Drake v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8001, 2009 WL 3295580 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 14 2009).

773. In defendant's sexual assault case, evidence was improperly excluded because there was no allegation that the evidence was self-serving or unreliable. The evidence was relevant to the complaining witness's credibility, and further, the State failed to show how the probative value of the evidence was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. State v. Moreno, 297 S.W.3d 512, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7642 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

774. At the punishment phase of a criminal trial, evidence of defendant's tattoos could be presented as character evidence. Likewise, his choice of tattoos could demonstrate a motive for his crime; the probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Albarado v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5471, 2009 WL 2055947 (Tex. App. Eastland July 16 2009).

775. Court properly excluded testimony from third parties establishing defendant's knowledge of the complainant's propensity for violence because a witness testified that she saw the complainant hit her mother multiple times, she and other family members had called the police multiple times regarding the complainant's domestic violence, and defendant told a witness after the shooting that defendant thought the complainant was trying to hurt him. Segovia v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4559, 2009 WL 1678024 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 9 2009).

776. In a murder trial, there was no error, after allowing testimony about a conversation in which defendant expressed a desire to get rid of the victim, in excluding further evidence offered under Tex. R. Evid. 107, the rule of optional completeness; the evidence that defendant sought--allegations that the victim had sexually abused their child and was involved with child pornography--was properly found to be more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the evidence did not tend to show that defendant's desire to get rid of the victim was any less serious. Glover v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8852 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 8 2007).

777. In a retaliation case, a court properly refused to allow defendant to question the State's character witnesses as to the victim's prior crimes where the remoteness of the prior convictions tended to diminish any potential they might have for impressing the jury in some improper manner, defendant called other witnesses who testified that the victim's character for truthfulness was not good, and thus, his need to cross-examine the State's witnesses regarding the victim's prior convictions was lessened. Moore v. State, 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

778. Danger of prejudice to a defendant is usually highest when evidence of defendant's extraneous acts is offered to prove that defendant acted in the same way in the offense on trial. The danger of prejudice may be much lower when evidence of a third party's extraneous acts is offered. Castaldo v. State, 78 S.W.3d 345, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 138 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002).

Evidence : Relevance : Circumstantial & Direct Evidence

779. Admission of testimony was not an abuse of discretion and did not cause the rendition of an improper judgment, because the court could reasonably conclude that the facts and details related to the patient's underlying offenses would be helpful to the jury to explain how the psychologist and medical doctor formed their opinions that the patient suffered from a behavioral abnormality. In re Commitment of Cardenas, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6441, 2014 WL 2616972 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 12 2014).

Evidence : Relevance : Compromise & Settlement Negotiations

780. Evidence related to a second victim of an alleged sexual assault involved in two other indictments than those on which appellant was being tried was not more unfairly prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as the testimony regarding the second victim was limited and the State was consistently cautiioned by the trial court. Downs v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6241, 2010 WL 3030487 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 4 2010).

781. During defendant's trial for the aggravated robbery of a car wash patron, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of the fact that defendant also robbed a second car wash patron at gun point where the State proved the evidence of defendant's other crime was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) for purposes other than any tendency to prove his character or action in conformity therewith because the other crime was particularly relevant to defendant's intent to rob the complainant, a fact disputed at trial, and, additionally, evidence of the other crime, which occurred just minutes after the crime for which defendant was being tried, showed the absence of any mistake by defendant. Moreover, the trial court did not err in concluding that the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because evidence of the other crime was highly probative of a disputed issue, defendant's intent to steal, and thus outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Moore v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6273 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 4 2005).

782. Because defendant couched an objection to evidence in terms of prejudice, the trial court was required to conduct the balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Jones v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5093 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2005).

783. In a drug case, in light of the offense charged and the evidence adduced at trial, the evidence that defendant possessed a bogus license did not unfairly prejudice the jury or confuse the issues. Accordingly, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence. Gregory v. State, 159 S.W.3d 254, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1660 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

784. In an inmate's trial for the sexual assault of another inmate while both were in a trustee unit, evidence that defendant told the victim he had been in prison and was probably going back did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 because he was already incarcerated, and the evidence explained why the victim feared defendant, although the victim was larger. Esparza v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9175, 2014 WL 4179435 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 20 2014).

785. During defendant's capital murder trial, the court did not err in admitting evidence related to another murder because the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect; the trial court's instructions informed the jury that it could consider evidence of the other murder only for the purposes of establishing identity and not for character-conformity purposes. Norwood v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9069, 2014 WL 4058820 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 15 2014).

786. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of evidence of defendant's two prior convictions for attempted aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child; the State needed the evidence to rebut challenges to the victim's credibility. Thompson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8916 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

787. Although the evidence from the neighbor's apartment was not same transaction contextual evidence and the trial court abused its discretion in admitting it, the error was harmless given that the extent of the other evidence for defendant's guilt because the State found the marijuana hidden in defendant's truck, an officer observed defendant exit the apartment building appearing to hide something under his shirt, and defendant chose to lead police on a high-speech chase instead of submitting to the traffic stop. Gonzalez v. State, 510 S.W.3d 10, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8934 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

788. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of an officer's encounter with defendant at an apartment two days before a search of the apartment because the evidence was relevant to defendant's connection with the apartment; the evidence was not of such an inflammatory nature so as to prevent the jury from considering it solely for the purpose of intent. Jackson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9059, 2014 WL 3955171 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 14 2014).

789. Court properly admitted two telephone calls that defendant placed from jail because they constituted the only direct admission by defendant that he "shot at" someone, they directly concerned the offenses, and the State played less than ten minutes of the first call and only thirty-three seconds of the second call. Reed v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8643 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 7 2014).

790. In case where defendant was convicted of felony murder and intentionally or knowingly causing serious bodily injury to a child, her daughter, counsel's failure to object to the testimony of defendant's sister that she once observed defendant strike the child with a belt did not constitute ineffective assistance because the trial court could have concluded that the probative value of the sister's testimony was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice to defendant as the testimony was probative not only as to the type of discipline defendant imposed on the child but also as to defendant's credibility because she told an officer that she only physically disciplined the child with her hand. Sandoval v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8608 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 7 2014).

791. During defendant's murder trial, the court did not err in admitting evidence that the two-year-old victim had sustained injuries to her thigh and genitals because the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b)to show that her injuries were not sustained accidentally; the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Sparks v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8392 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 31 2014).

792. Court did not err in refusing to exclude the extraneous offense testimony to rebut a defensive theory of fabrication, because the extraneous evidence tended to make the defensive claim of fabrication less probable, and the extraneous offense evidence was probative to rebut defendant's defensive theories that defendant was not the type of person who would sexually abuse a child and that the abuse allegations were fabricated. Shockley v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8345, 2014 WL 3756301 (Tex. App. Dallas July 30 2014).

793. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of the victim's half-sister about sexual abuse that defendant had inflicted upon her under this rule because it tended to rebut defendant's theory that the victim had fabricated her claims and there were similarities between defendant's conduct as described by both. The prejudicial effect of the testimony did not substantially outweigh its probative value because it was not so graphic as to be worse than the specifics to which the victim had already testified. Hosey v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7876, 2014 WL 3621796 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 23 2014).

794. Although defendant argued that the testimony was substantially more prejudicial than probative because he asserted that the State was attempting to "use the cover of impeachment to place before the jury otherwise inadmissible evidence," there was no evidence that was otherwise inadmissible. Stairhime v. State, 439 S.W.3d 499, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7905 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 22 2014).

795. Murder victim's girlfriend was properly allowed to testify regarding an attempted drive-by shooting defendant committed against the victim, during which she was shot in the hand, and which occurred ten months before the murder, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Jones v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7739, 2014 WL 3556587 (Tex. App. Waco July 17 2014).

796. Evidence of methamphetamine found at the murder scene was properly admitted because it was relevant to establish a motive for defendant's actions and to rebut her claim of accidentally shooting the victim; there was no evidence presented that defendant was in possession of the drugs, and the evidence was admissible because the jury could infer that the prior relationship between the victim and defendant was one that involved drugs. Taylor v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7282 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 3 2014).

797. Where appellant was convicted for indecency with a child by exposure, it was not an abuse of discretion to admit under Tex. R. Evid. 403 the extraneous offense testimony of a nephew, who testified that appellant had sexually assaulted the nephew when the nephew was 14 years old, because the factors weighed in favor of admission since, inter alia, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the State's need for the extraneous offense evidence was high. Laube v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7076, 2014 WL 2993823 (Tex. App. Dallas June 30 2014).

798. In a prosecution of defendant for aggravated sexual assault of a child less than 14 years old, the probative value of defendant's prior conviction for indecent exposure was greater than its prejudicial effect. Therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the prior conviction evidence. Smith v. State, 439 S.W.3d 451, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7108 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 30 2014).

799. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of his daughter, the court did not err in admitting evidence of a condom and DNA analysis of it; the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice. James v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6994 (Tex. App. Austin June 27 2014).

800. GPS evidence was properly admitted because, in establishing defendant's flight after the murder, it demonstrated his consciousness of guilt, and tended to rebut defendant's misidentification theory of defense; due to the nature of the technical details and technology involved, it was not the type of information that might otherwise have caused an inflammatory response. Longoria v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6800 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 25 2014).

801. In an intoxication-manslaughter case, the trial court did not err in the admission of the dash camera video from the police vehicle because defendant admitted to drinking alcohol on the video at issue, but claimed that he had only had two beers -- a fact refuted by significant other evidence, including a witness's testimony about how much alcohol defendant had consumed before the accident; defendant did not overcome the presumption that the relevant video was more probative than prejudicial; and defendant did not argue that the impact of the evidence would not be rendered harmless by the substantial other evidence at trial of his intoxication. Calbas v. State, 2014

Tex. App. LEXIS 6666, 2014 WL 2809809 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 19 2014).

802. In an intoxication-manslaughter case, defendant did not demonstrate that the trial court abused its discretion in admitting photographs of the decedent and the collision scene because the photographs were not cumulative, and each photograph was relevant and not unduly prejudicial. Calbas v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6666, 2014 WL 2809809 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 19 2014).

803. Prior sexual assault incident with the victim's teachers was in no way similar to the sexual assault allegation against defendant, and even assuming this evidence was relevant, because the allegation of the prior sexual assault incident was not the same as the allegation, its probative value to show that the victim was confusing the incidents was slight; the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the threat of confusion of the issues and unfair prejudice outweighed any probative value. Coleman v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6691, 2014 WL 2809064 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 19 2014).

804. In defendant's trial for theft for transferring $6,000 from her employer to her credit card accounts, the trial court did not err in excluding testimony regarding the bitterness of her divorce and the possibility that her ex-husband was attempting to make her look bad or was trying to reduce the amounts owed on the cards, because there was no evidence of any nexus between the ex-husband and the crime. Emmert v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6624, 2014 WL 2807987 (Tex. App. Dallas June 18 2014).

805. Appellant's conviction for felony theft was affirmed because the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence where nothing about the other individual's arrest for the January 30 break-in made any facts of consequence to the determination of appellant's guilt or innocence in the January 25 theft any more or less probable. Graves v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6522 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 17 2014).

806. Admission of testimony was not an abuse of discretion and did not cause the rendition of an improper judgment, because the court could reasonably conclude that the facts and details related to the patient's underlying offenses would be helpful to the jury to explain how the psychologist and medical doctor formed their opinions that the patient suffered from a behavioral abnormality. In re Commitment of Cardenas, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6441, 2014 WL 2616972 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 12 2014).

807. Even though the trial court erred by excluding a witness's testimony that the victim had performed oral sex on defendant two days before the sexual assault, as consent was at issue even before the witness testified and the evidence had probative value that outweighed the danger of undue prejudice, the error was harmless because defendant was able to produce considerable evidence that the victim had shown sexual interest in defendant before the assault. The witness testified that defendant and the victim had had sexually charged contact and had gone together into the witness's bedroom. Gotcher v. State, 435 S.W.3d 367, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6181, 2014 WL 2576061 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 10 2014).

808. Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the jury to hear evidence of defendant's prior conviction for possession of cocaine because the evidence made defendant's intent and his knowledge of the cocaine in his pocket more probable. Further, in light of the evidence presented, the trial court could have reasonably found that the State needed the evidence of the prior conviction to show that defendant knowingly possessed the cocaine. Rios v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5867 (Tex. App. El Paso May 30 2014).

809. Witness's testimony that defendant coerced her through his position as police officer, took her to the same place as the victim in this case to assault her, and did so on the same night strongly rebutted defendant's defensive argument that the victim was fabricating her story in order to gain a U-Visa and a civil-lawsuit victory. Because the extraneous-offense evidence was so similar to the charged offense, it was probative as modus operandi evidence to rebut the issue of intent. Joseph v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5712 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 29 2014).

810. There was no basis for the exclusion of expert testimony of a licensed professional counselor, as the expert did not express an opinion on whether she believed a victim was telling the truth or whether the victim could be believed, but told the jury what she observed and explained that these symptoms were consistent with trauma based on her experiences with patients suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. Kinsey v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5551 (Tex. App. Eastland May 22 2014).

811. Assault defendant failed to request notice of other crimes and acts evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and therefore could not complain of the adequacy of the State's notice; moreover, the notice gave her reasonable notice of a neighbor's expected testimony that defendant sought to bribe her to say that the victim struck defendant first. Additionally, this bribery evidence was relevant as consciousness of guilt and was not unfairly prejudicial. Cavazos v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5045, 2014 WL 1881691 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 8 2014).

812. Any error in the trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding the victim's prior acts because, even though the evidence was relevant to show the victim's tendency to provoke fights, the evidence already admitted showed that the victim was being combative and aggressive with defendant on the day in question. Waggoner v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4983 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 8 2014).

813. Trial court did not err in admitting testimony that the court had temporarily modified a divorce decree to give a father custody because, inter alia, admitting the testimony was not tantamount to admitting the temporary orders, and the jury's finding that the father should have permanent custody did not turn on any evidence indicating the trial court had temporarily modified custody prior to trial. In the Interest of A.D., 474 S.W.3d 715, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4860, 2014 WL 1800082 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 6 2014).

814. Court properly allowed defendant's former stepdaughter to testify about instances of molestation because, although the extraneous offense was fairly remote in time, the offenses were similar enough that evidence of the prior one did not distract the jury from the instant offense, and the State expended no more than fifteen minutes to develop the testimony. Donato v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4698 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 30 2014).

815. On appeal from his conviction for possession of methamphetamine, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence that the officer stopped the vehicle because of its association with a prior burglary since the testimony showed that the officer had a valid reason to stop the vehicle and was not an attempt to establish an extraneous offense to prove defendant's character in order to show action in conformity with that character; the testimony was critical and its probative value was clearly not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Mancilla v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4649 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 29 2014).

816. Trial court heard both the State's and defendant's arguments in favor and against other act admission, recognized it was a close call, and favored admission, and the ruling was within the zone of reasonable disagreement and not an abuse of discretion. Almaguer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3842, 2014 WL 1415182 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 10 2014).

817. Child victim's therapist's testimony did not amount to improper bolstering of a child victim's credibility because the therapist's testimony that he was treating the child and testimony about that treatment could lead the jury to assume that she was abused, as the therapist did not testify that he believed the child was being truthful; the fact that the child was being treated did not usurp the jury's role to determine if the child's allegations were true. Paramo v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3717, 2014 WL 1413794 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 7 2014).

818. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted the evidence of defendant's gang member because the evidence was relevant, the State's need for the evidence was great to establish defendant's motive for the shooting and to rebut his theory of self-defense, it directly related to the circumstances surrounding the shootings, and the time used to develop the evidence was not so great that it distracted the jury from considering the charged offense. Johnson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3618 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 3 2014).

819. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of a robbery allegedly committed by defendant two days prior to the charged offense, because the similarities in the proximity of time and setting, the mode of commission of the two offenses, and the victims' similar descriptions of the robber and his hoodie constituted sufficiently distinguishing characteristics to allow the evidence as evidence of identity. Collins v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3549, 2014 WL 1318882 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2014).

820. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's shirts with gun shot residue particles on them because the evidence was relevant, as the shirts were collected from defendant's vehicle two days after the murder. The evidence was not prejudicial because it showed defendant's connection to a discharged weapon, directly or indirectly, at some point in time. Burks v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3243, 2014 WL 1285731 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2014).

821. Statement that defendant made in jail to the effect that he was in jail for not following the rules could reasonably have led to an inference that he knew and chose not to follow the "rule" that he was not allowed to be in possession of a firearm because he was a felon; the statement was relevant to whether or not he was the individual who was in possession of the firearm and would not have improperly influenced the jury in any way. Greer v. State, 436 S.W.3d 1, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3192, 2014 WL 1621787 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 20 2014).

822. At the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated robbery with a deadly weapon, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of an uncharged murder through the testimony of his accomplice who said that defendant hold him he had "gotten rid of somebody." The evidence was highly probative of defendant's character and showed why his accomplice was afraid of him; any danger of unfair prejudice was mitigated because the evidence was elicited to show the effect defendant's statement had on his accomplice. Saenz v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2989, 2014 WL 1089744 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 19 2014).

823. In a forgery case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a photograph showing the pickup truck defendant was driving when he returned to the store. The photograph was relevant because it was given to the local authorities to aid their investigation; defendant advanced no theory as to how the photograph unduly prejudiced him or led the jury to decide the case on an improper basis. Resendez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2587, 2014 WL 972297 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 6 2014).

824. Admission of the extraneous evidence was not improper under this rule because it was strikingly similar to the charged offense, it tended to prove he did not have the physical inability he claimed, absent the evidence of defendant's past conduct the State had no way to rebut defendant's claim of physical inability, any prejudice was limited by the trial court's limiting instructions, and the presentation of the evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Arteaga v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2434, 2014 WL 866461 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 5 2014).

825. Admission during the punishment phase of a recorded jailhouse phone conversation between defendant and his brother was proper where it was probative with regard to a punishment determination, as it allowed the jury to gauge defendant's acceptance of responsibility for the crime by showing he was willing to allow his own brother to take responsibility for his crime, even if it meant his brother would be arrested. Given the force of the other evidence of bad acts presented at the punishment phase, the admission of the phone recording was not likely to create such unfair prejudice in the minds of the jurors that they sentenced defendant in a way disproportionate to his crime and past criminal history. Scales v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1744 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 19 2014).

826. At defendant's murder trial, the court did not err by admitting an autopsy photograph depicting the bullet lodged in the tissue at the back of the victim's neck; the photograph was relevant to the cause of death--a gunshot wound to the head, and manner of death--homicide. The autopsy photograph was also useful in assisting the medical examiner's testimony; the probative value was not outweighed by the prejudicial effect, because the photograph was not gruesome or enhanced in any way. Barr v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1714, 2014 WL 641351 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 14 2014).

827. In the sexually violent predator trial, the trial court did not err in admitting the offender's prior statement because the statement, which detailed his sexual history, had probative value regarding his behavioral abnormality, which was not outweighed by unfair prejudice. In re Commitment of Meyer, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1650, 2014 WL 580723 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 13 2014).

828. Exclusion of testimony by defendant's wife, who was also the complainant's older sister, regarding alleged prior sexual abuse by the complainant's father was proper because it would have confused or distracted the jury from the main issue-whether defendant perpetrated the crimes against the complainant-and would have been more prejudicial than probative. The complainant, who was twenty-three at the time of trial, positively identified defendant, and no one else, as the perpetrator of the charged offenses, and when questioned outside the presence of the jury, the complainant denied any sexual abuse at the hands of her father. Johnson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1369, 2014 WL 505332 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 6 2014).

829. Issues are inadequately briefed and presented nothing for appellate review because the brief merely contended that the trial court did not conduct a balancing test as is required by this rule before allowing admission of the evidence. Jackson v. State, 424 S.W.3d 140, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1170, 2014 WL 409946 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 4 2014).

830. There was no error in admitting the letter because defendant voluntarily wrote the letter to his wife in which it could have been interpreted that he expressed remorse for his actions, thus, as his comments could have been considered an admission of guilt, the letter was probative of whether he committed the charged offense. Also, it was not unfairly prejudicial because the evidence related directly to the charged offense and the State needed little time to develop the evidence because the victim identified the letter and the prosecutor read it into evidence. Beans v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1159, 2014 WL 357340 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2014).

831. Defendant was convicted for organized criminal activity based on gambling promotion, because he organized a raffle drawing to benefit his political campaign, his employees distributed and sold raffle tickets, and defendant deposited the ticket sales proceeds into his bank account. The trial court did not err by excluding evidence attacking the credibility of the State's witnesses who were defendant's former employees, because the jury was aware that all three witnesses had possible motives to make false accusations; the evidence tended to be needlessly cumulative, risked confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. Evans v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1430, 2014 WL 425613 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2014).

832. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony that he committed extraneous offenses in that he supplied drugs to the victim in the course of his sexual assaults; the evidence helped to fill in the gaps and explain the circumstances surrounding the offense. The appellate court overruled his claim that the probative value of the evidence was outweighed by its prejudicial effect and that it confused the issues and misled the jury. Washington v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 933 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 30 2014).

833. Testimony of two other purported victims of sexual assault by a defendant while the victims were incapable of consent was properly admitted since the issue of consent could be viewed as the most pivotal one in the trial, and evidence tending to prove lack of consent was quite probative and not unduly prejudicial. Dilg v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 963, 2014 WL 458019 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 29 2014).

834. Evidence that defendant on trial for reckless injury to his five-week-old daughter previously put a blanket tip into the victim's mouth to quiet her cries was properly admitted as a prior bad act because it was relevant to the issue of his intent to harm the victim and to demonstrate the character of his relationship with her; the evidence's probative value outweighed its unfair prejudice because there was little danger it would impress on the jury in some irrational way, it took little time to develop, and the State needed it to prove defendant's mental state. Sanchez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 896, 2014 WL 298322 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 28 2014).

835. In the murder case, the court did not abuse its discretion by sustaining the State's objection to a photograph showing the deceased's gang affiliation because the picture depicting a memorial to the deceased did not indicate he was violent and the photograph would have been cumulative. Wilson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 918, 2014 WL 310117 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2014).

836. Evidence that defendant on trial for reckless injury to his five-week-old daughter previously put a blanket tip into the victim's mouth to quiet her cries was properly admitted as a prior bad act because it was relevant to the issue of his intent to harm the victim and to demonstrate the character of his relationship with her; the evidence's probative value outweighed its unfair prejudice because there was little danger it would impress on the jury in some irrational way, it took little time to develop, and the State needed it to prove defendant's mental state. Sanchez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 896, 2014 WL 298322 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 28 2014).

837. In the murder case, the court did not abuse its discretion by sustaining the State's objection to a photograph showing the deceased's gang affiliation because the picture depicting a memorial to the deceased did not indicate he was violent and the photograph would have been cumulative. Wilson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 918, 2014 WL 310117 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2014).

838. Trial court did not err in refusing to allow an inmate to testify about his plans upon his release from prison because the inmate had already testified before the jury that he was going to move back home and look for work after he was released; therefore, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the slight probative value, if any, of the excluded evidence was substantially outweighed by the needless presentation of cumulative evidence. In re King, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 724, 2014 WL 346109 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

839. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence of flight because an eyewitness who was at the house during the shooting, testified that defendant shot the complainant, in comparison to the inherently graphic testimony given by the medical examiner, the evidence of flight had little tendency to influence the jury in an irrational way, and the State needed to introduce the evidence of flight. Goldsmith v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 754, 2014 WL 261007 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 23 2014).

840. As the 911 call evidence explained the circumstances surrounding the crime, the evidence was not unduly prejudicial, and even if the admission of the evidence were an abuse of discretion, defendant's substantial rights were not affected. Seibel v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 781, 2014 WL 261053 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 23 2014).

841. Defendant was convicted for organized criminal activity and gambling promotion, because he organized a raffle drawing to benefit his political campaign, his employees distributed and sold raffle tickets, and defendant deposited the ticket sales proceeds into his bank account. The trial court did not err by excluding evidence attacking the credibility of the State's witnesses who were defendant's former employees, because the jury was aware that all three witnesses had possible motives to make false accusations; additional evidence tended to be needlessly cumulative, risked confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. Evans v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 823, 2014 WL 261063 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 23 2014).

842. Trial court did not err in refusing to allow an inmate to testify about his plans upon his release from prison because the inmate had already testified before the jury that he was going to move back home and look for work after he was released; therefore, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the slight probative value, if any, of the excluded evidence was substantially outweighed by the needless presentation of cumulative evidence. In re King, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 724, 2014 WL 346109 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 23 2014).

843. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence of flight because an eyewitness who was at the house during the shooting, testified that defendant shot the complainant, in comparison to the inherently graphic testimony given by the medical examiner, the evidence of flight had little tendency to influence the jury in an irrational way, and the State needed to introduce the evidence of flight. Goldsmith v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 754, 2014 WL 261007 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 23 2014).

844. As the 911 call evidence explained the circumstances surrounding the crime, the evidence was not unduly prejudicial, and even if the admission of the evidence were an abuse of discretion, defendant's substantial rights were not affected. Seibel v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 781, 2014 WL 261053 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 23 2014).

845. Defendant was convicted for organized criminal activity and gambling promotion, because he organized a raffle drawing to benefit his political campaign, his employees distributed and sold raffle tickets, and defendant deposited the ticket sales proceeds into his bank account. The trial court did not err by excluding evidence attacking the credibility of the State's witnesses who were defendant's former employees, because the jury was aware that all three witnesses had possible motives to make false accusations; additional evidence tended to be needlessly cumulative, risked confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. Evans v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 823, 2014 WL 261063 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 23 2014).

846. At defendant's trial for robbery, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony regarding his efforts to resist arrest because evidence relevant to his flight from the scene was a circumstance indicative of guilt. The testimony encompassed only a few pages of the multiple-volume reporter's record and was not emphasized by the State; the probative value of the testimony was not outweighed by any danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading the jury, undue delay, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. Johnson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 471, 2014 WL 222929 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 16 2014).

847. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted evidence of the phone calls that defendant made to the friend from jail because the record supported the determination that the probative value of the testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice and, even if error were assumed, any error was harmless because the evidence of defendant's guilt was abundant. Dyer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 524, 2014 WL 268571 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 16 2014).

848. Probative value of the expert's testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or by needless presentation of cumulative evidence, as the testimony was relevant, and the witness was not unqualified. Eldred v. State, 431 S.W.3d 177, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2460, 2014 WL 856636 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 5 2014).

849. Defendant suffered no harm from the admission of evidence of a prior offense of aggravated assault/family violence against the same victim because, by his plea, defendant admitted he had a dating relationship with the victim, and the State only referenced the exhibit in its final argument to show a dating relationship between defendant and the victim. Pickett v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15410, 2013 WL 6923977 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 27 2013).

850. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by introducing evidence of other injuries because the victim's bone fractures suggested that defendant intended to hurt the victim by placing his finger in her female sexual organ when he became frustrated with her crying. The probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, as it was compelling in showing the abusive nature of the relationship defendant had with the victim. Rucker v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15212, 2013 WL 6730172 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 19 2013).

851. Court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the experts to testify about the non-testifying experts' opinions because the matters were reviewed by the experts to form opinions, the court gave a limiting instruction, and the court could reasonably conclude that the probative value of the testimony outweighed its capacity to prejudice the jury. In re Commitment of Garcia, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14986 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 12 2013).

852. Extraneous evidence was not unduly prejudicial because by establishing that defendant did similar things to a different child victim under similar circumstances, the evidence corroborated the instant child victim's testimony and made it more credible than it otherwise would be standing alone, and there was an absence of any other eyewitnesses who could give direct testimony about defendant's conduct. Cruz v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14659, 2013 WL 7964238 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 5 2013).

853. Even though the trial court erred by admitting defendant's posts to a social media website regarding his attitude toward children as they were unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the error was harmless given the strength of the evidence against defendant and the fact that the presentation of the evidence consumed less than half a page of the record. Copeland v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14675, 2013 WL 6388585 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 5 2013).

854. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's prior conviction of unlawfully carrying a weapon because it was relevant to rebutting his defensive theory of insanity, the trial court instructed the jury not to consider that as evidence he was guilty of the charged offense, and the State only asked two questions about the prior crime, one of which the jury was instructed to disregard. Thomas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14744, 2013 WL 6405479 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 5 2013).

855. Trial court did not err in admitting testimony showing that defendant was the driver of a vehicle involved in a drive-by shooting four days before the alleged victim was shot because the evidence was probative to show opportunity and identity and to rebut defendant's defensive theory that he was not the perpetrator, and there was nothing confusing or misleading about the evidence. Williams v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14602, 2013 WL 6253764 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 4 2013).

856. Trial court did not err in admitting an autopsy photograph of a murder victim during defendant's trial; the photograph, coupled with the medical examiner's testimony, was probative because it distinguished the laceration and stab wound from the sutured incision caused by emergency personnel's attempts to save the victim's life. Sanchez v. State, 418 S.W.3d 302, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14555, 2013 WL 6198862 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 27

857. State had to prove that defendants caused the child's injuries in ths injury to a child case, and in assessing photographs under the rule, they were probative to negate the theory that the child had a medical condition that prevented him from gaining weight, as a doctor testified that the only treatment progressing the child's recovery was regular feeding. Oliphant-Alston v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14562, 2013 WL 6198844 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 27 2013).

858. Probative value of the photographs of the child in this injury to a child case was not substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice or the needless presentation of cumulative evidence; the photographs showed no more than the injuries defendants were charged with causing, and they were not needlessly cumulative, as they showed various injuries and different parts of the child's body, detailing his improvement over a period of time, and thus there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the photographs. Oliphant-Alston v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14562, 2013 WL 6198844 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 27 2013).

859. Photographs were projected for viewing by the jury, but the record did not indicate details on the projection of the images, and without more, the court could not say that the projections made the photographs unfairly prejudicial. Oliphant-Alston v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14562, 2013 WL 6198844 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 27 2013).

860. Witnesses used photographs of the child to show the conspicuous nature of the child's injuries in this criminal case, as the child had an undeveloped body and wrinkled skin showing extreme dehydration, and thus the photographs were strong evidence of the nature of the child's injuries and were probative of defendants' awareness of the injuries, for purposes of an analysis under the rule. Oliphant-Alston v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14562, 2013 WL 6198844 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 27 2013).

861. On appeal of defendant's murder conviction, his complaint that the trial court abused its discretion by overruling his Rule 403 objections to various exhibits was inadequately briefed. He failed to set forth the required balancing test or identify any portion of the test which the trial court failed to perform; he did not apply the law to any facts or present any legal arguments explaining how the trial court abused its discretion or how the evidence was prejudicial to his case. Green v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14355 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 22 2013).

862. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence, Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), given the evidence already accumulated against defendant, and any error was harmless. Hicks v. State, 419 S.W.3d 555, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14091, 2013 WL 6076468 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 18 2013).

863. At defendant's trial for possession of a controlled substance, a witness's comment during direct examination that defendant was out on parole did not warrant a mistrial because the statement was not highly prejudicial. The State was developing a narrative, it did not anticipate a reference to an extraneous offense, the reference was not a concrete statement of a prior offense, and the instruction to disregard prevented any elaboration on the offense. Joseph v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13998, 2013 WL 6045902 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 12 2013).

864. In a murder trial, the court did not err when it admitted victim impact evidence consisting of testimony and photographs that provided information about defendant's life and character, as the evidence had some tendency to remind the jury that he was a unique human being. Although the evidence emphasized that the victim was a good man and had a lot of good qualities, the evidence did not encourage the jury to engage in a worth comparison; the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice. Evans v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13748, 2013 WL 7985593 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 7 2013).

865. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence pertaining to the general contractor's tax returns because the property owner did not argue that evidence pertaining to the asserted ability to mitigate damages was unavailable from other sources. Azad v. Mrco, Inc., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13776, 2013 WL 6700285 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 7 2013).

866. Testimony regarding the prior theft was probative to rebut defendant's testimony that the witness lied in testifying that she stole the wine and the State's need for the evidence to assist in establishing that the witness was more credible. Johnson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13693, 2013 WL 5950124 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 6 2013).

867. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of an extraneous offense-indecency with a child by contact-against the victim's sister where the evidence showed the victim's allegations of indecency by grinding and other acts were less likely to be fabricated, as defendant claimed, because defendant had similar contact with the victim's sister in the same house under similar circumstances; defendant's conduct with the sister showed a similar motive, plan, opportunity, and intent to assault the victim. Delacruz v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13492, 2013 WL 5890796 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 31 2013).

868. In a proceeding to civilly commit a patient as a sexually violent predator, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the factual details of defendant's crimes over his objection; the experts testified how these facts affected their determination of whether defendant suffered from a behavioral abnormality. Given the purpose for admitting this evidence, its cumulative nature, and the trial court's limiting instructions, the trial court's conclusion that the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial was reasonable. In re Commitment Jackson, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13507, 2013 WL 5874446 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2013).

869. Details of a sex offender's 1975 murder conviction were property admitted during his sexually violent predator commitment proceeding because the State's expert explained the facts he considered in forming his opinions and how those facts affected his evaluation of the offender; the trial judge performed a balancing test and could have reasonably concluded the evidence assisted the jury in weighing the testimony and was not unfairly prejudicial, and it also gave the jury a limiting instruction explaining that the information reviewed by the experts was admitted only for the purpose of showing the basis of the expert's opinion. In re Martinez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13512, 2013 WL 5874583 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2013).

870. Court did not abuse its discretion by not allowing the patient's counsel to pose certain questions, because counsel provided an extensive cross-examination of the doctor concerning his opinion that the patient had a behavioral abnormality that made him likely to commit a predatory act of sexual violence, and courts were allowed discretion to control testimony to avoid confusing the jury. In re Romo, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13495 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 31 2013).

871. On appeal of defendant's conviction for two counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child and one count of continuous sexual abuse of a child, his complaint that the trial court erred by admitting a judgment to show that he had a prior conviction for indecency with a child was not preserved for review. Defendant's trial objection that the prejudicial effect of the judgment outweighed its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not sufficient to preserve his Tex. R. Evid. 404 complaint for review. Loveday v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13364, 2013 WL 5874280 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 30 2013).

872. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence because in light of the defensive theory to attack State's evidence, evidence that defendant chewed and destroyed crack cocaine during a prior traffic stop increased the likelihood that defendant did the same during the instant traffic stop. The court could not hold that the probative value of showing a lack of accident or mistake was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or the misleading nature of the evidence. Williams v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12925, 2013 WL 5676226 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 17 2013).

873. Extraneous offense evidence that the complainant's life had been threatened because she was a witness to the aggravated robbery was not substantially more prejudicial than probative because: (1) a limiting instruction was given; (2) an officer testified the threat was not directly connected to defendant; (3) in closing, the prosecutor stated the jury should not consider the evidence for an impermissible purpose; (4) little trial time was spent developing the evidence; and (5) the State needed the evidence to counterbalance the continuous attack on the complainant, the State's sole witness to the crime. Wilhite v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12608, 2013 WL 5604741 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 10 2013).

874. Defendant's conviction for recklessly causing serious bodily injury to a child was appropriate because the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting into evidence a video recording of the infant while he was in the hospital. The video had probative value because it demonstrated the seriousness of the infant's brain injury and the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the video aided the jury's understanding of the mother's testimony regarding the long-term effects of the injury as it showed the infant's diminished ability to see or speak; further, the recording depicted nothing more emotional or graphic than the photographs. Holte v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12207, 2013 WL 5498134 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 1 2013).

875. Where defendant was convicted of capital murder for shooting his wife and her lover, the trial court's admission of a video recording of the bloody crime scene did not result in unfair prejudice or duplicate the medical examiner's testimony and crime scene photograph. Mendoza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11728 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 18 2013).

876. At defendant's trial for sexual assault, sexual assault of a child, and attempted sexual assault, the trial court abused its discretion when it admitted thousands of extraneous-offense pornographic images over his objection because the evidence was unfairly prejudicial. As the State had multiple victims testifying about specific incidents of inappropriate sexual behavior and the similarities in their stories were striking, the State's need for the extraneous-offense evidence was not great. Pawlak v. State, 420 S.W.3d 807, 2013 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1322 (Tex. Crim. App. Sept. 18 2013).

877. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's apology to the alleged victim because the apology was indicative of a consciousness of guilt and, thus, was highly probative and not outweighed by any danger of unfair prejudice. Smith v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11678 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 17 2013).

878. Extraneous burglary was nearly identical to the offenses in question, as the burglary took place at almost the same time of day with the same number of perpetrators of the same ethnic background and the stolen items were similar, and the evidence tipped in favor of admitting the extrinsic evidence going to the identity issue; a cautionary instruction was given, and the probative value of the evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect. Houston v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11753 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 17 2013).

879. Admission of defendant's gang affiliation was not inadmissible under this rule because the State's purpose was to show that defendant's statement to the witness was in fact a threat and without the evidence the jury would have been less able to understand defendant's statement as a credible threat. Simmang v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11529 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 11 2013).

880. Trial court's decision to overrule defendant's objection to exhibits was within the zone of reasonable disagreement because the evidence had probative value identifying defendant as a suspect; there was evidence that items stolen from the complainant during the sexual assault were collected from the owner of the stolen vehicle defendant was found driving, and a detective testified that he went to the home of the owner of the stolen vehicle and collected the exhibits. Reyes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11611 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 11 2013).

881. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that the probative value of the extraneous-offense evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because, on cross-examination of the State's witnesses, the defense placed identity in issue by eliciting testimony suggesting that someone other than defendant committed the charged offense. Lawson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11334 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 4 2013).

882. In a prosecution for evading arrest, the trial court did not err by admitting the State's photographs over defendant's objection under this rule because defendant challenged the officer's version of the events, there was no other evidence except the officers' testimony to establish that defendant refused to comply, and the pictures were not gruesome. King v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11185 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 30 2013).

883. Given the minimal danger of the jury drawing any unfair conclusions from defendant's presence when his brother displayed the gun and the probative value of being able to link defendant to the murder weapon, the trial court did not err in overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection; the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the probative value of the testimony about the gun was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Steward v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10761 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 27 2013).

884. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting five mug shots of defendant because the fact that the police officers' testimony concerning the Class C arrests was not supported by certified court records did not render the mug shots irrelevant, and the mug shots' probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice merely because the arrests at issue did not result in convictions. Riojas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10874 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 27 2013).

885. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the extraneous offense evidence was not substantially more prejudicial than probative because the issue of defendant's identity was central to the State's case, the jury was provided with these express written and oral instructions limiting its consideration of the extraneous offense evidence, and the State's need for the extraneous offense evidence was considerable. Morin v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10549 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 22 2013).

886. Decision that the extraneous offense evidence was not substantially outweighed by the potential for unfair prejudice was not an abuse of discretion, given that the evidence was compelling on the issue of identity, and the evidence, while sexual in nature, was unlikely to affect the jury in an irrational way based on the sexual characteristics of the murder in question. Reed v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10489 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 20 2013).

887. Accomplice's testimony that he and defendant were involved in another aggravated robbery of a taxi cab driver four days before the murder was not inadmissible because it tended to make defendant's theory that he was not the responsible party much less probable, the trial court gave a limiting instruction, an insignificant amount of time was needed to develop the evidence, and it was needed to show defendant's intent to commit a robbery and his intent to kill. Stephens v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10188 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 14 2013).

888. At issue in the case was the father's mental anguish following the death of his daughter; the single picture of the daughter's body was relevant to that issue and was properly admitted. In re Estate of Macdonald, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10135, 2013 WL 4081419 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 13 2013).

889. At the punishment phase of defendant's trial for robbery, the trial court admitted into evidence photographs of his wife after a domestic violence incident. Because defendant objected on the basis of relevance, his claim that the probative value of the photographs was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice was not preserved for review. Cordova v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9947 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 8 2013).

890. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses committed against his younger stepdaughter because they were so intertwined with the sexual assaults against the older stepdaughter that the jury's understanding of the offenses would have been obscured without them. The evidence also rebutted the defensive theory of fabrication, was sufficiently similar to the charged offense, and only limited details were introduced. Campos v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9593 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 1 2013).

891. Probative value of the two autopsy photographs substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice because defendant stated that he did not intentionally hurt the six-year-old child, but the medical examiner testified that neither of the two fatal injuries that the child sustained could have been caused accidentally or unintentionally; and the extent of the child's brain injury could not be determined from looking at the outside of his head. West v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9612 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 1 2013).

892. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting extraneous offense evidence because the probative value of the evidence was high and had the tendency to show that appellant's attempted sexual assault in this case was part of a pattern of offensive conduct, and the trial court could have found that the testimony was not excessively graphic and did not have a tendency to confuse the issues or mislead the jury. Womble v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9407 (Tex. App. Austin July 31 2013).

893. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the probative value of a photograph of his tattoo was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because at no time did he object to the prejudicial value of the photograph. Gossett v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9476 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2013).

894. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the probative value of a photograph of his tattoo was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because at no time did he object to the prejudicial value of the photograph. Gossett v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9475 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2013).

895. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the probative value of a photograph of his tattoo was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because at no time did he object to the prejudicial value of the photograph. Gossett v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9477 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2013).

896. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the probative value of a photograph of his tattoo was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because at no time did he object to the prejudicial value of the photograph. Gossett v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9479 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2013).

897. Trial court did not err by admitting a recording of a 9-1-1 call under this section because the call was not emotionally charged or otherwise inflammatory where the caller's behavior was consistent with any reasonable person tending to a severely injured party. Moreover, the call was admissible to provide a framework for the State to develop its case because the victim was unable to provide full information regarding the events after the incident due to a loss of consciousness. Woods v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9396 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 30 2013).

898. Trial court did not err in excluding evidence of drugs and finding that its probative value was outweighed by its prejudicial effect, as the complainant's involvement in drug dealing had little relevance to appellant's defense, and evidence that the complainant sold drugs would have infected the trial with irrelevant innuendo. Moreno v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9394 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 30 2013).

899. During defendant's sentencing hearing for his aggravated robbery convictions, the court did not err in admitting evidence regarding the general reputation of a gang and his tattoos because the probative value of a detective's testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice; the testimony satisfied the Beasley factors. Hickman v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9323 (Tex. App. Dallas July 29 2013).

900. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by permitting State to introduce evidence of sexual assault of one victim by accomplice because the facts of the case would have been incomplete and difficult to follow had it been excised from the sequence of events, as it occurred while other victim was being killed and before first victim was kidnapped and locked in her car. The probative force of the evidence and the State's need for the evidence favored admission and it took minimal time to develop. Smith v. State, 424 S.W.3d 588, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9093, 2013 WL 3832691 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 25 2013).

901. Because the evidence of a prior victim of an assault by defendant was probative as to who was the aggressor in the present aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting the extraneous offense testimony of the prior victim. Jeter v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8945 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 18 2013).

902. At defendant's trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a licensed professional counselor who treated sex offenders; the expert's testimony about grooming for a sexual offense was relevant to assist the jury in understanding defendant's behavior. The appellate court held that the prejudicial effect of the testimony was not greater than its probative value. Cox v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8890 (Tex. App. Waco July 18 2013).

903. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of toys and pictures from defendant's computer under because the evidence regarding the toys was relevant to determine defendant's sentence, photographs of the toys standing alone were innocuous, and the computer photographs were of young males in various states of undress and were more probative than prejudicial in determining defendant's punishment. Fiala v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8860 (Tex. App. Dallas July 17 2013).

904. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in balancing the factors in favor of the admission three autopsy photographs because the photographs demonstrated the reality of the crime that was committed, the measures taken to save the victim's life, and the steps taken to preserve evidence after those measures failed. The photographs were powerful visual evidence, probative of various aspects of the State's case. Oliver v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8863 (Tex. App. Dallas July 17 2013).

905. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining the admission of the photographs was not substantially more prejudicial than probative because the complainant could not recall the precise dates on which defendant had intercourse with her, but she testified that he had sex with her on the days he photographed her. Thus, the photographs established that the acts of sexual abuse occurred during a period that was 30 or more days in duration, a necessary element of the crime of continuous sexual abuse of a child. Moreno v. State, 409 S.W.3d 723, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8744 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 16 2013).

906. Photographs were relevant to prove appellant's identity and that he entered the establishment, and nothing depicted in the photographs was unfairly prejudicial, such that the trial court could have found that the probative value of the photographs was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Wise v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8446 (Tex. App. Eastland July 11 2013).

907. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the victim's testimony or the State's exhibit (computer images/files) over defendant's objections, because balancing the necessary factors, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Aponte v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8560 (Tex. App. Waco July 11 2013).

908. In a case in which a jury found defendant guilty of four counts of indecency with a child, the trial court did not err in allowing extraneous evidence of drugs and drug use. In addition to the fact trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction, the drug evidence was only a small part of the evidence used by the State to show that defendant had been grooming one of the victims to accept defendant's advances. Bonilla v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8569 (Tex. App. Waco July 11 2013).

909. In a case in which defendant was found guilty of two counts of indecency with a child for the sexual abuse of his granddaughter, a prior victim's testimony that defendant, a family friend, sexually assaulted her when she was seven years old was probative to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication and was admissible. Bible v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8354 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 10 2013).

910. In a misappropriation of trade secrets action, the court did not err in excluding appellees' prior pleadings in which they accused 16 parties of conspiring to steal trade secrets; the minimal relevance of the pleadings was substantially outweighed by the risk of distracting the factfinder from the issues by provoking speculation regarding the disposition or settlement of the cases against the former defendants. Southwestern Energy Prod. Co. v. Berry-Helfand, 411 S.W.3d 581, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8549, 182 Oil & Gas Rep. 798 (Tex. App. Tyler July 10 2013).

911. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence photographs of the victim taken in the hospital because they were visual representations of the officers' testimony regarding her condition, the mere fact that the photographs depicted the victim's badly bruised body did not automatically render them more prejudicial than probative, and they refuted defendant's claims that she never noticed anything wrong with the victim or that the bruising might have been caused by the efforts to resuscitate the victim. Sifuentes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8105 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 3 2013).

912. Video showing an individual's eyes with nystagmus on a Horizontal Gaze Nystagmus test was not inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the record did not show that it had any tendency to confuse or distract the jury from the main issue in the case and the limiting instruction the trial court gave before the testimony about the video avoided a risk that the jury would think that defendant's eyes looked like the eyes on the video. Guerrero v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8102 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 2 2013).

913. Trial court had discretion to exclude a misleading line of questions, and the fact that the trial court improperly disallowed the questioning on the recidivism rate among patients in appellant's offer of proof did not preclude him from properly presenting his appeal; even if the court assumed there had been no recidivism in the treated class of those committed to a program, it did not follow that expert testimony appellant would likely reoffend was incorrect. In re Weissinger, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7819, 2013 WL 3355758 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 27 2013).

914. In a liability insurance coverage dispute, testimony on whether the claimants had contracted asbestosis was properly excluded as irrelevant and confusing because bodily injury, as defined in the policies, occurred upon exposure to asbestos and was not determined on a case-by-case basis. Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's v. Chi. Bridge & Iron Co., 406 S.W.3d 326, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7856, 2013 WL 3270615 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 27 2013).

915. Defendant did not meet his burden to prove that any prejudice he had suffered substantially outweighed the probative value of his testimony to show that an incident occurred relating to defendant's subsequent relationship to the victim. Flores v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7829 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 27 2013).

916. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the extraneous offense evidence (unadjudicated aggravated robbery) over defendant's objections, because the evidence supported the State's theory that defendant intended to participate in the offenses. Menendez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7742 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 26 2013).

917. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's objection to the State's use of the phrase "sexually violent predator" under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the use of the term was not intended to inflame the jury, as the term appeared in the charging statute, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 841.085, in the final judgment, order of commitment, supervision, and GPS tracking service requirements. Malone v. State, 405 S.W.3d 917, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7766 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 26 2013).

918. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting photographs of defendant's tattoos because the photographs explained how the courtesy officer knew defendant by sight. Ladouceur v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7792 (Tex. App. Dallas June 25 2013).

919. Trial court's admission of jailhouse letters from defendant to the victim apologizing for assaulting her did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the letters were highly probative. The time needed to present them was not substantial, and they were not cumulative of other evidence. Kappel v. State, 402 S.W.3d 490, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7480 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 20 2013).

920. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting statements that defendant made to a jailer where the evidence was admissible as an admission by a party-opponent, as it was offered to prove that defendant admitted guilt in the instant case-he was being held for murder and said he would have to limit himself to one murder every two years. The jailer's testimony clarified the circumstances surrounding the victim's shooting, directly contradicted defendant's theory of the case that his accomplices were wrongly accusing him of firing the gun so that they would receive a favorable deal in their own cases, and was not likely to impress the jury in some irrational but nevertheless indelible way. Haynes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7232 (Tex. App. Eastland June 13 2013).

921. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant's statement to a witness who had been in jail with him before the trial, that defendant was the "shooter," where the State did not offer the inmate's testimony as evidence of an extraneous offense separate and apart from the charged offense but, instead offered the evidence as proof that defendant fired the shots that killed the victim. The statement was an admission by a party-opponent, supported the allegation that defendant killed the victim, directly contradicted defendant's defensive theory that his accomplices only named him as the shooter to get a reduced sentence, and was not likely to impress the jury in some irrational but nevertheless indelible way. Haynes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7232 (Tex. App. Eastland June 13 2013).

922. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it permitted a witness who had been in jail with defendant before the trial to testify that defendant threatened to kill him where the threat was a relevant extraneous offense, as the testimony was evidence that defendant made the threat to instill fear in the witness and to prevent him from testifying. Defendant's actions were probative of guilt, and the testimony was not unfairly prejudicial because defendant did not try to connect his threat to a different offense, and because the record was devoid of any evidence that the threat was related to anything else. Haynes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7232 (Tex. App. Eastland June 13 2013).

923. For purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), although 911 recordings were emotionally charged and disturbing, they depicted no more than the crime and the surrounding circumstances, and while prejudicial to defendant, they were not unfairly prejudicial; the recordings were probative of the circumstances of the crime and of defendant's guilt, and their probative value was not outweighed by emotional and prejudicial aspects under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Patterson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7287 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 13 2013).

924. Regarding other similar incidents an expert investigated, even if appellant preserved the complaint for review, the expert admitted that defendant reached a different conclusion regarding the cause of the incident in each of the cases, which supported defendant's objection that the testimony would have required a mini-trial on causation for each case, and thus the trial court would not have abused its discretion in excluding the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Estate of Muniz v. Ford Motor Co., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7158 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 12 2013).

925. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding details of certain complaints under Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that prolonged proof of what happened in other accidents could not be used to distract the jury's attention from what happened in the instant case, plus appellants did not make an offer of proof as to the contents of the complaints until filing a statutory offer of proof, while Tex. R. Evid. 103(b) required an offer to be made before the charge was read to the jury, and the record did not show that the procedure required in filing a formal bill of exception under Tex. R. App. P. 33.2 was followed. Estate of Muniz v. Ford Motor Co., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7158 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 12 2013).

926. Appellant's statements about whether the transmission was substantially similar did not address the Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection, and thus appellants' complaint was waived because they failed to address all possible bases for the ruling; even if the court addressed the issue, an alleged defect in a gear shift lever was different than an alleged defect in a transmission. Estate of Muniz v. Ford Motor Co., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7158 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 12 2013).

927. Trial court did not err by admitting defendant's prior conviction into evidence because it was offered to prove that defendant was a felony in possession of a firearm on the date of his arrest and the trial court gave a limiting instruction. Colvin v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7128 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 12 2013).

928. Trial court could have reasonably concluded that the probative value of the impeachment evidence offered by defendant was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or confusion of the issues because the absence of record of the witness' arrest in July 1984 for misdemeanor theft and assault suggested that the Houston Police Department did not arrest the witness on that date but did not prove that no entity in Harris County arrested defendant on that date. The Houston Police Department's records included some acts that had no relevance to the witness' credibility and other acts that resulted in convictions the witness had already testified about; defendant was able to explore the discrepancies in the witness' various statements without resorting to the records. Colvin v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7128 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 12 2013).

929. In defendant's pornography case, the chat logs had probative value, and the entire exchange between the prosecutor and a witness constituted no more than ten lines of testimony in the reporters' record. There was a need for the evidence to establish defendant's control over and use of the computer equipment, which also contained pornographic images of children for which he was being prosecuted. Checo v. State, 402 S.W.3d 440, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7029 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 11 2013).

930. Testimony about an aggravated robbery provided the contextual background for the consequent police pursuit of defendant's vehicle and was admissible in his trial for evading arrest and detention using a motor vehicle under the balancing test of Tex. R. Evid. 403. The officers testified that defendant was not charged in the robbery. Villarreal v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7142 (Tex. App. Dallas June 11 2013).

931. At defendant's trial for failure to comply with sex offender registration requirements, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence that defendant moved several times while continuing to report his previous address because the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of undue prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Hogan v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6706 (Tex. App. Dallas May 30 2013).

932. Appellant objected to testimony on grounds that it was more prejudicial than probative, presumably under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and when the State sought to admit photographs, appellant set forth a relevance objection, but at neither time did appellant assert a due course of law or due process objection, plus he failed to continue objecting and did not obtain a running objection or ask for a hearing outside of the jury's presence, and thus he failed to preserve this claim for review. Mccowan v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6138 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 16 2013).

933. Given that his co-conspirator shot the victim in the course of the prior robbery, the extraneous offense evidence supported the State's theory that defendant reasonably should have anticipated that these same co-conspirators, or others, might shoot and kill someone in their next robbery; the evidence was directly relevant to an essential element of the charged crime, and was not needlessly duplicative as there was little other evidence that defendant knew his companions would use violence or carried guns. Pagoada v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6077 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 16 2013).

934. At defendant's trial for assault on a family member, Tex. R. Evid. 613(b) permitted the admission of proof showing bias on the part of defendant's wife because they were involved in divorce proceedings in which she had a pecuniary interest; the trial court did not err in refusing to permit further cross-examination about the divorce under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to prevent harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, harm to the witness, and repetitive or marginally relevant interrogation. Baker v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6084 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 16 2013).

935. Finding that the insurer take nothing on its claim for declaratory judgment against the insured was appropriate, in part because the trial court could have concluded the probative value from the introduction of a signed application and the questioning of witnesses about it would have been substantially outweighed by the danger of confusion of the issues or misleading the jury. The insured testified that he signed the exhibit but also testified that he had never seen two other exhibit and that the signatures on those documents were not his; he also testified that no one at his office had the authority to sign his name to insurance applications. Medicus Ins. Co. v. Todd, 400 S.W.3d 670, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6505 (Tex. App. Dallas May 10 2013).

936. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's murder trial in concluding that the probative value of extraneous offense evidence of his theft of a truck and cocaine use after the charged offense was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice where the evidence of the stolen truck and the cocaine use took very little time to develop and did not distract the jury from the charged offense for any significant period of time during the trial. Moreover, the State had a great need for the evidence of the stolen truck to corroborate defendant's confession, and while the State's need for admitting the cocaine use was not as great, showing defendant's consciousness of guilt was one more factor used in establishing the charged offense. Shuff v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5469 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 2 2013).

937. Trial court did not err during the punishment phase in refusing to exclude evidence of the bad acts (gang involvement and possessing contraband) defendant committed in prison before his conviction was reversed because the evidence was relevant and was not unfairly prejudicial. That defendant engaged in bad acts while in prison revealed aspects of his character, and he failed to suggest that the State focused much attention upon or spent much time discussing the acts' setting. Nunez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5480 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 1 2013).

938. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of two additional stolen trailers on defendant's property under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because testimony established that defendant only had access and control of the property, and the evidence rebutted defendant's strategy of mistake or accident in which he attempted to cast doubt regarding his knowledge of the improper registration of the stolen trailers. Whited v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5225 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 30 2013).

939. Trial court did not err by finding that probative value of the sergeant's testimony regarding the Mexican Mafia and defendant's membership in the organization did not outweigh its prejudicial effect on defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it countered defendant's testimony that he shot two victims under the influence of sudden passion and provided an explanation to the jury as to why defendant shot the victims even though they were fighting with another man and not defendant. The testimony about the Mexican Mafia's reputation for violence and defendant's membership in the organization countered the testimony of defendant's friends and family that he was a non-violent and peaceful person. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5228 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2013).

940. Trial court did not err by finding that probative value of a lay witness's testimony regarding the Mexican Mafia and defendant's membership in the organization did not outweigh its prejudicial effect on defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was spoke to defendant's character, explained why defendant shot the two victims even though he did not know them and did not seem to have any personal motive for doing so, and it countered the testimony of defendant's family and friends that he was a non-violent and peaceful person. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5228 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 30 2013).

941. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting graphic photographs depicting the murder victim's injuries into evidence because they were probative of the manner of death and could be interpreted to indicate that the victim was shot twice in the back and that defendant planted the knife in the victim's hand, which was relevant to defendant's claim of self-defense. The court could not say that the probative value of the photographs was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because while the photographic depiction of the entrance wound was no doubt made more gruesome due to postmortem changes, that information was submitted to the jury solely by way of the autopsy report and the State did not focus on the condition of the wound. Rider v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5050 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 25 2013).

942. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence tending to show that a witness had observed defendant in possession of a firearm on the night of the robbery under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the testimony tended to establish defendant's identity as one of the gunmen during the robbery and to corroborate the accomplices' testimony and the evidence qualified as same transaction contextual evidence. The trial court could have found that the probative value of the evidence was high, as the victims of the robbery were unable to identify the men who had robbed them at gunpoint and the State needed the testimony to corroborate the accomplices' testimony who had identified defendant as one of the gunmen. Head v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5109 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 24 2013).

943. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the photograph of defendant nude in a bathtub with his nude infant son was relevant and material to rebutting defendant's defense that he was not the perpetrator and its probative value was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photograph. Bentley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4925 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 19 2013).

944. At defendant's assault trial, the admission of defendant's prior robberies was not unduly prejudicial because the probative value of the similar offenses was not outweighed by the possibility of unfair prejudice, given similarities between the crimes. Plata v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4795 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 18 2013).

945. Trial court did not err by excluding a defense witness's testimony as it related to defendant's neighbor's arrests and drug-related involvement with police because while there was evidence indicating that the neighbor might have been the anonymous tipster, there was no evidence that he planted the drugs, and therefore the fact that he may have been tipster was not relevant to the jury's determination of whether defendant possessed drugs. Even if the evidence was relevant, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the relevance was substantially outweighed by the danger of confusing the jury or causing undue delay. Ivie v. State, 407 S.W.3d 305, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4876 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 18 2013).

946. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of an aggravated robbery that occurred 45 minutes before the instant offense of murder under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the fact that defendant admitted to committing the robbery with a deadly weapon, the same gun that was used in the murder, tended to rebut his claim of duress. The trial court could have reasonably concluded that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because the evidence was highly probative, as it tended to rebut defendant's claim of duress, discussion of the offense only took one day of a six-day trial, it did not divert the jury's attention from the crucial issues in the case, and the State's need for the evidence was high, as it had no other direct evidence to rebut defendant's claim of duress. Ibarra v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4772, 2013 WL 1641493 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 17 2013).

947. In a capital murder case, admitting a computer-generated animation with moving figures that purported to illustrate the testimony of a witness was error because the animation contained speculative details not found in the record. The error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), however, because the animation had little bearing on the contested issues; moreover, the trial court gave a timely instruction to disregard. Hamilton v. State, 399 S.W.3d 673, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4839 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 17 2013).

948. Because appellant's contention that the officer's testimony constituted evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was rejected, his Tex. R. Evid. 403 contention was also rejected. Garza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4611 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 11 2013).

949. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying him permission to cross-examine the complainant on the reasons for her 1991 military discharge because there was no authority explaining how a suicide attempt 20 years ago would affect the complainant's credibility during trial. Duff v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4662 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 11 2013).

950. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that evidence that two co-defendants had committed a nearly identical robbery just a few days before the instant robbery and that defendant knew about that robbery was relevant to show defendant's intent to participate in the instant robbery and was relevant to the State's theory that defendant had conspired with the two co-defendants to commit the instant robbery. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence because the evidence tended to rebut defendant's theory that she had nothing to do with the instant robbery and capital murder. Ohlfs v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4660 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 11 2013).

951. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's indecency with a child trial in admitting an extraneous offense and bad act testified to by another child under seventeen years of age who resided at the apartment complex where the incident took place because the extraneous offense evidence was relevant to prove the sole disputed issue at trial--knowledge that a child was present--and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. While the extraneous offense evidence was not overwhelming evidence of defendant's knowledge of the child's presence, it was some evidence of that vital fact, and the time needed to develop the evidence was inconsequential, while the need for the evidence weighed heavily in favor of its admission to prove knowledge. Henderson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4512 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 10 2013).

952. During defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver methamphetamine, the court did not err in admitting into a evidence a switchblade knife found in his car because it was relevant as evidence of his intent to deliver narcotics, an element of the charged offense; not only was the evidence probative, but the State spent very little time developing it and there was little risk that it would impress the jury in an irrational way. Wetmore v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4466, 2013 WL 1451164 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

953. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence a letter defendant wrote to the woman who leased the apartment where the drugs were found because it was relevant, as defendant's statement in the letter that he had the "best dope around" could be seen as indicative of a willingness to provide the woman and perhaps others with dope, further connecting him to the woman and suggesting an intent to deliver. In addition, the letter was strongly probative to rebut any contention that his presence in the apartment was merely fortuitous and assisted the State with its proof that defendant's possession of the drugs was knowing. Bible v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4455, 2013 WL 1411849 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 8 2013).

954. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense of attempted capital murder, based on defendant swerving towards an officer laying traffic spikes, because the 40 minute chase that began in one county and ended in another was one, indivisible criminal transaction, and the need for context outweighed any unfairly prejudicial effect to defendant. Capps v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4438 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 5 2013).

955. Question was whether the evidence's probative value was substantially outweighed by dangers of prejudice or confusion of the issues, and the record did not show that the trial court abused its discretion when it allowed evidence of weapons and ammunition found in a search of appellant's last two residences, in light of allegations he had threatened three witnesses, plus the jury was instructed to consider the evidence only for the purpose of corroborating prior witness testimony. Hurst v. State, 406 S.W.3d 617, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4282 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 4 2013).

956. During defendant's trial for robbery of a fast-food restaurant, the court did not err in admitting evidence of another robbery at a nearby fast-food restaurant because the two robberies were similar; the extraneous offense was not likely to create such prejudice in the minds of the jurors that they would be unable to consider the evidence for its proper purpose. Mcneil v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4234 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 3 2013).

957. To the extent that records of other injuries or medical conditions showed a personal injury claimant had back pain before a slip and fall incident, the records were relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402. Absent evidence of other litigation, the medical evidence was not overly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and the admission of irrelevant medical records unrelated to back pain was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1) because the judgment did not turn on records regarding unrelated conditions. Sparks v. Exxon Mobil Corp., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4206 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 2 2013).

958. Defendant's conviction for capital murder was proper because the admission of evidence was relevant, probative, and offered in rebuttal to defendant's portrayal of himself as a gentle, even-handed father. Although the State's need for the evidence was minimal, it took very little time to present evidence of both extraneous offenses and, in light of the entire record, that evidence had little, if any, potential to sway the jury in an irrational yet indelible way. Duncan v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3169, 2013 WL 1258449 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 22 2013).

959. Appellant raised Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403 objections to a certain incident, but he did not claim that the extraneous offense evidence was improper character evidence, and as he did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), his complaint on appeal did not comport with his objections at trial, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), and thus he did not preserve his complaint for review. Rudzavice v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3140, 2013 WL

1188924 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 21 2013).

960. Having already concluded that the prior conviction for family-violence assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.01(b)(2) was an element of the offense and not just an enhancement provision, a sufficient stipulation by defendant would have to specifically show that he was previously convicted of a family-violence assault; therefore, neither Tex. R. Evid. 403 nor Old Chief, required the trial court to allow defendant's proposed stipulation. Olivas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3052, 2013 WL 1182208 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 20 2013).

961. Defendant's conviction for DWI, third or more was proper because the trial court properly overruled his sole objection related to "unadjudicated offenses" and the evidence introduced by the State which did not consist of judgments of convictions was permitted as extraneous bad acts. Because no Tex. R. Evid. 403 arguments were raised below, they were unpreserved on appeal, Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Capps v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2770, 2013 WL 1091232 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 15 2013).

962. Trial court acted within its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon in admitting the victim's medical records without expert testimony where the records were relevant to prove the victim suffered bodily injury as a result of the assault, and the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the victim's injuries were within the common knowledge and experience of the jurors and did not require expert testimony. The trial court also could have reasonably concluded that the probative value of the medical records was considerable compared to its potential for confusing or misleading the jury. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2250, 2013 WL 857252 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 7 2013).

963. Court properly admitted evidence that defendant's girlfriend purchased a silver .38 caliber revolver shortly before the victim's death because a codefendant testified that defendant had used a silver gun, and another witness testified that defendant was carrying a "chrome .38, snub-nose revolver" on the day the victim was killed. The inherent probative force of the evidence concerning the guns was its tendency to show that defendant was the shooter, and although the evidence was prejudicial, it was not unfairly prejudicial. Buckley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2246 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 7 2013).

964. In a divorce, testimony that a husband made statements to the witness about having had sex with young girls was not barred under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the testimony was relevant to the issue of the best interests of the parties' child. Howell v. Howell, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1991, 2013 WL 784542 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 28 2013).

965. Trial court's alleged error in permitting the complainant to testify as to the punishment he would like defendant to receive had no more than a very slight effect on the jury's determination of punishment; presuming there was error, such error was harmless. Hines v. State, 396 S.W.3d 706, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2000, 2013 WL 748755 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 28 2013).

966. Defendant made no showing that the complainant's immigration status was relevant to proving a material issue in the case and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by sustaining the State's relevance objection, Tex. R. Evid. 401; the trial court could have concluded that the prejudice from defense counsel's deportation and immigration-based questions far outweighed any probative value, Tex. R. Evid. 403. Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2042, 2013 WL 1277883 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 28 2013).

967. Admission of the poster was proper as it served to illustrate defendant's mens rea on the element of intent to deliver; the time spent on developing the evidence was minimal, and the probative value of the posters was not substantially outweighed by their potential prejudice. Mendoza-Torres v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1963, 2013

WL 708492 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 27 2013).

968. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence that defendant had previously, knowingly disregarded the lawful commands of a police officer because the State was entitled to rebut defendant's assertion that had he known they were police officers, he would not have pointed his firearm at them. Flores v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1809 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 26 2013).

969. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence of the minor victim's prior sexual conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 412 to explain the State's medical evidence because, even though the State opened the door to the victim's prior sexual history by asking whether ongoing sexual assaults could explain the nonexistence of trauma in a nonacute exam, the evidence could have been introduced without inquiry into the victim's prior sexual history, and therefore the probative value of the evidence did not outweigh its prejudicial effect. Seery v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2013 WL 683327 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 21 2013).

970. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to evidence that defendant viewed pornography and consumed alcohol under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the failure to object could have been based on trial strategy and therefore the court had to presume counsel's performance was adequate. Weeks v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1428, 2013 WL 557015 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 14 2013).

971. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a case in which defendant was convicted of continuous sexual abuse of a child, his two daughters, by admitting the testimony of an investigator for the district attorney's office over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because defendant's viewing of child pornography, specifically father-daughter pornography-even on a different computer than the one he used when he lived with his family-tended to corroborate the victims' testimony, and because the investigator's testimony had little potential to impress on the jury in some irrational way, as the State offered only the testimony about the searches, not the images or videos found on defendant's laptop. Moreover, the investigator's testimony took very little time to develop, and the State needed the evidence of defendant's searches for "daddy" plus "daughter" plus "images" or "videos" to lend credibility to other testimony. Watkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1512, 2013 WL 531062 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 14 2013).

972. At defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court erred because it refused to allow defendant to cross-examine the State's witnesses in violation of the Sixth Amendment and the Fourteenth Amendment regarding the complainant's sexual assault of his younger sister. The balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not authorize exclusion of the impeachment evidence, because Tex. R. Evid. 101(c) established that the Constitution of the United States controlled over a conflicting evidentiary rule or civil statute. Johnson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1515, 2013 WL 531079 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 14 2013).

973. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of two boys under the age of fourteen, the trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to offer evidence regarding disturbances at the children's home or the testimony of a psychologist that one of the children was living with a sex offender because the court could have concluded that the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Bullock v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1491, 2013 WL 593829 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 14 2013).

974. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining the testimony of a witness that appellant had been in jail was not substantially more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because 1) the evidence had probative value as it demonstrated appellant's possible motive for shooting the victim; 2) the witness's testimony about motive was brief and directly relevant to appellant's motive and the intent element of the charged offense and, as such, had less potential to distract the jury from the charged offense; and 3) evidence of the reason appellant was in jail was excluded, which mitigated any potential for the jury to give undue weight to the evidence. Nieto v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1239, 2013 WL 485762 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 7 2013).

975. At defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver a controlled substance, cocaine, in a drug free zone, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of weapons found at the location where defendant was arrested; it was relevant to show that the weapons were used for protection of the drugs. The probative value of the evidence outweighed the prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Blue v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1231, 2013 WL 489998 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 7 2013).

976. Because the expert's calculations did not include an amount to be paid to appellant as reasonable compensation for his management services, the expert's calculations were not complete, and therefore the proffered evidence could have confused or misled the jury. Nacogdoches Heart Clinic, P.A. v. Pokala, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1066, 2013-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P78252, 2013 WL 451810 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 6 2013).

977. In a murder case, a trial court did not err by admitting autopsy photographs because they were probative of the issue of whether a death where a victim was run over by a car was an intentional killing with multiple injuries inflicted. The probative value of the photographs was not substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect; none of the photos showed any mutilation to the body caused by the medical examiner's examination. Ogle v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1084, 2013 WL 453257 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 6 2013).

978. In a murder case, the admission of an autopsy photo of the victim's brain was not an abuse of discretion because (1) the photo assisted the jury in understanding the victim's injury, (2) the photo was not excessively gruesome, (3) nothing showed the jury would have given the photo undue weight, and (4) the photo would not have caused the jury to make the jury's decision on an improper basis. Wilson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1166, 2013 WL 461060 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 6 2013).

979. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence defendant's jail telephone call recordings and summaries because they aided the State in its rebuttal of defendant's defense that he had no involvement or knowledge of the dealership's transactions; The trial court was within the zone of reasonable disagreement to find that the probative value of the recordings and summaries were not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. The jailhouse phone calls did not tend to connect defendant to any prior bad acts or crimes that he might have committed. Wood v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 31 2013).

980. In appellant's murder case, the State offered a photograph to establish that the woman a sergeant identified as the victim was the same women whose autopsy he attended, and the sergeant identified the number visible in the exhibit as the number that applied to this case, and there was no error in the admission of the photograph in addition to the admission of the sergeant's testimony, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403; the fact that the State offered the photograph in addition to the sergeant's testimony did not destroy the photograph's probative value, and it was still relevant evidence. Jackson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 889 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 31 2013).

981. Defendant's commitment as a sexually violent predator was appropriate because the jury could have reasonably found beyond a reasonable doubt that he had a behavioral abnormality that made him likely to engage in a predatory act of sexual violence. Further, each expert explained the facts considered and how those facts affected that expert's evaluation; the evidence assisted the jury in weighing the testimony and the opinion each expert offered and the trial judge could have reasonably concluded that the experts' testimony was not unfairly prejudicial. In re Anderson, 392 S.W.3d 878, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 602 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 24 2013).

982. To the extent appellant claimed evidence was prejudicial, he did not object on grounds of Tex. R. Evid. 403, and thus this issue was not preserved for review. Williams v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 695 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 24 2013).

983. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's prior misconduct with a teenager under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because defense counsel's questions exploring a civil lawsuit opened the door to evidence offered to rebut the implication that the victim's mother had induced the victim to fabricate charges against defendant to create grounds for a lawsuit with a potential financial payoff. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the State's need for the evidence was substantial, given the lack of physical evidence to corroborate the testimony of the victim and his mother and testimony about the prior offense occupied very few pages of the record. Hetherington v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 437, 2013 WL 173760 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 17 2013).

984. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photographs where they were pictures of the locations at which the assaults took place and pictures of the victim's injuries; none of the photographs were gruesome, the victim was clothed, and none were cumulative. Hill v. State, 392 S.W.3d 850, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 453, 2013 WL 174062 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 16 2013).

985. Trial court did not err during defendant's murder trial in admitting photographs that were taken at the crime scene and at the victim's autopsy because the photographs were not so horrifying or appalling that a juror of normal sensitivity would necessarily encounter difficulty rationally deciding the critical issues of the case after viewing them. Jameson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 242, 2013 WL 150281 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 14 2013).

986. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that he held the child victim's mother at gunpoint several days after the alleged assault occurred under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it constituted same transaction contextual evidence and was relevant, as the evidence showed that defendant confronted the victim's mother because he wanted to interrogate the victim about the assault and showed the jury how defendant reacted violently to the victim's outcry; the evidence was also necessary to show how defendant gained access to the victim's house to leave a letter in which he admitted to touching the victim. The admission of the evidence did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it made a fact of consequence, defendant's touching of the victim's genitals, more probable. Rodriguez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 213, 2013 WL 135723 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 10 2013).

987. Defendant's conviction for continuous sexual abuse of a child was proper because the trial court could have reasonably concluded the extraneous offense evidence regarding an alleged victim and defendant's sexual acts toward her was offered to rebut defendant's several defensive theories. The extraneous offense was sufficiently similar to the charged offense to be admissible, both individuals were related to defendant's wife, both the extraneous offense and some of incidents involving the complainant occurred at defendant's workplace, and Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors favored admission because the extraneous offense evidence was probative to rebut defendant's defensive theories that appellant was not the type of person who would sexually abuse a child, Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 338 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 3 2013).

988. In defendant's murder case, the probative value of nine crime scene photographs outweighed their unfair prejudice because the photos did not show the victim's sexual organs and only showed his abdomen to the extent necessary to view the gunshot wound. The photos did nothing more than depict the crime scene, and they were unlikely to elicit an irrational decision. Gabriel v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10771, 2012 WL 6743557 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 31 2012).

989. In a termination of parental right case, the court did not err by admitting testimony regarding the child's outcries of abuse because the child made her initial outcries to a doctor while being treated, and after she began therapy, she made separate reports of the same events. That testimony was probative, and was not substantially outweighed by any unfair prejudice. In the Interest of C.T., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10746 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 27 2012).

990. Trial court did not err by allowing a physician to testify as an expert witness and testify generally as to the patterns of sexual offenders and how those offenders typically victimized children because the trial court could have concluded that the testimony would be helpful to the jury in its deliberations of the evidence and defendant failed to explain how the testimony about statistical correlations in families with sex offenders or the vulnerability of a child born into such a family carried with it unfair prejudice or how there was a clear disparity between its probative value and its degree of prejudice. Beltran v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10639 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 21 2012).

991. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony of defendant's 2007 sexual encounter with an adult female where the jury was instructed on how it should use the evidence at issue, which reduced the possibility that admitting the testimony created any harmful error. Cross v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10487, 2012 WL 6643832 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 19 2012).

992. Admission of testimony by defendant's girlfriend regarding defendant's prior drug use was not unduly prejudicial; considering expert testimony concerning the effect of methamphetamine on defendant's mental health condition and any prescribed medication for the condition, the trial judge could have reasonably concluded that the evidence of defendant's prior use of methamphetamine tended to rebut defendant's insanity defense. Dana v. State, 420 S.W.3d 158, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10265, 2012 WL 6213501 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 12 2012).

993. In defendant's drug case, the court properly admitted a letter a witness received from defendant while they were both in jail for the offense because the letter was probative of defendant's relationship with the witness, as well as his guilt. Although the letter contained some derogatory racial language, the language was used by defendant to refer to himself, and other racial references were directed at the witness. Caballero v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10098, 2012 WL 6035259 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 5 2012).

994. Court did not err by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses, because an issue in the case was whether defendant could form the intent necessary to commit the offense even if he did not meet the legal definition of insanity, and the evidence at issue was probative of defendant's intent and indicated the nature of his relationship with his wife in the days leading up to the offense of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, causing serious bodily injury, and involving family violence. Wilson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10004 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 4 2012).

995. Evidence that the victim was a drug dealer would have been irrelevant and inadmissible if offered to show that his life was not as valuable as other society members, and the trial court was within its discretion to limit the cross-examination in this regard during the punishment phase, as the victim's status as a drug dealer was collateral and irrelevant to the assessment of an appropriate sentence, and this status was not directly relevant to the murder charge; permitting impeachment of the victim's character with extrinsic evidence would have confused the issues and wasted the jury's time, and it was within the trial court's discretion to exclude the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Gladney v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9806, 2012 WL 5949473 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 28 2012).

996. Where defendant was convicted for aggravated sexual assault of a child -- his daughter, testimony about an extraneous offense he committed against his son was properly admitted because it rebutted the defensive claim of fabrication. The testimony did not appear to be so unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as to make its admission outside the range of the trial court's discretion. Korp v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9832, 2012 WL 5961662 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 28 2012).

997. During defendant's capital murder trial, the court did not err under the rule in excluding testimony about illegal drug use and promiscuous, extramarital sexual behavior by his wife, one of the victims, because the jury was made thoroughly aware through other evidence of the emotional stress caused by their volatile marriage. Hernandez v. State, 390 S.W.3d 310, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1601 (Tex. Crim. App. Nov. 21 2012).

998. Concerning appellant's conviction of aggravated assault on a peace officer, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting appellant's testimony concerning a certain prior incident and the attendant consequences over appellant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403; appellant sought to establish a theory of self-defense, and testimony about the prior incident was probative in (1) clarifying the false impression appellant gave about his relationship with a neighbor, the person appellant thought he shot, (2) undermining his self-defense theory, and (3) showing that he was prohibited from possessing a gun outside his house on the date in question, and appellant did not overcome the presumption that the testimony about the incident was more probative than prejudicial. Moten v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9541, 2012 WL 5696200 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 15 2012).

999. Without affirmative evidence establishing the proposed questions' probative value, the questions defendant sought to ask would constitute nothing more than a mere fishing expedition with a substantial prejudicial effect; therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the testimony of the confidential informant. Bolton v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9402, 2012 WL 5507404 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 14 2012).

1000. In defendant's criminal solicitation of a minor case, the court did not err by allowing evidence of his Internet address book, which showed he had contacts with females with sexually suggestive and youthful names because the evidence was probative in that it tended to show defendant was not on the Internet looking for babysitting services. The evidence did not include any specifics of any extraneous misconduct and there was therefore little danger the jury would either give the evidence undue weight or decide the case on an improper basis. Meadows v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9416, 2012 WL 5504017 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 14 2012).

1001. In defendant's attempted sexual assault case, a witness's testimony regarding other inappropriate conduct allegedly perpetrated by defendant was properly admitted because the testimony showed that defendant acted inappropriately with other underage girls in the household and, thus, corroborated the victim's testimony and showed defendant's predilection for underage girls. Additionally, the State needed the testimony to rebut the mother's assertion that nothing inappropriate had ever transpired between defendant and the victim. Baker v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9345, 2012 WL 5458474 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 8 2012).

1002. In defendant's murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting testimony as evidence of identity because, in both offenses, a green vehicle blocked the roadway and a young man approached the blocked-in vehicle with a "silver" handgun. The witness identified defendant as the "young man" from her aggravated robbery, and he used an accomplice's mother's vehicle to commit that offense; the challenged evidence made defendant's identity more probable, took little time to develop, and supported the element of identity. Torres v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9134 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 1 2012).

1003. Appellant only raised a general objection to the admission of extraneous offenses, which was insufficient to preserve a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection for review, and thus this issue was overruled. Martinez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8994 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 30 2012).

1004. In an indecent exposure case, the court properly allowed evidence of defendant's prior conviction of failing to register as a sex offender over his objection because it was a crime of deception and was a significant piece of evidence bearing on his character for truthfulness; the manner in which the State presented evidence of defendant's conviction did not likely leave an indelible impression on the jurors to encourage an irrational decision. Tristan v. State, 393 S.W.3d 806, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8895, 2012 WL 5285673 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct.

1005. As appellant's identity as a robber was a major dispute and the evidence corroborating accomplice-witness testimony was mostly circumstantial, the trial court could have considered other evidence, including stolen credit card evidence, probative and necessary; the credit card evidence had little prejudicial effect as character conformity evidence because there was testimony the card was not given to appellant, nothing showed the evidence tended to confuse or mislead the jury, and the jury was instructed on how to consider extraneous offense testimony, such that the court found no abuse of discretion in the trial court's finding that the evidence was not precluded by Tex. R. Evid. 403. Biera v. State, 391 S.W.3d 204, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8782, 2012 WL 5199374 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 22 2012).

1006. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because, with regard to the victim's alleged prior sexual behavior, other than her involvement, there was no similarity between those incidents and the current allegations against defendant currently, Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, and 412(b). Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

1007. Although Tex. R. Evid. 107 is limited by Tex. R. Evid. 403, appellant failed to object that the evidence was substantially more prejudicial than probative, and to the extent he tried to raise a Rule 403 complaint on appeal, he did not preserve this issue for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1). Hailey v. State, 413 S.W.3d 457, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8717, 2012 WL 4936655 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 18 2012).

1008. Defendant's contention that the probative value of video recordings showing sex acts between dancers and patrons of the adult establishment owned and operated by defendant were substantially outweighed by a danger of unfair prejudice was not preserved for appellate review because while defendant raised a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection in her motion in limine in her first trial but sought only to have the State approach the bench before mentioning or offering the video recordings in the instant trial. Coutta v. State, 385 S.W.3d 641, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8692 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 17 2012).

1009. In an aggravated kidnapping case, an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was properly overruled because of the probative value of a folding knife found in a truck; this supported the State's allegation that the kidnapping was aggravated, and there was little or no danger of confusion of the issues. Moreover, evidence of checks was probative to identify appellant as a participant in the kidnapping, and an argument that the trial court failed to conduct the Rule 403 balancing test before admitting the challenged evidence was rejected because the judge was presumed to have engaged in the required balancing test when Rule 403 was invoked. Padilla v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8519 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 11 2012).

1010. Defendant's conviction for engaging in organized crime was proper because the nonaccomplice evidence placed defendant at or near the scene of the crime at or about the time of its commission under suspicious circumstances and because, although the forensic examiner testified that he did not know who actually sent or received the text messages, the circumstances were sufficient to allow a jury reasonably to find that defendant sent and received the messages. Because intent to commit forgery could not be inferred, the prior conviction showing strikingly similar facts made the existence of a material fact, that was, whether defendant possessed forged checks with the intent to defraud or harm another, more probable and defendant did not show that the trial court acted outside the zone of reasonable disagreement by balancing the factors in favor of admissibility, Tex. R. Evid. 403. Franklin v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8513 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 10 2012).

1011. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting into evidence a letter defendant wrote while awaiting trial. The time needed to develop and present the evidence was minimal, and the evidence was needed to prove defendant intentionally caused the victim's death. Case v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8349, 2012 WL 4757929 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 4 2012).

1012. In a murder case, the trial court did not err when it denied defendant the opportunity to question an eyewitness about her experience with burning people to establish her as an alternate perpetrator. With little details regarding the alleged past conduct, the trial court did not err in sustaining the State's relevancy objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the court could not determine whether the excluded testimony was sufficient to show a nexus between the crime charged and the alleged alternative perpetrator to avoid confusing the issues at trial. Dayne Adenauer White v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8107 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 27 2012).

1013. At defendant's trial for indecency with a child by contact, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to the portions of a recorded interview in which he admitted viewing pornography, masturbating, and having sexual urges toward children. The prejudicial impact of the evidence was low in light of the allegations against him, and defendant's description of his sexual urges toward children was relevant to the elements of the offense. Mattingly v. State, 382 S.W.3d 611, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8126, 2012 WL 4457713 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 26 2012).

1014. Record did not affirmatively show that potential objections to evidence would have been successful, or if so, would have resulted in the exclusion of the evidence; nothing indicated that the proper foundation could not have been provided if objected to, and nothing indicated that the trial court would have excluded the evidence as unduly prejudicial, and thus the father failed to show that had counsel objected, the evidence would have been excluded, and the court did not find counsel was deficient for failing to objection. Medellin v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8225, 2012 WL 4466511 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 26 2012).

1015. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial for intoxication assault, the trial court did not err by admitting a statement probative of defendant's general attitude of selfishness because the statement was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to show defendant's character and helpful to the jury in determining whether she was a good candidate for community supervision. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection, because the State needed the statement to counter testimony from family and friends as to defendant's sweet nature and tender-heartedness. Ford v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8034, 2012 WL 4243715 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 20 2012).

1016. At defendant's trial for DWI, any error in the admission of medical records containing extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not have a substantial effect on the verdict because the jury heard evidence that defendant was passed out in his vehicle with a bottle of alcohol between his legs; the officer noticed defendant's glassy and bloodshot eyes, defendant admitted he consumed alcohol and prescription medications, and field sobriety test results suggested intoxication. The record contained sufficient evidence from which the jury could find defendant guilty of DWI beyond a reasonable doubt. Lorenz v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7777, 2012 WL 4017766 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 12 2012).

1017. Photograph showed the complainant's male fetus about 18 weeks in gestational age, who died when the complainant died, there was some indication that the photograph was not displayed on a screen overhead, and appellant challenged the admission of the photograph on Tex. R. Evid. 403 grounds; however, appellant was charged with the capital murder of the complainant and the unborn child, the photograph related to one victim, only one photograph was used during the medical examiner's testimony, and the photograph was not gruesome, nor did it depict mutilation, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photograph. Zapata v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7700, 2012 WL 3892878 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 10 2012).

1018. Trial court properly admitted a sex offender's prior written statements in his sexually violent predator commitment proceeding because the statements were relevant apart from their tendency to prove the sex offender's stipulated convictions. The prior inconsistent statements were neither unduly prejudicial nor cumulative of the matters that the sex offender admitted in his requests for admissions. In re Commitment of Bath, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7586, 2012 WL 3860631 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 6 2012).

1019. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a photograph of the victim's head after her body was discovered in the closet despite defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because it was probative of the injuries sustained by the victim, the single photograph did not require a great deal of time to present to the jury, and, though gruesome, depicted no more than the unpleasant, natural consequences of defendant's crime of murder. Hernandez-Sandoval v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7660, 2012 WL 3870306 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 6 2012).

1020. Court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence because the State was required to prove that defendant committed the aggravated assault with intent to participate as a member of a criminal street gang and the intent element was hotly contested because defendant asserted that the crimes were not gang-related but simply an argument over a woman that escalated into a fight; it was the State's theory that the gang members assaulted the victim in retaliation for him disrespecting another gang member by interfering with his advances on a woman. There was no evidence the jury gave the evidence undue weight. Romero v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7573, 2012 WL 3834917 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 5 2012).

1021. In a tampering with evidence case, the court properly admitted Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) evidence that defendant police officer had been at parties and that he was drinking with underage females because defendant attempted to show that the State was engaging in selective prosecution, and the State introduced the evidence to rebut the defensive theory. The State's evidence to rebut the defensive theory was not overly broad, and the court heard the testimony outside the presence of the jury. Shults v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7478, 2012 WL 3799209 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 30 2012).

1022. In a domestic assault case, the court properly admitted evidence because the fact that defendant had a prior conviction for assault-family violence was an essential element of the repeat-offender charge, and the victim did not appear at trial to testify so the State needed the evidence to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication. Additionally, the victim's mother, when testifying to the extraneous offense, did not go into graphic detail regarding the circumstances surrounding the prior assault, and the documents relating to the offense also did not provide much detail in describing the assault. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7543 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 29 2012).

1023. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant offered to pay for an abortion for another teenager with whom he had sex because the record did not establish the requisite level of danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, as the alleged act occurred in another town in the mid-1990s and the trial court could have found that the evidence was helpful in creating a fuller picture of defendant for the jurors, much like the evidence of his good work and family ties. Chavez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7127, 2012 WL 3629619 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 24 2012).

1024. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting hundreds of digital images of gay pornography seized from defendant's home computer, including some that depicted children, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the trial court found that a defense witness's testimony opened the door to the pornography, as the defense elicited testimony about her opinion as to whether defendant could have committed the charges complained of and as a result, left a false impression with the jury. The trial court did not err by admitting the evidence over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the State did not spend an excessive amount of time on the evidence and the pictures were no more heinous than the testimony elicited of the victims. Pawlak v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7109, 2012 WL 3612493 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2012).

1025. Text messages' probative value was not substantially outweighed by the prejudice in their admission, under Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that (1) the messages were relevant to the crime, and (2) even if there was error in admitting the messages, there was no harm; even without the text messages, there was enough evidence to substantiate appellant's anger. Trammell v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7149, 2012 WL 3612518 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2012).

1026. Court erred during defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child in admitting portions of recorded telephone conversations between defendant and a detective, which stated that defendant would rather spend time with kids, on the ground that the evidence was more prejudicial than probative. Dekneef v. State, 379 S.W.3d 423, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7024 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 22 2012).

1027. To the extent appellant claimed the trial court erred in not conducting a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing analysis on the record, the court disagreed because there was no requirement that such be on the record, and the court presumed the test was conducted once an objection was made, unless the record showed otherwise. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1028. There was no abuse of discretion by the trial court's admission of extraneous offense evidence, because all of the Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors weighed in favor of admitting the evidence. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1029. Probative nature of the extraneous offense was high as it arguably rebutted appellant's claim that the charges were fabricated as part of a conspiracy; the extraneous offense showed that appellant was arrested while driving his truck away from a lot behind the victim's house, the truck was spotted while police investigated a break-in report at the victim's house, and the break-in took place within days of the charged offense, and this weighed in favor of admitting the evidence. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1030. Potential of the extraneous offense evidence to impress the jury in an irrational but indelible way was not high, given that the evidence did not involve a crime of violence and the trial court gave a limiting instruction, and this factor weighed in favor of admitting the evidence. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1031. Extraneous offense was not discussed until cross-examination of appellant and then in the State's rebuttal case, and the testimony covered 50 pages out of more than 400 pages of testimony, which was not excessive; this factor weighed in favor of admitting the evidence. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1032. State's need for the evidence was high because it needed the extraneous offense evidence in order to rebut appellant's defensive theories, including conspiracy. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1033. Trial court did not err by admitting the testimony of an officer and a bail bondsman employee regarding defendant's prior arrest for felony possession of cocaine and subsequent bail under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the State was entitled to rebut defendant's testimony that he accidentally struck the police vehicles while attempting to flee and it tended to establish that defendant's motive for assaulting the officer was to avoid revocation of his felony bail. The court held that the admission of the evidence was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) created an inference that the assault on the officer was not accidental and defendant had a motive for attempting to flee; (2) the evidence exhibited little potential to improperly impress the jury; (3) the development of the evidence took only a short portion of the trial; and (4) the State needed the evidence because defendant testified that striking the officers' vehicles was accidental and he had no reason to flee from or assault the officer. Freeman v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6996 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 20 2012).

1034. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence regarding the underlying offense for which defendant was required to register as a sex offender because the State introduced statements made by defendant to officers that he did not think he should have to register as a sex offender because the sex with his thirteen-year-old stepdaughter was consensual. The State argued such evidence was relevant to show defendant's casual attitude regarding sex offender registration requirements and defendant's intent to ignore them; presentation of the disputed evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Toliver v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6902, 2012 WL 3553380 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 17 2012).

1035. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 by allowing the State's use of defendant's investigator's bills to cross-examine defendant because while the evidence may have been prejudicial it was not unfairly prejudicial. Pardee v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6823, 2012 WL 3516485 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 16 2012).

1036. In a negligence suit under the Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.S. § 30104, the trial court abused its discretion by sustaining a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to prohibit an injured seaman who slipped and fell on deck from impeaching the captain by questioning him about the subsequent painting of the boat's entire wooden deck with non-skid paint. By asking the captain about the use or non-use of non-skid paint on a vessel not involved in the lawsuit, the operator of the boat opened the door for the injured seaman to cross-examine the captain about the operator's use of non-skid paint on other vessels in its fleet. Hewitt v. Ryan Marine Servs., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6808, 2012 WL 3525408 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 16 2012).

1037. Because at trial defense counsel did not object to pictures of his tattoos on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 402 and 403, defendant's complaint on appeal was not preserved. Mejia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6862, 2012 WL 3525641 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2012).

1038. At a bench conference, counsel made an argument under Tex. R. Evid. 403 regarding a videotape, and although counsel failed to reassert her objection during the sentencing part of the trial, because the bench conference discussing the videotape was done outside of the jury's presence, the issue was preserved for review, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1). Garza v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6865, 2012 WL 3525634 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2012).

1039. Appellant failed to meet his burden under the test for ineffective assistance, given that (1) he did not offer any authority or argument, under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(i), showing that the trial court would have erred in overruling an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, (2) the trial court did overrule appellant's relevance objection under Tex. R. Evid. 402 as to a deputy's testimony, (3) appellant did not raise the issue on appeal, although he claimed that one reason counsel should have objected on relevancy grounds was to preserve the issue for appeal, and (4) counsel's failure to object might have been sound trial strategy, as the testimony was brief, counsel already objected to relevance of the testimony, and a later objection was successful and the trial court instructed the jury to disregard the testimony concerning whether committing a crime was something to be expected from persons with a certain disease; the court could not say that counsel's failure to further object was ineffective assistance. Ozuna v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6858, 2012 WL 3525635 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2012).

1040. Court rejected appellant's claim that photographs of the victim were more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403; although they were gruesome, the photographs were probative of the extent and nature of the victim's injuries, and they did not portray anymore than the gruesomeness appellant inflicted. Dempsey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6871, 2012 WL 3525653 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2012).

1041. Court found no abuse of discretion with the admission of photographs of the trial scene, which appellant claimed were more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403; the photographs were necessary to show location and the brutality of the offense of attempted capital murder. Dempsey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6871, 2012 WL 3525653 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2012).

1042. In a sexual assault case, the court did not err by allowing evidence of a 2008 kidnap and sexual assault of another victim because both victims were forcefully taken and isolated from anyone who could help them; after defendant had each woman in his car, he restrained each of them, and used derogatory terms towards both. He physically assaulted each woman; ripped off their clothing; and in each case forcefully penetrated their vaginas with his fingers or his hand. Ramos v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6780, 2012 WL 3363348 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 15 2012).

1043. At defendant's trial for family violence assault, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of his prior assault against the victim to explain the victim's fear of retaliation and to rebut the defensive theory that the victim fabricated the allegations. While evidence of the prior assault was unfavorable to defendant, it was not unfairly prejudicial for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Stanley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7064, 2012 WL 3601128 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 14 2012).

1044. In a murder case, the court properly admitted photographs of defendant's tattoos because the "REDRUM" and revolver tattoos were especially probative of defendant's intent and attitude relevant to his defense and testimony that he would never point a gun at someone else first. Given defendant's own counsel's indication that everyone had tattoos and criminal records, on both sides, there was no indication the evidence unfairly aroused the jury's hostility or sympathy. Luckett v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6686, 2012 WL 3241802 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 10 2012).

1045. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it did not exclude evidence of an extraneous murder pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403 where: (1) the extraneous offense evidence made defendant's identity as the murderer of the victim in the instant case more probable; (2) the pictures relating to the extraneous murder were some evidence of the similarity in the modus operandi of the attacks, which was highly probative; (3) the trial court instructed the jurors to limit their consideration of the extraneous offense evidence; and (4) the State's need for the evidence favored admissibility of the extraneous murder. The trial court was within the zone of reasonable disagreement when it implicitly ruled that the probative value of the extraneous murder was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. Mcgregor v. State, 394 S.W.3d 90, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6552, 2012 WL 3244196 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 9 2012).

1046. To the extent autopsy photographs could be seen as disturbing as they showed the victim lifeless, the photographs did not portray any more than the consequences of appellant's felony murder, and under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court could have found that the probative value of the photographs was not substantially outweighed by its inflammatory nature, if there was any; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling appellant's Rule 403 objections and admitting the photographs. Dittman v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6428, 2012 WL 3139873 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 3 2012).

1047. Passenger's evidence concerning her physical, emotional, and economic limitations was properly excluded by the trial court because even if it was relevant, it was merely the presentation of cumulative evidence; the passenger's 2008 motion for reinstatement did not raise the issue of how her health and finances may have limited her ability to pursue her claim. Welborn v. Ferrell Enters., 376 S.W.3d 902, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6378 (Tex. App.

Dallas Aug. 2 2012).

1048. Naming of the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services as permanent managing conservator of the mother's children was proper because her contention that by failing to object to questions, her trial counsel allowed the State to improperly comment on the attorney-client relationship was without merit. The evidence was relevant to the State's allegations that the mother had a pattern of alternating between periods when she was stable and had her illness under control followed by relapses in which she exhibited erratic behavior leading to confrontations with other people; the mother did not argue on what basis the trial court would have excluded such evidence, and considering other evidence of the mother's behavior during the case, it was not substantially more prejudicial than probative. In the Interest of S.W., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6363, 2012 WL 3115749 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 2 2012).

1049. Naming of the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services as permanent managing conservator of the mother's children was proper because she failed to show that her counsel was ineffective. The evidence as to the mother's inability to manage her finances was not substantially more prejudicial than probative as it showed her continued problems with basic life skills even though her mental status appeared to have temporarily improved as trial approached; thus, her trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the questions regarding her 2010 tax return. In the Interest of S.W., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6363, 2012 WL 3115749 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 2 2012).

1050. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child by contact, the court did not err under the rule in excluding evidence of the subsequent kidnapping and sexual assault of the victim; the kidnapping and sexual assault could have tended to confuse or distract the jury from the main issues in defendant's case. Woodall v. State, 376 S.W.3d 122, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6245 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 31 2012).

1051. Regarding appellant's convictions of robbery and aggravated robbery, identity was at issue, and each robbery, including the extraneous offense, took place at night in convenience or dollar stores, the perpetrator made victims retreat to the back of the store, the perpetrator demanded cash via a note in three of the four offenses, and in two of the robberies, appellant's note identified the cash denominations sought, and it was not an abuse of discretion to admit this evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); concerning the Tex. R. Evid. 403 component of this analysis, any prejudicial effect was mitigated because this was a bench trial, and the decision to admit the evidence was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. Williams v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6338, 2012 WL 3104390 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2012).

1052. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant during his trial for murdering his girlfriend's five-year-child because it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403, as: (1) defendant's ex-girlfriend's testimony regarding defendant's distinctively similar pattern of assaultive behavior and manner of abuse toward her son strongly served to make it more probable that it was defendant that assaulted the child leading to her death; (2) the State's need for the testimony was high as only two people could testify regarding the events of the day the child died presented completely contradictory accounts of those events; 93) the trial court instructed the jury regarding the appropriate use of the testimony; and (4) the nature of defendant's assault on his ex-girlfriend's child, which did not cause his death or apparently any serious or permanent injury, was less emotional than the testimony regarding the nature of his assault on his girlfriend's child. Castro v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6233, 2012 WL 3104817 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 2012).

1053. Appellant did not dispute that the proffered evidence was hearsay, and it was his responsibility to specify the exception on which he relied, but he failed to cite one; even if the court found the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403, on which appellant focused, appellant did not address the hearsay issue, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the testimony on inadmissible hearsay grounds. Quevedo v. State, 2012

Tex. App. LEXIS 6178, 2012 WL 3055470 (Tex. App. Dallas July 27 2012).

1054. In a capital murder case, a crime scene video was properly not excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was not duplicative of autopsy photographs; moreover, the fact that the video showed burns and nudity was not a sufficient reason for exclusion either. Even if the video was improperly admitted, it had a slight or no effect on the jury's verdict. Denson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5971, 2012 WL 3025845 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 25 2012).

1055. On appeal from his convictions for compelling prostitution, sexual assault of a child, and sexual performance of a child, the appellate court found that the admission of photographs of items seized from a trash can outside of the studio were admissible because they were relevant and the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Although the evidence might not have pertained directly to the complainant, proof of the activities at the studio was relevant to whether, in employing the complainant at the studio, defendant intended that she engage in sexual performance and prostitution. Wilkerson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5656, 2012 WL 2877623 (Tex. App. Dallas July 16 2012).

1056. Trial court did not err by admitting testimony by the shooter about previous attempts defendant had made on her husband's life under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the testimony was probative as the acts testified to were virtually identical to that with which defendant was charged, it tended to show defendant's motive and intent to end her husband's life, and a witness testified later, without objection, about two instances when defendant sought her advice or assistance in locating someone who could kill her husband, and therefore defendant was not harmed by the admission of the shooter's testimony. Grigsby v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5598, 2012 WL 2861670 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 12 2012).

1057. Because the extraneous offense evidence was not admissible, the court did not need to decide if the probative value of the evidence was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Castle v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5570, 2012 WL 2862270 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1058. Trial court did not err by excluding evidence of the father's psychological evaluation, which included an evaluation of his predilection to pedophilia, because since the father's stated reason to admit the evidence could be accomplished by permitting the mother to testify concerning actions she took to investigate allegations of child abuse against the father in 2003, the trial court was within its discretion to find that there was no other purpose for which the evaluation could have been offered than for the truth of its contents. In addition, the trial court was within its discretion to decide that the evaluation itself would have been cumulative of the mother's testimony and that admitting it would have needlessly confused the jury. In the Interest of W.B.W., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5562, 2012 WL 2856067 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1059. In defendant's aggravated assault, family violence penalty trial, the trial court did not err in admitting two photos of the victim lying in a hospital bed, attached to a ventilator with I-Vs in her arm and with a brace on her neck over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. Mejias v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5616, 2012 WL 2866303 (Tex. App. Waco July 12 2012).

1060. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding from evidence video recordings appellants took of appellee because from the video, there was no way to know what had been edited out, and therefore the trial court could have determined that audio of appellee making harassing comments on various dates in 2006 could mislead the jury. Vaughn v. Drennon, 372 S.W.3d 726, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5488, 2012 WL 2833847 (Tex. App. Tyler July 11 2012).

1061. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting portions of the victim's police interview during which he claimed defendant threatened to kill him like he had other boys because the statements were necessary to understand how defendant overcame the victim's resistance to the sexual assault and the evidence was relevant to rebut defendant's claim that he did not threaten the victim. The evidence was probative of whether defendant used or exhibited a deadly weapon to accomplish the assault, presentation of the evidence took little time, and the statements did not suggest an improper basis for deciding the case. Sandles v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5518, 2012 WL 3104377 (Tex. App. Dallas July 11 2012).

1062. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing two witnesses to testify about extraneous offenses because it could have concluded that the evidence was relevant, probative, and necessary to rebut defendant's theory that the victim fabricated her allegation against defendant. The State's presentation of the evidence consumed very little time, and it was presented in a fashion to prove defendant's intent or knowledge of the offenses charged in the indictment. Guardado v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5514, 2012 WL 2832561 (Tex. App. El Paso July 11 2012).

1063. Defendant failed to preserve for review his claim that the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the covers of commercial pornography video recording that were found in his home because the argument that the covers were more prejudicial than probative was preserved at trial, it was not argued on appeal. Although the argument that the covers improperly impeached the witness with other acts was argued on appeal, it was not preserved for review. Fletcher v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5429, 2012 WL 2783298 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 10 2012).

1064. Determination of the identity of the person fleeing from the police officer was a fact of significant consequence to the determination of the action, and an extraneous offense may be admissible, to show the identity of the accused, Tex. R. Evid. 403(b); therefore, evidence pertaining to identity was relevant and the trial court's decision to deny defendant's objection on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 401 was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. White v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5271 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 29 2012).

1065. Determination of the identity of the person fleeing from the police officer was a fact of significant consequence to the determination of the action, and an extraneous offense may be admissible, to show the identity of the accused, Tex. R. Evid. 403(b); therefore, evidence pertaining to identity was relevant and the trial court's decision to deny defendant's objection on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 401 was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. White v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5271 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 29 2012).

1066. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting into evidence photographs of the victim's body at the crime scene as it reviewed the photographs with the Tex. R. Evid. 403 standard invoked in mind, and the court repeated part of that standard in the midst of its ruling. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5215, 2012 WL 2509693 (Tex. App. Dallas June 28 2012).

1067. Where defendant entered a plea of guilty to four aggravated robberies, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs of defendant's tattoos as they were relevant to the jury's determination of his suitability for community supervision. Two of the tattoos indicated defendant's religious beliefs, one resembled knowledge, and another tattoo depicted a caretaker of death pouring down beer; nothing in the tattoos was so unfairly prejudicial that its exclusion was required under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Jackson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5221, 2012 WL 2445052 (Tex. App. Dallas June 28 2012).

1068. Defendant waived his complaint that the trial court should have undertaken a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test concerning photographs showing the condition of defendant's home because at trial defendant relied on his objection that the evidence was not relevant. Brown v. State, 381 S.W.3d 565, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5164 (Tex.

App. Eastland June 28 2012).

1069. Tex. R. Evid. 401 is helpful in determining what evidence should be admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 37.07, § 3(a), but the definition is not a perfect fit in the punishment phase; relevance is a question of what is helpful to the jury to determine the appropriate sentence for the particular defendant, however, evidence that is relevant may be excluded if the danger of unfair prejudice substantially outweighs the probative value of the evidence. Ex Parte Rogers, 369 S.W.3d 858, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 856 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012).

1070. There was no reasonable strategy for counsel not to object to a witness's testimony in the punishment phase, and even though applicant did not address this matter in his habeas corpus writ, such was relevant, given that in the prior offense and this case, applicant exhibited behavior that was similar, and the attack on the witness was different, and this called into question the probative value of this evidence; had counsel adequately investigated this assault prior to trial, he would have had a stronger basis to ask for exclusion of the prejudicial testimony, and the witness's testimony was likely inflammatory, such that the danger of unfair prejudice substantially outweighed the probative value of the evidence. Ex Parte Rogers, 369 S.W.3d 858, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 856 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012).

1071. Evidence was properly admitted as possession of a certain amount of cash was relevant to the issue of possession of firearm, Tex. R. Evid. 403; trial counsel's relevance objection with respect to defendant's personal items failed to preserve error, Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, as to the prejudicial effect of defendant's testimony of the amount of cash in his possession. Tyson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5059, 2012 WL 2393083 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 26 2012).

1072. Exclusion of the photographic evidence, of marginal relevance at best, was not calculated to cause, nor did it probably cause, the rendition of an improper judgment; because the photographs in question did not purport to show the condition of the property at the time of the annexation, but later, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding them. City of Lufkin v. Akj Props., Inc., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5057, 2012 WL 2393087 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 26 2012).

1073. Appellant did not object to evidence of narcotics use when the State posed a question or when the witness answered, but at a bench conference, he argued that the evidence was not relevant, and this was sufficient to preserve the relevance objection given that the objection was deemed to apply when the evidence was subsequently admitted, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1); at the bench conference, appellant did not object on prejudicial effect grounds, the objection at trial did not comport with the one on appeal, and he failed to preserve error on the claim that the testimony was prejudicial. Miles v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4929, 2012 WL 2356478 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 21 2012).

1074. Identification of defendant by the witness who stated that she was afraid to identify defendant from a photo lineup was highly probative evidence for the State in the murder case, and while certainly prejudicial to defendant, it was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Benavides v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4971, 2012 WL 2353731 (Tex. App. Dallas June 21 2012).

1075. Trial court did not err in admitting a color photograph of a murder victim taken at her autopsy, which depicted a side shot of her from the neck up and showed a placard placed beside her body bearing a unique autopsy number, because the photo was not gruesome, and because the State needed to identify the person in the photo as that of the victim. The probative value of the photo was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Bibbs v. State, 371 S.W.3d 564, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4677, 2012 WL 2135561 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 13 2012).

1076. Photograph of a murder victim taken at the crime scene after she had been shot by defendant was properly admitted where: (1) witnesses identified the picture as that of the victim; (2) the photo was not gruesome and showed no indication that the body had been posed or otherwise disturbed; and (3) the jury saw a video that showed the entire episode without objection. The photo simply depicted the result of a violent assault by one person, defendant, on another person, the victim, and the photo's probative value was not substantially outweighed by danger of unfair prejudice. Bibbs v. State, 371 S.W.3d 564, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4677, 2012 WL 2135561 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 13 2012).

1077. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence a picture of a pornographic videotape that contained adult pornography during defendant's trial on charges of indecency with a child and sexual assault of a child because it had some probative value, as a complainant testified that defendant used pornography in his bedroom immediately before sexually assaulting her and an officer testified about the use of pornography in grooming sexual assault victims. Admission of the picture was not unfairly prejudicial because defendant called the complainant's credibility into question, the officer provided unobjected-to testimony about similar materials found on defendant's computer, and the State focused on the evidence for a relatively short amount of time. Allen v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4598, 2012 WL 2106550 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 7 2012).

1078. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence a school principal's testimony about one of the complainant's bad hygiene during defendant's trial on charges of indecency with a child and sexual assault of a child because the State represented that its relevance would be demonstrated through later testimony and defendant did not argue that the relevance of the testimony was not demonstrated with later evidence. Allen v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4598, 2012 WL 2106550 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 7 2012).

1079. In appellant's aggravated sexual assault trial, a therapist testified that the victim showed behavior that was consistent with sexual abuse; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Lopez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4533, 2012 WL 2053846 (Tex. App. Waco June 6 2012).

1080. Counsel was not ineffective for making a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection to extraneous offenses because it would have been overruled, as Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2 permitted the admissibility of evidence that defendant provided alcohol and pornography to the child victims to lure or groom them. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to make a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the factors of the balancing test weighed in factor of admitting the evidence, as it was probative of the relationship between defendant and the victims. Odom v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4316, 2012 WL 1964580 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 31 2012).

1081. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence that he sexually assaulted two other women because the extraneous offenses were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show intent in response to the defense theory that the complainant consented. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining the evidence was not substantially more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403, because only one fifth of the testimony involved the extraneous offense evidence and the jury was given proper limiting instructions. Brown v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4150, 2012 WL 1893700 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 24 2012).

1082. In a trial for injury to a child, in which the trial court admitted evidence of extraneous wrongs committed by defendant, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because there appeared little chance that the evidence was likely to influence the jury irrationally, as the conduct at issue did not involve instances where defendant caused other injuries. Moreover, the State did not spend an excessive amount of time developing the evidence. Quirk v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4123, 2012 WL 1882934 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 23 2012).

1083. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses based on Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the inherent probative force of the evidence was significant as it tended to rebut defendant's self-defense theory and was highly probative of defendant's intent in assaulting the victim, a material issue at trial; (2) it took the State little time to present the evidence to the jury; and (3) defendant identified no similar evidence the State could have used to rebut his defensive theory. Castillo v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3997, 2012 WL 1764089 (Tex. App. Dallas May 18 2012).

1084. Appellant claimed that even if the extraneous acts were relevant, they should have not been admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403, but the State's establishment of motive relied almost exclusively on the extraneous acts against the victim or in retaliation for the current charge against appellant, and the parties' relationship was probative in helping develop the State's case and show motive; there was no abuse of discretion on the trial court's part in overruling appellant's objection. Jurasek v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3973, 2012 WL 1810197 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 17 2012).

1085. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence during defendant's stalking trial the victim's testimony about defendant's prior conviction for attempted murder because its prejudicial effect did not outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403, as: (1) the victim's testimony was probative of both the existence and reasonableness of her fear; (2) the State needed to elicit the victim's testimony since much of defendant's conduct not overtly hostile or threatening; and (3) the trial court gave an instruction limiting the jury's consideration of the evidence to prove the victim's and defendant's state of mind. Ramroop v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3688, 2012 WL 1649890 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 10 2012).

1086. FBI agent's testimony was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) as it reflected defendant's ongoing relationship, or defendant's willingness to maintain an ongoing relationship, with a known fugitive and was probative of defendant's character and suitability for community supervision, but it was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Jeffs v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3779, 2012 WL 1660612 (Tex. App. Austin May 10 2012).

1087. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, appellant's blood test result amounted to evidence that he had alcohol, which tended to increase the probability that he was intoxicated when he was driving, especially since there was nothing to show that appellant consumed any alcohol after the accident; because the consumption issue was contested, the test result was probative, and this factor weighed in favor of admissibility. Morales v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3634 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 9 2012).

1088. Blood draw results related to the charged offense of driving while intoxicated, and thus the trial court could have found that the jury would not be confused by the test, and testimony about the blood draw did not take an inordinate amount of time, such that the trial court could have found that this weighed in favor of admissibility. Morales v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3634 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 9 2012).

1089. Expert did not give the jury a definitive driving blood alcohol content, the trial court could have found that the jury was able to able to evaluate the force of the blood test result, and the test result admission did not necessarily encourage the jury to conduct its own retrograde extrapolation because the jury did not have to establish blood alcohol concentration at the time of driving, based on the intoxication definition submitted; the jury only had to find that appellant did not have the normal use of his faculties by introducing alcohol into himself when he drove, and the test results could be considered with all evidence to determine if appellant was impaired, such that the trial court could have found that this weighed in favor of admissibility. Morales v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3634 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 9 2012).

1090. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and considering all the factors, the trial court could have found that a blood test result's probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice in appellant's driving while intoxicated trial; at worst, the ruling of the trial court was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. Morales v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3634 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 9 2012).

1091. Without results of field sobriety test, given that the evidence of intoxication was subjective, the State needed objective evidence in this driving while intoxicated case, like the blood draw test results, in order to support evidence of impairment, and the trial court could have found that the need for the evidence weighed in favor of the evidence being admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Morales v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3634 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 9 2012).

1092. Appellant claimed that the result of his blood draw taken over five hours after the accident, which result was just at the limit, could force the jury to engage in retrograde extrapolation, but the criminal appeals court had already rejected this claim; the blood test result that showed appellant consumed alcohol was not unfairly prejudicial as it related directly the offense of driving while intoxicated as charged in the indictment, and the evidence did not have major potential to impress the jury irrationally, such the trial court could have found that this weighed in favor of admitting the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Morales v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3634 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 9 2012).

1093. Because the Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) evidence was relevant in identifying defendant and showing his intent to commit capital murder, and the evidence was not so prejudicial as to overcome the effectiveness of the limiting instruction, under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the extraneous offense evidence. Castoreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3636 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 9 2012).

1094. Defendant was free to present other evidence of the complainant's purported financial hardship, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the State's objection to introduction of evidence relating to the complainant's civil suit against a railroad company because it was not relevant and did not give rise to an inference of bias. West v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3612, 2012 WL 1606239 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 8 2012).

1095. Bag from appellant's wallet contained trace amounts of methamphetamine, and the State had to prove via evidence other than possession that appellant knew the substance was a controlled substance; for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court could have found that evidence of appellant's prior convictions for possession of a controlled substance showed his knowledge of such and were probative to the issue of his knowledge. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

1096. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court could have found that evidence of appellant's criminal history was needed by the State, given that (1) appellant's credibility was at issue, and (2) the State had to prove that appellant knew of the illegality of the substance he possessed. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

1097. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, although evidence of appellant's prior convictions might have had a tenancy to suggest an outcome on a basis that was improper based on the convictions' prejudicial nature, that was true of all evidence of appellant's prior convictions; Tex. R. Evid. 609 explicitly provides for impeachment with prior convictions for felonies and crimes of moral turpitude, the court presumed that the jury following the instruction to consider the prior convictions only for purposes of impeachment, nothing showed these instructions were disregarded, and the trial court did try to mitigate any improper influence. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

1098. Evidence of appellant's prior convictions was directly relevant to many issues in the case including knowledge of the illegality of the substance and appellant's credibility, for purposes of Tex. R. Evide. 403 and appellant's drug possession case. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

1099. Because the prior convictions concerned matters that laypersons could easily understand, the convictions were not prone to the tendency of misleading the jury, for Tex. R. Evid. 403 purposes. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

1100. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the evidence of appellant's prior convictions was presented in a short amount of time and was not repetitive. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

1101. Appellant claimed that evidence was unnecessarily cumulative as the State could have used only certain convictions and not others; however, Tex. R. Evid. 609 places no restriction on the number of previous convictions that may be used to impeach a witness's credibility, and arguably, the number of previous convictions corresponds to the level of impeachment of the witness's credibility: the more previous convictions, the greater the impeachment. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

1102. Considering all factors for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court did not find that the probative value of appellant's prior convictions were outweighed by the potential for unfair prejudice; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence in light of the State's burden of proof in this drug possession case and the matters the defense put in issue, including defendant's credibility. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

1103. Counsel objected to evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and counsel said he was not objecting under Tex. R. Evid. 609; thus, appellant did not preserve for review his Rule 609 issue, the case law factors that guided the balancing test under Rule 609 were not applicable, and the court only considered the Tex. R. Evid. 403 issue based on the factors that had to be considered in a Rule 403 balancing test. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

1104. Appellant's convictions for possession of a controlled substance were felony offense convictions, and a misdemeanor family violence assault conviction was a crime of moral turpitude, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), plus burglary of a motor vehicle was a crime of deception; the trial court could have found, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, that these convictions were probative of credibility of appellant. Johnson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3592, 2012 WL 1582236 (Tex. App. Austin May 4 2012).

1105. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, the evidence of harsh discipline imposed by defendant on his four children, including the victim of the aggravated sexual assaults, was admissible because it had significant probative value as that evidence served to explain to the jury how defendant perpetrated frequent sexual assaults on his young daughter over a period of years. Soria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3345, 2012 WL 1570969 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 27 2012).

1106. Appellant's affiliation with the Aryan Brotherhood was relevant and the probative value of such evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because appellant's membership in the gang and his obligation to follow a higher-ranking member's orders were relevant to show appellant's motive for the crime. Evidence of appellant's membership in the Aryan Brotherhood was offered to show appellant's motive, was not introduced to show character conformity, did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 404, and was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Guffey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3293, 2012 WL 1470185 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 26 2012).

1107. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, evidence of his Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (FLDS) membership was obviously unfavorable to him, but it was not unfairly prejudicial; it came as part of a larger examination of his character, behavior, and beliefs, which included the endorsement of and participation in the FLDS practice of underage marriage that subjected children to sexual assault. Jessop v. State, 368 S.W.3d 653, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3176, 2012 WL 1402117 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 19 2012).

1108. Probative value of the evidence regarding the drug ledger was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the ledger and the testimony regarding the ledger were inherently probative of whether there was a drug enterprise and whether defendant possessed, with intent to deliver, methamphetamine under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112. Martinez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3048, 2012 WL 1344715 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 18 2012).

1109. In a murder case, a text message sent by appellant to his girlfriend after a shooting was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to show state of mind and that appellant did not act in self-defense; it was not subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was the only evidence of state of mind following the shooting, despite the fact that it contained a derogatory term. Guerra v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2973, 2012 WL 1297718 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 17 2012).

1110. Appellant objected on grounds of hearsay and relevancy and he claimed the evidence was more prejudicial than probative, but he did not raise an objection on confrontation or insufficiency grounds at trial and thus he did not preserve those arguments for review. Mclamore v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2909 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 12 2012).

1111. In a termination of parental rights case, an issue under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not addressed on appellate review because it was not raised in a mother's statement of points of error on appeal. In the Interest of L.M., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2720 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 4 2012).

1112. In a forgery case, the trial court was within its discretion in admitting defendant's letter into evidence over her Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. The letter indicated a consciousness of guilt and had great probative value to the main issue at trial -- the identity of the forger. Shaw v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2543 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 30 2012).

1113. In a defamation case, a trial court did not err by admitting three documents that were drafted for a file because they were not unfair or highly prejudicial compared to the weight of their probative value; the documents were prepared by an executive director and tended to show his state of mind and were relevant in rebutting the theory that the director acted reckless in response to a complaint about a service provider without any basis. Collins v. Sunrise Senior Living Mgmt., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2457, 2012 WL 1067953 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 29 2012).

1114. In a case involving the civil commitment of a sexual predator, a patient failed to preserve an error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 relating to the details of his offenses because he did not object and obtain an adverse ruling each time the complained-of evidence was presented or obtain a running objection to the evidence; the patient did not waive error by waiting until the evidence was repeated to complain that it was prejudicial because it was needlessly cumulative. Even if the patient had preserved error regarding the experts' discussion of the details of the offenses, there was no unfair prejudice under Rule 403; the evidence assisted the jury in weighing each expert's testimony and opinion that each expert offered regarding the ultimate issue in the case. In re Ford, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS

1115. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the crime scene photographs as the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value; the exhibits merely depicted the crime scene and the condition of the victim's body. Robinson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2231, 2012 WL 987840 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 22 2012).

1116. On appeal from his convictions for continuous sexual abuse, aggravated sexual assault, and indecency with a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the child's interview under Tex. R. Evid. 107 and did not abuse its discretion by admitting the evidence over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. The interview was inherently probative to the issue of whether the interviewer's technique amounted to "coaching" the child and was the only evidence of whether the child equivocated in the interview; moreover, it was unlikely to distract the jury from the issues in the case. Ibenyenwa v. State, 367 S.W.3d 420, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333, 2012 WL 955401 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 22 2012).

1117. Appellant objected to a witness's testimony under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), suggesting a relevancy complaint, but he did not object on expert qualification or reliability grounds or on Tex. R. Evid. 403 grounds; thus, the only issue preserved for review was the claim that the witness's testimony was inadmissible because it was not linked to appellant. Keate v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117, 2012 WL 896200 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 16 2012).

1118. Appellant's membership in a church was unfavorable but not unfairly prejudicial, because it came as part of the examination of his character and devoted beliefs, which included the endorsement of the practice of underage marriage and the sexual assault of children; the evidence of the church membership was one of the factors that permitted the jury to gauge whether appellant would commit a similar crime, and the trial court did not err in admitting this evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Keate v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117, 2012 WL 896200 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 16 2012).

1119. Because appellant did not offer argument or authority on his claims under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, 404(b) and his claims for due process and due course of law, the complaints were inadequately briefed and presented nothing for review. Keate v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117, 2012 WL 896200 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 16 2012).

1120. Where defendant entered a plea of guilty to intoxication manslaughter with a deadly weapon, the trial court did not err by admitting photographs depicting the victim's body at the scene of the collision. Because the photographs showed the violence of the impact and the injuries to the victim, the trial court could have properly determined that their prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh their probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Deas v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2066, 2012 WL 858627 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 15 2012).

1121. Defendant's burglary conviction was appropriate because, assuming without deciding that the extraneous-offense evidence posed some danger of unfair prejudice, defendant's argument neither addressed the fact that the trial court granted his request for limiting instructions to the jury, nor explained why the limiting instructions were ineffective. Webb v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2111, 2012 WL 897766 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 15 2012).

1122. Because defendant did not establish how the slower version videos and the single frame pictures were more prejudicial than the real-time video, the admission of that evidence did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403. Evans v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1991, 2012 WL 848142 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 14 2012).

1123. In a capital murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs of the deceased child. Though gruesome, the photographs were probative of the full extent of the internal and external injuries inflicted. Desormeaux v. State, 362 S.W.3d 233, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1831, 2012 WL 746297 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 7 2012).

1124. Because there were sufficient common characteristics between each of the robberies, the issue of identity was a fact of great consequence, and the extraneous offense evidence was needed in order to identify defendant as the assailant, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Heigelmann v. State, 362 S.W.3d 763, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1670, 2012 WL 688427 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 2 2012).

1125. Trial court did not err by preventing the cross-examination of the child as to whether she committed perjury on the witness stand when she denied taking and posting provocative photographs of herself on a social media website pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the jury was already aware that the child had lied and therefore the excluded impeachment evidence was cumulative. Other evidence that the child had recanted on several occasions had already been admitted. In re E.A.G., 373 S.W.3d 129, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1532, 2012 WL 651605 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 29 2012).

1126. Court properly allowed an expert witness to testify about the similarity of physical evidence recovered from the crime scene because the tapes from the crime scene and defendant's home were offered to show that because the tapes were similar, it was more likely that they came from a common source, and if they came from a common source, it was more likely that the tape in defendant's home came from the packaging for the marijuana in the murder victim's home. The testimony showed the similarities of the tapes and was therefore relevant to show that defendant was at the crime scene and had a motive for shooting the victims. Robinson v. State, 368 S.W.3d 588, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483, 2012 WL 593558 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

1127. Defendant raised the issue of his identity as the perpetrator of the eight linked burglaries; therefore, the trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 404 in admitting evidence of an extraneous burglary offense during which defendant and his car were placed at the victim's home at the time of the burglary. The crime was sufficiently similar in that it occurred while the victim was at work, defendant's car was located there, it occurred within two months of the eight burglaries, and the victim's property, like the property from the eight burglaries, was found in a hotel room associated with defendant. Mejia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1434, 2012 WL 579455 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 23 2012).

1128. Even if appellant's speculation objections preserved his Tex. R. Evid. 403 objections, in both instances he failed to preserve the issue because his objections were untimely, as he did not object until after an objectionable question had been both asked and answered; furthermore, the court noted that similar evidence was admitted without any objection. Zavala v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1447, 2012 WL 601412 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 23 2012).

1129. State argued that appellant's relevance objection did not preserve an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and any error was harmless in any event, and the court agreed; the court did not find any objection to a witness's testimony about treaties between gangs on the basis of Rule 403, and thus no issue was preserved in this regard. Zavala v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1447, 2012 WL 601412 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 23 2012).

1130. In a capital murder case, a trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a video recording and a photograph because their probative value was not substantially outweighed by the potential for undue prejudice. The evidence was probative to show appellant's presence at the scene of the crime and the degree of cooperation between appellant and his brother, the prejudice to appellant was not unfair, the challenged evidence did not create or add to any confusion regarding the events, there was little danger of misleading the jury, and, given the highly probative nature of the recording and photographs, the trial court could have concluded that there was no undue delay and that their presentation was necessary. Mccuin v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1363, 2012 WL 566796 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 22 2012).

1131. trial court did not abuse its discretion by quashing defendant's subpoena of the school principal because her testimony would not have been material, as the evidence was undisputed that defendant was absent from the scene at the school when the social worker made the decision and notified the other family members that the children would be removed. Wyatt v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1308, 2012 WL 512654 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 16 2012).

1132. Defendant's convictions for aggravated sexual assault of a child by penetration of her sexual organ and indecency with a child were proper because the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of defendant propositioning another individual while he was married to the victim's mother. It appeared that the defense strategy was to convey an image to the jury that defendant was hardworking and truthful, that his wife was unfaithful but he was not, and that the victim made up the outcry to help her mother; thus, the State was entitled to call the women that he allegedly propositioned and the probative value of that proposed testimony outweighed its prejudicial nature, Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(a). Horton v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1313, 2012 WL 554454 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 16 2012).

1133. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of a pending assault charge against the father because it was relevant in determining whether termination of the father's rights was in the best interest of the child.. Defendant failed to show that its admission confused or misled the jury, was cumulative of other evidence, or unfairly prejudiced the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 403; a key issue in the trial was defendant's criminal history, and the pending charge was only a small fraction of that history. Davis v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1315, 2012 WL 512674 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 15 2012).

1134. In defendant's capital murder case, the trial court properly barred evidence of the victim's possible HIV condition because it found it irrelevant and too speculative; the proffered evidence showed only that the victim bit an accomplice, as the victim attempted to defend himself, and that the accomplice knew of the victim's possible HIV infection. The evidence was not enough to support defendant's defense of independent impulse and it lacked probative value. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 927, 2012 WL 361733 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 2 2012).

1135. In defendant's capital murder case, the trial court properly admitted autopsy photographs because they were not any more gruesome than what would be expected, the photographs tracked the doctor's testimony, and the photographs depicted the victim's bloody and bruised face and were vital to the State's case to the jury with regard to the manner and method of the victim's death. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 927, 2012 WL 361733 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 2 2012).

1136. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not err when it ruled that the videotape showing the struggle that occurred when the police removed defendant from his jail cell was irrelevant in the context of defendant's aggravated sexual assault charge against the child victim. Lopez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 676, 2012 WL 256103 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 26 2012).

1137. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting four photographs from the victim's autopsy because they helped the jury understand the extent of the victim's injuries, were demonstrative of defendant's intent, and did not constitute a large part of the pathologist's testimony and the State's case. The photographs were highly relevant and probative and not unfairly prejudicial. Ramirez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 455, 2012 WL 170996 (Tex.

App. Corpus Christi Jan. 19 2012).

1138. Appellant did not assert an objection to the extraneous-offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403, nor was such an objection apparent from the context of his objection for relevance under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), and thus this was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1). Bryant v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 479, 2012 WL 171243 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 19 2012).

1139. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a witness's testimony to rebut defendant's assertion that he would not sexually abuse a nine-year-old girl where the extraneous-offense evidence was not unfairly prejudicial and was probative of defendant's credibility--and his sexual attraction to nine-year-old girls--because it showed defendant's response on cross-examination was inconsistent with his history of assaulting another female when she was the same age (or about the same age) as the victim. The trial court minimized the potential of the witness's testimony to impress the jury in an irrational and indelible way by including a limiting instruction in its charge, the record showed that the witness's testimony was not lengthy, and the State did not need the witness's testimony to prove its case-in-chief. Jones v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 363, 2012 WL 130612 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 18 2012).

1140. Trial court did not err in finding that the probative value of appellant's disciplinary history was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given that the number of violations enhanced their probative value relative to showing appellant's character for purposes of sentencing. Martin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10177 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 29 2011).

1141. Appellant never raised the State's alleged inability to prove that he committed certain violations as a challenge to admissibility of the evidence, and it was unclear whether he suggested that the State's inability to prove the violations amounted to a reason that their value was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice; he failed to preserve error to the extent he presented a complaint under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, and as to Tex. R. Evid. 403, he did not raise this particular issue, only that the violations were repetitive in nature. Martin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10177 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 29 2011).

1142. Trial court said it found the probative value of certain evidence outweighed the prejudicial value, but specific findings were not recited; a trial court was not required to sua sponte recite findings in this regard, and the court presumed that the trial court engaged in the required balancing test once Tex. R. Evid. 403 was invoked and the record's silence did not imply otherwise. Martin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10177 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 29 2011).

1143. During defendant's trial for intentionally or knowingly causing serious bodily injury to a child, his eight-month-old daughter, the court did not err under in admitting evidence of extraneous bad acts showing that he had a drinking problem and had shaken the child's car seat in irritation after drinking alcohol on a prior occasion; the prior shaking of the car seat was not so dissimilar to weigh in favor of inadmissibility simply because defendant did not shake her vigorously enough to cause a fatal injury. Guerrero v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10080, 2011 WL 6808314 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 22 2011).

1144. In connection with appellant's injury to a child trial, photographs of the child in the hospital showed no more than the treatment of the injuries he had suffered shortly before he arrived at the hospital, and the court could not say that the trial court abused its discretion in finding that the probative value of the photographs was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to appellant. Gonzales v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10119, 2011 WL 6415125 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 22 2011).

1145. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's gang affiliation during the guilt phase of his trial because the evidence was relevant and admissible to show defendant's motive and to rebut his self-defense theory. The probative value of the evidence outweighed any unfair prejudice, and the State did not devote an excessive amount of time to presenting the evidence. Rodriguez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10156 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 22 2011).

1146. Informant's possible bias was made known to the jury, and the trial court allowed appellant to develop other testimony regarding the informant's possible bias, plus the jury heard evidence concerning the existence of an outstanding warrant against the informant for failure to stop and give information following and accident; given the information that the jury had about the accident and warrant, the trial court could have found that allowing more details about the incident would have wasted the jury's time, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, and the court found that appellant was not deprived of the right to confront the informant and the trial court did not err in limiting the testimony in this regard. Anderson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10038, 2011 WL 6743297 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 21 2011).

1147. Trial court did not err by allowing the State to present evidence that defendant was in possession of a weapon the day before the murder under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because that evidence made it more probable that defendant used that gun to cause the victim's death. The evidence did not suggest a decision on an improper basis, nor did it have the tendency to confuse or distract the jury, and it did not take an inordinate amount of time to present to the jury. Benitez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9871, 2011 WL 6306643 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 15 2011).

1148. There was no abuse of discretion by admitting the child's interview under Tex. R. Evid. 107 and over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection, because the interview was inherently probative and necessary for the Tex. R. Evid. 107 purpose for which it was admitted, and it was unlikely to distract the jury from the issues in the case; although the defense argued that the State should just be allowed to ask follow-up questions, the jury would not have had any yardstick by which to measure the effect of the interviewer's questions and techniques on the child, which occurred before the child testified at trial, other than by seeing the actual interview. Ibenyenwa v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9908, 2011 WL 6260874 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 15 2011).

1149. Because the trial concerning the welfare of the children could deteriorate into a trial on the practices of the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services, Child Protective Services Division in its selection of foster homes, the trial court could have believed that the danger of confusion of the issues in the termination of parental rights case outweighed the probative value of the tales concerning the post-removal experiences of the children under Tex. R. Evid. 403. In re R.N., 356 S.W.3d 568, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9632 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 9 2011).

1150. Although evidence that the victim was suicidal due to defendant's abusive conduct created a risk that the jury's heightened emotions could lead it to reach an erroneous conclusion, nothing in the record reflected the jury was confused, misled, or unable to evaluate the probative force of any of the evidence; further, the presentation of the letter did not take an inordinate amount of time. Finally, the evidence did not merely repeat evidence already admitted, and although the jury heard other evidence that the victim had suicidal thoughts, that evidence did not relate specifically to the time period in which the victim wrote the letter. Lofton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9666 (Tex. App.--Dallas Dec. 9, 2011).

1151. Court properly admitted evidence of defendant's extraneous bad acts committed after his arrest because witnesses testified about defendant "revving" his engine in front of the victim's house, repeatedly calling the victim, and the victim testified that he felt threatened by the conduct. Additionally, the evidence was unlikely to influence the jury in an irrational way; to the contrary, it was rational to conclude that defendant threatened the victim and his best friend because defendant was guilty of the offense. Lofton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9666 (Tex. App.-- Dallas Dec. 9, 2011).

1152. In a sexual abuse case, any risk of unfair prejudice from the statements attributing the victim's suicidal thoughts to defendant's abusive conduct did not substantially outweigh the probative value of that evidence because nothing in the record reflects the jury was confused, misled, or unable to evaluate the probative force of any of the evidence. Further, the presentation of the letter did not take an inordinate amount of time, and it did not merely repeat evidence already admitted. Lofton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9664, 2011 WL 6225415 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 9 2011).

1153. In a sexual abuse case, the evidence of defendant's conduct following his arrest was properly admitted because it was probative of defendant's consciousness of guilt. The State's need for the evidence was significant because the victim and defendant were the only two witnesses to the actual conduct, and defendant denied touching the victim; it was rational to conclude defendant threatened the victim and his best friend because defendant was guilty of the offense. Lofton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9664, 2011 WL 6225415 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 9 2011).

1154. Although appellant's objection at trial was largely based on Tex. R. Evid. 403, he also objected to the introduction of photographs because they went to specific prior bad acts, and thus appellant preserved for review his claim that the trial court erred under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Falade v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9408, 2011 WL 5984536 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 1 2011).

1155. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in admitting pornographic photographs and videos seized from defendant's home; defendant's possession of the pornographic material was likely to be construed as less heinous by the jury than the detailed evidence it heard concerning his sexually assaulting the victim while his wife slept in a medicated state in the same room. Pallm v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9402, 2011 WL 6043025 (Tex. App. Tyler Nov. 30 2011).

1156. Because evidence is rarely excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in parental rights termination cases, and in light of the trial court's discretion in determining admissibility, trial counsel's failure to object to an exhibit concerning the father's criminal convictions and issues did not amount to deficient performance. In the Interest of T.E., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9251, 2011 WL 5865712 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 23 2011).

1157. Victim's friend's testimony was clear and addressed the probability of the victim fabricating her allegations, and the testimony's potential for impressing the jury in an irrational manner was minimal as the friend's allegations were less egregious; the State needed the friend's testimony, and the trial court did not err in overruling appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to extraneous offense evidence in his aggravated sexual assault of a child trial. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9189, 2011 WL 5607620 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 17 2011).

1158. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, certain case law factors favored admission in appellant's arson case of evidence that the child was dead before the fire started because it supported the theory that appellant had a motive to commit arson; motive evidence could have assisted the jury in determining credibility issues.

1159. Evidence of a child's death created a risk in appellant's arson case that the jury's heightened emotions would lead to a wrong decision, but the trial court excluded evidence that might have led the jury to find that appellant was responsible for the child's death, and the State reminded the jury that the cause of death was a mystery and nothing pointed to appellant being at fault; the risk of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of that evidence to show a motive for arson, as limited, and the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence.

1160. During a trial for failure to comply with sex offender registration requirements, defense counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to two State exhibits that defendant filled out in compliance with defendant's bond conditions because the documents contained probative information and were more likely to assist the jury on the issues rather than confuse or inflame it. Darnell v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9049, 2011 WL 5515470 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 10 2011).

1161. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting an autopsy photograph depicting a murder victim's brain after it was removed from his body where the photograph had probative value because it showed the extent of the victim's injury and helped the jury understand how blunt force trauma-which other evidence showed came in the form of defendant's having kicked the victim in the head-caused the victim's death. Because the photograph had probative value and was not unnecessarily gruesome, the danger of unfair prejudice does did outweigh its probative value. Malone v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8602, 2011 WL 5118820 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 27 2011).

1162. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony from the State's investigator regarding an alleged retaliation statement made by defendant under Rule 403 because: (1) it assisted the jury in determining defendant's intent; (2) the trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction; and (3) the investigator's testimony was only about 14 pages of the reporter's record. Castillo v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8726, 2011 WL 5221238 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 26 2011).

1163. Defendant did not mention on appeal what information an expert would present that would not be cumulative of the evidence already brought forth during the punishment hearing. Blair v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8741, 2011 WL 5221256 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 26 2011).

1164. State did not refer to defendant as a drug dealer or elicit testimony that he was known as a drug dealer, and there was no dispute that defendant possessed marijuana; the State presented evidence that the marijuana was packaged for sale and that no one would purchase marijuana that had been in a person's underwear, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony. Eastland v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8748, 2011 WL 5221252 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 26 2011).

1165. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a video recording depicting the nature of the victim's injuries because it was relevant to proving serious bodily injury, an element of aggravated assault. The video was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) it communicated that the victim's injuries were serious in a non-technical way; (2) it was recorded a week before the trial and therefore was more current than other evidence; (3) it lasted only two minutes; and (4) it was only played once for the jury without sound. Rodriguez v. State, 352 S.W.3d 548, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8130 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 12 2011).

1166. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's extraneous sexual offense with a child during his trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child, indecency with a child, and three counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child; both victims were young girls, both had their privates rubbed by defendant, and both offenses occurred while the victims were in bed. Evidence of similar sexual conduct with another young girl tended to make defendant's theories of revenge, fabrication, and lack of opportunity much less probable; therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Struckman v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8042, 2011 WL 4712236 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 5 2011).

1167. Trial court did not act without guiding rules or principles when it determined that the Taproot Incident Report was inadmissible as a subsequent remedial measure; the report could not be used to show feasibility, there was cumulative evidence to the same effect, and the workers would not suffer unfair prejudice from its exclusion. Belmarez v. Formosa Plastics Corp., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7945, 2011 WL 4696750 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 30 2011).

1168. Because the evidence of the similar abusive conduct by defendant against a former cell mate made defendant's self-defense theory much less probable and the State needed the extraneous offense evidence to question whether defendant acted in self defense at all, under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the former cell mate's testimony. Svenningsen v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7681 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2011).

1169. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the captain to testify to clarify the extent of defendant's disciplinary record because defendant's testimony created a false impression that he had not been disciplined after the discovery of unsecured evidence in his office; while testifying as a rebuttal witness, the captain testified that defendant had in fact been suspended, and that that disciplinary action was taken as a result of the unsecured evidence investigation. Any prejudice stemming from the extraneous evidence did not outweigh its probative value, as the discussion with the captain consumed only a small portion of the record and was necessary to impeach defendant and to provide the jury with a complete and accurate understanding of the facts. Milton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7592, 2011 WL 4361482 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 20 2011).

1170. Evidence of one's sexual orientation may be relevant to show bias under unique circumstances when coupled with a logical connection to one's motive to testify in a certain manner, but that was not the case here, and the evidence of the victim's sexual orientation was inadmissible and irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402; furthermore, under these circumstances when there was no connection between the victim's relationship with her female friend and any motive for her to exaggerate the incident involving appellant juvenile, any de minimis probative value of that information would be substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice in putting the victim on trial for her sexual orientation. In re O.O.A., 358 S.W.3d 352, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7416 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 13 2011).

1171. In an aggravated kidnapping case, the trial court did not err in admitting a photograph of a chair and the victim's testimony that she was tied to the chair. The testimony and photograph had little potential to impress the jury in some irrational but nevertheless indelible way. Gaither v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7304, 2011 WL 3915820 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 7 2011).

1172. State needed to explain the relationship between appellant and the victim, and letters from appellant to the victim helped explain the dynamics of their relationship and thus were relevant; appellant did not identify specific instances of prior misconduct contained in the letters that were introduced or would suggest that he acted in conformity with his character in committing the offense, nor was it shown that the letters were more prejudicial than probative, and the trial court did not err in admitting the letters. Munsinger v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7318, 2011 WL 3915671 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 7 2011).

1173. Appellant did not attempt to explain how he was denied the opportunity to present a viable defense through the application of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(3), and he did not meet his burden to show how the rule permitted the admission of the testimony in question; as appellant did not show why the leeway discussed in case law should apply, the court could not allow him to forego addressing Rule 412(b)(3) and show how the supposed probative value of the evidence outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Nichols v. State, 349 S.W.3d 612, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7253 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 6 2011).

1174. Case law did state that in trials involving sexual assault, the Rules of Evidence should be used sparingly to exclude relevant, otherwise admissible evidence that might bear upon the credibility of either the defendant or complainant in "he said, she said" cases, but nowhere in that missive does the court find the directive to always ignore the Rules of Evidence in general or those specifically pertaining to the balancing test encompassed by either

Rules 403 or Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(3); it is not enough to merely suggest that because the victim supposedly lied before she must be lying now, as one could reasonably liken such effort to the type of general attack upon a witness's credibility falling outside the admonishment about when to use the rules of evidence sparingly. Chitwood v. State, 350 S.W.3d 746, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7301 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 6 2011).

1175. Appellant had the burden to establish that the trial court abused its discretion and thus he had to show that the probative value of the evidence did not substantially outweigh its prejudicial effect, but he did not attempt to do so, and thus it did not matter whether or not the conviction fell outside the 10-year window, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(b). Chitwood v. State, 350 S.W.3d 746, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7301 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 6 2011).

1176. Had defense counsel objected that the prejudicial value of testimony outweighed its probative value, the trial court would have been required to perform the balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403; if that was the intent of the objection, which was not obvious, objecting that the question was improper did not inform the trial court that appellant sought the balancing test under the rule, and the issue was not preserved for review. Vallair v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7055, 2011 WL 3847418 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 31 2011).

1177. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence that defendant had sexually assaulted another child under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 during his trial on charges of sexual assault and aggravated sexual assault because it rebutted the defenses of lack of opportunity and fabrication. Theragood v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7141, 2011 WL 3848840 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2011).

1178. Declarant's statements were properly admitted as statements against interest because there were sufficient corroborating circumstances that clearly indicated the trustworthiness of the statements. The declarant made the statements in response to questions from his common law wife about his involvement in the robbery, the declarant's guilt was not inconsistent with defendants, and the testimony bore significant probative force and was valuable in proving the State's case in chief. Gonzalez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7084, 2011 WL 3849393 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 31 2011).

1179. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, evidence of appellant's conduct prior to the shooting and during the police interview was relevant to assessing punishment under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), plus the evidence's potential to have an overwhelming effect on the jury was limited by an instruction, and it did not appear that the evidence required an inordinate amount of time to develop; because the evidence spoke directly to appellant's character and his lack of concern for others, the evidence was necessary to help the jury determine punishment, and the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Brown v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7170, 2011 WL 3849106 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2011).

1180. Exhibit, a computer-generated animation of the crime scene, was relevant, and the fact that the cars in the animation might have looked similar or that the background was either not to scale or not there did not cause the probative value of the evidence to be outweighed by unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403; the exhibit was not cumulative of other evidence and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting it. Murphy v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7230, 2011 WL 3860444 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 31 2011).

1181. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's possible gang affiliation under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 403 because the evidence that defendant initially approached a man and asked more than once if he was a member of a particular gang showed the context in which the encounter began that resulted in defendant shooting the victim. The trial court did not err by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial. Salazar v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6835, 2011 WL 3770297 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26 2011).

1182. Court did not err in admitting extraneous-offense evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2 because it showed a pattern of behavior on the part of defendant that was consistent with the concept of "grooming," and the evidence of the extraneous acts before the charged sexual assault fell squarely within the type of evidence allowed under art. 38.37. The victim's testimony about the June 2008 assault was also more graphic and time-consuming than the evidence of the extraneous acts, thus likely overshadowing any inflammatory response the jury might have had to testimony about the extraneous acts. Castro v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6900, 2011 WL 3796104 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 26 2011).

1183. Testimony of other victims of the extraneous crimes, who identified defendant as the man who had also robbed them in a quite similar way to how he robbed the victim, had substantial probative value; the evidence about the extraneous offenses focused, rather than distracted, the jury on the main issue in the case: whether defendant was the person who committed the crime against the victim. Price v. State, 351 S.W.3d 148, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6848 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 25 2011).

1184. During defendant's trial for capital murder, the court did not err in admitting photographs of the victim because it was not outside the zone of reasonable disagreement to conclude that the probative value was not outweighed by the prejudicial effect; a medical examiner's testimony about the victim's wounds was relevant and the pictures were merely a visual representation of that testimony. Estrada v. State, 352 S.W.3d 762, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6739 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 24 2011).

1185. Defendant's argument and questioning of the witnesses attempted to portray the victim as the aggressor and defendant as merely defending himself and lacking criminal intent; thus, the trial court's ruling that evidence of the prior assaults was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) was not an abuse of its discretion. Watkins v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6992, 2011 WL 3925583 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 24 2011).

1186. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence of defendant's prior assault of another victim during his trial on charges of aggravated assault and manslaughter under Tex. R> Evid. 403 because it had high probative value on the issue of whether defendant was the aggressor in the instant offense. The prior crime was similar to the charged offenses and occurred only six months before the charged crimes. Render v. State, 347 S.W.3d 905, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6623 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 18 2011).

1187. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant's blood contained a cocaine metabolite and marijuana under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the evidence was probative of the allegation that defendant's recklessness was caused in part by driving a motor vehicle with cocaine and marijuana in his body; (2) the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial; (3) the evidence could not have distracted the jury from the indicated offense because it was proof of the indicted offense; and (4) the State had no other evidence to establish that defendant recklessly caused the victim's death by driving with cocaine and marijuana in his body. Leblanc v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6273, 2011 WL 3556952 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 11 2011).

1188. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence about cocaine withdraw under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the trial court could have concluded that the evidence of the effects of cocaine withdrawal were relevant to defendant's operation of his truck. Leblanc v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6273, 2011 WL 3556952 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 11 2011).

1189. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of the presence of marijuana in the cab of his truck at the time of the accident under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was directly related to the charged offense of manslaughter and its potential to irrationally impress the jury to find guilt on grounds apart from the offense charge was minimal. Leblanc v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6273, 2011 WL 3556952 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug.

1190. Trial court did not err by admitting two crime scene photographs of the victim's body under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the photographs helped the State illustrate the paramedic's testimony by depicting both the crime scene and the victim's injuries; (2) the photographs were no more gruesome than the facts of the offense itself; and (3) the State did not spend a lot of time presenting the photographs to the jury. Suarez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6190 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 10 2011).

1191. Appellate court found that it would not be outside the zone of reasonable disagreement for the trial court to resolve the Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis in favor of allowing the State to elicit the prior inconsistent statements, because the witness was one of the two alleged victims in the case, the issue of the witness's credibility was crucial to both the State and defendant, the State was surprised by the witness's unfavorable testimony, and the elicited favorable testimony, although limited, would support a finding that the State did not call the witness for the primary purpose of eliciting otherwise inadmissible evidence. Polston v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6126, 2011 WL 3435389 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 5 2011).

1192. Letters that defendant wrote to another person were properly admitted, Tex. R. Evid. 403, as they constituted attempts by defendant to hinder his prosecution and, as such, were evidence of his consciousness of guilt; the probative value of the letters, establishing defendant's consciousness of guilt, was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Sandoval v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5971, 2011 WL 3273900 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 1 2011).

1193. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence autopsy photographs of the victim under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they allowed the jury to compare defendant's description of the victim in his statement to the photographs, and aided the jury in understanding and evaluating the medical examiner's testimony. Tilford v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5933, 2011 WL 3273543 (Tex. App. El Paso July 29 2011).

1194. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence testimony about voluminous pornographic images found on defendant's computer under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the testimony was probative as it assisted the jury in determining that the images did not arrive there by accident or mistake; (2) the State needed the testimony to rebut defensive theories; (3) limiting instructions were given; and (4) the amount of time required to develop the evidence was relatively short. Bethards v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5603, 2011 WL 2937875 (Tex. App. Waco July 20 2011).

1195. Because defendant sought to recall the victim after stating that he had no more questions, the trial court could have decided that recalling the victim on a matter collateral to the shooting to provide testimony that no quid-pro-quo existed for his testimony against defendant would risk an undue delay in the proceedings, risk causing confusion about the importance of the testimony to the shooting, and risk the jury taking the existence of the victim's pending charge out of context, as the questions to the victim about the pending driving while intoxicated charge would not then be asked at the time the jury heard other evidence about the victim's background. Smith v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5338, 2011 WL 2732270 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 13 2011).

1196. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of other offenses that occurred on the day before the offenses for which he was convicted where the court could reasonably have deemed testimony about defendant's escape from custody on February 11 relevant to his motive, intent, plan, or absence of mistake in taking the actions he did on February 12; the trial court did not err by admitting the evidence because it could reasonably have decided that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice. Morse v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5173, 2011 WL 2651915 (Tex. App. Austin July 8 2011).

1197. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence six photographs of the baby's injuries under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they were important for the jury in understanding testimony offered by a pediatric surgeon and for forming their own conclusions regarding the cause of injury to the baby's genitals and leg. A key issue raised in the case was whether the baby's injury could have been inflicted by a small dog or whether it was caused by a sharp instrument in the hands of a person. Nadal v. State, 348 S.W.3d 304, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5104 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 7 2011).

1198. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence three firearms that were not connected to the shooting that were found in defendant's motel room when he was arrested because: (1) defendant's possession of the firearms did not necessarily amount to extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); and (2) the evidence was probative of defendant's connection to the drug dealer's gang and to the State's efforts to prove that the victim was murdered in retaliation for informing on the drug dealer, Assuming that defendant was prejudiced, any error was harmless because there was ample evidence of defendant's guilt. Gonzalez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5139, 2011 WL 2652162 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 7 2011).

1199. Evidence of defendant's membership in the same gang as a witness was admissible to show that the witness was biased to testify in favor of defendant. The probative value of the impeachment evidence was high because the State wanted to show why the witness testified that he had lied to police about the statements defendant had made to him. Mccuin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5031, 2011 WL 2611234 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 30 2011).

1200. In defendant's sexual assault on a child case, the court properly admitted extraneous offenses because defendant failed to object, and in addition, defendant cited no authority for the proposition that a "more serious" extraneous offense automatically required a conclusion that the prejudicial effect of the offense substantially outweighed its probative value. Martines v. State, 371 S.W.3d 232, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4773, 2011 WL 2502839 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 23 2011).

1201. Law concerning when a peace officer can use deadly force is different from the law concerning when someone other than a peace officer can use deadly force; even if testimony about when an officer could use deadly force was relevant, the trial court would not have erred in excluding the evidence based on the danger that the jury could have been confused by the evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Knapper v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4782, 2011 WL 2503463 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 23 2011).

1202. Defendant did not show how the evidence of his gang membership unfairly prejudiced the jury against recommending community supervision; the trial court did not act outside its discretion by concluding that the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial as it was highly probative of defendant's character at the time of the offenses, which were gang-related. Kelly v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4656, 2011 WL 2438517 (Tex. App. Dallas June 20 2011).

1203. Even if one assumed that statements were party-opponent admissions under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2)(A) and relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, otherwise relevant evidence could be excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403; in addition to possibly confusing the jury and unfairly prejudicing the State's case, admission of the statements would have been cumulative, and the trial court did not err in excluding these statements. Mcneal v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4629, 2011 WL 2420271 (Tex. App. Dallas June 17 2011).

1204. Trial court did not err in declining to exclude extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that (1) the State needed the testimony in question to establish that appellant had previously been seen holding a weapon that was similar to the one he used to threaten an officer, (2) the impermissible inference of character conformity was minimized by the trial court's limiting instruction, and (3) the amount of time used for the testimony was not excessive. Benites-vijil v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4574, 2011 WL 2435942 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 16 2011).

1205. Appellant provided a general discussion on the application of Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404, and 405, most of which was not germane to the punishment phase, but he failed to specify the bad acts or extraneous offenses he found inadmissible or provide any references to their admission over objection; in the absence of references and citation of authority, this complaint under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) was waived. Crutchfield v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4490, 2011 WL 2420380 (Tex. App. Tyler June 15 2011).

1206. Even though the trial court erred by allowing the State to introduce evidence that a witness had been threatened by an unknown person, as the evidence did nothing to bolster the witness's credibility and was highly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because it did not affect defendant's substantial rights given the other evidence of guilt, including numerous statements to others by defendant. Newland v. State, 363 S.W.3d 205, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4587, 2011 WL 2480312 (Tex. App. Waco June 15 2011).

1207. Where defendant did not challenge the trial court's ruling that the probative value of evidence of witness's juvenile adjudication of attempted capital murder was substantially outweighed by the danger of undue prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court upheld the trial court's ruling excluding the evidence on that ground. Marsh v. State, 343 S.W.3d 158, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4390 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 10 2011).

1208. Father did not present argument or briefing that the exclusion of the decedent's unredacted will probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment; the probative value of the evidence on the issue of forgery was minimal. Kingsley v. Beck, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4294, 2011 WL 2225537 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 7 2011).

1209. At defendant's trial for attempted burglary of a habitation with intent to commit theft, the State was permitted to offer evidence regarding the theft of a vehicle in the same neighborhood because the vehicle's keys were found in defendant's pocket. The evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was probative on the issue of whether defendant was merely trespassing or intended to commit theft or burglary. Dickson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4774 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 6 2011).

1210. Defendant was not prevented from showing that the victim and other family members were biased and had a motive to testify against him because there was animosity between the victim's family and defendant, but the trial court did not err in not admitting evidence of the victim's family's use of drugs as the behavior that was criticized because it was not admissible under the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test and was not shown to be relevant to any issue in the case under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

1211. Under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and 609, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the State to ask defendant about his prior arrests after he opened the door with his testimony or in determining that the probative value of such evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

1212. Photographs of the victim wearing an allegedly sexually suggestive T-shirt were excludable under either Tex. R. Evid. 402 as irrelevant or Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the probative value of the photographs was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

1213. Trial court did not err in admitting defendant's letter in to evidence as its potentially prejudicial impact did not substantially outweigh the probative value. In re F.R., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4104, 2011 WL 2175857 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 27 2011).

1214. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's blood alcohol test results into evidence during her intoxication manslaughter trial because: (1) the results were probative on the issue of whether defendant was intoxicated, as she denied consuming any alcohol; (2) the result was the only direct evidence establishing that defendant had consumed alcohol; (3) it was not unfairly prejudicial because it related directly the an element of the charged offense; and (4) the time to present the evidence was relatively short. Damon v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4017, 2011 WL 2112807 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 26 2011).

1215. In a sexual abuse case, the court's error in admitting defendant's statement to an officer that he had cocaine and alcohol problems and he sometimes did not remember things when he was drunk or high was harmless because defendant gave a written confession that he sexually abused the child, and the children gave statements detailing the abuse. Henriquez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4072, 2011 WL 2119679 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 26 2011).

1216. Even if the trial court erred by denying defendant's request to present testimony from the victim's ex-wife about the victim's propensity for violence without engaging in the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test, the error was harmless because: (1) the trial court found that the ex-wife's testimony was too remote in time from the instant shooting; and (2) the ex-wife's testimony did not form a vital portion of defendant's case and its exclusion did not prevent defendant from presenting the substance of his self-defense claim. Defendant and others testified that the victim had previously gotten into fights. Hart v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3996, 2011 WL 2028216 (Tex. App. Dallas May 25 2011).

1217. Evidence of bathing incident between defendant and his niece was admissible, Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, 404(b), as it showed the nature of defendant's relationship with and mindset towards his niece, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 Gragert v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3948, 2011 WL 2027955 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 24 2011).

1218. Nature of appellant's relationship with the victim on the night before her murder was probative of the circumstances surrounding her death, the evidence from witnesses was needed to show the relationship, there was no reason to believe that disputed evidence gave rise to any tendency to confuse or distract the jury, and the presentation of the evidence did not take an inordinate amount of time, and the evidence met the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Sanders v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3673, 2011 WL 1843508 (Tex. App. Dallas May 16 2011).

1219. At defendant's criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, a witness was permitted to testify that defendant said that he had given the victim a vaginal exam; Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not apply, because the testimony was not about an extraneous act or offense. Since the testimony constituted evidence that defendant admitted touching the victim's sexual organ, it was not more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Babineaux v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3632, 2011 WL 1833123 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2011).

1220. In defendant's sexual assault on a child case, the victim's testimony about her extraneous sexual encounters with defendant was not likely to create such prejudice in the juror's minds that they would be unable to consider the evidence for its proper purpose because the portions of her testimony detailing the prior sexual activities were short, and prior to the testimony and in the jury charge, the trial court specifically instructed the jury about how to consider evidence concerning the prior sexual encounters. Chang Hyeong Lee v. State, 2011 Tex.

App. LEXIS 3623, 2011 WL 1833142 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2011).

1221. During defendant's trial for capital murder, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) in admitting a photograph of defendant and a third person holding guns pointed at the head of another individual because on direct examination, defendant stated that defendant had never pointed a gun at someone; the probative value of the photograph was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Lemon v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3473, 2011 WL 1837680 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 10 2011).

1222. At defendant's criminal trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a videotape showing the layout of the apartment with a sign indicating no one was allowed to open the refrigerator; the evidence was necessary to prove the victim was outside defendant's apartment when he was shot and to develop defendant's motive by showing he was angry because he believed the victim was stealing beer from him. The presence of pornography or Nazi paraphernalia was not so inflammatory or prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as to outweigh the need of the State to present the video evidence. Amador v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3404, 2011 WL 1706474 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 5 2011).

1223. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a photograph of appellant with cuts and blood on his hands, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that (1) the trial court could have found that the evidence was probative that appellant was the victim's assailant, (2) the offer of stipulation to the fact that appellant had cuts on his hands did not render the photograph less probative, (3) any stipulation would not be as strong as the jury's observations of appellants's injuries, which no other evidence established, (4) nothing indicated that it would be obvious to a viewer that the hand gesture was a gang sign, and (5) little time was spent on the photograph. Barron v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3330, 2011 WL 1744110 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 4 2011).

1224. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the photographs of the victim had more than minimal probative value because the defense argued that medical negligence, not the gunshot wounds, caused the victim's death, and thus it was important for the State to establish the seriousness of the wounds, plus a pathologist testified that the autopsy photographs would assist the jury in understanding her testimony; the photographs were not likely to impress the jury in an irrational way, and the State did not spend a lot of time presenting the photographs, and their admission in appellant's murder trial was not error. Crank v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3266, 2011 WL 1642598 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 29 2011).

1225. In a Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis regarding photographs of the victim, while the State arguably could have gotten by with the pathologist's testimony and diagrams, the photographs were more powerful, plus appellant disputed the seriousness of the wounds, which the photographs depicted; the admission of the photographs was not an abuse of discretion. Crank v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3266, 2011 WL 1642598 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 29 2011).

1226. In weighing the factors under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's blood alcohol concentration (BAC) without extrapolating back to the time of the offense. The BAC made it more likely that defendant had an illegal amount of alcohol in her blood at the time of the accident; the test results also helped the State establish that defendant's symptoms were due to intoxication and not the aftereffects of the crash; and the results spoke directly to the charged offense and did not impact the jury in an irrational way. Hernandez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3115, 2011 WL 1631011 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 27 2011).

1227. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the videotape was properly admitted as it was not gruesome or grotesque, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, §/Aa3(a)(1); admission of the photographs was harmless error, Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), because it could not have inflamed the minds of the jurors given the other similar photographs admitted without objection. Kolanowski v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3047 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 21 2011).

1228. Appellant did not seem to raise the overruling of the Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection as an issue on appeal, but in any event the court did not find that the trial court erred in overruling the Rule 403 objection because the probative value of the extraneous offense evidence was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice. Calvin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3091, 2011 WL 1562138 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 21 2011).

1229. Damage to a witness's credibility that appellant wanted, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), was inflicted by the witness's own testimony, and jail records were cumulative on the issue of whether she had been jailed; the trial court did not err in excluding jail records and the custodian's testimony for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Calvin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3091, 2011 WL 1562138 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 21 2011).

1230. Even if the court found that purported discrepancy in the number of jailings of a witness made evidence non-cumulative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and justified admitting the records evidence to impeach the witness under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), its exclusion was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because there was no showing that appellant's constitutional rights were denied, and the exclusion of the records did not influence the jury or had more than a slight effect. Calvin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3091, 2011 WL 1562138 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 21 2011).

1231. In reviewing a claim under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court found that (1) evidence that a witness was threatened by unknown persons with no proven connection to appellant had minimal capacity to make a fact more or less probable, (2) the Spanish term "La Eme" alone, with no explanation, had little potential to impress the jury in an irrational way, (3) there was other testimony during trial about threats of retaliation against testifying witnesses, and (4) the time required for the State to develop the evidence was minimal and the State had little need for the evidence to prove the charge, such that the isolated unexplained reference in Spanish to "La Eme" was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Miranda v. State, 350 S.W.3d 141, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2938 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 20 2011).

1232. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child, a child forensic interviewer was permitted to testify about behavioral characteristics of child sexual abuse victims; the expert explained the concept of a rolling disclosure pattern. Her testimony was not unfairly prejudicial for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, because it did not suggest an improper basis for reaching a decision. Dison v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2809, 2011 WL 1435201 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 14 2011).

1233. Photograph of a deceased person's hand wearing a glove had probative value because it established that the assailants took precautions to avoid leaving fingerprints; the photograph also had probative value as to appellant's liability as a party, plus no other photographs of the deceased person were admitted, and thus the photograph was relevant and its probative value outweighed any possible prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Garcia v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2848, 2011 WL 1442341 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 14 2011).

1234. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, evidence that defendant was driving a vehicle that matched the description of the vehicle involved in the shooting and that he attempted to flee from officers when one of them tried to pull him over was probative of his consciousness of guilt. The prejudicial effect of the evidence of defendant's flight did not outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Owens v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2871, 2011 WL 1435499 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 14 2011).

1235. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection as there was no clear disparity between the danger of unfair prejudice posed by the extraneous-offense evidence and its probative value; the factors did not weight in favor of exclusion of the evidence. Bethards v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS

2802 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 13 2011).

1236. Photographs of the victim's body were admitted over appellant's objection on Tex. R. Evid. 403 grounds, a ruling he did not challenge on appeal; the logo on the victim's clothing was still visible and helped to identify the body, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling appellant's Rule 403 objections. Reyes v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2328, 2011 WL 1169247 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 31 2011).

1237. Use of the words depicted in the tattoos to show the complainant was a bad person and that he acted in conformity with his bad character during the altercation weighed against admission, as this would have been improper; because the words presented a danger of unfair prejudice, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Smith v. State, 355 S.W.3d 138, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2426 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2011).

1238. Evidence of a worker's prior use of pain medication was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) for general impeachment purposes, the insurer did not raise intoxication as a defense under Tex. Lab. Code Ann. § 406.032(a)(1) in the worker's compensation administrative proceeding, and the insurer's suggestion that the worker might have fabricated his claim to obtain prescription drugs was speculative. Thus, the evidence was properly excluded as prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Commerce & Indus. Ins. Co. v. Ferguson-Stewart, 339 S.W.3d 744, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2446 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2011).

1239. Appellant developed his defense and aspects of the victim's racial animus were already put into the trial, such that the trial court acted within its discretion to avoid raising emotional fires through admitting overtly racial and inflammatory epithets. Cummings v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2303, 2011 WL 1157882 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 30 2011).

1240. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection where there was not a clear disparity between the danger of unfair prejudice posed by the extraneous-offense evidence and its probative value. Bethards v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2308 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 30 2011).

1241. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a photograph that showed a murder victim on the ground at the crime scene where, although some blood was visible on the victim's clothing and his chest was bared, the photograph was not gruesome, did not show a close-up of any injury, and merely depicted the victim in relation to his surroundings. The probative value of the photograph was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect. Acevedo v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2047, 2011 WL 1044402 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 23 2011).

1242. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence several photographs of the victim at the scene of the murder based on Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) only two of the photographs could be considered close-ups, and none were autopsy photos; (2) the photographs corroborated the testimony of the responding officer and the pathologist at to the location and manner of the crime; and (3) a photograph of the victim's state of dress did not indicate that she was sexually assaulted and the State did not present any evidence at trial suggesting a sexual assault took place. Reese v. State, 340 S.W.3d 838, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1900 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 16 2011).

1243. Nursing home records contained a number of facts the jury was entitled to consider and they were probative because they provided a general background from which jurors could understand the general status of the decedent's health in periods of time relevant to the contested will issues the jury was asked to decide; thus, the probate court could reasonably conclude that the probative value of the records outweighed any potential prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and admit those records into evidence. In the Estate of Kremer, 2011 Tex. App.

1244. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding text messages and voicemail messages offered for impeachment of the child victim's mother because the probative value of the evidence was minimal, as it did not directly refute any element of the charged offense, which was established by the victim's testimony, and none of the messages concerned the sexual abuse. The evidence was also cumulative of other evidence admitted at trial, as defense counsel cross-examined the victim's mother regarding her marriage to defendant, and the testimony of the victim and her brother corroborated the turbulent nature of the mother's marriage to defendant. Smith v. State, 340 S.W.3d 41, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1739 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 10 2011).

1245. Trial court was cautious in conducting the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test regarding photographs of the victim, as, in part, the trial court did not allow the State to display the photographs on a larger screen unless it was necessary; although the photographs were gruesome, that alone did not render the probative value outweighed by prejudice, the photographs depicted the crime scene and condition of the victim's body due to appellant's action, and the photographs had probative value in appellant's murder trial, in depicting his efforts to hide the crime and dispose of the body, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photographs. Ziegler v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1679, 2011 WL 810060 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 9 2011).

1246. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 613 and the balancing test in Tex. R. Evid. 403, the State had proper reasons to call defendant's father as a witness in a murder case and to point out that the account he gave to the police and to another witness were diametrically opposed. Westbrook v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1443, 2011 WL 686396 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 28 2011).

1247. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that defendant's statement was relevant because the discussion of "I'll find a way out" without "snitching" and his reference to the "footage" made it more probable that defendant had some involvement in the crime. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that there was not unfair prejudice requiring exclusion of the statement because if the jury chose to credit it, it would not have been on an improper basis; rather, it would have been on the basis that defendant was part of the crime. Quintanilla v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1353, 2011 WL 665328 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 24 2011).

1248. Trial court did not err in finding that the probative value of the photograph was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to defendant where the evidence was probative that defendant was the victim's assailant.

1249. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence concerning a syringe found in defendant's sock in jail following his arrest because the evidence was relevant to establish defendant's knowledge of the methamphetamine and to rebut the defensive theory that defendant had no knowledge of the methamphetamine in either the van or in the vehicle defendant was riding in. Defendant failed to establish that the probative value of the evidence was significantly or substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, defendant's knowledge of the methamphetamine was seriously contested, the time necessary to present the evidence represented a negligible portion of the State's case, and limiting instructions were given. Phillips v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1383, 2011 WL 652846 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 23 2011).

1250. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of the circumstances of defendant' arrest in July 2004 because evidence that defendant possessed methamphetamine at his father's residence on a later occasion was circumstantial evidence that defendant intentionally or knowingly possessed methamphetamine on an earlier occasion. Defendant's knowledge of the methamphetamine was seriously contested, the time necessary to present the evidence represented a negligible portion of the State's case, and limiting instructions were given.

Phillips v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1383, 2011 WL 652846 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 23 2011).

1251. Court did not reach the question of whether defense counsel's failure to identify a objectionable photograph by exhibit number was sufficient to preserve the complaint because the failure to state a particular basis for objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 preserved nothing for review. Conway v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 849 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 3 2011).

1252. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant, after committing the charged offense and on the same day, had ordered two minor girls walking down a street to get in his van where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence regarding defendant's encounter with the minor girls was relevant and admissible because that evidence revealed defendant's true plans about his encounter with the victim on the day he committed the offense. The trial judge could have reasonably concluded that the inherent probative force of the evidence, along with the State's need for the evidence, substantially outweighed the danger of any unfair prejudice to defendant, and the presentation of the extraneous offense evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Frank v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 762, 2011 WL 379041 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 2 2011).

1253. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's drug transaction and drug use during his capital murder trial because it was same-transaction contextual evidence and background contextual evidence that put in context the conspiracy offense that defendant was charged with; the State sought to show that defendant was an active participant with his sons in a large-volume and dangerous drug business, and not just an after the fact bus driver, to explain why defendant would have entered into the conspiracy with his sons to rob the victim. Given the State's need for circumstantial evidence to prove that defendant entered into the conspiracy to rob the victim, the court could not say that there was a clear disparity between the danger of unfair prejudice posed by the evidence and its probative value. Davis v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 835, 2011 WL 322877 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 2 2011).

1254. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony of three of defendant's sisters that he sexually assaulted them and a fourth sister when they were children and defendant was a juvenile, even though the acts had occurred between forty-four and sixty years before trial, because Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) contained no time restriction on punishment evidence, and because the sisters' testimony was quite probative of the punishment issue before the jury-the appropriate sentence for a particular defendant in a particular case-as it demonstrated a pattern of conduct over many years. The sisters' testimony did not occupy an undue amount of time, and it did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational, but nevertheless indelible way. Rodriguez v. State, 345 S.W.3d 504, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 834 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 2 2011).

1255. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not err in excluding the girlfriend's testimony during the guilt-innocence phase of the trial because that evidence amounted to no more than speculation that another person might have killed the victim; defendant not only did not provide a nexus between an alternative perpetrator and the victim's murder, but he also failed to identify any particular individual who might have been responsible for killing the victim; and the evidence would present a threat of confusing the issues since the State would be forced to disprove defendant's contention that some unknown person might have committed the murder. King v. Tex., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 729, 2011 WL 381743 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 2 2011).

1256. Testimony from the victim's girlfriend regarding the victim's violent tendencies towards her and his history of drug use was not admissible during the punishment phase of the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it would result in the jury focusing its attention on the victim's character rather than on defendant's personal responsibility and moral culpability. King v. Tex., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 729, 2011 WL 381743 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 2 2011).

1257. Gang evidence admitted at punishment was relevant under case law and probative of appellant's character, the testimony did not consume an inordinate amount of time at the hearing, and the jury sentenced appellant to much lower than the permitted 99 years in each possession with intent to deliver case, such that the probative value of the gang evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Gilmore v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 616 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2011).

1258. On appeal of defendant's conviction for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, he claimed the trial court abused its discretion by admitting evidence that two of the guns found in his apartment were stolen. Because the jury had already heard evidence from two different witnesses that the guns were stolen without any objection from defendant, his claim that the trial court abused its discretion in admitting this evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not preserved for review. Chenier v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 678, 2011 WL 286156 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2011).

1259. In a situation where a few factors weighed against admitting the testimony of two witnesses who were also abused as children by defendant, and a few factors weighed in favor of admitting their testimony, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the witnesses' testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because 1) without their testimony, the State's case would have basically come down to the victim's word against defendant's word; 2) the evidence did not tend to confuse or distract the jury as their testimony was straightforward and directly relevant to whether defendant abused the victim; 3) their testimony concerned matters easily comprehensible by laypeople; 4) the evidence was not given undue weight by the jury as the witnesses were on the stand for relatively brief periods of time; and 5) the evidence was not too time-consuming or repetitive. Gaytan v. State, 331 S.W.3d 218, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 444 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 21 2011).

1260. Fact that one child placed a Nazi symbol on his book was relevant to determining whether the mother endangered the child's well-being and also to evaluating his best interests; it was not shown that the admission of the evidence unfairly prejudiced the mother under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and if the trial court did err in allowing the evidence, the error was harmless. In re D.O., 338 S.W.3d 29, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 407 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 20 2011).

1261. Trial court's determination that any unfair prejudice did not outweigh the probative value of the extraneous offense evidence regarding the testimony of another sexual assault victim because the State also presented DNA evidence against defendant, the extraneous offense evidence did not have a large potential to impress the jury in an irrational way nor did the State spend a significant amount of time presenting the other victim's testimony, the State had a need for the other victim's testimony as there was no DNA evidence that linked defendant to the victim and there was no DNA evidence that verified the evidence of sexual assault had come from the victim, and the other victim's testimony served to undermine the defensive theories aimed at punching holes in the weight of the DNA evidence. Dreyer v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 353, 2011 WL 193494 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 19 2011).

1262. During the punishment phase of defendant's trial, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), the trial court did not err in admitting (1) the evidence of an accomplice's previous robbery as the evidence was relevant to defendant's culpability in the robbery at a bank because it reflected poorly on defendant's decision to associate with the accomplice that day, especially when combined with other evidence showing defendant's knowledge that the accomplice had previously shot someone, which was especially true when considering defendant's strategy of minimizing his role in the robbery to request a lenient sentence; (2) the photographs of the girlfriend's injuries caused by defendant even if they also displayed injuries caused by his mother; and (3) a detective's testimony regarding defendant's tattoos and gang membership as the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Collins v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 392, 2011 WL 167223 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 13 2011).

1263. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of a community activist's fee sharing agreement during her defamation trial because ordinary malice was an issue for the jury as both mayors pleaded exemplary damages and the probative value of the evidence did not outweigh its prejudicial value. Salinas v. Townsend, 365 S.W.3d 368, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 91, 2011 WL 61844 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 6 2011).

1264. Extraneous offenses occurred relatively close in time, involved highly unusual events that were unlikely to repeat themselves inadvertently, rebutted appellant's fabrication allegation, and the prosecutor did not seek to offer the evidence until after appellant testified in the guilt/innocence phase; in reviewing the balancing factors under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court found no abuse of discretion by the trial court in finding that the value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Jordan v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10244, 2010 WL 5541695 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 30 2010).

1265. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in admitting into evidence five child pornography photographs found on defendant's computer; his possession or viewing of child pornography was relevant circumstantial evidence of his intent to arouse or gratify his sexual desire. The probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Wooley v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10306 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 30 2010).

1266. Photographs of defendant's tattoos on his hand and across his stomach were admissible for purposes of identification under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and the danger of unfair prejudice resulting from the admission of that evidence did not substantially outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 where the tattoos were physical evidence linking defendant to a nickname that several witnesses used in identifying defendant and where the jury already heard testimony regarding defendant's gang membership. Arias v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10217, 2010 WL 5541118 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 29 2010).

1267. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting extraneous offense evidence of another robbery under the identity exception to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because both robberies were committed in the same area within an hour of each other, a clean-cut African-American man approached the victims on foot just after they had exited their vehicles in the parking lots of their respective apartment complexes, both victims heard the sound of a gun cocking just before they saw a man with a silver gun, both victims saw a red bandana, the man with the gun immediately asked for the victims' purse/wallet and took their cell phones, and both victims identified defendant as the robber. The trial court did not err by failing to exclude the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the evidence was probative as it assisted the jury in determining the robber's identity; (2) identity was the seminal issue in dispute; (3) the trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction; and (4) the testimony about the other robbery was only about 30 pages of the reporter's record. Carroll v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10003, 2010 WL 5142386 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 15 2010).

1268. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b) in admitting evidence of defendant's extraneous misconduct where the evidence was admitted for purposes other than character conformity and was more probative than prejudicial because the State's need for the evidence was considerable, and although the content of the evidence was emotional, it made the existence of a material and, perhaps, the ultimate disputed fact at trial-defendant's identity as the perpetrator-more probable. Because the pattern and characteristics of the alleged offense against the victim were so distinctively similar to the misconduct adduced in the evidence that a "signature" by defendant was apparent, the evidence showed a modus operandi that the State used both in its identifying of defendant as the perpetrator and in establishing the manner in which defendant committed the offense. Curcuru v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9748, 2010 WL 5020178 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 9 2010).

1269. Mother did not object at trial to relevance or that any relevance was outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice and she did not preserve this complaint for review, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; furthermore, the mother testified without objection to the substance of certain testimony, and any error in admitting evidence was cured where the same evidence came in elsewhere without objection. In the Interest of S.R., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9681, 2010 WL 4983484 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 8 2010).

1270. Evidence of the mother's drug or alcohol impairment while driving was relevant in determining whether she engaged in conduct that endangered the children and in determining the best interest of the children; for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the probative value of that evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. In the Interest of S.R., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9681, 2010 WL 4983484 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 8 2010).

1271. Court assumed that appellant's testimony about his sexual relationship with the victim, where the victim paid appellant for sexual activity, was relevant in the punishment phase, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), but nothing suggested a connection between the alleged sexual arrangement between appellant and the victim and the aggravated robbery, as there was no mention that the victim failed to pay for one of the encounters or that appellant was shortchanged, plus the testimony would tend to suggest a decision on an improper basis and tend to distract the jury, and the evidence would have been partially repetitious; for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not err in excluding the testimony. Peters v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9397, 2010 WL 4813675 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 24 2010).

1272. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection; given his sole defensive theory of fabrication, the inherent probative force of the niece's testimony, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), strongly served to make the existence of a fact of consequence more probable, and considering the Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors, the balancing determination by the trial court did not show a clear abuse of discretion, as the trial court gave limiting instructions and the presentation of the testimony was brief and not particularly graphic. Dial v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9273, 2010 WL 4705529 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2010).

1273. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence three series of photographs depicting the injuries suffered by the victim because their admission did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403, as: (1) the photos were black and white and did not show gruesome scenes; (2) the amount of time spent offering and discussing the photos did not unduly delay the trial; (3) while many of the photos were of the same area of the victim's body, they did not show the same degree of injury as they were taken at different times; and (4) the photos, showing the apparent anger of defendant by the lasting imprint his teeth on the victim's arm and head, went directly to the totality of the circumstances of the assault. Betliskey v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9150, 2010 WL 4644500 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 17 2010).

1274. In an aggravated robbery case, the evidence of a prior offense was admissible because the State needed it to demonstrate defendant's intent to steal a second vehicle within 13 minutes after his first attempt ended with an immovable truck in a drainage culvert; although defendant killed the victim in the prior offense, that would not inflame the jury any more than the second victim's testimony about being shot five times at close range by defendant, particularly in light of the descriptions of his wounds and the photographs of them that were presented to the jury; and the prejudicial nature of the contextual evidence did not render the evidence inadmissible where it set the stage for the jury's comprehension of the whole criminal transaction. Wilson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8685, 2010 WL 4261872 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 28 2010).

1275. At defendant's sentencing hearing after his guilty plea to two counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child and one count of indecency with a child, a taped statement's probative value outweighed any prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because defense counsel claimed that defendant's guilty plea indicated his willingness to accept responsibility for his conduct but the statement indicated that defendant initially denied responsibility and tried to blame others, including his wife, for the incident. Hernandez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8538, 2010 WL

4148359 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 21 2010).

1276. Even though the trial court erred by allowing the State to ask a police officer if defendant had assaulted two other inmates upon arriving at the city's holding facility, as it showed defendant's propensity to be aggressive and perpetrate assaults, the error was harmless because there was a significant amount of evidence that went to the issue of defendant's intent and the State mentioned the evidence only minimally during closing arguments. Parson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8330, 2010 WL 4053782 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 15 2010).

1277. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony of a fellow prisoner of defendant because it had a strong tendency to suggest that defendant was quick-tempered and prone to respond to the slightest provocation with homicidal violence, and it was directly relevant to the issue of defendant's identity as the murderer, as the prisoner testified that defendant spoke of putting "three in the back of the head" and expressed a preference for .22 caliber weapons, the same used to kill the victims. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that the probative value of the prisoner's testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or undue delay because only 51 pages of the 1347 pages of the reporter's record were devoted to the prisoner's testimony, including 15 pages for voir dire outside the jury's presence. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8313, 2010 WL 4053640 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 12 2010).

1278. Even though the trial court erred by admitting three autopsy photographs that showed the surgical mutilation caused by the autopsy, the error was harmless because the medical examiner's testimony was brief and came four days before deliberations began, each set of autopsy photographs were admitted as a group, the medical examiner briefly explained what each photograph showed, and no particular emphasis was given to the offending photographs. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8313, 2010 WL 4053640 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 12 2010).

1279. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting photographs showing defendant's tattoos because a criminal investigator testified that defendant's distinctive tattoos as depicted in the photographs identified him as a member of a particular gang, and defendant did not overcome the presumption that the relevant evidence was more probative than prejudicial. Pate v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8151, 2010 WL 3921177 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 7 2010).

1280. While an expert witness's general testimony about sex offenders' hesitancy to speak about their offenses was not particularly probative on the disputed issues, neither was it unduly prejudicial, because the expert never linked his observations to defendant; thus, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, the expert's testimony was not unduly prejudicial. Cook v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8095, 2010 WL 3910585 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 6 2010).

1281. In an aggravated assault case in which defendant shot a person who had brandished a hammer, the trial court reasonably found that any prejudice from the admission of photographs of the pickup truck from which the complainant got the hammer did not greatly outweigh the probative value of the exhibits. Sierra v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8039, 2010 WL 3866270 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 5 2010).

1282. Other than the fact the victim was intubated, the photographs, which the court assumed were shown to the jury in color, showed no more than the injuries the victim suffered, and because the gruesomeness of the photographs emanated from nothing more than the crime itself, the trial court did abuse its discretion in admitting them under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Gunter v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7909, 2010 WL 3769528 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 29 2010).

1283. To the extent appellant claimed testimony should have been excluded because it was hearsay and violated Tex. R. Evid. 403, nothing was presented for review; appellant cited no authority and made only a cursory argument that the admission of testimony violated Rule 403. Mccutchen v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7760, 2010 WL

3699987 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 22 2010).

1284. Victims testified that defendant made them watch pornographic images and videos depicting both children and adults, that defendant made them perform acts depicted in the pornographic images they were forced to watch, and that defendant would make them remove their clothing as they were watching the videos then sexually assault them afterward; based on that testimony, the evidence regarding child pornography found on the DVD's constituted same-transaction-contextual evidence and the evidence of child pornography was so intertwined with the sexual assaults of the victims that the jury's understanding of the offenses would have been obscured without it. The evidence was also admissible under Fed. R. Evid. 404(b) on the issue of defendant's intent, and although the evidence of child pornography was undoubtedly prejudicial, the State limited the visual evidence to two 30-second segments, and the appellate court could not say that the district court abused its discretion by ruling that the probative value of that evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Bonner v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7440, 2010 WL 3503858 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 8 2010).

1285. Certain testimony and a DVD were relevant to the elements of both counts of evading arrest and tampering, and the testimony also corroborated accomplice testimony regarding appellant's intent; the testimony in question did not unduly delay the trial and appellant raised no argument about the DVD's length, such that the trial court did not err in overruling appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection and in admitting the evidence. Lewis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7292, 2010 WL 3433992 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2010).

1286. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of a prior robbery during defendant's aggravated robbery trial because: (1) it was committed the evening prior to the instant robbery; (2) defendant and his accomplice acted together in both robberies; (3) both robberies were committed against lone, older women using surprise, speed, and strength through force or the threat of force; and (4) both robberies were committed while using the same vehicle as a means of escape. Therefore, the probative value of the evidence was great, as it showed that defendant and his accomplice acted together in a continuing criminal enterprise and rebutted defendant's theory that he was not a party to the instant robbery but was merely present in the vehicle while it occurred. Davis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6949, 2010 WL 3341514 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2010).

1287. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence photographs of defendant's tattoos because a criminal investigator testified that defendant's distinctive tattoos identified him as a member of particular street gang, which was an element of the charged offense of organized criminal activity. Defendant did not overcome the presumption that the relevant evidence was more probative than prejudicial. Pate v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6980, 2010 WL 3341853 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2010).

1288. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the probative value of the child victim's mother's testimony outweighed any prejudicial effect because the testimony, identifying defendant as the individual who left bite marks on the victim when they were playing, was relevant and probative of the relationship between defendant and the victim. Samora v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6759, 2010 WL 3279536 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2010).

1289. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence about the bullet damage to the interior of a particular home. The evidence was relevant to rebut defendant's theory that he merely fired a gun into the air to deter and stop a man whom he believed to be a burglar, and the evidence was not particularly inflammatory or of such a nature as to distract, confuse, or be given undue weight by the jury. Richardson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6659, 2010 WL 3245443 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18 2010).

1290. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony that the pistol used in the shooting was stolen despite defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the record showed that the probative force and need for the evidence was low, and there was a slight tendency that the evidence would suggest an improper basis for decision, distract the jury from the main issue, or would be given undue weight. The evidence took very little time to present and was not cumulative. Codina v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6550, 2010 WL 3192966 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 13 2010).

1291. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in performing its Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test regarding evidence of trace quantities of controlled substances that were found in defendant's car during the same search in which the methadone was found and finding that the evidence was admissible because: (1) the evidence made the fact that defendant knew the pill bottle contained contraband more probable; (2) defendant's possession of the baggie and the scale dusted with methamphetamine and cocaine was necessary to prove scienter; (3) the evidence had little potential to impress the jury in an irrational way; (4) since all of the contraband was discovered during the same search of defendant's car, little extra time was spent by the State to develop the evidence; and (5) the State's need for the evidence was great, as it needed to link defendant to the knowing possession of the methadone in the pill bottle by showing that defendant knowingly possessed other contraband at the time of his arrest. Lamkin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6484, 2010 WL 3170647 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 12 2010).

1292. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to a family counselor's testimony because: (1) the only direct evidence of sexual abuse came from the child victim, and the counselor's testimony tended to establish that the victim had indeed experienced a traumatic event consistent with sexual abuse; (2) the counselor testified briefly about each behavioral manifestation exhibited by the victim and spoke in general, not specific terms, and the trial court limited the counselor's testimony so that she did not testify about the content of the victim's nightmares; (3) defendant admitted that the counselor's testimony was not too terribly long; (4) most of the counselor's testimony was not cumulative of other evidence; and (5) the State needed the counselor's testimony because it tended to rebut the defense's theory that the abuse did not occur. Berzley v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6463, 2010 WL 3159875 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 11 2010).

1293. Evidence that appellant was on pretrial supervision in another case in which he was found competent was probative of determining his motive for committing the offenses and thus the evidence was needed by the State to rebut appellant's insanity claim; the trial court protected the jury from deciding the matter on an improper basis, there was no indication that the evidence would confuse the jury, nor did it take an inordinate amount of time to present the evidence, and the decision to admit the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not an abuse of discretion. Espinosa v. State, 328 S.W.3d 32, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6341 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 5 2010).

1294. During defendant's trial for possession of child pornography, the court did not err in admitting nine photographs recovered from his cell phone depicting naked adult females because the pictures depicting adults in similar poses as those depicted in the pictures of his niece rebutted the defensive theory that he only possessed the pictures of his niece for the purpose of trying to help her; the trial court gave both oral and written limiting instructions to the jury regarding the challenged pictures. Morris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6282 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 5 2010).

1295. There was no error in admitting into evidence over defendant's objections the rifle, magazine/clip, shell casings, police in-car video, ammunition, and the gunshot residue trace evidence kit, because the probative value of the exhibits was not substantially outweighed by any danger of unfair prejudice, when the fingerprints on the magazine/clip that fit the rifle and ammunition matched defendant's fingerprints, the video confirmed that defendant was a rear passenger in the vehicle, and the results of the residue test made it more probable that defendant was in fact not only around gunfire, but also the shooter. Jones v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6270, 2010 WL 3041963 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 4 2010).

1296. Appellate court could not say that it was shown that a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection could be properly sustained to the admission of spoliation evidence in a store customer's slip and fall action, based on the store's destruction of the bulk of the videotape recording surrounding the area where the customer fell because the evidence of spoliation rose beyond speculation and conjecture and because no reasonable explanation for the missing existed, as the store should have known from the seriousness of the accident and the customer's subsequent medical treatment that there was a substantial chance for litigation. Brookshire Bro, Ltd. v. Aldridge, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6065, 2010 WL 2982902 (Tex. App. Tyler July 30 2010).

1297. When a letter was offered into evidence at trial, defense counsel said "no objection," thereby waiving any alleged error in admission of that evidence, plus there was testimony about the letter, to which there was no objection; moreover, attempts by one to fabricate evidence were admissible, the evidence showing that appellant fabricated evidence was probative, and he did not show that the evidence had the potential to impress the jury in an irrational way. Seeger v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6064, 2010 WL 2998750 (Tex. App. Tyler July 30 2010).

1298. Trial court did not err by overruling his Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to the admission of letters he wrote to the complainant after the incident because it could have reasonably concluded that the probative value of the letters was not substantially outweighed by the countervailing factors specified in the rule, as the letters illustrated the nature of the relationship between defendant and the complainant and indicated his consciousness of guilt. White v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5985, 2010 WL 2951748 (Tex. App. Dallas July 29 2010).

1299. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant's letter to an officer regarding his plea agreement because the statements were not covered by Tex. R. Evid. 410. In addition, the letter's probative value was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the letter was probative of whether defendant committed the charged offense; (2) given the brevity and clarity of the letter and the fact that it was directly related to the charged offense, the amount of time required to develop it was negligible; and (3) the letter was important to the prosecution's case and had a significant tendency to make defendant's guilt more probable. Willis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5931, 2010 WL 2935772 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 28 2010).

1300. Trial court could have reasonably determined that the probative value of the extraneous offense evidence of a robbery during defendant's capital murder trial was not substantially outweighed by the countervailing factors specified in Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the evidence was highly probative to show defendant's identity as one of the perpetrators of both crimes; (2) although the evidence had the potential to evoke an emotional response in the jury, it was clear from the record that the State introduced the evidence to explain defendant's identity as on of the assailants; (3) the State's presentation of the evidence consumed only approximately two hours and 49 minutes of the three-day trial; (4) the State did not suggested that the evidence could be used to convict defendant of capital murder, and the evidence was presented in a fashion to prove defendant's participation in the instant robbery and murder; and (5) the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the presentation of the evidence would not consume an inordinate amount of time and that it was not cumulative of other evidence presented at trial. Dodson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5859, 2010 WL 2889693 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 22 2010).

1301. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting into evidence testimony about extraneous acts described by a child witness under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the issue of whether defendant was correctly identified by the victim was strongly contested, and therefore evidence showing defendant had been previously identified as engaging in sexual acts involving a child materially refuted the defense claims of mistake; the jury was instructed that it was not to consider the previous acts unless it believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant had committed them. Gillespie v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5701, 2010 WL 2839481 (Tex. App. Dallas July 21 2010).

1302. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence multiple extraneous offenses during defendant's trial on charges of engaging in organized criminal activity because the evidence, namely the letterhead, testimony about the ongoing mortgage fraud, the forged signature on the articles of incorporation and diverted money, was all admissible as evidence to establish the existence of the combination, its members and its ongoing criminal activities, which were elements of the offense; the diversion of money was also admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as evidence of motive, knowledge and intent, common scheme or plan, or absence of mistake. The court further held that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect. Marriott v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5804, 2010 WL 2869781 (Tex. App. Waco July 21 2010).

1303. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence during sentence a recording of a telephone conversation defendant had while he was in jail waiting for his murder trial to begin because the conversation, during which defendant threatened to kill a man or break the man's nose, was relevant, as it illustrated defendant's propensity for violence and that he was not deterred by his earlier convictions, the instant victim's murder, or by being incarcerated. The evidence did not have an undue effect on the jury's decision under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the comments were the only evidence of defendant's propensity to commit further violence following the victim's murder and therefore the State's need for the evidence was high; (2) the entire conversation was only 15 minutes long and the comments constituted only a few seconds of the conversation; and (3) although the State requested the jury sentence defendant to 99 years' confinement or life in prison, the jury sentenced him to 40 years' confinement. Walker v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5376, 2010 WL 2698782 (Tex. App. Dallas July 9 2010).

1304. During defendant's trial for possession of methamphetamine, the court would not have abused its discretion in determining that extraneous evidence concerning the finding of marijuana and drug paraphernalia inside a car would have been admissible under the rule had an objection been made; the possibility that the evidence impressed the jury in some irrational way was minimal because the record reflected that defendant's son was the only person arrested for marijuana possession. Brumbalow v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5333, 2010 WL 2696712 (Tex. App. Eastland July 8 2010).

1305. In appellant's murder case, the evidence of appellant's flight had probative value because it concerned a fact of consequence, his guilt, and because appellant claimed he acted in self-defense, the State needed the evidence to further substantiate its case; the State took very little time to develop the evidence and the flight evidence had little potential to confuse the jury, and the probative value of evidence of appellant's flight was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Staley v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5167, 2010 WL 2680000 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 7 2010).

1306. Strength of the State's need for the evidence supported the trial court's decision to admit the extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403; although the State's evidence of identity was strong, appellant challenged the probative value of much of the evidence, and the extraneous offense evidence was not unfairly prejudicial. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5084, 2010 WL 2650008 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 6 2010).

1307. For purposes of a Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis, the charged and extraneous offenses were identical in a number of respects and thus highly probative on the issue of identity; although appellant argued that identity was not seriously contested at trial, defense counsel raised the issue at opening statements, during trial, and in closing arguments. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5084, 2010 WL 2650008 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 6 2010).

1308. Second and third factors of a Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis weighed in favor of the trial court's decision to admit extraneous offense evidence; the trial court gave a limiting instruction and the State did not spend an unduly lengthy amount of time to develop the evidence. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5084, 2010 WL 2650008 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 6 2010).

1309. During defendant's trial for murdering his wife, the court did not err in admitting an exhibit containing his voluntary statement to the police for the purpose of establishing the nature of his relationship with his wife prior to her death; defendant failed to demonstrate that a "significant disparity" existed between the degree of potential prejudice presented by the admissions, as compared to the probative value of the evidence to establish the nature of his relationship with his wife, and to rebut his defense. Allen v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4925 (Tex. App. El Paso June 30 2010).

1310. Evidence of an extraneous robbery was offer to show identity, and for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), (1) given the similar distinctive characteristics shared by both robberies, a witness's identification of appellant as the robber in the extraneous offense case provided compelling evidence of his identity as the robber of the instant robbery, (2) the court did not see how the evidence of the extraneous robbery had the potential to impress the jury irrationally, plus the jury's consideration was properly limited, and (3) the State needed the evidence because the reliability of the direct evidence could be undermined; despite the inordinate time involved in proving the extraneous robbery, the court believed that the probative value of the evidence of that robbery was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4999 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2010).

1311. Twenty-seven percent of the State's direct examination was devoted to proof of an extraneous offense; the evidence was needed and inherently probative, but the expenditure of so much time proving the extraneous offense risked diverting the jury's attention from the charged offense. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4999 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2010).

1312. Evidence of the victim's extraneous offenses should have been allowed, Tex. R. Evid. 403, but because defendant denied hitting the victim with the baseball bat, he could not have employed the theory of self-defense for that part of the alleged assault; the trial court was free to disbelieve defendant's assertion that he only punched the victim once and that he did not hit him with the baseball bat, and the jury was free to believe the victim's testimony that defendant was the first aggressor. Tomasheski v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4709, 2010 WL 2512618 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 23 2010).

1313. Because appellant failed to develop any argument specifically with regard to a certain witness, the court presumed the reference to this testimony fell under the general rubric of appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 argument. Sung Mo Hong v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4688, 2010 WL 2510333 (Tex. App. Dallas June 23 2010).

1314. Even if the State failed to relate the breath test back to the time of arrest, such a failure afforded no basis for the exclusion of the test and the court's inquiry was confined to the admissibility of the breath test under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Sung Mo Hong v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4688, 2010 WL 2510333 (Tex. App. Dallas June 23 2010).

1315. Ultimate issue at trial was whether appellant was driving while intoxicated and it was axiomatic that the breath test was probative to this fact and there was no potential for jury distraction, plus the results were not unfairly prejudicial, there was no basis to conclude that there was any tendency for the evidence to be given undue weight by the jury, the amount of time spent on the evidence was not unduly lengthy, and the State had a considerable need for the evidence; thus, the probative value of the breath test results was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Sung Mo Hong v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4688, 2010 WL 2510333 (Tex. App. Dallas June 23 2010).

1316. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court could not conclude that the evidence of a convenience store robbery lacked inherent probative force or that there was no need for the evidence; the evidence of the robbery a few hours after the offense at issue corroborated certain testimony, appellant did not contend that the evidence consumed an inordinate amount of time, and the court did not find that the jury, which was given a limiting instruction, was confused or distracted. Chamberlain v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4653, 2010 WL 2473341 (Tex.

App. Dallas June 21 2010).

1317. Court abused its discretion in overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objections, because the court impermissibly allowed the State to interject extremely prejudicial evidence of multiple other sexual offenses allegedly committed by defendant (and others), when the evidence of extraneous acts admitted did not show a plan to sexually assault the two alleged victims, but rather it was evidence of repeated occurrences of the same bad act, compounded by numerous additional bad acts. Pittman v. State, 321 S.W.3d 565, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

1318. For purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.071, § 2(a)(1) and Tex. R. Evid. 401, though circumstantial, the evidence clearly proved that appellant killed the victim's cat, which suffered wounds similar to those suffered by the victim; that appellant would kill a house cat was some evidence of his violent nature, the prosecutor's assessment of this evidence as showing appellant's brutality was rational and was a legitimate reason for admitting the evidence, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting this evidence. Davis v. State, 313 S.W.3d 317, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1319. Even without medical evidence to verify it, defendant's volunteered statement to a police officer that he was HIV positive had probative value to show he was infected by the HIV virus when he sexually assaulted a child victim and was relevant as a circumstance of the offense that the jury could consider in assessing punishment under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1). Lewis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4545 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 16 2010).

1320. Trial court did not err in an employee's sexual harassment action in excluding the deposition testimony of a coworker because diverting the trial's focus to an investigation of the employee's general sexual proclivities was potentially highly prejudicial. Waffle House, Inc. v. Williams, 313 S.W.3d 796, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 416, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 809, 109 Fair Empl. Prac. Cas. (BNA) 1082, 30 I.E.R. Cas. (BNA) 1496 (Tex. 2010).

1321. Defendant's conviction for indecency with a child by contact was proper because, given the lack of evidence that a tape was in fact what defendant claimed it to have been, the trial court acted within its discretion in determining that the recording's authenticity had not been sufficiently established to allow its admission into evidence. Further, even if the tape had been properly authenticated, the probative value of the recording was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice; allowing the jury to hear a tape recording allegedly of the complainant's mother yelling at her young daughter and calling her derogatory names presented a significant risk of unfair prejudice and confusion of the issues. Sosa v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4428, 2010 WL 2330304 (Tex. App. Austin June 10 2010).

1322. Trial court's decision to admit a videotape under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) fell within the zone of reasonable disagreement, given that (1) the charge contained a limiting instruction of how the evidence of another wrong was to be considered, and (2) the videotape, which showed defendant struggling with police, was probative of the issue of whether defendant intentionally kicked an officer or did so by accident; the actions depicted on the videotape did not warrant the conclusion that the probative value was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the videotape into evidence on substantive grounds. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1323. Although defendant initially preserved error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 by objecting and obtaining a ruling before a detective's identification, defendant subsequently waived any error by failing to object when he was brought into court to be identified by witnesses on other occasions, plus defendant voluntarily appeared in court for all of the proceedings on the certain days of testimony, during which defendant was again in handcuffs, restrained in a wheelchair, and wearing jail clothes and a mask; defense counsel did not make a Rule 403 objection to defendant's appearance before the jury on these occasions and thus defendant did not preserve his error because he failed to object to the "evidence" each time it was presented to the jury. Jett v. State, 319 S.W.3d 846, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3559 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 12 2010).

1324. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting autopsy photographs, given that (1) the medical examiner's testimony about the wounds was relevant and the pictures were a visual representation of that testimony, (2) the wounds were described in the autopsy report, which was admitted without objection, and (3) defendant's argument was that the results of the crime were horrific, but the result of the crime was the very issue that was relevant. Jett v. State, 319 S.W.3d 846, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3559 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 12 2010).

1325. Even if a court erred during defendant's murder trial by allowing into evidence testimony regarding a prior attempt by defendant to shoot the victim, there was still overwhelming evidence that defendant conspired to commit aggravated assault, one or more of the conspirators murdered the victim, the murder was in furtherance of the assault, and defendant should have anticipated that the victim would die as a result of the assault; it was unlikely that the admission of the shooting attempt had a substantial effect on the verdict. Cruz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3552, 2010 WL 1904990 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 12 2010).

1327. Witness testified, without objection, that defendant left the firearms in her apartment such that evidence of defendant's arsenal, if any, was already before the jury, and the admission into evidence of the additional two firearms did not create such negative impact to be unfairly prejudicial. Anderson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440, 2010 WL 1839945 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 6 2010).

1328. Probative value of defendant's gang affiliation was low since an investigator did not testify about the gang's activities, and its prejudice was also correspondingly low; the trial court instructed the jury that it could not consider the gang affiliation unless the State proved that defendant committed an extraneous bad act by such affiliation beyond a reasonable doubt, this instruction likely curtailed the jury's consideration of the gang membership more than a case law instruction would have, and the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of defendant's gang affiliation. Anderson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440, 2010 WL 1839945 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 6 2010).

1329. Because defendant opened the door by testifying that he had pled guilty to two previous offenses because he was guilty of them, the prosecutor's question as to whether he did not plead to the current offense because there was no plea agreement was not substantially more prejudicial than probative, and defendant was not entitled to an instruction to disregard the prosecutor's reference to plea negotiations. Bowley v. State, 310 S.W.3d 431, 2010 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 553 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010).

1330. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, his daughter, the testimony by a witness that she was also sexually assaulted by defendant was offered to rebut the defense theory that the victim was untruthful and fabricated her allegations; in light of the defense theory, and the question of the victim's credibility as raised by defendant, the probative value of the testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Saunders v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3358, 2010 WL 1796232 (Tex. App. El Paso May 5 2010).

1331. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon and unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon by concluding that the probative value of photographs of one of the complainant's wounds was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or by admitting the photographs because the pictures were apparently introduced to help the complainant explain his multiple gunshot wounds and injuries, and, whether it was the State's intent or not, the pictures helped rebut defendant's self-defense argument because they, along with unobjected-to testimony by the second complainant, showed that a bullet entered his back. While the pictures were gruesome, they portrayed no more than the gruesomeness of the injuries defendant inflicted. Burleson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3250 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 29 2010).

1332. Although photographs of the child depicted some gruesome details, there were no more gruesome than the facts of the case, plus they provided a necessary visual to understand paramedics' testimony regarding the victim's injuries; the photographs were probative because they showed the extent and arguably non-accidental nature of many of those injuries, the State spent little time authenticating the photographs, and the photographs were not overly prejudicial and did not pose the danger of influencing the jury in an irrational way and the trial court did not err in admitting them. Latimer v. State, 319 S.W.3d 128, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3149 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 28 2010).

1333. Assuming the trial court erred by allowing into evidence a witness's pretrial identification, the error was harmless because there was other, extensive evidence identifying defendant as the only driver of a van and the witness's testimony about how the van was taken was not overly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403; to the extent defendant complained about the admission of the evidence about how the van was stolen, his failure to object waived error concerning the admission of the evidence, and the story about how the van was stolen has minor dramatic significance when compared to the dramatic evidence introduced at trial about the collision. Murphy v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2953 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 22 2010).

1334. It is not enough that the evidence is relevant; pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, the probative value of the evidence must not be substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading the jury, or by considerations of delay or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. King v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2811, 2010 WL 1510204 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 16 2010).

1335. Jury could have found from the evidence that defendant previously tried to shoot another person and was a violent person, which was the inference forbidden for this kind of evidence, but a significant amount of time was not required to develop the evidence, and the State had need for this evidence to establish a fact of consequence, which was defendant's intent, and the evidence supported the trial court's ruling to admit the extraneous evidence. King v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2811, 2010 WL 1510204 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 16 2010).

1336. Reasonable minds could have differed as to the admission of evidence because of a tenuous connection between the incidents and because of the chance that the jury would look unfavorably on defendant, who had previously tried to shoot another individual, and these kinds of rulings are subject to harmless error analysis; given that the jury found insufficient evidence that defendant acted intentionally, the jury did not misuse the evidence or make the forbidden inference that he intended to shoot the victim, and any residual bias the jury might have against defendant because of certain evidence would not necessarily intrude on the jury's evaluation of the evidence. King v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2811, 2010 WL 1510204 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 16 2010).

1337. During defendant's trial for engaging in organized criminal activity relating to the underlying offense of aggravated robbery with a deadly weapon, the court erred in admitting specific evidence relating to two offenses not involving defendant; any probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Jackson v. State, 314 S.W.3d 118, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2730 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 15 2010).

1338. Because defendant's argument on appeal did not comport with any objection raised in the trial court, defendant failed to preserve for appellate review her Tex. R. Evid. 403 challenge to certain evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Williamson v. State, 356 S.W.3d 1, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3432 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 6 2010).

1339. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence for defendant's son's siblings regarding the medical abuse they suffered at the hands of defendant, as well as evidence that defendant used the children's alleged illnesses to get money and gifts from others, given that (1) the evidence was highly probative to show motive and provide context, (2) the trial court could have found that the disputed evidence did not have a tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis, (3) it was clear that the evidence was offered to explain motive and context and the jury was properly instructed, (4) the trial court could have found that the evidence did not have a tendency to confuse the jury or be given undue weight, and (5) the trial court could have found that the evidence would not consume an inordinate amount of time or be cumulative. Williamson v. State, 356 S.W.3d 1, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3432 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 6 2010).

1340. In reviewing whether a video was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court found that (1) the video was probative because it linked defendant with narcotics paraphernalia, (2) the trial court could have found that the State needed the video, (3) the video had a limited potential to impress the jury in an irrational way, and (4) the video only lasted 79 seconds and was not repetitious and thus could not have caused confusion; the court could not say that there was a clear disparity between the danger of unfair prejudice posed by the video and its probative value, and the trial court did not err in overruling defendant's Rule 403 objection. George v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2425, 2010 WL 1269676 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2010).

1341. During defendant's trial for unlawful possession of a firearm and possession of cocaine, the trial court, without abusing its discretion, could have determined that the fact that defendant's adult daughter previously possessed and disposed of a handgun was not probative of any fact of consequence to the determination of defendant's guilt; the court could have determined that any relevance the evidence possessed was substantially outweighed by the danger of confusion of the issues involved in defendant's prosecution. Taylor v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2024, 2010 WL 1027534 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 22 2010).

1342. During defendant's murder trial, the court did not err in admitting a transcript of defendant's conversation with a codefendant because it was highly probative to establish a motive and identity for participating in the murder; evidence of defendant's payment for the commission of the murder, as well as defendant's association with gang assassins, was relevant to show that defendant assisted in the murder and defendant's intent to do so. Reta v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1482, 2010 WL 724395 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2010).

1343. Evidence of extraneous offenses against the victim, defendant's adopted daughter, was highly probative because it demonstrated the history and progression of the relationship between the victim and defendant and provided insight into their states of mind, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, plus the evidence was necessary to help the jury understand why the victim delayed in disclosing the offenses and the State needed the evidence; the trial court could have found that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Saenz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1519 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2010).

1344. When the workers' compensation administrative record was admitted into evidence under Tex. Lab. Code Ann. § 410.306(b), redacted documents properly could have been excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 401 as irrelevant in part and under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because of the likelihood of confusion; thus, the trial court adequately informed the jury of the appeals panel's decision under Tex. Lab. Code Ann. § 410.304(b). Fort Worth Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Seifert, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1575, 2010 WL 730362 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 3 2010).

1345. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to the victim's testimony about all the times he had sexually assaulted her over a two-year period because defendant did not object that the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect; defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection was not sufficient to preserve review under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Mayfield v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1387 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 26 2010).

1347. In a case in which defendant was convicted of theft from a person, there was no merit in defendant's claim that the trial court did not require the State to follow the proper procedure in admitting his accomplice's prior inconsistent statement for impeachment purposes where the trial court did not permit the predicate requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) to be violated because extrinsic evidence of the accomplice's statement to a detective was not offered before the jury, and, furthermore, the trial court took the extra step of instructing the jury that it could only consider the prior statements for impeachment purposes. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the accomplice's version of the events was critical to defendant's prosecution, because the probative value of impeaching the accomplice's potentially untrue testimony was not substantially outweighed by the potential misuse by the jury of his previous statement to the detective, and because the trial court expressly determined that there was no evidence that the State anticipated that the accomplice's trial testimony would be inconsistent with his statements to the detective or that the State called the accomplice as a witness in bad faith. Cervantes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1149, 2010 WL 548503 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 18 2010).

1348. Assuming without deciding that defendant's objection was sufficient to preserve a Tex. R. Evid. 403 complaint, the court could not find that the trial court abused its discretion in admitting the photographs of the victim's body in defendant's capital murder case; defendant did not articulate how the photographs were unduly prejudicial, although the photographs showed some decomposition the body suffered due to the manner defendant chose to dispose of the body, the photographs showed nothing more than the reality of the brutal crime committed, and the extent of the victim's injuries as shown in the photographs was highly probative in light of defendant's claim of self defense. Armstrong v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1133 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 18 2010).

1349. Bearing in mind that the issue before the jury was defendant's punishment, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony about a statement defendant made, given that (1) the evidence did not take an inordinate time to present, (2) there was little danger that the evidence misled or confused the jury, (3) the statement was probative of defendant's personal responsibility and moral culpability and suggested a lack of empathy for the victim and remorse for defendant's conduct, (4) the statement aided the jury in understanding the punishment issues, (5) although the statement might have been prejudicial, it was not unfairly so, and (6) the evidence only suggested that defendant be punished for his moral blameworthiness and his character, which were proper bases for the jury to consider. Dacus v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1072, 2010 WL 546691 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 17 2010).

1350. In defendant's aggravated assault against a public servant trial, assuming the evidence of defendant's mental state was relevant, the trial court was within its discretion to exclude the evidence on the grounds that the probative value of the evidence of defendant's hospitalization three days after the incident was substantially outweighed by the danger that the evidence would confuse the issues under Tex. R. Evid. 403; without being tied to defendant's actions at the time of the offense or having its significance explained in terms of the effect of her mental illness on her perceptions, the fact of her hospitalization might merely evoke fear or pity and affect the jury in some irrational way. Woods v. State, 306 S.W.3d 905, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1106 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 17 2010).

1351. In a case alleging negligent spraying of herbicide, the trial court's exclusion from evidence of a notice of violation, findings, and an order issued by the Texas Agriculture Commission could have been proper under either Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the evidence was potentially confusing or under Tex. R. Evid. 408 because it involved a settlement. Davis v. Jordan, 305 S.W.3d 895, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1151 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 17 2010).

1352. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the contested items, because the evidence defendant complained of was much less graphic and disturbing than the pictures for which he was indicted, defendant's knowledge of and preoccupation with pictures of children, both those that might be termed pornographic and otherwise, was critical to proving the State's case of possession of child pornography, and the items did not distract the jury from their main inquiry, nor, did the evidence create a situation where the jury would give undue credence to the evidence; an officer found the two pictures that were the basis of defendant's indictments, along with computer generated pictures of young girls engaged in various sexual acts, magazine advertisements of children with the heads and faces cut out, adult pornography, and a spiral notebook with handwritten sexually explicit stories about young females. Bolles v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1080, 2010 WL 539684 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 16 2010).

1354. In defendant's felony murder case, a court properly admitted a photo of the victim prior to death because it demonstrated the victim's health and physical characteristics, the photo of the victim while alive furnished a basis of contrast and comparison with other photos showing the wounds inflicted by the assault, and the fact that several witnesses identified the victim did not necessarily reduce the probative value of the photo. Flores v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 822, 2010 WL 411747 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 4 2010).

1355. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting certain messages, which were clearly relevant to motive in defendant's murder trial and the probative value was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect. Lopez v. State, 314 S.W.3d 54, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 725 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 3 2010).

1357. There was no err in excluding the expert's opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 403, because the expert simply opined that the doctor should have ordered that the claimant's arm be x-rayed in order to check for the presence of suspected glass, and the expert failed to show from his testimony that his opinion regarding the doctor's impairment was anything more than one possible scenario. Fitzpatrick v. Watson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 631, 2010 WL 337330 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 29 2010).

1358. In a drug case, a court erred in admitting a picture depicting lewd and salacious activity on the part of defendant during the punishment phase of the trial because the picture was extremely graphic, and the photograph was so inflammatory that it suggested the jury punish defendant for participating in such an act. Padilla v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 674, 2010 WL 337673 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 29 2010).

1359. In defendant's drug case, the court did not err by admitting evidence of an extraneous drug offense because the officer testified that he purchased methamphetamine from defendant, which made the intent to deliver much more probable, and the circumstances of the offense were just a simple transaction, which involved no violence or any potential inflaming factors. The testimony of was not a time consuming part of the trial, and while intent might have been proven by circumstantial evidence, the evidence was needed to rebut the defensive theories brought out during cross-examination of the witnesses. Padilla v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 674, 2010 WL 337673 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 29 2010).

1360. Defendant's complaints to evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 were raised for the first time on appeal and because his argument on appeal did not comport with any objection raised in the trial court, defendant failed to preserve this issue for appellate review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Whitton v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 486, 2010 WL 307911 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 28 2010).

1362. Company did not timely object or request an instruction to disregard, and thus any violation of a limine ruling was waived unless the company could show that an instruction to disregard could not have cured the prejudice; however, the company failed to explain how the testimony in question unfairly prejudiced the case or was calculated to inflame the jury and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a mistrial. Weeks Marine, Inc. v. Barrera, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 438, 2010 WL 307878 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 27 2010).

1363. Defendant claimed the trial court erred in admitting testimony over his Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection, but this same evidence was introduced without objection, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103 and Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), through defendant's own testimony, and thus any error the trial court might have made in admitting the challenged testimony was cured. Philip v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 353, 2010 WL 183524 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 21 2010).

1364. Nothing in the record indicated that the trial court conducted an improper Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis regarding defendant's parole officer's identification testimony, given that (1) the evidence did not possess the potential to impress the jury in some irrational way, (2) nothing indicated that the evidence had an undue tendency to cause the jury to make a decision on an improper basis, (3) the evidence corroborated an accomplice's testimony, (4) the amount of time the State used to develop the testimony covered only four pages of the multi-volume record, and (5) the State needed the evidence, and thus the probative value of the testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Mendez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9785, 2009 WL

5150071 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 30 2009).

1365. In an aggravated assault case, an objection that photographs of dead cattle were irrelevant did not preserve for review a claim that they were prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Walls v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9783, 2009 WL 5150073 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 30 2009).

1366. In defendant's capital murder case, the trial court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress hair-comparison analysis because the hair-comparison analysis was probative because it helped to show the similarity of the hair in defendant's vehicle to the victim's hair. The evidence was not unfairly prejudicial, did not confuse the issues, did not mislead the jury, and was not cumulative. Arciba v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9815, 2009 WL 5155532 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 30 2009).

1367. Testimony about defendant's failure to cooperate with a deputy sheriff and attempt to flee was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as same transaction contextual evidence in a theft case because it tended to establish intent; moreover, its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Matthews v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9816, 2009 WL 5155688 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 30 2009).

1368. Testimony of the officers regarding statements made by and the conduct and demeanor of defendant were properly admitted, because the demeanor and language used by defendant made it more likely that he intended to spotlight the aircraft in that he was angry with the military and was attempting to videotape the helicopter, as opposed to potentially an inadvertent act. Amspacher v. State, 311 S.W.3d 564, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9819 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 30 2009).

1369. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court did not err in admitting evidence that the child was in counseling since the alleged sexual assaults and that defendant's children were removed because evidence regarding the child's need for counseling was probative circumstantial evidence that increased the likelihood that she was sexually abused by defendant, and evidence that it was necessary to remove the children was probative circumstantial evidence that tended to show that the state believed something was occurring that warranted removal. Herrera v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9690, 2009 WL 4981327 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 23 2009).

1370. In defendant's aggravated kidnapping case, the court did not err by admitting extraneous offense involving the same victim because the intent to terrorize, harm, or abuse the victim must have been present prior to or at the particular time; thus, evidence of extraneous misconduct prior to the abduction was relevant apart from showing character conformity because it made more probable the elemental fact of defendant's intent at the time of the abduction. Additionally, only a small percentage of the time expended in the four-day jury trial was devoted to mention of the extraneous offenses. Crews v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9677, 2009 WL 4907423 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 22 2009).

1371. In defendant's capital murder case, the court did not err by admitting photographs of the victims because the photographs were introduced to assist the medical examiner in explaining the injuries and to rebut defendant's self-defense argument. The photographs, particularly the close-ups of the bullet wounds, were gruesome; however, they portrayed no more than the gruesomeness of the injuries inflicted by defendant. Williams v. State, 301 S.W.3d 675, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1751 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1372. In defendant's capital murder case, the court did not err by admitting evidence of extraneous murders because defendant opened the door by deliberately choosing to question the witness about the extraneous murders. The State was presenting the evidence to rebut defendant's claim of self-defense. Williams v. State, 301

S.W.3d 675, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1751 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1373. In defendant's online solicitation case, the trial court did not err by admitting the chat logs between defendant and the officer posing as a teenager because the inherent probative force of the chat logs was considerable as the logs established the sexually explicit content of the chats. That evidence tended to make it more probable than not that defendant had engaged in the online solicitation of a minor. Bailey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9440, 2009 WL 4725348 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 11 2009), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 475, 178 L. Ed. 2d 301, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 7971 (U.S. 2010).

1374. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence because the witness's testimony that defendant threatened him to keep him from testifying was highly probative of defendant's consciousness of his guilt; it was rational to conclude that defendant threatened the witness because he was guilty of the offense. A review of the record showed that the witness's testimony consumed no more than two pages of the record, and the State's need for the evidence was significant because consent was a contested issue and evidence that defendant was conscious of his guilt tended to show that he knew that the victim had not consented. Ramsey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9449, 2009 WL 4755175 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 10 2009).

1375. Autopsy photographs (1) were close-ups of the victim's upper body and torso, (2) did not depict the body in an inflammatory manner, (3) were the only photographs depicting four stab wounds and were not duplicative, and (4) the large incision and chest tube were not the result of an autopsy, but were the result of life-saving attempts by medical personnel, such that the probative value of the exhibits was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and the trial court did not err in admitting them in defendant's murder trial. Green v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9300, 2009 WL 4575146 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 8 2009).

1376. Three of four autopsy photographs admitted into evidence in a murder case were not subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they were not unnecessarily gruesome. The other photo had at most a slight effect on the jury; thus, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Smith v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9297, 2009 WL 4547907 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 7 2009).

1377. In defendant's felony murder case, the court properly excluded evidence that the trooper used the word "psychotic" in his accident report to impeach his trial testimony because the trooper could not properly testify as an expert or lay witness that defendant was psychotic, and therefore, the label had no probative value as primary evidence. Additionally, there was a strong tendency of the evidence to suggest decision on an improper basis, the tendency of the evidence to confuse or distract the jury from the main issues, and the tendency of the evidence to be given undue weight by the jury. Fisher-Riza v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9769, 2009 WL 4358622 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

1378. In a felony murder case, defendant was not harmed by the trial court's exclusion of expert testimony of two of her witnesses on her affirmative defense of insanity because, although relevant and probative of her defense, the excluded testimony was repetitive of the evidence of the history of mental illness, as described by defendant's husband. More importantly, the excluded evidence did not directly pertain to the question of whether defendant was sane at the time of the collision because neither witness ever evaluated defendant for sanity. Fisher-Riza v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9769, 2009 WL 4358622 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

1379. In defendant's indecency with a child case, the court properly allowed testimony of an officer that he had seen defendant watching children on a playground with binoculars because much of the State's case was built around the theory of "grooming" and that defendant spent significant time with the victim; because the bulk of the defensive case consisted of witnesses who said defendant had provided safe child care, that evidence was relevant to rebutting the defensive theory. Additionally, the time spent proving the extraneous act was negligible. Orange v.

State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8934, 2009 WL 3851068 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 19 2009).

1380. Defense opened the door to extraneous offense evidence from another girl, who said defendant sexually assaulted her, when the defense left a false impression that defendant would never commit aggravated sexual assault of a child; while prejudicial, the probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, the girl's testimony was brief and not cumulative, and it could be argued that it had the potential to assist defendant, given that the girl was shaky while testifying, but the victim was calm and composed, which raised the argument that maybe not the same thing happened to the victim. Reyes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8842, 2009 WL 3856198 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 18 2009).

1381. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted evidence from a witness that defendant liked young girls and oral sex because defendant was accused of fondling the breast of his victim and of performing oral sex on the victim who was ten years old, the evidence pertained to defendant's thoughts and did not implicate any conduct on his part, defendant's statements were the primary evidence of his intent and state of mind, and, the State had a significant need for the evidence. Jones v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8923, 2009 WL 3858016 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 18 2009).

1382. Balancing the factors for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting extraneous offense evidence, given that (1) intent of defendant was a contested fact and evidence regarding intent was thus necessary, (2) evidence of the extraneous offense was highly probative as to intent based on timing, (3) the extraneous offense and the current offense were similar, (4) the evidence was not inflammatory or repetitive, and (5) the jury was instructed that the extraneous offense could be considered only in determining intent. Talley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8830 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 17 2009).

1383. While photographs were certainly prejudicial to defendant, they did nothing more than depict the victim's condition after he was struck by defendant, and while graphic, they were not gruesome; furthermore, there was testimony that defendant struck the victim in the face, and the court did not find that the danger of unfair prejudice outweighed the probative value of the photographs, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, and the trial court did not err in admitting them. Nelson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8630, 2009 WL 3734953 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 10 2009).

1384. Evidence that defendant possessed the crack pipe was not unfairly prejudicial, because the trial court overruled the objection after concluding that his possession of the crack pipe was relevant to explain the basis for his arrest and as same transaction contextual evidence, and that the probative value of the evidence outweighed any unfair prejudice; any error was harmless and did not prejudice defendant's substantial rights, as the testimony regarding the crack pipe was brief and matter-of-fact, the State did not seek to emphasize the possession of the pipe and made no further reference to it during the trial, and the only mention of the pipe during closing arguments was by defense counsel. Shrader v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8777, 2009 WL 3806147 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 10 2009).

1385. In defendant's murder case, the court did not err by allowing the State to present the testimony of two witnesses in rebuttal regarding other sexual offenses alleged to have been committed by defendant because the best evidence that the State had to connect defendant to the murder was the fact that defendant had been with the victim until shortly before the murder, the statements of the two seasoned felons, whose credibility had been strongly attacked, and DNA evidence in the vehicle which was not particularly strong. Therefore, the State had a need for the evidence. Additionally, the presentation of the testimony did not take such a great amount of time as to confuse or distract the jury from the main issue of the case. Asberry v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8512 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 4 2009).

1386. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted excerpts from defendant's civil deposition and witness testimony because the defense was theorizing that the victim fabricated the allegations against defendant, and by offering the excerpts where he admitted to performing sexual acts with the witness the State was attempting to show that defendant's claim of fabrication-for-money defense was less probable. The witness's testimony was brief and the court gave a limiting instruction. Slutz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8326 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 29 2009).

1387. In defendant's capital murder trial, a photograph of victim was probative of the victim's appearance and the State took little time developing the evidence, plus this was the only pre-death photograph offered; the court found it unlikely that the photograph, which depicted the victim holding his newborn child, generated any more sympathy than that generated by certain testimony and no mention of the photograph was made during closing arguments, such that the probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Acevedo v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8109, 2009 WL 3353625 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 20 2009).

1388. In defendant's drug case, the court properly admitted evidence of defendant's gang affiliation at sentencing because the presentation of the evidence took only a short time and the probative value of the evidence was high. Defendant's prior admission of his affiliation with a prison gang and the reputation of that gang for commission of offenses, both inside prison and in the general community, was a factor that the jury was entitled to consider in determining defendant's propensity for further criminal activity should he be released from incarceration. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8078, 2009 WL 3335282 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 16 2009).

1389. Because a roommate's testimony helped to affirmatively link defendant to the cocaine found in their apartment and to establish that defendant possessed it with the intent to deliver, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b) to show intent, motive, opportunity, and lack of mistake. Hatcher v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8045, 2009 WL 3326758 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 15 2009).

1390. In defendant's murder case, a witness's testimony that defendant wanted to go kill someone and that he had a gun was not inadmissible evidence of an extraneous offense because defendant's statements and actions made it more probable that he did intend to seriously injure or kill the victim. The fact that he had a gun at the time was prejudicial, but it did not outweigh the probative value of his admission and his action at the time. Walton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8046, 2009 WL 3326759 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 15 2009), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 512, 178 L. Ed. 2d 379, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 8559 (U.S. 2010).

1391. In a murder case, evidence of defendant's drug dealing was properly admitted because, according to a witness, defendant and the victim were rival drug dealers, and proof of motive was important to the State's case because the State was unable to produce an eyewitness who actually saw defendant shoot the victim. The time spent attempting to prove that defendant sold illegal drugs was not out of proportion to the time required to present such evidence. Koy Timon Moore v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7847 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

1392. During defendant's murder trial, the trial court did not err in admitting into evidence certain autopsy photographs, because the probative value of the photographs was not substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403. The doctor used the photographs to explain the nature and extent of the complainant's internal injuries resulting from the blows from the bat; the photographs were no more gruesome than would be expected. Barnes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7931, 2009 WL 3248172 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

1393. In defendant's sexual assault case, evidence was improperly excluded because there was no allegation that the evidence was self-serving or unreliable. The evidence was relevant to the complaining witness's credibility, and further, the State failed to show how the probative value of the evidence was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. State v. Moreno, 297 S.W.3d 512, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7642 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

1394. Court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence of defendant's assaultive behavior occurring prior to, and after, the sexual assault because the extraneous offense evidence was admissible to show the context in which the criminal act occurred because defendant's assaultive behavior was "blended, or connected" to the sexual assault forming an "indivisible criminal transaction." Moreover, the evidence was helpful to the jury in their determination whether defendant used or exhibited a deadly weapon during the "same criminal episode." Quincy v. State, 304 S.W.3d 489, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7645 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 30 2009).

1395. Where defendant told a confidential informant that she was manufacturing methamphetamine at the site, the officer found methamphetamine, manufacturing precursors, and drug manufacturing paraphernalia in plain sight when they executed a search warrant; at defendant's trial for possession of a controlled substance in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.115, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence of additional items found in the camper including: a plastic bag containing 2.2 grams of a white powder believed to be methamphetamine, a twelve gauge shotgun, four lithium batteries, five boxes of pseudoephedrine pills, a wooden box containing miscellaneous drug paraphernalia, a syringe with a clear liquid inside, a bottle of muriatic acid, a bottle of iodine, and a gas generator. The items seized during the search of the camper were relevant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to establish that defendant was in possession of the methamphetamine; the probative value outweighed any prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Judd v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7400, 2009 WL 3019712 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 23 2009).

1396. Decision to admit the extraneous-offense evidence was within the zone of reasonable disagreement, because although the testimony regarding the extraneous sexual assaults had the potential to inflame the jury, the evidence was relevant to rebut defendant's theory of fabrication, the testimony was not particularly graphic, nor lengthy, and the trial court instructed the jury to consider the testimony only for a limited purpose. Abrego v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7288, 2009 WL 2959640 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 16 2009).

1397. Given that (1) witness one's testimony was probative on the issue of defendant's identity and was used to support witness two's testimony and was thus highly probative, (2) the need for the extraneous offense testimony was high because all other identification evidence was disputed, (3) the extraneous offense testimony of witness two did not have the tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis, (4) witness one's testimony did not consume so much time that it would have confused the jury, and (5) witness one's testimony was not cumulative and it was unlikely the jury gave the testimony improper weight, such that the probative value of witness one's testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice and the trial court did not err in admitting witness one's testimony. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

1398. Extraneous offense was highly probative on the issue of identity because of its similarity to the charged offense, the evidence was only introduced after defendant asserted an alibi, thus making the evidence probative to disprove that defense, and all the evidence bearing on identity was disputed, thus elevating the State's need for extraneous offense testimony; given that (1) the testimony was not so graphic or appalling that it would impress the jury in some irrational, but indelible way, (2) the trial court gave a limiting instruction, (3) the extraneous offense testimony was presented after all the evidence of the charged crime was presented and it did not consume an inordinate amount of time, (4) there was nothing about the witness's testimony that would cause jurors to improperly rely on her statements, and (5) her testimony was not repetitive of other evidence already admitted, the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the extraneous offense evidence and the trial court did not err in admitting it. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

1399. Trial court overruling an objection to evidence of extraneous offenses was not required to specify that it had conducted a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test, which it necessarily did when overruling the objection; moreover, the record did not show any confusion, distraction, or undue prejudicial impact resulting from the evidence of extraneous offenses. Martinez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7207, 2009 WL 2914154 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 11 2009).

1400. Even if Tex. R. Evid. 412 was not applicable, the victim's sexual history was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, given that there was nothing reflecting that the prior sexual assault made the victim's lack of consent more or less probable and the probative value, if any, was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect because the evidence had the potential to impress the jury in a irrational and indelible way and defendant cited to little if any need for the evidence. Woods v. State, 301 S.W.3d 327, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 10 2009).

1401. While the extraneous-offense evidence of a prior sex offense was not admissible in defendant's aggravated sexual assault trial under the "doctrine of chances," the defense did open the door to the testimony when it left a false impression with the jury that defendant would never have committed this type of act; while the evidence was certainly prejudicial to defendant, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. The prior victim's testimony was brief and not cumulative, and it could even have been argued that it had the potential to assist defendant. Reyes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6990, 2009 WL 2871893 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 2 2009).

1402. In a civil commitment proceeding involving a sexually violent predator, testimony from a witness that sexual acts with a patient were not consensual was not cumulative; it constituted impeachment or rebuttal because it conflicted with the patient's testimony on this issue. In re Diaz, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6930, 2009 WL 2749958 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 31 2009).

1403. In an aggravated assault case, extraneous conduct of theft of a firearm was properly admitted because the victim testified that defendant had showed him a pistol that defendant had stolen, and it was clear that the evidence was offered to negate defendant's theory that the victim was the first aggressor and establish that defendant intentionally attacked the victim because defendant believed that the victim had "snitched" on him. While the evidence was prejudicial, such prejudice was not unfair. White v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6875, 2009 WL 2914480 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 28 2009).

1404. In a capital murder case, a trial court did not err by refusing to allow the introduction of evidence that a victim had drugs in his system because any probative value the evidence might have had was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 403. The appellate court rejected defendant's argument that the evidence was relevant to the issue of the previous relationship between defendant and the victim and to show the condition of defendant's mind at the time of the offense. Anderson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6809, 2009 WL 2915011 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 27 2009).

1405. In defendant's tampering with a witness case, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence that the victim's father had recently kicked her out of his house because it was uncontested that defendant had previously threatened to kick the victim out if she became pregnant. That evidence served to establish a motive, if any, for the victim to make false accusations against defendant; the additional evidence regarding the victim's father's decision to kick her out, if true, did not lend any additional weight to that theory. Davis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6685 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 26 2009).

1406. In defendant's drug case, the court did not err by allowing the State to introduce evidence regarding defendant's alleged driving while intoxicated stop because testimony regarding the officer's observations of defendant before, during, and after the traffic stop gave the jury information essential to understanding the context and circumstances of defendant's arrest and subsequent charges. The officer described defendant's erratic driving that led to the stop, his physical condition during the stop, and his behavior during the field sobriety tests. Mason v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6705, 2009 WL 2623363 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 26 2009).

1407. In an intoxication manslaughter case, the court properly allowed photos of the scene because, while there were a large number of color photographs, there were no closeups of bodies, defendant's sister was covered, none of the pictures were gruesome, and there was no other way to adequately portray the events to the jury. Martinez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6631 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2009).

1408. Court properly admitted testimony because the witness's testimony rebutted defendant's theory that he did not intend to commit the alleged offense, and the witness's testimony showed that defendant was involved in a similar crime involving intent to commit a robbery subsequent to kidnapping the victim. Additionally, the evidence was presented in a short and concise manner and did not include unnecessarily graphic details. Dale v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6417, 2009 WL 2525421 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 19 2009).

1409. In defendant's manslaughter case, the court properly admitted evidence about an incident in 2004 when defendant pointed a gun at a motorist and pulled the trigger because he testimony of the victim of the deadly conduct was relevant to rebut the defense of accident and mistake in the shooting of the victim. Immediately prior to the testimony, the trial court instructed the jury that the evidence was being admitted for the limited purpose of whether it rebutted the defensive theory of accident. King v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6447, 2009 WL 2517174 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 19 2009).

1410. Court properly admitted evidence that defendant sexually assaulted his step-daughter twenty-five years earlier because both victims were defendant's step-daughters; both were ten when defendant sexually assaulted them; both were similar in appearance; and defendant abused both of them for several years. The State demonstrated that it needed this evidence to rebut defendant's claim of fabrication, and the time needed to develop the evidence amounted to about 116 pages out of the 426 pages of testimony. Newton v. State, 301 S.W.3d 315, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6534 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 19 2009).

1411. Court did not erroneously admit evidence of an undercover drug buy the day before defendant's warrant was executed because the evidence of the undercover buy served to make a fact of consequence--defendant's care, custody, and control of the contraband with intent to distribute--more or less probable than without the evidence. Further, the court instructed the jury that it could consider the evidence of the undercover drug buy only if it believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the offense. Stewart v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6391, 2009 WL 2488504 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 17 2009).

1412. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the recording of a telephone conversation defendant had with his brother while he was incarcerated, given that (1) the contents were not tremendously probative of whether defendant was intoxicated and the contents were not unfairly prejudicial, (2) both sides of the conversation were relevant for the arguable inference that defendant tacitly admitted committing the offense of driving while intoxicated, and (3) while the coarseness of the language used might have offended some jurors, the court was not persuaded that it made the jury more likely to convict defendant; even if the admission of the recording was error, it did not harm defendant, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that (1) defendant admitted that it was his fault for drinking and driving, (2) the arresting officer reported observing signs consistent with intoxication while defendant was driving and while he was performing field sobriety tests, and (3) defendants' blood alcohol concentration was well above the level for legal driving. DiCarlo v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6371, 2009 WL

2476630 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 14 2009).

1413. Defendant did not explain why a jury would infer he was intoxicated because his wife had been arrested for larceny and defendant did not attempt to demonstrate that the evidence was unfairly prejudicial, confused the issues, misled the jury, caused undue delay, or was cumulative, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403; thus, defendant failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to exclude the evidence in his driving while intoxicated trial. Hernandez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6356, 2009 WL 2476523 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 13 2009).

1414. In defendant's assault on a public servant case, the court properly admitted evidence of his prior arrests because the extraneous-arrest evidence was probative of both how well a character witness knew defendant and the foundation for her characterization of him, the trial court gave a limiting instruction, the extraneous arrests took up only four pages in the 564-page record, the question of whether defendant was threatening the officers was directly related to his intent, and the State did not have other evidence with which to rebut the witness's characterization of defendant's character. Morales v. State, 293 S.W.3d 901, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6241 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

1415. Court properly limited cross-examination of a witness because defendant's attempt to use an instance during an officer's career in which he wrote "phantom" warning citations was nothing more than an instance of wrongdoing in his life and was not shown to bear on his general reputation for truthfulness. There was nothing which revealed that the act of wrongdoing created a bias on the part of the officer against defendant or caused the officer to have a motive to testify untruthfully. McMillon v. State, 294 S.W.3d 198, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

1416. Given that the extraneous offense evidence was admissible to rebut defendant's theory of fabrication, the inherent probative value of the evidence was great, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1417. While the offenses were no doubt prejudicial, they were not unfairly so in proportion to their probative value; moreover, the jury received an instruction limiting their consideration of the offenses to the issue of fabrication, and this factor favored admissibility under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1418. Although the State spent some time developing the evidence, it was not excessive and this factor favored admissibility of the extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1419. Because all the factors weighed in favor of admissibility, the extraneous-offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1420. Nine photographs of injuries to a child were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the photographs were taken from different angles and locations, they were no more gruesome than the crime defendant committed, and they were not cumulative in nature. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5920, 2009 WL 2343259 (Tex. App. Dallas July 31 2009).

1421. In a child sexual assault case, the court properly allowed the victim's brother to testify regarding extraneous offenses against him because the boys were the same age when defendant allegedly sexually abused them, and the manner and location of the abuse alleged by the brothers were identical. A substantial part of defendant's cross examination of the victim was devoted to the attempt to undermine the victim's credibility. Boyd v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5970, 2009 WL 2370730 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2009).

1422. In a child sexual assault case, the court properly allowed defendant's daughter to testify regarding extraneous offenses against her because the daughter's testimony tended to show that defendant was a sexual predator, and her testimony also had relevance apart from its tendency to show character conformity. It forcefully served to rebut the defense that defendant was the victim of a retaliatory "frame up." Boyd v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5970, 2009 WL 2370730 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2009).

1423. Given that defendant did not object at trial that photographs were unduly prejudicial, he failed to preserve that issue for appeal, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 and Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1). Wallace v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5794, 2009 WL 2265023 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 29 2009).

1424. Under the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test, the probative value of a witness's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given that (1) the testimony was probative to rebut defendant's defensive theory of a lack of intent, which was an issue in the aggravated kidnapping case, (2) the evidence was presented in a short and concise manner, (3) the testimony was preceded by a limiting instruction, plus the jury charge clarified that the evidence was offered only for its noncharacter conformity purpose of determining defendant's intent, and (4) while the witness's testimony injured defendant's case, it did not adversely affect defendant beyond its purpose of tending to prove his intent to commit the offense, and the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony. Dale v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5784, 2009 WL 2264230 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 29 2009).

1425. On appeal of the order terminating parental rights, the mother's statement of points for appeal preserved her complaint regarding the trial court's admission of an alleged sexual abuse incident between her and her younger brother; the trial court erred in holding that her appeal was frivolous. The evidence had little, if any, connection to the termination suit; such evidence tended to have an extreme prejudicial impact that could give rise to reversible error under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Loehr v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5693 (Tex. App. Austin July 22 2009).

1426. Court properly admitted defendant's threat to take the officer's gun and kill him because that was probative evidence of defendant's precise intentions at the time he was assaulting the officer. It offered significant proof of defendant's commission of the charged offense of attempting to take a weapon from a peace officer with the intention of harming the officer. Presley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5613, 2009 WL 2152559 (Tex. App. Dallas July 21 2009).

1427. Trial court could have found that evidence of defendant's drug dealing, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), had some logical relevance aside from character conformity, plus the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given the other evidence admitted at trial, including evidence of defendant's gang membership; assuming it was error to admit the extraneous offense evidence, defendant's substantial rights were not affected under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that the jury was instructed to use the evidence for the limited purpose of determining a relationship between defendant and another and the drug dealing was not mentioned by the State in closing arguments and thus was not emphasized. Mata v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5410, 2009 WL 2045250 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 15 2009).

1428. Trial court did not err in concluding the probative value of an expert's testimony was not substantially outweighed by the prejudicial harm under Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that (1) the expert's testimony was probative of whether the victim tended to act like other victims of domestic violence, (2) the testimony was in response to defendant's theory that the victim assaulted him and continued to see him, making her assault story against him unlikely, (3) the expert's testimony was not inflammatory, and (4) nothing suggested that the evidence had any tendency to confuse or mislead the jury from the main issues, plus the expert testified that she did not have specific knowledge of the relationship between defendant and the victim. Booker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5541, 2009 WL 2006428 (Tex. App. Dallas July 13 2009).

1429. Defense made no objection as to two felonies, the State offered evidence of these convictions, and defendant did not object or raise a Tex. R. Evid. 403 complaint; thus, he had not preserved that complaint for appellate review, and to the extent that his remoteness objection encompassed these two felonies, they were less than 10 years old and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609. John v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4853, 2009 WL 1815650 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 25 2009).

1430. Trial court's ruling implicitly suggested a probative/prejudicial determination and defendant's 1999 and 2003 felony convictions were sufficient to insulate 1993 offenses from a remoteness objection; applying the proper test, the could held that the evidence of defendant's 1993 convictions was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609. John v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4853, 2009 WL 1815650 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 25 2009).

1431. Inasmuch as the record presented to the court presented no Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to an exhibit, nothing was preserved for review; even if error were preserved, the court saw no reason why any probative value of a picture of blood found at the scene of the crime was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. McGinnis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4799, 2009 WL 1800826 (Tex. App. Eastland June 25 2009).

1432. Inasmuch as one exhibit, an autopsy photograph, showed that there was only one gunshot wound in the victim's mid-right chest and inasmuch as the exhibit was the only autopsy picture showing what appeared to be a surgical incision, the court found that a doctor was describing the incision shown in that exhibit; as with the other exhibits complained of, defendant made no argument of prejudice specific to a photograph and disregarding the surgical incision contained in one exhibit, it depicted the realities of the crime committed and was no more graphic than the rest of the photographs that were admitted into evidence. The presence of the incision was explained to the jury as being the result of medical intervention and the probative value of the testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. McGinnis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4799, 2009 WL 1800826 (Tex. App. Eastland June 25 2009).

1433. Defense counsel's objection to the testimony was untimely because it was not made at the earliest opportunity and consequently, nothing was presented for review; the trial court allowed the testimony as evidence of motive, instructing the jury not to consider the evidence for any other purpose, defendant made no argument or showing on this appeal that the evidence was inadmissible for that purpose and no specific argument why, if properly admitted for that purpose, its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice,a nd the court overruled this claim. McGinnis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4799, 2009 WL 1800826 (Tex. App. Eastland June 25 2009).

1434. Court properly admitted autopsy photographs because, although the pictures were somewhat gruesome, and both were disagreeable to look at, they depicted nothing more than the reality of the brutal crime committed. The photographs were probative of defendant's use of a deadly weapon, the type of wounds sustained, and the brutality and seriousness of the crime, which bore on the issues of guilt and punishment. Rodriguez v. State, 398 S.W.3d 246, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4838, 2009 WL 1801264 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 25 2009).

1435. Where defendant was convicted of three counts of promotion of child pornography and four counts of possession of child pornography, the trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by admitting an exhibit showing a list of subfolders and 900 file names from defendant's computer. For purposes of the balancing test under Tex. R.

Evid. 403, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of undue prejudice; the exhibit was the best and least prejudicial method of rebutting the defense theory that he may have downloaded images of child pornography accidentally or shared them without knowledge of their content. Wenger v. State, 292 S.W.3d 191, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4859 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 25 2009).

1436. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the inherent probative force of the testimony regarding defendant's shooting the gun was its tendency to show that the victim did not willingly get into or remain in the car, and although the testimony was prejudicial, it was not unfairly prejudicial, as the testimony tended to corroborate the victim's testimony that defendant used or exhibited a deadly weapon; defendant agreed the testimony did not consume an inordinate amount of time and the court found that the testimony did not have any tendency to confuse or mislead the jury, such that it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Yepez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4694, 2009 WL 1835330 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 24 2009).

1437. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court properly admitted evidence of an extraneous aggravated robbery because the extraneous offense and the instant offense occurred on the same night, within an hour of each other, in the same area, in each offense, two men approached the complainants while each complainant was in his or her car, held the complainants at gunpoint, and shot the complainants. Additionally, the State's need for the evidence was significant because, although one complainant identified defendant as the second perpetrator, the record also showed that the complainant could not see defendant's face because of the bandana. Hackaday v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4501, 2009 WL 1687957 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 18 2009).

1438. In a capital murder case, a court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence of an aggravated robbery because the offense occurred four days after the charged offense and was compelling evidence tending to prove intent; given the specific instructions provided to the jury that they were only to use the extraneous evidence in consideration of defendant's intent in the death of the victim, it did not impress the jury in some irrational way. Gomez v. Tex., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4521, 2009 WL 1688233 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 18 2009).

1439. In defendant's capital murder case, autopsy photographs were properly admitted because the photographs provided a necessary visual component to, and understanding of, the expert's testimony regarding the nature and extent of the victim's injuries. The photographs were probative because they showed the full extent and non-accidental nature of those injuries; thus, they were necessary for the State to develop its case. Nunez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4476, 2009 WL 1677821 (Tex. App. Dallas June 17 2009).

1440. In defendant's capital murder case, photographs of the victim were not cumulative because one showed injuries to the child's neck and head from a side view, whereas two other photos showed injuries from a frontal view. Williams v. State, 294 S.W.3d 674, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4201 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 11 2009).

1441. Court properly excluded testimony from third parties establishing defendant's knowledge of the complainant's propensity for violence because a witness testified that she saw the complainant hit her mother multiple times, she and other family members had called the police multiple times regarding the complainant's domestic violence, and defendant told a witness after the shooting that defendant thought the complainant was trying to hurt him. Segovia v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4559, 2009 WL 1678024 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 9 2009).

1442. For purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a), a psychiatrist's testimony would have been repetitive of defendant's testimony that he suffered from bipolar disorder and had prescription medication and the psychiatrist could express no opinion as to whether the multiple stabbing was the result of defendant's disorder; thus, defendant failed to elicit any evidence from the psychiatrist that negated the mens rea element of the offense of murder and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the psychiatrist's testimony, nor did the trial court abuse its discretion in ruling that the psychiatrist's testimony did not meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 403 because of unnecessary delay, possible accumulation of evidence, and misleading the jury. Gassaway v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3919, 2009 WL 1547756 (Tex. App. Dallas June 4 2009).

1443. In defendant's manslaughter punishment trial, photographs clarified and developed an officer's testimony concerning the victim's injuries and the circumstances under which her body was found, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photographs, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Ehrhart v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3901, 2009 WL 1547757 (Tex. App. Dallas June 4 2009).

1444. In an aggravated assault case, a trial court did not err by admitting photographs of a victim's injuries over a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the inherent probative force of the photographs was considerable since they provided context for the offense; moreover, they were relevant and necessary for the prosecution to aid the jury in understanding the testimony regarding the extent of the victim's injuries. Even if the photographs were in color, the images were not of such a horrifying or appalling nature that a juror of normal sensitivity would have had difficulty rationally deciding the critical issues of the case after viewing any of them individually or cumulatively; further, they could not have possibly distracted the jury from the issue at hand, the jury was not misled, and the time involved in the introduction of the photographs was minimal. Houston v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4357, 2009 WL 1677860 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 4 2009).

1445. In a civil commitment case involving a sexually violent predator, a trial court acted within its discretion in concluding that the underlying facts or data used by experts were not unfairly prejudicial and that the danger of improper use did not outweigh the value of the facts or data as explanation or support for expert opinions. The trial court did not err in overruling an objection to alleged cumulative and repetitive testimony regarding a patient's sexual convictions, the details of his non-sexual convictions, juvenile convictions, alleged un-adjudicated crimes, and his disciplinary history while incarcerated; moreover, a limiting instruction was not insufficient. In re Commitment of Tolleson, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3660 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 28 2009).

1446. Defense counsel made no specific reference to Tex. R. Evid. 403 and did not succinctly state that the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, but the court believed that counsel's statements were sufficient to bring before the trial court the issue of whether the probative value of the testimony was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice Worthy v. State, 295 S.W.3d 685, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3672 (Tex. App. Eastland May 28 2009).

1447. Probative value of the evidence that defendant's stepbrother was a registered sex offender was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given that (1) the court knew of no other way for the State to show that defendant had little regard for sex offender community supervision conditions and to show the danger he put the victim in by having her unsupervised at his stepbrother's place of residence other than to show that his stepbrother was a registered sex offender, and (2) little time was consumed in presenting the evidence and the evidence was not repetitive. Worthy v. State, 295 S.W.3d 685, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3672 (Tex. App. Eastland May 28 2009).

1448. In a capital murder, case, autopsy photographs were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because their probative value substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice; they were used to show injuries not seen on the surface of a victim's body, and there was no danger that a jury would have attributed autopsy damage to defendant. Wiggins v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4320, 2009 WL 1395928 (Tex. App. Dallas May 20 2009).

1449. Regarding a Tex. R. Evid. 403 issue, the court's review had a somewhat limited scope in that the court had already concluded the evidence was admissible because of a particular line of inquiry by the defense, and thus the court addressed the case law factors in terms of that line of inquiry. Gutierrez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3296, 2009 WL 1335154 (Tex. App. Dallas May 14 2009).

1450. Once the jury had heard evidence that defendant's husband, sister, brother-in-law, and mother had all been investigated by child protective services (CPS) and that the investigator found some CPS history on those people, then evidence of any similar background check on defendant became highly probative in defendant's injury to a child trial; while the evidence would make an impression on the jury, the court viewed that fact in light of the evidence the jury had already heard about other family members, the evidence took minimal time to develop, the State did need the evidence of defendant's background to give a fair treatment of the subject to the jury, and although the court did not question that the evidence was prejudicial to defendant, the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Gutierrez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3296, 2009 WL 1335154 (Tex. App. Dallas May 14 2009).

1451. During defendant's criminal trial for the sexual asault of a child, the State was permitted to introduce extraneous offense evidence that defendant encouraged the victim's involvement in several crimes to rebut defense counsel's opening remarks that defendant was a positive influence on the victim. The trial court determined the extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to correct the false impression created by the defense; the probative value of the evidence substantially outweighed any prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Ytuarte v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3056, 2009 WL 1232327 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 6 2009).

1452. In a professional negligence case, a trial court did not err by excluding evidence of a deceased lawyer's drug and alcohol use during the time that he was representing a client under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the evidence fell short of supporting an inference that the lawyer's performance when negotiating a mediated settlement agreement was actually impaired by alcohol or drugs. Even crediting an opinion that alcohol and drug addiction adversely impacted a lawyer's judgment, there was nothing linking this general observation to the lawyer's performance during the settlement negotiations. Beck v. Law Offices of Edwin J. Terry, Jr., P.C., 284 S.W.3d 416, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2994 (Tex. App. Austin May 1 2009).

1453. Hearsay testimony relating to a DNA results report that a detective had not personally prepared was harmless because a DNA analyst had testified without objection about the test results on the swabs contained in the victim's sexual assault kit; the detective's testimony was cumulative of the DNA analyst's testimony. Alvarez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3039, 2009 WL 1176440 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 30 2009).

1454. In a sexual assault of a child case, evidence that defendant had been subjected to unusual sexual events in his youth and that he related those events to the sexual assault of the child tended to rebut a contention that any contact with the child's penis was simply an accident, and therefore, the evidence was properly admitted. Additionally, the evidence took no additional time to develop initially, and was mentioned again during the trial only when defendant took the stand and denied making some of the statements. Watterson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2938, 2009 WL 1148751 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 29 2009).

1455. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted because it made the defense's theory of fabrication less probable, and the State needed the evidence to rebut defendant's theory of fabrication and frame-up, which was promulgated in opening statements, on cross-examination, during the defense's case-in-chief, and during closing arguments. Wells v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2762, 2009 WL 1108796 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 23 2009).

1456. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted because it made the defense's theory of fabrication less probable, and the State needed the evidence to rebut defendant's theory of fabrication and frame-up, which was promulgated in opening statements, on cross-examination, during the defense's case-in-chief, and during closing arguments. Wells v. State, 2009 Tex. App.

LEXIS 2767, 2009 WL 1108665 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 23 2009).

1457. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted because it made the defense's theory of fabrication less probable, and the State needed the evidence to rebut defendant's theory of fabrication and frame-up, which was promulgated in opening statements, on cross-examination, during the defense's case-in-chief, and during closing arguments. Wells v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2768, 2009 WL 1108663 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 23 2009).

1458. In an intoxication manslaughter case, the trial court's decision to exclude the statements at issue did not violate the doctrine of optional completeness because the officer's testimony that people at the scene said they saw what happened did not leave a false impression with the jury, and the excluded statements were not necessary to fully understand the officer's testimony; he further testified that people were approaching him while he was laying the flare line on the scene and that he gave one person a stack of affidavits so that witnesses could begin writing down what they saw. The officer testified that he did not talk to every witness on the scene, thus informing the jury that not all witnesses testified at trial. Mole v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2838, 2009 WL 1099433 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 23 2009).

1459. In defendant's capital murder case, an autopsy identification photograph of the victim was properly admitted at the guilt phase of trial because it was relevant and not cumulative of the autopsy photographs exhibiting the wounds. The complained-of picture was not particularly gruesome or detailed, it was not enhanced in any way, and it portrayed no more than the condition of the victim due to the injuries inflicted. Young v. State, 283 S.W.3d 854, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 979 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1460. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly permitted the admission of evidence at punishment regarding an extraneous shooting incident because defendant's out-of-court admissions that he committed the act of misconduct, along with his possession of the weapon and forensic evidence, constituted "clear proof" that he committed the extraneous offense. The trial court did not err in holding that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Young v. State, 283 S.W.3d 854, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 979 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1461. Defendant pleaded guilty to assault and aggravated assault and several exhibits were introduced concerning previous charges and convictions, plus many other unadjudicated bad acts were introduced; thus, even if the failure to object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to certain unadjudicated bad acts was error, which the court did not decide, the error did not deprive defendant of a fair trial. Schroeder v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2688, 2009 WL 1035223 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 16 2009).

1462. In a sexual assault of a child case, evidence of defendant's arrest for possession of child pornography was properly admitted because it explained the reason for the investigation of defendant, the State needed it to adequately describe the circumstances of the charged offenses, and the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Greene v. State, 287 S.W.3d 277, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2855 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 16 2009).

1463. In a sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of statements defendant made to a witness and the child about his feelings for the child because it was relevant to, and highly probative of, defendant's state of mind and the relationship between defendant and the child. The record did not demonstrate that the probative value of this evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Greene v. State, 287 S.W.3d 277, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2855 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 16 2009).

1464. Court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence because the extraneous offenses admitted tended to "make the existence" of a fact of consequence "more probable" and established that: defendant's gang was a criminal street gang, defendant had an affiliation with the gang, and defendant committed the instant offense as a member of a criminal street gang. Furthermore, the probative force and the State's need to admit the extraneous offenses outweighed the factors that favored exclusion; the evidence was not only relevant, but essential to the State's burden of proof. Fuentes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2544, 2009 WL 997508 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 14 2009).

1465. Defendant's conviction for capital murder was appropriate because a crime-scene video was relevant to show the victim's death and the consistency of the physical evidence with an eyewitness' testimony. It did not involve an unusual and overwhelming emotional impact. Jones v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5866, 2009 WL 988647 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 13 2009).

1466. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in preventing defendant from (1) cross-examining the complainant about the contents of the medical records when defendant took her to the hospital to be examined for a possible sexual assault; (2) offering those records into evidence if the complainant denied their accuracy; and (3) preventing defendant from offering testimony that the complainant told a friend that the sexual activities that night were consensual and with her boyfriend, not assaultive with defendant. There was nothing in the record that would support a finding that the prejudicial effect of this evidence outweighed its probative value. Hammer v. State, 296 S.W.3d 555, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 513 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1467. During the punishment phase of defendant's murder trial, the trial court acted within her discretion by excluding evidence that the victim was a registered sex offender. This kind of comparative evidence offered to mitigate defendant's punishment by showing that the victim's life was of little value was unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Hayden v. State, 296 S.W.3d 549, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 510 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1468. Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors weighed in favor of admissibility of close-up photos of the victim because (1) the photos contained substantial probative value about the crime scene, the injuries received by the victim, and the State's theory that defendant's actions were intentional and not done in self-defense; (2) the photographs had very little potential to impress the jury in an irrational way because they were not overly gruesome; (3) the State took very little time in developing the testimony about the photos; and (4) the State needed the photos because there were no other close-up, crime-scene photos of the victim's wounds and the blood pattern from the wounds. Thus, the probative value of the photos was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice and the photos were admissible. Martinez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2274, 2009 WL 884785 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 3 2009).

1469. Because the State had to prove that defendant had two prior driving while intoxicated (DWI) convictions, the State's two exhibits were relevant to establish an element of the offense of felony DWI and to demonstrate that defendant was the same person as the person convicted of the prior two DWIs; thus, the value of these records was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury when defendant had not stipulated to the prior convictions, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Paschall v. State, 285 S.W.3d 166, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2201 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 2 2009).

1470. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting crime-scene photographs despite defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the five photographs were not exactly alike, were not unnecessarily duplicative, took almost no time to introduce into evidence, and had very little, if any, potential to impress the jury in an irrational but indelible way. The photos were relevant to show the circumstances of the killing and the crime scene at the time. Hilliard v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2429, 2009 WL 838241 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

1471. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting nine autopsy photographs despite defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because there was only one photograph of each gunshot wound showing its general location on the victim's torso and only one close-up view of it. The photographs were not duplicative and showed only the extent and nature of the wounds; the assistant medical examiner referred to all of the photographs during her testimony. Hilliard v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2429, 2009 WL 838241 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

1472. In an aggravated sexual abuse of a child case, evidence of physical violence perpetrated upon a victim was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2 because it showed the relationship between defendant and the victim both before and after the alleged assault; moreover, threats to the child showed why a prompt outcry was not made, and the evidence showed defendant's dominance over the victim. Even though the physical abuse evidence was horrific and undoubtedly prejudicial to defendant, it was probative and the Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors, when considered as a whole, did not clearly weigh in favor of holding that the evidence's unfair prejudice substantially outweighed its probative value; this was a close case because, even though the State needed to introduce the evidence to show why the victim waited years to make an outcry and testimony regarding this evidence did not take up an inordinate amount of time, there was a definite tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis, and the evidence tended to distract the jury from the main issue in the case. Gamble v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2134, 2009 WL 806879 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 27 2009).

1473. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of voice messages defendant left for his former girlfriend in which he threatened to kill her husband because the evidence was properly admitted to prove defendant's knowledge and intent; a reasonable person could view the messages as creating an inference that defendant, knowing he would see the husband that day, intentionally brought the gun with him in order to harm or further threaten the husband. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objections because the messages were left a few hours before defendant drove to the husband's home with a gun in the back of his truck, the trial court specifically directed the State not to delve into the details of the messages, the time the State needed to admit the messages was minimal, and the evidence was an integral part of the State's theory that defendant took the gun with him to further threaten the husband. Rice v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2062, 2009 WL 790178 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2009).

1474. Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not violated where the trial court allowed extraneous offense evidence, namely that defendant's confidential informant had twice before planted fake drugs to frame an innocent person, to be admitted during defendant's trial on charges of knowingly making false statements in a police report and aggravated perjury for making the same false statements under oath because the evidence made facts of consequence, the falsity of defendant's statements and his knowledge that those statements were false, more likely. The evidence that defendant committed the extraneous acts was strong, as in each instance the confidential informant and the set-up dealer testified that there was no contact or delivery; the accuracy of defendant's statement that he saw the confidential informant and the suspect in the instant case make contact and his knowledge of its accuracy were the two hotly contested issues at trial, and the extraneous acts had high probative value in showing that defendant repeatedly put false statements of what he purportedly saw during the buy-bust deals in his reports. De La Paz v. State, 279 S.W.3d 336, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 426 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1475. In defendant's aggravated assault case, evidence of third-party threats against the complainants was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the evidence that the two key eyewitnesses had been threatened, which would explain inconsistencies in their testimony, was indirectly probative of all of the elements of the charged offense. Additionally, the State's need for the testimony about threats--the only evidence available to explain the witnesses' inconsistent accounts of who was present during the shooting--was considerable, and the evidence of threats that was presented to the jury consumed only forty-three lines of testimony. Cox v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1902, 2009 WL 807491 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 19 2009).

1476. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the utility knife, the pocket knife, and wire cutters that were found on defendant's person after his arrest into evidence because the items were probative, as they showed defendant's intent as well as the context and circumstances of his actions of entering the victims' garage, and the probative value did not substantially outweigh the risk of unfair prejudice. The State spent relatively little time developing the evidence and the evidence did not have a tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis. Enloe v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 19 2009).

1477. In a murder case, evidence of a prior relationship between defendant and his victim was properly admitted into evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a); moreover, the evidence was not offered to show that defendant acted in conformity with his propensity for violence, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Evidence that defendant had beaten the victim in the past was no more inflammatory or prejudicial than the evidence that he beat the victim on the night of the murder. Chavez v. State, 399 S.W.3d 168, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1840, 2009 WL 700658 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 18 2009).

1478. In a murder case, the court properly admitted evidence of a subsequent shooting involving defendant because, in both cases, defendant fired a gun from the driver's side window, once when he was sitting on the passenger side, both incidents occurred in the early morning, and in each instance defendant was responding to a perceived slight to one of his friends, rather than to himself, by conducting a drive-by shooting. Additionally, defendant's alibi defense and challenges to witness credibility raised identity, and in light of the importance of proving the identity of the perpetrator, the State had a strong need for the challenged evidence. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1725, 2009 WL 585986 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 10 2009).

1479. In a case involving aggravated assault using a deadly weapon, a trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's other convictions involving the same complainant under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the State needed the evidence to explain the complainant's fear of defendant, and the evidence was not confusing, distracting, or cumulative. The prior convictions were addressed briefly, no details of the offenses were revealed, and the presentation of the evidence did not take an inordinate amount of time. Miranda v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1727, 2009 WL 586005 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 10 2009).

1480. Defendant limited one issue to the admissibility of a sexual assault nurse examiner's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 and he did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 or request a balancing test; thus, the court limited its review solely to determining whether the nurse's testimony had any relevance to the issues contested at trial in defendant's sexual assault trial. Shackelford v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1441, 2009 WL 508478 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 3 2009).

1481. Case law held that a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection was not implicitly contained in relevancy or Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objections and rather, a specific Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection had to be raised to preserve error; the court does not hold, however, that a litigant must expressly invoke "Rule 403" to preserve error. Shackelford v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1441, 2009 WL 508478 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 3 2009).

1482. Court erred in failing to instruct the jury to disregard the State's reference to plea negotiations because, given the manner in which the State's question to defendant was posed, one could reasonably interpret it as disclosing that plea negotiations had occurred, that potential offers were made and rejected, and that defendant's desires presented the major obstacle to arriving at a bargain. Bowley v. State, 280 S.W.3d 530, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1448 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 2 2009).

1483. In a case involving indecency with a child, testimony from defendant's former wife regarding defendant's sexual behavior with neighborhood boys and with his niece was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because it was helpful to the jury in determining an appropriate sentence, and any issues relating to truthfulness or a lack of specificity went to the weight, not the admissibility, of the evidence and was for the jury to determine; moreover, the extraneous offense testimony was not inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was probative, it would not have irrationally impressed the jury, the time needed to develop the evidence was minimal, and the State needed the evidence. To the extent the evidence showed defendant's sexual conduct with children, it was not unfairly prejudicial. Orr v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4152, 2009 WL 485502 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 27 2009).

1484. Trial court did not err by admitting autopsy photos during the punishment phase of a murder trial because they were not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403; they had probative value, they did not show mutilation, the presentation of the photos constituted only a few pages of the record, and they were necessary to determine punishment. Defendant had entered a plea of guilty to the charge, but was before the jury seeking community supervision as punishment. Farnsworth v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1038, 2009 WL 349799 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

1485. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, prior bad acts evidence was properly admitted at sentencing because the collective testimony was probative of defendant's ongoing, repeated pattern of abuse, which the witnesses could not individually establish, and the collective testimony assisted the jury in evaluating defendant's character and his moral blameworthiness for punishment purposes. Cintron v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 889, 2009 WL 330963 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 11 2009).

1486. Trial court could have reasonably concluded that (1) defendant's half-brother's testimony did not substantially outweigh its prejudicial value. (2) the State's need for the evidence was considerable since it suggested that defendant misled the jury about the reason for his expulsion from the family home, and (3) the half-brother's testimony did not tend to suggest that the jury decide the case on an improper basis; the conduct in which the half-brother testified that appellant engaged with him, inappropriate touching and oral genital contact, was no more serious and potentially inflammatory than the offense defendant was charged with committing against the victim in this aggravated sexual assault trial and the testimony did not confuse or distract the or take an inordinate amount of time, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the probative value of testimony outweighed any unfairly prejudicial impact and the testimony was admissible under the rule of optional completeness. Goodwin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 875, 2009 WL 311457 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 10 2009).

1487. Determination that evidence was relevant under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 did not end the inquiry, as the court still had to balance whether the evidence's probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Gonzalez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 879, 2009 WL 311448 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 10 2009).

1488. Defendant's previous molestation of his daughter offered relevant evidence about his relationship with her and to rebut his defensive theory, the daughter's testimony was detailed and brief on this matter, and her graphic descriptions of the main events surrounding the offenses overshadowed any inflammatory response the jury might have had to the testimony, and thus the court found defendant was not unfairly prejudiced by the testimony and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting it. Gonzalez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 879, 2009 WL 311448 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 10 2009).

1489. Because the record was silent as to the trial court's balancing of the factors, the court presumed the trial court conducted the balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Mathis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1466, 2009 WL 3003252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 10 2009).

1490. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting extraneous offense evidence in defendant's capital murder trial, given that (1) the evidence tended to make some facts more or less probable, (2) it was unlikely that the jury was impressed in an indelible way by admission of a pistol, marijuana, and bullets, (3) the State did not emphasize the evidence or spend an inordinate amount of time developing the evidence, despite the State's need to development evidence in light of the circumstantial case, and (4) in considering the overwhelming evidence of defendant's guilt, it was unlikely that the evidence had anything more than a slight effect on the jury's considerations. Mathis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1466, 2009 WL 3003252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 10 2009).

1491. In a case involving the possession of hydrocodone, the State was properly allowed to introduce extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) showing that defendant had subsequently been arrested for the same offense because this rebutted defendant's assertions that was unaware that the pills were in his car and that they belonged to someone else. Moreover, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Smith v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 751, 2009 WL 279490 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 5 2009).

1492. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection was properly overruled; a miniature dildo possessed significant probative value based on one child's allegations, the presence of condoms in a married couple's home was not prejudicial, and the prejudicial value of an adult magazine was limited since there was other evidence of pornography in the home. Rousseau v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 380, 2009 WL 141857 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 22 2009).

1493. Evidence of defendant's serial drug dealing had a significant potential to inflame the jury's perception of defendant as a criminal in general, and taken in conjunction with the charged crime of conspiracy to commit capital murder and the fact that several of the State's witnesses were prison or jail inmates relating statements made to them by defendant while incarcerated with him, there was a substantial amount of evidence before the jury which could very well have affected its view of defendant in an irrational or indelible manner; while motive was not an element which must be proven in defendant's case, it was nonetheless an appropriate and permissible area of evidence, and evidence of defendant's history of drug dealing had at least the potential to unfairly prejudice the jury, such that this factor weighed against admission of the evidence. Toliver v. State, 279 S.W.3d 391, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 345 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 21 2009).

1494. About 23 percent of the State's case centered on extraneous offenses, plus the State played three videos of the drug transactions in question; while bearing in mind the complexity and difficulty of proving conspiracy, the court nonetheless found that the amount of time used to prove the extraneous offenses here weighed against their admission. Toliver v. State, 279 S.W.3d 391, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 345 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 21 2009).

1495. While the State had other competent evidence tending to prove the conspiracy to commit capital murder, the court could not say that the State did not have some need for the extraneous offense evidence, especially considering the degree that the harsh penalties to which defendant was susceptible for the drug delivery charges would serve as motive for the conspiracy and the integral part which the proposed victim of the murder plot would have played as a witness in defendant's pending trials; the court was not in a position to determine which parts of the evidence should have been excluded and it was this kind of decision that was in the trial court's discretion, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative nature of the State's proffered extraneous-offense evidence. Toliver v. State, 279 S.W.3d 391, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 345 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 21 2009).

1496. After finding the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the extraneous evidence, the court next reviewed the trial court's balancing of the prejudicial nature of this evidence against its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Toliver v. State, 279 S.W.3d 391, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 345 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 21 2009).

1497. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, evidence of defendant's sales of cocaine was relevant to the issue of his motive to conspire to kill the victim; there was substantial evidence of defendant's guilt in the delivery of controlled substance cases, which would have subjected him to some of the highest penalty ranges available, and the victim's potential testimony would have been an integral part of any successful prosecution of those cases, and thus this factor weighed in favor of the admission of the extraneous-offense evidence. Toliver v. State, 279 S.W.3d 391, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 345 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 21 2009).

1499. In an aggravated assault case, defendant failed to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1) regarding the testimony of a former army investigator about a prior murder that defendant committed because an objection was not made when essentially the same testimony was given by defendant's girlfriend. Even if the error was preserved, the trial court did not err by applying the presumption of admissibility under Tex. R. Evid. 403; the circumstances surrounding the twenty-five-year-old murder and those surrounding the present charge were very similar, the State limited the information provided to the jury by having the investigator briefly testify as to the facts surrounding the prior murder, and the investigator's testimony provided the jury with an understanding of defendant's prior history of violence towards women. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 324, 2009 WL 112774 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 15 2009).

1500. Court properly excluded defendant's "alternative perpetrator" evidence because, although defendant suggested that the testimony of a witness raised the possibility that the child was injured before the time that defendant babysat for her, the testimony by the other witnesses offered no corroboration to that theory. To the extent that the proffered evidence would have been even marginally relevant to the defense theory, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that its probative value was substantially outweighed by confusing the issues or misleading the jury. Contreras v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 91, 2009 WL 50601 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 8 2009).

1501. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault case, the trial court properly excluded evidence of drug use at the victim's home because the fact that two of the victim's parents' house guests used cocaine in their bathroom had no probative value of a material fact issue in this case. The extraneous offense, the victim's mother's house guests using cocaine in the bathroom, did not tend to make the existence of a material fact -- whether defendant sexually assaulted the victim -- more or less probable. Mendenhall v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 22 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2009).

1502. Evidence that defendant failed to appear in 1999 and that his bond was forfeited was relevant and admissible as evidence of guilt, and defendant failed to present any evidence showing that his failure to appear was not flight from prosecution, plus he presented no argument that the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403; thus, he did not show that the trial court abused its discretion or committed reversible error in admitting the evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Pratte v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9716 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 31 2008).

1503. During defendant's criminal trial for burglary of a building, the trial court overruled defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to the prejudicial effect of testimony about his methamphetamine addiction. The Court of Appeals of Texas held that the failure to reassert his earlier objection waived the issue for appellate review in accordance with Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Greenlee v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9438 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 19 2008).

1504. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence that defendant tried to flee from police during his arrest because it was relevant, as defendant failed to show that his flight was unconnected to the capital murder offense based on his testimony that he did so because he was wanted for a probation violation and did not want to go back to jail. The evidence was probative because it showed the context and circumstances of defendant's arrest, the State spent relatively time developing the evidence, and the evidence did not have a tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis or that it impressed the jury in an irrational way. Baker v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9416 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 18 2008).

1506. In defendant's drug case, any error by the admission of testimony concerning the search warrant being assigned to the gang unit was harmless because, by the time the officer testified, the following evidence had already been admitted: defendant claimed membership in the past in two gangs, and defendant had gang membership tattoos and photographs of the tattoos were admitted into evidence. Cedillo v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9485 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 18 2008).

1507. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to question the victim and her mother about whether the victim had made an outcry against her grandfather because even if the grandfather had abused the victim, that did not bear on whether defendant also abused her. Defendant did not establish a connection between the grandfather and the abuse the victim alleged. Ruiz v. State, 272 S.W.3d 819, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9491 (Tex. App. Austin 2008).

1508. Defendant complained that the admission of evidence that he had left a note containing his name, jail address, and other information in the women's room was irrelevant and prejudicial; however, the trial court determined that the probative value of the evidence was substantial. Wilson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9395 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 17 2008).

1509. Because defense counsel failed to lay any predicate regarding the inception of defendant's tattoos, the existence or non-existence of the tattoos was not relevant to identification and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in disallowing the evidence; one victim identified defendant and another victim did not recall seeing any tattoos, such that it would have been improper for defendant to show his tattoos to the jury without an explanation of when they were acquired, and without the proper predicate, the proffered evidence was not relevant and was more prejudicial than probative. Harris v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9474 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 16 2008).

1510. In a driving while intoxicated case, a booking photograph of defendant was not excluded from evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it was not unfairly prejudicial; even though the picture was not flattering, it did not have the potential to impress the jury in some irrational way. Moreover, it was relevant to show defendant's condition near the time of arrest. Hester v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9242 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 15 2008).

1511. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when the State sought to introduce into evidence State's exhibit number 12 because there was nothing in the record to indicate that the trial court did not perform a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test or that the trial court refused to include its findings on the record. Kneeland v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9249 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 11 2008).

1512. In a theft case arising from defendant's failure to complete a construction contract, evidence that defendant had done the same thing to another person was not excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the testimony was very compelling to prove defendant's intent to commit theft, rather than a failure to perform due to circumstances out of his control. The evidence was quickly and clearly presented such that it did not take too much time and was not confusing; moreover, the testimony was not so outrageous that it would affect the jury in an indelible way, and a jury instruction likely would not have had any effect. Gill v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9261 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 11 2008).

1513. In a drug case, extraneous offenses regarding other transactions were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. The evidence in question tended to show that an undercover officer had the opportunity to observe and listen to defendant on more than one occasion, the trial court instructed the jury to only consider the evidence for purposes of determining motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, the testimony took up only five pages of the trial transcript, and it tended to rebut the insinuation raised by defendant that he had not engaged in drug activity before. Stebbins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9199 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 10 2008).

1514. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a photograph of defendant holding a pistol during his trial for possessing more than four grams of cocaine with intent to deliver and for possessing more than four ounces of marihuana where the photograph was relevant because it made it more probable that defendant knowingly possessed both the contraband and the pistol, and where that relevance was not outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice because no significant amount of time was required to introduce the photograph. Furthermore, even though the photograph had the potential for impressing the jury in an improper way pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by suggesting that defendant was the sort of person who brandished a pistol during a telephone conversation, by linking defendant to the pistol found in the night stand of his motel room, albeit indirectly, the photograph was some evidence that defendant used the pistol to protect his drugs and money, and the State's only other evidence of such use, beyond defendant's simple possession of the weapon, was a police officer's testimony describing defendant's ambiguous movements when the officers entered his motel room. Rangel v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9008 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 5 2008).

1515. In an aggravated assault case, a trial court did not err by allowing a victim's father to testify during the guilt/innocence phase of the case because his brief testimony, which included basic information about himself, the victim, the evening of the shooting, and the victim's condition, was relevant and not overly prejudicial. Sanchez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9072 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 4 2008).

1516. In defendant's drug case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting in evidence the shotgun found on the back seat of the vehicle that defendant was driving just before his arrest because the probative value of the shotgun was considerable and significantly necessary to the State's case because it was a link tending to show that defendant knowingly possessed the cocaine. Additionally, the evidence of the shotgun was relevant to prove defendant's knowledge that he possessed narcotics. Harris v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9090 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 4 2008).

1517. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child under fourteen years of age, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence of defendant's extraneous acts involving the victim where: (1) the evidence of physical abuse gave compelling insight as to why the incident at issue transpired and why the victim waited so long to tell anyone; (2) the State demonstrated a considerable need to develop the evidence because the physical abuse evidence corroborated the victim's testimony that he feared for his life and that his fear was the reason he was afraid to tell anyone about the sexual abuse for so many years; (3) presenting the jury with the victim's brief testimony and the short testimony from two later witnesses concerning the physical abuse did not lead to a decision on an improper basis; (4) the evidence did not have a tendency to confuse or distract the jury from the main issues; (5) the evidence did not have a tendency to be given undue weight by the jury because, even though the abuse details were horrific, the evidence went straight to the important issue of why the victim waited six years to speak out by explaining the basis for his belief that defendant might kill him; and (6) developing the evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Under the circumstances, the Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors weighed in favor of the trial court admitting the evidence of extraneous offenses under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37. Gamble v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8914 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 26 2008).

1518. Extraneous offense witness testimony strongly served to make the sexual assault on the victim more probable, given that the offenses were very similar, the State had a great need for the evidence, as consent was the only issue in the case and the State had no uncontested evidence to prove that the sexual encounter was without the victim's consent, and the presentation of the extraneous offense testimony did not take such a great amount of time as to have confused or distracted the jury; the evidence did not present any unnecessary cumulative evidence and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the extraneous offense evidence over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. Yarbrough v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9056 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 26 2008).

1519. Given the similarity of the assailant's modus operandi and the relative proximity of the rape, plus the witnesses' in-court identification of defendant, the extraneous offense evidence was compelling as to the issue of identity, as the defense impeached the victim on the issue of identity, thus providing the State with a reason to develop the extraneous offense evidence in defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault; the victim's description of her attacker and the modus operandi of the crime matched the other two offenses, making the victim's identification of defendant more probable, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the extraneous offenses, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b). Jabari v. State, 273 S.W.3d 745, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8814 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2008).

1520. Admission of the extraneous offenses carried a risk of irrationally impressing the jury of defendant's character conformity, which the law seeks to avoid, but the trial court gave a limiting instruction and the testimony in question did not take up a significant portion of the trial for aggravated sexual assault, and the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence. Jabari v. State, 273 S.W.3d 745, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8814 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2008).

1521. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault, the State's need for extraneous offense evidence was strong, given the victim's initial struggle to identify defendant as her attacker and her impeachment by the defense, and the trial court was within the zone of reasonable disagreement when it ruled that the probative value of the evidence of two unadjudicated extraneous offenses was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Jabari v. State, 273 S.W.3d 745, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8814 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2008).

1522. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence a videotaped interview of the daughter taken by a forensic investigator because, although the interview contained information similar to the daughter's prior testimony, it was not needlessly cumulative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the videotape rebutted the defense's effort to impugn her motive for report that defendant had sexually assaulted her; the videotape was recorded closer in time to the incidents and included the daughter's reluctance to report the abuse, which was not present in her trial testimony. For the same reasons, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the videotape over defendant's bolstering objection. Biggers v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8439 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 6, 2008).

1523. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by permitting the State to question him regarding a statutory rape charge filed against him in 1983 because the statutory rape charge and testimony were relevant rebuttal evidence to show the jury that the victim's parents were not motivated by greed or money in making the allegations against defendant. Additionally, State did not elicit detailed accounts of the offenses, but only asked a few questions in order to show similarities to the charged offenses, and other than the details and circumstances of the charged offenses, the State had no other evidence to rebut the defensive theory. Martin v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8437 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 6, 2008).

1524. Trial court did not err, under Tex. R. Evid. 403, in admitting evidence that defendant possessed the stolen property found in his girlfriend's car because (1) the evidence of the stolen property tended to prove that he intended to commit the current burglary offense; (2) although there was some risk that the jury might convict defendant solely because they believed that he committed an extraneous offense, that risk did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence as it pertained to his intent; (3) it was highly unlikely that the evidence about the previously stolen items distracted the jury from the indicted offense; and (4) the issue of intent was disputed, and the extraneous offense evidence strengthened the inference that defendant had intended to commit a theft. Kirksey v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8429 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 6, 2008).

1525. Trial court did not err in finding that the potential character conformity inference did not substantially outweigh the relevant purpose of showing motive for the aggravated sexual assault with evidence of defendant's skinhead and neo-Nazi affiliation, given that (1) the evidence was probative for establishing motive, (2) the record did not support the notion that the evidence was going to tend to impress the jury in an irrational manner, (3) the trial court instructed the jury to consider defendant's other bad acts only for the purposes of determining the motive and intent, (4) the court presumed the jury followed the trial judge's instructions, (5) the evidence was developed quickly, and (6) although the evidence was not essential to the State's case, the State had a compelling reason for presenting the evidence. Tuck v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8525 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 30 2008).

1526. In his brief, defendant did not cite authority to support his issues regarding victim photographs, which violated Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h), but in the interest of justice, the court addressed the issues; the victim testified that the pictures accurately depicted their injuries, although two pictures depicted one victim's bloodied face, the pictures were not overly gruesome, and the pictures enabled the State to show the level and extent of the injuries the victims sustained, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the photographs, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Garza v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7004 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 19, 2008).

1527. Defendant argued that a deputy's employment of the horizontal gaze nystagmus test was not reliable for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 705(c), and the testimony was not only not helpful to the jury, but was misleading and unfairly prejudicial, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, 702, but defendant's objection, which referred broadly to the deputy's administration of the test, was not specific enough to have informed the trial court of the basis of the argument defendant now raised on appeal so as to have afforded the trial court the opportunity to rule on it, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 103; thus, defendant waived error, if any. Gowin v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6873 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 17 2008).

1528. In defendant's murder case, photographs of the victim's boyfriend's injuries were properly admitted because they assisted the doctor's descriptions of the boyfriend's injuries, and they were highly probative to show the full extent of the injuries the boyfriend suffered at the hands of defendant, who had claimed self-defense. Young v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 17, 2008).

1529. In defendant's murder case, a photograph of the victim's body at the crime scene was properly admitted because the photograph was probative of both the manner of the victim's death and defendant's mental state, given that he argued self-defense. The State used very little time introducing the photograph, and while gruesome, it depicted nothing more than the reality of the brutal crime committed by defendant. Young v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 17, 2008).

1530. In defendant's murder case, photographs of the victim's autopsy were properly admitted because the three photographs were necessary to assist the witness with explaining her testimony about the victim's stab wounds, especially given the fact that no one injury caused the victim's death. They were highly probative to show the full extent of the injuries defendant inflicted on the victim. Young v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 17, 2008).

1531. In an arson and drug case, the court properly admitted evidence of defendant purchase of pseudoephedrine because defendant's purchases during the four months leading up to the fire were probative evidence of defendant's intent to unlawfully manufacture methamphetamine. The State needed that probative evidence to demonstrate a required element of the crime, the admission of the evidence was not repetitious, and it did not take an inordinate amount of time to present. Stone v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6738 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 10, 2008).

1532. In an aggravated assault case, while evidence of defendant's gang affiliation may have had some influence on the jury, and while the State's argument played to the emotional aspect of gang wars in the community, it was not so emotionally charged as to prevent the jury from rationally considering the evidence before it. The evidence was properly admitted as the State used the evidence during cross-examination of witnesses and it was used to prove both defendant's motive in the knifing incident and that the girlfriend feared defendant. Salinas v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6910 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 10, 2008).

1533. For purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a), defendant's membership in a prison gang was relevant to the circumstances of the murder and the evidence was not offered solely to show that defendant murdered the victim because he acted in conformity with his bad character; for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the probative force and the State's need to admit evidence that the victim and defendant were members of the same prison gang outweighed factors that favored exclusion, as the evidence of guilt was so compelling, the gang evidence did not consume inordinate time, and such was not mentioned in closing argument. Vasquez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6831 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 4, 2008).

1534. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's statement, which contained a list of persons to whom defendant admitted he had sold methamphetamine as well as his admissions that he had bought approximately a half-ounce of methamphetamine every week for the last three years, that he used about a quarter-ounce every week, that he sold the rest, and that he sold enough methamphetamine to support his habit, because those portions of the statement that related to defendant's selling methamphetamine were relevant to proving intent to deliver, which was an essential element of defendant's offense, possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Furthermore, the probative force and the State's need to admit the statement outweighed the factors that favored exclusion because defendant's admission that he regularly sold methamphetamine was compelling evidence that he intended to sell methamphetamine, and his admission further served to rebut his theories that the drugs were planted on him and that the money that he carried when he was arrested had come, not from selling drugs, but from payments from his rental properties. Bridges v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6634 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 29, 2008).

1535. Trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting a memo that lacked probative value and arguably contained an ethnic slur, which inflamed the jury and resulted in unreasonably high damage findings for a mineral lease breach. Coastal Oil & Gas Corp. v. Garza Energy Trust, 268 S.W.3d 1, 2008 Tex. LEXIS 771, 52 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 55, 172 Oil & Gas Rep. 521 (Tex. 2008).

1536. Trial court properly admitted autopsy/crime scene photographs of the victims of a car collision where each set of photographs depicted a different victim, only minor injuries were apparent, the photographs were used to identify the victims, and they were not especially gruesome. Cortez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6533 (Tex. App.

Corpus Christi Aug. 27, 2008).

1537. In a case involving kidnapping and aggravated robbery, testimony about defendant's drug use in the days prior to the crime was admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was relevant to show the victim's state of mind; defendant had contended that no crimes had been committed against the victim because she acted voluntarily. The probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the dangers of unfair prejudice since the extraneous offense evidence made facts of consequence more or less probable, the testimony was unlikely to irrationally affect the jury, the time spent on the issue was very brief, and the testimony was necessary to rebut a defensive theory; moreover, no limiting instruction was required because the drug use and the crimes involved in the case at issue were not similar. Padilla v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6356 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 21 2008).

1538. In defendant's solicitation case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant defendant's motion for mistrial because a witness testified, without objection, that defendant and the victim were involved in another "high-profile case," in explaining why his "people" would not carry out the alleged plot to kill the victim. Additionally, the complained of testimony was elicited by defendant's trial counsel, thus supporting a finding that the testimony was given inadvertently. Simpson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6382 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 21 2008).

1539. In defendant's murder case, the trial court properly excluded a psychiatrist's memo because the entirety of it was not on the same subject as the portion read aloud by the doctor during direct examination. The memo covered her entire conversation with defendant which took place over more than six hours, and much of the memo was not on the same subject as the portion read into evidence by the prosecutor. Whipple v. State, 281 S.W.3d 482, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6344 (Tex. App. El Paso 2008).

1540. In a child pornography case, the trial court properly admitted evidence that defendant posted child pornography to an internet group because the evidence was probative of defendant's intent to view and store child pornography on his computer and to explain why his house was searched for child pornography. Furthermore, the State's need for the evidence was moderate because it established the reason why defendant's house was searched, and the presentation did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Perry v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6446 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 21, 2008).

1541. In a murder case, the court properly admitted prior offenses because the State offered the evidence of another death and theft of a ring to show that even if both the victim's daughter and defendant had equal access to insulin, only defendant could be connected to a modus operandi; that particular modus operandi was to murder elderly patients via insulin overdose and steal from them. The State's need for the evidence was significant because it was the only evidence available to the State to rebut the defensive theory that the victim's daughter was a more plausible source of the insulin than defendant. Hannah v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6361 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 21, 2008).

1542. In a driving while intoxicated case, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit the photographs allegedly showing the conditions of the road where the officer conducted the traffic stop because defendant's explanation for why he was swerving on the road was already before the jury, and the trial court could have concluded that photographs taken one year after the arrest were, at best, unnecessary and, at worst, could have misled the jury into believing the road conditions were worse than they actually were. Davis v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6459 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 20, 2008).

1543. In the sentencing phase of defendant's drug case, the court properly admitted photographs showing a victim's injuries following his 1999 beating and the crime scene of that beating because the photographs were probative as to defendant's character and provided information to assist the jury in tailoring the appropriate sentence, the photographs had little, if any, tendency to suggest decision on an improper basis, and the State used the photographs as visual aids to supplement the beating victim's testimony as he described the incident. Aguilar v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6268 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18 2008).

1544. In defendant's indecency with a child case, the court properly admitted testimony that defendant "leered" at the victim because the witness did not testify that defendant "leered" or stared at the victim in a suggestive manner; he said the stare was "unusual." Additionally, there was other unobjected-to testimony that defendant stared at the victim; the victim's mother testified that she saw defendant looking at the victim, who was dressed in a swimsuit, in a way that made her uncomfortable; Fugate v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6266 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18, 2008).

1545. In a capital murder case, the court properly admitted two photographs because the photographs bolstered a State witness's testimony that testifying as a "snitch" had detrimental consequences -- injury to his sister, the photographs presented little, if any, prejudice to defendant because no party suggested to the jury that defendant was connected to the stabbing of the witness's sister, and the time involved in the introduction of the two photographs was minimal and unlikely to distract the jury from considering the charged offense when compared to having the witness's sister testify before the jury. Padron v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6175 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2008).

1546. Trial court properly allowed testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 403 regarding 13,000 images of child pornography possessed by defendant because they demonstrated the circumstances surrounding the crimes, were relevant to the jury's determination of the appropriate sentence and to a trial court's decision to make the sentences be served consecutively, and showed that defendant's possession of 116 other images was not accidental. The trial court conducted the necessary balancing test because, after arguments were made with regard to the evidence at issue, the trial court allowed the testimony to put it in context of volume, but refused to allow testimony that this was the largest child pornography case that had been worked by a witness. Nicholas v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5918 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 6 2008).

1547. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant failed to preserve an error based on Tex. R. Evid. 403 relating to a trial court's decision to grant the State's motion in limine, which sought to exclude the quantitative results of a portable breath test. Defendant did not attempt to offer the evidence, and he did not object to the trial testimony. Bookman v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6012 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 6 2008).

1548. Defendant's felony-murder conviction was proper because the admission was autopsy photographs was appropriate. The photographs were quite clinical in nature and the fracture and hemorrhaging would not have been visible to the jury without the photographs; it took little time to develop the evidence of the injuries. Bromon v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5886 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 5 2008).

1549. Although an heir argued that testimony of an argument between the heir and his parents was prejudicial for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the heir did not demonstrate that the entire case turned on the disputed testimony, and the disputed testimony was relevant to show how the heir interacted and responded to his parents; given the claims, it was important for the jury to be given historical information regarding this relationship and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting this evidence. Dace v. Dace, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5779 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 31 2008).

1550. In defendant's trial for sexual indecency with a child, evidence that defendant offered the victim cocaine and that they smoked it together in a hotel room where the assault took place was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because there was no showing that defendant's cocaine use had the potential to impress the jury in some irrational, indelible way. Madrid v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5834 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2008).

1551. In a sexual assault of a child case. did not abuse its discretion by admitting extraneous offense evidence that defendant used cocaine at the time of the offense as it was same transaction contextual evidence that the State had to introduce. The record did not show that the evidence of defendant's cocaine usage had the potential to impress the jury in some irrational, indelible way, and any prejudice suffered by defendant was to some degree counterbalanced by the complainant's drug usage and her admission she had used it before. Madrid v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5838 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2008).

1552. Items seized at the scene of a house fire were relevant under Tex. R. Evid 401, 402, 403, 404(b) to show that the fire started as a result of the cooking of methamphetamine on the stove and that the debris found in the burned house pertained to the use or manufacture of illegal drugs; defendant failed to establish that the trial court abused its discretion or that the determination fell outside of the zone of reasonable disagreement. Dentler v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5708 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2008).

1553. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 403, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence concerning an extraneous homicide to establish defendant's identity as the victim's murderer, given that (1) defendant attempted to establish an alibi defense, (2) defendant cross-examined a witness and attempted to impeach the reliability of her identification of defendant, and (3) the trial court admitted portions of defendant's statement that placed defendant, in possession of a gun, at a place a few weeks before the shooting in question, and .45 bullet jackets from a homicide committed at that place were fired by the same .45 firearm used in this murder. Johnson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5591 (Tex. App. Dallas July 28 2008).

1554. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of a life insurance policy covering her husband, of which defendant was the beneficiary, because the fact that defendant may have been motivated to shoot her husband by the $ 300,000 life insurance policy was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the State's attempt to prove defendant acted knowingly and intentionally. The trial court could have reasonably concluded the existence of the husband's life insurance policy related directly to the charged offense, did not have a tendency to confuse or distract the jury from the main issues in the case or have any tendency to be given undue weight by the jury; defendant admitted she shot her husband but claimed it was partially in self-defense and partially an accident; the trial court could have reasonably concluded that it was unlikely that presentation of the evidence of life insurance would consume an inordinate amount of time or merely repeat evidence already admitted. Armstrong v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5448 (Tex. App. Dallas July 24 2008).

1555. In defendant's intoxication manslaughter case, the court properly admitted a photograph of the victim because the photograph showed the victim's condition at the scene of the accident, he was clothed and depicted lying face up on a flat board, and the photograph was not particularly gruesome. The photograph showed only some blood on the victim's face, and the victim's condition as depicted in the photograph was the subject of trial testimony. Villasana v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5462 (Tex. App. Dallas July 24 2008).

1556. Trial court did not err in permitting the State to raise gang-related evidence at defendant's robbery trial, given that (1) although defendant claimed the gang-related testimony was inadmissible because it was irrelevant, the case law defendant relied upon was inapposite, (2) because evidence of defendant's gang affiliation was relevant to show his motive for the robbery, rather than mere conformity with character, it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 402, 404, (3) the fact that the victim was unsure whether defendant was a particular gang member did not render the gang-related evidence inadmissible, the jury was the judge of the credibility of the witnesses, and the jury could have inferred that defendant was affiliated with or a member of a particular gang, and (4) the trial court did not err in finding that the potential character conformity inference did not substantially outweigh the relevant purpose of showing motive, as defendant's gang affiliation was not only relevant but critical to show the motive for his crime. Spencer v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5524 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 24 2008).

1557. In defendant's assault on a public servant trial, a spitting incident was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show intent and there was no violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that (1) the inherent probative value of the evidence was great, (2) although evidence of the spitting incident could potentially impress the jury, it was not of such a nature as to have impressed the jury in an irrational or indelible way, (3) the record did not indicate that the time needed to develop this evidence was such that the jury would be distracted from the indicted offense, and (4) although the evidence was relevant to defendant's intent, several witnesses identified defendant as the attacker, such that the need for the evidence factor weighed against admissibility, but the factors as a whole weighed in favor of admissibility and the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence. Collins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5481 (Tex. App. Waco July 23 2008).

1558. In defendant's murder case, the court properly admitted a forensic firearms report without expert testimony regarding its contents because the statements in the report tended to explain the physical evidence already admitted at trial. Edwards v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5170 (Tex. App. Dallas July 14 2008).

1559. In a sexual assault case, testimony that defendant's DNA was in a database was not improper because it showed circumstances surrounding defendant's arrest and was relevant to the identity of the attacker; the evidence had probative value because it showed how the investigation began and how defendant became a suspect. Jackson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 4890 (Tex. App. Dallas July 1 2008).

1560. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting extraneous-offense evidence that another child had had sex with defendant because the State spent minimal time developing the witness's testimony, and it was neither lengthy nor graphic; because defendant strongly contested the victim's allegations, the State demonstrated the need to counter defendant's theory that the victim fabricated the allegations in order to retaliate against defendant for not returning her amorous feelings. Dinsmore v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3730 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 20 2008).

1561. In defendant's murder case, the court properly admitted autopsy photographs because the medical examiner explained the contents of each photograph as it was projected onto a screen for the jury's view; the photos depicted mutilation to the body other than that caused by the gunshot wound, however, the witness distinguished for the jury the damage caused by the fatal gunshot from the marks that indicated life-saving attempts and the autopsy itself. Mata v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3476 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 14 2008).

1562. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting two photographs of the victim into evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403; one photograph was of the victim prior to his injuries, and the second was of the victim in the emergency medical services unit on a stretcher, which photograph was taken at the crime scene and which photograph was small and showed only the injuries that the victim received and was no more gruesome than would have been expected. Davis v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3478 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 14 2008).

1563. Extraneous-offense evidence that defendant had sexually assaulted his former live-in girlfriend's fourteen-year-old daughter was properly admitted because the extraneous-offense testimony rebutted the defensive theory of retaliation, the State spent minimal time developing the witness's testimony, and it was neither lengthy nor graphic, and because defendant strongly contested the child's allegations on a theory of retaliation, the State demonstrated the need to counter the theory that the child fabricated the allegations in order to avoid living with defendant. Bargas v. State, 252 S.W.3d 876, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3443 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

1564. In defendant's child sexual assault case, the court properly allowed evidence that defendant "gave" the victim to his drug dealer in lieu of payment because, although the testimony about what the drug dealer did to her and defendant's involvement might have inflamed the jury, the incident, although heinous, paled in comparison to the victim's graphic testimony about defendant's repeated sexual assaults of her, and the brief testimony about the incident with the drug dealer was followed by a specific limiting instruction Sanders v. State, 255 S.W.3d 754, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3413 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

1565. In defendant's drug case, the court did not err by admitting a videotape of a witness's interrogation by police because it was introduced to "rebut the witness's claims that the police threatened and coerced her into falsely stating that defendant was at the parking lot in order to conduct the drug deal;" the trial court negated any tendency of the evidence to suggest to the jury that defendant was guilty, or to distract the jury from the coercion issue, by instructing the jury that it was not to consider the videotape for the truth of the matters asserted therein. Kennedy v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3424 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 8 2008).

1566. Driver's consumption of alcohol was relevant to the element of causation in his negligence suit against a trucker because the trucker presented evidence that the accident could have been avoided had the driver steered his vehicle to the right to avoid the trucker's trailer, and in failing to do so, the driver caused the accident. PPC Transp. v. Metcalf, 254 S.W.3d 636, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3291 (Tex. App. Tyler 2008).

1567. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in refusing to admit toxicology reports under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) and the court agreed that because the reports reflected the facts and circumstances surrounding the killing, they were admissible under the statute; however, the trial court found the value did not outweigh the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and defendant failed to address this analysis, and the court found no abuse of discretion on the trial court's part. Lopez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3167 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 1 2008).

1568. Because defendant claimed self-defense against both victims, the court agreed with the State that defendant's experience with firearms prior to the shootings was relevant to rebut defendant's defensive theory, as the testimony spoke to defendant's lack of maturity and good judgment in handling his weapon and was relevant to show absence of mistake or accident regarding the victims' deaths; the photograph of defendant at a firing range was relevant to provide a link between defendant, a cellular phone, and the handgun used in the shooting, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony and photograph over defendant's Tex. R. App. P. 404(b) objection, and, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the ruling to admit the testimony and photograph did not fall outside the zone of reasonable disagreement, as the record did not support the notion that the evidence tended to impress the jury irrationally, the evidence was developed quickly and a disproportionate amount of time was not spent on the subject, and the State had a compelling reason to present the evidence to rebut defendant's theory of self-defense. Lopez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3167 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 1 2008).

1569. Trial court, in refusing to admit toxicology results, weighed the probative value of the evidence against the danger of unfair prejudice or confusion under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and given that a doctor could not speak to whether toxicology results showed either victim was behaving aggressively on the night of the shooting, the probative value of the evidence was minimal; the ruling did not effectively preclude defendant from presenting a defense on this issue because defendant offered testimony that both victims were intoxicated, and thus the ruling was not arbitrary and defendant's Sixth Amendment rights were not violated. Lopez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3167 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 1 2008).

1570. In an illegal possession of a weapon case, audio portions of the patrol-car videotape were properly admitted because an issue during trial was the course and conduct of the officer's investigation of defendants, and the statements concerned one defendant's friend's alleged drug use, and did not concern any drug use by either of the defendants. Gomez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2966 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 24 2008).

1571. Trial court did not err in admitting a photograph of the victim while on a cruise, given that prior to seeing the picture, the jury's only visual depictions of the victim were police and medical examiner photographs of his bones, the jury heard testimony that the victim's body had skeletonized, that his bones had been scattered by animals, and that they showed signs of animal scavenging, plus the jury knew that the picture did not accurately portray the victim at the time of his death; while the victim's ex-wife and son confirmed that the victim's drug use had taken a toll on his appearance, the photograph was still relevant as punishment evidence for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) because it reminded the jury that, despite his issues, the victim was still a human being and that defendant had taken his life, and because of the disclosures accompanying the photograph, its probative value was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Thomas v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3050 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 24 2008).

1572. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court properly admitted evidence of a third attempted aggravated robbery that occurred on the same night as the other two robberies because the dispatch description that led to defendant's apprehension after the third attempted aggravated robbery also led to the discovery that defendant had in his possession personal items belonging to the complainants of both the first and second robbery, and that discovery was a probative piece of evidence tying defendant to the first and second aggravated robberies. Carson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3091 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 24 2008).

1573. Court properly admitted evidence of defendant's statement of gang affiliation made to a deputy at the time of his arrest because defendant did not simply state that the deputy should watch his back but told him that he should watch his back because defendant ran with the Mexican Mafia; thus, defendant used the Mexican Mafia reference to give more weight to his threat; additionally, the State did not introduce any other evidence about defendant's gang affiliation or the activities of the Mexican Mafia and it did not mention defendant's claimed gang affiliation again in the presence of the jury. Bejarano v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2762 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 17 2008).

1574. In defendant's unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the admission of defendant's prior felonies because counsel could have concluded that it would be better for the jury to be aware that the prior convictions had been for nonviolent offenses such as failing to register as a sex offender than to have the jury potentially be concerned about a violent felon possessing a gun. Tapps v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2809 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 17 2008).

1575. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's motions to continue his indecency with a child trial so that he could flesh out allegations in a report to child protective services (CPS) that the victim (who was four years old at the time) was "purging" at home and in school and was caught by her uncle in bed with her four-year-old cousin's head between her legs, which allegations defendant believed were exculpatory where defendant's argument was founded on a defective factual basis because nothing in the CPS report exculpated him; nothing in the report suggested that defendant did not molest the child as alleged in the indictment, even if the circumstances mentioned in the report were deemed true, but, rather, the circumstances described (when intertwined with imagination) suggested that the child could have been the victim of other molestation at the hands of unknown parties, or so a reasonable jurist could have interpreted the circumstances. Reder v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2624 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 10 2008).

1576. Records showing that defendant obtained hydrocodone and other prescriptions many times in the past from different doctors made it more probable that, when defendant was unable to get a doctor to refill his prescription, he knowingly asked a co-worker to refill it through fraudulent means, and thus the trial court did not err in finding that the records were relevant for purposes of defendant's conviction of possession of a controlled substance, dihydrocodeinone (hydrocodone), by fraud, in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.129(a); considering that the only direct evidence of defendant's culpable mental state was the co-worker's testimony and she was impeached, the trial court could have found (1) that the probative force of and the State's need for the records were considerable, (2) the records were not inflammatory and did not suggest a decision on an improper basis, (3) the records would not have misled the jury, and (4) the probative value of the records was not substantially outweighed by the countervailing factors specified in Tex. R. Evid. 403. Starn v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2402 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 3 2008).

1577. In a murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs of the victim at the crime scene because some of the photographs were used by the experts to explain the manner of the death and the amount of force used by defendant when hitting the victim with the baseball bat, tending to disprove his self-defense claim; other photographs, along with the testimony of the blood-spatter expert, addressed the absence of any struggle between the victim and defendant and that the victim was either on his knees or on the ground while being beaten, while some photographs depicted the brutality of the crime and the severity of the injuries and were probative of the manner of the victim's death. Grayson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2210 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 27 2008).

1578. Defendant was required under Tex. R. App. P. 33 to make an objection with sufficient specificity that the trial court could be aware of what defendant was complaining about, and because the initial hearsay objection was to the entirety of medical records, the objection was too general and insufficient and the court was unable to say that the inadmissible material that formed the basis of the objection was apparent from the context, and thus error was not preserved; even assuming that the hearsay objection was sufficient to preserve error, the statements in question were made by medical personnel for the purpose of diagnosis and treatment under Tex. R. Evid. 803, although defendant complained of certain injuries, his actions were inconsistent with any desire for treatment, and that defendant was escorted to a police car following his return to the emergency room was consistent with admission of the evidence for diagnosis and treatment and defendant did not show that the probative value of the evidence was outweighed by its prejudicial nature. Cline v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2242 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2008).

1579. In defendant's trial for retaliation, aggravated kidnapping, and aggravated assault, the fact that defendant had also locked another girlfriend in the same trunk in the past made it more probable that he had done the same to his current ex-girlfriend, and the first girlfriend's testimony that she did not feel free to leave him tended to rebut his claim that his ex-girlfriend remained with him voluntarily, and thus the first girlfriend's testimony was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence over a Tex. R. Evid. 402 objection; because the first and third factors under Tex. R. Evid. 403 weighed heavily in favor of admissibility, given that the jury was drawn away from the indicted offenses only briefly and the testimony was compelling and supported the ex-girlfriend's claims, and the second and fourth factors were neutral, the trial court did not err in finding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of this evidence. Stephenson v. State, 255 S.W.3d 652, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2072 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

1580. Defendant's argument that the trial court reversibly erred and abused its discretion by allowing one of his victims to testify during punishment that she was concerned about her future safety because the evidence was irrelevant and more prejudicial than probative was rejected because defendant failed to preserve his claim for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33 by failing to object on the ground that the evidence was not relevant. Smith v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2081 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 20 2008).

1581. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense where the cross-examination made the relationship between defendant and the complainant, including the beating, relevant and it was necessary to explain the context within which the charged crime occurred; the evidence gave context to the demand of only $50, when the complainant apparently had more money, and explained the complainant's reluctance to immediately report the crime. Lopez v. State, 261 S.W.3d 103, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1963 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2008).

1582. Trial court did not err by admitting two witnesses' testimony concerning encounters they had with defendant that were similar to his encounters with the complainant under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the evidence was relevant to show defendant's motive and intent, and to show that people other than the complainant had the same reaction of fear from defendant's actions; the trial court determined that the evidence's probative value substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Sawyer v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1975 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 19 2008).

1583. In defendant's manslaughter case, the court properly admitted autopsy photographs because they provided a visual component to, and understanding of, the medical examiner's testimony about the extent and nature of the victim's injuries, not all of the photographs offered by the State were admitted by the trial court, and neither of the photographs showed any mutilation caused by the autopsy. Ashorali v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1976 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 19 2008).

1584. Trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 403 during defendant's murder trial by admitting the testimony of defendant's husband regarding an extraneous offense in 2001 in which defendant threatened him with a knife and nicked him on the arm to rebut defendant's self-defense theory because although the incidents might not have presented the same resulting injury, the testimony was probative, as it showed that, under similar argumentative circumstances with a loved one, defendant picked up a knife and threatened the other individual, and thus it tended to show that she had been the initial aggressor in the past, which served to make the fact that she was the initial aggressor in the incident with the victim more likely. Smith v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1726 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 6 2008).

1585. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the evidence of defendant's bond papers for unrelated misdemeanor offenses from a house adjacent to the house where the shooting occurred was relevant and probative because (1) it established or suggested that the dwelling next to the murder scene was defendant's house or home base, which was a contested issue; and (2) it buttressed the State's argument that defendant's flight to Mexico was indicative of guilt; in addition, because the charged offense of murder was so weighty, it was unlikely that any impression that evidence might have made on the jury would overcome their judgment; furthermore, the amount of time needed to develop the evidence was low, and the need for the evidence was high as it placed defendant near the scene of the shooting and explained his flight to Mexico. Arroyo v. State, 259 S.W.3d 831, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1519 (Tex. App. Tyler 2008).

1586. In defendant's murder case, a trooper was properly allowed to testify concerning defendant's apparent false theft report because it was consistent with the State's theory that it was defendant's addiction to gambling that was at the heart of the money problems that essentially poisoned the relationship between defendant and the victim, his wife; part of the State's theory was that the victim was murdered when she threatened to quit her job and thus, cut off any further support of defendant's gambling. Stafford v. State, 248 S.W.3d 400, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1280 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2008).

1587. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in requiring defendant to display his tattoos for a jury because evidence of defendant's gang membership was relevant at the punishment phase for its probative bearing on defendant's character, the viewing and description of the tattoos was brief, and, while it may have been true that the actual viewing of the tattoos had a greater impact on the jury than a description of the tattoos, that did not mean that the viewing of the tattoos was unfairly prejudicial, under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Cantu v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1028 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 13 2008).

1588. Even if evidence of an alternative perpetrator's prior crimes had some marginal relevance, a trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the probative value of the testimony was slight and presented a great threat of confusion of the issues because it would have forced the State to attempt to disprove the nebulous allegation that perhaps the alternative perpetrator committed the murder. Villa v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1025 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 13 2008).

1589. Defendant's convictions for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon and assault of a public servant, which were entered upon his guilty pleas to a jury, were upheld where there was no error by the trial court under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 or Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting a videotape into evidence during the punishment phase of both offenses showing defendant committing the assault on a public servant, a police officer, because the State's right to introduce the videotape was not restricted by defendant's guilty plea; although defendant argued that the videotape was unnecessarily cumulative because he pled guilty and that its admission was for the purpose of obtaining a greater sentence, and although the two victims, defendant's girlfriend and the officer, testified about the circumstances surrounding the offenses, because the jury had to determine what punishment to assess, a video recording could provide a more panoramic representation of the evidence, and, thus, could be more helpful to the jury in assessing punishment than oral testimony. Perez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 509 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 23 2008).

1590. In defendant's robbery case, the State properly presented evidence of an extraneous robbery because the offenses occurred within three miles of one another and within a six-day time period, both took place late in the morning in large retail parking lots, and both acts were perpetrated quickly, snatching purses from unaccompanied females walking or standing in the parking lots; additionally, the testimony rebutted defendant's theories of alibi and that one victim's brief opportunity to view the perpetrator led to a mistaken identification; therefore, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. Evans v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 477 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 22 2008).

1591. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not err in admitting certain autopsy photographs into evidence in defendant's murder trial; the medical examiner used the photographs to help explain the victim's injuries, certain photographs depicted the way in which the medical examiner received the victim's body, others depicted the gunshot wounds and various lacerations to the victim's body, and other photographs were offered to show that the victim's injuries were consistent with him stumbling to find help after he was shot and that he tried to defend himself, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the probative value of the photographs was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Quang Khac Tran v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1159 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 19 2008).

1592. In a products liability action, an expert's lint ignition testimony was based on an objective observation of lint build-up in the dryer cabinet, independent observations supported the expert's testimony regarding how an ember survived to ignite the clothes in the dryer and then spread from the dryer, and this expert and another expert relied on objective criteria in the record and their own experience to conclude that the dryer caused the fire; while the manufacturer might have disagreed with their conclusions, the experts explained the basis for their opinions and based those opinions on objective facts, and the trial court did not err in admitting this evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702. Whirlpool Corp. v. Camacho, 251 S.W.3d 88, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 356 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2008).

1593. In defendant's murder case, the court properly allowed the State to reveal defendant's tattoos because the evidence was relevant to support the State's theory that defendant was a gang member who murdered rival gang members in retaliation; in addition, given the other evidence indicating defendant's admitted gang membership, the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial. Reyes v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 293 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 16 2008).

1594. Evidence was not admitted in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403 as (1) the evidence was probative; (2) the potential for prejudice was minimized as the jury heard all the facts surrounding the evidence; (3) the jury had the ability to weigh the evidence; and (4) the evidence was relevant to a highly contested issue in the case. Goldine v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 68 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 8 2008).

1595. Although defendant's proffered alternative perpetrator evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because identity was a material issue in the case and vigorously contested at defendant's aggravated robbery trial, and although there was no danger that the evidence would create a side issue that would unduly distract the jury from the main issues under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the evidence addressed a material issue in the case, the trial court's exclusion of the evidence was not error because defendant failed to show the required nexus between the alleged alternative perpetrator and the offense-at-issue; although the alleged alternative perpetrator's indictments and convictions indicated that he engaged in a spree of robberies overlapping the offense-at-issue, that evidence supported no conclusions other than that he was committing robberies around the time of the offense-at-issue, and defendant did not present evidence that the alleged alternative perpetrator's offenses were committed at or near the location of the offense-at-issue or present testimony from any of the witnesses identifying that individual as the robber. Dickson v. State, 246 S.W.3d 733, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9859 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1596. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of a gun found by the witness because its probative value was not outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice, when the witness testified that he found the gun around the same time as the aggravated robbery, lying on the road a few blocks away from the store, and this was approximately the same location where the officer observed defendant driving a car matching the description of the suspect's vehicle provided by police dispatchers at the time of the aggravated robbery and from which the officer observed defendant extend his hand and arm out of the window and then back into the car. Mouton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10076 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 20 2007).

1597. By failing to identify what photographs were objectionable, the court found that defendant waived any error associated with the admission of those photographs, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33, and even if the court addressed the issue by examining all photographs in which the victim's body was visible, the complaint lacked merit because the photographs aided a witness in describing the scene and defendant did not object to this testimony, plus the photographs were not so gruesome or horrifying as to have caused a juror of normal sensitivity to have difficult rationally deciding the case, and the court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the photographs under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Earl v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9580 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 7 2007).

1598. Nothing in the record indicated that the trial court did not perform a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test when it admitted extraneous offenses under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 or that defendant requested and the trial court refused to include its findings on the record; thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection to the extraneous offenses. Clark v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9452 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 4 2007).

1599. In defendant's murder case, although the court erred in excluding the testimony and notes of a licensed counselor who had counseled defendant hours before the murder because the testimony provided some insight into defendant's state of mind at the time of the murder, the error was harmless; defendant's expert's testimony concerning defendant's sanity at the time of the offense was considerably more direct and probative than the tangentially relevant testimony of the counselor. Bradshaw v. State, 244 S.W.3d 490, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9427 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

1600. Record demonstrated that defendant did not ask the trial court to conduct a balancing test under Tex. R. Evid. 403 or object when it failed to do so; therefore, he did not preserve for appellate review his argument that the trial court failed to properly conduct a balancing test. Wilson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9261 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2007).

1601. Probative value of a photograph was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that (1) a photograph of defendant in possession of the same handgun used to commit the murder was highly probative of defendant having committed the murder, (2) while the photograph was prejudicial, it directly related to the charged offense of murder and the photograph did not have a great potential to impress the jury in an irrational way and would not have tempted the jury into a guilt finding on improper grounds, (3) the time involved in the introduction of the photograph was minimal and thus unlikely to have distracted the jury, and (4) the photograph was related to a disputed issue and the State had a need for the evidence, to connect defendant to the murder. Andrade v. State, 246 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9288 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1602. Although the State argued that the trial court, when conducting a Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis, had a limited right to be wrong, case law held that the trial court had no right to be wrong if it appeared to the court, affording all due deference, that the evidence was substantially more prejudicial than probative. Andrade v. State, 246 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9288 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1603. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of a robbery defendant's extraneous bad acts because such acts were admissible to show motive, as rebuttal of his effort to characterize his actions as a legitimate, or as contextual transactional proof. Maranda v. State, 253 S.W.3d 762, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9285 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

1604. Defendant's conviction for murder was proper because the admission of photographs of defendant's gang-related tattoos was not erroneous since the evidence was probative in that a tattoo was highly indicative of gang affiliation; the photographs were used to show his gang membership in one particular gang and also connected him to another gang. Rivers v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8898 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 8 2007).

1605. Tex. R. Evid. 403 does not require the exclusion of all cumulative evidence; rather it requires exclusion if the probative value of the evidence is substantially outweighed by the needless presentation of cumulative evidence. Trinh v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9196 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2007).

1606. In defendant's murder trial, the trial court did not err under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) in admitting evidence that defendant had attacked and kidnapped his wife six months before her death; the relationship between defendant and his wife was a material issue, the evidence was not overly emphasized in that it was only one of many instances of heated arguments between the two, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Barnes v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8633 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 31 2007).

1607. In a child sexual abuse case, the trial court did not err when it excluded evidence of the complainant's prior bad conduct as too remote; such evidence is subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 608, and although remoteness in time is not a concept generally considered under Tex. R. Evid. 608, it was pertinent to a Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis. Blanchard v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8403 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 25 2007).

1608. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 by admitting evidence that defendant failed to appear for a previous trial date; defendant's failure to appear was not the type of misconduct that had a great unfair prejudicial danger. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8218 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 17 2007).

1609. Testimony relating to the nature of the relationship between defendant and his wife was previously found to be relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and testimony about security measures taken during the serving of divorce papers related to the nature of their relationship, such that the testimony was relevant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court found that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Garcia v. State, 246 S.W.3d 121, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8051 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007), cert. denied, 555 U.S. 949, 129 S. Ct. 404, 172 L. Ed. 2d 295, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 7457 (2008).

1610. Witness's testimony of a conversation she had with the victim, defendant's wife, before the crime, when the victim was highly upset and crying, was admissible as an excited utterance under Tex. R. Evid. 803, plus defendant admitted that the statements were cumulative, and thus any error was harmless; because the statements related to the nature of the relationship between defendant and his wife, the statements were relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and as they were not merely an attack on defendant's character, the trial court therefore did not err in overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. Garcia v. State, 246 S.W.3d 121, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8051 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007), cert. denied, 555 U.S. 949, 129 S. Ct. 404, 172 L. Ed. 2d 295, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 7457 (2008).

1611. Statements made by the victim, defendant's wife, were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 803 because they went to her state of mind, and although defendant claimed that statements that she was afraid of him were not relevant, it had previously been determined that the circumstances surrounding their relationship were relevant under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a), and thus the court held that the statements were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401; given that the jury had been told of the "dicey" relationship between defendant and his wife, the trial court did not believe there was going to be any confusion of the issues, and the court agreed and held that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Garcia v. State, 246 S.W.3d 121, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8051 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007), cert. denied, 555 U.S. 949, 129 S. Ct. 404, 172 L. Ed. 2d 295, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 7457 (2008).

1612. Tex. R. Evid. 403 gives the trial court considerable latitude to assess the courtroom dynamics, to judge the tone and tenor of the witness' testimony and its impact upon the jury, and to conduct the necessary balancing. Winegarner v. State, 235 S.W.3d 787, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1383 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1613. Although the Texas Rules of Evidence are intentionally slanted toward the inclusion of all relevant evidence, Tex. R. Evid. 403 gives the trial court considerable discretion to exclude evidence when it appears to that individual judge, in the context of that particular trial, to be insufficiently probative when measured against the countervailing factors specified in the rule; the rule thus allows different trial judges to reach different conclusions in different trials on substantially similar facts without abuse of discretion. Winegarner v. State, 235 S.W.3d 787, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1383 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1614. Trial court's decision denying defendant's request to impeach the victim, his wife, with evidence of a remote assault by her of her former husband was not an abuse of discretion; the trial court could have found that the probative value of the evidence was mostly outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and whether the court would have reached a different conclusion than the trial court was not the standard of appellate review. Winegarner v. State, 235 S.W.3d 787, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1383 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1615. In defendant's capital murder trial, the trial court's finding that the probative value of the photographs, three of the crime scene and one taken prior to the victim's autopsy, was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; the court found that (1) the photographs were probative because they supported the State's theory that the victim was killed by a gunshot wound to the back of the head, (2) the photographs only had a slight potential to impress the jury in an irrational way because they depicted only the results of defendant's actions, (3) the State used little time to develop the evidence, (4) the State needed the photographs to corroborate the testimony of those who took the photographs, (5) the photographs aided the jury's understanding of the injuries to the victim and the nature of the crime, (6) all photographs were eight by ten inches in size and while the crime scene photographs might have been disturbing to those unused to viewing such images, they were not especially gruesome, and (7) to the extent that the autopsy photograph was gruesome, it was no more gruesome than the facts of the offense; the court noted that only black and white photographs were included in the appellate record and if defendant believed that the colors in the actual photographs would have affected the court's analysis, then he should have made sure that the original photographs were included in the record. Trinh v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7678 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 25 2007).

1616. In connection with defendant's capital murder conviction, the court rejected defendant's cumulative objection to certain photographs under Tex. R. Evid. 403; although all the photographs are cumulative to the extent that they all showed some aspect of the victim's injuries, the photographs were not needlessly cumulative because they allowed the jury to see the victim's head injuries in greater detail and an autopsy photograph depicted the victim in the condition in which defendant left him. Trinh v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7678 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 25 2007).

1617. Court evaluated defendant's claim of error regarding the admission of testimony of prior bad acts under case law addressing the State's misuse of its ability under Tex. R. Evid. 607 to impeach its own witness, and defendant's trial objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 provided the proper framework for analysis of any error in the trial court's ruling permitting the line of questioning, and the trial court did not err in permitting the State to question the victim, defendant's mother, about her prior statements to police; there was little risk of prejudice, as the dispute was over the use of a firearm, and none of the extraneous offenses involved a firearm, and the line of questioning sought to serve the State's case by providing the jury with a reason to discount the victim's testimonial effort to mitigate her son's offense, not by giving the jury evidence of guilt that was not otherwise admissible. Mendoza v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7679 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 24 2007).

1618. Although defendant complained that the trial court failed to balance the probative value of evidence against the risk of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the State correctly noted that the required balancing did not need to be affirmatively shown on the record, defendant did not request the trial court to articulate its balancing, and nothing indicated that the trial court failed to do so. Mendoza v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7679 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 24 2007).

1620. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting exhibits consisting of certified copies of judgments in two of defendant's prior driving while intoxicated convictions, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403 and defendant's felony driving while intoxicated conviction; the court found that (1) the exhibits were highly probative as they served to establish jurisdiction in the trial court, (2) defendant's failure to stipulate to the jurisdictional prior convictions took defendant out of the rule that the prosecution should not read or prove the prior convictions, and the exhibits did not have a great potential to impress the jury in an irrational way, and (3) the time involved in the disputed testimony was short and was unlikely to have distracted the jury, and thus defendant did not meet his burden to show that the probative value of the evidence substantially outweighed its prejudicial effect. Nall v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7289 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 4 2007).

1621. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, because there was no evidence suggesting that defendant intended the register under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 62.055(a) but the police or jailers prevented him from doing so after his arrest, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit evidence of the incarceration; even if the evidence was improperly excluded, defendant was unable to show harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44, given that the jury was presented with ample evidence showing that defendant violated the mens rea element of the statute. Kosick v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7284 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2007).

1622. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting photographs of the victims; the number of photographs was mitigated by the fact that there were two victims, and while the detail was graphic and some photographs were gruesome and showed one victim nude, the medical examiner referred to most of the photographs while explaining his testimony, and one photograph, showing the scalp pulled back, was the only way to show the damage to the bone. Wilson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7173 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 30 2007).

1623. Probative value of the witness testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or misleading the jury, because none of the testimony suggested to the jury that defendant was eligible for jury recommended probation, nor did the testimony from these three witnesses suggest to the jury that it should reach its decision on an improper basis, such as an emotional one, and even if the trial court erred by admitting the testimony, defendant had not demonstrated reversible error, when defendant had not demonstrated that he received a longer sentence or was harmed by the admission of the testimony concerning the conditions of and his eligibility for probation. Ivey v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7241 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 30 2007).

1624. Appellate court overruled defendant's assertion that the evidence of his possession of child pornography at sentencing for sexual assault was irrelevant and should have been excluded, because while the potential prejudice that the admitted pictures could cause was high, the potential unfair prejudice of admitting pictures was marginal at best since the pictures merely showed the commission of the extraneous offense, and the trial court was thus well within the zone of reasonable disagreement when it decided that the unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value. Bitterman v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7235 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 28 2007).

1625. Defendant claimed that the trial court's evidentiary rulings effectively prevented her from presenting her defense to capital murder, that the child victim's parents were the perpetrators of the crime, and the court analyzed the evidence to determine if the trial court's evidentiary rulings were clearly erroneous; the court found that (1) absent evidence that the children became involved in the physical disputes the parents previously had, the court was unable to hold that the trial court abused its discretion in excluding this evidence, and in any event, defendant did not raise her due process argument in this regard to the trial court, such that two related subpoints were not properly before the court, (2) certain excluded evidence did not add much, if anything, to the defense and did not prevent defendant from putting on a defense, such that defendant's due process rights were not violated, and (3) another witness statement was hearsay and did not meet any exceptions, and the exclusion of the statement in question did not prevent defendant from putting on a defense, and no indicia of reliability existed concerning the witness's statement, and defendant did not call this witness to testify. Stevens v. State, 234 S.W.3d 748, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6845 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

1626. In defendant's capital murder case, evidence in the guilt-innocence phase that painted a picture of the victim as a young man with a promising future whose life defendant had ended prematurely was irrelevant and appealed to the jury's sympathies. However, the error was harmless; defendant admitted to participating in the shooting, and a witness testified that defendant shot the victim and grabbed the bag of codeine. Durand v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6535 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 16 2007).

1627. Where defendant was convicted of the aggravated assault of a ten-year-old child, the trial court did not err by permitting the child to testify as to defendant's threats and act of throwing the child to the ground; defendant's nudity; his prior drug use; and display of a crack pipe during the altercation; the child's testimony related to a single episode and gave context to the jury; the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by any unfair prejudice that might have resulted. Jones v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6414 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 14 2007).

1628. Admission of evidence regarding defendant's use of drugs and alcohol, having sex with an older man, running away from home, and being a liar was properly admitted because she chose to marry an older man and, thus, had sex with an older man, she ran away from home, and she put her maturity, sophistication, and independence at issue by claiming she was under her husband's control; further, the fact that defendant lied about being pregnant, which "necessitated" a marriage, went to her ability to tell the truth; the use of drugs went to defendant's then-existing state of mind. Vega v. State, 255 S.W.3d 87, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6315 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2007).

1629. In defendant's trial for aggravated assault, when the State elicited evidence of defendant's prior conviction for aggravated assault, a proper objection should have been made under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and Tex. R. Evid. 403; even if error existed, and it was preserved, error was harmless because introduction of evidence was not prejudicial to defendant. Moore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6354 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 9 2007).

1630. Decision refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant regarding the sexual abuse allegations against her father was affirmed because defendant failed to demonstrate that cross-examining the complainant regarding her allegations against her father was constitutionally required, and the district court's decision to limit the cross-examination did not violate the defendant's constitutional right to confront the witnesses against him; evidence demonstrating that the complainant had made allegations against her father, without more, would not have been relevant to a determination of whether the complainant fabricated her allegations against defendant, defendant failed to produce any evidence indicating that the complainant's prior allegations against her father were false, and the complainant's credibility had already been impeached through the testimony of one of the State's witnesses indicating that the complainant had made false allegations against other individuals while in therapy. Davis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6360 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 9 2007).

1631. During defendant's trial for aggravated robbery with a deadly weapon, the trial court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to a large mounted photograph of the victim's infant daughter; a single photograph was involved and it was not gruesome in any way; the photograph was not prejudicial. Minos v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6394 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 9 2007).

1632. Because Tex. R. Evid. 403 falls within the exceptions to the right of confrontation that have been delineated by Texas courts, and because Rule 403 only allows for the exclusion of testimony where its probative value is substantially outweighed by concerns found within these exceptions, no additional weighing by the appellate court is necessary; testimony properly excluded under Rule 403 is also properly excluded under the Confrontation Clause, and because defendant did not directly attack the trial court's Rule 403 ruling, the trial court did not err in limiting defendant's cross-examination. Dinger v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6253 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 8 2007).

1633. Trial court properly admitted a photograph of a murder victim and his family because it was relevant to show a true appearance of the victim before his death, and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. While it showed the family smiling, the photograph was not the type that would impress the jury in an irrational but indelible way, no mention was made of the photograph during closing argument, and only one mention was made of the victim's children. Johnson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6256 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 8 2007).

1634. Trial court properly admitted autopsy photographs of a murder victim because they did no more than visually depict what the medical examiner's testimony had already described, which was that the victim died of multiple gunshot wounds, and the probative value of the autopsy photographs was not substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect because they were neither gruesome nor unnecessarily graphic, and because minimal time was spent on actually introducing the photographs following the medical examiner's testimony. While the manner of the victim's death was not disputed, the circumstances surrounding it were disputed, and the photographs lent visual support to the witnesses' description of those events. Johnson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6256 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 8 2007).

1635. At defendant's capital murder trial, the trial court properly admitted evidence pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) that defendant possessed a semi-automatic weapon the week before the offense where the evidence showed that the victim was shot seven times by a semi-automatic weapon, and there was also ample evidence that defendant shot the victim. The evidence was not more prejudicial than probative because the State did not impute defendant's possession of the semi-automatic weapon to be a crime, the State did not imply that defendant was generally a criminal because he possessed the weapon, and there was no indication that the weapon might have been used in another offense. Johnson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6256 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 8 2007).

1636. In a case of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, a penitentiary packet showing that defendant previously had been convicted of two burglary offenses was admissible at punishment in accordance with Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3, and the trial court could have found under Tex. R. Evid. 403 that the relevant and probative information in the packet outweighed its prejudicial effect. Latchie v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6127 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 2 2007).

1637. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of the thirteen-year-old victim, Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not require the exclusion of evidence of three extraneous acts of sexual intercourse; the extraneous acts of intercourse differed from the tried offense only in their locations and dates; because the trial court gave a limiting instruction, there was not a significant risk of distracting the jury from consideration of the offense being tried. Smith v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6004 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 2007).

1638. In defendant's capital murder case, photographs of the victim taken at the crime scene and at the autopsy were properly admitted because the photographs did not depict internal organs or show damage to the corpse resulting from the autopsy as opposed to the attack; that the wounds were inflicted by accomplices did not make the photographs unfairly prejudicial in the prosecution of defendant as a party to the murder. Randall v. State, 232 S.W.3d 285, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5860 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

1639. Defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection went to crime scene photographs of the victim's body, rather than to family pictures; defendant wholly failed to identify how the family pictures would have created an indelible and irrational sympathy in the jury and the court concluded that defendant failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion in admitting the family photographs. Castilleja v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5974 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 24 2007).

1640. Although defendant argued that the trial court did not properly perform the balancing test required by Tex. R. Evid. 403 in ruling on the admission of photographs, the court noted that unless the trial court refused to perform the balancing test, the overruling of a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection without further comment did not establish that the trial court failed to conduct the test and was not going to support the finding of an abuse of discretion. Castilleja v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5974 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 24 2007).

1641. Defense counsel lodged objections to extraneous evidence, but counsel did not urge an objection that the State failed to provide notice; the court agreed with the State that a trial objection regarding extraneous offenses that did not comport with the complaint raised on appeal did not preserve the contention for appellate review. Hohnstein v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5975 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 24 2007).

1642. In defendant's murder trial, the trial court did not err in admitting crime scene photographs, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403; the photographs depicted nothing more than the reality of the gruesome crime itself, and their probative value was not substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice. Chon Ki Yi v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5648 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 19 2007).

1643. Trial court did not err in admitting an autopsy photograph in defendant's murder trial, which photograph showed defendant's ex-wife's brain after the top of her skull had been removed; the State had to prove that she was killed by stab wounds caused by scissors, and the medical examiner testified that one of the stab wounds penetrated the skull into the brain and was alone fatal, and the wound to the brain would not have been visible had the skull been left intact. Chon Ki Yi v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5648 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 19 2007).

1644. Trial court did not err in admitting a 911 tape over defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in his murder trial; the tape was made immediately after boys found their mother's body and verified their testimony in many respects, the tape did not unfairly implicate defendant as he was not mentioned on the tape, and while dramatic, the tape was relevant in providing a framework for the State's evidence, and its relevance was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Chon Ki Yi v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5648 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 19 2007).

1645. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in failing to grant defendant's motion for a mistrial, raised when the victim's mother was permitted to give her personal opinion about the victim's character for being truthful; any error from the testimony occurred only one time, the jury was specifically instructed to disregard the testimony, which did not contribute to the mother's prior testimony, and the court did not perceive the testimony to be highly prejudicial and incurable. Montgomery v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5682 (Tex. App. Dallas July 19 2007).

1646. Trial court did not violate defendant's constitutional right to present a defense by excluding photographs of the victim, a man, dressed as a woman; other testimony established the victim's appearance on the night in question and because defendant was able to provide other probative evidence establishing the victim's identity, his need for the photographs was slight. Rodriguez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5651 (Tex. App. Waco July 18 2007).

1647. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of a prior assault under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), because the extraneous offense served to show that it was more probable that defendant would sexually assault girls younger than fourteen, and the jury was given a limiting instruction to consider the testimony only to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication; the witness testified that defendant sexually assaulted her when she was twelve years old, and without the witness's testimony, the State only had the victim's testimony to prove the charged offenses took place, testimony contradicted by defendant's testimony and the testimony of friends of the victim that the victim indicated nothing happened between her and defendant. Braz v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5531 (Tex. App. Dallas July 16 2007).

1648. In a suit on a sworn account brought by a law firm to recover its legal fees, the trial court questioned the law firm's principal witness to establish that the underlying legal matter was settled. The trial court acted within its discretion in attempting to limit the jury's exposure to needless and possibly confusing or misleading evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 403; the trial court did not impermissibly comment on the weight of the evidence. Alam v. Wilshire & Scott, P.C., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5501 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 12 2007).

1649. Trial court properly admitted evidence of a protective order defendant's wife had obtained against him during defendant's capital murder trial because: (1) the State was entitled to prove intent through evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts as defendant's cross-examination of the State's witnesses brought his intent into question as a defensive theory; (2) because the detectives found the protective order in defendant's truck, its introduction was relevant to help the jury understand how the circumstances surrounding the charged crime fit together; and (3) the protective order was highly probative as the wife secured it a few months before her death and a copy of the order was found in defendant's truck, and the jury heard about it only briefly. Price v. State, 245 S.W.3d 532, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5294 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

1650. Under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant did not preserve for review the complaint that the prejudicial value of a witness's testimony outweighed its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403; although defendant used the word "prejudicial" in an objection, the trial court construed the objection as an objection to the nonresponsive nature of the witness's answer, such that defendant did not obtain a ruling on his Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection, and he did not object to the trial court's failure to rule on this objection. Bass v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5344 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 5 2007).

1651. In a capital murder case, evidence of appellant's gang affiliation was properly admitted pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 402 because it was relevant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice as described in Tex. R. Evid. 403; there was ample evidence connecting appellant to the gang and their plan regarding the victim, and it included the gang's violent activities. Moreover, the evidence was not admitted to show that the murder was gang activity, but that it was predictable that a homicide would occur as the result of the conspiracy, in which some participants were violent gang members, to rob the victim. Arroyo v. State, 239 S.W.3d 282, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5111 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007).

1652. Record indicated that defendant objected under "4 or 3," which the court presumed was a typographical error by the court reporter because defendant went on to urge that a videotape was far more prejudicial than probative, which the court interpreted as a reference to Tex. R. Evid. 403. Akins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4989 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 28 2007).

1654. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses concerning defendant's sexual abuse of other family members because the trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that defendant's brother's testimony created a false impression as to the observations of defendant's family members regarding his behavior around women and children; the trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the testimony was highly probative of the veracity of the brother's statement indicating that none of his family members had ever seen defendant do anything inappropriate around a child. Hassenplug v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4998 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 28 2007).

1655. Defense counsel never invoked Tex. R. Evid. 403 or claimed that the probative value of evidence was outweighed by prejudice, and a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection was not implicitly contained in a relevancy objection, which counsel did make, and thus the probative value/prejudice argument was not preserved for appeal. Blanco v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5008 (Tex. App. El Paso June 28 2007).

1656. Defendant contended that the issue for the court was whether reversible error occurred because the jury heard defendant's wife's testimony regarding possible other crimes under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), which could not have been disregarded, however, a mistrial could only be granted where there had been error first, and in this case, it would have been the jury hearing inadmissible evidence; defendant did not request or obtain a ruling on the admissibility of the evidence other than based on his motion in limine, and the trial court's ruling on that motion did not address the admissibility of the evidence, but only that a hearing would have to be held on admissibility before the State would be free to mention such matters; defendant's brief also did not challenge or address the admissibility of the statement in question, either in terms of relevance or unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and without demonstrating that the statement in question was inadmissible, defendant's contentions that the trial court violated the motion in limine and the statement could not have been disregarded by the jury did not demonstrate that the trial court erred in denying his mistrial motion. Nitsche v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4926 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 26 2007).

1657. Although defendant's brief contended that a doctor's testimony was exactly what was in the victim's medical record, the brief cited no portions of the record where there was any duplication, let alone any duplication that could have been unfairly prejudicial; he claimed that admitting the redacted portion of the record was highly prejudicial, but his argument would have suggested that any redacted exhibit would have been inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and thus he failed to demonstrate error in the admission of the medical records. Rivera v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4931 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 26 2007).

1658. In defendant's trial for attempted sexual assault, defendant's ex-girlfriend's application for a protective order was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 because the application was some evidence that the ex-girlfriend no longer wanted a relationship with defendant and that the encounter with defendant was not consensual; any Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection was waived because it was not raised to the trial court and the Tex. R. Evid. 401 objection did not preserve the complaint under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Sapp v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4790 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 21 2007).

1659. Court did not violate defendant's right to confrontation under the Sixth Amendment in a sexual assault on a child case by limiting cross examination of the victim and his mother about the victim's alleged behavioral problems because the evidence in question was not relevant to punishment under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07; in addition, because Tex. R. Evid. 403 fell within the exceptions to the Confrontation Clause, the trial court did not violate the Confrontation Clause in limiting defendant's cross examination. Dinger v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4767 (Tex. App. Tyler June 20 2007).

1660. Any error in admitting certain evidence, a statement about defendant being on probation, without the State having responded to a request for notice under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the reference to an extraneous offense was in a recorded statement by defendant that was produced in discovery well before trial, and it strained credulity to think that defendant was not on notice that the State intended to use the videotape in which defendant confessed to the crime, and the admission of the evidence was not overly prejudicial for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, as the statement in question did not undermine his defense theory. Hopson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4851 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 20 2007).

1661. Where defendant was alleged to have committed a sexual assault against a thirteen-year-old child, trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 by admitting the child's testimony of defendant's use and sale of marijuana; the evidence was admissible to show the attempt by defendant to cultivate a relationship with the child; it took only a few moments to present the evidence and there was little chance that this evidence distracted the jury from the consideration of the indicted offense. Valdez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4612 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 12 2007).

1662. In a medical malpractice case, the probative value of statements from superseded pleadings regarding two nonsuited doctors was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because counsel, representing the parents of an injured child, first alluded to the doctor's party status, thus opening the door to rebuttal, and the statements, which were made by the parents, constituted admissions by party-opponents under Tex. R. Evid. 801, and were not hearsay. Bay Area Healthcare Group, Ltd. v. McShane, 239 S.W.3d 231, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 527, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 866 (Tex. 2007).

1663. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence the bra and shirt that the victim was wearing at the time of the stabbing under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because they were admitted to show where the knife went into the victim's torso, which could orient the jury to the location and nature of the victim's wounds. Matez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4418 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 7 2007).

1664. Evidence of gang affiliation was properly admitted as relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 402 since it was offered to show a motive for a murder; the evidence was not limited under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and the probative value substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Rodrigues v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4441 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 7 2007).

1665. Trial court's decision during defendant's trial for sexually molesting his stepdaughter to allow the report of the sexual assault nurse examiner in evidence was not outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. The probative value of the report was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice where: (1) the report spoke directly to the offense, and, as such, it did not confuse or distract the jury from the main issue; (2) although the report was cumulative evidence and was, therefore, not essential to the State's case, the presentation of the evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time; (3) the report did not have a tendency to be given undue weight by a jury that had not been equipped to evaluate the probative force of the evidence because at the time of its admission, the jury had already heard the testimony of the victim and the investigating officer, and thus the description of the assaults could not have surprised the jury; and (4) unfair prejudice did not arise from the mere fact that evidence injured defendant's case. Rivas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4395 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 6 2007).

1666. Defendant's death sentence after being convicted of capital murder was appropriate, in part because the trial court did not err in admitting autopsy photographs since the medical examiner used the autopsy photographs to help explain his testimony about the victim's gunshot wounds. Saldano v. State, 232 S.W.3d 77, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 698 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1232, 128 S. Ct. 1446, 170 L. Ed. 2d 278, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 2119 (2008).

1667. In a burglary case, a Tex. R. Evid. 403 argument based on a decision to admit a prior deadly conduct conviction was meritless because there was no argument on why such a ruling made at a bench conference conveyed an opinion on guilt, in violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.05. Cooper v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4342 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 5 2007).

1668. Evidence of defendant mentioning an attorney on the tape was inadmissible because its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and therefore it should have been suppressed; although the evidence had some probative value as evidence of defendant's speech pattern, the State did not have a distinct need for the evidence in light of other portions of the tape providing the same evidence; the error was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because the evidence of guilt was not overwhelming, as it consisted of only defendant's refusal to perform a breath test, his slow speech, and his poor performance on a horizontal gaze nystagmus test. Lajoie v. State, 237 S.W.3d 345, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4318 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

1669. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding from evidence during sentencing the plea-bargained punishments assessed against defendant's nontestifying accomplices because the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 as public policy favored the conclusion of litigation by compromise and settlement. Eichelberger v. State, 232 S.W.3d 225, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4331 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

1670. In defendant's murder trial, testimony that a witness bought drugs from defendant out of his apartment was relevant because it rebutted the suggestion that defendant had no interest in any of the drugs that might have been stolen from the apartment, and the evidence was not subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because (1) the testimony went to defendant's motive, (2) the testimony consisted of only two questions, (3) the State needed to establish a motive, and (4) the evidence was not likely to impress the jury in some irrational way. Freeman v. State, 230 S.W.3d 392, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3965 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

1671. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not err by admitting testimony that the cadaver dogs alerted on the scent of human remains because the evidence was not more prejudicial than probative of whether defendant had disposed of the murder victim's body where he said that he did, and the evidence did not point to other suspects. Trejos v. State, 243 S.W.3d 30, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4045 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

1672. In defendant's capital murder case, admission of evidence of defendant's "hidden pregnancies" and the abandonment of another infant were properly admitted because the State argued that the subsequent hidden pregnancy and abandonment of the infant showed that defendant "was keeping the children fathered by one man, and discarding the children fathered by other men," thus demonstrating her motive and her intent to kill the child. Berry v. State, 233 S.W.3d 847, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 651 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1673. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it allowed the State to present testimony by one victim's mother that the victim acted afraid of defendant when she saw him in court prior to the start of trial because the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect; the State introduced the evidence to rebut defendant's defensive theory that the victims and the mother recently fabricated the allegation of sexual abuse as revenge for defendant's dishonest conduct in an aborted automobile swap and for paying the other victim's mother for sex; the evidence directly rebutted defendant's defensive theory, the time involved in the disputed testimony was short, encompassing just over two pages in the reporter's record of the trial, and the State needed the testimony to rebut defendant's theory. Cirlos v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3774 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 17 2007).

1674. Probative value of three extraneous aggravated robbery offenses was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice where the evidence made it more probable that the appellant was the person who caused the victim's death and the trial court had instructed the jury to limit consideration of the evidence to the issues of motive, intent, and identity. Baskin v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3803 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 17 2007).

1675. In a strict product liability action, the trial court properly excluded evidence regarding the drug use and prior kidnapping conviction of the deceased, an individual involved in a vehicle accident, because the evidence added nothing to the central issue of the trial, the design defect of a seat belt buckle, and the risk of unfair prejudice greatly outweighed the probative value of the evidence. The vehicle manufacturer did not establish that the exclusion of the evidence probably resulted in an incorrect judgment. AlliedSignal, Inc. v. Moran, 231 S.W.3d 16, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3883, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17758 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2007).

1676. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense at the guilt-innocence phase of defendant's aggravated robbery trial for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403; evidence that defendant stole the victim's van and traded it for drugs served to make the fact or consequence that defendant committed the crime more probable by providing a possible motive, the testimony was brief and not emphasized by the State, the jury was not irrationally impressed, and the evidence was necessary for the State. Washington v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3699 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 10 2007).

1677. Although defendant made a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection, defendant failed to make any argument pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403 and thus defendant waived error, if any. Craig v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3524 (Tex. App.

Tyler May 9 2007).

1678. Trial court did not err in limiting the scope of defense counsel's cross-examination, for confrontation purposes; the court found that (1) certain testimony was cumulative under Tex. R. Evid. 403, (2) counsel's proffered question sought evidence to rebut testimony that the victim was a fun person, not to show another pertinent fact, such as defendant's assertion that he acted in self-defense, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404, and (3) whether the witness took a gun from defendant was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Jones v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3527 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 9 2007).

1679. In a sexual assault case in which the complainants were an adult and a child, evidence that defendant possessed sex toys and nude photos was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401 for the purpose of showing how defendant was grooming the complainants, and this evidence was not overly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Petronella v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3198 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 26 2007).

1680. On review of defendant's conviction for indecency with a child, he cited to various portions of the record where he allegedly requested the trial court to conduct a Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test; defendant's relevancy objection was not sufficient to preserve the error for review. Ficarro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 26 2007).

1681. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, the State was permitted to admit evidence of pornographic photos taken from defendant's computer which depicted the kind of activity in which he was alleged to have engaged in; under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the probative value of the photographs substantially outweighed their prejudicial effect. Ficarro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 26 2007).

1682. Trial court properly excluded evidence of extraneous acts under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) related to defendant's codefendant, as even if it was relevant, it was inadmissible for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that the evidence, which did not amount to a "signature act" by codefendant, carried little probative weight and was highly prejudicial. Moore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3209 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 26 2007).

1683. In a case where defendant murdered her husband, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting prior bad acts evidence that defendant twice shot at her former husband because the evidence was relevant aside from its tendency to show that she acted in conformity with bad character since (1) defendant put the shooter's identity at issue by undermining the evidence against her and advancing the theory that the victim committed suicide; (2) the evidence went to the very fundamental fact of consequence, whether there was an act of murder; and (3) the evidence was relevant to rebut defendant's claim that the victim shot himself; also, under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the evidence was admissible because the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Scott v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3055 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 20 2007).

1684. Because defendant only objected to evidence on relevance grounds, and no separate Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection was specifically made to the trial court, that claim was waived. Sapp v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2875 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 17 2007).

1685. Given defendant's reason to admit the evidence, a videotaped statement of the child victim, to show demeanor and character, the trial court would have been within its discretion to exclude the evidence because the videotape would have been cumulative of the victim's trial testimony, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, and because the court found that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence on non-hearsay grounds, the court did not need to analyze whether the evidence fell within an exception to the hearsay rule under

Tex. R. Evid. 803(1), for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 47.1; the court noted that had the tape been offered to show the truth of the matters asserted, it would have been hearsay under Tex. R. Evid. 801(d). Shanta v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2887 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 12 2007).

1686. Regarding the introduction of defendant's children's medical records in defendant's felony injury to a child trial, in which the State's theory was that defendant, the mother, had Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy (MSBP), the court found that the evidence that defendant induced illnesses in her children could have affected the jury in an emotional way, and many witnesses spent significant time testifying about matters in the records, but showing defendant had MSBP was critical to establish motive and provide context for the offense, and while prejudicial to defendant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, it was not unfairly prejudicial and the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence. Austin v. State, 222 S.W.3d 801, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2739 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

1687. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because defendant did not show that the verdict was unduly prejudiced by the testimony; intent was at issue and the testimony made a fact of consequence, that defendant acted intentionally, more probable, and the State did not mention the testimony in closing arguments. Bookman v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2681 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 5 2007).

1688. Although a patient made an offer of proof, the patient failed to make any argument as to why evidence of a surgeon's reputation in the medical community and alleged mistreatment of other patients was improperly excluded or why it should have been admitted, and the patient failed to specify the purpose for which the evidence was offered; because both steps were required to avoid waiver, the patient failed to preserve certain issues for review. Montgomery v. Varon, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2582 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 3 2007).

1689. Patient's claim that an expert's testimony concerning a radiologist's alleged mistreatment and misdiagnosis of patients other than the patient was not properly preserved for review, because although the patient included some evidence in this regard in an offer of proof, the patient failed to state why the evidence was improperly excluded or why it should have been admitted, and the patient failed to specify the purpose for which the evidence was offered; in any event, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding this evidence given that the expert's testimony in one aspect amounted to pure speculation and the patient did not establish how the testimony was material to the radiologist's interpretation of certain scans, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding the testimony was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, or that even if relevant, its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Montgomery v. Varon, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2582 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 3 2007).

1690. In defendant's trial for attempted sexual assault, the trial court erred in admitting evidence of a prior conviction of indecency with a child, which was an extraneous offense, and while the conviction might have been relevant, such did not make it admissible, given that (1) the evidence was unnecessary because the acts currently charged spoke for themselves, (2) the probative value of the extraneous conviction was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial impact for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, as the evidence had the potential for improperly influencing the jury and more than just a small amount of attention was focused on the extraneous crime, (3) given the victim's testimony, the need for the extraneous conviction was slight, and (4) the evidence was used in a way to illustrate a modus operandi, such that the use of the prior conviction had the risk of confusion or misinterpretation. Bjorgaard v. State, 220 S.W.3d 555, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2514 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

1691. Admission of an extraneous conviction amounted to harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); while there was enough evidence to convict defendant of attempted sexual assault without the conviction, there was some contradictory evidence and the error involved the introduction of evidence, a prior conviction for indecency with a child, that was inherently inflammatory; although the trial court gave a limiting instruction, the relevance of the evidence was suspect and the court had little choice but to recognize the high likelihood that the prior conviction influenced one or more of the jurors. Bjorgaard v. State, 220 S.W.3d 555, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2514 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

1692. In an aggravated sexual assault case, the court properly allowed a neighbor's testimony that on two occasions she caught defendant looking into her daughters' bedrooms while the girls were undressing because it demonstrated that defendant displayed an inappropriate sexual interest in teenage girls, thus rebutting the defensive theory that he was the victim of a frame-up; in addition, the evidence was probative of defendant's intent to commit the sexual offenses against the victims by showing that he had a similar pattern of gratifying his sexual desires through watching the neighbor's daughters undress, the evidence, which did not involve any physical touching, was not worse than the charged offenses and was not graphic, and the State's need for the evidence was significant. Mayfield v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2545 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 29 2007).

1693. In a sexual assault case, the court properly admitted evidence that defendant sexually abused his stepdaughter because if the jury believed that defendant committed the extraneous offenses, that made it more probable that the victim was not fabricating her allegations against defendant; although the evidence did not tend to disprove fabrication directly, it tended circumstantially to prove that the victim did not fabricate her allegations, both parties argued to the jury that it could not consider the evidence apart from those circumstances and for that purpose, and the State's presentation of the testimony of which defendant complained was brief. Newton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2477 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 28 2007).

1694. Where defendant was charged with aggravated robbery based on his involvement in a gang-style offense with two other men, the trial court did not err in admitting into evidence an extraneous robbery that was committed by two or three Hispanic men; the facts of the robberies were similar, and personal documents taken during the extraneous robbery were found in defendant's apartment; under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court found that the probative value of the evidence substantially outweighed any prejudicial affect that it might have. Gonzalez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2318 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2007).

1695. While the court strongly questioned the State's need for including the evidence, allowing testimony that defendant's DNA profile was found in a database was not an abuse of discretion on the trial court's part for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403; the court found that (1) although relevant to show how police focused their attention on defendant, the evidence was not necessary to show a fact of consequence in proving defendant committed the aggravated sexual assault, (2) the testimony had the potential to impress the jury in an irrational manner, but the testimony that the database was analogous to a fingerprint database that held government employees' fingerprints prevented the court from reaching the conclusion that the jury was irrationally impressed, and (3) the time the State needed to develop the evidence was minimal. Mata v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2319 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2007).

1696. Child victim's cousin's testimony that defendant had molested her in the past was highly probative and an important part of the State's case of indecency with a child because whether the offensive touching occurred was contested; because two witnesses testified to lack of opportunity, the cousin's testimony gave credibility to the victim's testimony, and given that the time the State needed to develop the extraneous offense evidence was minimal, the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the evidence's probative value. Maldonado v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2276 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 22 2007).

1697. During defendant's criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 by determining that the probative value of the autopsy photographs of the three victims was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Although the photographs were gruesome, they depicted nothing more than the reality of the brutal crime committed. Confer v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2002 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 15 2007).

1698. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence consisting of defendant's 1979 statement in which he admitted setting a fire that caused a person's death because there were no eyewitnesses, defendant had joined in placing identity at issue by claiming that another person who had quarreled with his brother was the perpetrator, and the 1979 offense was highly compelling evidence that made defendant's identity challenge much less probable. Powell v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 15 2007).

1699. Although defendant claimed that the admission of exhibits of handguns was overly prejudicial for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, by the time the handguns were admitted, testimony was admitted without objection that the handguns had been seized from defendant's shed, witnesses testified that defendant was armed during the offense, and defendant testified to keeping guns and arming himself and codefendants, such that the court found the admission of the exhibits either did not influence the jury or had but a slight effect under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2, and thus error, if any, was harmless. Denton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1706 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 7 2007).

1700. During defendant's trial for the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant sold or pawned jewelry and other items stolen from the victims' residence over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection; the evidence was relevant to prove that defendant knew that the truck was stolen and the probative value of the challenged evidence outweighed the danger that it might impress the jury in some irrational way. O'Donnell v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1551 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 1 2007).

1701. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence photographs found in defendant's home depicting unidentified women who were naked and unconscious under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because they had a logical relevance apart from character conformity; there were numerous similarities between the charged incident, sexual assault, and the photographs, and the photographs were relevant to rebut the defensive theories that the complainant brought the GHB, initiated the sexual activity, and consented to the photographic depiction of it; the risk of unfair prejudice from admitting the photographs did not substantially outweigh their probative value because the photographs were circumstantial evidence that the complainant did not consent in the offense and the evidence demonstrated a modus operandi of group sex, drugs, and photography and rebutted the defensive theory that the complainant brought the drugs, initiated the sex, and consented to the photography. Casey v. State, 215 S.W.3d 870, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 230 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

1702. In a juvenile defendant's murder case, the court did not err by admitting a videotape of the crime scene, although nine photographs of the crime scene were also admitted, because an officer testified that the video depicted items not included in the photographs such as the path that the cab took once it left the pavement, some blood spatter on a house, a tennis shoe in the driveway, and the position of the body inside the cab. In re E.C.D., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1270 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 21 2007).

1703. Appellate court considers rulings on relevance and Tex. R. Evid. 403 objections under an abuse of discretion standard. Gore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1124 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 15 2007).

1704. Defendant appeared to argue that a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to evidence of defendant's flight should have been sustained because evidence that tended to rebut the inference of guilt from defendant's flight would have been too prejudicial, had it been elicited on cross-examination; however, the unfair prejudice in Tex. R. Evid. 403 must come from the offered evidence itself, not from evidence that would have to be offered in rebuttal, and to the extent this argument constituted a separate appellate issue, it was overruled. Gore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1124 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 15 2007).

1705. In an intoxication manslaughter with a deadly weapon case, an enhanced videotape of the accident revealed that it was highly probative of the fact and manner of an officer's death; thus, it was clearly relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Adams v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1165 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 15 2007).

1706. In defendant's trial for causing serious bodily injury to a child, the trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 by admitting hospital and autopsy photographs of the child because they were admitted during the testimony of both the treating physician and the medical examiner who performed the autopsy, both testified as to the child's injuries, and the autopsy photographs, coupled with the examiner's testimony, provided crucial evidence of the severe force used by defendant to inflict the child's injuries. Rodriguez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 460 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 25 2007).

1707. In defendant's murder trial, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of defendant's connection to a street gang, as it was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403; the evidence was relevant to rebut the claim that defendant was not a violent person and tended to make it more probable that defendant was willing to use deadly force in situations where defendant was not directly threatened with serious injury or death, and defendant's willingness to use deadly force made it more probable than not that defendant was not acting in self defense when the victim was shot; the likelihood that the evidence impressed the jury in an irrational way was slight, the evidence was not graphic and defendant never admitted to being a gang member, the State's need for the evidence was high, and the time needed to develop the evidence was minimal. Alvarez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 386 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 18 2007).

1708. In defendant's murder trial, the trial court properly admitted autopsy photographs because they had significant probative value as the State used them to rebut defendant's theory that his girlfriend committed the crime by trying to show that a woman was not capable of causing the internal injuries shown, including cutting through bone and cutting all the way from the victim's front and back ribs; for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, and although the photographs were graphic, color photographs that depicted internal body parts separated from the rest of the body, these factors alone did not require exclusion. Hobday v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 109 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 10 2007).

1709. Where the owner of a grocery store was robbed at gunpoint, Tex. R. Evid. 404 permitted the trial court to admit evidence of an extraneous robbery two days earlier to confirm the identity of defendant as the perpetrator of the charged robbery. Any prejudice was substantially attenuated by the trial court's instruction to the jury to consider the evidence only for purposes of identity. Carter v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 75 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 9 2007).

1710. Testimony in defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child concerning the child victim's account of what happened, was prejudicial to defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 403, but although it allowed an inference that the child told a consistent story, it was not likely to inflame the emotions of the jurors and thus was admissible. Gauna v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11128 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 29 2006).

1711. Where defendant was charged with possession of cocaine with intent to deliver in a drug free zone, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence of another sale of cocaine by defendant to the police informant just days after the charged offense; the similarity between the crimes helped identify defendant as the dealer in both instances; the trial court correctly denied defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. Smith v. State, 211 S.W.3d 476, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11133 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

1712. Defendant's conviction for aggravated robbery was appropriate because extraneous-offense evidence was relevant since the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence compellingly served to make it more probable that the identification of the robber as defendant was accurate. Leija v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS

10966 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 21 2006).

1713. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that police found a pistol in the trunk of his car when they arrested him because: (1) the extraneous offense in question, being a felon in possession of a firearm, was never presented to the jury; (2) the victim's description of the pistols used during the robbery general matched the pistol found in defendant's vehicle; (3) the weapon was found in a vehicle that closely matched the victim's description of a vehicle on the scene of the robbery; and (4) admission of the gun did not unfairly prejudice defendant. Young v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11371 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 21 2006).

1714. Admission of two prior similar acts by defendant into evidence did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 or 404(b), and defendant's convictions of sexual assault and impersonation of a public servant should not have been reversed, because the trial court testimony of the complainant and the two witnesses showed that the three incidents all occurred in mid-1997 and were similar in several significant respects. Page v. State, 213 S.W.3d 332, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2446 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1715. On defendant's petition for discretionary review under Tex. R. App. P. 66.3(c), the court held that the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the probative value of the breath test results was not substantially outweighed by the countervailing factors specified in Tex. R. Evid. 403: (1) the inherent probative force of the test results was considerable, as they showed that defendant had consumed a substantial amount of alcohol and therefore tended to make more probable defendant's intoxication when he was driving; (2) the results did not have a tendency to suggest decision on an improper basis, and did not have tendency to confuse or distract the jury from the main issues in the case; (3) the results did not have any tendency to be given undue weight by the jury, as a witness testified that the results could not be used to determine what defendant's breath alcohol concentration was at the time he was stopped; and (4) it was unlikely that presentation of the results would consume an inordinate amount of time or merely repeat evidence already admitted. Gigliobianco v. State, 210 S.W.3d 637, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2450 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1716. In an aggravated robbery case, the court properly allowed the State to present a witness's testimony that defendant had robbed her at gunpoint at a time when defendant's witness testified that he was working for her because the testimony had significant potential value to prove that defendant's alibi witness was not truthful; in light of the instructions given, the evidence did not have the potential to impress the jury in an irrational way, and no other evidence except the witness's significantly assisted the State in contradicting the account of defendant's whereabouts. Davis v. State, 214 S.W.3d 101, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10866 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2006).

1717. Extraneous offense testimony was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the issue of identity and was admissible to prove that defendant posed as a police officer and sexually assaulted a prostitute; the facts of the charged offense and the extraneous offenses showed a pattern of conduct sufficiently distinctive to constitute a signature. Page v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2521 (Dec. 20, 2006).

1718. Evidence of other contraband that police officers found in the room and evidence of the drugs found on the person of defendant's girlfriend, found while executing a search warrant was admissible when defendant was charged with possession of methadone that was found in the room because the evidence tended to establish the requisite affirmative link to the contraband. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10721 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 14 2006).

1719. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence relating to the search of the girlfriend and the discovery of the crack pipe because under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the evidence was relevant to the issue of whether the contraband and drug paraphernalia were present in the house and tended to prove an affirmative link between defendant and the methadone, and therefore the evidence was relevant to show defendant's knowledge or intent to possess the methadone. The probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because it had high probative value in affirmatively linking defendant to the methadone. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2526 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 14, 2006).

1720. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting 14 autopsy photographs into evidence because they were relevant, as they accurately reflected the state of the victim's body when it was discovered and the injuries inflicted on him. None of the photographs were especially large, all were taken from different angles, and they were not gruesome simply because they showed the body in a state of decomposition. Gutierrez v. State, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2211 (Tex. Crim. App. Apr. 21 2004).

1721. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting victim-impact evidence of the victim's parents in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403 because nothing in the record suggested that the State engaged in a comparison of the worth of defendant and the victim; the testimony came from immediate family members who related the uniqueness of the victim's character and the impact of his death on his family. Neither the tenor nor the volume of the evidence was such that it was unfairly prejudicial, nor would any prejudice resulting from the evidence substantially outweigh its probative value. Gutierrez v. State, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2211 (Tex. Crim. App. Apr. 21 2004).

1722. Court properly admitted autopsy photos because, although they were gruesome, they were no more gruesome than the injuries that defendant inflicted upon the victim when he committed the offense of intoxication manslaughter. Each of the six photographs depicted a different view of the victim and showed the different injuries that she suffered, and the State did not offer a large number of photographs, nor were the photographs it offered cumulative of the victim's injuries. Booth v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2351, 2014 WL 887286 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 28 2014).

1723. Detective's testimony was not hearsay because his testimony concerning the police department's prior investigations for the "same type of offense" was not offered to establish that defendant had been investigated for or committed other instances of indecent exposure. Rather, the testimony was offered to explain the course of his investigation and how defendant came to be a suspect, which was an acceptable, non-hearsay purpose for admitting an out-of-court statement. Denmon v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2180, 2014 WL 857671 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 27 2014).

1724. As a police officer had reasonable suspicion to detain defendant based upon the information in the NCIC system, such that ownership of the vehicle was not relevant to the detention, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence regarding the actual ownership of the vehicle that defendant was in when he was stopped. Thornton v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2273, 2014 WL 813745 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 27 2014).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

1725. Although the evidence from the neighbor's apartment was not same transaction contextual evidence and the trial court abused its discretion in admitting it, the error was harmless given that the extent of the other evidence for defendant's guilt because the State found the marijuana hidden in defendant's truck, an officer observed defendant exit the apartment building appearing to hide something under his shirt, and defendant chose to lead police on a high-speech chase instead of submitting to the traffic stop. Gonzalez v. State, 510 S.W.3d 10, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8934 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

1726. Court did not err in refusing to exclude the extraneous offense testimony to rebut a defensive theory of fabrication, because the extraneous evidence tended to make the defensive claim of fabrication less probable, and the extraneous offense evidence was probative to rebut defendant's defensive theories that defendant was not the type of person who would sexually abuse a child and that the abuse allegations were fabricated. Shockley v. State,

2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8345, 2014 WL 3756301 (Tex. App. Dallas July 30 2014).

1727. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of the victim's half-sister about sexual abuse that defendant had inflicted upon her under this rule because it tended to rebut defendant's theory that the victim had fabricated her claims and there were similarities between defendant's conduct as described by both. The prejudicial effect of the testimony did not substantially outweigh its probative value because it was not so graphic as to be worse than the specifics to which the victim had already testified. Hosey v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7876, 2014 WL 3621796 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 23 2014).

1728. Murder victim's girlfriend was properly allowed to testify regarding an attempted drive-by shooting defendant committed against the victim, during which she was shot in the hand, and which occurred ten months before the murder, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Jones v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7739, 2014 WL 3556587 (Tex. App. Waco July 17 2014).

1729. Evidence of methamphetamine found at the murder scene was properly admitted because it was relevant to establish a motive for defendant's actions and to rebut her claim of accidentally shooting the victim; there was no evidence presented that defendant was in possession of the drugs, and the evidence was admissible because the jury could infer that the prior relationship between the victim and defendant was one that involved drugs. Taylor v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7282 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 3 2014).

1730. Where appellant was convicted for indecency with a child by exposure, it was not an abuse of discretion to admit under Tex. R. Evid. 403 the extraneous offense testimony of a nephew, who testified that appellant had sexually assaulted the nephew when the nephew was 14 years old, because the factors weighed in favor of admission since, inter alia, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the State's need for the extraneous offense evidence was high. Laube v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7076, 2014 WL 2993823 (Tex. App. Dallas June 30 2014).

1731. Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the jury to hear evidence of defendant's prior conviction for possession of cocaine because the evidence made defendant's intent and his knowledge of the cocaine in his pocket more probable. Further, in light of the evidence presented, the trial court could have reasonably found that the State needed the evidence of the prior conviction to show that defendant knowingly possessed the cocaine. Rios v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5867 (Tex. App. El Paso May 30 2014).

1732. Witness's testimony that defendant coerced her through his position as police officer, took her to the same place as the victim in this case to assault her, and did so on the same night strongly rebutted defendant's defensive argument that the victim was fabricating her story in order to gain a U-Visa and a civil-lawsuit victory. Because the extraneous-offense evidence was so similar to the charged offense, it was probative as modus operandi evidence to rebut the issue of intent. Joseph v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5712 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 29 2014).

1733. In defendant's trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child under fourteen years of age, evidence from two of the victim's cousins that defendant also molested them while they were visiting defendant and sleeping in the same bed with the victim was contextual and therefore admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b).

THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH August 16, 2020

Rule 404 Character Evidence; Crimes or Other Acts

(a) Character Evidence.

(1) Prohibited Uses.--Evidence of a person's character or character trait is not admissible to prove that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character or trait.

(2) Exceptions for an Accused.

(A) In a criminal case, a defendant may offer evidence of the defendant's pertinent trait, and if the evidence is admitted, the prosecutor may offer evidence to rebut it.

(B) In a civil case, a party accused of conduct involving moral turpitude may offer evidence of the party's pertinent trait, and if the evidence is admitted, the accusing party may offer evidence to rebut it.

(3) Exceptions for a Victim.

(A) In a criminal case, subject to the limitations in Rule 412, a defendant may offer evidence of a victim's pertinent trait, and if the evidence is admitted, the prosecutor may offer evidence to rebut it.

(B) In a homicide case, the prosecutor may offer evidence of the victim's trait of peacefulness to rebut evidence that the victim was the first aggressor.

(C) In a civil case, a party accused of assaultive conduct may offer evidence of the victim's trait of violence to prove self-defense, and if the evidence is admitted, the accusing party may offer evidence of the victim's trait of peacefulness.

(4) Exceptions for a Witness.--Evidence of a witness's character may be admitted under Rules 607, 608, and 609.

(5) Definition of "Victim." --In this rule, "victim" includes an alleged victim.

(b) Crimes, Wrongs, or Other Acts.

(1) Prohibited Uses.--Evidence of a crime, wrong, or other act is not admissible to prove a person's character in order to show that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character.

(2) Permitted Uses; Notice in Criminal Case.--This evidence may be admissible for another purpose, such as proving motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, absence of mistake, or lack of accident. On timely request by a defendant in a criminal case, the prosecutor must provide reasonable notice before trial that the prosecution intends to introduce such evidence - other than that arising in the same transaction - in its case-in-chief.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Pretrial Matters : Separate Trials

1. Trial court did not err in denying a juvenile's motion to sever six counts of aggravated sexual assault for separate trials, in part because the juvenile made no showing that evidence of the extraneous offenses would not have been admissible in severed cases. In re D.L., 160 S.W.3d 155, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1447 (Tex. App. Tyler 2005).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review

2. Objection on relevance grounds did not preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1) as to an asserted Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) error. Helping Hands Home Care, Inc. v. Home Health of Tarrant County, Inc., 393 S.W.3d 492, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 820, 2013 WL 326319 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 29 2013).

3. Error was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 in a negligence case with regard to spoliation of evidence in the context of a venue transfer and the admission of character evidence at trial because no request was made to deem venue facts established as a sanction for discovery misconduct under Tex. R. Civ. P. 215.2(b)(3) and no objections were raised to the admission of testimony reflecting on character under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a), (b). Duff v. Spearman, 322 S.W.3d 869, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7420 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion

4. Evidence that defendant had previously choked and violently sexually assaulted an individual 12 years ago was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to aid the jury in determining that the victim did not consent to sexual intercourse with defendant because the evidence of the other crime only showed character conformity which is not a proper purpose for admission under Rule 404(b). Curtis v. State, 89 S.W.3d 163, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 6915 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

Computer & Internet Law : Criminal Offenses : General Overview

5. In a trial for defendant's online harassment of a psychic, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 in admitting evidence that before and after the offense, defendant sent the victim a condom and panties because it showed intent to harm the victim, rather than to test her psychic abilities, when masquerading online as her hairdresser. Taylor v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2279, 2012 WL 955383 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 22 2012).

6. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, 404 in admitting a video of a social networking page, on which defendant was depicted holding a gun. The evidence was relevant because a witness testified that the gun in the video was the same gun the witness saw defendant use in the murder; it wass unlikely that the jury would have felt compelled to convict defendant of murder simply because he acted like a "bad boy" and brandished a weapon on camera. Brumfield v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10137, 2010 WL 5187690 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 23 2010).

Computer & Internet Law : Criminal Offenses : Child Pornography

7. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of a grandchild, there was no error in admitting evidence of child pornography seized from defendant's computer because the evidence rebutted defendant's testimony that defendant would not abuse the victim because the victim was a blood relative and that defendant did not have the same type of urge for children. Garreans v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 852 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 5 2008).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Procedural Due Process : Double Jeopardy

8. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404, because appellant was not prosecuted for the extraneous offense of the attempted murder of his mother-in-law in his trial for the murder of his estranged wife, his constitutional right to double jeopardy protection under the Fifth Amendment and Tex. Const. art. I, § 14 was not implicated; thus, appellant's constitutional right guarantee against double jeopardy was not violated. Milner v. State, 263 S.W.3d 353, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1457 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2008).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Procedural Due Process : Scope of Protection

9. In a case involving indecency with a child, defendant's due process rights were not violated by the admission of extraneous offense evidence because it was admissible to rebut the contention that a victim was fabricating her allegations and that defendant was not the type of person who would have engaged in these acts. Bass v. Tex., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736, 2009 WL 3839003 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 18 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : General Overview

10. In a drug trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), Rule 608(a) in excluding evidence, offered to show bias, that an officer was investigated for planting drugs on a defendant in an unrelated case because the allegations were determined to be unfounded. Brown v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5432, 2010 WL 2772488 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 14 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Delivery, Distribution & Sale

11. Defendant's murder indictment alleged that defendant murdered the victim in retaliation for her cooperation with the police, which eventually led to defendant's conviction for delivery of cocaine; thus, the prior drug conviction was not an irrelevant, extraneous offense that showed only that defendant was a criminal generally. Therefore, the admission of two photographs related to that conviction and the cross-examination by the State regarding those photographs and his prior drug conviction were not erroneous. Russell v. State, 155 S.W.3d 176, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 150 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Manufacture : General Overview

12. In a trial for manufactured methamphetamine, there was no error in the admission of evidence concerning a subsequent arrest, seven months later, for possession of chemicals with intent to manufacture methamphetamine. That evidence tended to make less probable defendant's argument that he possessed items used to manufacture methamphetamine solely for use in bartering for drugs; because it refuted a defense, had relevance separate from character conformity and was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Tarpley v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6289 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 10 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8782 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 24, 2005).

13. In a criminal prosecution for possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver or manufacture, the trial court properly admitted evidence that defendant had some chemicals and scales at his house before the police raid where this rebuttal evidence was admissible to show the defensive theory that defendant knew nothing on the subject of methamphetamine lacked merit. Revill v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5654 (Tex. App. Tyler June 23 2004).

14. In a possession and manufacture of methamphetamine case, admission of evidence regarding defendant's arrest in another county was proper as issues of who was in care, custody, or control of the clandestine laboratory equipment and the methamphetamine, and of defendant's intent and knowledge, were in dispute, and that he had the same type of equipment used in the manufacture on his own property in the other county was therefore relevant to those issues. Tullos v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5186 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 9 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : General Overview

15. Evidence of trace quantities of controlled substances that were found in defendant's car during the same search in which the methadone was found was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), even though it was not admissible as same transaction contextual evidence, because the evidence constituted a recognized link to drug possession and refuted defendant's contention that his possession of the pill bottle containing methadone was merely inadvertent. Lamkin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6484, 2010 WL 3170647 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 12 2010).

16. In a case in which defendant was convicted of felony possession of a controlled substance by fraud under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.129(a)(5), (d), the trial court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence where, to the extent that there were differences between the instant offense and the extraneous offense, the offenses were sufficiently similar to be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) for purposes of proving defendant's identity because: (1) the two offenses were committed within six weeks of each other; (2) in each instance, defendant presented a fraudulent prescription for 120 pills of dihydrocodeinone (an amount far in excess of normal prescription amounts); (3) the prescription slip had been created using an incorrect typeface and physician signature (as opposed to theft of an actual physician's prescription pad); (4) neither named physician had a patient by the name of the person listed on the prescription to receive the dihydrocodeinone; and (5) an employee from each pharmacy noticed defendant's distinctive tattoo and identified him from a photo line-up. Greer v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5632, 2010 WL 2813404 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2010).

17. In trial for possession of methamphetamine, extraneous offense evidence pertaining to other controlled substances and illegal narcotics found at the same time as the methamphetamine was properly admitted because it was relevant to an affirmative links analysis and was not likely to impress a jury in an irrational but nevertheless indelible way, given that the evidence supporting the charged offense was far more damaging. Johnson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7773 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 27 2007).

18. Drug use is not an essential element of the crime of possession of a controlled substance; a defendant may not, therefore, use specific instances of drug use; rather, he may only use reputation or opinion testimony to prove his good character. Norton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2006).

19. In defendant's drug case, a court did not err by admitting "extraneous offense" evidence of his meeting with an undercover agent the morning of his arrest because defendant's presence at and participation in the negotiation regarding the drugs was not a separate offense, but was part of the evidence showing that defendant knowingly exercised care, custody, control and management of the marihuana on the date alleged in the indictment; as such, it was part of the charged offense. Urias v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1495 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 23 2006).

20. Where defendant was charged with possession of methamphetamine, a controlled substance, the arresting officer was permitted to testify to finding a sawed-off shotgun during the search of defendant's residence; possession of an illegal weapon qualified as same transaction contextual evidence in the circumstances of this offense, which established affirmative links between the methamphetamine and defendant. Longoria v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1158 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 9 2006).

21. Trial court did not err in admitting items used in the manufacture of methamphetamine and amphetamine in the case against defendant for possession of amphetamine as these items went to the issue of knowledge or criminal intent which was an element in the possession case. Popp v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 631 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 26 2005).

22. In a trial for heroin possession, gang-membership evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404 because the evidence was interlaced with the offense; the offense's obscurity was eliminated with evidence that the defendant was a gang member. The expert testified about the gang's trade being the trafficking of heroin, primarily by using a female's body cavity to transport the contraband, and having that female accompanied by a gang member; defendant was stopped entering the country with a woman who was carrying heroin in her vaginal cavity. Ojeda v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8557 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 24 2004).

23. In a possession and manufacture of methamphetamine case, admission of evidence regarding defendant's arrest in another county was proper as issues of who was in care, custody, or control of the clandestine laboratory equipment and the methamphetamine, and of defendant's intent and knowledge, were in dispute, and that he had the same type of equipment used in the manufacture on his own property in the other county was therefore relevant to those issues. Tullos v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5186 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 9 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Intent to Distribute

24. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting extraneous drug offense evidence because the extraneous offense evidence showed that defendant sold and delivered cocaine to an officer during an undercover buy which took place the day before the search warrant was executed. That extraneous drug offense evidence was relevant to show that defendant had knowledge of the cocaine located within the residence and possessed it with intent to deliver. Banal v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10661, 2012 WL 6681946 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 21 2012).

25. In a trial for drug possession with intent to deliver, evidence that a gun was found with the drugs was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because defendant was also charged with using or exhibiting a deadly weapon during the offense. De La Cruz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2336, 2010 WL 1254537 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 1 2010).

26. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), it was error in a trial for possession with intent to deliver 34 grams of crack cocaine to admit evidence that defendant had previously possessed .88 grams of cocaine because the prior possession did not tend to make defendant's intent to deliver the cocaine in the current case more or less likely. However, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because there was evidence that, while in jail, defendant directed the continued sale of crack cocaine and that the cocaine rocks at issue belonged to him, rendering possession of .88 grams of crack cocaine three years earlier almost insignificant in comparison with his current conduct. De La Cruz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2336, 2010 WL 1254537 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 1 2010).

27. Where defendant was charged with possession of cocaine with intent to deliver in a drug free zone, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence of another sale of cocaine by defendant to the police informant just days after the charged offense; the similarity between the crimes helped identify defendant as the dealer in both instances. Smith v. State, 211 S.W.3d 476, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11133 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Intent to Distribute : Elements

28. In a drug trial, there was no error under Tex. R. App. P. 404(b) in admitting video excerpts showing defendant in a drug house because they showed intent, knowledge, and absence of mistake or accident in light of the indicted possession-with-intent-to-deliver offense. Mincey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2825, 2009 WL 1058734 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 21 2009).

29. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's statement, which contained a list of persons to whom defendant admitted he had sold methamphetamine as well as his admissions that he had bought approximately a half-ounce of methamphetamine every week for the last three years, that he used about a quarter-ounce every week, that he sold the rest, and that he sold enough methamphetamine to support his habit, because those portions of the statement that related to defendant's selling methamphetamine were relevant to proving intent to deliver, which was an essential element of defendant's offense, possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Furthermore, the probative force and the State's need to admit the statement outweighed the factors that favored exclusion because defendant's admission that he regularly sold methamphetamine was compelling evidence that he intended to sell methamphetamine, and his admission further served to rebut his theories that the drugs were planted on him and that the money that he carried when he was arrested had come, not from selling drugs, but from payments from his rental properties. Bridges v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6634 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 29, 2008).

30. Evidence of a defendant's previous drug sales was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404 at his trial for possession of methamphetamine with intent to deliver because this evidence belied his defense that he was unaware of the large amount of methamphetamine hidden in a motel room registered in his name, and it showed his awareness of the drug and his intent to sell it. Hernandez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2634 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 11 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Intent to Distribute : Penalties

31. In a drug case, the State was not collaterally estopped from using evidence of a manufacturing facility as extraneous offense evidence relevant to prove the knowing possession of methamphetamine; because the record of a prior trial where the result was an acquittal and a hung jury was not introduced at trial or made a part of the appellate record, the collateral estoppel claim did not prevail. Tyler v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6462 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 15 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Simple Possession : General Overview

32. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting extraneous-offense evidence during defendant's trial on a charge of possession of less than one gram of cocaine because the extraneous offense, which was committed while defendant was on bail awaiting the instant trial, also involved possession of cocaine thereby establishing defendant's familiarity with the substance and the jury was given an appropriate limiting instruction; the extraneous offense involved over six grams of cocaine. Baker v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11745, 2013 WL 12297784 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 18 2013).

33. In a driving while intoxicated trial, evidence that cocaine was located in plain view next to the driver's seat in the vehicle defendant was driving was relevant to prove the State's allegation in the indictment that defendant was intoxicated, and, because the possession of cocaine evidence went to a material element of the State's case, it was not an extraneous offense. Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2064, 2013 WL 765711 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 28 2013).

34. In a possession of marijuana case, the trial court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as it served to illustrate defendant's involvement in a transaction that started at the residence and included depictions of behavior that tended to show his awareness of the contents (drugs) in the back of the vehicle; he was placed in the garage, where marijuana was found with packaging similar to the packaging of the marijuana found in the vehicle. All of this evidence tended to show the same continuous transaction and to demonstrate defendant's intentional and knowing possession of the marijuana in the vehicle. Duarte v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5837 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Simple Possession : Elements

35. In a drug trial, it was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to admit evidence of recent sting operations that had each led to defendant's arrest for delivery of a controlled substance in order to show defendant's knowledge of the cocaine found in defendant's car. Armstrong v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1328 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 21 2008).

36. In a drug possession trial, evidence of defendant's extraneous violent conduct toward defendant's spouse was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in light of the claim that the drugs found in the spouse's purse belonged to the spouse because the evidence of violent conduct was relevant to show that the spouse feared and was controlled by defendant and that the spouse put the drugs in the purse at defendant's direction. Huneycutt v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9975 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 21 2007).

37. In a trial for possession of marihuana, evidence was properly admitted regarding defendant's prior drug use because it was relevant to whether defendant had the requisite intent and knowledge, issues that defendant contested. Wingfield v. State, 197 S.W.3d 922, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6810 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : General Overview

38. In an assault trial, evidence of defendant's extraneous assault on and arguments with his girlfriend was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the evidence was relevant to proving defendant's motive for returning to the girlfriend's home later that evening and brandishing a gun when confronted by her mother. The assault of the girlfriend was also same transaction contextual evidence, providing the jury with a context to show the relevant surrounding facts and circumstances relating to the assault against the mother. Bazile v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9385, 2010 WL 4813786 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2010).

39. In an assault trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) in admitting evidence of an assault that defendant committed against his common-law wife to rebut his theory of self-defense. White v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5604, 2010 WL 2803018 (Tex. App. Eastland July 15 2010).

40. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated assault, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's prior acts of aggression; the prior violent acts presented by the State were admissible to show defendant's intent and to rebut her theory of self-defense. Vidal v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1913 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 9 2006).

41. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated assault, an officer was permitted to testify that when he was talking to appellant he observed appellant take out a pistol and throw it on the ground. The testimony was relevant to whether the appellant committed aggravated assault by pointing a gun at the complainant just hours before his arrest. Payne v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9785 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 4 2004).

42. In an assault case, evidence of gun possession was properly allowed as an extraneous offense because it was indivisibly connected to the charged offense, and it explained the context of the offense for which defendant was tried; the evidence showed that defendant committed the crime of felon in possession of a handgun by placing a gun in a vehicle before threatening two law enforcement officers. Morales v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3602 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 22 2004).

43. In an assault case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to an extraneous assault offense as being not relevant, unfairly prejudicial, and based on hearsay where the evidence was relevant because it tended to make it more probable that the victim's father was a credible witness; without the evidence, the jury was presented with the impression that he was being evasive and that he was racially biased against defendant. The probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by its prejudicial effect because the evidence presented a reason for the witness's feelings toward defendant, and the extraneous offense was not hearsay because it was not offered to prove that defendant had assaulted the victim in the past; rather, the evidence was admitted to prove that the victim's father disapproved of defendant because of his belief that defendant had assaulted the victim in the past.

Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2775 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 30 2004).

44. In defendant's assault case, a court did not err in admitting testimony that defendant had previously assaulted the victim where the court admitted the testimony in order to remedy an impression created by defendant's cross-examination that the victim's father was being evasive and was racially biased against defendant. By repeatedly questioning the victim's father as to his reason for disapproving of defendant, defendant opened the door to the testimony that the disapproval was due to the prior offense. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2775 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 30 2004).

45. In a criminal prosecution for assault causing bodily injury to a family member, evidence of phone calls defendant made threatening the victim was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to rebut the defense theory that because the victim was not afraid of defendant, the offense did not occur. Martinez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1418 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 12 2004).

46. In a criminal prosecution for assaulting a public servant, the trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 404 by admitting evidence of the defendant's status as a parolee at the time of the offense. Defendant's desire to avoid being incarcerated for violating his parole was the triggering factor of the chain of events that ultimately resulted in the assault of a police officer. Hall v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 489 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 21 2004).

47. Trial judge properly applied the balancing test found in Tex. R. Evid. 403 to exclude from a trial for aggravated assault evidence with respect to the victim's extraneous acts of violence in order to show defendant's state of mind under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Mozon v. State, 991 S.W.2d 841, 1999 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 39 (Tex. Crim. App. 1999).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Aggravated Offenses

48. In a shooting case, it was proper to admit extraneous offenses as same transaction contextual evidence because shooting two other victims at the same place and time as the victim of the charged shooting, flight, and assault on a deputy were relevant to the issues of identity and rebutting defendant's other-shooter theory. Hignojos v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8929 (Tex. App. Eastland July 18 2013).

49. In an aggravated assault case under Tex. Penal Code Ann. §§ 22.01(a)(1) and 22.02(a), defendant was not entitled to use a specific act of violence to show that the victim was the first aggressor as only opinion and reputation testimony was admissible to show the victim's character for violence and defendant's use was an attempt to prove that the victim's conduct in conformity with his violent character, which Tex. R. Evid. 404(a) and 405(a) prohibited; also, the record did not suggest that defendant attempted to use a witness's testimony that the victim had choked her for any admissible purpose. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the witness's testimony. Hawthorne v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1728, 2011 WL 846121 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 9 2011).

50. In a trial for aggravated assault on a public servant, evidence of defendant's assault on his wife earlier the same evening was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 404 as same transaction contextual evidence or as background contextual evidence. The series of events that took place that night was an uninterrupted continuum of conduct that was, in essence, a single event. Hester v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9311, 2009 WL 4597948 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 8 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Aggravated Offenses

51. In an aggravated assault with a deadly weapon case, the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence of prior violence by defendant toward the victim because it could help establish that the breakup motivated defendant to act violently toward the victim and by extension toward the boyfriend who had taken his place beyond the tendency of the evidence to show defendant's inclination toward violence. Gray v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3, 2014 WL 24410 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 2 2014).

52. In an assault trial arising from a drive-by shooting, evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 that defendant, the driver, was charged with the offense of unlawfully carrying a weapon while he was out on bond for the instant case. The evidence was relevant to rebut a defensive theory that defendant did not know a passenger in the backseat possessed a sawed-off shotgun at the time of the drive-by shooting. Ramirez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3245 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 25 2006).

53. In an assault trial arising from a drive-by shooting, evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404 that defendant, the driver, was charged with the offense of unlawfully carrying a weapon while he was out on bond for the instant case; the evidence was relevant to rebut a defensive theory that defendant did not know a passenger in the backseat possessed a sawed-off shotgun at the time of the drive-by shooting. Ramirez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3245 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 25 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Simple Offenses

54. In a trial for assault on a public servant, testimony that defendant was a convicted felon and in possession of drugs and a handgun was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was relevant to motive. Thurman v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 135 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 10 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Coercion : General Overview

55. In a retaliation case, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous offenses as the first threat was sufficiently similar to that charged in the instant case to render it admissible on the issue of intent; the threats were made at the same location, to the same person, close in time, and for the similar purpose of punishing the threatened individual. Woolverton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10502 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 24 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : General Overview

56. Mistrial was not required on a charge of indecency with a child, even though a witness testified regarding an extraneous act after the trial court ruled the evidence inadmissible, because the statement was isolated, did not include details, and was not the result of prosecutorial misconduct. The court presumed that a curative instruction was effective. Vickery v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7664 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 15 2005).

57. In a trial for child sexual assault, testimony about extraneous acts was properly admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 38.37, notwithstanding Tex. R. Evid. 404 and 405. The testimony from a complainant, defendant's stepdaughter, concerned two sexual encounters and was highly probative of both defendant's intent to engage in the charged offenses and the states of mind of defendant and the stepdaughter. Miller v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6227 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 4 2005).

58. In a child abuse case, pictures of injuries suffered by a sibling should not have been admitted because they did not show that defendant caused a cigarette burn on a child's hand where the evidence established that both defendant and the mother had caused the sibling's injuries, and there was no evidence of any cigarette burns of the sibling. Johnston v. State, 145 S.W.3d 215, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1478 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

59. In a child abuse case, pictures of injuries suffered by a sibling should not have been admitted because they did not show an absence of mistake on the part of defendant; defendant contended that a cigarette burn on a child's hand was accidentally caused by the child's mother. Johnston v. State, 145 S.W.3d 215, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1478 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

60. In a child abuse trial, the child's foster mother was properly allowed to testify that when she changed dressings in the child's vaginal area, the child said that her daddy had touched her there. The evidence rebutted the father's defense that the child's burns were accidental, arguably supported a finding that there was a pattern of abuse, and was not explicit in a way that would impress the jury in an irrational and indelible way. Wooten v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4296 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2004).

61. Burglary defendant's statement that his three children were waiting next door during the burglary was properly admitted. The trial court's ruling that the statement did not reveal an extraneous offense or bad act was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; the State also pointed out that evidence was admissible as proof of opportunity. Carter v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3394 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 15 2004).

62. In a murder trial, incidences of domestic violence were properly admitted as an indication of the prior relationship between defendant and the victim, his wife. The significant probative value as to self defense and intent outweighed any prejudice. Heard v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3254 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 8 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Children : General Overview

63. In a trial for the murder of defendant's 4-month-old child, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b) in admitting evidence that defendant physically abused the child's mother. The evidence negated the defense theory that the mother was actually the person who beat the child and caused the fatal injury. Miller v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6693 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 10 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Children

64. There was no error in admitting extraneous offense evidence that defendant parent had cause to believe and failed to report that there was abuse of the child years before the charged offense, because the evidence was relevant to counter the defensive theory that the child was lying both about the abuse and about telling defendant it had occurred. Cannell v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15299, 2013 WL 6729857 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 19 2013).

65. Inappropriate touching reported by a witness occurred in the midst of the on-going sexual abuse at issue in a trial for failure to report; therefore, the testimony did not concern an extraneous offense and prior notice was not required. Cannell v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15299, 2013 WL 6729857 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 19 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Domestic Assault

66. In a trial for assault on a family member, elevated to a third-degree felony by a prior conviction, it was reversible error not to allow defendant to stipulate to one prior conviction for assault on a family member, rather than admitting evidence of two prior convictions. Taylor v. State, 442 S.W.3d 747, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8750 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 8 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Domestic Assault : Elements

67. Trial court's admission of an assault victim's testimony concerning allegations contained in a divorce petition she filed against defendant, if erroneous, was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) where testimony presented by the responding officers and pictures of the victim on the night of the incident revealing redness in the victim's left eye and bruising around the eye were admitted without objection and were amply sufficient to enable the jury to find that defendant, at a minimum, recklessly caused bodily injury to the victim. Furthermore, because the State did not emphasize the divorce petition evidence in its argument to the jury, the victim's testimony regarding the divorce petition had no more than a slight effect, if any, on the jury's decision. Sharp v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3216 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 20 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Domestic Assault : Penalties

68. In the punishment phase of a domestic assault trial, defendant was not entitled to notice of the State's intent to introduce his daughter's statement about an unprosecuted allegation of sexual assault because the court found nothing in the record showing that he requested notice of extraneous offenses before the statement was offered. Sanders v. State, 422 S.W.3d 809, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1090, 2014 WL 325028 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 30 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Kidnapping : General Overview

69. In a kidnapping trial, evidence that the complainant bought Oxycontin from defendant before the complainant learned of her pregnancy was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 403 because it was relevant to the defenses of immunity, necessity, and defense of third person, which were based on a claim that the complainant was endangering and abusing or neglecting her unborn child by consuming Oxycontin while pregnant. Scroggs v. State, 396 S.W.3d 1, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3769, 2010 WL 1993676 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 19 2010).

70. In a case charging that defendant kidnapped a car salesperson to collect a debt, defendant should have been permitted to introduce testimony from five business associates that defendant was an honest, non-violent businessperson, whom they trusted; the evidence was pertinent to the charged crime and admissible to show that, in light of defendant's character, it was unlikely that defendant committed the charged offense. Melgar v. State, 236 S.W.3d 302, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2207 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Robbery : General Overview

71. Because the robberies occurred in the same geographic area within a relatively brief time frame, and all were committed by an assailant who covered his hands with socks or gloves, and whose face was completely covered by a similar covering, leaving only the eyes exposed, there are sufficient common characteristics between each of the robberies, that the extraneous offenses were relevant to prove identity and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 404(b). Heigelmann v. State, 362 S.W.3d 763, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1670, 2012 WL 688427 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 2 2012).

72. In a trial for capital murder arising from a robbery and shooting, it was reversible error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to admit evidence that defendant committed an armed robbery of a grocery store a month after the charged murder. The mere fact that both offenses were armed robberies did not make them sufficiently similar to prove identity; the evidence was not admissible as to intent because intent was not at issue. The other crimes evidence had substantial potential to convince the jury that defendant was a criminal in general and, therefore, probably committed the charged offense. Jackson v. State, 320 S.W.3d 873, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6572 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2010).

73. In a robbery trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting testimony about defendant's prior aggravated assault and criminal mischief. The evidence was relevant to correct a false impression left by defendant's testimony that he had no prior arrests, charges, or trouble with the police and to rebut a defensive theory of duress. Hemphill v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8330, 2009 WL 3488053 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 28 2009).

74. In a robbery trial, substantial similarities supported the admission under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) of evidence of an extraneous offense, when similarities included similarly described perpetrators attempting nighttime robberies of taquerias located in similar neighborhoods when the complainant was alone. In both cases, the perpetrator fitting defendant's description was armed with a pistol, both victims spoke limited English, and the offenders apparently approached and left the taquerias on foot. Vela v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2336 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 27 2007).

75. Where the owner of a grocery store was robbed at gunpoint, Tex. R. Evid. 404 permitted the trial court to admit evidence of an extraneous robbery two days earlier to confirm the identity of defendant as the perpetrator of the charged robbery. There were several similarities between the offenses indicating defendant's handiwork; in both instances, the robber concealed his face by covering it with his shirt and attacked the individuals while they filled a coffee pot next to the cash booth inside the store. Carter v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 75 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 9 2007).

76. In a robbery trial, similarities between an extraneous offense and the charged aggravated robbery offenses were sufficient to allow the introduction of the extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404; the extraneous robbery and the charged robberies all occurred within hours of each other in the same area; each victim was an older female and was dragged or thrown to the ground as her purse was pulled from her arm; defendant's vehicle was used in all three robberies; and the witnesses' descriptions of the perpetrator generally matched defendant. Hutchins v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8464 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 28 2006).

77. In a trial for the robbery of a pickup truck, the trial court properly admitted a police chase video of the robbers' pickup along with testimony about the chase, even though defendant was not in the truck, as well as evidence of three handguns found in the pickup; the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as same transaction contextual evidence because the robbers used their truck to find their target, followed that vehicle to the complainant's residence, and blocked the complainant's vehicle in the driveway with theirs and both vehicles left together and only separated after officers turned on their emergency lights; by introducing evidence of the subsequent police chase of the robbers' pickup and the handguns located within, the State painted a full picture for the jury. Hawkins v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6439 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 20 2006).

78. In a trial for aggravated robbery, there was no error in admitting evidence regarding an extraneous offense involving a drug transaction with one of the victims. From defendant's participation in the previous drug transaction, it was reasonable for the jury to infer that he knew or should have known that the victims would have cash on them. Jefferson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7288 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 31 2005).

79. In a trial for robbery, extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 because the similarity in the offenses made the evidence compelling as to identity. In both robberies, the assailants drove into an apartment complex parking lot, wore shirts bearing Houston police insignia, claimed to be police officers, and searched Hispanic male victims; money was taken in both robberies with a silver pistol. Casique v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6517 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 16 2005).

80. Admission was proper of extraneous acts evidence, including defendant's escape, aggravated assault on a police officer, aggravated assault, and unauthorized use of two vehicles. Defendant's motive for robbery could be explained by the fact that he had escaped from prison and needed money; the events occurred in one afternoon and during the same contextual transaction; identity was contested; and the contemporaneous evidence proved that defendant had the same gun and car as the person who committed the robbery. Russell v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3703 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 13 2005).

81. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated robbery, evidence of the three previous instances in which appellant had taken money or personal property from the complainant was relevant to rebut his defensive theory and show motive. Guillory v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 155 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 11 2005).

82. In a trial for aggravated robbery, extraneous evidence of other robberies had relevance apart from character conformity in that it tended to prove defendant's intent to permanently deprive the owners of their property, even if he had no reason to do so. Defendant had argued that he made so much money selling drugs that he did not need to rob people. Humphrey v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10622 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2004).

83. In an aggravated robbery case, the witnesses' extraneous offenses testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) for the purpose of proving identity because the robberies were sufficiently similar so as to mark them as defendant's handiwork because: (1) the time interval between the commission of the robberies was relatively short -- a three-week period; and (2) defendant used the same general modus operandi in all three robberies -- he entered the dry cleaning businesses carrying a jacket, asked each of the employees to dry clean his jacket, pulled out a knife when the employees' attentions were directed elsewhere, forced the employees to give him money, and then instructed them to stay in the businesses' bathrooms. Chatman v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5410 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 17 2004).

84. In an aggravated robbery case, the trial court did not err in admitting the witnesses' extraneous offenses testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) for the purpose of proving identity over defendant's objection because (1) defendant placed his identity in issue with the testimony of two alibi witnesses and the testimony of another individual, that he, and not defendant, was the robber; and (2) the danger of unfair prejudice from the witnesses' testimony was minimal because the jury was instructed that the witnesses' testimony could only be considered for the limited purposes set out in Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Chatman v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5410 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 17 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Robbery : Armed Robbery : General Overview

85. In a trial for aggravated robbery, an unadjudicated extraneous robbery offense was properly admitted to show identity because the offenses were sufficiently similar. The two aggravated robberies of older complainants occurred within 20 minutes and three miles of each other and involved an unidentified accomplice, a request for an unknown individual, use of a silver/chrome gun, forced entry, and forcing the complainants to lie on the floor. Villar v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11084 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 29 2013).

86. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant's complaint that he did not receive notice that extraneous evidence of a check-cashing incident would be used at trial was without merit as he acknowledged receiving the report which included the check-cashing incident. Cross v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8535 (Tex. App. Dallas July 10 2013).

87. In an aggravated robbery case, the extraneous evidence of a check-cashing incident was same-transaction contextual evidence, and, as such, no notice that it would be introduced at trial was required. Cross v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8535 (Tex. App. Dallas July 10 2013).

88. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the evidence of the shooting of the first victim and the other evidence collected at the crime scene pertaining to the shooting (such as the truck in the culvert) demonstrated defendant's motive, intent, and identity with regard to the aggravated robbery of the driver and the second victim, who was shot when defendant tried to steal the driver's car. Wilson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8685, 2010 WL 4261872 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 28 2010).

89. During defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, the trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404 in allowing the State to present extraneous offense evidence of a robbery committed the day of the offense-at-issue for the purpose of identification where although the extraneous offenses were not so intermixed as to form a single, indivisible criminal transaction, and therefore the evidence was not admissible as contextual evidence, defendant raised the issue of identity in his cross-examination of the State's witnesses and in his case-in-chief, and the offenses were sufficiently similar; the offenses were proximate in both time and place because both were committed on the same night and in approximately the same location, and the offenses were committed by a common mode of commission because the robber approached his victims as they walked to or from their apartments and threatened them with a gun. Dickson v. State, 246 S.W.3d 733, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9859 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Stalking : General Overview

90. In a stalking case, the trial court did not err by allowing the cross-examination of a defense witness regarding whether she was aware that defendant had been charged with a crime following an alleged domestic violence incident with the victim and whether she was aware that he had violated a protective order and assaulted his former wife; this evidence was relevant to defendant's good character after the witness testified that she had called the victim and asked her to give defendant another chance. Allen v. State, 218 S.W.3d 905, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2527 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

91. In a trial for stalking, defendant's prior murder conviction was relevant to the reasonableness of the complainant's fear of bodily injury or death and to whether defendant reasonably believed that his course of conduct would be regarded as threatening such injury. Defendant should have known that the complainant would be aware of his identity and his prior conviction for murder because of the involvement of private investigators and the police. Martinez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7476 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 9 2005).

92. In defendant's retaliation case, testimony concerning burglaries was not offered to prove that defendant had a record, but rather to assist the jury's understanding of the events by providing a context for an officer's subsequent actions. The testimony was admissible as proof of knowledge, absence of mistake, or accident, plan or intent; because the testimony. Martin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7142 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 11 2004).

93. Trial court did not err in admitting the victim's testimony about incidents of property damage that were not included in the stalking indictment, which included testimony that someone piled her trash in front of her door, flipped her breaker box, flooded her yard, damaged her yard decorations, pulled down an outside light fixture, cut her satellite cable, and spray-painted her gate, because (1) the evidence was not improper character evidence under Tex. Evid. R. 404(a) as the victim never claimed that defendant committed the acts; and (2) the victim's testimony that the offenses against her property had occurred was relevant to establishing her state of mind at the time of the events in the stalking indictment. Marsh v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3620 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 22 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : General Overview

94. In a murder trial, the trial court properly determined that the victim's action of rising from a chair and reaching for a knife was an unambiguous aggressive act and therefore evidence of the victim's character and prior acts of violence was not necessary to explain his actions. Johnson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12819, 2013 WL 5657425 (Tex. App. Tyler Oct. 16 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : General Overview

95. In a trial alleging defendant's murder of his wife, it was proper to admit evidence of the wife's prior black eyes that she and defendant said were caused by accidents, that she had been arrested, and that police had responded to multiple 911 calls at the residence, some from a male and some from a female callers, because the evidence did not relate to defendant's extraneous bad conduct; even if it had, it was admissible to show the nature of the relationship. Tretter v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8591 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 7 2014).

96. In a murder case, the court erred by failing to require the State to redact portions of defendant's recorded statement admitting he had previously been in prison three times, but the error was harmless because the statement had no more than a slight effect on the jury's verdict. Barley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13313, 2013 WL 5827728 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 29 2013).

97. In a murder trial, it was proper to admit evidence of defendant's character trait of offering to handle the problems of other people with a firearm and a specific extraneous bad act to demonstrate this character trait because the evidence was probative to rebut the defense that only a third person, and not defendant, had a motive to harm the complainant. Williams v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

98. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant during his trial for murdering his girlfriend's five-year-child because it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), as: (1) the identity of the perpetrator was in issue throughout the trial; (2) the overall pattern of abuse described by defendant's ex-girlfriend was significantly similar to the pattern of abuse described by his girlfriend; and (3) the ex-girlfriend's description of defendant's abuse of her son was strikingly similar to the girlfriend's description of defendant's deadly assault of her child. Castro v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6233, 2012 WL 3104817 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 2012).

99. In a trial for a murder that occurred in a game room, there was no error in admitting evidence that minutes before the murder defendant approached the game room and left. That evidence was of an extraneous offense because it showed only that defendant and an accomplice were denied entry. Dronso v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3720, 2012 WL 1624065 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 10 2012).

100. In a murder trial, evidence relating to an alleged alternative perpetrator was properly excluded on the basis that there was an insufficient nexus between the alleged alternative and the offense, notwithstanding the theory that the alleged alternative had a motive to want the victim (a witness to a previous shooting) dead, his alleged involvement in a shotgun shooting in the same neighborhood just a few days earlier, and his presence in the area near the time the charged murder occurred. Caldwell v. State, 356 S.W.3d 42, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8437 (Tex.

App. Texarkana Oct. 21 2011).

101. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, 404 in admitting a video of a social networking page, on which defendant was depicted holding a gun. The evidence was relevant because a witness testified that the gun in the video was the same gun the witness saw defendant use in the murder; it wass unlikely that the jury would have felt compelled to convict defendant of murder simply because he acted like a "bad boy" and brandished a weapon on camera. Brumfield v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10137, 2010 WL 5187690 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 23 2010).

102. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 in allowing the State to introduce evidence of a threatening phone call made by defendant hours after the death of the complainant because the evidence tended to establish that defendant's motive or intent was to cause the death of complainant in retaliation for money stolen, at the request of complainant, by the person to whom defendant made the threat; the trial court could have reasonably determined that, because the statements established motive or intent and were made on the same day as the murder, the statements provided information essential to the jury's understanding of the context and circumstances surrounding the murder, and therefore no notice was required by the State. Matos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1808 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 13 2008).

103. In a murder trial, no error occurred when the trial court admitted tape-recorded phone conversations that included defendant's statements regarding illegal drug use after the victim's hospitalization; its probative value outweighed its unfairly prejudicial effect, as it suggested defendant's lack of remorse or concern about the victim. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9519 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 5 2007).

104. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting shell casings that were retrieved from defendant's residence prior to the charged offense or a redacted photograph of defendant holding a firearm because the items did not show illegal activity and were not introduced to prove defendant's character. Quesada v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1011 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 8 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6181 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 19, 2006).

105. Defendant's murder indictment alleged that defendant murdered the victim in retaliation for her cooperation with the police, which eventually led to defendant's conviction for delivery of cocaine; thus, the prior drug conviction was not an irrelevant, extraneous offense that showed only that defendant was a criminal generally. Therefore, the admission of two photographs related to that conviction and the cross-examination by the State regarding those photographs and his prior drug conviction were not erroneous. Russell v. State, 155 S.W.3d 176, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 150 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

106. In a trial for murder and robbery, evidence that a gun was taken in a prior robbery was same-transaction contextual evidence and was relevant to show preparation for the planned robbery and murder at issue. The evidence was not unduly prejudicial, given the other evidence that the stolen gun was the murder weapon. Hill v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8474 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 22 2004).

107. In a murder case where the State alleged that defendant hit the victim in the head, which eventually led to her death, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the testimony from the victim's father, sister, and co-workers regarding other incidents where defendant abused the victim and his religious beliefs because it was relevant to rebut defendant's defensive theory that the victim's injuries resulted from a variety of different accidents and that he did not beat her to death. Simeon v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 626 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 22, 2004), cert. denied, 555 U.S. 1035, 129 S. Ct. 604, 172 L. Ed. 2d 463, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 8496 (2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Capital Murder : General Overview

108. In a murder trial, there was no error in admitting extraneous offense evidence regarding a robbery/shooting that occurred ten minutes before the murder or regarding an assault that occurred as the suspects drove away from the robbery victim's apartment. The other offenses bore bear striking similarities to the offense for which defendant was convicted and were relevant to the hotly contested issue of identity. Mason v. State, 416 S.W.3d 720, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13527, 2013 WL 5861492 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 31 2013).

109. Accomplice's testimony that he and defendant were involved in another aggravated robbery of a taxi cab driver four days before the murder was not inadmissible because it showed that defendant was involved in a virtually identical aggravated robbery, it was relevant to show defendant's intent to commit a robbery, his intent to kill, and that it was reasonably foreseeable that a death would occur, and it rebutted defendant's contention that the accomplice murdered the taxi driver. Stephens v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10188 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 14 2013).

110. In a capital murder trial, it was proper to admit testimony about defendant's prior act of pulling out a gun during a disagreement with the complainant because it was relevant to show defendant's hostility or ill will toward the complainant and his motive to later kill her. It was not necessary to show that the complainant was threatened in the prior incident. Jackson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10062, 2012 WL 6049074 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 6 2012).

111. In a trial for capital murder arising from a robbery and shooting, it was reversible error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to admit evidence that defendant committed an armed robbery of a grocery store a month after the charged murder. The mere fact that both offenses were armed robberies did not make them sufficiently similar to prove identity; the evidence was not admissible as to intent because intent was not at issue. The other crimes evidence had substantial potential to convince the jury that defendant was a criminal in general and, therefore, probably committed the charged offense. Jackson v. State, 320 S.W.3d 873, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6572 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2010).

112. In a robbery-murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting evidence that defendant committed a similar extraneous crime three days after the charged murders because defendant put identity at issue. The offenses were sufficiently similar because they were both robberies committed at gunpoint; they occurred three days apart and in the late evening or early night hours; they occurred in the same geographic area; defendant was placed at the both scenes by eyewitness or DNA evidence; in both cases, he had an African-American male accomplice, used a revolver, emptied the cash register, and rifled through the shelves beneath the cash register. Hartsfield v. State, 305 S.W.3d 859, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 764 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 4 2010).

113. Even if character evidence of a decedent was improperly introduced during a capital murder case, this constituted harmless error since defendant's substantial rights were not affected; defendant admitted that she knew her boyfriend was using a weapon in robberies, she participated after learning of a shooting, and she helped dispose of the weapon. Harris v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3225 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 2 2008).

114. In defendant's capital murder case involving the murder of her child, the court did not err by admitting "bad act" evidence because evidence of the removal of the child by the State and reunification evidence was a form of relationship evidence that showed the prior and existing relationship between defendant and her child, and a witness's answer was an isolated reference to "guns and drugs" which was not repeated during trial, and therefore it was not so prejudicial that the court's instruction to disregard could not cure the error. Alexander v. State, 229 S.W.3d 731, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3358 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

115. In an attempted capital murder case, the State was allowed to introduce extraneous evidence regarding defendant's shooting during a similar burglary because intent was the only challenged issue in the case where defendant contended that the shooting was only intended to scare the victim of the charged offense, but the extraneous evidence showed that defendant threatened to kill another victim with a gun during a similar burglary. Cisneros v. State, 143 S.W.3d 269, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6370 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

116. Evidence presented by the state that a capital defendant had excessively dunked his two-year-old stepchild in a swimming pool, had "thumped" the back of her head, had pushed her with his foot, had made her sit still on a couch for over two hours, and had hit her the night before her death, was evidence of extraneous acts, which were generally inadmissible at the guilt/innocence stage of a trial since Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) states that evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. Ex parte Varelas, 45 S.W.3d 627, 2001 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 12 (Tex. Crim. App. 2001).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Capital Murder : Elements

117. At defendant's trial for capital murder where the indictment alleged that he committed the murder of the complainant in the course of committing a robbery the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of an extraneous robbery offense committed by defendant. Because defendant asserted there was no indication that a shooting took place during a robbery and the element of his specific intent to kill the complainant was at issue, the extraneous offense was admissible to rebut the defense theory. Smith v. State, 420 S.W.3d 207, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15280, 2013 WL 6699495 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 19 2013).

118. Because the Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) evidence was relevant in identifying defendant and showing his intent to commit capital murder, and the evidence was not so prejudicial as to overcome the effectiveness of the limiting instruction, under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the extraneous offense evidence. Castoreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3636 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 9 2012).

119. In a father's trial for murdering his two unborn children, evidence of bruises on the mother when she presented at the hospital, and the resulting notification of the police, were admissible as same transaction contextual evidence; under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the evidence had probative value because it served to explain the context of the police presence after the stillbirths of the twins and the assaultive environment in which the twins died. Flores v. State, 215 S.W.3d 520, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 516 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

120. Evidence of a judgment that terminated defendant's parental rights to three of her children after the date that she allegedly murdered her newborn infant was relevant at her capital murder trial under Tex. R. Evid. 401, and had relevance apart from mere proof of character conformity in compliance with Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), because an extraneous offense/bad act that took place subsequent to the offense for which a defendant was on trial did not make the extraneous offense/bad act inadmissible per se; furthermore, the judgment was introduced by the State after defendant had testified that the infant's death on the night in question was not the result of any intentional or knowing conduct on defendant's part, and the termination judgment contained findings by the trial judge that defendant "knowingly" placed or allowed her other children to remain in conditions dangerous to their physical or emotional well-being, which at least arguably made it more probable that defendant's acts or omissions on the night in question were done either intentionally or knowingly. Fergerson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6589 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Felony Murder : General Overview

121. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 in allowing an accomplice to testify about two prior attempted robberies by defendant and the same accomplices. The testimony was relevant to prove that the group's plan was to rob an Hispanic man whom they believed to be carrying cash and to prove that defendant was the member of the group who carried the gun, rebutting the defensive theory that he was not the shooter. Howard v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1388 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 26 2010).

122. In a trial for felony murder, there was no errorr in the admission of extraneous offense evidence relating to forgery of documents; the evidence was relevant in order to show motive, relationship of the parties, and consciousness of guilt; the fact that defendant had equipment to produce fake checks was unlikely to make an unfair impression on the jury. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

123. In a trial for felony murder, there was no error in the admission of extraneous offense evidence relating to automobile theft; the evidence was relevant in order to show defendant's flight and attempt to conceal identity, both of which demonstrated a consciousness of guilt; it was not likely to leave any unfair or irrational impression upon the jury. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

124. In a trial for felony murder, there was no error in the admission of extraneous offense evidence relating to possession of a firearm; the evidence was probative because it provided the jury with information essential to understanding the context and circumstances of the crime; it was not unfairly prejudicial, in part because mere possession of a handgun in a temporary home and while traveling was not, in and of itself, a criminal offense or a bad act under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 46.15. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

125. In a trial for felony murder, it was error to admit extraneous offense evidence relating to attempted extortion; the offense, a threat made against an accomplice to her family, was only distantly related to the charged offense and the danger of unfair prejudice substantially outweighed the probative value. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Voluntary Manslaughter : General Overview

126. In defendant's murder case, a court abused its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's prior voluntary manslaughter conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because voluntary manslaughter was an offense involving violence, and did not involve deception, the prior offense and the charged offense were similar, defendant's testimony was critical to his claim of self-defense, and the State also had impeachment evidence of a prior conviction of forgery, which was a crime involving deception and moral turpitude and was better suited for impeachment purposes; however, the evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to prove intent and to rebut defendant's claim of self-defense. High v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 877 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 2 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Inchoate Crimes : Conspiracy : General Overview

127. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of guns and cash during his capital murder trial because, to put the conspiracy offense in context, evidence that defendant and his sons were drug dealers who dealt in large amounts of cash and guns to protect their drugs and case was necessary, and therefore the evidence was same-transaction contextual evidence and background contextual evidence excepted from Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Davis v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 835, 2011 WL 322877 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 2 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Bail Jumping & Failure to Appear

128. Although defendant testified he did not believe he was required to go to court because of the lawsuit he filed against the government, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), evidence that he concealed his identity and left the state was admissible and probative as to his mental state and whether he was aware that he committed a crime when he failed to appear in court. Marascio v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1178, 2012 WL 472920 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 15 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Cruelty to Animals : General Overview

129. In an animal cruelty case, defendant did not preserve an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), regarding the prejudicial effect of testimony from a neighbor who found dog carcasses and drag marks on his property. That argument did not comport with a relevance objection at trial, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Holz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2017, 2010 WL 1041068 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 23 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Fleeing & Eluding : General Overview

130. Evidence admitted at defendant's trial did not refer to defendant's "flight," nor demonstrate defendant had fled Texas; rather, it showed defendant stated he was homeless to his probation officer, went to a homeless shelter in St. Louis, and was arrested there. Thus, the evidence presented at trial merely showed the circumstances surrounding defendant's arrest and did not characterize defendant's presence in St. Louis as the result of his "flight." Garner v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9404, 2012 WL 5503995 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 14 2012).

131. In a trial for evading arrest, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, or 404 in the admission of evidence that defendant placed a marijuana cigar on the pavement outside his motor vehicle while fleeing from a deputy sheriff. The evidence was relevant because it helped to prove that defendant intentionally fled; it was not submitted to show that defendant acted in conformity with his character because it indicated a motive; and it was highly probative in establishing intent, an essential element of the charge. Slaughter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8694 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 3 2006).

132. In a case where defendant was charged with fleeing from police, evidence that defendant was found underneath a house when officers tried to serve a warrant for arrest was properly admitted by a trial court because it tended to prove knowledge of guilt; even if the admission was erroneous, it was disregarded on appeal since defendant's substantial rights were not affected; it would have been difficult to explain the circumstances of the arrest without such evidence, and the State did not mention the evidence in its final argument. Jacobs v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4239 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 11 2004).

133. In a trial for evading arrest, evidence that defendant was on parole at the time was probative of his motive to get away from the police officer and made less probable the defensive argument that defendant was not aware the police were behind him; the risk of undue prejudice was minimized by the fact that the jury was not told what crime led to the parole status. Steele v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1532, 2014 WL 580200 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 12 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Fleeing & Eluding : Consciousness of Guilt

134. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault, there was no error in admitting evidence that defendant, after being confronted by the victim's mother and fleeing to a nearby apartment complex, was seen fleeing from the complex, in which a fire had been started. A reasonable inference from the evidence was that defendant started the fire to aid his flight from the apartment complex; thus, the evidence was of value in establishing consciousness of guilt. Craft v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 199, 2012 WL 112527 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 11 2012).

135. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, evidence that defendant was driving a vehicle that matched the description of the vehicle involved in the shooting and that he attempted to flee from officers when one of them tried to pull him over was probative of his consciousness of guilt and relevant to prove his identity under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). The trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the evidence was relevant for purposes other than character conformity. Owens v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2871, 2011 WL 1435499 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 14 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Money Laundering : General Overview

136. In a trial for money laundering, the trial court properly allowed extraneous offense evidence that defendant had been stopped on one occasion with more than $67,000 in his van and on another with more than 80 pounds of marijuana in his vehicle. The extraneous acts were relevant to show that defendant, although he claimed not to know about money hidden in the van on the current charge, repeatedly carried large amounts of cash and drugs hidden in his vehicle. The extraneous acts were not rendered inadmissible merely because they occurred after the charged offense. Stallworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 993 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 9 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Resisting Arrest : General Overview

137. In a trial for assault on a peace officer, evidence was properly admitted as to defendant's 40-year sentence on a prior drug conviction because the sentence was the catalyst for defendant's attack on two deputies. Because the 40-year sentence was not a crime, wrong, or act committed by defendant, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was inapplicable. Wheatfall v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1622 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 19, 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Riot, Rout & Unlawful Assembly

138. Evidence of defendant's gang affiliation was admissible to illuminate the nature of the crime alleged because his affiliation with the gang was evidence of his capacity to carry out the threat, or have it carried out, which in turn made it more likely that he made the threat as the witness testified. Simmang v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11529 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 11 2013).

139. In a trial for aggravated assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404, 405 in admitting evidence of defendant's gang affiliation because the evidence raised an inference that defendant's motive for stabbing the complainant was to harm him because of his race. Defendant stated during booking that he was a member of a particular gang and did not want to be jailed with any black people. Martin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5624, 2011 WL 2937423 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 21 2011).

140. Defendant did not object to testimony about gang affiliation during the guilt-innocence phase of a murder trial and therefore failed to preserved error under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Vasquez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2952 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 2008).

141. In a trial for heroin possession, gang-membership evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404 because the evidence was interlaced with the offense; the offense's obscurity was eliminated with evidence that the defendant was a gang member. The expert testified about the gang's trade being the trafficking of heroin, primarily by using a female's body cavity to transport the contraband, and having that female accompanied by a gang member; defendant was stopped entering the country with a woman who was carrying heroin in her vaginal cavity. Ojeda v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8557 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 24 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Witness Tampering

142. Assault defendant failed to request notice of other crimes and acts evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and therefore could not complain of the adequacy of the State's notice; moreover, the notice gave her reasonable notice of a neighbor's expected testimony that defendant sought to bribe her to say that the victim struck defendant first. Additionally, this bribery evidence was relevant as consciousness of guilt and was not unfairly prejudicial. Cavazos v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5045, 2014 WL 1881691 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 8 2014).

143. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted testimony showing that defendant called his friend and asked him to change his testimony. Even if it did rise to the level of witness tampering, the testimony showing that defendant told the friends to tell the jury that he was holding a cell phone instead of a gun was admissible as evidence of consciousness of guilt. Dyer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 524, 2014 WL 268571 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 16 2014).

144. Evidence of defendant's alleged witness tampering--phone calls offering the witness money not to testify--was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404, as evidence of consciousness of guilt in a burglary trial. Livingston v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9054, 2011 WL 5535332 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 15 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Burglary & Criminal Trespass : General Overview

145. In a criminal trial for burglary, the court did not err by allowing a police officer to testify as to the contents of defendant's van. The testimony was needed to show that defendant was in recent possession of stolen property; the testimony was not character evidence of other crimes or wrong acts. Middleton v. State, 187 S.W.3d 134, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 578 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

146. In a criminal prosecution for burglary of a habitation where defendant claimed that he did not have the "intent to commit a felony, theft, or an assault," the jury was permitted to consider evidence of defendant's six prior convictions for burglary of a habitation and one time for felony theft to the extent the evidence was helpful in determining defendant's intent in relation to the present burglary. Harris v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7666 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Burglary & Criminal Trespass : Burglary

147. In a burglary case, the evidence of a prior burglary was admissible during the guilt/innocence phase to prove identify. Because a credit card stolen from the first victim was found in the second victims' apartment and apparently was used to force open the locked door, it created a link between the crime; defendant was identified in store pictures as the person carrying the stolen wallet that contained the credit card. Martinez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 824, 2014 WL 458015 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 23 2014).

148. In a burglary case, the evidence of a prior burglary was admissible during the guilt/innocence phase to prove identify. Because a credit card stolen from the first victim was found in the second victims' apartment and apparently was used to force open the locked door, it created a link between the crime; defendant was identified in store pictures as the person carrying the stolen wallet that contained the credit card. Martinez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 824, 2014 WL 458015 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 23 2014).

149. In defendant's burglary case, the court properly admitted evidence of other burglaries because they were committed in close proximity to defendant's home, the burglaries were similar, and the burglaries were both daytime residential burglaries by forced entry in which the homes were ransacked. The property stolen at the burglaries was commingled at defendant's residence. Box v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4077, 2013 WL 1319359 (Tex. App.

Dallas Mar. 28 2013).

150. In a burglary trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 404(b), 403 in admitting evidence of an extraneous burglary in order to show intent. The prior burglary was near in time and location to the charged burglary. Martinez v. State, 304 S.W.3d 642, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 413 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 21 2010).

151. In a burglary of a habitation case, in light of the fact that intent was the central issue in defendant's case, evidence that he possessed stolen property found in his girlfriend's car, which had been used in previous burglaries at the apartment complex, was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show defendant's motive, intent, plan, and the absence of mistake or accident. Kirksey v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8429 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 6, 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Burglary & Criminal Trespass : Burglary : Elements

152. Evidence regarding defendant's sexual assault of a complainant in a prior case was relevant in his trial for burglary of a habitation with intent to commit sexual assault to prove the lack of consent of the complainant in the present case and defendant's intent to commit sexual assault only to the extent that the extraneous offense and the charged offense were shown to be sufficiently similar to invoke the doctrine of chances. Mackenzie v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1776 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 7 2007).

153. In a burglary trial, there was no error in the admission of evidence that defendant had, in his possession when he was arrested, items taken in a subsequent burglary from the same victim; the evidence was admissible to rebut a line of questioning directed at burglaries that occurred after defendant was in custody. Ellis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 414 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 24 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Destruction of Property : General Overview

154. In a criminal mischief case, extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was properly used to show identity; although a trial court could have presumed that appellant's wife or someone else could have installed a jumper on an electric meter at his residence, finding one on appellant's business made it less likely that he was innocent. Giles v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4044, 2013 WL 1319343 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 28 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Forgery : General Overview

155. In a forgery case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of three other forged checks as relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to prove defendant's guilty knowledge and intent. The fact that each of these forgeries was substantially identical tended to rebut defendant's claim that she had passed the first check without knowing that it was forged. Williams v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 857, 2011 WL 350477 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2011).

156. In a trial for felony murder, there was no errorr in the admission of extraneous offense evidence relating to forgery of documents; the evidence was relevant in order to show motive, relationship of the parties, and consciousness of guilt; the fact that defendant had equipment to produce fake checks was unlikely to make an unfair impression on the jury. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Forgery : Elements

157. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a copy of a check allegedly forged and presented by defendant because the State offered the evidence to establish defendant's knowledge that a copy of another check, which was identified in the indictment, was a forgery and that defendant therefore acted with the requisite intent to commit the offense of forgery and that there was no mistake or lack of intent, as defendant asserted at trial. Duncan v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4678, 2014 WL 1788173 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 1 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Larceny & Theft : General Overview

158. In defendant's theft case, evidence of subsequent offenses was admissible because those offenses provided the jury with proof of defendant's identity, showed his knowledge, and showed a scheme -- all purposes expressly permitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and the trial court unequivocally overruled a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. At no point did defendant request that the findings and conclusions of the trial court's balancing test be placed on the record. Boswell v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7177, 2012 WL 3629922 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 23 2012).

159. In a theft case based on a failure to complete a construction contract, evidence that defendant had done the same thing to another person was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show defendant's intent and lack of accident or mistake; defendant contended that he was unable to finish the job that gave rise to the charges due to circumstances beyond his control. Gill v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9261 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 11 2008).

160. In a trial for felony murder, it was error to admit extraneous offense evidence that at the time of arrest defendant was returning to a hotel after attempting to steal a car; the evidence, unlike other evidence of car theft, did not tend to show flight and added nothing to a showing of consciousness of guilt and therefore was more prejudicial than probative; the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because it was unlikely that the admission had a substantial effect on the verdict, given all of the evidence before the jury. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

161. In a trial for felony murder, there was no error in the admission of extraneous offense evidence relating to automobile theft; the evidence was relevant in order to show defendant's flight and attempt to conceal identity, both of which demonstrated a consciousness of guilt; it was not likely to leave any unfair or irrational impression upon the jury. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

162. In a trial for theft of services, the trial court did not err in allowing evidence regarding the deposit of checks into defendant's account and the subsequent debits to that account when those checks were returned. The checks were important proof to establish the manner in which defendant attempted to falsely inflate the balance of the account and established defendant's knowledge that checks written on the account would not have sufficient funds to cover them. Ingram v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 42 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 5 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Racketeering : General Overview

163. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence multiple extraneous offenses during defendant's trial on charges of engaging in organized criminal activity because the evidence, namely the letterhead, testimony about the ongoing mortgage fraud, the forged signature on the articles of incorporation and diverted money, was all admissible as evidence to establish the existence of the combination, its members and its ongoing criminal activities, which were elements of the offense. The diversion of money was also admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as evidence of motive, knowledge and intent, common scheme or plan, or absence of mistake. Marriott v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5804, 2010 WL 2869781 (Tex. App. Waco July 21 2010).

164. Objection to extraneous offense evidence was not successful because testimony that stolen parts were removed from defendant's residence after his arrest, along with testimony that defendant had purchased stolen parts, was probative evidence of the elements of the offense of engaging in organized criminal activity; the testimony was evidence relevant to the element of combination and the collaboration in carrying on criminal activities, and the probative value of this evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. The evidence tended to prove defendant had the intent to establish, maintain, or participate in a combination or in the profits of a combination, an essential element of the offense of engaging in organized criminal activities. Marban v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6760, 2009 WL 2618343 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Racketeering : Extortion : General Overview

165. In a trial for felony murder, it was error to admit extraneous offense evidence relating to attempted extortion; the offense, a threat made against an accomplice to her family, was only distantly related to the charged offense and the danger of unfair prejudice substantially outweighed the probative value. Robinson v. State, 236 S.W.3d 260, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1192 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Child Pornography : General Overview

166. Admission of extraneous-offense evidence, regarding defendant's two encounters with children in public restrooms, did not affect defendant's substantial rights because testimony regarding the encounters did not consume an inordinate amount of time during trial, the State focused the majority of its closing argument on the evidence establishing the charged offenses, and the trial court gave a limiting instruction. Hoard v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11760 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 18 2013).

167. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting photographs of defendant naked and/or exposing his genitals, penis, and anus under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the photographs were relevant to link defendant to the child pornography on his computer and showing intent. De Leon v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7029, 2011 WL 3847180 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 30 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Indecent Exposure : General Overview

168. In a trial for indecent exposure, testimony that a park was a popular location for lewd or indecent behavior or was a high crime area would have been admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Jenson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6301 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 19 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Indecent Exposure : Elements

169. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence under this rule that defendant had previously pled no contest to indecent exposure and was placed on deferred adjudication because it had a tendency to make defendant's defensive theory, that he had a physical inability that prevented him from developing an intent to sexually arouse or gratify himself, less probable. Arteaga v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2434, 2014 WL 866461 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 5 2014).

170. Jury charge was not erroneous because the alleged error did not suggest that defendant acted with the intent to arouse or gratify his sexual desire when read in the context of the next sentence, in which the trial court clearly stated that the jury had to find, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the act was committed. There was no error in the second paragraph simply because it failed to track the language of this rule. Arteaga v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2434, 2014 WL 866461 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 5 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Obscenity : General Overview

171. In an indecent exposure case, a court properly admitted evidence where defendant's comment about a prior incident to the undercover officer was compelling evidence that he intended to expose himself to gratify his sexual desire, not just to urinate. Elkin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5832 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 1 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Prostitution : General Overview

172. In a trial for sexual assault of a child and compelling prostitution, defendant was not entitled to a mistrial after a witness testified that defendant threatened to kill the witness outside the presence of the complainant. Nothing in the record suggested that the jury failed to follow an instruction to disregard the extraneous offense evidence, and there was other evidence presented that defendant threatened both the witness and the complainant. Puckett v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8188 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 4 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

173. In a trial for a mother's sexual abuse of her son, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to admit evidence that defendant had been a victim of sexual assault as a child to show that she was more likely to commit the offense; the error was harmful under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 and Tex. R. Evid. 103 because it was a close case resolved by a credibility determination between the child and defendant. Kirby v. State, 208 S.W.3d 568, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2785 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

174. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of child under 14 years of age, it was not error to admit a tape recording of the child's message to her mother in which the child's crying was audible but the child did not say anything; the State was not required to give notice of the tape. Johnson v. State, 190 S.W.3d 838, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2496 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

175. In a trial for indecency with a child, testimony from a parole officer that defendant was restricted from contact with children did not constitute extraneous offense evidence because the testimony did not show what crime, if any, had been committed. Turner v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 944 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 2 2006).

176. In defendant's indecency with a child case, although the extraneous offense evidence of other sexual offenses against young boys was inadmissible to confront false-impression evidence, the State's alternate reason, that the extraneous offense evidence was admissible to rebut defensive theories propounded by defendant, was a proper basis for the admission of the extraneous offense evidence. Blackwell v. State, 193 S.W.3d 1, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 903 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

177. In defendant's indecency with a child case, defendant's extraneous sexual offenses were admissible to rebut the defensive theory that he lacked the intent to have sexual contact with the victim because, by asserting that defendant was a regular parent who did a good job of raising two other young boys, he impliedly suggested that he lacked the intent to have sexual contact with the victim. Blackwell v. State, 193 S.W.3d 1, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 903 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

178. In a trial for sexual assault of a child and compelling prostitution, defendant was not entitled to a mistrial after a witness testified that defendant threatened to kill the witness outside the presence of the complainant. Nothing in the record suggested that the jury failed to follow an instruction to disregard the extraneous offense evidence, and there was other evidence presented that defendant threatened both the witness and the complainant. Puckett v.

State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8188 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 4 2005).

179. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's having solicited the third party to have sexual intercourse with the minor. The evidence was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, which superseded Tex. R. Evid. 404; the trial court gave a limiting instruction, minimizing any impermissible inference of character conformity. Comeaux v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3748 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 17 2005).

180. In a case of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony of the complaining witness and two other children about extraneous acts by defendant; although defendant argued that the testimony was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was not necessary to prove elements of the offense that were essentially uncontested, such as identity, intent, plan, preparation, and opportunity, the evidence was relevant under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2 to show defendant's intentions toward the complaining witness. Nesby v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3379 (Tex. App. Austin May 5 2005).

181. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony of the complainant and other children about defendant's extraneous acts as the evidence was relevant to show the relationship between defendant and the complainant and their respective states of mind. Nesby v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2182 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 24 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3379 (Tex. App. Austin May 5, 2005).

182. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault, the trial court did not err in admitting an extraneous robbery offense. Because defendant's statement about robbing someone was part of a continuum of activity beginning with his presence in the victim's apartment, notice was not required. Williams v. State, 161 S.W.3d 680, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2014 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

183. Where defendant was charged with the murder of a woman with whom he had sexual relations, the trial court committed reversible error by admitting the testimony of a department store clerk that defendant made sexual gestures toward her approximately one month before the victim's death. The two incidents did not appear sufficiently similar to establish defendant's identity as the person who killed the victim. Webb v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1431 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 23 2005).

184. In an indecency with a child case, because intent to satisfy sexual appetite was an element of the crime, the victim's younger sister's testimony that defendant had "french" kissed her when he took her alone for a ride and asked that she not tell anyone was relevant; thus, the trial court properly allowed it. Further, this evidence showing that defendant acted inappropriately with another young girl was highly probative, making the fact of defendant's sexual contact with the victim more probable, gave credibility to the victim's complaint, and diminished defendant's credibility. Mejia v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11615 (Tex. App. Tyler Dec. 22 2004).

185. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, admission of extraneous offense evidence involving a sexual assault defendant committed against another victim was proper as the State used it to rebut defendant's "lack of opportunity" defense theory. Guzman v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7693 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 26 2004).

186. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence that defendant had sexually assaulted another woman approximately three months prior to the instant assault where the state was not allowed to use the extraneous sexual assault evidence until defendant had presented his defensive theory of consent in his testimony. Martin v. State, 144 S.W.3d 29, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7755 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2004), affirmed by 173 S.W.3d 463, 2005

Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1618 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

187. In a case where defendant was convicted of the aggravated sexual assault of his daughter, a child younger than 14 years of age, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021(a)(1)(B)(i), (iii) and (2)(B), defendant's niece's testimony that he sexually assaulted her 16 years prior to the current offense was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because: (1) the State's direct evidence showing the intent or knowledge element of the crime was uncontradicted by defendant and not undermined by cross-examination of the State's witnesses; (2) nothing in the niece's testimony explained why he would assault his daughter; (3) there was no "lack of opportunity" defense that the State had to rebut; and (4) the niece's testimony was not admissible to rebut a defensive theory of recent fabrication as defendant did not call his daughter's credibility into question. Harrison v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6418 (Tex. App. Dallas July 19 2004).

188. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err in permitting the victim's stepfather to testify that he saw defendant in the parking lot of the family's apartment complex a few weeks after the victim made her outcry where that evidence tended to corroborate the victim's testimony and was not, in itself, evidence of misconduct or bad character. The prosecutors' description of defendant as a "sexual predator" was a logical inference from his overall behavior as shown by the victim's testimony. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2878 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 927, 125 S. Ct. 1652, 161 L. Ed. 2d 489, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2556, 73 U.S.L.W. 3556 (2005).

189. In a child sexual abuse case, the trial court did not err in allowing the State to elicit testimony from the victim concerning instances of abuse subsequent to the charged incident; defendant's request for notice under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), which the trial court granted, did not require the State to provide notice of other crimes evidence when it introduced the victim's testimony in accordance with Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, §§ 2, 3. Lazalde v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 388 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 15, 2004).

190. In a criminal trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, the child's mother was permitted to testify as to threats the appellant made to keep the child from reporting the assault, and the evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 404 for the non-propensity purpose to show why the child did not make a prompt outcry. Mark v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 879 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 30 2003).

191. In defendant's trial on two counts of indecency with a child, testimony from defendant's ex-wife that defendant occasionally paraded around in front of his minor daughters, the complainants, in the nude with an erection was admissible under Tex. R. Crim. Evid. 404(b), because the State had to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant had contact with the complainants and the contact was done for his sexual gratification, and because the evidence was relevant to prove sexual motive in as much as the manner that defendant acted around his own children was the only proof of defendant's possible sexual motive if the touching did in fact occur. Montgomery v. State, 810 S.W.2d 372, 1990 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 90 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Adults : General Overview

192. In a sexual assault case, the court properly admitted testimony of another sexual assault victim who identified defendant as her attacker because, like the victim, the witness lived alone, and her attacker was a black male in his late twenties who broke in through the back patio door in the early morning hours. Like the victim's attacker, the witness's attacker demanded her ATM card. Ledbetter v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1472, 2012 WL 593424 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 24 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Adults : Elements

193. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting an extraneous offense, a prior sexual assault, into evidence because defendant opened the door to its admissibility through his cross-examination of the victim, which implied that she consented to the sexual intercourse. Morales v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 312, 2014 WL 108770 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 10 2014).

194. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of his wife, who recanted in her trial testimony, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in allowing the State to impeach the victim with a prior inconsistent statement about how she broke her nose six months before the charged assault; the statements were offered as prior inconsistent statements to challenge the victim's credibility, as permitted by Tex. R. Evid. 613. Davis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 352 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 18 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

195. In defendant's trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child under fourteen years of age, evidence from two of the victim's cousins that defendant also molested them while they were visiting defendant and sleeping in the same bed with the victim was contextual and therefore admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b). Doss v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5702 (Tex. App. Dallas May 28 2014).

196. In a trial for continuous sexual abuse of young children, there was no error in admitting evidence of an extraneous offense because the testimony that defendant abused the witness while her mother was sleeping next to her in the same bed rebutted defense counsels lack-of-opportunity argument, specifically, that it did not add up for defendant to molest children sleeping on a couch while other children were on the floor asleep in the same room. Macintosh v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3105, 2014 WL 1087926 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 20 2014).

197. Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing defendant's niece to testify about defendant's alleged sexual assault upon her because the testimony had logical relevance apart from character conformity when it showed that the alleged victim's allegations were less likely to be fabricated, was properly admitted to rebut the defense's theory of fabrication, and served to show defendant's course of conduct, motive, and intent. Munger v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14728, 2013 WL 6512674 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 5 2013).

198. In a prosecution for aggravated sexual assault, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous acts of child sexual abuse that occurred in another county because the court instructed that the jury could not consider testimony regarding defendant having committed extraneous offenses for any purpose unless it found and believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed such other offenses and that it could only consider the testimony for the specific purposes listed in the charge, including its bearing on the previous and subsequent relationship between the defendant and the child. Foley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14638, 2013 WL 6244540 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 3 2013).

199. In a case in which defendant was found guilty of two counts of indecency with a child for the sexual abuse of his granddaughter, a prior victim's testimony that defendant, a family friend, sexually assaulted her when she was seven years old was probative to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication and was admissible. Bible v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8354 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 10 2013).

200. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in a case in which defendant was convicted of continuous sexual abuse of a child, his two daughters, by allowing evidence of computer searches for child pornography on defendant's laptop because the complained-of testimony showed that defendant viewed the father-daughter relationship as a sexual one; his viewing of child pornography, particularly father-daughter pornography, was relevant circumstantial evidence of his intent to arouse or gratify his sexual desire. Watkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1512, 2013 WL

531062 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 14 2013).

201. In a trial for child sexual abuse, it was proper for the prosecutor to comment on extraneous-offense evidence because the prosecutor argued that the jury should not convict defendant based on the uncharged conduct and did not argue that the evidence should be considered for purposes impermissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2; Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Kuhn v. State, 393 S.W.3d 519, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1038, 2013 WL 490746 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 31 2013).

202. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, it was proper to admit evidence of prior extraneous offenses because the defense arguably advanced a fabrication theory when it stated in opening that the complainant's mother had created the allegations to get back at defendant and got her daughter to go along. Moore v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 154, 2013 WL 86592 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 9 2013).

203. Defendant did not preserve a challenge under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to testimony regarding other acts of child sexual abuse because his only objection was under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Richert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7719 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

204. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault on a child, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 in admitting into evidence a videotape depicting defendant and his ex-wife acting out a father/daughter fantasy or testimony of the complainant's younger sister and defendant's former student concerning his sexual abuse of them. Richert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7719 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

205. Evidence regarding prior false allegations of sexual abuse by the child victim was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because defendant failed to show that the victim made any prior false allegations of sexual abuse against her grandmother or father and failed to show that any allegations were similar to the accusation in defendant's case. Luevano v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4108, 2012 WL 1883115 (Tex. App. El Paso May 23 2012).

206. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, the evidence of harsh discipline imposed by defendant on his four children, including the victim of the aggravated sexual assaults, was admissible because it had significant probative value as that evidence served to explain to the jury how defendant perpetrated frequent sexual assaults on his young daughter over a period of years. Soria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3345, 2012 WL 1570969 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 27 2012).

207. Evidence of defendant's harsh discipline of his children and testimony that the children feared him was admissible over a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection to explain why the victim of sexual assault did not make a prompt outcry. Soria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3345, 2012 WL 1570969 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 27 2012).

208. Defendant's argument that although the State elected at the close of its case-in-chief and the jury was informed of that election, the State's election violated his due process rights was without merit where, because the State made a proper election, the trial court could order the State to elect before close of its evidence. Criswell v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7112, 2011 WL 3836442 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2011).

209. While the parties had stipulated to the characterization of prior acts as extraneous offenses, based on the language "on or about" in the indictment, the prior acts were not extraneous as they were allegedly committed before the return of the indictment and within the limitations period for aggravated sexual assault of a child in Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 12.01(5). Garza v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9613, 2010 WL 5106329 (Tex. App.

Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2010).

210. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) when the trial court admitted extraneous-act evidence about defendant's inappropriate interaction with another student to rebut the defense fabrication claim because the acts were sufficiently similar: both involved 16- and 15-year-old female students who confided their personal problems in defendant, and defendant complimented each on their looks and shook their hands similarly by continuing to hold their hands after shaking them and invited each to his apartment. James v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1337, 2010 WL 654522 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 24 2010).

211. In a trial for aggravated assault on a child, defendant was not deprived of his Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel, even though counsel violated Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 412(b), (c), by introducing evidence about two other situations in which defendant had sexual conduct with girls who were three years younger than him and younger than the age for consensual sex, because the evidence could have been introduced to show a pattern of consensual activities and of involvment with girls relatively close to defendant in age. McGuire v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 673, 2010 WL 322988 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 29 2010).

212. In a child sexual assault case involving a victim who was 10 at the time of the offenses and 24 at the time of trial, evidence of extraneous offenses was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 to rebut defensive theories that defendant lacked opportunity and that the complainant fabricated his allegations. Given the similarities of action, place, and modus operandi, the time differential alone did not render the evidence irrelevant or lacking in probative value. Villa v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6965, 2009 WL 2914255 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2009).

213. In a trial for indecency with a child, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11(b), there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, 404, in admitting extraneous offense evidence. Evidence of possession of child pornography was relevant to defendant's intent to arouse or gratify his sexual desire; evidence of methamphetamine use was relevant to show defendant's state of mind at the time of the charged offense and tended to show how the offense unfolded and progressed; and evidence that defendant physically abused the victim and two other children, in addition to providing context about the relationship between the victim and defendant, was admissible to show the victim's state of mind and explain why the victim did not speak up earlier about the abuse. Stinson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3186, 2009 WL 1267348 (Tex. App. Dallas May 8 2009).

214. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony and evidence of an extraneous offense committed by defendant against a witness because the extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted to rebut a defensive theory of fabrication and frame-up. The witness identified defendant in court, and testified that he tried to put his hands down her pants. Wells v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2762, 2009 WL 1108796 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 23 2009).

215. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony and evidence of an extraneous offense committed by defendant against a witness because the extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted to rebut a defensive theory of fabrication and frame-up. The witness identified defendant in court, and testified that he tried to put his hands down her pants. Wells v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2767, 2009 WL 1108665 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 23 2009).

216. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony and evidence of an extraneous offense committed by defendant against a witness because the extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted to rebut a defensive theory of fabrication and frame-up. The witness identified defendant in court, and testified that he tried to put his hands down her pants. Wells v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS

2768, 2009 WL 1108663 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 23 2009).

217. In defendant's trial for sexual indecency with a child, evidence that defendant offered the victim cocaine and that they smoked it together in a hotel room where the assault took place was admissible because it was intertwined with the assault offense. It was not an extraneous offense requiring the State to give notice under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Madrid v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5834 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2008).

218. In a sexual assault of a child case. did not abuse its discretion by admitting extraneous offense evidence that defendant used cocaine at the time of the offense as it was same transaction contextual evidence; evidence showing defendant and the victim used cocaine together was intertwined with the evidence of the assaultive conduct and it would have been impractical to describe the events of that day without relating the cocaine use. Further, the evidence illuminated the nature of the crime and helped explain why the victim went to the motel room with defendant. Madrid v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5838 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2008).

219. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, evidence that a witness saw defendant's hand in another child's underwear was properly admitted because the testimony rebutted defendant's theory that any touching was accidental. Johnson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3713 (Tex. App. El Paso May 22 2008).

220. In defendant's child sexual assault case, the court properly allowed evidence that defendant "gave" the victim to his drug dealer in lieu of payment because it revealed defendant's relationship with the victim by demonstrating that defendant saw sex with the victim as a tradable good that he took lightly; defendant's allowing an adult male to sexually abuse the victim thus demonstrated his own state of mind and relationship with the victim. Sanders v. State, 255 S.W.3d 754, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3413 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

221. Trial court did not err by denying defendant's request for an extraneous offense instruction in the jury charge because the extraneous offenses were so intertwined with the sexual assault that the jury's understanding of the sexual assault would have been obscured without them; the extraneous offenses all occurred closely in time to the sexual assault and a description of each offense was necessary to properly explain the assault and the circumstances under which it took place, as: (1) defendant's encounter with another man demonstrated how defendant ensured that the victim was alone; (2) the cocaine use of defendant and the victim just before the sexual assault demonstrated that defendant might have completed his crime by lowering the victim's inhibitions; and (3) the evidence that defendant gave the victim a bag of crack cocaine for her mother immediately after the assault demonstrated that the mother might have set up an encounter between defendant and the victim as part of a drug deal. Taylor v. State, 263 S.W.3d 304, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6198 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

222. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of the thirteen-year-old victim, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of three extraneous acts of sexual intercourse; the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to counter his attack on her credibility and show that a relationship existed. Smith v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6004 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 2007).

223. Where defendant was alleged to have committed a sexual assault against a thirteen-year-old child, trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 404 by admitting the child's testimony of defendant's use and sale of marijuana; the evidence was admissible to show the attempt by defendant to cultivate a relationship with the child by bringing him to his house to smoke marijuana. Valdez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4612 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 12 2007).

224. In a trial for indecency with children, defendant should have been allowed to elicit testimony that he had a reputation in the community for the ethical treatment of children; the error in excluding that evidence was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), even though there was other testimony as to his reputation for being peaceful and law-abiding, because evidence of a reputation as being law-abiding was far too generic to address the specific character trait of pedophilia. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9788 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 9 2006).

225. Relevancy of the defendant's pornographic magazines that portrayed underaged young women in sexual situations lay in their tendency to make it more probable that defendant intended to sexually assault his daughter, a child under age 17, because it demonstrated his predilection for underaged females. Kenley v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8864 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 12 2006).

226. Defendant's admission in a videotape regarding other acts involving a child victim of sexual abuse was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2; the statement was also admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because he attempted to rebut a showing of motive, opportunity, and intent. White v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4973 (Tex. App. Austin June 9 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : Elements

227. Evidence of another sexual assault by defendant on the same victim at another location was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); the appellate court would not speculate as to why counsel did not request a limiting instruction at the time the jury heard testimony about the offense. Bock v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8743 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 16 2013).

228. During defendant's trial for attempted indecency with a child, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence of a recorded interview conducted by police officials, during which defendant confessed to previously sexually assaulting an eight-year-old girl, a victim separate from the one in the case at bar, where, in addition to outlining during his opening statement a defensive theory about the lack of intent, defendant pursued an attack on the State's evidence via cross-examination that furthered that previously-outlined defensive strategy, and only thereafter did the State seek admission of the at-issue Tex. R. Evid. 404 evidence. Erickson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1134 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 15 2008).

229. In an aggravated sexual assault case where defendant was convicted of sexually assaulting his 10-year-old stepgranddaughter, the fact that defendant suggested he was only wrestling with or tickling the victim brought into issue his intent; thus, the evidence of prior instances of sexual conduct with children became relevant. Therefore, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the evidence of prior acts of sexual misconduct with other children, including his two stepdaughters. Phillips v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10622 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 14 2006).

230. Defendant presented evidence that he was away from the house for most of the day obtaining stickers for both his and his ex-wife's vehicles; that permitted the trial court to make a reasonable inference that defendant was suggesting that he did not have the time to commit the alleged acts; by presenting his activities on the day in question to demonstrate lack of opportunity to commit the crime, defendant opened the door to admission of the extraneous evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show that he had the opportunity to commit the crime of aggravated sexual assault of a child. Morales v. State, 222 S.W.3d 134, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9771 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006), corrected by--S.W.3d--, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11350 (Tex. App. -- Corpus Christi 2006.

231. Another child's testimony that defendant assaulted her logically demonstrated that the current child victim was a credible witness by showing that an incestuous relationship could arise between a step-grandfather and his step-grandchildren; thus, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of those extraneous sexual offenses under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because defendant challenged the victim's credibility and the other child's testimony was needed to support the victim's testimony of the sexual assault that a jury might not otherwise want to acknowledge as existing in some familial relationships. Morales v. State, 222 S.W.3d 134, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9771 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006), corrected by--S.W.3d--, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11350 (Tex. App. -- Corpus Christi 2006.

232. Complainant testified that defendant fondled and kissed her in an escalating fashion when she was between the ages of six and 10, that he felt her under her clothes when she was 10, and that he had sexual intercourse with her when she was 13. Because the testimony was relevant to the state of mind of the complainant and defendant, as well as to the previous and subsequent relationship between the complainant and defendant, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, the trial court did not err in admitting the extraneous offense evidence. Parker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8834 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 12 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : Penalties

233. In a penalty trial for aggravated-sexual assault of a child, it was proper to allow the State to ask defendant's mother whether she had heard about an extraneous offense after she testified that her son was a good boy and that she knew he did not do it. Burke v. State, 371 S.W.3d 252, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8368, 2011 WL 5023008 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 20 2011).

234. In an aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child case, while defendant did not receive adequate notice of the bad act evidence of showing a pornographic videotape to the victim, as required by Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, this error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) as the victim testified unequivocally concerning sexual contact between defendant and her, and defendant received much less than the possible maximum sentence. Flores v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2506 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 29, 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Rape : Elements

235. In a sexual assault case alleging use of a date rape drug, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 in admitting testimony from women other than the complainant who claimed to have been drugged by defendant. Corbo v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7809, 2009 WL 5551376 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 24 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : General Overview

236. To the extent that defendant convicted of driving while intoxicated (DWI), second offense, had sought to characterize the technical violations that he committed during his previous community supervision for DWI as new offenses, and thereby require the State to provide pretrial notice of its intent to introduce evidence regarding technical community supervision violations in a future prosecution pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 or Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), his argument found no support in Texas statutes or caselaw because the legislature has not taken steps to include "technical" violations of community supervision within the scope of the term "offense," as that term is commonly used by Texas statutes and caselaw. Coffel v. State, 242 S.W.3d 907, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9993 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

237. Trial court did not err during defendant's trial for driving while intoxicated by admitting evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) of defendant's alcoholism and attendance at alcohol rehabilitation because the State was allowed to show a more complete picture of defendant's health -- the fact that she also suffered from alcoholism -- in order to rebut her defensive theory that she suffered generally from depression and panic attacks and that her suffering from such an attack caused her to appear intoxicated on the occasion in question. Manor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8276 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 21 2006).

238. Where defendant offered to stipulate that jurisdictional convictions existed, the probative value of evidence of the same convictions was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, and under Tex. R. Evid. 403, admission of defendant's prior DWI convictions was error; thus, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 2(a), the conviction should not be based on the assumption that the accused was a criminal generally or that he was a person of bad character. Robles v. State, 85 S.W.3d 211, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 97 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : License Violations

239. In a case where defendant was accused of making a counterfeit insurance card to procure the dismissal of a traffic ticket, there was no error in admitting evidence of a similar incident under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the evidence tended to show that defendant's actions were taken with the conscious objective of defrauding a court. Moreover, the differences between the two incidents, which occurred just two months apart, were not significant for purposes of Rule 404(b) since intent was the material issue. Vera v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5549 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 24 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Weapons : Possession : General Overview

240. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence three firearms that were not connected to the shooting that were found in defendant's motel room when he was arrested because: (1) the court did not believe that possession of a firearm was, in and of itself, extraneous misconduct; and (2) defendant made no assertion or argument that he was surprised or otherwise harmed by the State's failure to include the firearms in its Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) notice. Gonzalez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5139, 2011 WL 2652162 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 7 2011).

241. Where defendant was charged with possession of methamphetamine, a controlled substance, the arresting officer was permitted to testify to finding a sawed-off shotgun during the search of defendant's residence; possession of an illegal weapon qualified as same transaction contextual evidence in the circumstances of this offense, which established affirmative links between the methamphetamine and defendant. Longoria v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1158 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 9 2006).

242. In defendant's criminal trial for evading arrest in a vehicle, the trial court abused its discretion by permitting the State to introduce evidence of the handgun found in his vehicle and his parole status; because identity was the main issue in the case, the State did not have a compelling need to prove motive via defendant's parole status and the handgun. The trial court abused its discretion by concluding that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Powell v. State, 151 S.W.3d 646, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9368 (Tex. App. Waco 2004), reversed by 189 S.W.3d 285, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 681 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

243. In an assault case, evidence of gun possession was properly allowed as an extraneous offense because it was indivisibly connected to the charged offense, and it explained the context of the offense for which defendant was tried; the evidence showed that defendant committed the crime of felon in possession of a handgun by placing a gun in a vehicle before threatening two law enforcement officers. Morales v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3602 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 22 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Weapons : Use : General Overview

244. In a murder case involving multiple gunshot wounds, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting evidence that defendant produced a weapon several hours before the shooting because the assault was same transaction contextual evidence; the record showed an ongoing course of events from the time defendant threatened the assault victim with the gun until defendant shot the murder victim. Miller v. State, 2007 Tex. App.

LEXIS 6511 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 10 2007).

245. In an aggravated robbery case, the witnesses' extraneous offenses testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) for the purpose of proving identity because the robberies were sufficiently similar so as to mark them as defendant's handiwork because: (1) the time interval between the commission of the robberies was relatively short -- a three-week period; and (2) defendant used the same general modus operandi in all three robberies -- he entered the dry cleaning businesses carrying a jacket, asked each of the employees to dry clean his jacket, pulled out a knife when the employees' attentions were directed elsewhere, forced the employees to give him money, and then instructed them to stay in the businesses' bathrooms. Chatman v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5410 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 17 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juvenile Offenders : Juvenile Proceedings : General Overview

246. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child under 14 years of age case, juvenile defendant's 10-year commitment was reversed as the trial court's error in allowing the admission of an extraneous unadjudicated offense defendant allegedly committed against another child in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not harmless. The only purpose for offering the evidence was to show that defendant, while on probation, had sexually assaulted another young child just months earlier than the offense alleged in the petition to adjudicate. In re C.J.M., 167 S.W.3d 892, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4606 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

247. Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 51.17 if followed by the court and the rules of evidence applicable to criminal cases are applied to issues of admissibility at the disposition phase of all juvenile cases. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) is applicable to criminal cases. In re C.J.M., 167 S.W.3d 892, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4606 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

248. Trial court did not err in denying a juvenile's motion to sever six counts of aggravated sexual assault for separate trials, in part because the juvenile made no showing that evidence of the extraneous offenses would not have been admissible in severed cases. In re D.L., 160 S.W.3d 155, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1447 (Tex. App. Tyler 2005).

249. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) requires that, upon timely request by a defendant in a criminal case, reasonable notice be given in advance of the trial of the State's intent to introduce in the State's case-in-chief evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts, and where defendant juvenile objected to the extraneous offense evidence elicited upon cross-examination by the State after the State presented its case-in-chief and rested, defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection was without merit. In re V.M.S., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5938 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 1 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9833 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 4, 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Grand Juries : Procedures : Return of Indictments : Refusals to Indict

250. In a case involving indecency with a child, a trial court did not err by refusing to admit into evidence a grand jury's no-bill relating to an extraneous offense because it was not material to the defense of the case at hand. Bass v. Tex., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736, 2009 WL 3839003 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 18 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Accusatory Instruments : Indictments : General Overview

251. Court did not err in ruling that the State had given timely and adequate notice of its intention to introduce evidence of extraneous offenses where the State's notice as to each extraneous offense gave information, either in the notice itself or by reference to a specific numbered count of the indictment, sufficient to allow defendant to prepare for trial. In addition, over 10 days elapsed from the date of notice to the beginning of the trial. Splawn v.

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Brady Materials : Brady Claims

252. Because evidence of the investigation into the arresting officer was not admissible under this rule, as the investigation about whether the officer had violated the Occupations Code had no bearing on his propensity for violence or whether he was the first aggressor, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that defendant did not establish a Brady violation. Smith v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9194 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 25 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : General Overview

253. State was not required to give notice of the punishment phase testimony of two witnesses because, at no point, did defendant formally request notice prior to the commencement of the punishment phase. Also, the trial court's actions gave defendant several days to prepare for the testimony of the two new witnesses even though he was legally entitled to none. Flores v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 611, 2014 WL 235276 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 22 2014).

254. State was not required to give notice of the punishment phase testimony of two witnesses because, at no point, did defendant formally request notice prior to the commencement of the punishment phase. Also, the trial court's actions gave defendant several days to prepare for the testimony of the two new witnesses even though he was legally entitled to none. Flores v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 611, 2014 WL 235276 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 22 2014).

255. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b)'s requirement that the State give a defendant reasonable notice before trial of its intention to offer evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts does not apply when the other crimes, wrongs, or acts arise in the same transaction; other crimes may be admissible as same transaction contextual evidence where several crimes are intermixed, or blended with one another, or connected so that they form an indivisible criminal transaction, and full proof by testimony of any one of them cannot be given without showing the others. Gregory v. State, 56 S.W.3d 164, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 4519 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2001), writ of certiorari denied by 538 U.S. 978, 123 S. Ct. 1787, 155 L. Ed. 2d 667, 2003 U.S. LEXIS 2967, 71 U.S.L.W. 3666 (2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : Prior Record of Defendant

256. Appellant's solicitation came in a motion asking the trial court to order the State to give notice and that the order encompass discovery of all the State's evidence that would be used to establish each prior crime, but the trial court never ruled on the motion, which was required before the State's duty to produce or disclose was triggered; the court could not say the trial court erred in admitting the evidence even if prior notice of the State's intent to do so was not provided. Benitez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13146, 2013 WL 5782923 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 22 2013).

257. State did provide notice of its intent to offer evidence of extraneous offenses related to a prior kidnapping involving the same victim as in the current case, and a supplemental notice was also filed in advance of the trial; the subject matter of the pictures in question overlapped with the subject matter of the victim's testimony, such that no harm resulted from the admission of the pictures, assuming the State failed to provide reasonable prior notice. Benitez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13146, 2013 WL 5782923 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 22 2013).

258. Defendant argued that he did not receive proper notice regarding a witness's extraneous-offense testimony, but the notice requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) applied only to evidence presented during the State's case-in-chief, not to rebuttal evidence. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

259. Defendant argued that a description, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), did not properly indicate that the assault was of a public servant, but the State's next entry on the notice had the same date and a similar cause number and contained an offense description of resisting arrest and search. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

260. Given that (1) the prosecutor called defense counsel to inform him of the existence of a videotape as soon as the prosecutor learned of it, and he narrated a portion of the events to counsel, and (2) a copy of the videotape was made available on April 9th, and counsel received the video on April 13th, the day before trial, the trial court did not err in finding that the prosecution gave counsel reasonable notice of the evidence. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

261. Even if defendant had shown that the trial court abused its discretion in either admitting the videotape or in finding that notice was reasonable under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), defendant failed to show what harm resulted under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the other evidence provided reasonable assurance that even the erroneous admission of the videotape would have had only a slight effect, if any, on the jury, and defendant did not show how the lack of reasonable notice prejudiced the defense in any way. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

262. In an aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child case, while defendant did not receive adequate notice of the bad act evidence of showing a pornographic videotape to the victim, as required by Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, this error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) as the victim testified unequivocally concerning sexual contact between defendant and her, and defendant received much less than the possible maximum sentence. Flores v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2506 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 29, 2007).

263. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the court agreed with defendant that the State should have entitled its additional notices as "supplemental" or "additional" rather than "amended," but the trial court did not err in finding that the State intended to supplement, not amend, its prior notices and defendant did not suffer unfair prejudice. Icenogle v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 339 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 19 2007).

264. Trial court did not err in allowing the State to introduce extraneous evidence during the punishment phase; notice given under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) six days before a trial was not per se unreasonable as defendant claimed, the trial court refused to allow the State to present the evidence during its case-in-chief, the evidence was ultimately offered almost two weeks after defendant received notice, and defendant did not request a continuance. Icenogle v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 339 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 19 2007).

265. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), notice given six days before a trial is not per se unreasonable. Icenogle v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 339 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 19 2007).

266. State was not required by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to give advance notice to defendant of its intent to introduce evidence of her alcoholism because the evidence of alcoholism of which defendant complained was introduced in cross-examination and not in the State's case-in-chief. Manor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8276 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 21 2006).

267. In an aggravated assault and murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the extraneous offense evidence as defendant had adequate time to prepare a defense and could not demonstrate surprise by its introduction. Gabriel v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7979 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery Misconduct : General Overview

268. In a driving while intoxicated sentencing proceeding, the court did not err in admitting a scene video from a prior conviction, with testimony from the arresting officer, despite the State's failure to disclose. Defendant had argued that the admission was erroneous under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Oprean v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1895 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 10 2005).

269. In a trial for indecency with a child, the trial court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence, which related to defendant's touching of the victim's cousin, without the notice required by Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 3. The evidence was closely related in time, location, and subject matter with the charged offense, and therefore it was within the trial court's discretion to find that it was evidence "arising in the same transaction." McDonald v. State, 148 S.W.3d 598, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8855 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004), aff'd, 179 S.W.3d 571, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2010 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005). no pet.

270. Evidence of taped phone conversation, in which defendant indicated his involvement in the narcotics business, was properly admitted to rebut evidence that defendant desired to change his life, was capable of following the law if released, and made his living as a mechanic. The State was not required to give defendant notice of its intent to use the phone conversation as rebuttal during punishment. Wiggins v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8835 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 30 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Joinder & Severance : Severance of Defendants

271. Defendants, the mother of the victim and her boyfriend, failed to prove that they were prejudiced by their joint trial because: (1) the mother's request for severance was based entirely upon antagonistic defenses; (2) any error based on the mother's prior conviction of second-degree injury to a child was harmless because the conviction was not admitted into evidence; and (3) the boyfriend failed to timely present his claim that the mother's prior conviction was relevant to whether he had a motive to confess falsely; the boyfriend knew about his own motives before trial, and therefore was obligated to raise before trial any claim based on those motives, but he failed to raise the claim in his pretrial severance motion. Qualley v. State, 206 S.W.3d 624, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1007 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Joinder & Severance : Severance of Offenses

272. Although the trial court erred when it failed to grant defendant's motions to sever, based upon the overwhelming evidence of guilt as to each offense, defendant's substantial rights were not adversely affected by the joinder of the offenses of sexual assault, aggravated sexual assault, and indecency with a child by exposure into a single trial. Because the trial court in a separate trial for each offense could have admitted evidence of the other offenses to show same transaction context or to rebut defendant's suggestion of fabrication, separate juries would have heard similar evidence. Rodriguez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1018 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 30 2014).

273. Court did not err by denying defendant's motion to sever offenses because it was probable that the evidence relating to the victim's allegations against defendant would have been admissible for the purpose of rebutting defendant's theory that the victim was not telling the truth even if a severance had been granted, and defendant was able to concentrate his defense on the lack of physical evidence, the victim's inconsistent statements, and implications that she embellished and fabricated facts to please the outcry interviewer and others. Galbraith v.

State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8433 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 6, 2008).

274. Severance of offenses was properly denied in defendant's indecency and sexual assault on a child case because the record did not reflect that, had the cases been severed, defendant would have asserted different defensive theories for each victim; in addition, because of the allegedly similar patterns of abuse, and because two of the victims were living together, it was also likely that the testimony of the other victims would have been admissible to show opportunity, intent, preparation, or plan. Sparks v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2810 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 17 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Guilty Pleas : Admissibility at Trial

275. Tex. R. Evid. 404 was implicated by a murder defendant's statements in tape-recorded phone conversations about a plea offer on an unrelated offense because a rational jury could have believed that the reference to a plea agreement was evidence of another crime. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9519 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 5 2007).

276. In a murder trial, no harm occurred when the trial court admitted tape-recorded phone conversations that included defendant's statement about a plea offer on an unrelated offense; defendant's remark was in the middle of the State's first tape-recorded conversation, it was not singled out at trial, and the State did not attempt to introduce other evidence regarding the previous offense. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9519 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 5 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Guilty Pleas : Allocution & Colloquy

277. Failure to admonish defendant on the consequences of a guilty plea, specifically the requirement of registering as a sex offender, as required by Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 26.13, was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44 because the State presented substantial evidence of guilt, including Tex. R. Evid. 404 evidence regarding other children who had allegedly been abused by defendant and because the omitted admonition regarding the sex-offender registration requirement did not apply to or affect defendant, given that defendant would not be eligible for parole until serving 100 years of the sentence. Bessey v. State, 239 S.W.3d 809, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1630 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Sentencing

278. Defendant failed to show that her counsel was ineffective for failing to request notice of the State's intent to introduce evidence of extraneous offenses or bad acts during punishment, particularly the officer's testimony that defendant continued to post web-advertisements for escorting services up until the trial setting, because defendant did not identify what counsel could have discovered with timely notice of the State's intent. Defendant did not identify any particular witness or other evidence her counsel could have present to rebut the inference that she continued to work in the sex industry. Brown v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3685 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 10 2012).

279. Defendant in a methamphetamine possession case failed to show that his counsel was ineffective when evidence of an extraneous offense of manufacture of controlled substance was admitted during the punishment phase under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07. Counsel only told defendant he would not be indicted for the extraneous offense, not that it was inadmissible. Talbert v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5697 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2008).

280. Defendant's counsel was not ineffective for failure to object to the extraneous offenses mentioned in the presentence report, because defendant's complaints were based on Tex. R. Evid 404(b) (extraneous evidence) and 802 (hearsay), and because the rules of evidence, including the rules pertaining to hearsay, did not apply to the contents of the presentence report. Champion v. State, 126 S.W.3d 686, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 964 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Tests

281. In a trial for aggravated-sexual assault of a child, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to evidence of extraneous acts against the same victim that took place in a different county because the evidence was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 to show the relationship between defendant and the victim (defendant's nephew), to show their respective states of mind, and to show why the victim did not make a prompt outcry. Burke v. State, 371 S.W.3d 252, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8368, 2011 WL 5023008 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 20 2011).

282. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to the admission of a patrol-car video of a traffic stop in which the dispatcher and officer referred to defendant's other crimes, given a limiting instruction already provided by the trial court, the unintelligibility of much of the language in the video, the difficulty in establishing who was speaking in the video, and the applicable presumption of a sound trial strategy. Sorrells v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2519, 2010 WL 1404625 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 9 2010).

283. Defendant did not meet the Strickland test for proving that his counsel was ineffective in failing to timely object to the introduction of defendant's alleged extraneous conduct because the record was devoid of evidence regarding counsel's reasons or strategy concerning his failure to object to such evidence, and there was no showing that the trial's result would have differed if such evidence had been excluded. Franklin v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6128 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 2 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

284. Because the record was silent as to why counsel failed to object to the admission of a syringe and evidence of methamphetamine use, the court presumed that his conduct was reasonable. Griffis v. State, 441 S.W.3d 599, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4598 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 30 2014).

285. Even if counsel's performance was deficient in opening the door to evidence of defendant's remote prior convictions, there was no prejudice because the trial court would still have had the discretion to allow such evidence to be introduced by the State for impeachment purposes and the evidence of guilty was substantial. Howard v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3051, 2014 WL 2619087 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 20 2014).

286. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the introduction of extraneous offense evidence that he had assaulted his wife and a peace officer because counsel did object, the evidence constituted the same transaction contextual evidence and was admissible as an exception under this rule and because the record was silent the court presumed that counsel's actions were motivated by sound trial strategy. Hernandez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3079, 2014 WL 1101587 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 20 2014).

287. There was nothing in the record to suggest that defense counsel purposely elicited extraneous-offense evidence from his client or otherwise intentionally opened the door to such evidence, as defense counsel's decision to call a witness as a limited character witness represented a strategy within the bounds of the objective standard of reasonableness and counsel took steps to limit any damage incurred from the State's questioning, requesting a limiting instruction. Johnson v. State, 432 S.W.3d 552, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5162, 2014 WL 1998711 (Tex. App.

Texarkana May 15 2014).

288. Defendant did not show that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to specifically include a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection in his objection to testimony because trial counsel reasonably could have concluded that the testimony described past criminal behavior and not just inchoate statements. Perkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15003, 2013 WL 6569874 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 12 2013).

289. Because the record did not clearly establish that defense counsel did not receive notice of the State's intent to introduce the testimony of defendant's girlfriend and the victim concerning defendant's attempts to persuade them to drop the charges, the court could not conclude that counsel's failure to object on the ground that he lacked notice under this rule constituted deficient performance. Agbogwe v. State, 414 S.W.3d 820, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 29 2013).

290. Defendant's counsel was ineffective for opening the door to allow the State to introduce evidence of his prior convictions of sexual assault and sexual assault of a child by asking defendant's ex-girlfriend whether defendant was a violent person and she responded that he was not; therefore, on cross-examination the State was permitted to ask the ex-girlfriend whether she knew that defendant had pleaded guilty to two prior sexual assaults, allowing prejudicial and otherwise inadmissible evidence to be presented before the jury, which could not be considered sound trial strategy. The court held that defendant was prejudiced because the credibility of defendant's testimony was a key component of his defense strategy, given that he claimed he was trying to get away from the victim and had no intention of hurting anyone; although the trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction as to how it could consider the prior convictions, the instruction specifically allowed the jury to consider the convictions for the sole purpose of determining defendant's character for violence. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6365, 2013 WL 2301989 (Tex. App. Eastland May 23 2013).

291. In the absence of a record, the court could not conclude that defense counsel's failure to object to the admission of defendant's prior marijuana conviction was so outrageous that no competent attorney would have engaged in it. The court further held that defendant also failed to show that a reasonable possibility existed that, but for counsel's error, the result of the trial would have been different because excluding the complained-of prior offense, the evidence amply supported defendant's convictions. Mccook v. State, 402 S.W.3d 47, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4337 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 4 2013).

292. In a case where the victim's wife and appellant were having an affair, defense counsel was not ineffective for not objecting to the evidence regarding appellant's prior threats toward the victim as identity was an issue in the case and appellant's threats towards the victim could have been admitted to show proof of identity, motive, and intent under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Lemons v. State, 426 S.W.3d 267, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4227, 2013 WL 1339002 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 4 2013).

293. Trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to file a motion to secure notice from the State of its intent to introduce extraneous offense evidence because counsel was already aware of the evidence, as seen by counsel's preemptive attempts to exclude it by objecting. Matthews v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 47, 2013 WL 53748 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 3 2013).

294. Because the record did not contain any evidence of trial counsel's strategy in failing to file a motion in limine to exclude extraneous offense evidence, the court was constrained to presume that counsel's performance was effective. Matthews v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 47, 2013 WL 53748 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 3 2013).

295. Defendant failed to show that his trial counsel was deficient in failing to make a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection where defendant failed to show that the trial court would have been required to sustain the objection; the evidence at issue was arguably admissible to explain why the victim finally reported the abuse to the police. Sanchez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2019, 2012 WL 868010 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 14 2012).

296. In a sexual assault trial, counsel was not shown to be ineffective in failing to request a limiting instruction when the victim testified, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 § 2, about other extraneous acts of sexual abuse defendant committed against her because the record contained no explanation for counsel's decision. Taylor v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 581 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 26 2012).

297. Trial counsel was not ineffective in failing to object to evidence of extraneous offenses and in failing to move to suppress the suggestive pre-trial identification of defendant because (1) defendant had not established that some of the complained of evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and trial counsel's decision to elicit testimony to discredit the evidence identifying defendant as the person who committed the burglary was based on sound trial strategy; and (2) a complainant was not shown a photo lineup for identification purposes as she was not a witness to the burglary and defendant's trial counsel used her testimony about tattoos to discredit her recognition of defendant as a person who had been by the house about a week before the burglary. Mott v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10007, 2010 WL 5117251 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 15 2010).

298. Defendant failed to meet his burden to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the admission of extraneous offenses because the court could not conclude that the trial court would have erred by overruling such an objection, and therefore defendant failed to show a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's error, the result of the trial would have been different. It was within the trial court's discretion to conclude that counsel's cross-examination of the victim called into question a material detail of defendant and, as a result, put defendant's identity at issue; in addition, the record showed that the extraneous offense was sufficiently similar to the instant offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because both were acts of indecency towards a child, were committed on the morning of October 6, 2008, were committed between the hours of 7 a.m. and 8 a.m., were committed in the same kind of car, and occurred within a one block radius. Woods v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5894 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 22 2010).

299. Counsel was not ineffective for eliciting evidence from defendant's girlfriend about previous drug transactions and failing to object to such testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the record supported a conclusion that this was part of counsel's trial strategy to show that the arresting officer and defendant's girlfriend were not credible. Chandler v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 963, 2010 WL 457444 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 11 2010).

300. In a trial for aggravated assault on a child, defendant was not deprived of his Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel, even though counsel violated Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 412(b), (c), by introducing evidence about two other situations in which defendant had sexual conduct with girls who were three years younger than him and younger than the age for consensual sex, because the evidence could have been introduced to show a pattern of consensual activities and of involvment with girls relatively close to defendant in age. McGuire v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 673, 2010 WL 322988 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 29 2010).

301. In a driving while intoxicated case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object or request a limiting instruction with regard to a witness's testimony about defendant's bribery of a witness because evidence of the alleged bribe was admissible to impeach the witness's testimony and to indicate defendant's consciousness of guilt. The record reflected that counsel objected to the testimony, and defendant did not show how any limiting instruction would have been consistent with the defensive issues raised at trial. White v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 406, 2010 WL 196938 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 21 2010).

302. Counsel was ineffective because counsel's conduct in introducing and opening the door to a prior sexual assault and other "bad acts" evidence, along with his failure to object or request a limiting instruction, showed his lack of investigation of the relevant law and facts in advance of trial. Such conduct led to the admission of evidence that undermined defendant's credibility, which was dependent on the strength of his own credibility as compared to that of the complainant. Garcia v. State, 308 S.W.3d 62, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9692 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 23 2009).

303. In a case in which defendant was convicted of murder, defendant did not prove by a preponderance of the evidence that his trial counsel's representation was deficient where, although he claimed that trial counsel did not call witnesses who would have supported his contention that his cousin killed the victim, it could not be said that counsel was ineffective for failing to attempt to introduce evidence that was inadmissible because: (1) neither the witnesses nor the proffered testimony attacked the cousin's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, nor did their testimony establish he had been convicted of a crime within the parameters of Tex. R. Evid. 609; and (2) as to testimony by defendant's grandmother and uncle about what the cousin's father told them, that evidence was clearly hearsay, and defendant did not demonstrate on the record any exception that would have permitted the admission of those statements. Moreover, defendant did not establish that, but for his counsel's failure to call the witnesses, there was a reasonable probability the result of the proceeding would have been different because there were three eyewitnesses to the murder, one of whom had no relationship to anyone other than the victim, and therefore no motive to lie, and his testimony was corroborated by the other two eyewitnesses. Aquino v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7391, 2009 WL 3030749 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 23 2009).

304. In a child pornography case, habeas relief was denied to an accused on the basis of ineffectiveness of trial counsel relating to a failure to request Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) notice because trial counsel's affidavit stated that he did not make the request since the State provided the information prior to trial; the State's discovery response and trial counsel's affidavit also indicated that the State had an open-file policy which permitted trial counsel to inspect and review the State's files up to the day of trial. Moreover, the accused failed to show that the failure to make Rule 404(b) objections was professionally unreasonable or would have changed the outcome of the case. Ex Parte Yusafi, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6715, 2008 WL 6740798 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

305. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child, trial counsel did not perform ineffectively, even though no limiting instruction was requested concerning evidence of prior acts, crimes, or wrongs, because the decision might have been strategic. The record was silent regarding the reasons for the failure to request the instruction, and an argument was made that certain activities brought up by the State were normal family interactions. Arcement v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1096, 2009 WL 383398 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 18 2009).

306. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, counsel was not ineffective for eliciting details of defendant's prior conviction because defendant raised the issue of self-defense, and it was likely that the details of the offense would have been admitted to rebut that theory. In eliciting details of the offense, defense counsel gave defendant the opportunity to explain his version of the prior offense in the best light possible. McClure v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9026 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 4 2008).

307. Trial court properly denied the inmate habeas corpus relief on his claim that defense counsel was ineffective for failing to object to a witness's nonresponsive testimony concerning defendant's propensity for violence because the inmate failed to meet his burden to prove that counsel's representation fell below the standard of prevailing professional norms, as the court was not in a position to judge whether the risk of the jury focusing their view on the inmate outweighed the prejudicial nature of the testimony. Ex parte McAndrew, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 656 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 31 2008).

308. Defendant did not meet the Strickland test for proving that his counsel was ineffective in failing to timely object to the introduction of defendant's alleged extraneous conduct because the record was devoid of evidence regarding counsel's reasons or strategy concerning his failure to object to such evidence, and there was no showing that the trial's result would have differed if such evidence had been excluded. Franklin v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6128 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 2 2007).

309. In defendant's capital murder case, counsel was not ineffective for not cross-examining a witness about his prior testimony concerning the same murder and robbery at issue in the instant case because counsel testified that if the jury found out that defendant had been involved in another robbery similar to the one in the instant case, committed almost in the same manner and with one of the same parties, the jury would likely not have considered other evidence. Rivas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5623 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 12 2007).

310. In defendant's aggravated assault case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the admission of prior episodes of domestic violence, including photographs of injuries from other alleged acts of abuse and letters to the victim, because the evidence might have been relevant and admissible to provide context for defendant's spontaneous conduct on the night in question, the victim's response to defendant's threats, and to respond to defendant's testimony of denial and that he was the one threatened by the victim on that and prior occasions. Keeton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4873 (Tex. App. Austin June 19 2007).

311. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 404, to the admission of the portion of defendant's written statement that referred to an extraneous offense; any error was harmless because there is no reasonable probability that the evidence contributed to the conviction. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

312. In a drug case, defense counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to extraneous offense evidence because, at least some of the uncharged contraband discovered in defendant's vehicle would have been admissible; therefore, it could not be said that the result of the proceeding would have been different if counsel had objected or requested a limiting instruction. Batiste v. State, 217 S.W.3d 74, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8822 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

313. During defendant's criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, counsel was not ineffective for failing to request notice of the State's intent to offer evidence of defendant's extraneous offenses under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g); Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); the record did not indicate counsel's reasons for not objecting to evidence of defendant's extraneous offenses. Bishop v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4874 (Tex. App. Waco June 7 2006).

314. Where defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child under two indictments, counsel was not ineffective for failing to request a limiting instruction regarding extraneous offense evidence that may have been admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Tomlinson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3643 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 27 2006).

315. In a resisting arrest case, counsel was ineffective where, inter alia, counsel failed to investigate or interview defendant in detail about his criminal history or his prior contacts with the arresting officer; failed to seek discovery from the State; failed to file and obtain rulings on a motion in limine to require the State to raise extraneous matters outside the presence of the jury; failed to prepare defendant to testify; failed to object to evidence of inadmissible extraneous matters during the guilt phase; invited evidence of unadjudicated arrests during the punishment phase; and failed to object to failure of the punishment-phase charge to include a reasonable doubt instruction. Walker v. State, 195 S.W.3d 250, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1381 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

316. In a criminal prosecution for murder, defense counsel was not ineffective for failing to cross-examine witnesses on certain discrepancies. A defense strategy that avoids the introduction of extraneous offenses is not constitutionally ineffective. Ex parte McFarland, 163 S.W.3d 743, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 740 (Tex. Crim. App.

317. In defendant's drug case, counsel was ineffective where counsel failed to object to the omission of an accomplice witness instruction, allowing the jury to convict without any corroborating evidence, and counsel failed to object to the State's use of defendant's previous charges and arrests, which were not clearly related or relevant to the instant crime. In addition, counsel failed to object to the prosecutor's comment on defendant's failure to offer an explanation of the drugs in the trunk; therefore, there was a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's deficiencies during trial, the result would have been different. Hall v. State, 161 S.W.3d 142, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 508 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

318. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child, defendant failed to show that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the introduction into evidence of his mental health records, which defendant claimed contained evidence of inadmissible extraneous bad conduct. Defendant was not prejudiced by counsel's actions; even without the mental health records, the victim's testimony alone would have been sufficient to support his conviction. Taylor v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4581 (Tex. App. Dallas May 20 2004).

319. In an assault case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to an extraneous assault offense as being not relevant, unfairly prejudicial, and based on hearsay where the evidence was relevant because it tended to make it more probable that the victim's father was a credible witness; without the evidence, the jury was presented with the impression that he was being evasive and that he was racially biased against defendant. The probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by its prejudicial effect because the evidence presented a reason for the witness's feelings toward defendant, and the extraneous offense was not hearsay because it was not offered to prove that defendant had assaulted the victim in the past; rather, the evidence was admitted to prove that the victim's father disapproved of defendant because of his belief that defendant had assaulted the victim in the past. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2775 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 30 2004).

320. Defendant failed to show that his counsel was ineffective during his criminal trial, as her closing arguments emphasized defendant's claim that he did not intentionally or knowingly possess a bag of marijuana that was found in his newly rented apartment; the apartment manager's testimony that drug trafficking had been occurring at defendant's apartment was arguably admissible for purposes of showing intent, knowledge, or absence of mistake or accident pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and accordingly, his counsel's failure to object was not shown to have been unreasonable. Anang v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1902 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 26 2004).

321. Criminal defendant's trial counsel was not deficient for failing to call witnesses to testify as to specific instances of good conduct, which would be in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(1) as proof of character may only be admitted at trial in the form of reputation or opinion testimony. Monarrez v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 997 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Prosecutors

322. In a criminal prosecution for endangering a child arising from the sexual assault of defendant's two children by her live-in boyfriend, the trial court properly overruled defendant's objection to the prosecutor's remarks during opening statement that the two fathers of the victims were incarcerated where the prosecutor's remarks were improper character evidence, not within the exceptions provided by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Naivar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4883 (Tex. App. Tyler May 28 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Jury Deliberations : General Overview

323. Jury's request for previous charges and convictions did not implicate Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) but was a request for the relevant exhibits. Alvis v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4301, 2011 WL 2120510 (Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Province of Court & Jury : Invasion of Jury's Province

324. In a case involving the possession of hydrocodone, there was no error in admitting evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) based on the holding of Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296, 124 S. Ct. 2531 (2004), because that holding stated that a jury was required to make factual determinations in a jury trial; moreover, it held that a trial judge was unable to usurp the province of a jury in making determinations of fact. Defendant unsuccessfully tried to argue that, because no jury had ever found him guilty of the extraneous offense, it was improper to submit it to the jury in the instant case. Smith v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 751, 2009 WL 279490 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 5 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Burdens of Proof : Prosecution

325. In the punishment phase of a murder trial, the trial court was not required to instruct the jury that the State had to prove beyond a reasonable doubt extraneous offenses for which defendant had previously been convicted. Johnson v. State, 176 S.W.3d 94, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9589 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Closing Arguments : General Overview

326. Defendant failed to preserve error as to improper jury argument about his arrest because he failed to raise that objection at trial and because other evidence about his arrest was admitted without objection. Gonzales v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4020 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 11 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Continuances

327. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant defendant's motion for continuance based on lack of notice or in admitting extraneous offense evidence during punishment because the State was not obligated to inform defendant regarding extraneous offenses that it intended to use during the punishment phase of trial due to defendant's failure to properly request notice of the extraneous acts. Defendant's request was made pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and made no reference to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, and a request made pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not sufficient to obligate the State to disclose extraneous evidence that it intended to introduce at the punishment phase of trial. Miller v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2717 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 7 2005).

328. Where defendant pleaded guilty to criminal mischief, he failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion by denying his oral motion for continuance because the State gave inadequate notice of its intent to introduce evidence of prior bad acts. Defendant was only entitled to reasonable notice, and he did not dispute that the State provided notice as soon as the information became available. Burns v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1892, 2014 WL 708548 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 20 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Confrontation

329. In a trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon under, the trial court did not err by excluding the hearsay recitals in an arrest warrant affidavit and complaint indicating the complainant had previously committed an assault on the defendant; defendant was not prevented from confronting the complainant concerning his prior bad acts; he was permitted to cross-examine the complainant concerning his previous conviction for aggravated assault. Bradshaw v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5891 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 6 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Counsel : Effective Assistance

330. Trial counsel was not ineffective in failing to object to evidence of extraneous offenses and in failing to move to suppress the suggestive pre-trial identification of defendant because (1) defendant had not established that some of the complained of evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and trial counsel's decision to elicit testimony to discredit the evidence identifying defendant as the person who committed the burglary was based on sound trial strategy; and (2) a complainant was not shown a photo lineup for identification purposes as she was not a witness to the burglary and defendant's trial counsel used her testimony about tattoos to discredit her recognition of defendant as a person who had been by the house about a week before the burglary. Mott v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10007, 2010 WL 5117251 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 15 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : General Overview

331. Criminal defendant's trial counsel was not deficient for failing to call witnesses to testify as to specific instances of good conduct, which would be in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(1) as proof of character may only be admitted at trial in the form of reputation or opinion testimony. Monarrez v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 997 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Cross-Examination

332. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(3), 608(a), 613 by denying defendant the opportunity to cross-examine a witness about whether the witness was untruthful to the judge that presided over the witness's guilty plea to an assault charge. Reyes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2359, 2010 WL 1254543 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 1 2010).

333. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by allowing extraneous offense evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because, although the State did not provide prior notice of its intent to utilize the evidence, the State presented the evidence during cross examination of defendant. Hope v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 657, 2009 WL 223134 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 30 2009).

334. Defendant advanced the theory that the charged offenses of three counts of sexual assault and two counts of indecency with a child were an anomaly in his life and that the chance of reoffense was very small; that theory was subject to rebuttal and cross-examination by the State; the fact that the victim alleged that more instances had occurred than were charged could be seen as relevant to defendant's assertions that the charged offenses were anomalies in his life and that it was unlikely that he would reoffend; therefore, under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the extraneous offenses to be brought into evidence by the State on cross-examination and rebuttal even without notice to defendant. Norman v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9463 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 5 2007).

335. In a stalking case, the trial court did not err by allowing the cross-examination of a defense witness regarding whether she was aware that defendant had been charged with a crime following an alleged domestic violence incident with the victim and whether she was aware that he had violated a protective order and assaulted his former wife; this evidence was relevant to defendant's good character after the witness testified that she had called the victim and asked her to give defendant another chance. Allen v. State, 218 S.W.3d 905, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2527 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

336. During defendant's trial for indecent exposure, the trial court properly excluded evidence that the victim called the police regarding various disturbances at her residence on several occasions following the report of exposure because the decision was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; the trial court maintained broad discretion to impose reasonable limits on cross-examination to avoid harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, endangering the witness, and the injection of cumulative and collateral evidence, and, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), specific instances of conduct, other than conviction of a crime, when offered to attack the witness's credibility could not be explored on cross-examination. Tennison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2120 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 16 2006).

337. In a criminal prosecution for murder, defense counsel was not ineffective for failing to cross-examine witnesses on certain discrepancies. A defense strategy that avoids the introduction of extraneous offenses is not constitutionally ineffective. Ex parte McFarland, 163 S.W.3d 743, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 740 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

338. For proof of identity to be a valid purpose for the introduction of extraneous bad acts under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), it must be an issue in the case, and the identity can be raised by defense cross-examination, such as when the identifying witness is impeached on a material detail of the identification. Page v. State, 137 S.W.3d 75, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 936 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

339. Vigorous cross-examination can, by itself, place in issue a nonconformity purpose under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Page v. State, 137 S.W.3d 75, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 936 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Judicial Discretion

340. Court of appeals failed to properly defer to a trial court's decision where the trial court was within its discretion to hold that the probative value of evidence of a handgun and of defendant's parole status was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given that the jury was not informed of the crime for which defendant was on parole, that the strength or weakness of the handgun's connection to defendant reflected equally on the issues of probative value and prejudice, and that there was reason to believe that the State had a significant need for the evidence. Powell v. State, 189 S.W.3d 285, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 681 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Motions for Mistrial

341. Mistrial was not required by the use by a state witness of defendant's nickname, which was suggestive of other crimes, even though the use violated the trial court's order, because there was no showing that the prosecutor intentionally violated the order and the witness stopped using the nickname after being warned by the trial court that it would not honor the witness's deal with the state. Simons v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8111, 2014 WL 3700667 (Tex. App. Dallas July 24 2014).

342. At defendant's trial for possession of a controlled substance, a witness's comment during direct examination that defendant was out on parole did not warrant a mistrial, because the State's questioning was developing the narrative, the State did not anticipate a reference to an extraneous offense, and the reference was not a concrete statement of a prior offense. The prompt objection and instruction to disregard prevented any elaboration on the offense. Joseph v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13998, 2013 WL 6045902 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 12 2013).

343. Statement made by a testifying officer about defendant's prior arrests did not require a mistrial under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was not given in answer to a question designed to elicit testimony about any extraneous offenses. Rather, the question was to determine when during a stop the officer asked for permission to search the vehicle. Nunn v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7794, 2009 WL 3189361 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 6 2009).

344. In defendant's solicitation case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant defendant's motion for mistrial because a witness testified, without objection, that defendant and the victim were involved in another "high-profile case," in explaining why his "people" would not carry out the alleged plot to kill the victim. Additionally, the complained of testimony was elicited by defendant's trial counsel, thus supporting a finding that the testimony was given inadvertently. Simpson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6382 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 21 2008).

345. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault, the complainant testified that she waited several years to tell anyone about the abuse as she was afraid of defendant because she saw him beat her mother; the complainant also testified that defendant came to her house to buy drugs; the trial court instructed the jury to disregard the improper statements, therefore curing any prejudice; defendant was not entitled to a mistrial. Degollado v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6032 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 1 2007).

346. Defendant argued that the trial court erred by allowing evidence of an extraneous offense before the jury; the evidence of which defendant complained was the admission of his statements in the videotaped interview that his daughter had threatened to report him to the authorities because he "scratched her little girl's butt;" defendant could complain on appeal that he should have been granted a mistrial due to the improper admission of the evidence of an extraneous offense; however, the appellate court, having decided all of the Mosley factors adversely to defendant, overruled the issue. Badeaux v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2710 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 4 2007).

347. Trial court did not err in denying a mistrial in an aggravated assault case because an instruction to disregard was sufficient to cure any prejudice resulting from the prosecutor's asking a witness whether she was aware of other shootings that had taken place in the area and the witness' reply that she had heard about it; there was no Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) violation because defendant was not clearly implicated in an extraneous offense, and the question was not extremely inflammatory under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Holland v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

348. Mistrial was not required on a charge of indecency with a child, even though a witness testified regarding an extraneous act after the trial court ruled the evidence inadmissible, because the statement was isolated, did not include details, and was not the result of prosecutorial misconduct. The court presumed that a curative instruction was effective. Vickery v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7664 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 15 2005).

349. Trial court did not err in denying a request for mistrial in a cocaine possession case after a detective testified that he had already suspected defendant of drug trafficking; the passing reference to the detective's prior suspicions was not prejudicial in light of the prompt jury instruction to disregard. Legarda v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1403 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 17 2005).

350. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial in a drug case based on an officer's reference to knowing people in a certain town because the statement did not constitute an improper reference to extraneous offenses, and any improper impression created by the statement was cured by the trial court's prompt instruction to disregard. Moss v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4219 (Tex. App. Dallas May 10 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Opening Statements

351. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), defendant's opening statement was sufficient to raise a theory of fabrication that entitled the State to offer extraneous-offense evidence in rebuttal because defendant's attorney provided the victim's motive for fabricating her story; he said that there was no evidence to support her allegations; and he claimed that her story changed. Gaytan v. State, 331 S.W.3d 218, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 444 (Tex. App. Austin

Jan. 21 2011).

352. Defense opening statement opens the door to the admission of extraneous-offense evidence to rebut the defensive theory presented in the defense opening statement. Bass v. State, 270 S.W.3d 557, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 859 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

353. In a criminal prosecution for endangering a child arising from the sexual assault of defendant's two children by her live-in boyfriend, the trial court properly overruled defendant's objection to the prosecutor's remarks during opening statement that the two fathers of the victims were incarcerated where the prosecutor's remarks were improper character evidence, not within the exceptions provided by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Naivar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4883 (Tex. App. Tyler May 28 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Credibility

354. In defendant's aggravated assault case, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not exclude evidence of third-party threats against the complainants because it was relevant to explain the inconsistencies in the complainants' testimony; evidence of threats against any witnesses to the shootings tended to explain the complainants' motivation to potentially understate the number of their family members that, in fact, might have witnessed the shootings. Cox v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1902, 2009 WL 807491 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 19 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Impeachment

355. Trial court did not err during defendant's trial for indecency with a child when it allowed the prosecutor, for the limited purpose of impeachment, to question the victim's mother about her knowledge of defendant's prior convictions for aggravated sexual assault of two other children because the mother's testimony on direct examination by defendant's counsel that she had no reason to suspect that defendant would abuse her children opened the door and put at issue her credibility. Delacruz v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13492, 2013 WL 5890796 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 31 2013).

356. Because a witness's testimony was admissible only to rebut defendant's statement of good conduct with minors, a court should have given an instruction to use the testimony only in assessing defendant's credibility, not as proof that he committed the offense or as proof of a plan to have a sexual relationship with the victim. Daggett v. State, 187 S.W.3d 444, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2127 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Presentation

357. In a capital murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 in admitting extraneous offense evidence that was offered to show why an accomplice witness was fearful of defendant and did not report the murders to the authorities. Segura v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6589, 2010 WL 3190252 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 13 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : General Overview

358. Another sexual assault victim's testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to rebut the defense's claim of fabrication or frame-up by the victim and because the evidence had relevance apart from character conformity. Dreyer v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 353, 2011 WL 193494 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 19 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Alibi

359. In an aggravated robbery case, the court properly allowed the State to present a witness's testimony that defendant had robbed her at gunpoint at a time when defendant's witness testified that he was working for her because the testimony had significant potential value to prove that defendant's alibi witness was not truthful; in light of the instructions given, the evidence did not have the potential to impress the jury in an irrational way, and no other evidence except the witness's significantly assisted the State in contradicting the account of defendant's whereabouts. Davis v. State, 214 S.W.3d 101, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10866 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2006).

360. Extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 to refute defendant's alibi. Casique v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6517 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 16 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Necessity

361. Trial court did not err when it admitted evidence that defendant had been seen selling drugs a month before her indicted offense of being a felon in possession of a firearm because the testimony, elicited from a witness present when the indicted offense was committed, was relevant and tended to make the existence of defendant's intent to possess a firearm more likely than not, as the witness testified that he knew of five prior occasions on which defendant sold crack cocaine and also commented that drug dealers were often armed to protect themselves from being robbed; furthermore, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not prevent the State from introducing evidence of extraneous acts to help rebut defendant's necessity defense and other evidence offered to rebut intentional or knowing possession of a firearm because in order to prove that defendant was a felon in possession of a firearm, it was necessary for the State to establish she acted with the requisite mental state. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Right to Present

362. Defendant failed to preserve for review her claim that she was deprived of her right to present a complete defense under the Sixth Amendment due to the fact that the trial court excluded from evidence a videotaped interview with the victim because at trial defendant relied on Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) but never asserted her right to present a complete defense and did not cite the Holmes case; her attorney's statement at the end of his bill of exception that defendant was denied her constitutional rights was insufficient preserve the Holmes issue for appeal. Even if the issue had been preserved, defendant failed to show that any constitutional error occurred because the trial court excluded the videotape based on Tex. R. Evid. 403 and the substance of the defense, that the videotape would have enabled the jury to judge whether the victim initially failed to implicate her mother because she was truly afraid, was presented to the jury, through cross-examination of the victim and a caseworker. Sanchez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10169, 2011 WL 6916418 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 28 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Self-Defense

363. Witness's testimony that defendant was angry and agitated earlier the same evening of the stabbing was admissible under this rule to prove defendant's motive or intent and to rebut his theory of self-defense. Allen v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7895 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 22 2014).

364. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence extraneous offense testimony because it was relevant to rebut defendant's theory of self-defense. Defendant raised the issue of self-defense when he testified that he felt threatened and thought his life was in grave danger at the time he shot at the front tire of the complainant's vehicle; the State presented evidence of two prior violent acts in which he acted as an aggressor and later asserted that he had acted in self-defense. Franks v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14442 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 26 2013).

365. In defendant's murder case, the court did not erroneously exclude evidence regarding the victim's violent character because the evidence did not tend to show that the victim was the first aggressor; the fact that victim once told a witness that he would "take care of her husband and brother if they came looking for her" did not serve to demonstrate the victim's intent the night of the murder. Defendant's preferred testimony that the victim was a member of a prison gang that was "running fast" and "doing hits" was similarly irrelevant other than to show the victim's character conformity. Vasquez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7428, 2012 WL 6863860 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 27 2012).

366. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the extraneous-offense evidence that defendant had engaged in abusive behavior with a former cell mate, similar to what had been inflicted on the murder victim, rebutted the theory that defendant acted in self-defense. Svenningsen v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7681 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2011).

367. Because the evidence of the similar abusive conduct by defendant against a former cell mate made defendant's self-defense theory much less probable and the State needed the extraneous offense evidence to question whether defendant acted in self defense at all, under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the former cell mate's testimony. Svenningsen v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7681 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2011).

368. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's prior assault of another victim during his trial on charges of aggravated assault and manslaughter because it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show defendant's intent and to rebut his theory of self-defense. Render v. State, 347 S.W.3d 905, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6623 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 18 2011).

369. When defendant was charged with causing injury to an elderly person by reckless conduct, the State was permitted to rebut defendant's claim of self-defense with evidence of his prior assault conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). The evidence was quite probative and did not have a tendency to confuse or mislead the jury. Kelley v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1780, 2011 WL 832862 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 9 2011).

370. In an assault trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) in admitting evidence of an assault that defendant committed against his common-law wife to rebut his theory of self-defense. White v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5604, 2010 WL 2803018 (Tex. App. Eastland July 15 2010).

371. In an assault trial arising from a bar fight, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to exclude evidence of a prior violent act by the victim because there was evidence that the victim was the first aggressor. The error did not require reversal because the excluded testimony did not have a substantial effect on the rejection of defendant's self-defense claim, given that defendant did not attempt to retreat but pulled a knife during a physical altercation and stabbed the unarmed victim, who did not not use deadly force. Dudzik v. State, 276 S.W.3d 554, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9073 (Tex. App. Waco 2008).

372. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, the trial court did not err by allowing the State to introduce evidence of prior assaults by defendant on the victim to rebut the self-defense theory raised in the opening statement by the defense; Tex. R. Evid. 404 did not render the evidence inadmissible. Jones v. State, 241 S.W.3d 666, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9490 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

373. Trial court did not err by allowing the State to introduce evidence of the victim's character under Tex. R. Evid. 404 because the claim of self-defense was raised by the defense, as defense counsel had indicated during opening argument that defendant's actions were justified and the State introduced defendant's statement in its entirety, which included evidence in support of his self-defense claim. Cruz v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9002 (Tex. App.

El Paso Nov. 15 2007).

374. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated assault, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's prior acts of aggression; the prior violent acts presented by the State were admissible to show defendant's intent and to rebut her theory of self-defense. Vidal v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1913 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 9 2006).

375. In a murder prosecution where a defendant claimed self-defense, the deceased's prior threats could be admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), even though those threats were not directed at the defendant, as long as the proffered threats explain the outward aggressive conduct of the deceased at the time of the killing, and in a manner other than demonstrating character conformity only; however, where a jury convicted a defendant for manslaughter, the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas did not need to decide whether evidence of an individual's two-year-old specific acts of violence against defendant was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because self-defense was unavailable to a defendant who recklessly injured or killed an innocent third person. Hayes v. State, 161 S.W.3d 507, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 652 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).
