376. When the accused claimed self-defense, the State may introduce evidence of other violent acts where the defendant was the aggressor to show the defendant's intent; defendant asked for and received an instruction on self-defense in the charge, and the extraneous-offense evidence tended to make it less probable that defendant was acting in self-defense and more probable that he was the first aggressor, such that because the extraneous-offense evidence was relevant to disprove defendant's claim of self-defense, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence on this basis pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Diogu v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7123 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 10 2004), appeal dismissed by 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 184 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 12, 2006).

377. In the assault trial of a father who shot his son, the trial court properly excluded a post-shooting psychological evaluation of the son, and any evidence of the son's violent nature that surfaced after the shooting was at best only minimally relevant and was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or confusion of the issues concerning the father's assertion of self-defense. Iverson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7007 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 2 2004).

378. Defendant's prior crimes or bad acts could be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, intent, plan, knowledge, or lack of mistake or accident, and when a defendant claimed self-defense, the State could introduce evidence of other violent acts where the defendant was an aggressor in order to show intent, and the appellate court saw no reason to depart from precedent and found that the trial court properly admitted the evidence of the extraneous offenses. Hamilton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5444 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2004).

379. In a criminal prosecution for murder where defendant claimed self-defense, the trial court properly excluded evidence of the victim's previous violent acts against people other than defendant. Defendant offered the previous violent acts only for the purpose of demonstrating that the victim had acted in conformity with his violent character in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404. Deavila v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3562 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 22 2004).

380. Where the record showed that defendant and the intended victim engaged in an altercation, which left a bystander dead, and defendant claimed self-defense in shooting at the intended victim, defendant's manslaughter conviction was affirmed; the exclusion of testimony about extraneous acts of aggression by the intended victim was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2) where defendant failed to show that he had any knowledge of those violent acts, and therefore the acts could not have influenced defendant's state of mind. Hayes v. State, 124 S.W.3d 781, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9841 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003), affirmed by 161 S.W.3d 507, 2005 Tex. Crim. App.

381. Defendant's manslaughter conviction was affirmed where the exclusion of testimony about extraneous acts of aggression by the intended victim was proper; defendant could have introduced character evidence suggesting that the intended victim was the aggressor, but he could not have introduced evidence of the specific acts and events where such evidence was not admissible for other purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Hayes v. State, 124 S.W.3d 781, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9841 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003), affirmed by 161 S.W.3d 507, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 652 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

382. Evidence that a witness feared for her life because the deceased victim had told her that if she did not tell him where his girlfriend was, he would hurt her and her children, should not have been excluded from defendant's murder trial because, as defendant's defense was that he acted in self-defense, he was permitted, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2), to introduce evidence of his victim's violent character as long as there was some evidence of aggression by the victim before the introduction of the character evidence and, in defendant's trial, before the witness was called to testify, there was evidence that the victim had climbed up a balcony, uninvited, early in the morning, which was an act of aggression by the victim that tended to raise the issue of self defense. Torres v. State, 117 S.W.3d 891, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 595 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003).

383. Defendant should have been permitted to introduce evidence of his victim's character in support of his claim of self-defense pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2) because, as evidence had been admitted that the victim had engaged in an act of aggression by climbing up a balcony, uninvited, early in the morning, it was not necessary for defendant to also provide evidence of a "fray" between himself and the victim before the introduction of the character evidence. Torres v. State, 117 S.W.3d 891, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 595 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Scienter : General Overview

384. In a case where defendant was charged with fleeing from police, evidence that defendant was found underneath a house when officers tried to serve a warrant for arrest was properly admitted by a trial court because it tended to prove knowledge of guilt; even if the admission was erroneous, it was disregarded on appeal since defendant's substantial rights were not affected; it would have been difficult to explain the circumstances of the arrest without such evidence, and the State did not mention the evidence in its final argument. Jacobs v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4239 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 11 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Scienter : General Intent

385. During a confrontation over a stolen bike, defendant stabbed the victim with a knife. After defendant testified that the victim was the aggressor and was injured when he fell, the State was permitted to prove defendant's intent through extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) showing that he had threatened others with violence and chased another individual with a knife when he believed the individual had stolen money from him. McDonald v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7139 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 29 2007).

386. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous assaults where they had sufficient similarities to the charged offense to have been introduced to show intent, and under the doctrine of chances those offenses had a multiplicative effect where each additional offense made the issue of intent more compelling, and the prejudicial effect of the evidence did not outweigh its probative value. Rickerson v. State, 138 S.W.3d 528, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4884 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Scienter : Knowledge

387. Trial court did not err in admitting items used in the manufacture of methamphetamine and amphetamine in the case against defendant for possession of amphetamine as these items went to the issue of knowledge or criminal intent which was an element in the possession case. Popp v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 631 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 26 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Scienter : Specific Intent

388. At defendant's trial for indecent exposure, the court did not err in allowing the State to question him regarding his prior conviction for indecency with a child because the circumstances surrounding the earlier offense made it more probable that defendant exposed himself with intent to arouse sexual desire. Rodriguez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14268, 2013 WL 6147789 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 21 2013).

389. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, the State was permitted to admit evidence of pornographic photos taken from defendant's computer; the images were indicative of defendant's intent to commit the sexual offense of indecency with a child and sexual assault, and thus were admissible pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Ficarro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 26 2007).

390. Because defendant denied that he intentionally and knowingly causing the deaths of the two murder victims, his intent was an essential disputed issue in the case, and evidence of defendant's involvement in a similar murder was properly admitted pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as relevant to the jury's determination of whether defendant anticipated or intended the murders of the victims in the present case. Sorto v. State, 173 S.W.3d 469, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1622 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 2982, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 5229 (U.S. 2006).

391. Evidence of an extraneous assault offense that defendant allegedly committed against his wife after her aggravated kidnapping and six days before his trial on that charge was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) for the purpose of showing his intent to inflict bodily injury on his wife where defendant's intent was a fact of consequence because the indictment included an allegation that he intended to commit murder or to inflict bodily injury when he abducted his wife. Furthermore, evidence of defendant's subsequent alleged assault of his wife was relevant because his subsequent conduct made it more probable that he intended to inflict bodily injury on his wife during the charged offense. Simoneaux v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5628 (Tex. App. Tyler July 20 2005).

392. Intent can be characterized as a contested issue for purposes of justifying the admission of extraneous offense evidence to help prove intent if the required intent for the primary offense cannot be inferred by the act itself or if the accused presents evidence to rebut the inference that the required intent existed. Harris v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7666 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2004).

393. In an attempted capital murder case, the State was allowed to introduce extraneous evidence regarding defendant's shooting during a similar burglary because intent was the only challenged issue in the case where defendant contended that the shooting was only intended to scare the victim of the charged offense, but the extraneous evidence showed that defendant threatened to kill another victim with a gun during a similar burglary. Cisneros v. State, 143 S.W.3d 269, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6370 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : General Overview

394. Because the second instruction to the jury was a new and different instruction and contradicted the original correct instruction, the jury was free to disregard the initial instruction and to consider the extraneous offense evidence to determine defendant's guilt on the present robbery charge, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b).

Heigelmann v. State, 362 S.W.3d 763, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1670, 2012 WL 688427 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 2 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Curative Instructions

395. In a burglary trial, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to admit testimony about a prior theft, but the trial court's instruction to disregard was curative. Stine v. State, 300 S.W.3d 52, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8121 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 21 2009).

396. During defendant's murder trial, the detective testified that he had seen defendant in a crime stoppers listing on an unrelated shooting. Assuming that the testimony violated Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), defendant was not entiitled to a mistrial because the trial judge instructed the jury to disregard the statement. Gamboa v. State, 296 S.W.3d 574, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 512 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

397. Trial court did not err by refusing to grant a mistrial based on defendant's assertion that Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was violated when a witness testified that defendant's wife had stated that defendant had murdered someone; the statement was in the middle of the testimony, it was not repeated, it was not connected to a charged assault, and the jury was told to disregard the testimony. Moreover, nothing in the record suggested that the jury would have rendered a different verdict without the complained-of statement. Hecht v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 521, 2009 WL 200979 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 29 2009).

398. Trial court did not err in denying a mistrial in an aggravated assault case because an instruction to disregard was sufficient to cure any prejudice resulting from the prosecutor's asking a witness whether she was aware of other shootings that had taken place in the area and the witness' reply that she had heard about it; there was no Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) violation because defendant was not clearly implicated in an extraneous offense, and the question was not extremely inflammatory under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Holland v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

399. In a murder case, any prejudice caused by the admission of defendant's extraneous offense was cured by the trial court's instruction; the State brought attention to the extraneous offense on only one occasion where it asked a witness if she knew that defendant had been convicted of a felony, after the witness had voiced a favorable opinion of defendant's character. That question was followed immediately by a sustained objection and a curative instruction by the trial court. Nickleson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6658 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 18 2005).

400. In a sexual assault trial, the complainant's comment that she had been told of defendant's actions with other girls did not require a mistrial. The trial court instructed jury to disregard the comment, the testimony was unsolicited, and the comment was not calculated to inflame the minds of the jurors. Mass v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2551 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 24 2004).

401. In a sexual assault trial, the complainant's comment that she had been told of defendant's actions with other girls did not require a mistrial. The trial court instructed jury to disregard the comment, the testimony was unsolicited, and the comment was not calculated to inflame the minds of the jurors. Mass v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2551 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 24 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Limiting Instructions

402. There was nothing in the record to suggest that defense counsel purposely elicited extraneous-offense evidence from his client or otherwise intentionally opened the door to such evidence, as defense counsel's decision to call a witness as a limited character witness represented a strategy within the bounds of the objective standard of reasonableness and counsel took steps to limit any damage incurred from the State's questioning, requesting a limiting instruction. Johnson v. State, 432 S.W.3d 552, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5162, 2014 WL 1998711 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 15 2014).

403. Where the trial court properly instructed the jury to consider extraneous offense evidence only for the purposes allowed under this rule, which included determining identity, it was not necessary to submit a limiting instruction on the defensive theory of misidentification. Mason v. State, 416 S.W.3d 720, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13527, 2013 WL 5861492 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 31 2013).

404. Despite defendant's contention to the contrary, the record showed that the trial court properly instructed the jury that it could consider the extraneous offense evidence only if it believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant had committed the offense and only in determining the motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident of defendant. Nash v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10452 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 20 2013).

405. Trial court was not obligated to issue an instruction limiting the usage of evidence pertaining to a pornographic video that defendant showed to his child sexual assault victim (his teenaged daughter) because the complained-of evidence constituted same-transaction contextual evidence; the evidence was properly received as general evidence. Freeman v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8566 (Tex. App. Waco July 11 2013).

406. Court did not err in admitting extraneous-offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because, throughout trial, defendant's defensive theory was that the complainant consented to the sexual encounter; defendant neither objected to the instruction provided nor did he request a different limiting instruction that he deemed to be appropriate. The evidence was admissible under the opportunity, plan, and intent exceptions to Rule 404(b) and as evidence of modus operandi. Bailey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8593, 2012 WL 4841465 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 11 2012).

407. In a case involving burglary of a habitation, a trial court did not err by admitting evidence of appellant's subsequent assault on one apartment resident under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), who was attempting to retrieve the purse and keys of appellant's victim. This was admissible as same-transaction contextual evidence because it provided the jury with information essential to understanding the context and circumstances of blended or interwoven events, and a limiting instruction was not required. Jennings v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7400, 2012 WL 3765083 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 31 2012).

408. Any error by the trial court in failing to given the jury a contemporaneous limiting instruction as the extraneous offenses admitted against defendant was harmless because the record reflected ample evidence of defendant's guilt, the extraneous evidence was not more heinous or inflammatory than the evidence pertaining to the charged offenses, and the jury charged contained a limiting instruction with regard to the extraneous conduct committed by defendant. Guardado v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5514, 2012 WL 2832561 (Tex. App. El Paso July 11 2012).

409. During a capital murder trial, the court erred in its charge to the jury regarding extraneous acts of credit card abuse because it did not require the jury to find beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the extraneous acts. The error was harmless under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.19, because the jury was admonished by a limiting instruction to consider the credit card evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404 for the limited purpose of showing defendant's motive for the murders. Smith v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2890, 2012 WL 1263567 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 12 2012).

410. Defendant was not entitled to a limiting instruction in the jury charge on extraneous offense evidence because he did not request a limiting instruction when the evidence was first introduced. Harris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2143, 2012 WL 952248 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 20 2012).

411. Trial court did not err, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), by allowing the jury to hear evidence of defendant's extraneous offenses during the guilt/innocence stage of the trial because the evidence was not admitted to show that defendant had actually committed the prior offense, but to show that he had lied to the officer about whether he had been previously arrested. The trial court properly instructed the jury to use the evidence solely for the purpose of showing the existence of defendant's untruth about a prior arrest, providing some support for the officer to have a reasonable suspicion about the nature of defendant's activities. Davila v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 959, 2012 WL 376634 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 7 2012).

412. Even though the trial court erred by failing to include extraneous offense limiting instructions in the jury charge during the guilt phase of defendant's trial, the error was harmless because: (1) the complainant and two officers testified that defendant, a convicted felon, possessed a firearm at the time of his arrest; (2) defense counsel admitted during closing arguments that the evidence was probably sufficient to support a conviction for that offense; (3) the trial court provided the requisite oral instruction twice to the jury and included it in the written charge in the companion case; and (4) the prosecutor did not emphasize the extraneous offenses during closing arguments. Williams v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3312 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 3 2011).

413. Even though the trial court erred by failing to provide a written instruction to the jury regarding the extraneous offenses during the punishment phase as required by Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(b) (Supp. 2009), the error was harmless because: (1) defendant received the minimum sentence for the being a felon in possession of a firearm offense; and (2) as to the aggravated robbery offense, defendant stipulated to nine prior felony convictions, he received a sentence on the low end of the statutory range, the evidence of the extraneous offenses was strong and uncontroverted, and the prosecutor mentioned the extraneous offenses only once during closing arguments. Williams v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3312 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 3 2011).

414. In a murder case, photographs of a van that had been set on fire were not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and were relevant to establishing that the fire was intentionally set; defendant's counsel was not ineffective for not objecting to some of the photographs; and the extraneous offense of the burning of the van was admissible as same transaction contextual evidence and thus did not require a limiting instruction. Balderas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9752, 2010 WL 5621288 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 9 2010).

415. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child, trial counsel did not perform ineffectively, even though no limiting instruction was requested concerning evidence of prior acts, crimes, or wrongs, because the decision might have been strategic. The record was silent regarding the reasons for the failure to request the instruction, and an argument was made that certain activities brought up by the State were normal family interactions. Arcement v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1096, 2009 WL 383398 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 18 2009).

416. In finding that a limiting instruction should have been given concerning an extraneous offense, the reviewing court noted that the State's contextual-evidence argument would have been more appropriate to the consideration of whether such evidence was admissible over an objection under Tex. R. Evid. 404 than whether a limiting instruction was required. Pedersen v. State, 237 S.W.3d 882, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8383 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

417. In a drug case, the trial court was not required under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.14 to instruct the jury sua sponte on the burden of proof when considering evidence of an extraneous offense during the guilt phase; even if a limiting instruction under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) would have been appropriate, defendant failed to request a limiting instruction under Tex. R. Evid. 105 when the evidence was offered. Delgado v. State, 235 S.W.3d 244, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1235 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

418. Where defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child under two indictments, counsel was not ineffective for failing to request a limiting instruction regarding extraneous offense evidence that may have been admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Tomlinson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3643 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 27 2006).

419. Request for a limiting instruction was not required concerning an assault defendant's white power and Adolph Hitler tattoos because defendant did not request a limiting instruction at the time the evidence was admitted. Furthermore, the court could find no authority that evidence of tattoos should be considered by a jury for only a limited purpose. Oldfield v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11310 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 15 2004).

420. Any extraneous offense testimony by an officer regarding the buying and selling of prescription drugs was contextual to the murder of the victim. Thus, the trial court did not err in denying defendant's request for a limiting instruction. Singleton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9620 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 28 2004).

421. In defendant's drug and robbery case, although defendant's relevancy objection to evidence of other thefts sufficiently apprised the trial court of the nature of his complaint, where defendant did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and obtain a ruling as to whether the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, nor ask for a limiting instruction, defendant waived at trial any complaint over admission of evidence of extraneous thefts. Loftin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2651 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 25 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Objections

422. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, the trial court was not required to instruct the jury, sua sponte, not to consider evidence of extraneous offenses because all of the extraneous offense evidence pertained to offenses that defendant committed against the complainant and thus was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, §§ 1 and 2. Allen v. State, 180 S.W.3d 260, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9709 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Particular Instructions : Accomplice Testimony

423. Trial court did not err by including "corroboration" in the list of acceptable uses for extraneous offense evidence because the corroborative nature of the extraneous offense evidence was not unduly emphasized by including "corroboration" in the instruction, and "corroboration" was given no more or less emphasis than any other proper use of the extraneous evidence. Lacaze v. State, 346 S.W.3d 113, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5095 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 7 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Particular Instructions : Reasonable Doubt

424. Defendant convicted of arson failed to show she suffered egregious harm as a result of the trial court's failure to instruct the jury during sentencing that the State had to prove extraneous offenses beyond a reasonable doubt because she did not argue that the evidence of her extraneous misconduct was insufficient to support a conviction or was lacking in credibility, and neither did she provide authority or other considerations indicating that, if an instruction had been given, the jury would likely have disregarded the evidence or imposed a lighter sentence; she faced up to 99 years' imprisonment and up to a $10,000 fine, but the jury only assessed a 14-year sentence and a $3,000 fine. Sanders v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 830, 2014 WL 2619398 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 24 2014).

425. Evidence of extraneous bad acts were not admitted at the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, because the State's questions on cross-examination regarding his other child were not evidence; therefore, the trial court was not required to provide a reasonable doubt jury instruction regarding extraneous offenses. Bolte v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1490, 2013 WL 593834 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 14 2013).

426. Trial court did not err by not sua sponte providing a reasonable doubt instruction under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) when evidence of extrinsic acts was offered during the guilt/innocence phase of defendant's trial because the Huizar-required reasonable doubt instruction did not apply to the guilt/innocence phase of the trial. Brown v. State, 243 S.W.3d 141, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7458 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

427. Because the jury assessed defendant's punishment for the aggravated kidnapping of his ex-girlfriend at 15 years, and rejected probation, on the facts surrounding the kidnapping and not based on passing references to prior bad acts, the failure to give the reasonable doubt instruction as to prior bad acts could not have caused egregious harm. Thomas v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3054 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 21 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Particular Instructions : Use of Particular Evidence

428. Trial court did not err in including a reference to extraneous offenses because the jury charge properly instructed the jury in how it could consider the extraneous offense evidence, and it limited the jury's use of the evidence to only those purposes explicitly permitted by Texas Rules of Evidence. Perkinson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9948 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 8 2013).

429. It was not error for the trial court to deny defendant's request for an instruction during the sentencing phase concerning the burden of proof element required for prior crimes, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3, because the conduct at issue was not admitted into evidence during the penalty phase or mentioned by either of the attorneys during the closing argument. Burks v. State, 227 S.W.3d 138, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10663 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Alternatives : Probation : General Overview

430. Defendant's argument that testimony of his having exposed himself to a woman at the post office was an inadmissible extraneous offense was improperly overruled was upheld because at the time the case was tried, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) prohibited the admission of extraneous offense evidence at the punishment phase of a non-capital offense unless it was permitted by the Texas Rules of Evidence and satisfied art. 37.07, § 3(a)'s definition of prior criminal record. Mireles v. State, 1997 Tex. App. LEXIS 2179 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 1997).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Alternatives : Probation : Revocation : Standards

431. To the extent that defendant convicted of driving while intoxicated (DWI), second offense, had sought to characterize the technical violations that he committed during his previous community supervision for DWI as new offenses, and thereby require the State to provide pretrial notice of its intent to introduce evidence regarding technical community supervision violations in a future prosecution pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 or Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), his argument found no support in Texas statutes or caselaw because the legislature has not taken steps to include "technical" violations of community supervision within the scope of the term "offense," as that term is commonly used by Texas statutes and caselaw. Coffel v. State, 242 S.W.3d 907, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9993 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Capital Punishment : Aggravating Circumstances

432. In a death penalty case, the State's introduction of extraneous offenses committed while defendant was a juvenile as an aggravating factor did not constitute a violation of due process because the State clearly proved the commission of various adjudicated and unadjudicated offenses through certified court records and live testimony; further, the State was also permitted to admit evidence concerning unadjudicated extraneous offenses. Escamilla v. State, 143 S.W.3d 814, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1032 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 950, 125 S. Ct. 1697, 161 L. Ed. 2d 528, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2827, 73 U.S.L.W. 3569 (2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Guidelines : Adjustments & Enhancements : Criminal History

433. In a criminal proceeding, the document filed by the State served a dual purpose as both a motion to enhance punishment and as notice to defendant of intent to enhance punishment based on his prior convictions. Because defendant pled true to the enhancement allegations and stipulated to the evidence in support of them, any error by the State in alleging the prior convictions in the form of a motion, as opposed to in the form of a notice, was harmless. Green v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1753 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 19 2014).

434. Notice requirements of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) did not apply to the evidence of defendant's trips to truancy court, because the State did not question defendant on this matter during its case in chief on punishment, but rather during its cross-examination of defendant. Torres v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3904, 2010 WL 2044900 (Tex. App. Dallas May 25 2010).

435. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), evidence of prior convictions was properly admitted at the punishment phase where it met the requirements of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3. Hernandez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4548 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 25 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Guidelines : Adjustments & Enhancements : Criminal History

436. Appellant waived error in the State's admission of juvenile adjudications during the punishment phase of trial without prior identification. Defense counsel stipulated to appellant's identity for prior convictions and her objection to admission of the prior offenses based on Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 was overruled. Lynch v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1095 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 8 2005).

437. Defendant's reliance on the notice provisions of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to object to the amount of notice given by a prosecutor of his intent to introduce defendant's prior crimes during the sentencing phase of defendant's trial was misplaced because Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not apply to the penal or punishment phase of a bifurcated trial. Patton v. State, 25 S.W.3d 387, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 5295 (Tex. App. Austin 2000).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Evidence

438. In a drug case, although a trial court should not have admitted two illegal arrest records during sentencing because the State failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the crimes had actually been committed by appellant in the two arrests, there was little to no affect on the jury where appellant had 35 arrest records. Simmons v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7833 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 27 2013).

439. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by finding that defendant had reasonable notice of extraneous offenses introduced into evidence by the State because, as to one set of offenses, although written notice was not provided 10 days prior to trial, defense counsel was given reasonable notice of those offenses through multiple conversations with the prosecutor more than 10 days prior to trial; as to another extraneous offense, the trial court could have impliedly found that even though neither written or oral notice was provided 10 days prior to trial, the State had reasonably notified defendant of the offense and the victim shortly after the State itself was informed of the circumstances of the offense. Even if the State had failed to provide reasonable notice, it was not harmful, as there was no allegation that the State acted in bad faith, defendant did not move for a continuance, and written notice was provided a week before the evidence was admitted at the punishment hearing. Head v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5109 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 24 2013).

440. When defendant pleaded guilty to the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, the State gave reasonable notice of its intent to proffer evidence of extraneous offenses and prior convictions during the punishment phase. The extraneous offenses were contained in a police report given to defendant long before trial, and the State gave notice of the prior convictions in an amended motion to enhance punishment filed seven days before trial. Campbell v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4353 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 3 2013).

441. Trial court did not err by allowing the prosecutor to impeach defendant's witnesses concerning his good character and fitness for probation because the prosecutor rested his case in the punishment phase without referring to other convictions or wrongful acts, and therefore the State was not required to give defendant notice of extraneous offenses referred to during cross-examination under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 37.07. Morales v. State, 389 S.W.3d 915, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 109, 2013 WL 80154 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 8 2013).

442. In a sexual assault case, the court did not err by allowing a witness to testify that she had had sex with defendant because the prosecutor met with defendant's counsel minutes after learning of the witness's claim about having sex with defendant and the prosecutor later gave written notice of the State's intent to use that evidence. Additionally, the record included significant evidence, apart from the witness's testimony, of defendant actually having sex with underage girls and desiring to have sex with others. Cooper v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9643, 2012 WL 5869600 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 21 2012).

443. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant offered to pay for an abortion for another teenager with whom he had sex without notice under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) because the evidence was adduced during sentencing on cross-examination in rebuttal to mitigation evidence and therefore was not subject to the notice requirement. Chavez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7127, 2012 WL 3629619 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 24 2012).

444. On appeal of defendant's conviction for robbery, he claimed he was deprived of his right to fair notice by the State's untimely disclosure of its intent to present evidence of his gang membership. Because the evidence was introduced at the punishment phase of trial, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07(3)(g)--rather than Tex. R. Evid. 404(b)--applied. Rea v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7063, 2012 WL 3601126 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 14 2012).

445. No reversible error occurred from the admission of extraneous offense evidence at punishment, even if the State failed to give defendant timely written notice, because the record did not show bad faith or surprise, the state did not emphasize the unnoticed prior conviction, and the jury imposed a lower sentence than urged by the State. Collins v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1636, 2012 WL 661686 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 1 2012).

446. Trial court did not err in the sentencing phase of defendant's trial by admitting into evidence testimony from a police officer concerning uncharged misconduct on defendant's part because Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) specifically provided that, notwithstanding Tex. R. Evid. 404, the trial court could admit, at the punishment stage, evidence of an extraneous crime or bad act that was shown beyond a reasonable doubt by evidence to have been committed by the defendant. Vinez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 817, 2012 WL 335557 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 1 2012).

447. In a penalty trial for aggravated-sexual assault of a child, it was proper to allow the State to ask defendant's mother whether she had heard about an extraneous offense after she testified that her son was a good boy and that she knew he did not do it. Burke v. State, 371 S.W.3d 252, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8368, 2011 WL 5023008 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 20 2011).

448. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant was not harmed by the trial court's erroneous admission of statements at the penalty phase from an outcry witness concerning an extraneous offense even though the State's notice of intent was unreasonable under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) for lack of any reference to the county in which the act allegedly occurred or its date. The error was harmless because the alleged incident was part of the series of events for which defendant was being prosecuted, and there was no indication that he was surprised by the allegations or statements. Schatte v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4100, 2011 WL 2112025 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 26 2011).

449. Even if the trial court erred by admitting evidence of an extraneous sexual assault during sentencing on the ground that the State did not properly provide defendant notice of its intention to do so, the error was harmless because defendant did not claim that the evidence caused him surprise, as the sexual assault was a charge pending against defendant in the same court as the instant charges and the trial court determined defendant had actual notice of the charge. Gonzalez v. State, 337 S.W.3d 473, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1967 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 17 2011).

450. Even if the trial court erred by failing to instruct the jury regarding the burden of proof for extraneous offenses, any such error did not egregiously harm defendant because defendant was convicted of causing the victim's death by acting alone or as a party to her murder; evidence that he attempted to conceal evidence by destroying a car was only part of the evidence that the jury had to consider in assessing punishment. The evidence also showed that defendant was involved in gang activity, offered conflicting information to police about his own involvement in the crime, and assisted the victim's murderer before, during, and after the crime. Smith v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9419, 2010 WL 4878847 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 30 2010).

451. In defendant's drug case, the court properly admitted evidence of defendant's gang affiliation at sentencing because the presentation of the evidence took only a short time and the probative value of the evidence was high. Defendant's prior admission of his affiliation with a prison gang and the reputation of that gang for commission of offenses, both inside prison and in the general community, was a factor that the jury was entitled to consider in determining defendant's propensity for further criminal activity should he be released from incarceration. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8078, 2009 WL 3335282 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 16 2009).

452. Punishment phase extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 because there was evidence that defendant was the only adult with the complainant, the autopsy showed a variety of injuries to the complainant, and a doctor testified that the injuries all occurred within the same twenty-four-hour period. Roberts v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7816, 2009 WL 6338618 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 24 2009).

453. Defendant was not harmed by the State's failure to provide him with notice of its intent to introduce deferred adjudications involving unauthorized use of a motor vehicle under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) because defendant's ability to prepare to meet other, more serious offenses (of which he was given notice) was not affected by the State's failure to provide notice of its intent to introduce the orders of deferred adjudication. Weeks v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5106, 2009 WL 1896066 (Tex. App. Austin July 1 2009).

454. In defendant's murder case, a pretrial motion in limine regarding extraneous offenses was insufficient to trigger a duty by the State to provide notice under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) and therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the prosecutor to impeach a defense witness during the punishment phase of trial without notice to defendant. Additionally, any error was harmless because defendant shot the victim four times in the back. Ridley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4242, 2009 WL 1653083 (Tex. App. Dallas June 15 2009).

455. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, evidence during the punishment phase of defendant's gang affiliation was relevant to defendant's punishment and the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. An officer testified that defendant's gang was involved in narcotics trafficking, theft, kick burglaries, and other similar offenses. Sutton v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9068 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 4 2008).

456. Where defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and aggravated assault, the prosecutor and defense counsel discussed the extraneous offense evidence the State intended to offer under Tex. R. Evid. 404 in great detail; defendant was provided with copies of documents and the prosecutor orally communicated information about the extraneous offense evidence. Defendant was not harmed by the State's failure to provide prior, written notice of its intent to introduce evidence of extraneous crimes or bad acts at the punishment phase. Jones v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8541 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 13 2008).

457. In a criminal prosecution for possession of cocaine, the trial court abused its discretion during the punishment phase of trial by allowing the State to prove defendant's previous convictions through judgments and a fingerprint expert; defendant was aware of the previous convictions, due to notices filed by the State pursuant Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 and Tex. R. Evid. 404. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8218 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 17 2007).

458. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of prior extraneous acts of indecency with minors during sentencing because the language of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) established that the conduct described by the witnesses was relevant to the assessment of defendant's punishment; the three witnesses described conduct by defendant that was similar to his conduct against the victim, and given that similarity, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Rodriguez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4618 (Tex. App. Eastland June 14 2007).

459. Months before defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the prosecutor filed an amended document informing defendant of his intention to offer evidence of other crimes, including defendant's act of manslaughter of his infant son; defendant was afforded prior notice of the State's intent to offer evidence that he previously committed manslaughter. Sharp v. State, 210 S.W.3d 835, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11033 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

460. Cross-examination of defendant, who was adjudged guilty of evading arrest, as to an extraneous offense was permissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), which does not require notice under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) when extraneous offense evidence relevant to sentencing is introduced during cross-examination at punishment. Blackwelder v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10489 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 7 2006).

461. In defendant's aggravated assault case, the court properly allowed a witness to testify during the punishment phase of the trial that defendant had bragged about getting away with a murder in Virginia because defendant could not be convicted of murder on the basis of his confession without proof of a corpus delicti or corroboration of the statement and those procedural requirements did not apply in the context of extraneous acts introduced at a punishment hearing; in order to be persuaded beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant had committed a murder in Virginia, all that was necessary was for the trial court to believe that defendant had told the witness that he had committed the murder and that defendant was telling the truth. Scott v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10358 (Tex.

App. Tyler Dec. 1 2006).

462. At the punishment phase of defendant's criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child under 14 years of age, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence of a pen packet establishing that defendant had two prior convictions; the State's failure to provide defendant reasonable notice under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) did not affect his ability to respond to the extraneous offense evidence. Contreras v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9059 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 19 2006).

463. In a criminal trial for drug possession, defendant was not entitled to a mistrial after a State's witness testified regarding an extraneous offense; the trial court's instruction to disregard cured any prejudice to defendant. Coleman v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8133 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 14 2006).

464. In a drunk driving case, the State's notice of intent to offer bad act evidence at punishment met the requirements of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it listed a prior conviction and the date of arrest and indicated that the State would introduce acts identified in the offense report and other related documents. Ewing v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5755 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 29 2006).

465. During defendant's criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, counsel was not ineffective for failing to request notice of the State's intent to offer evidence of defendant's extraneous offenses under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g); Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); the record did not indicate counsel's reasons for not objecting to evidence of defendant's extraneous offenses. Bishop v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4874 (Tex. App. Waco June 7 2006).

466. In an indecency with a child case, the trial court did not err by allowing the State to present evidence of extraneous offenses during the punishment phase as defendant placed his suitability for probation at issue by calling witnesses who offered their assistance in ensuring that he was capable of abiding by the conditions imposed; thus, he opened the door for evidence of specific instances of misconduct that tended to mitigate against his suitability for probation. Further, defendant was not entitled to notice of the State's use of extraneous offenses in rebuttal. McClellan v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6668 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 18 2005).

467. Murder defendant waived the right to raise complaints on appeal concerning the admission, at the punishment phase, of an alleged extraneous offense under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). His objections at trial did not preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A) because they did not address the issues raised on appeal: lack of notice of the intention to offer evidence of an extraneous bad act and the trial court's failure to make a threshold determination of admissibility. Juarez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6460 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 11 2005).

468. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant defendant's motion for continuance based on lack of notice or in admitting extraneous offense evidence during punishment because the State was not obligated to inform defendant regarding extraneous offenses that it intended to use during the punishment phase of trial due to defendant's failure to properly request notice of the extraneous acts. Defendant's request was made pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and made no reference to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, and a request made pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not sufficient to obligate the State to disclose extraneous evidence that it intended to introduce at the punishment phase of trial. Miller v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2717 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 7 2005).

469. In an aggravated robbery case, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), extraneous offense or bad act evidence was admissible during the punishment phase without regard to Tex. R. Evid. 404. Raby

v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2380 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 30 2005).

470. Where defendant was tried for aiding seven men escape from prison, evidence of the post-escape crimes committed by the seven men bore heavily upon defendant's character and moral blameworthiness; the evidence was admissible to help the jury determine an appropriate sentence for defendant's crimes. Rodriguez v. State, 163 S.W.3d 115, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1084 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

471. Although the State failed to provide notice of its intent to introduce evidence of defendant's immigration status, there was no indication from the record that the omission was intended to mislead defendant and prevent him from preparing a defense where the State apparently notified the defense that it intended to question defendant about his immigration status at some point before the punishment phase as indicated by the hearing held while the jury deliberated guilt-innocence. Alvarado v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5019 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 3 2004).

472. Evidence of defendant's gang affiliation and of a fight that defendant was involved in while in prison could be admitted during the punishment phase of the trial and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not applicable to the admission of the evidence during the penalty phase. Shaw v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3798 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 29 2004).

473. While inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(1), specific acts of good conduct may be admissible before the sentencing court under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) to prove a defendant's good character. Monarrez v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 997 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2003).

474. At the punishment phase of a capital trial, evidence regarding a defendant's character is relevant. Gang membership is relevant character evidence and therefore admissible. Moreno v. State, 1 S.W.3d 846, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 6657 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 1999).

475. Evidence of gang membership was admissible as character evidence at punishment under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a). Moreno v. State, 1 S.W.3d 846, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 6657 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 1999).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Factors

476. Defendant's argument that testimony of his having exposed himself to a woman at the post office was an inadmissible extraneous offense was improperly overruled was upheld because at the time the case was tried, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) prohibited the admission of extraneous offense evidence at the punishment phase of a non-capital offense unless it was permitted by the Texas Rules of Evidence and satisfied art. 37.07, § 3(a)'s definition of prior criminal record. Mireles v. State, 1997 Tex. App. LEXIS 2179 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 1997).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Presentence Reports

477. Defendant waived his assertion that the trial court erred in relying on allegedly inaccurate extraneous offenses listed in the pre-sentence investigation report, because defendant waived this contention by failing to first object or make the required showing before raising the issue on appeal. Harrison v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1141, 2010 WL 547388 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 18 2010).

478. Defendant's counsel was not ineffective for failure to object to the extraneous offenses mentioned in the presentence report, because defendant's complaints were based on Tex. R. Evid 404(b) (extraneous evidence) and 802 (hearsay), and because the rules of evidence, including the rules pertaining to hearsay, did not apply to the contents of the presentence report. Champion v. State, 126 S.W.3d 686, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 964 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Motions for New Trial

479. In a trial for assault--family violence, any error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 802 from an unredacted video containing a hearsay statement of an alleged prior extraneous offense could be cured by a new trial rather than dismissal. State v. Harbor, 425 S.W.3d 508, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3033 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 19 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : General Overview

480. Defendant in a drug trial could not claim that he was surprised by testimony at sentencing regarding failure to comply with sex offender requirements because he did not request notice of bad acts prior to trial under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Free v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1554, 2012 WL 651638 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 29 2012).

481. In a case in which defendant was convicted of violating the terms of his civil conviction under the Texas Civil Commitment of Sexually Violent Predators Act, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. ch. 841, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence of specific instances of defendant's compliance with his commitment order because that evidence was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a), 405(a). Moreover, because the State did not ever imply that defendant had violated the terms of commitment before the charged offenses, the State did not open the door to evidence of defendant's compliance prior to those offenses. Jones v. State, 333 S.W.3d 615, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3997 (Tex. App. Dallas May 29 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : Civil Commitments

482. Trial court acted within its discretion in allowing the experts to discuss the details of the patient's offenses and other bad acts he committed that were contained in the records they reviewed in determining that the patient was a sexually violent predator because having each expert explain which facts were considered and how those facts influenced his evaluation assisted the jury in weighing each expert's testimony and the opinion each offered regarding the ultimate issue in the case. In re Day, 342 S.W.3d 193, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3573 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 12 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Briefs

483. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of a grandchild, defendant inadequately briefed arguments under Tex. R. Evid. 404 that it was error to admit evidence that defendant had previously sexually assaulted an adopted child; defendant failed to brief the specific theory of admissibility upon which the trial court allowed the testimony and failed to apply the Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors to the facts of the case, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 38.1. Garreans v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 852 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 5 2008).

484. Under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(e), (g), (h), defendant waived any claims to error under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) because defendant's brief discussed only Tex. R. Evid. 404(a). Error under R. 404(a) was also inadequately briefed with regard to unanswered questions about contraband. Sanchez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7130 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 4 2007).

485. Assuming that defense counsel's mention of "character" preserved for review an issue under Tex. R. Evid. 404, defendant failed on appeal to apply the extraneous-offense and character-propensity law to the facts in the case; thus, he failed to brief that portion of his point adequately under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h), and the court would not address it. Springsteen v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2340 (Tex. Crim. App. May 24 2006).

486. Defendant labeled the testimony at trial as extremely prejudicial; however, defendant neither explained how or why the evidence was extremely prejudicial, nor how or why the evidence would have had any substantial effect on the punishment. The appellate court declined to draft an argument for defendant. Smith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9341 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 21 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : General Overview

487. In a murder case, a court did not err in admitting four photographs depicting gang-related graffiti on defendant's bedroom walls where the photos were primarily offered not as prior acts evidence, but to impeach a witness's credibility because her testimony at trial conflicted with her prior statements to the police. In addition, because the gang symbols depicted in the photos were also before the jury through other evidence of defendant's gang affiliation, which was admitted without objection, any error in admitting the photos for purposes of showing gang affiliation and intent or motive was not reversible. Garza v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6843 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 24 2005).

488. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child under 14 years of age case, juvenile defendant's 10-year commitment was reversed as the trial court's error in allowing the admission of an extraneous unadjudicated offense defendant allegedly committed against another child in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not harmless. The only purpose for offering the evidence was to show that defendant, while on probation, had sexually assaulted another young child just months earlier than the offense alleged in the petition to adjudicate. In re C.J.M., 167 S.W.3d 892, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4606 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

489. Where defendant was charged with the murder of a woman with whom he had sexual relations, the trial court committed reversible error by admitting the testimony of a department store clerk that defendant made sexual gestures toward her approximately one month before the victim's death. The two incidents did not appear sufficiently similar to establish defendant's identity as the person who killed the victim. Webb v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1431 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 23 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : Evidence

490. Trial court erred by admitting extraneous conduct evidence that he inappropriately touched another child a decade before instant assault because it had no relevance as to motive, issue of opportunity was not raised, defendant never claimed he lacked intent, and there was no logical link between the prior act and an ultimate plan to have sex with the instant victim. The error was not harmless because the evidence against defendant was not overwhelming and the evidence was inherently inflammatory. Sandoval v. State, 409 S.W.3d 259, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11657 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 13 2013).

491. Complaint on appeal premised on Tex. R. Evid. 404 was not preserved for review because the trial objection was not based on Rule 404. Further, the same evidence was subsequently admitted without objection. Buckaloo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1326 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 12 2013).

492. Even if extraneous offense evidence relating to a shotgun found during the execution of a search warrant was improperly admitted in a drug case, a reversal was not warranted under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because defendant's substantial rights were not affected; the jury did not find that defendant had the intent to deliver drugs, despite the fact that the evidence showed that defendant kept a vicious dog, a surveillance camera was outside his residence, and he was kept scales, baggies, and a drug ledger. In addition, an 85-year prison sentence was likely to have resulted from the fact that defendant had two prior convictions for similar offenses. Lester v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6006 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 6 2008).

493. Trial court abused its discretion by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the testimony of defendant's former stepdaughter about his sexual abuse of her was not admissible to rebut defendant's fabrication defense; the evidence could not assist the jury in determining whether defendant abused the instant victim, other than to show character conformity. The error was not harmless, and therefore defendant's convictions of indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault by contact were reversed. Newton v. State, 283 S.W.3d 361, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4634 (Tex. App. Waco 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : Prosecutorial Misconduct

494. Defendant failed to preserve error on his contention that the State committed prosecutorial misconduct by eliciting testimony suggesting that defendant stole the gun because defendant objected only at the beginning of the witness's testimony but did not object to the remainder. Defendant objected to admission of the testimony on relevancy grounds, but did not assert that introduction of the allegedly irrelevant testimony constituted prosecutorial misconduct warranting a mistrial. Thibodeaux v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4964, 2009 WL 1748747 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 23 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

495. Defendant failed to properly object to evidence that was admitted at trial concerning unindicted aggravated robberies, even though he filed a motion in limine, because he failed to make objections under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) when the evidence was admitted at trial. Ashford v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2770 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 6 2006).

496. Defendant failed to properly object to the trial court's admission of a bulletproof vest because when the vest was admitted, he objected on the ground that it was not relevant; therefore he did not preserve for appellate review on the ground that the vest was admitted in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Ashford v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2770 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 6 2006).

497. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault, the State gave notice of its intention to use evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant and the trial court admitted the evidence. Because defendant did not object on the ground that the State's notice was untimely, the issue was not preserved for review. Foxworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2005).

498. Murder defendant waived the right to raise complaints on appeal concerning the admission, at the punishment phase, of an alleged extraneous offense under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). His objections at trial did not preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A) because they did not address the issues raised on appeal: lack of notice of the intention to offer evidence of an extraneous bad act and the trial court's failure to make a threshold determination of admissibility. Juarez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6460 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 11 2005).

499. In a trial for arson, defendant failed to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) as to the admission of evidence regarding his prior threats to kill the victim and her family. Although he had objected, under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404, to the admission of prior threats involving arson, he failed to object to a question broadening the scope to other threats. Flores v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6255 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 8 2005).

500. Because counsel raised no objection under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to the police officer's wife's statement that defendant smelled of alcohol, no complaint was preserved for appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1); however, it was nonetheless harmless in light of other evidence available to the jury. Martinez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6136 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 4 2005).

501. Defendant's conviction for murder was proper where the trial court did not err by overruling his relevancy objection to extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) relating to his drug use because he only made a relevancy objection at trial; such an objection did not preserve error concerning a R. 404(b) extraneous offense claim. Shivers v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3204 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 26 2005).

502. Defendant did not preserve for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1) and (2) the issue of admission of evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), such as false impersonation as a member of the clergy, because defendant's attorney opened the door for the questioning by referring to defendant as "father" in his opening statement. While defendant objected to the first mention of the existence or nonexistence of his credentials from any religious group, defendant did not ask for a running objection to this testimony. Givens v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11333 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 16 2004).

503. Request for a limiting instruction was not required concerning an assault defendant's white power and Adolph Hitler tattoos because defendant did not request a limiting instruction at the time the evidence was admitted. Furthermore, the court could find no authority that evidence of tattoos should be considered by a jury for only a limited purpose. Oldfield v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11310 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 15 2004).

504. In a trial for attempted murder, it was proper to admit an autopsy report regarding a different victim, which included details about the angle of the wound and photographs of the body. Defendant did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 404, and there was no indication the trial court ruled on character conformity; the reviewing court therefore declined to address the issue. Adams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8999 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 12 2004).

505. Defendant in a sexual assault trial failed to preserve error as to extraneous offenses or bad acts testimony because he failed to request an instruction to disregard, although he objected after each incident. The comments were not so inflammatory that an instruction would not have cured any error. Mass v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2551 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 24 2004).

506. Defendant in a sexual assault trial failed to preserve error as to extraneous offenses or bad acts testimony because he failed to request an instruction to disregard, although he objected after each incident. The comments were not so inflammatory that an instruction would not have cured any error. Mass v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2551 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 24 2004).

507. In a trial for indecency with a child under the age of 17 years, defendant objected, during a psychiatric witness's voir dire, to testimony regarding the complainant's statements about one incident; the separate objections under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), 602, 803(1) and 803(4), were overruled and appellant was not required to later repeat the individual objections before the jury. However, defendant argued on appeal that it was error to admit the hearsay statements for the purpose of medical diagnosis when the child did not have personal knowledge of the incident, in that the child was not sure whether he was touched by a penis or a finger; this argument appeared to be a unique blend of Tex. R. Evid. 602 and 803(4), which was not presented to the trial court with sufficient specificity to preserve the objection and which was also contrary to the law because defendant was not challenging the lack of personal knowledge by the witnesses. Ramirez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1063 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 5

508. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, an objection that testimony from defendant's ex-wife was outside the scope of relevancy and a request to instruct the jury to disregard did not preserve the complaint on appeal that Tex. R. Evid. 404 prohibited the admission of evidence of extraneous wrongs. Kirk v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 710 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 26 2004).

509. After the trial court overruled an appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection, the appellant was required to make further objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in order to preserve the complaint for review. Mark v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 879 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 30 2003).

510. Where a defense attorney objected that the testimony of the complainant, defendant's estranged wife, was irrelevant, prejudicial, and probative-irrelevant, she made only a relevancy objection, which did not preserve error concerning a Tex. R. Evid. 404 extraneous offense claim. Fullylove v. State, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 8009 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 29 2001).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

511. Defendant failed to show the court reversibly erred by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense, because by objecting to the evidence as "extraneous," defendant preserved only a complaint that the evidence was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) since it served no probative purpose, and even assuming the trial court abused its discretion, any error was harmless, as the State spent very little time developing the evidence, which was minor compared to the rest of the evidence implicating defendant in the robbery. Barrett v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6160 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 5 2014).

512. At defendant's trial for robbery, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony regarding his efforts to resist arrest because evidence relevant to his flight from the scene was a circumstance indicative of guilt. As defense counsel objected to the evidence about the details of the arrest on the grounds of relevance, defendant's argument under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not preserved for review. Johnson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 471, 2014 WL 222929 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 16 2014).

513. On appeal of defendant's conviction for burglary of a habitation and possession of a controlled substance, cocaine, in an amount of less than one gram, he claimed that the State violated his right to a fair trial by introducing, without the required notice, evidence of his prior crimes, wrongs, or acts. Because defendant did not complain that he had not been given proper notice, the error was not preserved for review. Washington v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13793, 2013 WL 5952144 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 7 2013).

514. Any error in the admission of extraneous offenses evidence was not preserved for review because defendant did not explicitly challenge the admission of the evidence on appeal but rather, his argument was confined to the propriety of the limiting instruction contained in the jury charge. Perkinson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9948 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 8 2013).

515. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense because he did not make the court aware he was objecting to the failure of the State to include the offense in a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) notice. Sanchez-Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4548 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 9 2013).

516. Complaint on appeal premised on Tex. R. Evid. 404 was not preserved for review because the trial objection was not based on Rule 404. Further, the same evidence was subsequently admitted without objection. Buckaloo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1326 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 12 2013).

517. Even if the trial court erred by admitting into evidence a witness's testimony that defendant had been trying to send someone to harm him and his family, any error was cured when the same type of evidence concerning witnesses' fear of defendant was admitted elsewhere without objection, both before and after the complained-of testimony. Prior to the complained-of testimony, a co-defendant testified that he did not want to tell authorities about defendant's involvement in the offense because "snitches get stitches," and a second co-defendant testified that he gave three different statements to the police because he feared that defendant would harm his family in retaliation; after the complained-of testimony, defendant's ex-wife testified without objection that she came forward with what she knew about defendant's involvement because she feared that defendant would harm her because she no longer wanted to be involved with him. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1058, 2013 WL 476764 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 6 2013).

518. Defendant's relevancy objections did not preserve his argument that admission of extraneous offense evidence of uncharged sexual conduct violated Tex. R. Evid. 404; in any event, because the same evidence came in through other testimony without objection, any error was cured. Goodwin v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6918, 2012 WL 3590723 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 20 2012).

519. Defendant waived any error in the admission of evidence of the additional injury to his daughter because he did not object to the admission of his written statement in which he admitted to throwing his daughter onto the bed prior to the date of the offense. Smith v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5167, 2012 WL 2469548 (Tex. App. Eastland June 28 2012).

520. Defendant failed to preserve for review his claim that the trial court erred by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense during sentencing because at trial, defendant objected that the evidence was hearsay and admitting it denied defendant his right of confrontation, but on appeal he contended that the evidence was not relevant and that the probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Dirden v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2207, 2012 WL 983182 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 21 2012).

521. Trial court did not err by admitting testimony from two witnesses about defendant's past use and sale of methamphetamine under Tex. R. Evid. 404 because defendant's relevance objection did not preserve his Rule 404 complaints and because he lodged no objection to the testimony about his past use and sale of methamphetamine by one of the witnesses. Norris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 108, 2012 WL 34453 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 4 2012).

522. Defendant failed to preserve for review her claim that she was deprived of her right to present a complete defense under the Sixth Amendment due to the fact that the trial court excluded from evidence a videotaped interview with the victim because at trial defendant relied on Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) but never asserted her right to present a complete defense and did not cite the Holmes case; her attorney's statement at the end of his bill of exception that defendant was denied her constitutional rights was insufficient preserve the Holmes issue for appeal. Even if the issue had been preserved, defendant failed to show that any constitutional error occurred because the trial court excluded the videotape based on Tex. R. Evid. 403 and the substance of the defense, that the videotape would have enabled the jury to judge whether the victim initially failed to implicate her mother because she was truly afraid, was presented to the jury, through cross-examination of the victim and a caseworker. Sanchez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10169, 2011 WL 6916418 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 28 2011).

523. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred by allowing the State to present evidence that defendant was in possession of a weapon the day before the murder under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because he failed to make an objection under Rule 404(b). Benitez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9871, 2011 WL 6306643 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 15 2011).

524. Objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to prior acts evidence did not preserve for review a complaint under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Vela v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6917, 2011 WL 3821045 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2011).

525. Although defendant, who was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child, argued the trial court erred in admitting evidence regarding an extraneous incident involving another child, defendant's issue was overruled because defendant's objection in the trial court did not correspond with his argument on appeal. In addition, defendant's argument was untimely, and the trial court did not issue an adverse ruling to defendant excluding this evidence Gilmore v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9822, 2010 WL 5132560 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 14 2010).

526. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred by refusing to allow him to question the victim about a juvenile felony theft conviction because defendant did not inform the trial court that he was seeking admission of the evidence pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2). Soto v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8709, 2010 WL 4273173 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 29 2010).

527. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to admit evidence of a fight between the victim and his older brother because defendant failed to show the victim's propensity to fight when challenged was a pertinent character trait that had any relevance in a sexual assault on a child case. Soto v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8709, 2010 WL 4273173 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 29 2010).

528. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the district court erred by excluding evidence regarding the motivation of the authorities to prosecute the case against him because he failed to objected on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) during the trial. Even assuming that defendant had preserved error, the trial court did not abuse its discretion because: (1) the proffered evidence had no relevance to the issue of whether defendant had committed the offense of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle; (2) the trial court could have found that the evidence would have put the officers and the police department on trial, confused the issues, and caused undue delay; and (3) there was considerable evidence showing that defendant committed the offense, particularly the videotape showing defendant entering the bait vehicle on three separate dates. Bishop v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7056, 2010 WL 3369845 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 26 2010).

529. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred allowing into evidence information about his alleged prior bad acts in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404 because defendant did not object each time the witness testified about defendant's purported extraneous bad acts, nor did he obtain a running objection from the trial court. Even if he had preserved the claim, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony because it fell within the purview of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, as the testimony described the history of the relationship between defendant and the child victim and established defendant's consistently hostile behavior or his statement of made as it related to the victim. Samora v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6759, 2010 WL 3279536 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2010).

530. Defendant's objection to extraneous offense evidence that four truckloads of stolen car parts were found at his house, along with evidence that he had purchased stolen car parts in the past, was preserved for appellate review because a bench conference conducted outside of the jury's presence provided the trial court the opportunity to consider the necessary factors and rule on the objection. Marban v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS

6760, 2009 WL 2618343 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

531. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant did not preserve an issue relating to extraneous offense evidence for appellate review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 because no objection was lodged; the record was replete with evidence of a homicide, its investigation, and a grand jury's return of a "no-bill" in favor of defendant. Vanderburgh v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4643, 2009 WL 1740053 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 18 2009).

532. Where defendant did not raise an objection in the trial court based on inadmissibility of evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) due to character conformity, the argument was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Mincey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2825, 2009 WL 1058734 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 21 2009).

533. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve error relating to the admission of testimony from the mother of the victim that the family had moved many times to get away from defendant's violent behavior. Although defendant argued to a trial court that he had not opened the door to evidence of abuse by cross-examining the mother, he did not object that admission of the evidence violated Tex. R. Evid. 403, Tex. R. Evid. 404, and Tex. R. Evid. 405, as he argued on appeal. Gamble v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2134, 2009 WL 806879 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 27 2009).

534. Defendant failed preserve error because he failed to object under either Tex. Rs. Evid. 403 or 404 to admission of prior offenses; the State posed questions to defendant to clarify the nature of the prior convictions, and counsel objected neither to the court's ruling allowing the evidence nor to the procedure used to arrive at the ruling. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1032, 2009 WL 350608 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

535. Defendant did not object to testimony about gang affiliation during the guilt-innocence phase of a murder trial and therefore failed to preserved error under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Vasquez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2952 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 2008).

536. Under Tex. R. App. P. 33, a murder defendant failed to preserve an argument that the State should not have been allowed to introduce evidence of defendant's prior dealings in narcotics because the arguments asserted on appeal failed to comport with the hearsay and relevancy objections raised at trial. Marshal v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1411 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 28 2008).

537. In a drug trial, defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to evidence of extraneous violent conduct toward defendant's spouse was not sufficient under Tex. R. App. P. 33 to preserve error under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Huneycutt v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9975 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 21 2007).

538. Defendant did not preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33 and Tex. R. Evid. 103 as to the timeliness of the State's notice under Tex. R. Evid. 404 of its intent to introduce extraneous offense evidence in a child sexual abuse case because, although he raised the issue, he did not object to any specific testimony or obtain a ruling. Jared v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8448 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 25 2007).

539. Defendant failed to preserve for review his challenge to the admission into evidence of marijuana that was found inside his tractor trailer because, even though he objected to the lifting of the motion in limine, he never renewed an objection when the evidence was admitted; even if the challenge was preserved for review, it was without merit because the marijuana was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as the cocaine, which defendant was charged with possessing, and the marijuana were part of the same transaction; the marijuana was relevant as an officer testified that he smelled the odor of raw marijuana when he stopped the tractor trailer, and keeping evidence about the marijuana from the jury would deprive them of an understanding of the offense; the evidence of the marijuana was crucial when it came to evaluating the propriety of the officer's search of the truck. McMorris v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7202 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 31 2007).

540. Defendant's argument that evidence that marijuana was found along with the cocaine in the secret compartment in the trailer was improperly admitted into evidence was not preserved for appellate review because after objecting to lifting the motion in limine, defense counsel failed to object when the evidence was admitted; even if the argument had been preserved for review, it was without merit because it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as the cocaine and marijuana were part of the same transaction and the marijuana was crucial when it came to evaluating the propriety of the officer's search of the tractor trailer. Thomas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7203 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 31 2007).

541. Under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, a robbery defendant waived an argument that it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to admit evidence that after the robbery, someone stole the complainant's tools from the complainant's vehicle and set the vehicle on fire. An objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 did not preserve this extraneous act argument for review. Flores v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6539 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 16 2007).

542. Because defendant did not voice any of the following objections in the trial court regarding the testimony of the three witnesses in the State's rebuttal case, they were not preserved for appellate review: (1) that the witnesses' testimony was not relevant; (2) that their testimony only tended to show defendant's propensity to commit the offense of indecency with a child; and (3) that their testimony was inadmissible character evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Hassenplug v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4998 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 28 2007).

543. In a capital murder trial, any objection under Tex. R. Evid. 404 was not preserved under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 by defendant's general relevancy objection. Russo v. State, 228 S.W.3d 779, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4499 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

544. Under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant failed to preserve his argument that he should have had a hearing regarding the admission of prior convictions, which the state had noticed under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); although defendant's written pretrial motion contained a request for a hearing, defendant did not orally object to the lack of a hearing when the court denied his motion. Fletcher v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10163 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 28 2006).

545. Where defendant testified that the police found a glass pipe in his pocket when they arrested him for DWI, the trial court did not err by overruling his relevancy objection during the punishment phase when the prosecutor asked him if he had ever smoked marijuana; defendant's relevancy objection did not preserve his Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) claim for review. Bradshaw v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10029 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 16 2006).

546. Under Tex. R. App. P. 33, defendant did not preserve a complaint, and any error was cured, with regard to the admission of extraneous offense evidence; he did not request a running objection to evidence concerning the offense and did not object to the evidence that the State elicited on cross-examination of defendant. Davila v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6865 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 2 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

547. Court did not err in allowing the State to offer the extraneous offense evidence, because the rule required that a request be submitted by the accused to trigger the Rule and no such request was given. Pompa v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9079, 2014 WL 4049880 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

548. On appeal of defendant's conviction for two counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child and one count of continuous sexual abuse of a child, his complaint that the trial court erred by admitting a judgment to show that he had a prior conviction for indecency with a child was not preserved for review because defendant did not raise his Tex. R. Evid. 404 objection at trial. Loveday v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13364, 2013 WL 5874280 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 30 2013).

549. In a drug case, an issue relating to the similarity of a charged crime and extraneous offenses was not preserved for review since no objection was made on that basis. Stebbins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9199 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 10 2008).

550. Because defendant did not object and obtain a ruling as to the admission of extraneous evidence (a witness's testimony during the State's case-in-chief that defendant and his brother had "jacked" people around in the past), defendant had failed to preserve error on appeal. Redden v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1333 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 21 2008).

551. On appeal of his conviction for theft, defendant argued that the trial court erred in admitting evidence concerning various instances of prior bad acts in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); because defendant did not object to the testimony when it was first elicted, he waived any error concerning the admissibility of such testimony according to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Craig v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6027 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2007).

552. Because defendant failed to make a Tex. R. Evid. 404 conformity-of-character objection to a witness's testimony, his claim was not preserved for review. Hale v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7825 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2006).

553. During defendant's murder trial, the State questioned him about two extraneous offenses and defense counsel did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403, Tex. R. Evid. 404, or Tex. R. Evid. 609 regarding either offense; in accordance with Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant could not raise these issues on appeal. Cotton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5445 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 27 2006).

554. Defendant failed to preserve error as to improper jury argument about his arrest because he failed to raise that objection at trial and because other evidence about his arrest was admitted without objection. Gonzales v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4020 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 11 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

555. Defense counsel preserved for review the issue of whether the trial court erred in admitting an extraneous offense because defense counsel emphasized what rules his request for a running objection was based on, and the trial court stated that the evidence was admitted as inextricably intertwined with the offense. Finney v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8317 (Tex. App. Dallas July 8 2013).

556. Defendant did not preserve a challenge under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to testimony regarding other acts of child sexual abuse because his only objection was under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Richert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7719 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

557. Defendant waived a complaint under Tex. R. Evid. 609 regarding the admission of prior crimes impeachment evidence because it did not comport with his objection at trial under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Pearson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5690, 2012 WL 2899766 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 17 2012).

558. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, since defendant did not raise the identity exception to the general rule of inadmissible character conformity evidence, he failed to preserve any complaint regarding the admissibility of the evidence as relevant to the issue of identity and waived the issue; defendant's stated reason for seeking the victim's brother's testimony was to establish the brother's alleged propensity to commit sexual offenses, the purpose specifically prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 404. Gonzales v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4613 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 12 2007).

559. In a burglary case, defendant's purported error regarding character evidence was rejected on appeal because the objection before the trial court was not the same as the issue raised on appeal; at trial, defendant contended that character evidence was irrelevant, but on appeal he contended that it was uninvited. Cooper v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4342 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 5 2007).

560. In a trial for indecency with and sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve an argument under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 607 to the State's calling a witness who the State knew would testify adversely to its case, solely so that it could impeach its own witness with defendant's extraneous offense. Defendant raised only a general objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404 and thus was not specific, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Starnes v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3144 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 26 2007).

561. Where the State failed to introduce before the jury all the proffered evidence regarding the similarities between the charged and extraneous offenses on which the relevance of the extraneous offense depended, had defendant moved to strike the extraneous offense testimony of the complainant in the prior case at the close of the State's case and had the trial court overruled the motion, it was possible that reversible error would have been presented; however, any error in the admission of the testimony of the complainant in the prior case was not preserved for review because defendant did not renew his objection and did not move to strike the testimony. Mackenzie v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1776 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 7 2007).

562. Defendant adequately preserved error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 as to the exclusion of character evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and satisfied Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(2), even though he did not make an offer of proof, because counsel told the trial court that he wanted to elicit evidence of defendant's reputation for the ethical treatment of children; accordingly, the nature of the disputed evidence was apparent to all. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9788 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 9 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : General Overview

563. Appellant waived error in the State's admission of juvenile adjudications during the punishment phase of trial without prior identification. Defense counsel stipulated to appellant's identity for prior convictions and her objection to admission of the prior offenses based on Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 was overruled. Lynch v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1095 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 8 2005).

564. In defendant's drug and robbery case, although defendant's relevancy objection to evidence of other thefts sufficiently apprised the trial court of the nature of his complaint, where defendant did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and obtain a ruling as to whether the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, nor ask for a limiting instruction, defendant waived at trial any complaint over admission of evidence of extraneous thefts. Loftin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2651 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 25 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : Admission of Evidence

565. On appeal of defendant's conviction for aggravated robbery, he claimed the trial court abused its discretion when it allowed evidence of four prior convictions that were over ten years old to be admitted during the guilt/innocence phase of the trial. Because defendant introduced the evidence of his prior convictions on direct examination, he had waived any error. Richardson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1723, 2014 WL 645801 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 14 2014).

566. On appeal of defendant's conviction for robbery causing bodily injury and aggravated robbery with a deadly weapon, he claimed the trial court erred in considering information regarding an extraneous offense involving a cell phone. Because defendant failed to object to this evidence during his sentencing hearing, the issue was waived. Delgado v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9774 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 6 2013).

567. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant waived any straight forward, substantive objection to the admission of testimony concerning extraneous evidence of a check-cashing incident because he did not make that objection at trial. Cross v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8535 (Tex. App. Dallas July 10 2013).

568. Defendant in a child sexual assault case waived his objection to testimony regarding extraneous bad acts, including two prior incidents involving the same victim, which he contended were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), by failing to object to the evidence when it was offered at trial as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Walker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3249, 2009 WL 1314227 (Tex. App. Tyler May 13 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Waiver : Waiver Triggers Generally

569. Defendant on a drug delivery charge was estopped from raising on appeal any error in the admission of subsequent deliveries at the guilt phase because he admitted his guilt at the penalty phase of trial; further, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 or Tex. R. Evid. 404 because his counsel opened the door by suggesting that defendant was only a marginal participant in the drug trade and that the charged transaction constituted his sole involvement in the drug business. Houston v. State, 208 S.W.3d 585, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3056 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Right to Appeal : Defendants

570. Pursuant to the DeGarmo doctrine, defendant was estopped from challenging the admission of the extraneous offense evidence because he unequivocally admitted his guilt during the punishment phase of his trial and because the admission of the legally obtained extraneous offense evidence did not implicate a fundamental right. Jarmon v. State, 263 S.W.3d 25, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3809 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : General Overview

571. Trial court's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) ruling is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. Page v. State, 137 S.W.3d 75, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 936 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

572. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial in a drug case based on an officer's reference to knowing people in a certain town because the statement did not constitute an improper reference to extraneous offenses, and any improper impression created by the statement was cured by the trial court's prompt instruction to disregard. Moss v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4219 (Tex. App. Dallas May 10 2004).

573. There was no abuse of discretion by a trial court in its admission of evidence of defendant's actions between the time of a robbery at a fast food restaurant and when he was identified by the restaurant employees, which actions included the burglary of a house, as such evidence was properly admitted under the "same transaction contextual evidence" exception to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); the finding that the probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by the prejudicial effect was also not an abuse of discretion. Goodwin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS

997 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 4, 2004).

574. Trial court's rulings on whether to admit or exclude evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) are reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. Prescott v. State, 123 S.W.3d 506, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 8792 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

575. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted defendant's prior robbery conviction because he raised the issue of identity by challenging the eyewitness's description, challenged defendant's identity as the robber, and challenged the photo array. The robberies were similar because they occurred six days apart, they occurred shortly after 10 p.m., they occurred in the same area, both businesses were convenience stores, the suspects in both robberies were wearing the same type of zip-up hoodies, and both robberies occurred when only one clerk was present inside the store. Dudley v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3083, 2014 WL 1101563 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 20 2014).

576. Trial court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence of two witnesses concerning prior sexual assaults because defendant opened the door to the admission of evidence to rebut his defensive theory of fabrication. Implicit in defense counsel's opening statement was the victim fabricated her outcry and in his cross-examination of several witnesses counsel repeatedly asked witnesses about the custody battle between defendant and the victim's aunt and uncle and the victim's truthfulness. Jones v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12150, 2013 WL 5494678 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 26 2013).

577. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting an extraneous offense regarding marijuana found on defendant's person and in his car because it was admissible same transaction contextual evidence; defendant's possession of an illegal substance explained his possible motive for hitting a detective and fleeing the scene before the drugs could be found, and he was not acting suspiciously until the detective moved closer. Finney v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8317 (Tex. App. Dallas July 8 2013).

578. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of the burglary in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was necessary to show the chain of events that occurred immediately prior to the shooting, why the officer was in pursuit of defendant's brother, and led to the confrontation between defendant and the officer and defendant's shooting the officer. Castillo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2034, 2013 WL 781776 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 1 2013).

579. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's girlfriend's testimony that defendant called her the day before the assault and threatened to harm her if he found her and the complainant together under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony constituted admissible same-transaction contextual evidence. Defendant's telephone threat the day before placed the assault in context and was necessary to the jury's understanding of defendant's intent, state of mind, and motivation to forcibly enter the girlfriend's house and repeatedly stab the complainant; the evidence also tended to rebut defendant's self-defense theory. Morales v. State, 389 S.W.3d 915, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 109, 2013 WL 80154 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 8 2013).

580. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's objection to testimony about an extraneous offense against a corrections officer under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the victim testified that defendant hit her with the corrections officer's riot baton, and therefore the question of how the baton went from the officer's holder to defendant's hand to being used against the victim in short order was contextual evidence relating to the charged assault. In addition, defendant's objection came well after the extensive testimony about defendant hitting the officer and he only object to the officer's description of her injury; the court further held that the admission of the officer's statement regarding a slight swelling of her face did not affect a substantial right. Mayfield v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5487, 2012 WL 2832529 (Tex. App. Tyler July 11 2012).

581. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that, beginning with the opening statement, defendant attempted to portray the victim as the aggressor and defendant as merely defending himself, and therefore the State was allowed to rebut with evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts where defendant was the aggressor. Castillo v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3997, 2012 WL 1764089 (Tex. App. Dallas May 18 2012).

582. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting extraneous evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) of defendant's theft of his friend's gun, the aggravated assault of one victim, the killing of the victim from whom he stole the vehicle, and the robbery of yet another victim, because the State needed the evidence to give context to defendant's crime spree. Defendant did not rest between incidents and showed that he stole the gun to go after women with whom he had had personal relationships and to then effectuate his flight to his mother's home. Devoe v. State, 354 S.W.3d 457, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1669 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 14 2011).

583. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence allegations made by the victim's sister under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the complained-of instances did not rise to the level of extraneous misconduct evidence. The prosecutor's comments during the opening statement did not include any specifics regarding the allegations made by the victim's sister, as neither defendant nor any specific act or conduct were mentioned, and the victim's mother did not include any specific information related to the sister's allegations. Guillory v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8337, 2011 WL 4996465 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 20 2011).

584. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), namely a firearm that was found in defendant's vehicle because, although defendant's first question to the officer was specific as to whether weapons were found on defendant's person, defendant's follow-up question was more general and asked the officer whether weapons were found. The officer's negative response left the jury with the impression that defendant had no weapons, but because a loaded weapon was found in the general vicinity of the driver's side floorboard, it was possible that defendant was either armed during the burglary or was attempting to arm himself when the officers ordered him to exit his own vehicle; therefore, the evidence was relevant and admissible to correct the false impression left by the officer's testimony. Thomas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6207 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 3 2010).

585. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by deciding that extraneous offense evidence that defendant had molested two girls other than the victim on church property was admissible to rebut defensive theories because it was at least subject to reasonable disagreement whether extraneous offense evidence was admissible for noncharacter-conforming purpose of rebutting defendant's theory that the victim fabricated her allegations against him and of rebutting the defensive theory clearly suggesting that defendant, as a "real deal" and "genuine" pastor, would not engage in the type of conduct alleged in the indictment. Bass v. State, 270 S.W.3d 557, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 859 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

586. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of another aggravated robbery that occurred at another convenience store under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the issue of identity was contested, as various witnesses gave conflicting descriptions of the suspect and defendant testified that another man committed the instant offense. In addition, the robberies were committed within a few days of each other, at the same type of store, in the same area of town, and with a sawed-off shotgun. Both suspects wore a mask and were white males with a short build. Raymer v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5463 (Tex. App. Waco July 23 2008).

587. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for the robbery of a store and the stabbing murder of a store employee in admitting evidence that defendant had, on previous occasions, possessed a knife because the trial court's ruling that the evidence was admissible to show intent, preparation, or plan was not outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Cantu v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2907 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 12 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Mistrial

588. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial because the officer's reference to defendant's "criminal history," without any further detail, was not so inflammatory that the trial court's instruction to disregard could not cure the harm. Francis v. State, 445 S.W.3d 307, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4815 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 18 2013).

589. During defendant's trial for sexual assault, a witness testified that defendant was listed as a sex offender; the trial court told the jury to disregard the evidence; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for mistrial based on the quality and quantity of evidence against him; the victim testified that defendant sexually assaulted her, DNA evidence linked defendant to the crime, and there was no contrary evidence presented. Carnes v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6025 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2007).

590. In a trial for child sexual assault, defendant was not entitled to a mistrial after a detective testified about another case in which the police investigated defendant as a suspect because the detective testified only that he interviewed defendant and did not believe him to be a suspect; any inference of other bad acts was slight, and defendant did not show that an instruction to disregard would not have been effective to cure any error. Garza v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8308 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 21 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

591. Failure to admonish defendant on the consequences of a guilty plea, specifically the requirement of registering as a sex offender, as required by Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 26.13, was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44 because the State presented substantial evidence of guilt, including Tex. R. Evid. 404 evidence regarding other children who had allegedly been abused by defendant and because the omitted admonition regarding the sex-offender registration requirement did not apply to or affect defendant, given that defendant would not be eligible for parole until serving 100 years of the sentence. Bessey v. State, 239 S.W.3d 809, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1630 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

592. It was error to admit evidence of an almost 30-year-old acquittal for attempted murder because the gap made the prior charge too remote; the error was harmless, however, because the evidence was introduced to rebut self-defense, and that claim was not supported because a reasonable person would have retreated. Wyatt v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2288 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 23 2006).

593. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of his daughter, any error was harmless when the trial court excluded testimony from the complainant's mother regarding disciplinary problems defendant had with the complainant, through which defendant sought to show the complainant's motive for the allegation. Any such motive was established by the complainant's testimony on cross-examination. Pruitt v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1669 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 2 2006).

594. In a case of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the State provided notice of other crimes evidence pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, regarding previous inappropriate touching; the lack of an allegation of an exact date did not necessarily render notice insufficient as to a crime against a child, and any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because defendant was not surprised by the evidence. Hindaoui v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1021 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 9 2006).

595. In a trial for defendant's murder of his estranged wife, the admission of evidence that defendant hit the victim 25 years earlier was not reversible error, even if it was evidence of character conformity in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because of the significant evidence of guilt, including defendant's DNA under the victim's fingernails, the fact that he had recently learned that the victim failed to file the divorce papers he had relied on in remarrying, and his confession. McCann v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7343 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 1 2005).

596. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the appellate court assumed the admission of pornographic photographs of adult women taken from his computer was erroneous. However, the error was harmless; the photographs were less shocking and offensive than the complainant's graphic description of the acts defendant engaged in with her and there was ample testimonial evidence of defendant's guilt. Breland v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5925 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 28 2005).

597. Gang affiliation evidence was relevant evidence to show an intent to kill and was permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) where the State's theory was that defendant intentionally opened fire at a vehicle because the driver was a member of a rival sect in the same gang. Moreover, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(a) because the jury heard other, substantial evidence related to defendant's conduct. Trevino v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4449 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 9 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4938 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 8, 2006).

598. Because the jury assessed defendant's punishment for the aggravated kidnapping of his ex-girlfriend at 15 years, and rejected probation, on the facts surrounding the kidnapping and not based on passing references to prior bad acts, the failure to give the reasonable doubt instruction as to prior bad acts could not have caused egregious harm. Thomas v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3054 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 21 2005).

599. Although pictures of injures suffered by a sibling should not have been admitted in a child abuse case, a remand for a harm analysis was not necessary where the evidence showed that the pictures depicted very minor abuse, the pictures of the child who was the subject of the indictment were much more serious and disturbing, defendant admitted to abusing the children, and the pictures were not mentioned in closing arguments. Johnston v. State, 145 S.W.3d 215, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1478 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

600. In defendant's sexual assault on a child case, a court's error in the admission of extraneous offense evidence was harmless where the evidence introduced at trial that supported the verdict was compelling and included the testimony of the victim, his mother, and a therapist. An outcry witness testified that the victim recounted the events, that testimony was consistent with the victim's testimony, the victim's mother and his therapist testified to the victim's behavior and personality after the incident, and a doctor testified that the symptoms the victim exhibited supported the possibility that the victim had been sexually abused. Cervantes v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7442 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2004).

601. Where both defendant and the State discussed the niece's inadmissible extraneous offense testimony and because the niece's testimony significantly bolstered the State's case, the erroneous admission of her testimony affected defendant's substantial rights and was not harmless to defendant; thus, defendant's conviction of aggravated sexual assault of his daughter, a child younger than 14 years of age, was reversed. Harrison v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6418 (Tex. App. Dallas July 19 2004).

602. In a trial for a violent sexual assault of a child, it was error to admit a letter that defendant wrote from prison in which he asserted that the victim lied about her age and that he defended himself when she attacked him, and because his testimony, prior to admission of the letter, was consistent with those claims, the letter was not relevant to guilt and was only relevant to defendant's promiscuous sexual conduct, which he also discussed in the letter; however, the error was harmless because the letter was largely exculpatory and the evidence of guilt was overwhelming. Reed v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5389 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 17 2004).

603. Although the State failed to provide notice of its intent to introduce evidence of defendant's immigration status, there was no indication from the record that the omission was intended to mislead defendant and prevent him from preparing a defense where the State apparently notified the defense that it intended to question defendant about his immigration status at some point before the punishment phase as indicated by the hearing held while the jury deliberated guilt-innocence. Alvarado v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5019 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 3 2004).

604. In an aggravated felony theft case, any error in permitting the State to question defendant about why she was fired from the another job was harmless; the reference to the "financial irregularities" at the place of her former employment was only one sentence and was no more damaging than references to the other "bad acts" that were mentioned. Furthermore, the prosecutor's argument paled in comparison to the quantum of evidence presented by the State and the absence of any controverting witnesses or documentation by defendant. Dugan v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3548 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 21 2004).

605. Testimony concerning defendant's plans following release from jail was minimal compared to the testimony concerning the charged offenses, and it did not influence the jury or had only a slight effect; therefore, any error was rendered harmless. Ellinberg v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2753 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2004).

606. Defendant's argument that testimony of his having exposed himself to a woman at the post office was an inadmissible extraneous offense was improperly overruled was upheld because at the time the case was tried, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) prohibited the admission of extraneous offense evidence at the punishment phase of a non-capital offense unless it was permitted by the Texas Rules of Evidence and satisfied art. 37.07, § 3(a)'s definition of prior criminal record. Mireles v. State, 1997 Tex. App. LEXIS 2179 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 1997).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

607. Although the evidence from the neighbor's apartment was not same transaction contextual evidence and the trial court abused its discretion in admitting it, the error was harmless given that the extent of the other evidence for defendant's guilt because the State found the marijuana hidden in defendant's truck, an officer observed defendant exit the apartment building appearing to hide something under his shirt, and defendant chose to lead police on a high-speech chase instead of submitting to the traffic stop. Gonzalez v. State, 510 S.W.3d 10, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8934 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

608. At defendant's trial for four counts of tampering with a governmental record she prepared as a case-worker for the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services, she was not harmed by the admission of extraneous-offense testimony even though she did not receive sufficient notice. Because defendant received reasonable notice that the State intended to introduce extraneous-offense evidence that she made false entries claiming she made trips to the home of one family, the court could not see how her defensive strategy might have been different had she been given notice about the State's intent to introduce evidence of false entries in travel logs with respect to the second family. Washington v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7742, 2014 WL 3556525 (Tex. App. Waco July 17 2014).

609. Even if the court erred by admitting evidence about defendant's gang affiliation, the error was harmless because defendant and other individuals were in the bedroom with over ninety grams of crack cocaine, the packaging was consistent with the sale of drugs, and the house contained surveillance cameras. Villarreal v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7296, 2014 WL 3056509 (Tex. App. Dallas July 7 2014).

610. Exclusion of character evidence that a murder victim occasionally drank to excess and was violent when he drank was harmless error, given that defendant was able to present his defense that the victim was drunk and pulled a shotgun on defendant, which defendant then used to kill the victim. Milliff v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4589, 2014 WL 1713897 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 29 2014).

611. Even though the trial court err by excluding the portion of defendant's testimony regarding the victim's prior specific instances of violence against her to support her claim of self-defense, the error was harmless because defendant admitting yelling at the victim because she was mad at him, which led to an argument, and she slapped him during the argument. Defendant was permitted to testify that she was afraid of the victim and she had slapped him because she was scared. Rodriguez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14876, 2013 WL 6533378 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 11 2013).

612. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence, Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), given the evidence already accumulated against defendant, and any error was harmless. Hicks v. State, 419 S.W.3d 555, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14091, 2013 WL 6076468 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 18 2013).

613. Although the State did not provide notice of its intent to introduce evidence of marijuana taken from defendant at the scene of his DWI arrest as required by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), defendant's counsel was aware of the existence of the marijuana evidence, did not ask for a continuance of the trial, and did not show how his trial strategy would have been different if he had been provided notice; therefore, any error was harmless. Voltmann v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11445 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 5 2013).

614. Similar crimes evidence admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) against a defendant convicted of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02(a)(2), if error, did not have a substantial effect on the jury's verdict given other evidence that defendant was the perpetrator of the assault. Tovar v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10404 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 20 2013).

615. Even if the trial court erred by admitting a witness's testimony about the burglary of vehicle, the error was harmless given the strength of the State's case, the limited scope of the witness's testimony, defendant pleaded guilty before the jury to burglarizing the witness's vehicle, and an officer repeated the substance of the witness's testimony without objection. Rendon v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10103 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 14 2013).

616. Even if the trial court erred by allowing the State to elicit testimony from defendant's wife about an incident involving defendant and the child victim without notice, the error was harmless because defendant learned of the testimony before trial and he was prepared and cross-examined the wife about the incident. Lair v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9906 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 8 2013).

617. Defendant's conviction for abuse of official capacity was improper because the jury's verdict was substantially influenced by the admission of improper extraneous offense evidence and the error was not harmless, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the evidence of guilty was not overwhelming. The improper use of extraneous offense evidence included arguments by the State that defendant should be found guilty of the charged offense because he and his employees were in the "business" of criminal activity. Lomas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 6 2013).

618. In a robbery/murder trial, any error in admitting evidence of defendant's gang affiliation was harmless because a surviving witness unequivocally identified defendant. Vallejo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6952 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 6 2013).

619. Even though the trial court erred by admitting evidence that defendant was previously in prison or jail for another crime, was a gang member, or had sold or possessed marijuana under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the error was harmless because the net effect of the improperly admitted evidence was to show that defendant had some relatively minor criminal history, circumstantial evidence supported the verdict that defendant participated in the victim's murder, the State did not refer to defendant's previous conviction, imprisonment, gang affiliation, or marijuana sales during its jury argument, and the trial court limited the jury's consideration of all evidence of other offenses to a determination of defendant's state of mind at the time of the instant offense. Childs v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5392 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 2 2013).

620. In a child sexual abuse case, even if evidence that appellant spanked his daughters with a cable cord did not fall under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, the admission of the testimony was harmless and did not affect appellant's substantial rights where the daughters testified about the years of sexual abuse that they suffered. Appellant failed to preserve his Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objections in the trial court. Arellano-Sanchez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5438 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 2 2013).

621. Even though the trial court abused its discretion by admitting defendant's military record into evidence, as the fact that defendant was charged with escape and had been discharged for misconduct did not make it more or less likely that he had committed the sexual assault offenses, the error was harmless because there was evidence supporting defendant's conviction, other evidence showed that he was untruthful about his military service, and the State never mentioned the extraneous offenses contained in defendant's military record. Seery v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2013 WL 683327 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 21 2013).

622. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's girlfriend's testimony that she lied to the police because she was scared of defendant, that they fought a lot, he would hit her, and that it was normal for them to fight. Even if the trial court had erred by admitting the evidence, the error was harmless because there was ample other evidence that it was normal for defendant and his girlfriend to fight and it was extremely doubtful that the jury gave much credence to the girlfriend's testimony concerning why she lied to police. Moreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10403, 2012 WL 6582556 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 13 2012).

623. No reversible error resulted from the state's alleged failure to provide notice of extraneous offense evidence because defendant was given the opportunity to-and did-develop evidence to rebut the testimony. Nieto v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8787 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 18 2012).

624. At defendant's trial for DWI, the admission of medical records containing extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not have a substantial effect on the verdict because the jury heard evidence that defendant was passed out in his vehicle with a bottle of alcohol between his legs; the officer noticed defendant's glassy and bloodshot eyes, defendant admitted he consumed alcohol and prescription medications, and field sobriety test results suggested intoxication. The record contained sufficient evidence from which the jury could find defendant guilty of DWI beyond a reasonable doubt. Lorenz v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7777, 2012 WL 4017766 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 12 2012).

625. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it took into consideration during punishment an unadjudicated offense that had been dismissed, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a), as any error was harmless as the trial court considered the positive steps defendant had made since his arrest, but was uncertain that defendant understood the seriousness of the offense. Meighen v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7401, 2012 WL 3799664 (Tex.

App. Eastland Aug. 31 2012).

626. Even though the trial court erred by admitting evidence concerning defendant's suicide attempt shortly after his arrest on the instant charges under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was not part of the same transaction and therefore the State was required to give notice before the day of trial, the error was harmless because: (1) defendant was not surprised; (2) he did not request a continuance; and (3) similar evidence was admitted elsewhere without objection. Fletcher v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5429, 2012 WL 2783298 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 10 2012).

627. In a driving while intoxicated case, even if a brief mention of appellant's parole status was in error under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), it was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the evidence supporting the verdict was substantial, the jury was not told why appellant was on parole, and the testimony had a slight effect on the jury, if it had any effect at all. Link v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3350, 2012 WL 1495182 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 30 2012).

628. Even if the trial court erred by admitting extraneous offense evidence, the error did not affect defendant's substantial rights because: (1) the record did not indicate that the State specifically mentioned the agent's testimony regarding the 20 instances when similar counterfeit bills were passed; (2) the trial court instructed the jury that it could not consider extraneous offenses unless it found beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the offenses; and (3) the record contained sufficient other evidence to support defendant's forgery conviction. Mookdasnit v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2220, 2012 WL 983333 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 21 2012).

629. No reversible error occurred from the admission of penalty-phase evidence that defendant was a member of a street gang prior to becoming a member of a prison gang; even if the State erroneously failed to provide notice, there was no unfair surprise. Zubia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 551, 2012 WL 225470 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 25 2012).

630. In a driving while intoxicated (DWI) case, it was error to admit the entirety of defendant's driving record because it contained evidence of extraneous offenses beyond the prior DWI convictions that were elements of a charged offense. However, the error was harmless because evidence of guilt was ample. Bridges v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9104, 2011 WL 5557534 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 16 2011).

631. Even though the trial court erred by admitted evidence of extraneous misconduct that occurred two days after the date of the instant altercation, the error was harmless because: (1) the State presented considerable evidence of defendant's guilt, as numerous witnesses testified they saw defendant hit the victim; (2) there was considerable evidence of injuries to the victim; (3) the State did not reemphasize the details of the extraneous offense during closing argument; and (4) the trial court included a limiting instruction in the jury charge. Vaughn v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5037, 2011 WL 2621327 (Tex. App. Austin July 1 2011).

632. At defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation based on evidence showing that defendant and his brother broke into a mobile home and stole a TV set, the trial court ruled that evidence of two extraneous burglaries committed by his brother was relevant, probative, and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). The appellate court held that defendant was not harmed by the admission of the evidence because it was not unduly emphasized by the State, and it did not have a substantial effect on the jury's verdict. Crutchfield v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4959, 2011 WL 2638402 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2011).

633. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a witness's testimony because whether the witness's testimony about an incident of intoxication unrelated to the current felony driving while intoxicated offense was relevant and admissible under the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; furthermore, even if the trial court erred in admitting the challenged testimony, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the State placed extremely little emphasis on the witness's testimony that he had previously seen defendant intoxicated. Snyder v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10203, 2010 WL 5541120 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 29 2010).

634. Even if four days' notice of an extraneous offense was insufficient under the standards of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 § 3(g) and Tex. R. Evid. 404, there was no evidence of harm because defendant admitted that he knew about the offense for two months and was not surprised by the introduction of the evidence. Gonzalez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9805, 2010 WL 5060634 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 9 2010).

635. Even though the trial court erred by refusing defendant's request to redact his medical records to delete the doctor's diagnosis of cocaine abuse and drug abuse-marijuana, as it constituted inadmissible character-conformity evidence, the error was harmless because it did not substantially affect the verdict, as there was other evidence, including the results of a urinalysis and defendant's statements to hospital staff that he used crack cocaine and had smoked three or four rocks that day, revealing defendant's drug use. Montgomery v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9220, 2010 WL 4668952 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 18 2010).

636. Even if the trial court abused its discretion by refusing to allow defendant to present evidence that the victim had previously threatened two witnesses, the error did not amount to reversible error because defendant was able to present his defense, as the jury was properly instructed on the law of self-defense and defendant was testified about prior threats the victim had made to him and about the circumstances of the shooting; other witnesses also testified about threats the victim had allegedly made. There was also evidence presented contradicting defendant's self-defense claim, including evidence that: (1) defendant had threatened to kill the victim shortly before the victim was shot; (2) no evidence showed that the victim was armed or attempted to use deadly force; (3) none of the witnesses that were in the area when the shooting occurred or that responded to the scene reported seeking a sniper; and (4) when defendant drove to the sheriff's office and admitted that he shot the victim, he did not mention a sniper. Currin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7051, 2010 WL 3370059 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 27 2010).

637. Defendant's contention that the State failed to provide reasonable notice of extraneous offenses that it intended to offer under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was rejected because: (1) the State choose not to introduce evidence of theft of the electronic device charger; (2) defense counsel admitted that he had notice that the State intended to offer evidence related to the burglary of a skate shop; and (3) defendant was not surprised or harmed by the introduction of evidence relating to a robbery because prior to defendant's trial, the State produced transcripts of court proceedings against an accomplice for that robbery that disclosed defendant's role in the robbery and the potential witnesses against him, and the State's witness list in the instant case disclosed the robbery victim's identity. Davis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6949, 2010 WL 3341514 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2010).

638. State gave defendant notice that it intended to introduce defendant's prior criminal trespass under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) where the prosecutor stated on the record that several months before trial, he had delivered to defendant numerous discovery documents, including a copy of the offense report that referenced a statement that the instant burglary victims had report to authorities that defendant had criminally trespassed on their residence. Even if the State had not provided such notice, defendant was not harmed because his counsel made no claim that he was actually surprised by the evidence, and in light of the fact that the criminal trespass involved the same property and the same property owners as the charged offense, it was unlikely that defendant was aware that the State would attempt to admit the evidence. Castle v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7039, 2010 WL 3370057 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25 2010).

639. Court abused its discretion when it allowed the State to introduce evidence that defendant failed to appear for two drug tests, however, the error did not affect defendant's substantial rights, because the evidence was brief and was not emphasized by the State, defendant had a prior criminal record, and there was direct evidence connecting defendant with the syringe that contained a trace amount of methamphetamine. Hood v. State, 2010 Tex. App.

640. Any error in the admission of prior acts testimony was harmless because the complainant testified to years of sexual abuse at the hands of defendant, her grandfather, and a detective testified that during his interview with the complainant, the complainant told him about having sexual intercourse with her grandfather. In light of the more detailed, first-hand testimony of the complainant, the mother's testimony regarding defendant's behavior towards her did not influence the jury or had but a slight effect. Barrera v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 401, 2010 WL 188312 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 21 2010).

641. In an indecency with a child case, the court erred by admitting extraneous offense evidence due to the lack of similarity between the extraneous offenses and the charged offenses, the duration in time of twenty years between the offenses, and the lack of evidence concerning a continuing course of conduct by defendant. The extraneous acts did not take place in defendant's home and defendant did not ask the witness to touch himself or defendant. Crocker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9432, 2009 WL 4725299 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 11 2009).

642. Trial court abused its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's prior burglary arrest pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) where the tendency of the evidence was to show defendant was a bad person or that his character conformed to that of a person from whom criminal conduct might be expected. However, the error did not influence the jury, or had but a slight effect on its verdict of guilt, because the State's presentation of the alleged burglary, although factually detailed, was brief and received only passing mention in closing argument, and because the propensity and potency of the evidence to characterize defendant as a criminal was blunted by the previous, unopposed, admission of evidence of his prior conviction for manslaughter. Tello v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8401, 2009 WL 3518006 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 30 2009).

643. Defendant was not harmed by the State's failure to provide him with notice of its intent to introduce deferred adjudications involving unauthorized use of a motor vehicle under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) because defendant's ability to prepare to meet other, more serious offenses (of which he was given notice) was not affected by the State's failure to provide notice of its intent to introduce the orders of deferred adjudication. Weeks v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5106, 2009 WL 1896066 (Tex. App. Austin July 1 2009).

644. Even if the trial court erred by allowing the State to introduce any of defendant's recorded phone conversations under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), any error was harmless because the jury heard ample evidence of defendant's guilt apart from the conversations, the State did not rely upon the conversations during either its opening or closing statements, and the conversations did not constitute a critical part of the State's case. Jimenez v. State, 307 S.W.3d 325, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4701 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 24 2009).

645. In defendant's murder case, a pretrial motion in limine regarding extraneous offenses was insufficient to trigger a duty by the State to provide notice under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) and therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the prosecutor to impeach a defense witness during the punishment phase of trial without notice to defendant. Additionally, any error was harmless because defendant shot the victim four times in the back. Ridley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4242, 2009 WL 1653083 (Tex. App. Dallas June 15 2009).

646. Trial court erred when extraneous offense evidence of marihuana possession was admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it did not relate to defendant's perception or state of mind in a murder case; even if it was relevant, the probative value was weak and substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. However, defendant's substantial rights under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) were not affected because defendant admitted shooting the victim, he had threatened the victim previously, a witness testified about crack cocaine on her person, and the forensic evidence showed that the victim was shot at close range with a gun found in defendant's possession.

Harbert v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3305 (Tex. App. Eastland May 14 2009).

647. In a sexual assault of a child case, the court reversibly erred by admitting extraneous acts evidence because defendant's practice of not using a condom while engaged in consensual sex with an adult companion, or informing the companion of his HIV positive status, had the practical effect of prejudicing any defense raised by defendant regarding the complainant's credibility. Such an effect would have been detrimental to defendant, who sought to discredit the complainant by pointing out factual variances in his outcries, and by suggesting that the complainant was motivated to fabricate the assault to avoid being schooled in an alternative education program. Lopez v. State, 288 S.W.3d 148, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2050 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 26 2009).

648. In a case involving sexual assault of a child, the State's notice of its intent to use extraneous offenses was not unreasonable because it involved a time span of 6 years; because the testimony regarding when defendant lived in El Salvador was not precise, the notice giving a range of dates for the extraneous offenses alleged to have occurred in El Salvador was not unreasonable. Even if the notice was unreasonable, the error was not harmful because defendant did not contend that he was surprised, he did not seek a continuance, and he failed to show how his defense strategy had been different had the intent notice been more specific. Sagastume v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1093, 2009 WL 387182 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 18 2009).

649. Alleged error regarding the admission of an extraneous offense was disregarded in a robbery case under the standard in Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because defendant's substantial rights were not affected; there was ample evidence of defendant's guilt, a limiting instruction was given, and there was other evidence regarding defendant's untruthfulness. Moreover, whether or not defendant had stolen a truck used to flee the robbery scene had minimal relevance as to whether he used a deadly weapon during the robbery. Crump v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 760, 2009 WL 279606 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 5 2009).

650. In a sexual assault of a child case, the trial court abused its discretion by admitting a graphic story written by defendant for purposes of showing defendant's intent to gratify his sexual desire because intent was not an issue at trial. However, the error was harmless because the victim testified regarding the abuse perpetrated by defendant, testimony established that defendant routinely slept in the same bed with her, and the State presented other evidence that defendant did not have an appropriate relationship with his adolescent daughter. Mayer v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9483 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 18 2008).

651. In a sexual assault case, other acts evidence was properly admitted because, although defendant claimed surprise, there was evidence that he was aware of the allegations that sexual abuse occurred while the victim was a minor, and he did not seek a continuance to obtain evidence to establish an alibi defense or otherwise rebut the testimony. Defendant did not show how his defense strategy might have been different if he had been given notice fourteen days before trial, as he requested, rather than the day of jury selection. Merlos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6514 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26, 2008).

652. Trial court erred by admitting an extraneous offense of marijuana possession under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in a case involving unlawful possession of a weapon because it was irrelevant where defendant did not challenge the legality of a search; however, the error was harmless since defendant's sole defensive theory was negated by his admission to police. Defendant contended that he had no knowledge of gun found under the driver's seat of a vehicle, but he told a police officer that searched the vehicle that there was a weapon inside. Provencio v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6073 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 11 2008).

653. Even if character evidence of a decedent was improperly introduced during a capital murder case, this constituted harmless error since defendant's substantial rights were not affected; defendant admitted that she knew her boyfriend was using a weapon in robberies, she participated after learning of a shooting, and she helped dispose of the weapon. Harris v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3225 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 2 2008).

654. Any error was harmless when the State failed to notify defendant, as required under Tex. R. Evid. 404, of its intent to introduce extraneous offense evidence of a fight between a murder defendant and the victim three months earlier; although that evidence may have shown a motive for the crime, it was insignificant in light of the other evidence. Vasquez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2952 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 2008).

655. In a trial for defendant's aggravated assault of a former romantic partner, it was error to admit without the notice required by Tex. R. Evid. 404 evidence that defendant drove by the victim's workplace and threatened to kill the victim; however, the error was harmless because there was no showing that the defensive strategy would have been different if the State had given proper notice or that the defense was injuriously affected by the lack of notice. Padilla v. State, 254 S.W.3d 585, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2719 (Tex. App. Eastland 2008).

656. In defendant's unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon case, the court did not err by allowing the State to ask a witness whether she knew defendant was a convicted sex offender because inquiry into the nature of the relationship between defendant and a witness was relevant to show potential bias by the witness or challenge the witness's credibility; additionally, any error was harmless; in the jury's presence, the parties stipulated to the admission into evidence of records pertaining to defendant's conviction for failure to register as a sex offender. Tapps v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2809 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 17 2008).

657. In an aggravated robbery case in which a trial court allowed the State to present extraneous offense evidence of a robbery committed the day of the offense-at-issue for the purpose of identification, even if the trial court prematurely admitted the extraneous offense evidence pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404, the error was rendered harmless by subsequently admitted evidence; in defendant's case-in-chief, he presented an alibi defense, thus affirmatively raising the issue of identity by positing that he could not be the person who robbed the victim because he was at a different location at the time of the robbery. Dickson v. State, 246 S.W.3d 733, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9859 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

658. Appellant was entitled to a new trial based on the erroneous admission of improper character evidence that appellant failed a drug test, contrary to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); the evidence of the drug-test results, which occurred after the assault for which appellant was on trial, came in unexpectedly and was later explained by appellant, yet it was embraced by the State and emphasized throughout trial in an effort to tie the drug-test results to the assault; consequently, the error in admitting the evidence was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44 and Tex. R. Evid. 103. Simmons v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9732 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 14 2007).

659. In a murder trial, no harm occurred when the trial court admitted tape-recorded phone conversations that included defendant's statement about a plea offer on an unrelated offense; defendant's remark was in the middle of the State's first tape-recorded conversation, it was not singled out at trial, and the State did not attempt to introduce other evidence regarding the previous offense. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9519 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 5 2007).

660. Defendant was not substantially harmed by the trial court's error in admitting a witness's reputation testimony because evidence of the victim's character as a peaceful person was properly presented to the jury. Cruz v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9002 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 15 2007).

661. In defendant's sexual assault on a child case, a court did not err in admitting a prior bad act because, in regard to the breast touching incident, the record reflected that defendant and her lead trial counsel were both present at a deposition where the incident was explored extensively at least four months before her trial; under such circumstances, defendant failed to show that she was surprised by the substance of the testimony or that her ability to prepare cross examination or mitigating evidence was affected; therefore, the trial court's error, if any, in admitting the testimony was harmless. Dinger v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4767 (Tex. App. Tyler June 20 2007).

662. In a trial for indecency with and sexual assault of a child, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to admit electronic mail messages as evidence of defendant's prior bad acts because the purpose of the evidence was to prove defendant's bad character. The error was harmless because the evidence had at most a slight effect in light of the complainant's testimony about the abuse and medical evidence of rectal tearing. Starnes v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3144 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 26 2007).

663. In a drug trial, counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 404, to the admission of the portion of defendant's written statement that referred to an extraneous offense; any error was harmless because there is no reasonable probability that the evidence contributed to the conviction. Hollis v. State, 219 S.W.3d 446, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1207 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

664. In a trial for aggravated robbery, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 when the trial court allowed testimony regarding extraneous acts evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), specifically that defendant possessed drugs at the time of arrest; the extraneous acts were less serious than the charged offense, the trial court gave a limiting instruction, and there was a plethora of evidence establishing guilt. Padrino v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 623 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 30 2007).

665. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child, the trial court did not err by allowing a sexual assault nurse examiner to testify about the child's statements that defendant touched the child victim's breasts and buttocks on various occasions; the State's failure to give defendant prior notice of intent to tender the evidence as required by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.072 was harmless; defendant was not surprised by the evidence. Sharp v. State, 210 S.W.3d 835, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11033 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

666. In a trial for indecency with children, defendant should have been allowed to elicit testimony that he had a reputation in the community for the ethical treatment of children; the error in excluding that evidence was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), even though there was other testimony as to his reputation for being peaceful and law-abiding, because evidence of a reputation as being law-abiding was far too generic to address the specific character trait of pedophilia. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9788 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 9 2006).

667. In an aggravated robbery case, extraneous conduct evidence of a shooting incident involving defendant was improperly admitted because the shooting offense was different than the aggravated robbery offense, however, the error was harmless; the aggravated robbery victim made a positive identification of defendant and a witness also implicated defendant. Jimenez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9282 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 26 2006).

668. Defendant was not entitled to reversal of a conviction for indecency with a child because of the admission of a confession that referred to other bad acts; any violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404 was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because the confession strongly supported the verdict and a proper limiting instruction was given. Diaz v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8084 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 12 2006).

669. Even if the trial court erred by admitting evidence of defendant's two prior aggravated sexual assault offenses during his murder trial, the error was harmless because the incriminating evidence was substantial, consisting of DNA evidence showing that defendant had sexually assaulted the victim and defendant's oral and written statements about his dream that showed his detailed knowledge of the victim's murder scene. Dossett v. State, 216 S.W.3d 7, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7428 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

670. Even though the trial court abused its discretion by allowing the State to introduce extraneous-offense evidence relating to the theft of a purse and a cell phone, as the State failed to give notice under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by failing to list the offense in its notice of intent, the error was harmless because while the evidence may have reinforced the State's proof that defendant fled after the shooting, it was insignificant compared to evidence that defendant never returned to his home or his job, abandoned his car in Louisiana, and was apprehended in Virginia. Allen v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5186 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 15 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7349 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 17, 2006).

671. Although the tape was not properly authenticated, the evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404 could not be said to have infringed on defendant's substantial rights because the evidence was before the jury via an undercover officer's unobjected-to testimony; therefore, admission of the extraneous offense evidence was harmless. Roberson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4282 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 18 2006).

672. Trial court's admission of an assault victim's testimony concerning allegations contained in a divorce petition she filed against defendant, if erroneous, was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) where testimony presented by the responding officers and pictures of the victim on the night of the incident revealing redness in the victim's left eye and bruising around the eye were admitted without objection and were amply sufficient to enable the jury to find that defendant, at a minimum, recklessly caused bodily injury to the victim. Furthermore, because the State did not emphasize the divorce petition evidence in its argument to the jury, the victim's testimony regarding the divorce petition had no more than a slight effect, if any, on the jury's decision. Sharp v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3216 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 20 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Jury Instructions

673. Defendant convicted of arson failed to show she suffered egregious harm as a result of the trial court's failure to instruct the jury during sentencing that the State had to prove extraneous offenses beyond a reasonable doubt because she did not argue that the evidence of her extraneous misconduct was insufficient to support a conviction or was lacking in credibility, and neither did she provide authority or other considerations indicating that, if an instruction had been given, the jury would likely have disregarded the evidence or imposed a lighter sentence; she faced up to 99 years' imprisonment and up to a $10,000 fine, but the jury only assessed a 14-year sentence and a $3,000 fine. Sanders v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 830, 2014 WL 2619398 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 24 2014).

674. Even if the trial court erred in including a reference to extraneous offenses in the jury charge, defendant could not show that he was harmed by the error because if the trial court had sustained defense counsel's objection and excluded the instruction, the jury would have been free to consider evidence of defendant's extraneous offenses for any purpose, including character conformity. Perkinson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9948 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 8 2013).

675. Trial court's extraneous offense instruction did not cause defendant egregious harm because defendant's driving offenses were irrelevant to an intent to deliver cocaine because the instruction neither suggested nor required that the jury draw any particular inference about defendant's intent based on the offenses he committed but rather permitted the jury to assign the offenses their appropriate relevance in determining defendant's intent. Limas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 827, 2013 WL 328988 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 29 2013).

676. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child younger than 14 years of age, the trial court erred by failing to give a limiting instruction with regard to extraneous acts contained in a prosecution's exhibit when the exhibit was first admitted into evidence. However, the trial court's error had no more than a slight effect on the jury's verdict and, thus, was harmless. Mccormick v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2026, 2012 WL 851696 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 14 2012).

677. To the extent that the district court's failure to include an instruction regarding recent fabrication was an error in defendant's sexual assault trial, it was a harmless error because the instruction given prohibited consideration of testimony from three of the victim's relatives who claimed that defendant had also abused them for any reason other than specifically identified, the trial court's failure to include an instruction on recent fabrication benefited, rather than harmed, defendant. Tobar v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5161 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Appeals : General Overview

678. Trial court properly denied the inmate habeas corpus relief on his claim that defense counsel was ineffective for failing to object to a witness's nonresponsive testimony concerning defendant's propensity for violence because the inmate failed to meet his burden to prove that counsel's representation fell below the standard of prevailing professional norms, as the court was not in a position to judge whether the risk of the jury focusing their view on the inmate outweighed the prejudicial nature of the testimony. Ex parte McAndrew, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 656 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 31 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Cognizable Issues : Evidentiary Rulings

679. State inmate was denied habeas relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254(d) because, inter alia, the State's failure to notify him of its intent to introduce prior bad act evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) at his third trial for murdering his wife did not violate due process, as it failed to raise an issue of federal constitutional dimension. Garcia v. Quarterman, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82214 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 10 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Review : Specific Claims : Evidentiary Errors

680. Testimony of a victim who survived a rape and attack perpetrated by an inmate was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to establish the inmate's identity as the perpetrator of similar attacks and murders where identity was a hotly contested issue in the case; thus, the inmate was not entitled to a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the admission of the victim's testimony violated the inmate's rights. Wood v. Dretke, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36083 (N.D. Tex. June 2 2006).

681. Testimony of a victim who survived a rape and attack perpetrated by an inmate was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to establish the inmate's identity as the perpetrator of similar attacks and murders where identity was a hotly contested issue in the case; thus, the inmate was not entitled to a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the admission of the victim's testimony violated the inmate's rights. Wood v. Dretke, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15740 (N.D. Tex. Apr. 4 2006).

Evidence : Authentication : General Overview

682. Although the tape was not properly authenticated, the evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404 could not be said to have infringed on defendant's substantial rights because the evidence was before the jury via an undercover officer's unobjected-to testimony; therefore, admission of the extraneous offense evidence was harmless. Roberson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4282 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 18 2006).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Admissibility

683. Prison guards' testimony and videotape of a melee were relevant to show defendant's intent to help her boyfriend escape and were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Jones v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1850 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 10 2005).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Photographs

684. In the murder case, the court did not abuse its discretion by sustaining the State's objection to a photograph showing the deceased's gang affiliation because the picture depicting a memorial to the deceased did not indicate he was violent and the photograph would have been cumulative. Wilson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 918, 2014 WL 310117 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2014).

685. In the murder case, the court did not abuse its discretion by sustaining the State's objection to a photograph showing the deceased's gang affiliation because the picture depicting a memorial to the deceased did not indicate he was violent and the photograph would have been cumulative. Wilson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 918, 2014 WL 310117 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2014).

686. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by admitting autopsy photographs of the victim that showed injuries to areas other than her vagina because they were admissible to show the context in which the offense occurred, as defendant's assaultive behavior was so connected to the sexual assault that they formed an indivisible criminal transaction. Coe v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4169, 2012 WL 1899179 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2012).

687. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a photograph of defendant holding a pistol during his trial for possessing more than four grams of cocaine with intent to deliver and for possessing more than four ounces of marihuana where the photograph was relevant because it made it more probable that defendant knowingly possessed both the contraband and the pistol, and where that relevance was not outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice because no significant amount of time was required to introduce the photograph. Furthermore, even though the photograph had the potential for impressing the jury in an improper way pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by suggesting that defendant was the sort of person who brandished a pistol during a telephone conversation, by linking defendant to the pistol found in the night stand of his motel room, albeit indirectly, the photograph was some evidence that defendant used the pistol to protect his drugs and money, and the State's only other evidence of such use, beyond defendant's simple possession of the weapon, was a police officer's testimony describing defendant's ambiguous movements when the officers entered his motel room. Rangel v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9008 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 5 2008).

688. State argued that the burn evidence, which constituted other crimes evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), was admissible because in defendant's written statements, he stated that any injury that he inflicted on the victim, a 16-month old child, the night of her fatal injury was accidental; the burn evidence was relevant to show defendant's state of mind and his relationship with the victim and rebutted his claim of the accidental nature of the injury that resulted in her death; further, the testimony and photograph of the burn was not so graphic that it would have impressed the jury in an irrational, yet indelible way, and the State had a compelling need for the evidence because its case was entirely circumstantial, and defendant contested both his identity as the perpetrator and his state of mind. Montgomery v. State, 198 S.W.3d 67, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3377 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

689. Trial court erred by admitting certain photographs in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 403, and 901 because although the photographs that were found in defendant's kitchen the day after the alleged sexual assault that showed the victim naked and unconscious were properly admitted as they were essential to understanding the circumstances of the assault and tended to confirm her testimony; other photographs that showed unidentified men sexually assaulting another woman, and that showed defendant's house mate having sexual intercourse, and defendant urinating against the wall giving a gang sign were improperly admitted. There was no evidence that defendant took the other photographs or knew of their existence and they suggested an improper basis upon which to convict defendant. Casey v. State, 160 S.W.3d 218, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1807 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

690. Trial judge abused his discretion in admitting a photograph of defendant's prior family assault victim where the State had other evidence of defendant's intent, specifically defendant's testimony that he had been convicted three times of similar assaults; the probative value of the photograph was not particularly compelling in light of his admission to the offense, and a limiting instruction would likely not have been effective because of the indelible impression photographic evidence of this nature leaves. Randolph v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4363 (Tex. App. Waco May 12 2004).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Recordings

691. No error resulted from the State's failure to mute a recording in which a detective told defendant "there is a time to quit," and said he needed to stop whatever types of issues he was having and that the police were watching him because the statements were so general that they did not constitute evidence of other crimes. Basinger v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3847, 2012 WL 1704322 (Tex. App. Dallas May 16 2012).

692. Where defendant pleaded guilty to three counts of sexual assault of a child and a fourth count of indecency with a child, the jury was permitted to view seven pornographic videotapes that defendant took to the hotel and viewed before engaging in sexual acts with the victim; at no time did defendant lodge a Tex. R. Evid. 404 objection to the exhibits; defendant's relevancy and forgery objections did not preserve his complaint for review. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9982 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 15 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Statements of Child Abuse

693. Evidence of bathing incident between defendant and his niece was admissible, Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, 404(b), as it showed the nature of defendant's relationship with and mindset towards his niece, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 Gragert v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3948, 2011 WL 2027955 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 24 2011).

694. Complainant initially told her school counselor that defendant had touched her inappropriately; however, the complainant testified at trial that she had made up the scenario; a videotape of complainant was admissible because defendant's attorney opened the door, and moreover, defendant failed to object that admission of the videotape was improper impeachment evidence; rather, defendant objected that the videotape was prior bad acts evidence. Roberts v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6214 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 7 2007).

695. During defendant's child sexual assault trial, the trial court was not required to deny admission of the victim's testimony detailing the history of defendant's sexually assaulting her because the State gave defendant sufficient notice by filing a notice of intent to use the outcry statement pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.072, and by filing multiple notices pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), of its intent to offer evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts, specifically the introduction of the evidence of the images of children found at defendant's residence. Pratt v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10657 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 22 2005).

Evidence : Hearsay : Rule Components

696. Because defendant did not request notice of the State's intent to use evidence of crimes committed by third persons under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), no notice was required of the intent to use evidence that a grandmother attempted to bribe a child to remain quiet about sexual abuse; moreover, the evidence was not hearsay under Tex. R. Evid. 801(d) because it was merely offered to show that the child maintained the allegations despite the bribe. Franco v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1655 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 19 2004).

Evidence : Judicial Admissions : Admissions During Trials

697. Defendant on a drug delivery charge was estopped from raising on appeal any error in the admission of subsequent deliveries at the guilt phase because he admitted his guilt at the penalty phase of trial; further, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 or Tex. R. Evid. 404 because his counsel opened the door by suggesting that defendant was only a marginal participant in the drug trade and that the charged transaction constituted his sole involvement in the drug business. Houston v. State, 208 S.W.3d 585, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3056 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Circumstantial & Direct Evidence

698. Admission of a pistol into evidence during defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault was not prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Because the pistol fit the description of the gun used during the assault, defendant's possession of the pistol was circumstantial evidence that he had the opportunity and means to commit the armed assault. Sargeon v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1857, 2012 WL 761210 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 8 2012).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Curative Admissibility

699. Trial court did not err during defendant's trial for indecency with a child when it allowed the prosecutor, for the limited purpose of impeachment, to question the victim's mother about her knowledge of defendant's prior convictions for aggravated sexual assault of two other children because the mother's testimony on direct examination by defendant's counsel that she had no reason to suspect that defendant would abuse her children opened the door and put at issue her credibility. Delacruz v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13492, 2013 WL 5890796 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 31 2013).

700. Defendant's statement to police that he had, 20 years earlier, been accused of improper conduct with his former stepdaughter, was not relevant to prove defendant's intent under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and it was unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Defendant did not "open the door" to admission of the statement, Tex. R. Evid. 107, by responding to a question by the State. However, given the evidence of guilt, the error was harmless. Cressman v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9849, 2012 WL 5974013 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 29 2012).

701. In a murder trial, defendant opened the door to evidence of his past misconduct because his brother testified that defendant had a mellower and more peaceful disposition than his brothers. The same testimony cured error in extraneous-offense evidence admitted prior to the testimony. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7938, 2012 WL 4101900 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 19 2012).

702. Trial court properly allowed defendant's daughter to testify concerning defendant's sexually abuse of her because defendant's unequivocal statement that he never sexually abused either of his children opened the door for the State to rebut the false impression that he would not and did not sexually abuse his children. Vesely v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5611 (Tex. App. Tyler July 18 2007).

703. Evidence of defendant's prior conviction for delivering drugs was admissible where, through his questioning of a defense witness, defense counsel had sought to paint defendant as a "white knight" not involved with drugs, thereby creating a false impression before the jury; by doing so, defendant opened the door to testimony to correct that false impression, and the prosecutor could only correct that false impression by cross-examination of the witness who created it. Jones v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7917 (Tex. App. Dallas Sept. 5 2006).

704. Defendant on a drug delivery charge was estopped from raising on appeal any error in the admission of subsequent deliveries at the guilt phase because he admitted his guilt at the penalty phase of trial; further, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403 or Tex. R. Evid. 404 because his counsel opened the door by suggesting that defendant was only a marginal participant in the drug trade and that the charged transaction constituted his sole involvement in the drug business. Houston v. State, 208 S.W.3d 585, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3056 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

705. In a criminal trial for burglary, the court did not err by allowing a police officer to testify as to the contents of defendant's van. The testimony was needed to show that defendant was in recent possession of stolen property; the testimony was not character evidence of other crimes or wrong acts. Middleton v. State, 187 S.W.3d 134, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 578 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2006).

706. In a drug and weapons possession case, evidence that defendant lived at a house in which drugs were being manufactured was admissible to show why a police officer was watching defendant's house; thus, under the circumstances, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Summerville v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6773 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 18 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9715 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 15, 2005).

707. No reversible error was presented under Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, and 404(b) by an arresting officer's testimony that defendant told the officer during a traffic stop about defendant's prior arrests because the videotape of the stop, including defendant's own statement of the arrests, was admitted without objection under R. 402, 403, and 404(b). Tunstall v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6336 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 10 2005).

708. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the appellate court assumed the admission of pornographic photographs of adult women taken from his computer was erroneous. However, the error was harmless; the photographs were less shocking and offensive than the complainant's graphic description of the acts defendant engaged in with her and there was ample testimonial evidence of defendant's guilt. Breland v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5925 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 28 2005).

709. Trial court properly admitted evidence of an extraneous assault offense under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) where defendant's wife's testimony on behalf of the defense was an attempt to show that her injury was caused by an accident, not the intentional actions of defendant. Thus, a videotape in which defendant admitted a prior assault on his wife made the defensive theory of accident less probable and was relevant to rebut the defensive theory of accident. Iroegbu v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5296 (Tex. App. Dallas July 6 2005).

710. In a burglary case in which several houses were broken into at about the same time, the extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as same transaction contextual evidence. Trevino v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4556 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 15 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1885, 164 L. Ed. 2d 573, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 3325, 74 U.S.L.W. 3598 (U.S. 2006).

711. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of defendant's having solicited the third party to have sexual intercourse with the minor. The evidence was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, which superseded Tex. R. Evid. 404; the trial court gave a limiting instruction, minimizing any impermissible inference of character conformity. Comeaux v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3748 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 17 2005).

712. Where defendant charged with injury to a disabled person went beyond merely entering a guilty plea and cross-examined the victim in an attempt to attack her credibility, the victim's testimony that defendant had assaulted her on several occasions was admissible to show intent, opportunity, and absence of accident. Phillips v. State,

2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3035 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 21 2005).

713. During the guilt phase of defendant's trial for aggravated robbery with a deadly weapon, the trial court erred by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense for carjacking; the extraneous offense evidence was not so unusual or distinctive that it showed a unique signature crime. McKay v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2261 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 17 2005).

714. Evidence admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36 must still meet the requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Navarro v. State, 154 S.W.3d 795, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11429 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

715. In a robbery case, extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to establish defendant's identity, which was at issue because defense counsel had challenged the accuracy of the victim's identification of defendant, and the evidence was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because proper instructions were given. Thompson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11088 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 9 2004).

716. Defendant maintained that the trial court abused its discretion in allowing testimony that defendant went back to the victim's house to shoot a witness to the murder; however, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence under a same transaction analysis. Palacios v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9912 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 10 2004).

717. Defendant's argument on appeal that the trial court erred in allowing the admission of extraneous offense evidence in his case where he was charged with the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle was rejected, as defendant's failure to object to the admission of that evidence meant that he did not preserve that alleged error for review. Smith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7505 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 19 2004).

718. Where defendant's cell mate described what defendant had told him about the instant murder and also about another killing, the trial court had not erred in admitting the evidence of the other shooting because the extreme degree of similarity between the two murders made the evidence of the other murder highly probative. In addition, without evidence of defendant's involvement in the other murder, it would have been more difficult for the jury to resolve whether the cell mate was a credible witness. Corona v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5042 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 9 2004).

719. In a criminal trial, evidence of defendant's extraneous offenses was admissible to show identity since there was a discrepancy between defendant's actual weight and the description of the perpetrator's weight given to the police by an eyewitness. Page v. State, 137 S.W.3d 75, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 936 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

720. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child, defendant failed to show that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the introduction into evidence of his mental health records, which defendant claimed contained evidence of inadmissible extraneous bad conduct. Defendant was not prejudiced by counsel's actions; even without the mental health records, the victim's testimony alone would have been sufficient to support his conviction. Taylor v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4581 (Tex. App. Dallas May 20 2004).

721. Testimony concerning defendant's plans following release from jail was minimal compared to the testimony concerning the charged offenses, and it did not influence the jury or had only a slight effect; therefore, any error was rendered harmless. Ellinberg v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2753 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 26 2004).

722. Regardless of the adequacy of the notice under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the extraneous evidence was properly admitted in defendant's trial for indecency with a child under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37. Avery v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 464 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 20, 2004).

723. In a drunk driving case, it was not error for the State to place defendant's stipulation of two prior convictions, which were jurisdictional elements of a felony offense, into evidence and to mention it in closing argument; the stipulation was evidence, could be received as such by the jury as the fact finder, and did not create a risk of unfair prejudice within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b). Shugart v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 427 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 15 2004).

724. Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test is an inherent part of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Lucky v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 11 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2003).

725. In a criminal trial for defendant's charge of possession of cocaine, evidence of citations issued to the driver of the car where the offense occurred was background contextual evidence inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Lucky v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 11 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2003).

726. Background contextual evidence is not one of the "other purposes" listed in Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) justifying the introduction of otherwise inadmissible character or propensity evidence. Lucky v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 11 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2003).

727. Acts of misconduct by the defendant not necessary to the proof of the primary offense constitute background contextual evidence and are not exempt under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) from the general prohibition of the admission of character or propensity evidence against the accused set out in Tex. R. Evid. 404(a). Lucky v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 11 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2003).

728. Only if the facts and circumstances of the charged offense would make little or no sense without the introduction of the same transaction contextual evidence, should the same transaction contextual evidence be admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Lucky v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 11 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2003).

729. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) applies to other acts of third parties as well as those of the accused. Lucky v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 11 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2003).

730. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) excludes acts of persons other than the defendant that tend to show the defendant's propensity to commit the charged offenses. Lucky v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 11 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2003).

731. A defendant alleged that the fatal shot which killed his father was fired accidentally, and the evidence of a subsequent arrest, in which it took three officers to subdue the defendant, was admissible pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show the absence of an accident, where the victim could not have possibly taken the gun away from the defendant or caused it to discharge as the result of a struggle. Skeen v. State, 96 S.W.3d 567, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 8181 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2002).

732. Testimony that an area is a high crime area is admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as facts and circumstances surrounding the commission of the offense. Charlot v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 5736 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 1999).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Limited Admissibility

733. During defendant's trial for the aggravated robbery of an elderly person, the jury was instructed to consider extraneous offense evidence only in determining the plan, identity, or absence of mistake by defendant in connection with the offense; defendant was not entitled to reversal on appeal; the trial court properly limited the jury's consideration of the evidence to a permissible purpose. Jaramillo v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7440 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 12 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : General Overview

734. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault, the State gave notice of its intention to use evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant and the trial court admitted the evidence. Because defendant did not object on the ground that the State's notice was untimely, the issue was not preserved for review. Foxworth v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7728 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2005).

735. Faced with an objection, the proponent of the evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts must satisfy the trial court that the extraneous act has relevance apart from its tendency to prove character conformity. "Other crimes, wrongs, or acts evidence" has noncharacter-conformity relevance where it logically serves to make less probable defensive evidence that undermines an elemental fact. Harris v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7666 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2004).

736. Defendant's argument on appeal that the trial court erred in allowing the admission of extraneous offense evidence in his case where he was charged with the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle was rejected, as defendant's failure to object to the admission of that evidence meant that he did not preserve that alleged error for review. Smith v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7505 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 19 2004).

737. After the trial court overruled an appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection, the appellant was required to make further objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in order to preserve the complaint for review. Mark v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 879 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 30 2003).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Offers of Proof

738. Defendant's contention that the trial court erred by not allowing her to present testimony regarding her drinking habits was rejected because she testified without objection that she always carried cash for a taxi, had a taxi cab company programmed into her telephone, or shared a ride with another person, and counsel did not make an offer of proof regarding any additional evidence to be admitted. Pierce v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9876 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 7 2013).

739. Defendant adequately preserved error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 as to the exclusion of character evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and satisfied Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(2), even though he did not make an offer of proof, because counsel told the trial court that he wanted to elicit evidence of defendant's reputation for the ethical treatment of children; accordingly, the nature of the disputed evidence was apparent to all. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9788 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 9 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Preliminary Questions : General Overview

740. In an assault trial, the court did not err by admitting, without notice from the State, evidence of defendant's extraneous assault offense; the evidence was introduced by defendant, with additional testimony elicited by the State on rebuttal. Jordan v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4593 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Preliminary Questions : Admissibility of Evidence : General Overview

741. Complainant initially told her school counselor that defendant had touched her inappropriately; however, the complainant testified at trial that she had made up the scenario; a videotape of complainant was admissible because defendant's attorney opened the door, and moreover, defendant failed to object that admission of the videotape was improper impeachment evidence; rather, defendant objected that the videotape was prior bad acts evidence. Roberts v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6214 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 7 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Rulings on Evidence

742. At defendant's trial for failure to comply with sex offender registration requirements, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling his objections to the admission of evidence of an extraneous bad act under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); the evidence that defendant moved several times while continuing to report his previous address to local law enforcement authorities had substantial probative value as to his knowledge of the reporting requirements and his intent respecting compliance. Hogan v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6706 (Tex. App. Dallas May 30 2013).

743. In a case in which defendant was convicted of cocaine possession, a probation officer's testimony did not place defendant's drug use in the context of his operation of the vehicle in which the cocaine was found because, insofar as it served to prove defendant's knowing possession of cocaine on the date of the instant offense, it did so only by showing that defendant was a chronic drug abuser, i.e., by character conformity. However, in light of the other evidence properly admitted, the admission of the probation officer's testimony did not affect defendant's substantial rights pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Bell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9034, 2010 WL 4595704 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 9 2010).

744. Defendant had not preserved for appellate review his complaint concerning the timeliness of the State's notice of its intent to introduce evidence of extraneous offenses during trial where defendant objected to the reasonableness of the State's notice, but he did not request that the trial court grant him a continuance. In any event, it could not be said that the trial court abused its discretion when it overruled defendant's objection to the reasonableness of the State's notice under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 3 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the trial court could have determined that the State's notice was adequate and reasonable under the circumstances of the case. Greer v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5632, 2010 WL 2813404 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2010).

745. Tape-recorded evidence of defendant's various extraneous crimes was improperly admitted during his capital murder trial because the prosecution did not comply with the notice provisions of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). His conviction was affirmed, however, because under the Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) harm standard, the error in admitting the evidence did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict. Hernandez v. State, 176 S.W.3d 821, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1857 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

746. Where defendant charged with injury to a disabled person went beyond merely entering a guilty plea and cross-examined the victim in an attempt to attack her credibility, the victim's testimony that defendant had assaulted her on several occasions was admissible to show intent, opportunity, and absence of accident. Phillips v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3035 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 21 2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Weight & Sufficiency

747. Defendant's conviction for engaging in organized crime was proper because the nonaccomplice evidence placed defendant at or near the scene of the crime at or about the time of its commission under suspicious circumstances and because, although the forensic examiner testified that he did not know who actually sent or received the text messages, the circumstances were sufficient to allow a jury reasonably to find that defendant sent and received the messages. Because intent to commit forgery could not be inferred, the prior conviction showing strikingly similar facts made the existence of a material fact, that was, whether defendant possessed forged checks with the intent to defraud or harm another, more probable, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) Franklin v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8513 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 10 2012).

Evidence : Relevance : Character Evidence

748. Exclusion of character evidence that a murder victim occasionally drank to excess and was violent when he drank was harmless error, given that defendant was able to present his defense that the victim was drunk and pulled a shotgun on defendant, which defendant then used to kill the victim. Milliff v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4589, 2014 WL 1713897 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 29 2014).

749. Even if the victim's conduct at the car dealership showed her ability to "intimidate, harass, manipulate, and physically abuse" defendant, the conduct was not relevant because it did not involve the victim injuring herself or fabricating allegations that defendant injured her. It, therefore, was not relevant evidence essential to prove the theory of defense, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the witness's testimony. Vasquez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3714, 2014 WL 1413809 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 7 2014).

750. In a case in which a jury found defendant guilty of continuous sexual abuse of his eight-year-old stepdaughter, the trial court did not err in not allowing defendant's uncle to testify that defendant was not the kind of person who would molest a child. This was an impermissible attempt to put on evidence of specific instances of conduct to support the inference that it was unlikely the accused would have engaged in the criminal conduct charged. Hernandez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 162, 2014 WL 50544 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 7 2014).

751. Even though the trial court err by excluding the portion of defendant's testimony regarding the victim's prior specific instances of violence against her to support her claim of self-defense, the error was harmless because defendant admitting yelling at the victim because she was mad at him, which led to an argument, and she slapped him during the argument. Defendant was permitted to testify that she was afraid of the victim and she had slapped him because she was scared. Rodriguez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14876, 2013 WL 6533378 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 11 2013).

752. In a murder trial, the trial court properly determined that the victim's action of rising from a chair and reaching for a knife was an unambiguous aggressive act and therefore evidence of the victim's character and prior acts of violence was not necessary to explain his actions. Johnson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12819, 2013 WL 5657425 (Tex. App. Tyler Oct. 16 2013).

753. Defendant's contention that the trial court erred by not allowing her to present testimony regarding her drinking habits was rejected because she testified without objection that she always carried cash for a taxi, had a taxi cab company programmed into her telephone, or shared a ride with another person, and counsel did not make an offer of proof regarding any additional evidence to be admitted. Pierce v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9876 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 7 2013).

754. Because evidence of the investigation into the arresting officer was not admissible under this rule, as the investigation about whether the officer had violated the Occupations Code had no bearing on his propensity for violence or whether he was the first aggressor, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that defendant did not establish a Brady violation. Smith v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9194 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 25 2013).

755. Evidence unambiguously established that defendant's husband was the first aggressor, and apart from establishing this, defendant did not suggest that the evidence in question was otherwise admissible for non-character purposes such as intent, motive, or state of mind, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(a). Perusquia v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7154 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 12 2013).

756. It was clear from the record that the trial court's ruling on the motion in limine permitted testimony that the victim suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), but the trial court intended to exclude evidence that his actions were a result of his PTSD diagnosis without expert testimony; the court found no waiver of appellant's complaint on appeal, and although appellant might have made an offer of proof concerning how the victim's PTSD diagnosis related to her belief of his actions on the day in question, such an offer was not necessary because counsel made the trial court aware of the content of the testimony. Strache v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6494 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 29 2013).

757. Although appellant was not permitted to testify in detail about the victim's diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), she was permitted to testify that he was so diagnosed and appellant's knowledge of such, along with the victim's prior violent acts, led appellant to fear for her safety and act in self-defense; she cited case law noting that a defendant could offer evidence of acts of violence by the victim to show the reasonableness of a claim of apprehension of danger, and as appellant was permitted to adequately present her claim of self-defense in her assault-bodily injury-married trial based on her knowledge of the victim's PTSD, the court overruled her issue. Strache v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6494 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 29 2013).

758. Assuming character evidence was relevant, the error in excluding it was subject to a harm analysis for nonconstitutional error. Bundick v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4350 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 4 2013).

759. Assuming evidence was relevant, appellant did not provide a harm analysis, and the court could not find from its own review that the error, if any, had a substantial effect on the verdict, given that the State made a strong case for appellant's guilt, which evidence included eyewitness testimony that appellant fired a gun that killed the victim, as well as the victim's dying declaration that identified appellant as the shooter; the excluded testimony tried to establish a history of conflict between appellant and one witness, and while appellant discussed Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2), this applied to one who raised self-defense, which appellant did not, and nothing showed that the victim or witness had been carrying a gun. Bundick v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4350 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 4 2013).

760. Appellant argued that the evidence the trial court excluded about an extraneous act of violence the victim allegedly committed was relevant and admissible for showing that appellant reasonably believed his life was in danger, and to be admissible for showing state of mind for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36, appellant had to have known of the act of the victim before the murder; appellant was aware of the victim's specific extraneous act, as appellant offered testimony that he heard the victim shot appellant's friend, but even assuming it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of the misconduct of the victim, appellant did not show harm and the court did not find any. Flores v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9785, 2012 WL 5951977 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 29 2012).

761. Appellant argued that the evidence the trial court excluded, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36, about an extraneous act of violence the victim allegedly committed, amounted to constitutional error, but the court disagreed; appellant was not precluded from presenting his defense, and thus the court analyzed the claim under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Flores v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9785, 2012 WL 5951977 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 29 2012).

762. Jury was properly instructed on self-defense, and the facts did not show aggression by the victim that would have justified appellant's use of deadly force, and thus appellant was not harmed by the exclusion of the evidence about an extraneous act of violence the victim allegedly committed, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36; the specific misconduct of the victim that was excluded, that appellant heard the victim shot someone, did nothing more than add to the existing proof of the victim's bad reputation and that appellant was afraid of him, the exclusion of further evidence of the victim's criminal history would have been harmless, and appellant's substantial rights were not affected. Flores v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9785, 2012 WL 5951977 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 29 2012).

763. Appellant wanted to offer evidence of specific instances of conduct of the victim, but he was not entitled to offer evidence of any specific prior violent acts in order to show the victim was the first aggressor; the proffered testimony was an attempt to prove the victim's conduct in conformity with his character for violence, which was prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 404(a), 405(a). Bottorff v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8220, 2012 WL 4477396 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 28 2012).

764. Incidents about which appellant wanted to introduce testimony did not implicate himself, and the victim did not make any threat toward him, nor did the victim's prior conduct show that he had any animosity toward appellant, and the evidence was not probative of the victim's state of mind as it related to the situation with appellant two years after the incidents took place, given that before the shooting, the two did not know each other; while appellant could introduce reputation or opinion testimony suggesting the victim was the first aggressor, appellant could not introduce specific acts because that was not admissible for these purposes, and nothing showed that the proffered testimony would have been relevant for any purpose besides character conformity, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Bottorff v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8220, 2012 WL 4477396 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 28 2012).

765. In defendant's murder case, the court did not erroneously exclude evidence regarding the victim's violent character because the evidence did not tend to show that the victim was the first aggressor; the fact that victim once told a witness that he would "take care of her husband and brother if they came looking for her" did not serve to demonstrate the victim's intent the night of the murder. Defendant's preferred testimony that the victim was a member of a prison gang that was "running fast" and "doing hits" was similarly irrelevant other than to show the victim's character conformity. Vasquez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7428, 2012 WL 6863860 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 27 2012).

766. In a murder trial, it was error to exclude evidence of defendant's peaceful character through a friend who had known him for almost 30 years. Turner v. State, 413 S.W.3d 442, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6619 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 9 2012).

767. Appellant's affiliation with the Aryan Brotherhood was relevant and the probative value of such evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because appellant's membership in the gang and his obligation to follow a higher-ranking member's orders were relevant to show appellant's motive for the crime. Evidence of appellant's membership in the Aryan Brotherhood was offered to show appellant's motive, was not introduced to show character conformity, did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 404, and was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Guffey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3293, 2012 WL 1470185 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 26 2012).

768. State was allowed to rebut testimony about appellant's character for truthfulness by asking about specific conduct instances, and appellant did not claim they were irrelevant, and they shared many similarities; the court is aware of no authority that restricts the State from asking whether the witness had heard that the defendant was convicted of a particular crime. Ethridge v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3110, 2012 WL 1379648 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 18 2012).

769. Challenged evidence concerning appellant's sexually-oriented emails and alleged fantasizing about his stepdaughter was admissible as rebuttal, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(1)(A), as appellant had testified about his own good conduct involving his stepdaughter. Zavala v. State, 401 S.W.3d 171, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8671, 2011 WL 5156843 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2011).

770. There was no error regarding character evidence made in this case during the prosecutor's argument. Baines v. State, 401 S.W.3d 104, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1694, 2011 WL 816810 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 10 2011).

771. State did not use the photograph to prove defendant's gang activity; the photograph was admitted to prove defendant's identity as the assailant and it was properly admitted to prove the identity of the perpetrator of the crime, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b).

772. Even though the trial court erred by refusing defendant's request to redact his medical records to delete the doctor's diagnosis of cocaine abuse and drug abuse-marijuana, as it constituted inadmissible character-conformity evidence, the error was harmless because it did not substantially affect the verdict, as there was other evidence, including the results of a urinalysis and defendant's statements to hospital staff that he used crack cocaine and had smoked three or four rocks that day, revealing defendant's drug use. Montgomery v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9220, 2010 WL 4668952 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 18 2010).

773. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred by refusing to allow him to question the victim about a juvenile felony theft conviction because defendant did not inform the trial court that he was seeking admission of the evidence pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2). Soto v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8709, 2010 WL 4273173 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 29 2010).

774. Error was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 in a negligence case with regard to spoliation of evidence in the context of a venue transfer and the admission of character evidence at trial because no request was made to deem venue facts established as a sanction for discovery misconduct under Tex. R. Civ. P. 215.2(b)(3) and no objections were raised to the admission of testimony reflecting on character under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a), (b). Duff v. Spearman, 322 S.W.3d 869, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7420 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

775. Even if the trial court abused its discretion by refusing to allow defendant to present evidence that the victim had previously threatened two witnesses, the error did not amount to reversible error because defendant was able to present his defense, as the jury was properly instructed on the law of self-defense and defendant was testified about prior threats the victim had made to him and about the circumstances of the shooting; other witnesses also testified about threats the victim had allegedly made. There was also evidence presented contradicting defendant's self-defense claim, including evidence that: (1) defendant had threatened to kill the victim shortly before the victim was shot; (2) no evidence showed that the victim was armed or attempted to use deadly force; (3) none of the witnesses that were in the area when the shooting occurred or that responded to the scene reported seeking a sniper; and (4) when defendant drove to the sheriff's office and admitted that he shot the victim, he did not mention a sniper. Currin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7051, 2010 WL 3370059 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 27 2010).

776. Evidence of the victim's extraneous offenses should have been allowed, Tex. R. Evid. 403, but because defendant denied hitting the victim with the baseball bat, he could not have employed the theory of self-defense for that part of the alleged assault; the trial court was free to disbelieve defendant's assertion that he only punched the victim once and that he did not hit him with the baseball bat, and the jury was free to believe the victim's testimony that defendant was the first aggressor. Tomasheski v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4709, 2010 WL 2512618 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 23 2010).

777. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a) in not allowing defense witnesses to testify that defendant had good character and propensity for moral and safe relations with small children or young girls; the questions were an impermissible attempt to put on evidence of specific instances of good conduct to support the inference that it was unlikely that defendant touched the victim inappropriately. Fernandez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2628, 2010 WL 1486971 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 15 2010).

778. Court properly excluded character evidence because defendant testified that the victim told him "he's been in a lot of fights and that he's been in trouble for fighting." That general statement was not sufficient to establish that defendant was aware that the victim had committed an assault for which he was placed on deferred adjudication community supervision. Evans v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 810, 2010 WL 376940 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 3 2010).

779. Defendant opened the door to testimony concerning the victim's peaceable and inoffensive nature by eliciting evidence regarding the possibility that the victim had been fighting or arguing before the murder; even if it was assumed that the victim was the one referred to in certain excerpts, the State was entitled to offer a 911 tape as rebuttal evidence, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a). Green v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9300, 2009 WL 4575146 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 8 2009).

780. In defendant's sexual assault case, evidence was improperly excluded because there was no allegation that the evidence was self-serving or unreliable. The evidence was relevant to the complaining witness's credibility, and further, the State failed to show how the probative value of the evidence was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. State v. Moreno, 297 S.W.3d 512, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7642 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

781. In a case in which defendant was convicted of murder, defendant did not prove by a preponderance of the evidence that his trial counsel's representation was deficient where, although he claimed that trial counsel did not call witnesses who would have supported his contention that his cousin killed the victim, it could not be said that counsel was ineffective for failing to attempt to introduce evidence that was inadmissible because: (1) neither the witnesses nor the proffered testimony attacked the cousin's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, nor did their testimony establish he had been convicted of a crime within the parameters of Tex. R. Evid. 609; and (2) as to testimony by defendant's grandmother and uncle about what the cousin's father told them, that evidence was clearly hearsay, and defendant did not demonstrate on the record any exception that would have permitted the admission of those statements. Moreover, defendant did not establish that, but for his counsel's failure to call the witnesses, there was a reasonable probability the result of the proceeding would have been different because there were three eyewitnesses to the murder, one of whom had no relationship to anyone other than the victim, and therefore no motive to lie, and his testimony was corroborated by the other two eyewitnesses. Aquino v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7391, 2009 WL 3030749 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 23 2009).

782. In defendant's murder case, the court properly excluded evidence that the victim purportedly was always armed with a gun because defendant failed to satisfy his burden of producing evidence demonstrating his shooting of the victim stemmed from a reasonable belief that the victim was attempting to use unlawful deadly force at that exact moment, the two had no prior relationship, and the trial court did permit defendant to establish that the victim's reputation in the community for violence was bad. Welch v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6292, 2009 WL 2461172 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 12 2009).

783. Court did not err by refusing to allow defense counsel to cross-examine a police officer about prior incidents in which the officer allegedly used excessive force because the officer's character was not an essential element of the charge, claim, or defense to attempting to take a weapon from a peace officer, and the proffered testimony was not material because it did not address any fact of importance to the outcome of the action. Rico v. State, 2009 Tex.

App. LEXIS 4141, 2009 WL 1623343 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 11 2009).

784. Court properly excluded testimony from third parties establishing defendant's knowledge of the complainant's propensity for violence because a witness testified that she saw the complainant hit her mother multiple times, she and other family members had called the police multiple times regarding the complainant's domestic violence, and defendant told a witness after the shooting that defendant thought the complainant was trying to hurt him. Segovia v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4559, 2009 WL 1678024 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 9 2009).

785. While petitioner state inmate argued his counsel was ineffective for not presenting additional witnesses to show the 9-year-old victim of his sexual assault was motivated to lie in retaliation for the inmate having disciplined the victim, nothing showed such testimony would have been admissible since, consistent with Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and a pre trial order, defense counsel and defense witnesses were precluded from mentioning, directly or indirectly, any specific instance of conduct by the victim without first approaching the bench; under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), specific instances of conduct could be used to establish that a witness had specific bias, self-interest, or motive for testifying, and under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), specific acts of misconduct could also be used to establish a person's motive for performing an act, such as making a false allegation, but where credibility was concerned, a witness's general character for truthfulness could be shown only through reputation or opinion testimony under Rule 608(a). Mendez v. Quarterman, 625 F. Supp. 2d 415, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47543 (S.D. Tex. June 4 2009).

787. State argued that, since defendant never obtained a ruling on his motion for discovery asking the State to disclose its intent to use extraneous offense evidence, the State had no duty to do so, but the court did not need to address the State's position because the duty was imposed by the trial court's granting of the motion in limine and admonishment to the State to warn its witnesses not to discuss any extraneous offense evidence without prior ruling from the court. State v. Clayton, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 906, 2009 WL 322869 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 11 2009).

788. By arguing that a witness's insertion of an extraneous offense denied defendant the constitutionally protected right of a criminal defendant to a fair and impartial trial, as is required in order to obtain due process, defendant articulated a valid claim in his motion for new trial. State v. Clayton, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 906, 2009 WL 322869 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 11 2009).

789. Defendant's claim that a witness's insertion of an extraneous offense denied defendant the constitutionally protected right of a criminal defendant to a fair and impartial trial was substantiated by evidence in the record. State v. Clayton, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 906, 2009 WL 322869 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 11 2009).

790. Both character evidence in the form of opinion testimony and extraneous-offense testimony may be admissible during trial, even if the opinion testimony is based on facts brought forth from the extraneous-offense testimony. Sims v. State, 273 S.W.3d 291, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 820 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

791. In defendant's unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon case, the court did not err by allowing the State to ask a witness whether she knew defendant was a convicted sex offender because inquiry into the nature of the relationship between defendant and a witness was relevant to show potential bias by the witness or challenge the witness's credibility; additionally, any error was harmless; in the jury's presence, the parties stipulated to the admission into evidence of records pertaining to defendant's conviction for failure to register as a sex offender. Tapps v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2809 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 17 2008).

792. Evidence of a defendant's previous drug sales was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404 at his trial for possession of methamphetamine with intent to deliver because this evidence belied his defense that he was unaware of the large amount of methamphetamine hidden in a motel room registered in his name, and it showed his awareness of the drug and his intent to sell it. Hernandez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2634 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 11 2008).

793. Because defendant did not assert in the trial court that certain records constituted inadmissible character evidence, defendant forfeited that complaint under Tex. R. App. P. 33; furthermore, when making objections, defendant agreed that the records were business records, but appeared to argue that they contained double hearsay, but defendant failed to specify or identify the objectionable part of the exhibit, and thus the objections were insufficiently specific to have preserved the hearsay complaint defendant also made on appeal. Starn v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2402 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 3 2008).

794. Trial court's decision to admit the testimony of defendant's two adult stepchildren concerning sexual abuse was not an abuse of discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 404 because the challenged testimony was offered to rebut character evidence presented by defendant. Green v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2135 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 26 2008).

795. Defendant was not substantially harmed by the trial court's error in admitting a witness's reputation testimony because evidence of the victim's character as a peaceful person was properly presented to the jury. Cruz v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9002 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 15 2007).

796. In an action against the owner of a corporation for breach of an employment contract and breach of a stock option agreement, a trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony as to the owner's dishonest character because the owner himself was a witness and thus his credibility was at issue. Simplified Dev. Corp. v. Garfield, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8840 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 6 2007).

797. It was not an error for the trial court to overrule defendant's objections, during the punishment phase, to questions the State asked a witness regarding a criminal charge against defendant that had been dismissed because by raising the defensive theory that defendant was a nice guy or of good character, defendant, through the witness, opened the door for the State to cross-examine the witness regarding an extraneous offense if the extraneous offense would tend to correct the false impression left by the witness's direct examination. Romero v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7552 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 24 2006).

798. Appellate court held the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding testimony by defendant's father about defendant's use of firearms as the testimony did not offer evidence of a pertinent character trait of defendant. Townsend v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4929 (Tex. App. Eastland June 8 2006).

799. In a trial for a mother's sexual abuse of her son, it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to admit evidence that defendant had been a victim of sexual assault as a child to show that she was more likely to commit the offense; the error was harmful under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 and Tex. R. Evid. 103 because it was a close case resolved by a credibility determination between the child and defendant. Kirby v. State, 208 S.W.3d 568, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2785 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

800. Drug use is not an essential element of the crime of possession of a controlled substance; a defendant may not, therefore, use specific instances of drug use; rather, he may only use reputation or opinion testimony to prove his good character. Norton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2006).

801. Although the husband claimed that expert testimony should have been excluded because it contained improper character evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the husband opened the door during direct examination, and because the witness was offered as an expert witness, the wife was permitted, under Tex. R. Evid. 705(a) to disclose the underlying facts the witness used to form an opinion regarding the husband. Moyer v. Moyer, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6966 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 26 2005).

802. In a murder case, any prejudice caused by the admission of defendant's extraneous offense was cured by the trial court's instruction; the State brought attention to the extraneous offense on only one occasion where it asked a witness if she knew that defendant had been convicted of a felony, after the witness had voiced a favorable opinion of defendant's character. That question was followed immediately by a sustained objection and a curative instruction by the trial court. Nickleson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6658 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 18 2005).

803. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the appellate court assumed the admission of pornographic photographs of adult women taken from his computer was erroneous. However, the error was harmless; the photographs were less shocking and offensive than the complainant's graphic description of the acts defendant engaged in with her and there was ample testimonial evidence of defendant's guilt. Breland v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5925 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 28 2005).

804. Defendant did not place character or reputation at issue through a particular witness's testimony, and thus the State should not have been allowed, under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a), 404(a)(1), to ask the witness "were you aware" questions, and although the court did not approve of the prosecution's arguments, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the error probably did not influence the jury or had only a slight influence on the jury's verdict. Harrison v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5705 (Tex. App. Waco July 20 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at, review dismissed by 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8654 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 19, 2005).

805. Trial court erred in admitting evidence that was probative only of defendant's character and propensity to sexually assault children because the extraneous offense against a different victim did not fall within the false impression exception, nor was the evidence relevant to prove a material issue such as motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake, however, the error was harmless because it probably did not influence the jury or had only a slight influence on its verdict. The alleged victim testified that defendant sexually assaulted her, which was corroborated by the pediatric nurse who examined her, one inmate testified that he heard defendant acknowledge sexually assaulting the victim and a second inmate testified, without objection, that defendant boasted of having sex with minor girls. Tipton v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 871 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 2 2005).

806. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit evidence of the victim's violent character under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2), 405(a) in connection with defendant's murder trial; defendant failed to provide any evidence that connected the victim's previous violent acts with the events leading up to the victim's murder or any evidence that shed light on the victim's state of mind or intention in inciting the altercation with defendant. Toledo v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9596 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 28 2004).

807. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the testimony of eight witnesses who, according to defendant, would have described events that occurred in the days and weeks before the shooting. None of the witnesses at trial described any aggressive action by the victim close to the time of the shooting, and because the evidence did not raise the issue of self-defense, the excluded testimony was not relevant. Wortham v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8810 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 30 2004).

808. Trial court abused its discretion in a murder trial in permitting the State to introduce evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) that, two years earlier, defendant had forced the victim out of his car during an argument; however, the incident was not probative of defendant's motive and intent under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and was not proper rebuttal evidence under Rule 404(a)(1)(A), but the error was harmful under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given the emphasis placed on the incident and the fact that the evidence of defendant's guilt was circumstantial and not overwhelming.

809. In a criminal prosecution for endangering a child arising from the sexual assault of defendant's two children by her live-in boyfriend, the trial court properly overruled defendant's objection to the prosecutor's remarks during opening statement that the two fathers of the victims were incarcerated where the prosecutor's remarks were improper character evidence, not within the exceptions provided by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Naivar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4883 (Tex. App. Tyler May 28 2004).

810. In a case where defendant was charged with fleeing from police, evidence that defendant was found underneath a house when officers tried to serve a warrant for arrest was properly admitted by a trial court because it tended to prove knowledge of guilt; even if the admission was erroneous, it was disregarded on appeal since defendant's substantial rights were not affected; it would have been difficult to explain the circumstances of the arrest without such evidence, and the State did not mention the evidence in its final argument. Jacobs v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4239 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 11 2004).

811. In a criminal prosecution for murder where defendant claimed self-defense, the trial court properly excluded evidence of the victim's previous violent acts against people other than defendant. Defendant offered the previous violent acts only for the purpose of demonstrating that the victim had acted in conformity with his violent character in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404. Deavila v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3562 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 22 2004).

812. In defendant's retaliation case, the State's objections to defendant's offer of opinion evidence of his good character for being peaceful and law-abiding were properly sustained where the court did permit reputation evidence, and the defendant did not suggest how opinion evidence would have been preferable to reputation evidence; defendant's "substantial rights" were not affected by the limitation of evidence to reputation evidence. Moore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3017 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Waco July 21, 2004), substituted opinion at 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

813. Where the record showed that defendant and the intended victim engaged in an altercation, which left a bystander dead, and defendant claimed self-defense in shooting at the intended victim, defendant's manslaughter conviction was affirmed; the exclusion of testimony about extraneous acts of aggression by the intended victim was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2) where defendant failed to show that he had any knowledge of those violent acts, and therefore the acts could not have influenced defendant's state of mind. Hayes v. State, 124 S.W.3d 781, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9841 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003), affirmed by 161 S.W.3d 507, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 652 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

814. Defendant's manslaughter conviction was affirmed where the exclusion of testimony about extraneous acts of aggression by the intended victim was proper; defendant could have introduced character evidence suggesting that the intended victim was the aggressor, but he could not have introduced evidence of the specific acts and events where such evidence was not admissible for other purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Hayes v. State, 124 S.W.3d 781, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9841 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003), affirmed by 161 S.W.3d 507, 2005

Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 652 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

815. Evidence that a witness feared for her life because the deceased victim had told her that if she did not tell him where his girlfriend was, he would hurt her and her children, should not have been excluded from defendant's murder trial because, as defendant's defense was that he acted in self-defense, he was permitted, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2), to introduce evidence of his victim's violent character as long as there was some evidence of aggression by the victim before the introduction of the character evidence and, in defendant's trial, before the witness was called to testify, there was evidence that the victim had climbed up a balcony, uninvited, early in the morning, which was an act of aggression by the victim that tended to raise the issue of self defense. Torres v. State, 117 S.W.3d 891, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 595 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003).

816. Defendant should have been permitted to introduce evidence of his victim's character in support of his claim of self-defense pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2) because, as evidence had been admitted that the victim had engaged in an act of aggression by climbing up a balcony, uninvited, early in the morning, it was not necessary for defendant to also provide evidence of a "fray" between himself and the victim before the introduction of the character evidence. Torres v. State, 117 S.W.3d 891, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 595 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003).

817. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), defendant charged with assault of a child after spanking the child with an extension cord was not prejudiced when the trial court erroneously excluded school records showing the child's disciplinary record; although the records were relevant to defendant's claim that he disciplined the way he did based on the child's continuing trouble at school, the error was harmless because defendant was able to establish the same thing through other means. Davis v. State, 104 S.W.3d 177, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 2709 (Tex. App. Waco 2003).

818. Where a victim's unambiguous, violent or aggressive act needs no explaining, evidence of the victim's extraneous conduct admitted in conjunction with his unambiguous act has no relevance apart from its tendency to prove the victim's character conformity, and thus is inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Reyna v. State, 99 S.W.3d 344, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1391 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

819. While inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(1), specific acts of good conduct may be admissible before the sentencing court under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) to prove a defendant's good character. Monarrez v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 997 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2003).

820. Criminal defendant's trial counsel was not deficient for failing to call witnesses to testify as to specific instances of good conduct, which would be in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(1) as proof of character may only be admitted at trial in the form of reputation or opinion testimony. Monarrez v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 997 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2003).

821. Where a defendant was a passenger in a vehicle whose driver was arrested for driving while intoxicated and possession of marijuana, at defendant's trial on a charge of possession of marijuana, the evidence of the driver's conduct was inadmissible extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), which applied to the conduct of third parties. Castaldo v. State, 78 S.W.3d 345, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 138 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002).

822. Where a defendant was a passenger in a vehicle whose driver was arrested for driving while intoxicated and possession of marijuana, at defendant's trial on a charge of possession of marijuana, the evidence of defendant's alcohol intoxication was admissible as same transaction contextual evidence and no limiting instruction was required. Castaldo v. State, 78 S.W.3d 345, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 138 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002).

823. Reason that Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) prohibits using evidence of acts to prove character, even when character is at issue under one of the three exceptions in Rule 404(a), is the danger of prejudice outweighing probative value. Castaldo v. State, 78 S.W.3d 345, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 138 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002).

824. Danger of prejudice to a defendant is usually highest when evidence of defendant's extraneous acts is offered to prove that defendant acted in the same way in the offense on trial. The danger of prejudice may be much lower when evidence of a third party's extraneous acts is offered. Castaldo v. State, 78 S.W.3d 345, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 138 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002).

825. Where defendant offered to stipulate that jurisdictional convictions existed, the probative value of evidence of the same convictions was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, and under Tex. R. Evid. 403, admission of defendant's prior DWI convictions was error; thus, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 2(a), the conviction should not be based on the assumption that the accused was a criminal generally or that he was a person of bad character. Robles v. State, 85 S.W.3d 211, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 97 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002).

826. If an objection is made to extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the proponent of the evidence must persuade the trial court that the evidence has relevance apart from character conformity or that it tends to establish some elemental fact such as identity or intent; that it tends to establish some evidentiary fact such as motive, opportunity, or preparation leading inferentially to an elemental fact; or that it rebuts a defensive theory, such as the absence of mistake or accident. Abshire v. State, 62 S.W.3d 857, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 7862 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2001).

827. "Propensity rule" contained in Tex. R. Evid. 404 regarding character evidence was not available to defendant because Tex. R. Evid. 404 did not govern the admission of character evidence in a capital trial. Jackson v. State, 992 S.W.2d 469, 1999 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 42 (Tex. Crim. App. 1999).

Evidence : Relevance : Compromise & Settlement Negotiations

828. In a drug case, in light of the offense charged and the evidence adduced at trial, the evidence that defendant possessed a bogus license did not unfairly prejudice the jury or confuse the issues. Accordingly, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence. Gregory v. State, 159 S.W.3d 254, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1660 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

829. Court did not err in refusing to exclude the extraneous offense testimony to rebut a defensive theory of fabrication, because the extraneous evidence tended to make the defensive claim of fabrication less probable, and the extraneous offense evidence was probative to rebut defendant's defensive theories that defendant was not the type of person who would sexually abuse a child and that the abuse allegations were fabricated. Shockley v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8345, 2014 WL 3756301 (Tex. App. Dallas July 30 2014).

830. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of the victim's half-sister about sexual abuse that defendant had inflicted upon her under this rule because it tended to rebut defendant's theory that the victim had fabricated her claims and there were similarities between defendant's conduct as described by both. The prejudicial effect of the testimony did not substantially outweigh its probative value because it was not so graphic as to be worse than the specifics to which the victim had already testified. Hosey v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7876, 2014 WL 3621796 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 23 2014).

831. Murder victim's girlfriend was properly allowed to testify regarding an attempted drive-by shooting defendant committed against the victim, during which she was shot in the hand, and which occurred ten months before the murder, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Jones v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7739, 2014 WL 3556587 (Tex. App. Waco July 17 2014).

832. Any error in the trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding the victim's prior acts because, even though the evidence was relevant to show the victim's tendency to provoke fights, the evidence already admitted showed that the victim was being combative and aggressive with defendant on the day in question. Waggoner v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4983 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 8 2014).

833. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of a robbery allegedly committed by defendant two days prior to the charged offense, because the similarities in the proximity of time and setting, the mode of commission of the two offenses, and the victims' similar descriptions of the robber and his hoodie constituted sufficiently distinguishing characteristics to allow the evidence as evidence of identity. Collins v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3549, 2014 WL 1318882 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2014).

834. Admission of the extraneous evidence was not improper under this rule because it was strikingly similar to the charged offense, it tended to prove he did not have the physical inability he claimed, absent the evidence of defendant's past conduct the State had no way to rebut defendant's claim of physical inability, any prejudice was limited by the trial court's limiting instructions, and the presentation of the evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Arteaga v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2434, 2014 WL 866461 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 5 2014).

835. In the murder case, the court did not abuse its discretion by sustaining the State's objection to a photograph showing the deceased's gang affiliation because the picture depicting a memorial to the deceased did not indicate he was violent and the photograph would have been cumulative. Wilson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 918, 2014 WL 310117 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2014).

836. In the murder case, the court did not abuse its discretion by sustaining the State's objection to a photograph showing the deceased's gang affiliation because the picture depicting a memorial to the deceased did not indicate he was violent and the photograph would have been cumulative. Wilson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 918, 2014 WL 310117 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2014).

837. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's prior conviction of unlawfully carrying a weapon because it was relevant to rebutting his defensive theory of insanity, the trial court instructed the jury not to consider that as evidence he was guilty of the charged offense, and the State only asked two questions about the prior crime, one of which the jury was instructed to disregard. Thomas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14744, 2013 WL 6405479 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 5 2013).

838. Trial court did not err in admitting testimony showing that defendant was the driver of a vehicle involved in a drive-by shooting four days before the alleged victim was shot because the evidence was probative to show opportunity and identity and to rebut defendant's defensive theory that he was not the perpetrator, and there was nothing confusing or misleading about the evidence. Williams v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14602, 2013 WL 6253764 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 4 2013).

839. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence because in light of the defensive theory to attack State's evidence, evidence that defendant chewed and destroyed crack cocaine during a prior traffic stop increased the likelihood that defendant did the same during the instant traffic stop. The court could not hold that the probative value of showing a lack of accident or mistake was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or the misleading nature of the evidence. Williams v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12925, 2013 WL 5676226 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 17 2013).

840. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses committed against his younger stepdaughter because they were so intertwined with the sexual assaults against the older stepdaughter that the jury's understanding of the offenses would have been obscured without them. The evidence also rebutted the defensive theory of fabrication, was sufficiently similar to the charged offense, and only limited details were introduced. Campos v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9593 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 1 2013).

841. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by permitting State to introduce evidence of sexual assault of one victim by accomplice because the facts of the case would have been incomplete and difficult to follow had it been excised from the sequence of events, as it occurred while other victim was being killed and before first victim was kidnapped and locked in her car. The probative force of the evidence and the State's need for the evidence favored admission and it took minimal time to develop. Smith v. State, 424 S.W.3d 588, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9093, 2013 WL 3832691 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 25 2013).

842. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant's statement to a witness who had been in jail with him before the trial, that defendant was the "shooter," where the State did not offer the inmate's testimony as evidence of an extraneous offense separate and apart from the charged offense but, instead offered the evidence as proof that defendant fired the shots that killed the victim. The statement was an admission by a party-opponent, supported the allegation that defendant killed the victim, directly contradicted defendant's defensive theory that his accomplices only named him as the shooter to get a reduced sentence, and was not likely to impress the jury in some irrational but nevertheless indelible way. Haynes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7232 (Tex. App. Eastland June 13 2013).

843. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it permitted a witness who had been in jail with defendant before the trial to testify that defendant threatened to kill him where the threat was a relevant extraneous offense, as the testimony was evidence that defendant made the threat to instill fear in the witness and to prevent him from testifying. Defendant's actions were probative of guilt, and the testimony was not unfairly prejudicial because defendant did not try to connect his threat to a different offense, and because the record was devoid of any evidence that the threat was related to anything else. Haynes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7232 (Tex. App. Eastland June 13 2013).

844. Given that his co-conspirator shot the victim in the course of the prior robbery, the extraneous offense evidence supported the State's theory that defendant reasonably should have anticipated that these same co-conspirators, or others, might shoot and kill someone in their next robbery; the evidence was directly relevant to an essential element of the charged crime, and was not needlessly duplicative as there was little other evidence that defendant knew his companions would use violence or carried guns. Pagoada v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6077 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 16 2013).

845. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of two additional stolen trailers on defendant's property under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because testimony established that defendant only had access and control of the property, and the evidence rebutted defendant's strategy of mistake or accident in which he attempted to cast doubt regarding his knowledge of the improper registration of the stolen trailers. Whited v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5225 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 30 2013).

846. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence tending to show that a witness had observed defendant in possession of a firearm on the night of the robbery under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the testimony tended to establish defendant's identity as one of the gunmen during the robbery and to corroborate the accomplices' testimony and the evidence qualified as same transaction contextual evidence. The trial court could have found that the probative value of the evidence was high, as the victims of the robbery were unable to identify the men who had robbed them at gunpoint and the State needed the testimony to corroborate the accomplices' testimony who had identified defendant as one of the gunmen. Head v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5109 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 24 2013).

848. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining the testimony of a witness that appellant had been in jail was not substantially more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because 1) the evidence had probative value as it demonstrated appellant's possible motive for shooting the victim; 2) the witness's testimony about motive was brief and directly relevant to appellant's motive and the intent element of the charged offense and, as such, had less potential to distract the jury from the charged offense; and 3) evidence of the reason appellant was in jail was excluded, which mitigated any potential for the jury to give undue weight to the evidence. Nieto v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1239, 2013 WL 485762 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 7 2013).

849. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence defendant's jail telephone call recordings and summaries because they aided the State in its rebuttal of defendant's defense that he had no involvement or knowledge of the dealership's transactions; The trial court was within the zone of reasonable disagreement to find that the probative value of the recordings and summaries were not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. The jailhouse phone calls did not tend to connect defendant to any prior bad acts or crimes that he might have committed. Wood v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 31 2013).

850. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that he held the child victim's mother at gunpoint several days after the alleged assault occurred under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it constituted same transaction contextual evidence and was relevant, as the evidence showed that defendant confronted the victim's mother because he wanted to interrogate the victim about the assault and showed the jury how defendant reacted violently to the victim's outcry; the evidence was also necessary to show how defendant gained access to the victim's house to leave a letter in which he admitted to touching the victim. The admission of the evidence did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it made a fact of consequence, defendant's touching of the victim's genitals, more probable. Rodriguez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 213, 2013 WL 135723 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 10 2013).

851. In defendant's criminal solicitation of a minor case, the court did not err by allowing evidence of his Internet address book, which showed he had contacts with females with sexually suggestive and youthful names because the evidence was probative in that it tended to show defendant was not on the Internet looking for babysitting services. The evidence did not include any specifics of any extraneous misconduct and there was therefore little danger the jury would either give the evidence undue weight or decide the case on an improper basis. Meadows v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9416, 2012 WL 5504017 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 14 2012).

852. In defendant's attempted sexual assault case, a witness's testimony regarding other inappropriate conduct allegedly perpetrated by defendant was properly admitted because the testimony showed that defendant acted inappropriately with other underage girls in the household and, thus, corroborated the victim's testimony and showed defendant's predilection for underage girls. Additionally, the State needed the testimony to rebut the mother's assertion that nothing inappropriate had ever transpired between defendant and the victim. Baker v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9345, 2012 WL 5458474 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 8 2012).

853. In defendant's murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting testimony as evidence of identity because, in both offenses, a green vehicle blocked the roadway and a young man approached the blocked-in vehicle with a "silver" handgun. The witness identified defendant as the "young man" from her aggravated robbery, and he used an accomplice's mother's vehicle to commit that offense; the challenged evidence made defendant's identity more probable, took little time to develop, and supported the element of identity. Torres v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9134 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 1 2012).

854. In an indecent exposure case, the court properly allowed evidence of defendant's prior conviction of failing to register as a sex offender over his objection because it was a crime of deception and was a significant piece of evidence bearing on his character for truthfulness; the manner in which the State presented evidence of defendant's conviction did not likely leave an indelible impression on the jurors to encourage an irrational decision. Tristan v. State, 393 S.W.3d 806, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8895, 2012 WL 5285673 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 25 2012).

855. Court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence because the State was required to prove that defendant committed the aggravated assault with intent to participate as a member of a criminal street gang and the intent element was hotly contested because defendant asserted that the crimes were not gang-related but simply an argument over a woman that escalated into a fight; it was the State's theory that the gang members assaulted the victim in retaliation for him disrespecting another gang member by interfering with his advances on a woman. There was no evidence the jury gave the evidence undue weight. Romero v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7573, 2012 WL 3834917 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 5 2012).

856. In a tampering with evidence case, the court properly admitted Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) evidence that defendant police officer had been at parties and that he was drinking with underage females because defendant attempted to show that the State was engaging in selective prosecution, and the State introduced the evidence to rebut the defensive theory. The State's evidence to rebut the defensive theory was not overly broad, and the court heard the testimony outside the presence of the jury. Shults v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7478, 2012 WL 3799209 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 30 2012).

857. In a domestic assault case, the court properly admitted evidence because the fact that defendant had a prior conviction for assault-family violence was an essential element of the repeat-offender charge, and the victim did not appear at trial to testify so the State needed the evidence to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication. Additionally, the victim's mother, when testifying to the extraneous offense, did not go into graphic detail regarding the circumstances surrounding the prior assault, and the documents relating to the offense also did not provide much detail in describing the assault. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7543 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 29 2012).

858. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant offered to pay for an abortion for another teenager with whom he had sex because the record did not establish the requisite level of danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, as the alleged act occurred in another town in the mid-1990s and the trial court could have found that the evidence was helpful in creating a fuller picture of defendant for the jurors, much like the evidence of his good work and family ties. Chavez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7127, 2012 WL 3629619 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 24 2012).

859. In defendant's theft case, evidence of subsequent offenses was admissible because those offenses provided the jury with proof of defendant's identity, showed his knowledge, and showed a scheme -- all purposes expressly permitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and the trial court unequivocally overruled a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. At no point did defendant request that the findings and conclusions of the trial court's balancing test be placed on the record. Boswell v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7177, 2012 WL 3629922 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 23 2012).

860. In a sexual assault case, the court did not err by allowing evidence of a 2008 kidnap and sexual assault of another victim because both victims were forcefully taken and isolated from anyone who could help them; after defendant had each woman in his car, he restrained each of them, and used derogatory terms towards both. He physically assaulted each woman; ripped off their clothing; and in each case forcefully penetrated their vaginas with his fingers or his hand. Ramos v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6780, 2012 WL 3363348 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 15 2012).

861. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant during his trial for murdering his girlfriend's five-year-child because it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403, as: (1) defendant's ex-girlfriend's testimony regarding defendant's distinctively similar pattern of assaultive behavior and manner of abuse toward her son strongly served to make it more probable that it was defendant that assaulted the child leading to her death; (2) the State's need for the testimony was high as only two people could testify regarding the events of the day the child died presented completely contradictory accounts of those events; 93) the trial court instructed the jury regarding the appropriate use of the testimony; and (4) the nature of defendant's assault on his ex-girlfriend's child, which did not cause his death or apparently any serious or permanent injury, was less emotional than the testimony regarding the nature of his assault on his girlfriend's child. Castro v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6233, 2012 WL 3104817 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 2012).

862. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing two witnesses to testify about extraneous offenses because it could have concluded that the evidence was relevant, probative, and necessary to rebut defendant's theory that the victim fabricated her allegation against defendant. The State's presentation of the evidence consumed very little time, and it was presented in a fashion to prove defendant's intent or knowledge of the offenses charged in the indictment. Guardado v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5514, 2012 WL 2832561 (Tex. App. El Paso July 11 2012).

863. Counsel was not ineffective for making a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection to extraneous offenses because it would have been overruled, as Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2 permitted the admissibility of evidence that defendant provided alcohol and pornography to the child victims to lure or groom them. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to make a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the factors of the balancing test weighed in factor of admitting the evidence, as it was probative of the relationship between defendant and the victims. Odom v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4316, 2012 WL 1964580 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 31 2012).

864. In a trial for injury to a child, in which the trial court admitted evidence of extraneous wrongs committed by defendant, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because there appeared little chance that the evidence was likely to influence the jury irrationally, as the conduct at issue did not involve instances where defendant caused other injuries. Moreover, the State did not spend an excessive amount of time developing the evidence. Quirk v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4123, 2012 WL 1882934 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 23 2012).

865. Appellant's affiliation with the Aryan Brotherhood was relevant and the probative value of such evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because appellant's membership in the gang and his obligation to follow a higher-ranking member's orders were relevant to show appellant's motive for the crime. Evidence of appellant's membership in the Aryan Brotherhood was offered to show appellant's motive, was not introduced to show character conformity, did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 404, and was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Guffey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3293, 2012 WL 1470185 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 26 2012).

866. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a witness's testimony to rebut defendant's assertion that he would not sexually abuse a nine-year-old girl where the extraneous-offense evidence was not unfairly prejudicial and was probative of defendant's credibility--and his sexual attraction to nine-year-old girls--because it showed defendant's response on cross-examination was inconsistent with his history of assaulting another female when she was the same age (or about the same age) as the victim. The trial court minimized the potential of the witness's testimony to impress the jury in an irrational and indelible way by including a limiting instruction in its charge, the record showed that the witness's testimony was not lengthy, and the State did not need the witness's testimony to prove its case-in-chief. Jones v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 363, 2012 WL 130612 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 18 2012).

867. Court properly admitted evidence of defendant's extraneous bad acts committed after his arrest because witnesses testified about defendant "revving" his engine in front of the victim's house, repeatedly calling the victim, and the victim testified that he felt threatened by the conduct. Additionally, the evidence was unlikely to influence the jury in an irrational way; to the contrary, it was rational to conclude that defendant threatened the victim and his best friend because defendant was guilty of the offense. Lofton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9666 (Tex. App.--Dallas Dec. 9, 2011).

868. In a sexual abuse case, the evidence of defendant's conduct following his arrest was properly admitted because it was probative of defendant's consciousness of guilt. The State's need for the evidence was significant because the victim and defendant were the only two witnesses to the actual conduct, and defendant denied touching the victim; it was rational to conclude defendant threatened the victim and his best friend because defendant was guilty of the offense. Lofton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9664, 2011 WL 6225415 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 9 2011).

869. State's Exhibit 221 had substantial probative value because it strongly tended to prove one of the elements of Counts 2 and 3, namely, that defendant acted with intent to participate in a criminal street gang, and for this same reason, the State had a considerable need for this evidence; any potential to create undue prejudice would have been counteracted by the trial court's limiting instruction which restricted the jury's consideration of the gang activity evidence to the intent element of Counts 2 and 3, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's objections and admitting State's Exhibit 221. White v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8118, 2011 WL 4825650 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 12 2011).

870. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the captain to testify to clarify the extent of defendant's disciplinary record because defendant's testimony created a false impression that he had not been disciplined after the discovery of unsecured evidence in his office; while testifying as a rebuttal witness, the captain testified that defendant had in fact been suspended, and that that disciplinary action was taken as a result of the unsecured evidence investigation. Any prejudice stemming from the extraneous evidence did not outweigh its probative value, as the discussion with the captain consumed only a small portion of the record and was necessary to impeach defendant and to provide the jury with a complete and accurate understanding of the facts. Milton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7592, 2011 WL 4361482 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 20 2011).

871. Defendant's argument and questioning of the witnesses attempted to portray the victim as the aggressor and defendant as merely defending himself and lacking criminal intent; thus, the trial court's ruling that evidence of the prior assaults was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) was not an abuse of its discretion. Watkins v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6992, 2011 WL 3925583 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 24 2011).

872. Evidence of defendant's membership in the same gang as a witness was admissible to show that the witness was biased to testify in favor of defendant. The probative value of the impeachment evidence was high because the State wanted to show why the witness testified that he had lied to police about the statements defendant had made to him. Mccuin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5031, 2011 WL 2611234 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 30 2011).

873. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence concerning a syringe found in defendant's sock in jail following his arrest because the evidence was relevant to establish defendant's knowledge of the methamphetamine and to rebut the defensive theory that defendant had no knowledge of the methamphetamine in either the van or in the vehicle defendant was riding in. Defendant failed to establish that the probative value of the evidence was significantly or substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, defendant's knowledge of the methamphetamine was seriously contested, the time necessary to present the evidence represented a negligible portion of the State's case, and limiting instructions were given. Phillips v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1383, 2011 WL 652846 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 23 2011).

874. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of the circumstances of defendant' arrest in July 2004 because evidence that defendant possessed methamphetamine at his father's residence on a later occasion was circumstantial evidence that defendant intentionally or knowingly possessed methamphetamine on an earlier occasion. Defendant's knowledge of the methamphetamine was seriously contested, the time necessary to present the evidence represented a negligible portion of the State's case, and limiting instructions were given. Phillips v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1383, 2011 WL 652846 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 23 2011).

875. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant, after committing the charged offense and on the same day, had ordered two minor girls walking down a street to get in his van where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence regarding defendant's encounter with the minor girls was relevant and admissible because that evidence revealed defendant's true plans about his encounter with the victim on the day he committed the offense. The trial judge could have reasonably concluded that the inherent probative force of the evidence, along with the State's need for the evidence, substantially outweighed the danger of any unfair prejudice to defendant, and the presentation of the extraneous offense evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Frank v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 762, 2011 WL 379041 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 2 2011).

876. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's drug transaction and drug use during his capital murder trial because it was same-transaction contextual evidence and background contextual evidence that put in context the conspiracy offense that defendant was charged with; the State sought to show that defendant was an active participant with his sons in a large-volume and dangerous drug business, and not just an after the fact bus driver, to explain why defendant would have entered into the conspiracy with his sons to rob the victim. Given the State's need for circumstantial evidence to prove that defendant entered into the conspiracy to rob the victim, the court could not say that there was a clear disparity between the danger of unfair prejudice posed by the evidence and its probative value. Davis v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 835, 2011 WL 322877 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 2 2011).

877. Photographs of defendant's tattoos on his hand and across his stomach were admissible for purposes of identification under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and the danger of unfair prejudice resulting from the admission of that evidence did not substantially outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 where the tattoos were physical evidence linking defendant to a nickname that several witnesses used in identifying defendant and where the jury already heard testimony regarding defendant's gang membership. Arias v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10217, 2010 WL 5541118 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 29 2010).

878. Testimony of two police officers that defendant had twice before been found in possession of cocaine while in or near the vehicle in which the cocaine for the present possession offense was found was plainly relevant, beyond mere character conformity, to rebut defendant's suggestion that he was an innocent victim of circumstance, and, under the circumstances, a trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by admitting the officers' testimony to rebut defendant's claim that he was unaware of the cocaine found in the vehicle. It was also not an abuse of discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 for the trial court to conclude that the relevance of the testimony, which consumed only sixteen pages of the reporter's record, outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice or confusion of the issues. Bell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9034, 2010 WL 4595704 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 9 2010).

879. Even though the trial court erred by allowing the State to ask a police officer if defendant had assaulted two other inmates upon arriving at the city's holding facility, as it showed defendant's propensity to be aggressive and perpetrate assaults, the error was harmless because there was a significant amount of evidence that went to the issue of defendant's intent and the State mentioned the evidence only minimally during closing arguments. Parson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8330, 2010 WL 4053782 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 15 2010).

880. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the district court erred by excluding evidence regarding the motivation of the authorities to prosecute the case against him because he failed to objected on the basis of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) during the trial. Even assuming that defendant had preserved error, the trial court did not abuse its discretion because: (1) the proffered evidence had no relevance to the issue of whether defendant had committed the offense of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle; (2) the trial court could have found that the evidence would have put the officers and the police department on trial, confused the issues, and caused undue delay; and (3) there was considerable evidence showing that defendant committed the offense, particularly the videotape showing defendant entering the bait vehicle on three separate dates. Bishop v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7056, 2010 WL 3369845 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 26 2010).

881. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of a prior robbery during defendant's aggravated robbery trial because: (1) it was committed the evening prior to the instant robbery; (2) defendant and his accomplice acted together in both robberies; (3) both robberies were committed against lone, older women using surprise, speed, and strength through force or the threat of force; and (4) both robberies were committed while using the same vehicle as a means of escape. Therefore, the probative value of the evidence was great, as it showed that defendant and his accomplice acted together in a continuing criminal enterprise and rebutted defendant's theory that he was not a party to the instant robbery but was merely present in the vehicle while it occurred. Davis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6949, 2010 WL 3341514 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2010).

882. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the probative value of the child victim's mother's testimony outweighed any prejudicial effect because the testimony, identifying defendant as the individual who left bite marks on the victim when they were playing, was relevant and probative of the relationship between defendant and the victim. Samora v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6759, 2010 WL 3279536 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2010).

883. Evidence of the victim's extraneous offenses should have been allowed, Tex. R. Evid. 403, but because defendant denied hitting the victim with the baseball bat, he could not have employed the theory of self-defense for that part of the alleged assault; the trial court was free to disbelieve defendant's assertion that he only punched the victim once and that he did not hit him with the baseball bat, and the jury was free to believe the victim's testimony that defendant was the first aggressor. Tomasheski v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4709, 2010 WL 2512618 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 23 2010).

884. Trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence of a convenience store robbery rebutted appellant's defensive theory, and thus the court could not find that the trial court abused its discretion when it overruled appellant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Chamberlain v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4653, 2010 WL 2473341 (Tex. App. Dallas June 21 2010).

885. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) is not limited to the extraneous acts of a defendant, and applies to the conduct of a third party. Chamberlain v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4653, 2010 WL 2473341 (Tex. App. Dallas June 21 2010).

886. Court abused its discretion in overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objections, because the court impermissibly allowed the State to interject extremely prejudicial evidence of multiple other sexual offenses allegedly committed by defendant (and others), when the evidence of extraneous acts admitted did not show a plan to sexually assault the two alleged victims, but rather it was evidence of repeated occurrences of the same bad act, compounded by numerous additional bad acts. Pittman v. State, 321 S.W.3d 565, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

887. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the contested items, because the evidence defendant complained of was much less graphic and disturbing than the pictures for which he was indicted, defendant's knowledge of and preoccupation with pictures of children, both those that might be termed pornographic and otherwise, was critical to proving the State's case of possession of child pornography, and the items did not distract the jury from their main inquiry, nor, did the evidence create a situation where the jury would give undue credence to the evidence; an officer found the two pictures that were the basis of defendant's indictments, along with computer generated pictures of young girls engaged in various sexual acts, magazine advertisements of children with the heads and faces cut out, adult pornography, and a spiral notebook with handwritten sexually explicit stories about young females. Bolles v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1080, 2010 WL 539684 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 16 2010).

888. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence of a prior robbery because the identity of the robber was at issue; defendant persistently attacked the victim's certainty of identification and offered an alibi for his presence at the time the robbery took place. Additionally, both the robber in the instant case and the prior case had features and dress in common, both tried to hide their faces, both were brandishing a pistol, and both were seen leaving and departing in a blue vehicle. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 863 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 5 2010).

889. In defendant's indecency with a child case, the court did not err by excluding evidence related to the victim's sexual relationship with her boyfriend who lived at the residence where the events took place because the victim's sexual history and relationship with her boyfriend had little or no probative value. The defensive theory was that the victim was motivated to fabricate the allegations because of defendant's complaints to the victim about her boyfriend's failure to contribute to household expenses; however, evidence of the victim's sexual relationship with her boyfriend would show only that she was sexually active with an older male who lived in the apartment. Franklin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 619, 2010 WL 337334 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 29 2010).

890. In defendant's drug case, the court did not err by admitting evidence of an extraneous drug offense because the officer testified that he purchased methamphetamine from defendant, which made the intent to deliver much more probable, and the circumstances of the offense were just a simple transaction, which involved no violence or any potential inflaming factors. The testimony of was not a time consuming part of the trial, and while intent might have been proven by circumstantial evidence, the evidence was needed to rebut the defensive theories brought out during cross-examination of the witnesses. Padilla v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 674, 2010 WL 337673 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 29 2010).

891. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted other acts evidence that defendant removed a windowscreen on the witness's enclosed patio, squatted in the dark wearing only boxer-shorts, and told her he wanted to get inside her apartment and needed a place to hide because the evidence proved that defendant was in the vicinity of the victim's apartment and was looking for a place to hide near the time of the murder. Additionally, the testimony was not particularly emotional or otherwise likely to inflame the jury, and the State did not have other evidence to show defendant's behavior and presence near the time of the murder. Gregory v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 618, 2010 WL 323884 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 28 2010).

892. In defendant's aggravated kidnapping case, the court did not err by admitting extraneous offense involving the same victim because the intent to terrorize, harm, or abuse the victim must have been present prior to or at the particular time; thus, evidence of extraneous misconduct prior to the abduction was relevant apart from showing character conformity because it made more probable the elemental fact of defendant's intent at the time of the abduction. Additionally, only a small percentage of the time expended in the four-day jury trial was devoted to mention of the extraneous offenses. Crews v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9677, 2009 WL 4907423 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 22 2009).

893. In defendant's indecency with a child case, the court properly allowed testimony of an officer that he had seen defendant watching children on a playground with binoculars because much of the State's case was built around the theory of "grooming" and that defendant spent significant time with the victim; because the bulk of the defensive case consisted of witnesses who said defendant had provided safe child care, that evidence was relevant to rebutting the defensive theory. Additionally, the time spent proving the extraneous act was negligible. Orange v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8934, 2009 WL 3851068 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 19 2009).

894. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted evidence from a witness that defendant liked young girls and oral sex because defendant was accused of fondling the breast of his victim and of performing oral sex on the victim who was ten years old, the evidence pertained to defendant's thoughts and did not implicate any conduct on his part, defendant's statements were the primary evidence of his intent and state of mind, and, the State had a significant need for the evidence. Jones v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8923, 2009 WL 3858016 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 18 2009).

895. In defendant's murder case, the court did not err by allowing the State to present the testimony of two witnesses in rebuttal regarding other sexual offenses alleged to have been committed by defendant because the best evidence that the State had to connect defendant to the murder was the fact that defendant had been with the victim until shortly before the murder, the statements of the two seasoned felons, whose credibility had been strongly attacked, and DNA evidence in the vehicle which was not particularly strong. Therefore, the State had a need for the evidence. Additionally, the presentation of the testimony did not take such a great amount of time as to confuse or distract the jury from the main issue of the case. Asberry v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8512 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 4 2009).

896. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted excerpts from defendant's civil deposition and witness testimony because the defense was theorizing that the victim fabricated the allegations against defendant, and by offering the excerpts where he admitted to performing sexual acts with the witness the State was attempting to show that defendant's claim of fabrication-for-money defense was less probable. The witness's testimony was brief and the court gave a limiting instruction. Slutz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8326 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 29 2009).

897. Because a roommate's testimony helped to affirmatively link defendant to the cocaine found in their apartment and to establish that defendant possessed it with the intent to deliver, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b) to show intent, motive, opportunity, and lack of mistake. Hatcher v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8045, 2009 WL 3326758 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 15 2009).

898. In defendant's murder case, a witness's testimony that defendant wanted to go kill someone and that he had a gun was not inadmissible evidence of an extraneous offense because defendant's statements and actions made it more probable that he did intend to seriously injure or kill the victim. The fact that he had a gun at the time was prejudicial, but it did not outweigh the probative value of his admission and his action at the time. Walton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8046, 2009 WL 3326759 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 15 2009), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 512, 178 L. Ed. 2d 379, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 8559 (U.S. 2010).

899. In a murder case, evidence of defendant's drug dealing was properly admitted because, according to a witness, defendant and the victim were rival drug dealers, and proof of motive was important to the State's case because the State was unable to produce an eyewitness who actually saw defendant shoot the victim. The time spent attempting to prove that defendant sold illegal drugs was not out of proportion to the time required to present such evidence. Koy Timon Moore v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7847 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

900. In defendant's sexual assault case, evidence was improperly excluded because there was no allegation that the evidence was self-serving or unreliable. The evidence was relevant to the complaining witness's credibility, and further, the State failed to show how the probative value of the evidence was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. State v. Moreno, 297 S.W.3d 512, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7642 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

901. Court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence of defendant's assaultive behavior occurring prior to, and after, the sexual assault because the extraneous offense evidence was admissible to show the context in which the criminal act occurred because defendant's assaultive behavior was "blended, or connected" to the sexual assault forming an "indivisible criminal transaction." Moreover, the evidence was helpful to the jury in their determination whether defendant used or exhibited a deadly weapon during the "same criminal episode." Quincy v. State, 304 S.W.3d 489, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7645 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 30 2009).

902. Decision to admit the extraneous-offense evidence was within the zone of reasonable disagreement, because although the testimony regarding the extraneous sexual assaults had the potential to inflame the jury, the evidence was relevant to rebut defendant's theory of fabrication, the testimony was not particularly graphic, nor lengthy, and the trial court instructed the jury to consider the testimony only for a limited purpose. Abrego v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7288, 2009 WL 2959640 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 16 2009).

903. In an aggravated assault case, extraneous conduct of theft of a firearm was properly admitted because the victim testified that defendant had showed him a pistol that defendant had stolen, and it was clear that the evidence was offered to negate defendant's theory that the victim was the first aggressor and establish that defendant intentionally attacked the victim because defendant believed that the victim had "snitched" on him. While the evidence was prejudicial, such prejudice was not unfair. White v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6875, 2009 WL 2914480 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 28 2009).

904. In defendant's drug case, the court did not err by allowing the State to introduce evidence regarding defendant's alleged driving while intoxicated stop because testimony regarding the officer's observations of defendant before, during, and after the traffic stop gave the jury information essential to understanding the context and circumstances of defendant's arrest and subsequent charges. The officer described defendant's erratic driving that led to the stop, his physical condition during the stop, and his behavior during the field sobriety tests. Mason v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6705, 2009 WL 2623363 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 26 2009).

905. Court properly admitted testimony because the witness's testimony rebutted defendant's theory that he did not intend to commit the alleged offense, and the witness's testimony showed that defendant was involved in a similar crime involving intent to commit a robbery subsequent to kidnapping the victim. Additionally, the evidence was presented in a short and concise manner and did not include unnecessarily graphic details. Dale v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6417, 2009 WL 2525421 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 19 2009).

906. In defendant's manslaughter case, the court properly admitted evidence about an incident in 2004 when defendant pointed a gun at a motorist and pulled the trigger because he testimony of the victim of the deadly conduct was relevant to rebut the defense of accident and mistake in the shooting of the victim. Immediately prior to the testimony, the trial court instructed the jury that the evidence was being admitted for the limited purpose of whether it rebutted the defensive theory of accident. King v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6447, 2009 WL 2517174 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 19 2009).

907. Court properly admitted evidence that defendant sexually assaulted his step-daughter twenty-five years earlier because both victims were defendant's step-daughters; both were ten when defendant sexually assaulted them; both were similar in appearance; and defendant abused both of them for several years. The State demonstrated that it needed this evidence to rebut defendant's claim of fabrication, and the time needed to develop the evidence amounted to about 116 pages out of the 426 pages of testimony. Newton v. State, 301 S.W.3d 315, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6534 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 19 2009).

908. Court did not erroneously admit evidence of an undercover drug buy the day before defendant's warrant was executed because the evidence of the undercover buy served to make a fact of consequence--defendant's care, custody, and control of the contraband with intent to distribute--more or less probable than without the evidence. Further, the court instructed the jury that it could consider the evidence of the undercover drug buy only if it believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the offense. Stewart v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6391, 2009 WL 2488504 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 17 2009).

909. In defendant's assault on a public servant case, the court properly admitted evidence of his prior arrests because the extraneous-arrest evidence was probative of both how well a character witness knew defendant and the foundation for her characterization of him, the trial court gave a limiting instruction, the extraneous arrests took up only four pages in the 564-page record, the question of whether defendant was threatening the officers was directly related to his intent, and the State did not have other evidence with which to rebut the witness's characterization of defendant's character. Morales v. State, 293 S.W.3d 901, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6241 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

910. In a child sexual assault case, the court properly allowed the victim's brother to testify regarding extraneous offenses against him because the boys were the same age when defendant allegedly sexually abused them, and the manner and location of the abuse alleged by the brothers were identical. A substantial part of defendant's cross examination of the victim was devoted to the attempt to undermine the victim's credibility. Boyd v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5970, 2009 WL 2370730 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2009).

911. In a child sexual assault case, the court properly allowed defendant's daughter to testify regarding extraneous offenses against her because the daughter's testimony tended to show that defendant was a sexual predator, and her testimony also had relevance apart from its tendency to show character conformity. It forcefully served to rebut the defense that defendant was the victim of a retaliatory "frame up." Boyd v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5970, 2009 WL 2370730 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2009).

912. Court properly admitted defendant's threat to take the officer's gun and kill him because that was probative evidence of defendant's precise intentions at the time he was assaulting the officer. It offered significant proof of defendant's commission of the charged offense of attempting to take a weapon from a peace officer with the intention of harming the officer. Presley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5613, 2009 WL 2152559 (Tex. App. Dallas July 21 2009).

913. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court properly admitted evidence of an extraneous aggravated robbery because the extraneous offense and the instant offense occurred on the same night, within an hour of each other, in the same area, in each offense, two men approached the complainants while each complainant was in his or her car, held the complainants at gunpoint, and shot the complainants. Additionally, the State's need for the evidence was significant because, although one complainant identified defendant as the second perpetrator, the record also showed that the complainant could not see defendant's face because of the bandana. Hackaday v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4501, 2009 WL 1687957 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 18 2009).

914. Court properly excluded testimony from third parties establishing defendant's knowledge of the complainant's propensity for violence because a witness testified that she saw the complainant hit her mother multiple times, she and other family members had called the police multiple times regarding the complainant's domestic violence, and defendant told a witness after the shooting that defendant thought the complainant was trying to hurt him. Segovia v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4559, 2009 WL 1678024 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 9 2009).

915. In a sexual assault of a child case, evidence that defendant had been subjected to unusual sexual events in his youth and that he related those events to the sexual assault of the child tended to rebut a contention that any contact with the child's penis was simply an accident, and therefore, the evidence was properly admitted. Additionally, the evidence took no additional time to develop initially, and was mentioned again during the trial only when defendant took the stand and denied making some of the statements. Watterson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2938, 2009 WL 1148751 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 29 2009).

916. In a sexual assault of a child case, evidence of defendant's arrest for possession of child pornography was properly admitted because it explained the reason for the investigation of defendant, the State needed it to adequately describe the circumstances of the charged offenses, and the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Greene v. State, 287 S.W.3d 277, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2855 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 16 2009).

917. Court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence because the extraneous offenses admitted tended to "make the existence" of a fact of consequence "more probable" and established that: defendant's gang was a criminal street gang, defendant had an affiliation with the gang, and defendant committed the instant offense as a member of a criminal street gang. Furthermore, the probative force and the State's need to admit the extraneous offenses outweighed the factors that favored exclusion; the evidence was not only relevant, but essential to the State's burden of proof. Fuentes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2544, 2009 WL 997508 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 14 2009).

918. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of voice messages defendant left for his former girlfriend in which he threatened to kill her husband because the evidence was properly admitted to prove defendant's knowledge and intent; a reasonable person could view the messages as creating an inference that defendant, knowing he would see the husband that day, intentionally brought the gun with him in order to harm or further threaten the husband. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objections because the messages were left a few hours before defendant drove to the husband's home with a gun in the back of his truck, the trial court specifically directed the State not to delve into the details of the messages, the time the State needed to admit the messages was minimal, and the evidence was an integral part of the State's theory that defendant took the gun with him to further threaten the husband. Rice v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2062, 2009 WL 790178 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2009).

919. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the utility knife, the pocket knife, and wire cutters that were found on defendant's person after his arrest into evidence because the items were probative, as they showed defendant's intent as well as the context and circumstances of his actions of entering the victims' garage, and the probative value did not substantially outweigh the risk of unfair prejudice. The State spent relatively little time developing the evidence and the evidence did not have a tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis. Enloe v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 19 2009).

920. In a murder case, evidence of a prior relationship between defendant and his victim was properly admitted into evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a); moreover, the evidence was not offered to show that defendant acted in conformity with his propensity for violence, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Evidence that defendant had beaten the victim in the past was no more inflammatory or prejudicial than the evidence that he beat the victim on the night of the murder. Chavez v. State, 399 S.W.3d 168, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1840, 2009 WL

700658 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 18 2009).

921. In a murder case, the court properly admitted evidence of a subsequent shooting involving defendant because, in both cases, defendant fired a gun from the driver's side window, once when he was sitting on the passenger side, both incidents occurred in the early morning, and in each instance defendant was responding to a perceived slight to one of his friends, rather than to himself, by conducting a drive-by shooting. Additionally, defendant's alibi defense and challenges to witness credibility raised identity, and in light of the importance of proving the identity of the perpetrator, the State had a strong need for the challenged evidence. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1725, 2009 WL 585986 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 10 2009).

922. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, prior bad acts evidence was properly admitted at sentencing because the collective testimony was probative of defendant's ongoing, repeated pattern of abuse, which the witnesses could not individually establish, and the collective testimony assisted the jury in evaluating defendant's character and his moral blameworthiness for punishment purposes. Cintron v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 889, 2009 WL 330963 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 11 2009).

923. In a case involving the possession of hydrocodone, the State was properly allowed to introduce extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) showing that defendant had subsequently been arrested for the same offense because this rebutted defendant's assertions that was unaware that the pills were in his car and that they belonged to someone else. Moreover, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Smith v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 751, 2009 WL 279490 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 5 2009).

924. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault case, the trial court properly excluded evidence of drug use at the victim's home because the fact that two of the victim's parents' house guests used cocaine in their bathroom had no probative value of a material fact issue in this case. The extraneous offense, the victim's mother's house guests using cocaine in the bathroom, did not tend to make the existence of a material fact -- whether defendant sexually assaulted the victim -- more or less probable. Mendenhall v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 22 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2009).

925. In a drug case, extraneous offenses regarding other transactions were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. The evidence in question tended to show that an undercover officer had the opportunity to observe and listen to defendant on more than one occasion, the trial court instructed the jury to only consider the evidence for purposes of determining motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, the testimony took up only five pages of the trial transcript, and it tended to rebut the insinuation raised by defendant that he had not engaged in drug activity before. Stebbins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9199 (Tex. App. Amarillo Dec. 10 2008).

926. In defendant's drug case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting in evidence the shotgun found on the back seat of the vehicle that defendant was driving just before his arrest because the probative value of the shotgun was considerable and significantly necessary to the State's case because it was a link tending to show that defendant knowingly possessed the cocaine. Additionally, the evidence of the shotgun was relevant to prove defendant's knowledge that he possessed narcotics. Harris v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9090 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 4 2008).

927. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child under fourteen years of age, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence of defendant's extraneous acts involving the victim where: (1) the evidence of physical abuse gave compelling insight as to why the incident at issue transpired and why the victim waited so long to tell anyone; (2) the State demonstrated a considerable need to develop the evidence because the physical abuse evidence corroborated the victim's testimony that he feared for his life and that his fear was the reason he was afraid to tell anyone about the sexual abuse for so many years; (3) presenting the jury with the victim's brief testimony and the short testimony from two later witnesses concerning the physical abuse did not lead to a decision on an improper basis; (4) the evidence did not have a tendency to confuse or distract the jury from the main issues; (5) the evidence did not have a tendency to be given undue weight by the jury because, even though the abuse details were horrific, the evidence went straight to the important issue of why the victim waited six years to speak out by explaining the basis for his belief that defendant might kill him; and (6) developing the evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Under the circumstances, the Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors weighed in favor of the trial court admitting the evidence of extraneous offenses under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37. Gamble v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8914 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 26 2008).

928. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by permitting the State to question him regarding a statutory rape charge filed against him in 1983 because the statutory rape charge and testimony were relevant rebuttal evidence to show the jury that the victim's parents were not motivated by greed or money in making the allegations against defendant. Additionally, State did not elicit detailed accounts of the offenses, but only asked a few questions in order to show similarities to the charged offenses, and other than the details and circumstances of the charged offenses, the State had no other evidence to rebut the defensive theory. Martin v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8437 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 6, 2008).

929. In an arson and drug case, the court properly admitted evidence of defendant purchase of pseudoephedrine because defendant's purchases during the four months leading up to the fire were probative evidence of defendant's intent to unlawfully manufacture methamphetamine. The State needed that probative evidence to demonstrate a required element of the crime, the admission of the evidence was not repetitious, and it did not take an inordinate amount of time to present. Stone v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6738 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 10, 2008).

930. In a case involving kidnapping and aggravated robbery, testimony about defendant's drug use in the days prior to the crime was admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was relevant to show the victim's state of mind; defendant had contended that no crimes had been committed against the victim because she acted voluntarily. The probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the dangers of unfair prejudice since the extraneous offense evidence made facts of consequence more or less probable, the testimony was unlikely to irrationally affect the jury, the time spent on the issue was very brief, and the testimony was necessary to rebut a defensive theory; moreover, no limiting instruction was required because the drug use and the crimes involved in the case at issue were not similar. Padilla v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6356 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 21 2008).

931. In a child pornography case, the trial court properly admitted evidence that defendant posted child pornography to an internet group because the evidence was probative of defendant's intent to view and store child pornography on his computer and to explain why his house was searched for child pornography. Furthermore, the State's need for the evidence was moderate because it established the reason why defendant's house was searched, and the presentation did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Perry v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6446 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 21, 2008).

932. In a murder case, the court properly admitted prior offenses because the State offered the evidence of another death and theft of a ring to show that even if both the victim's daughter and defendant had equal access to insulin, only defendant could be connected to a modus operandi; that particular modus operandi was to murder elderly patients via insulin overdose and steal from them. The State's need for the evidence was significant because it was the only evidence available to the State to rebut the defensive theory that the victim's daughter was a more plausible source of the insulin than defendant. Hannah v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6361 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 21, 2008).

933. Items seized at the scene of a house fire were relevant under Tex. R. Evid 401, 402, 403, 404(b) to show that the fire started as a result of the cooking of methamphetamine on the stove and that the debris found in the burned house pertained to the use or manufacture of illegal drugs; defendant failed to establish that the trial court abused its discretion or that the determination fell outside of the zone of reasonable disagreement. Dentler v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5708 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2008).

934. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court properly admitted evidence of a third attempted aggravated robbery that occurred on the same night as the other two robberies because, in the two robberies and third attempted robbery, the perpetrator approached the complainants with a gun, at night in a parking lot, and with a ski mask covering his face, and all three offenses occurred within a few hours of each other. Carson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3091 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 24 2008).

935. Court properly admitted evidence of defendant's statement of gang affiliation made to a deputy at the time of his arrest because defendant did not simply state that the deputy should watch his back but told him that he should watch his back because defendant ran with the Mexican Mafia; thus, defendant used the Mexican Mafia reference to give more weight to his threat; additionally, the State did not introduce any other evidence about defendant's gang affiliation or the activities of the Mexican Mafia and it did not mention defendant's claimed gang affiliation again in the presence of the jury. Bejarano v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2762 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 17 2008).

936. In defendant's murder case, a trooper was properly allowed to testify concerning defendant's apparent false theft report because it was consistent with the State's theory that it was defendant's addiction to gambling that was at the heart of the money problems that essentially poisoned the relationship between defendant and the victim, his wife; part of the State's theory was that the victim was murdered when she threatened to quit her job and thus, cut off any further support of defendant's gambling. Stafford v. State, 248 S.W.3d 400, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1280 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2008).

937. In defendant's robbery case, the State properly presented evidence of an extraneous robbery because the offenses occurred within three miles of one another and within a six-day time period, both took place late in the morning in large retail parking lots, and both acts were perpetrated quickly, snatching purses from unaccompanied females walking or standing in the parking lots; additionally, the testimony rebutted defendant's theories of alibi and that one victim's brief opportunity to view the perpetrator led to a mistaken identification; therefore, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. Evans v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 477 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 22 2008).

938. In defendant's murder case, the court properly allowed the State to reveal defendant's tattoos because the evidence was relevant to support the State's theory that defendant was a gang member who murdered rival gang members in retaliation; in addition, given the other evidence indicating defendant's admitted gang membership, the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial. Reyes v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 293 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 16 2008).

939. Admission of evidence regarding defendant's use of drugs and alcohol, having sex with an older man, running away from home, and being a liar was properly admitted because she chose to marry an older man and, thus, had sex with an older man, she ran away from home, and she put her maturity, sophistication, and independence at issue by claiming she was under her husband's control; further, the fact that defendant lied about being pregnant, which "necessitated" a marriage, went to her ability to tell the truth; the use of drugs went to defendant's then-existing state of mind. Vega v. State, 255 S.W.3d 87, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6315 (Tex. App.

Corpus Christi 2007).

940. In defendant's trial for aggravated assault, when the State elicited evidence of defendant's prior conviction for aggravated assault, a proper objection should have been made under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and Tex. R. Evid. 403; even if error existed, and it was preserved, error was harmless because introduction of evidence was not prejudicial to defendant. Moore v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6354 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 9 2007).

941. At defendant's capital murder trial, the trial court properly admitted evidence pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) that defendant possessed a semi-automatic weapon the week before the offense where the evidence showed that the victim was shot seven times by a semi-automatic weapon, and there was also ample evidence that defendant shot the victim. The evidence was not more prejudicial than probative because the State did not impute defendant's possession of the semi-automatic weapon to be a crime, the State did not imply that defendant was generally a criminal because he possessed the weapon, and there was no indication that the weapon might have been used in another offense. Johnson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6256 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 8 2007).

942. Trial court properly admitted evidence of a protective order defendant's wife had obtained against him during defendant's capital murder trial because: (1) the State was entitled to prove intent through evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts as defendant's cross-examination of the State's witnesses brought his intent into question as a defensive theory; (2) because the detectives found the protective order in defendant's truck, its introduction was relevant to help the jury understand how the circumstances surrounding the charged crime fit together; and (3) the protective order was highly probative as the wife secured it a few months before her death and a copy of the order was found in defendant's truck. Price v. State, 245 S.W.3d 532, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5294 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

943. Evidence of gang affiliation was properly admitted as relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 402 since it was offered to show a motive for a murder; the evidence was not limited under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and the probative value substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Rodrigues v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4441 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 7 2007).

944. In defendant's capital murder case, admission of evidence of defendant's "hidden pregnancies" and the abandonment of another infant were properly admitted because the State argued that the subsequent hidden pregnancy and abandonment of the infant showed that defendant "was keeping the children fathered by one man, and discarding the children fathered by other men," thus demonstrating her motive and her intent to kill the child. Berry v. State, 233 S.W.3d 847, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 651 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

945. In a case where defendant murdered her husband, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting prior bad acts evidence that defendant twice shot at her former husband because the evidence was relevant aside from its tendency to show that she acted in conformity with bad character since (1) defendant put the shooter's identity at issue by undermining the evidence against her and advancing the theory that the victim committed suicide; (2) the evidence went to the very fundamental fact of consequence, whether there was an act of murder; and (3) the evidence was relevant to rebut defendant's claim that the victim shot himself; also, under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the evidence was admissible because the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Scott v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3055 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 20 2007).

946. Defendant argued that the trial court erred by allowing evidence of an extraneous offense before the jury; the evidence of which defendant complained was the admission of his statements in the videotaped interview that his daughter had threatened to report him to the authorities because he "scratched her little girl's butt;" defendant could complain on appeal that he should have been granted a mistrial due to the improper admission of the evidence of an extraneous offense; however, the appellate court, having decided all of the Mosley factors adversely to defendant, overruled the issue. Badeaux v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2710 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 4 2007).

947. In an aggravated sexual assault case, the court properly allowed a neighbor's testimony that on two occasions she caught defendant looking into her daughters' bedrooms while the girls were undressing because it demonstrated that defendant displayed an inappropriate sexual interest in teenage girls, thus rebutting the defensive theory that he was the victim of a frame-up; in addition, the evidence was probative of defendant's intent to commit the sexual offenses against the victims by showing that he had a similar pattern of gratifying his sexual desires through watching the neighbor's daughters undress, the evidence, which did not involve any physical touching, was not worse than the charged offenses and was not graphic, and the State's need for the evidence was significant. Mayfield v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2545 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 29 2007).

948. In a sexual assault case, the court properly admitted evidence that defendant sexually abused his stepdaughter because if the jury believed that defendant committed the extraneous offenses, that made it more probable that the victim was not fabricating her allegations against defendant; although the evidence did not tend to disprove fabrication directly, it tended circumstantially to prove that the victim did not fabricate her allegations, both parties argued to the jury that it could not consider the evidence apart from those circumstances and for that purpose, and the State's presentation of the testimony of which defendant complained was brief. Newton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2477 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 28 2007).

949. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence consisting of defendant's 1979 statement in which he admitted setting a fire that caused a person's death because there were no eyewitnesses, defendant had joined in placing identity at issue by claiming that another person who had quarreled with his brother was the perpetrator, and the 1979 offense was highly compelling evidence that made defendant's identity challenge much less probable. Powell v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 15 2007).

950. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that police found a pistol in the trunk of his car when they arrested him because: (1) the extraneous offense in question, being a felon in possession of a firearm, was never presented to the jury; (2) the victim's description of the pistols used during the robbery general matched the pistol found in defendant's vehicle; (3) the weapon was found in a vehicle that closely matched the victim's description of a vehicle on the scene of the robbery; and (4) admission of the gun did not unfairly prejudice defendant. Young v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11371 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 21 2006).

951. Admission of two prior similar acts by defendant into evidence did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 or 404(b), and defendant's convictions of sexual assault and impersonation of a public servant should not have been reversed, because the trial court testimony of the complainant and the two witnesses showed that the three incidents all occurred in mid-1997 and were similar in several significant respects. Page v. State, 213 S.W.3d 332, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2446 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

952. Extraneous offense testimony was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to the issue of identity and was admissible to prove that defendant posed as a police officer and sexually assaulted a prostitute; the facts of the charged offense and the extraneous offenses showed a pattern of conduct sufficiently distinctive to constitute a signature. Page v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2521 (Dec. 20, 2006).

953. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence relating to the search of the girlfriend and the discovery of the crack pipe because under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the evidence was relevant to the issue of whether the contraband and drug paraphernalia were present in the house and tended to prove an affirmative link between defendant and the methadone, and therefore the evidence was relevant to show defendant's knowledge or intent to possess the methadone. The probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because it had high probative value in affirmatively linking defendant to the methadone. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2526 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 14, 2006).

954. In a criminal trial for aggravated robbery, the trial court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence of a previous robbery committed by defendant; the probativeness factor of the balancing test weighed in favor of admissibility of the extraneous offense evidence, because the robbery victim was unable to identify the robber in a photo lineup. Hicks v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10375 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 4 2006).

955. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, the probative value of defendant's prior conviction was not substantially outweighed by a danger of unfair prejudice because (1) the prior conviction was probative to rebut defendant's contention that the complainant's injuries resulted from an accident, not an assault; (2) any chance that the jury would be impressed in an irrational way was minimized by the trial court's limiting instructions, both orally and in the jury charge, to consider the prior conviction only for determining an absence of mistake or accident; (3) the evidence of the prior conviction was developed quickly and no further inquiry was made after it was established; and (4) the prior conviction was needed because defendant and the complainant were the only two eyewitnesses to the assault, and whether the complainant's injuries were caused by an accident or an assault was a pivotal fact issue. Carranza v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10137 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 28 2006).

956. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's association with two white supremacy groups on the ground that the State failed to provide defendant with notice under Tex. R. Evid. 404 because defendant failed to explain how the status of being a member of those groups constituted evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts; defendant failed to preserve for review his claim that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because he did not renew his objection during a detective's testimony regarding the evidence. Jaynes v. State, 216 S.W.3d 839, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10124 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

957. Other child's testimony regarding defendant's sexual assault of her, as direct evidence, had great probative value and provided strong and compelling evidence to establish (1) opportunity and (2) state of mind; also, there were significant similarities and circumstances between the instant offense against the victim and the conduct the other child described in her testimony; thus, the trial court properly conducted the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test and did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the probative value of the extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect. Morales v. State, 222 S.W.3d 134, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9771 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006), corrected by--S.W.3d--, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11350 (Tex. App. -- Corpus Christi 2006.

958. In defendant's robbery and drug possession case, a court properly admitted evidence of a "drug ledger" seized at defendant's apartment because, while searching the apartment for evidence related to drug transactions and defendant's possession offense, the officers discovered identification documents taken from the robbery victims, the drug ledger evidence assisted the jury in understanding how the officers linked defendant to the robberies and the circumstances under which he possessed cocaine, and the drug ledger was admissible as res gestae of defendant's offenses. Villegas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9334 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 27 2006).

959. In defendant's murder case, testimony that defendant had attempted to poison the victim on a prior occasion was admissible because that evidence made more probable the fact that defendant sought to have the victim killed; the State's need for the evidence was significant because it was the sole evidence that defendant had made any direct attempts to kill the victim herself. Cooper v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 19 2006).

960. In defendant's assault case, extraneous offense evidence regarding defendant's having cut a witness with a knife on a prior occasion was properly admitted because, under defendant's self defense theory, his intent in stabbing the victim was to defend himself and the State's theory was that defendant was the aggressor and his intent was not defensive; in addition, the evidence was more probative than prejudicial; the time the prosecution devoted to developing the evidence did not present a danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or undue delay. Salazar v. State, 222 S.W.3d 10, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8382 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

961. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of extraneous offenses during the punishment phase because defendant committed the current drug offense on May 17, 2002 and the State presented evidence of a prior conviction occurring in 1997 and presented evidence of multiple unadjudicated offenses occurring after defendant committed the current offense, six of which were similar to the instant offense in that they were drug related offenses; Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) established that the extraneous offenses were relevant to the assessment of defendant's punishment. Hale v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7987 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 7 2006).

962. It was not an error for the trial court to allow the State to present evidence that defendant and the victim were involved in a transaction in which she took money from defendant for a product without providing the produce because it was so intertwined with the aggravated assault that the jury's understanding of the offense would have been obscured without it; further, admission of the product transaction evidence tended to establish some evidentiary fact, such as motive, opportunity, and preparation; the evidence was not more prejudicial than probative because: (1) the evidence was necessary for the jury to understand defendant's actions and motive; (2) the trial court limited reference to the drug transaction by only allowing the State to say a transaction to purchase a product; and (3) the evidence was important to the prosecutors' contention that defendant intentionally committed the aggravated assault and that said assault stemmed from the transaction gone bad. Romero v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7552 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 24 2006).

963. During defendant's aggravated kidnapping trial, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of his generalized assaultive conduct, an assault against another man, and an unadjudicated aggravated assault against the victim because defendant's extraneous conduct in fighting men that he saw with the victim, slapping the victim's male friend, and choking the victim, pointing a gun at her, and dragging her away were clearly relevant to show defendant's motive, intent, plan, and absence of mistake or accident; further, while the extraneous acts were "prejudicial" in the sense that they showed defendant's motive, intent, and plan for kidnapping the victim, their probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Parker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6649 (Tex. App. Dallas July 27 2006).

964. Court properly denied defendant's motion for a mistrial because an officer's testimony regarding an outstanding warrant for possession of a controlled substance was admissible as transactional contextual evidence, it explained defendant's arrest, and it explained the necessary events of the transaction; the testimony was brief and neither the prosecutor nor the officer emphasized the warrant other than to explain the necessary events of the transaction. Mitchell v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6590 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 26 2006).

965. In an injury to a child case, evidence that defendant broke a coffee table because he was frustrated about his argument with the child's mother over breast feeding the child was properly admitted because, considering the violent nature of the crime, the evidence was critical to the State's case; in addition, the evidence was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it took only eight pages of the guilt/innocence record, which consisted of over 1,000 pages, and the State presented no other evidence of defendant's temperament for the time period immediately preceding the child's death. Lopez v. State, 200 S.W.3d 246, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9199 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

966. In an aggravated assault case, a court properly admitted evidence of another collision caused by defendant because defendant claimed his reckless driving was the product of intoxication, failure to wear glasses, and mechanical problems with his vehicle; the motorcycle accident evidence, when combined with the other evidence admitted at trial, rebutted that defense by showing a pattern of behavior during the course of what was essentially a single event or transaction. Gattis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5668 (Tex. App. Austin June 29 2006).

967. In defendant's murder case, a court properly allowed evidence that defendant had pushed the victim out of the car and left her on the road because the evidence was probative of their relationship, and was necessary to tie together the events beginning with their separation, including the subject matter of their counseling sessions, which ultimately explained why the victim filed for divorce; finally, any potential prejudice was diminished by the trial court's limiting instruction and instruction to disregard. Garcia v. State, 201 S.W.3d 695, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1284 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

968. During defendant's murder trial, the State questioned him about two extraneous offenses and defense counsel did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 403, Tex. R. Evid. 404, or Tex. R. Evid. 609 regarding either offense; in accordance with Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant could not raise these issues on appeal. Cotton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5445 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 27 2006).

969. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 by admitting testimony from three of the victim's relatives who claimed that defendant had also abused them to rebut defendant's theory of lack of opportunity given the whole record, including defendant's opening statement claiming that he was never alone with the victim, testimony by defendant's mother that he was never alone with the victim, and testimony of defendant's mother and his half-brother that defendant was out of the state for a significant amount of time while the victim was living at defendant's mother's residence; the fact that the testimony was inflammatory did not mean that it left an irrational and indelible impression on the jury, as the trial court explicitly instructed the jury that it could only consider the evidence for the allowable purposes listed in Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Tobar v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5161 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

970. In defendant's murder case, evidence of the history of physical abuse in the relationship between defendant and the victim was relevant and properly admitted; the extraneous-offense evidence rebutted defendant's claim of accident and showed that he intended to cause death, serious bodily injury, or bodily injury; in addition, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Brown v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5163 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

971. Trial court's admission of an officer's testimony regarding extraneous "narcotics transactions" in appellant's trial for possession of a controlled substance (heroin) with the intent to deliver was not reversible error because the testimony was admissible to show the context in which the criminal act occurred, and was relevant to show that appellant had the intent to deliver. Moreno v. State, 195 S.W.3d 321, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4393 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

972. Evidence that defendant dismembered a murder victim's body was properly admitted where it was relevant to prove his consciousness of guilt with respect to the victim's murder and was not unfairly prejudicial because the dismemberment showed an attempt to conceal evidence of the murder and avoid detection, and the State needed evidence that defendant dismembered the body to prove that defendant, not his mother, murdered the victim; although the facts of dismemberment were generally gruesome and would tend to leave an emotional impression on the jury, that factor was not compelling enough to outweigh the other factors. Williams v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4251 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 11 2006).

973. State argued that the burn evidence, which constituted other crimes evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), was admissible because in defendant's written statements, he stated that any injury that he inflicted on the victim, a 16-month old child, the night of her fatal injury was accidental; the burn evidence was relevant to show defendant's state of mind and his relationship with the victim and rebutted his claim of the accidental nature of the injury that resulted in her death; further, the testimony and photograph of the burn was not so graphic that it would have impressed the jury in an irrational, yet indelible way, and the State had a compelling need for the evidence because its case was entirely circumstantial, and defendant contested both his identity as the perpetrator and his state of mind. Montgomery v. State, 198 S.W.3d 67, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3377 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

974. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, the victim's testimony regarding prior incidents of abuse was properly admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 38.37 and Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404, 405. Because defendant had lived with the victim's family for five years, the extraneous acts evidence helped to support the victim's credibility by placing the events in context. Allred v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3118 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 20 2006).

975. Trial court's decision to allow evidence of defendant's prior assault of the victim was not error because the trial court reasonably could have found the evidence to be probative that the victim's injury for which he was being tried was not accidental. Defendant did not show that the trial court abused its discretion in its balancing of the probative value and potential for prejudice of evidence of the prior incident because evidence of the prior incident did not distract the jury from its proper consideration of the events for which he was on trial. Sharp v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3216 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 20 2006).

976. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, the victim's testimony regarding prior incidents of abuse was properly admitted; because defendant had lived with the victim's family for five years, the extraneous acts evidence helped to support the victim's credibility by placing the events in context. Allred v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3118 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 20 2006).

977. Defendant failed to properly object to evidence that was admitted at trial concerning unindicted aggravated robberies, even though he filed a motion in limine, because he failed to make objections under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) when the evidence was admitted at trial. Ashford v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2770 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 6 2006).

978. Defendant failed to properly object to the trial court's admission of a bulletproof vest because when the vest was admitted, he objected on the ground that it was not relevant; therefore he did not preserve for appellate review on the ground that the vest was admitted in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Ashford v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2770 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 6 2006).

979. Court of appeals failed to properly defer to a trial court's decision where the trial court was within its discretion to hold that the probative value of evidence of a handgun and of defendant's parole status was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given that the jury was not informed of the crime for which defendant was on parole, that the strength or weakness of the handgun's connection to defendant reflected equally on the issues of probative value and prejudice, and that there was reason to believe that the State had a significant need for the evidence. Powell v. State, 189 S.W.3d 285, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 681 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

980. In defendant's perjury case, the court did not err by admitting evidence of his wife's bad acts and crimes where defendant relied on a report he obtained from his wife and submitted it as proof that he did not owe money to the apartment complex, he subsequently reaffirmed those facts in his sworn statement, the contested evidence tended to establish that the wife altered the report, and in order to prove that defendant could not have reasonably believed that the document was genuine, the State offered evidence of the wife's criminal history which included theft and forgery. Robinson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2189 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 23 2006).

981. During defendant's trial for being a felon in possession of a firearm, the trial court did not err in allowing a witness to testify regarding defendant's prior drug dealing because the risk of convicting defendant solely on the fact that she was a drug dealer did not substantially outweigh the probative value of establishing her state of mind. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

982. In defendant's drug case, a court did not err by admitting an officer's testimony regarding his observations of defendant over a period of several days during which the officer saw defendant complete what appeared to be a hand-to-hand transaction involving narcotics because that action was part of the same criminal transaction that led to defendant's arrest; defendant's extraneous behavior was admissible to show the context in which the criminal act occurred and was relevant to show that he had the intent to deliver the drugs. Moreno v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1403 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 21 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 195 S.W.3d 321, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4393 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

983. Trial court did not err by allowing evidence pertaining to defendant's sexual assault of one of the children he killed in a house fire because it was offered primarily to show defendant's motive; part of the State's theory was that defendant committed the murders because he was very worried about the pending sexual assault charges, he did not want to go to jail, and was angry at the child's mother for filing the charges and having him removed from the house. The evidence was important to understanding the context of and motivation behind defendant's actions, and was not so embellished or detailed as to become a diversion from the issues presented; the evidence was also highly probative of the chain of events that drove defendant's actions. Holiday v. State, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2544 (Tex. Crim. App. Feb. 8, 2006).

984. In defendant's indecency with a child case, although the extraneous offense evidence of other sexual offenses against young boys was inadmissible to confront false-impression evidence, the State's alternate reason, that the extraneous offense evidence was admissible to rebut defensive theories propounded by defendant, was a proper basis for the admission of the extraneous offense evidence. Blackwell v. State, 193 S.W.3d 1, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 903 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

985. In defendant's indecency with a child case, defendant's extraneous sexual offenses were admissible to rebut the defensive theory that he lacked the intent to have sexual contact with the victim because, by asserting that defendant was a regular parent who did a good job of raising two other young boys, he impliedly suggested that he lacked the intent to have sexual contact with the victim. Blackwell v. State, 193 S.W.3d 1, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 903 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

986. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not err by allowing the prosecutor's questions regarding the defendant's possible exchange of sexual favors for forgiveness of a drug debt; the evidence was admissible to show the relationship between defendant and the victim. Whitmire v. State, 183 S.W.3d 522, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 170 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

987. In defendant's capital murder case, a court properly allowed a police officer to testify about the nature, structure, and activities of criminal street gangs generally and a specific gang because defendant himself asserted that he was acting under orders from his gang's leader, and therefore, the officer's testimony about gang hierarchy and promotion was not just relevant but essential to put defendant's statement and the gang-related testimony of other witnesses into context. His testimony suggested a motive for the victim's slaying that would have otherwise remained hidden. Bradford v. State, 178 S.W.3d 875, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9214 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

988. In an insurance fraud case, a court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence relating to defendant's car being involved in a homicide where the evidence that a witness delivered the car to storage two days before it allegedly was stolen, and reported that defendant told him to destroy the car to cover up evidence of another crime, was helpful to the jury's understanding of defendant's false statements to the insurer that the car was stolen. In addition, the probative value was compelling, as the evidence related to defendant's motive for claiming the vehicle to be stolen in submitting her insurance claim, proof of one of the elements of insurance fraud. Nguyen v. State, 177 S.W.3d 659, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7289 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

989. In defendant's trial for attempted sexual assault, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous offenses pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 because defense counsel's cross-examination of the victim attempted to impeach her identification of defendant and raised the issue of identity, therefore extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b) for the purpose of proving identity. Also, there were numerous similarities between the extraneous offenses and the charged offense, and the State had no other evidence to establish identity, therefore it had a compelling need to present the extraneous offense evidence. Williams v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6824 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 23 2005).

990. In a murder case, court did not err in allowing the State to present evidence of defendant's drug transaction with the victim shortly before the murder because the drug transaction with the victim was relevant to show the motive for the victim's murder, rather than mere conformity with character, there was not an overwhelming potential for the evidence to impress the jury in an irrational way, and the State needed little time to develop the evidence in the course of putting on the witness's testimony. Nickleson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6658 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 18 2005).

991. In a drug and weapons possession case, evidence that defendant lived at a house in which drugs were being manufactured was admissible to show why a police officer was watching defendant's house; thus, under the circumstances, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Summerville v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6773 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 18 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9715 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 15, 2005).

992. In a trial for robbery, extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 because the similarity in the offenses made the evidence compelling as to identity. In both robberies, the assailants drove into an apartment complex parking lot, wore shirts bearing Houston police insignia, claimed to be police officers, and searched Hispanic male victims; money was taken in both robberies with a silver pistol. Casique v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6517 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 16 2005).

993. Extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 to refute defendant's alibi. Casique v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6517 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 16 2005).

994. Trial court did not err in excluding evidence regarding other acts of sexual harassment allegedly committed by a former employee's managers where all of the additional acts occurred after the employee's discharge. The excluded evidence would have had negligible relevance to the question of the workplace environment during the employee's tenure and would have been substantially more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Mackey v. U.P. Enters., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6044 (Tex. App. Tyler July 29 2005).

995. Probative value of the extraneous evidence of an assault offense that defendant allegedly committed against his wife after her aggravated kidnapping and six days before his trial on that charge was not substantially outweighed by the dangers of unfair prejudice where the evidence was highly probative for the State because defendant's conduct and the injuries his wife received during the extraneous assault were sufficiently similar to the charged offense to at least weaken defendant's defensive theory, and where the wife's testimony was unlikely to irrationally affect the jury because the cumulative testimony was not particularly descriptive, nor was the wife unduly anguished by defendant's actions. Furthermore, the time spent developing the wife's testimony was fairly brief, and evidence of the extraneous offense related to the disputed issue of defendant's intent because of its similarity to the charged offense. Simoneaux v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5628 (Tex. App. Tyler July 20 2005).

996. Court did not err by admitting evidence concerning the circumstances of a prior sexual assault conviction where defendant encountered the victims in the parking lot of their residences, waited for the victims to return to their rooms, approached them under the guise of needing help, and made advances toward raping them but ejaculated before penetration. Because intent was a material element of the offense on which the State carried the burden of proof, the probative value of the witness's testimony was high and was not overcome by the danger of unfair prejudice. Fields v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5494 (Tex. App. Austin July 14 2005).

997. Although the testimony of the teenage cousin of defendant's girlfriend of an extraneous sexual assault during defendant's trial for sexually assaulting a minor, his teenage daughter, carried emotional weight and the danger of impressing the jury in an indelible way, the trial court's decision to admit the extraneous offense evidence was within the zone of reasonable disagreement because: (1) the cousin's testimony had similarities to the victim's; (2) the cousin's testimony was not especially graphic, and the jury was correctly instructed to consider it only for a limited purpose; and (3) the cousin's direct examination was not unduly lengthy. Furthermore, because defendant strongly contested that the sexual assault actually occurred, the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the State demonstrated that it needed the cousin's testimony to counter lengthy testimony elicited by defendant, during both direct and cross-examinations of several witnesses, that the victim was angry at him for taking away her cellular telephone and thus fabricated the allegations. Dennis v. State, 178 S.W.3d 172, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5295 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

998. Trial court properly admitted evidence of an extraneous assault offense under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) where defendant's wife's testimony on behalf of the defense was an attempt to show that her injury was caused by an accident, not the intentional actions of defendant. Thus, a videotape in which defendant admitted a prior assault on his wife made the defensive theory of accident less probable and was relevant to rebut the defensive theory of accident. Iroegbu v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5296 (Tex. App. Dallas July 6 2005).

999. In an injury to a child case where defendant contested his guilt by claiming that he did not injure the child but that she fell, the trial court did not err in permitting the State to introduce evidence that defendant had previously committed an extraneous offense against another young child as it may have been helpful to the jury to rebut defendant's defensive theory and show that he injured the victim. Furthermore, evidence of the extraneous offense was not of such a nature as to impair the efficacy of a limiting instruction: the evidence showed that the child involved in the extraneous offense was not seriously injured but, at most, had bruises on her face from defendant's hands. Harrell v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4578 (Tex. App. Eastland June 16 2005).

1000. In a trial for indecency with a child, the trial court properly admitted evidence of a prior indecency conviction. The current charge arose from defendant's exposing himself, and he argued that he had merely forgotten to zip his pants; the extraneous offense evidence therefore tended to make a fact of consequence--whether defendant had or lacked intent to arouse or gratify sexual desire--more or less probable. Arp v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4535 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 15 2005).

1001. In a murder trial, evidence was properly admitted, under Tex. R. Evid. 401 -- 404, of a shooting incident that occurred eight days after the murder. The extraneous offense evidence was relevant to the development of the case and was admissible to show the development of the investigation and defendant's intent or knowledge regarding the gun; as to prejudice, the evidence was presented almost matter-of-factly and included no injuries, disturbing photographs, or emotional testimony. Gonzales v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4532 (Tex. App. Amarillo

1002. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant's statement under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) where it appeared that it believed that the portion of the statement in which defendant admitted to threatening a prostitute with a box cutter referred to the complainant because the statement corroborated the complainant's testimony and was relevant to the issue of consent. Furthermore, the statement was not inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it strengthened the State's case on the consent issue and because, while the acts described in the statement were probably distasteful to at least some, if not all, of the jury members, they were not any more inflammatory than the charged offense. Marc v. State, 166 S.W.3d 767, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4228 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

1003. In an indecency with a child case, the trial court did not err in allowing extraneous offense evidence, including the complainant's testimony that defendant asked him to disrobe to make a movie, videotaped him wearing his underwear, had sexual contact with him while he was bathing, and had sexual contact with him on other unspecified dates, as the testimony was probative to show defendant's state of mind and their relationship. When viewed with the other evidence, it was unlikely that this testimony left an indelible impression on the jury that precluded it from rational deliberation, and the State used little time to elicit the testimony. Painter v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4125 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 26 2005).

1004. Defendant contended throughout his trial that the officer misidentified him as the driver of the suspect vehicle who started firing at the officer with an assault rifle; thus, the evidence of drug paraphernalia (specifically, a bong) seized from defendant's residence bearing defendant's fingerprints provided an affirmative link between defendant and the vehicle, which contained both fingerprints belonging to defendant as well as a marijuana cigarette that was discovered on the vehicle's passenger seat. Therefore, the trial court did not err as a matter of law in admitting the bong evidence as both relevant to a material issue and more probative than prejudicial. Pena v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2355 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 30 2005).

1005. Trial court had not erred in admitting evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant against his murder victim wife because the offenses were admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) to show the previous relationship between defendant and the victim and were relevant to sentencing under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1). Furthermore, the extraneous acts were proper rebuttal evidence because defendant's son had testified that the victim had no reason to fear defendant. Ramon v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2036 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 17 2005).

1006. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, defendant's trial counsel was not ineffective for failing request a limiting instruction to evidence that defendant showed the victim a pornographic movie as no limiting instruction was required for same transaction contextual evidence. Given the defensive theory that the child fabricated the charges, the State's ability to produce a piece of physical evidence to support the victim's testimony outweighed the prejudice inherent in matters concerning pornography. Redwine v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1796 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 9 2005).

1007. Trial court's admission of two victim's statements about prior assaults by defendant was proper as the prior assaults were similar circumstances to the current assault, defendant had raised consent as a defense, and the court limited the use of the evidence. Reyna v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1663 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 2 2005).

1008. Trial court did not violate Tex. R. Civ. P. 404(b) by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses of the victims' children's deaths because although defendant was only charged with the murder of the victims, evidence that the victims' children died of smoke inhalation as the result of a fire defendant set to hide the murders was admissible to corroborate the testimony of defendant's cell mate, who stated that defendant confessed to him by detailing the manner in which the crimes were committed, and it was admissible as same-transaction contextual evidence because it was intertwined with the State's proof of the charged crime. However, the trial court violated Tex. R. Civ. P. 403 by admitting the children's autopsy photos because it was undisputed that they died of smoke inhalation and the State did not need the photos to explain the crime scene or to corroborate the cell mate's testimony. Prible v. State, 175 S.W.3d 724, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 110 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 481, 163 L. Ed. 2d 367, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 7695, 74 U.S.L.W. 3246 (U.S. 2005).

1009. In an indecency with a child by contact case where a second count involving the victim's friend was ultimately dismissed, the friend's testimony describing how defendant had touched and rubbed her was admissible as it tended to show that defendant acted intentionally and according to a plan when he committed the offense against the victim. Further, the probative value of the friend's testimony was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because the testimony did not reference facts encompassed in the dismissed count involving the friend. Dinsmore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11624 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 23 2004).

1010. In an indecency with a child case, because intent to satisfy sexual appetite was an element of the crime, the victim's younger sister's testimony that defendant had "french" kissed her when he took her alone for a ride and asked that she not tell anyone was relevant; thus, the trial court properly allowed it. Further, this evidence showing that defendant acted inappropriately with another young girl was highly probative, making the fact of defendant's sexual contact with the victim more probable, gave credibility to the victim's complaint, and diminished defendant's credibility. Mejia v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11615 (Tex. App. Tyler Dec. 22 2004).

1011. In an aggravated sexual assault and burglary case, testimony by another person that she had previously discovered defendant outside her apartment window and that he had attempted to gain entry by shooting two small holes in her window near the latch was distinctly similar to the evidence in the instant case; therefore, it was admissible to show identity. Considering the fact that defendant raised identity as an issue during trial, and the degree of similarity between the offenses, the trial judge did not err in holding the probative value of the extraneous evidence outweighed its prejudicial or inflammatory effect. Scally v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11636 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 22 2004).

1012. In a robbery case, extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to establish defendant's identity, which was at issue because defense counsel had challenged the accuracy of the victim's identification of defendant, and the evidence was not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because proper instructions were given. Thompson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11088 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 9 2004).

1013. In an indecency case, a court properly admitted evidence from defendant's daughters concerning extraneous offenses committed by him where the fact that defendant intentionally exposed himself to his daughters made the fact that he acted intentionally, not accidentally, when he exposed himself to the victims more probable than not. The probative value of the extraneous offense testimony to show intent and absence of mistake or accident was particularly compelling, and the State had little else with which to prove intent. Sanders v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10677 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 30 2004).

1014. Because the witnesses' testimony constituted direct evidence of the element of both offenses, the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence under either Tex. R. Evid. 403 or 404(b). The evidence regarding the carjacking established the elements of the offenses where the victim did not give defendant permission to drive her vehicle, defendant acquired the vehicle alone, and defendant had sole possession of the shotgun. Dominguez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9942 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 10 2004).

1015. In defendant's criminal trial for evading arrest in a vehicle, the trial court abused its discretion by permitting the State to introduce evidence of the handgun found in his vehicle and his parole status; because identity was the main issue in the case, the State did not have a compelling need to prove motive via defendant's parole status and the handgun. The trial court abused its discretion by concluding that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Powell v. State, 151 S.W.3d 646, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9368 (Tex. App. Waco 2004), reversed by 189 S.W.3d 285, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 681 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

1016. Relevant criteria in determining whether the prejudice of an extraneous offense outweighs its probative value include: (1) how compellingly the extraneous offense evidence serves to make a fact of consequence more or less probable-a factor which is related to the strength of the evidence presented by the proponent to show the defendant in fact committed the extraneous offense; (2) the potential the other offense evidence has to impress the jury "in some irrational but nevertheless indelible way;" (3) the time the proponent will need to develop the evidence, during which the jury will be distracted from consideration of the indicted offense; and (4) the force of the proponent's need for this evidence to prove a fact of consequence. Harris v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7666 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2004).

1017. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court improperly permitted the State to elicit testimony about the details of defendant's prior conviction and his strategy of self-defense as the State's delving into the details of the prior shooting was prejudicial because it forced defendant to defend himself against charges that were not the subject of the present suit, implied that he was a violent man, and suggested that the current offense was in conformity with that character. Further, there was little, if any, probative value gained from the admission of the evidence. Arebalo v. State, 143 S.W.3d 402, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7157 (Tex. App. Austin 2004).

1018. Probative value of the extraneous offense evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial potential where the jury was instructed to consider such testimony only in determining the absence of mistake, or the identity or plan of defendant; defendant seriously contested the ultimate issue to which the extraneous offense evidence was relevant, and the evidence was not of such a nature that it would distract the jury from the charged offense or suggest to them they should convict on a moral or emotional basis rather than on a reasonable response to the relevant evidence. Acker v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6283 (Tex. App. Tyler July 14 2004).

1019. In an aggravated robbery case, the trial court did not err in admitting the witnesses' extraneous offenses testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) for the purpose of proving identity over defendant's objection because (1) defendant placed his identity in issue with the testimony of two alibi witnesses and the testimony of another individual, that he, and not defendant, was the robber; and (2) the danger of unfair prejudice from the witnesses' testimony was minimal because the jury was instructed that the witnesses' testimony could only be considered for the limited purposes set out in Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Chatman v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5410 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 17 2004).

1020. Where defendant's cell mate described what defendant had told him about the instant murder and also about another killing, the trial court had not erred in admitting the evidence of the other shooting because the extreme degree of similarity between the two murders made the evidence of the other murder highly probative. In addition, without evidence of defendant's involvement in the other murder, it would have been more difficult for the jury to resolve whether the cell mate was a credible witness. Corona v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5042 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 9 2004).

1021. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous assaults where they had sufficient similarities to the charged offense to have been introduced to show intent, and under the doctrine of chances those offenses had a multiplicative effect where each additional offense made the issue of intent more compelling, and the prejudicial effect of the evidence did not outweigh its probative value. Rickerson v. State, 138 S.W.3d 528, 2004 Tex. App.

LEXIS 4884 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

1022. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 403 by admitting evidence of defendant's prior deferred adjudication probation for possession of methamphetamine because defendant testified that she did not know a package in her possession contained drugs. The evidence was not likely to create such prejudice in the minds of the jury that it would have been unable to limit its consideration of the evidence to its proper purpose. Owen v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4144 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 6 2004).

1023. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err in permitting the victim's stepfather to testify that he saw defendant in the parking lot of the family's apartment complex a few weeks after the victim made her outcry where that evidence tended to corroborate the victim's testimony and was not, in itself, evidence of misconduct or bad character. The prosecutors' description of defendant as a "sexual predator" was a logical inference from his overall behavior as shown by the victim's testimony. Williams v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2878 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 1 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 927, 125 S. Ct. 1652, 161 L. Ed. 2d 489, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 2556, 73 U.S.L.W. 3556 (2005).

1024. In a murder trial, evidence of a prior shooting was relevant, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), to prove that defendant's intended victim was the prior victim, who was standing in a crowd with the complainant at the time of the charged offense. The court rejected an argument that was advanced for the first time on appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 403 because a separate objection was required to preserve that issue. Watters v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1852 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 26 2004).

1025. In a criminal prosecution for assaulting a public servant, the trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 404 by admitting evidence of the defendant's status as a parolee at the time of the offense. Defendant's desire to avoid being incarcerated for violating his parole was the triggering factor of the chain of events that ultimately resulted in the assault of a police officer. Hall v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 489 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 21 2004).

1026. In a drunk driving case, it was not error for the State to place defendant's stipulation of two prior convictions, which were jurisdictional elements of a felony offense, into evidence and to mention it in closing argument; the stipulation was evidence, could be received as such by the jury as the fact finder, and did not create a risk of unfair prejudice within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b). Shugart v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 427 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 15 2004).

1027. In a prosecution for aggravated sexual assault, a woman's testimony, alleging that defendant had sexually assaulted her 25 years earlier, was not unduly prejudicial or too remote, for any extraneous offense or bad act evidence is admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3, without regard to Tex. Evid. R. 404. Fowler v. State, 126 S.W.3d 307, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 405 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2004).

1028. Evidence admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) may be excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 404; if a defendant makes a timely objection, before the trial court can properly admit the evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a), it must first determine whether the non-character conformity purpose for which it is proffered is relevant to a material issue and if so, whether the evidence should nevertheless be excluded because its probative value is substantially outweighed by the factors set forth in Tex. R. Evid. 403. Saxer v. State, 115 S.W.3d 765, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 7512 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2003).

1029. Testimony of a witness that he and a murder victim had "shorted" the defendant in a marijuana transaction was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as a possible motivating factor for the killing of the victim by the defendant, and it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because its probative value was not so slight as to be substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant. Saxer v. State, 115 S.W.3d 765, 2003 Tex. App.

LEXIS 7512 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2003).

1030. Testimony of a witness that a defendant stated that if he found out who helped his wife move out of their apartment, he was going to kill that person, was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show the defendant's mental state a few days prior to the commission of a murder; the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because its prejudicial effect was related to its probative value rather than to an unrelated matter. Saxer v. State, 115 S.W.3d 765, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 7512 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2003).

1031. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), evidence of an extraneous offense may be admitted to prove identity, but an extraneous offense may be admitted to show identity only if identity is an issue in the case, and the defense may raise the issue of identity during cross-examination of the State's witnesses. Ortiz v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 2242 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 13 2003).

1032. Conviction of aggravated sexual assault was affirmed where the extraneous offense was similar enough to be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), as both crimes occurred within one week of each other, occurred at the same abandoned van, were violent and involved weapons, and the extraneous offense evidence was probative to the issue of identification under Tex. R. Evid. 403, as defendant made identity an issue when his main defense was that the victim could not positively identify him due to the fact that the crime occurred in near total darkness. Alexander v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1478 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 13 2003).

1033. After the trial court overruled an appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection, the appellant was required to make further objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in order to preserve the complaint for review. Mark v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 879 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 30 2003).

1034. After the trial court overruled an appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection, the appellant was required to make further objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in order to preserve the complaint for review. Mark v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 879 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 30 2003).

1035. Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test is an inherent part of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Lucky v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 11 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 6 2003).

1036. Trial court could have reasonably decided: (1) that pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) the extraneous offense evidence that defendant had been accused of child molestation had noncharacter conformity relevance where it rebutted defendant's defensive theory that defendant was framed and showed defendant's motive to solicit capital murder and, (2) that pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403 the extraneous offense evidence was not more prejudicial than probative; thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the evidence was admissible. Keen v. State, 85 S.W.3d 405, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 7339 (Tex. App. Tyler 2002).

1037. Trial court could have reasonably decided: (1) that pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) the extraneous offense evidence that defendant had been accused of child molestation had noncharacter conformity relevance where it rebutted defendant's defensive theory that defendant was framed and showed defendant's motive to solicit capital murder and, (2) that pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403 the extraneous offense evidence was not more prejudicial than probative; thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the evidence was admissible. Keen v. State, 85 S.W.3d 405, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 7339 (Tex. App. Tyler 2002).

1038. In a prosecution for possession with intent to deliver 400 grams or more of heroin, certain testimony elicited by the state that defendant had been distributing heroin near a particular city prior to the instant offense was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because testimony about how the investigation came to be focused upon defendant could have offered appropriate context in regard to the instant offense. Tapia v. State, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 2143 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 25 2002).

1039. Trial judge properly applied the balancing test found in Tex. R. Evid. 403 to exclude from a trial for aggravated assault evidence with respect to the victim's extraneous acts of violence in order to show defendant's state of mind under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Mozon v. State, 991 S.W.2d 841, 1999 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 39 (Tex. Crim. App. 1999).

1040. Detective's testimony was not hearsay because his testimony concerning the police department's prior investigations for the "same type of offense" was not offered to establish that defendant had been investigated for or committed other instances of indecent exposure. Rather, the testimony was offered to explain the course of his investigation and how defendant came to be a suspect, which was an acceptable, non-hearsay purpose for admitting an out-of-court statement. Denmon v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2180, 2014 WL 857671 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 27 2014).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

1041. During defendant's capital murder trial, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting evidence related to another murder on the ground that the two crimes were sufficiently similar such that evidence of the other murder was admissible to prove identity in the current case; the pattern and characteristics of the two murders were so distinctively similar that they constituted a "signature." Norwood v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9069, 2014 WL 4058820 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 15 2014).

1042. Although the evidence from the neighbor's apartment was not same transaction contextual evidence and the trial court abused its discretion in admitting it, the error was harmless given that the extent of the other evidence for defendant's guilt because the State found the marijuana hidden in defendant's truck, an officer observed defendant exit the apartment building appearing to hide something under his shirt, and defendant chose to lead police on a high-speech chase instead of submitting to the traffic stop. Gonzalez v. State, 510 S.W.3d 10, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8934 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

1043. Court did not err in allowing the State to offer the extraneous offense evidence, because the rule required that a request be submitted by the accused to trigger the Rule and no such request was given. Pompa v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9079, 2014 WL 4049880 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 14 2014).

1044. Because defendant did not request a limiting instruction when a sexual assault victim testified about alleged other wrongs or acts, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) never became law applicable to the case, the evidence was admissible for all purposes, and the trial court had no duty to include a Rule 404(b) limiting instruction in the charge. Irielle v. State, 441 S.W.3d 868, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8771 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 12 2014).

1045. During defendant's murder trial, the court did not err in admitting evidence that the two-year-old victim had sustained injuries to her thigh and genitals because the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b)to show that her injuries were not sustained accidentally. Sparks v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8392 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 31 2014).

1046. Court did not err in refusing to exclude the extraneous offense testimony to rebut a defensive theory of fabrication, because the extraneous evidence tended to make the defensive claim of fabrication less probable, and the extraneous offense evidence was probative to rebut defendant's defensive theories that defendant was not the type of person who would sexually abuse a child and that the abuse allegations were fabricated. Shockley v. State,

2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8345, 2014 WL 3756301 (Tex. App. Dallas July 30 2014).

1047. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of the victim's half-sister about sexual abuse that defendant had inflicted upon her under this rule because it tended to rebut defendant's theory that the victim had fabricated her claims and there were similarities between defendant's conduct as described by both. The prejudicial effect of the testimony did not substantially outweigh its probative value because it was not so graphic as to be worse than the specifics to which the victim had already testified. Hosey v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7876, 2014 WL 3621796 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 23 2014).

1048. Witness's testimony that defendant was angry and agitated earlier the same evening of the stabbing was admissible under this rule to prove defendant's motive or intent and to rebut his theory of self-defense. Allen v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7895 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 22 2014).

1049. At defendant's trial for four counts of tampering with a governmental record she prepared as a case-worker for the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services, she was not harmed by the admission of extraneous-offense testimony even though she did not receive sufficient notice. Because defendant received reasonable notice that the State intended to introduce extraneous-offense evidence that she made false entries claiming she made trips to the home of one family, the court could not see how her defensive strategy might have been different had she been given notice about the State's intent to introduce evidence of false entries in travel logs with respect to the second family. Washington v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7742, 2014 WL 3556525 (Tex. App. Waco July 17 2014).

1050. Murder victim's girlfriend was properly allowed to testify regarding an attempted drive-by shooting defendant committed against the victim, during which she was shot in the hand, and which occurred ten months before the murder, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Jones v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7739, 2014 WL 3556587 (Tex. App. Waco July 17 2014).

1051. Even if the court erred by admitting evidence about defendant's gang affiliation, the error was harmless because defendant and other individuals were in the bedroom with over ninety grams of crack cocaine, the packaging was consistent with the sale of drugs, and the house contained surveillance cameras. Villarreal v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7296, 2014 WL 3056509 (Tex. App. Dallas July 7 2014).

1052. Evidence of methamphetamine found at the murder scene was properly admitted because it was relevant to establish a motive for defendant's actions and to rebut her claim of accidentally shooting the victim; there was no evidence presented that defendant was in possession of the drugs, and the evidence was admissible because the jury could infer that the prior relationship between the victim and defendant was one that involved drugs. Taylor v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7282 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 3 2014).

1053. Where appellant was convicted for indecency with a child by exposure, it was not an abuse of discretion to admit the extraneous offense testimony of a nephew, who testified that appellant had sexually assaulted the nephew when the nephew was 14 years old, because appellant raised the defensive theory of fabrication during trial, and the extraneous offense was sufficiently similar to the charged offense. Laube v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7076, 2014 WL 2993823 (Tex. App. Dallas June 30 2014).

1054. During defendant's trial for sexual abuse of his daughter, the court did not err in instructing the jury that it could consider evidence of a 1983 incident in which defendant, then 17 years old, made his sister's seven- or eight-year-old friend undress and then put his penis in her mouth and hand; because defendant indicated that his daughter fabricated the allegations, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) permitted the jury to consider the extraneous offense to rebut that theory. James v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6994 (Tex. App. Austin June 27 2014).

1056. Based on the evidence before it, the trial court could have concluded that the evidence of defendant's extraneous prior abusive conduct toward an ex-wife rebutted the defensive theory presented to the jury, and the trial court's admission of the complained-of-testimony was not an abuse of discretion. Mata v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6736 (Tex. App. Austin June 24 2014).

1057. Defendant failed to show the court reversibly erred by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense, because by objecting to the evidence as "extraneous," defendant preserved only a complaint that the evidence was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) since it served no probative purpose, and even assuming the trial court abused its discretion, any error was harmless, as the State spent very little time developing the evidence, which was minor compared to the rest of the evidence implicating defendant in the robbery. Barrett v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6160 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 5 2014).

1058. Defendant failed to preserve his issue for appellate review because he created the impression that he was abandoning any objection that he opened the door to extraneous offenses by raising self-defense as a defensive theory, but even if the issue was preserved, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the extraneous offense evidence to rebut his theory that another person was the aggressor. Mcfadden v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6047, 2014 WL 2566480 (Tex. App. Waco June 5 2014).

1059. Court properly allowed evidence of defendant's prior conviction for possession of cocaine because the defensive theory was that he did not know the cocaine was in his pocket because it was placed there while he was unconscious; therefore, the evidence was relevant to rebut defendant's defensive theory. Rios v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5867 (Tex. App. El Paso May 30 2014).

1060. Witness's extraneous-offense testimony was sufficiently distinctive and similar to the charged offenses to qualify as modus operandi evidence relevant to the issue of consent where both women in this case were waitresses at the same nightclub working the same shift, both women identified as Hispanic, both women were approached by defendant while he wore his uniform and drove his patrol car, and both women were assaulted in the same park and on the same night. Joseph v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5712 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 29 2014).

1061. In defendant's trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child under fourteen years of age, evidence from two of the victim's cousins that defendant also molested them while they were visiting defendant and sleeping in the same bed with the victim was contextual and therefore admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b). Doss v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5702 (Tex. App. Dallas May 28 2014).

1063. Any error in the trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding the victim's prior acts because, even though the evidence was relevant to show the victim's tendency to provoke fights, the evidence already admitted showed that the victim was being combative and aggressive with defendant on the day in question. Waggoner v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4983 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 8 2014).

1064. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a copy of a check allegedly forged and presented by defendant because the State offered the evidence to establish defendant's knowledge that a copy of another check, which was identified in the indictment, was a forgery and that defendant therefore acted with the requisite intent to commit the offense of forgery and that there was no mistake or lack of intent, as defendant asserted at trial. Duncan v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4678, 2014 WL 1788173 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 1 2014).

1065. Defendant had not established an abuse of discretion with respect to a trial court's determination that the State's notice of a copy of a check it sought to admit into evidence was sufficient because defendant's attorney had actual notice of the evidence, which was provided to counsel in the State's discovery packet, and because based on the facts and circumstances set forth in the record, it would be possible for reasonable minds to reach different conclusions about whether the State's notice was reasonable and whether defendant suffered unfair surprise when the State offered the copy of the check into evidence. Duncan v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4678, 2014 WL 1788173 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 1 2014).

1066. Defendant's request for notice of a copy of a check the State sought to use to establish defendant's knowledge that the check identified in the indictment was a forgery was deficient in the sense that it was limited to evidence to be offered by the State during the punishment phase of trial, whereas the complained-of evidence was offered during the guilt-innocence phase of trial. Duncan v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4678, 2014 WL 1788173 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 1 2014).

1067. Evidence that defendant engaged in similar misconduct in the past-that he would slip out of a bed occupied by a sleeping wife to molest his stepdaughter -undermined the defensive theory that he had "no opportunity" to molest the victim because of the presence of his wife, and therefore, the evidence was properly admitted. Donato v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4698 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 30 2014).

1068. Because the record was silent as to why counsel failed to object to the admission of a syringe and evidence of methamphetamine use, the court presumed that his conduct was reasonable. Griffis v. State, 441 S.W.3d 599, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4598 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 30 2014).

1069. On appeal from his conviction for possession of methamphetamine, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence that the officer stopped the vehicle because of its association with a prior burglary since the testimony showed that the officer had a valid reason to stop the vehicle and was not an attempt to establish an extraneous offense to prove defendant's character in order to show action in conformity with that character; the testimony was critical and its probative value was clearly not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Mancilla v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4649 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 29 2014).

1070. At defendant's trial for three counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child and two counts of indecency with a child by contact based on conduct occurring over a two-year period, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence about the details of defendant's ongoing sexual misconduct with the victim. Because it was same-transaction contextual evidence, the trial court was not obligated to issue a contemporaneous-limiting instruction. Ramirez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3955, 2014 WL 1410344 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 10 2014).

1071. As the proponent of an investigator's testimony, it was incumbent upon the State to satisfy to the trial court that the other crime, wrong, or act had relevance apart from its tendency to prove character in order to show that she acted in conformity therewith. Almaguer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3842, 2014 WL 1415182 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 10 2014).

1072. Evidence of defendant's parole appointment, and an investigator's follow up with her parole officer had relevance apart from its tendency to prove character conformity, that is, the motive for her departure to Mexico shortly after the child's death and funeral. Almaguer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3842, 2014 WL 1415182 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 10 2014).

1073. Trial court heard both the State's and defendant's arguments in favor and against other act admission, recognized it was a close call, and favored admission, and the ruling was within the zone of reasonable disagreement and not an abuse of discretion. Almaguer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3842, 2014 WL 1415182 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 10 2014).

1074. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of a robbery allegedly committed by defendant two days prior to the charged offense, because the similarities in the proximity of time and setting, the mode of commission of the two offenses, and the victims' similar descriptions of the robber and his hoodie constituted sufficiently distinguishing characteristics to allow the evidence as evidence of identity. Collins v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3549, 2014 WL 1318882 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2014).

1075. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted defendant's prior robbery conviction because he raised the issue of identity by challenging the eyewitness's description, challenged defendant's identity as the robber, and challenged the photo array. The robberies were similar because they occurred six days apart, they occurred shortly after 10 p.m., they occurred in the same area, both businesses were convenience stores, the suspects in both robberies were wearing the same type of zip-up hoodies, and both robberies occurred when only one clerk was present inside the store. Dudley v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3083, 2014 WL 1101563 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 20 2014).

1076. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the introduction of extraneous offense evidence that he had assaulted his wife and a peace officer because counsel did object, the evidence constituted the same transaction contextual evidence and was admissible as an exception under this rule and because the record was silent the court presumed that counsel's actions were motivated by sound trial strategy. Hernandez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3079, 2014 WL 1101587 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 20 2014).

1077. Because similar evidence showing that defendant was a car thief was admitted without objection, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the portions of defendant's fourth statement to the police. Adams v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2762, 2014 WL 989260 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 12 2014).

1078. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence under this rule that defendant had previously pled no contest to indecent exposure and was placed on deferred adjudication because it had a tendency to make defendant's defensive theory, that he had a physical inability that prevented him from developing an intent to sexually arouse or gratify himself, less probable. Arteaga v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2434, 2014 WL 866461 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 5 2014).

1079. Admission of the extraneous evidence was not improper under this rule because it was strikingly similar to the charged offense, it tended to prove he did not have the physical inability he claimed, absent the evidence of defendant's past conduct the State had no way to rebut defendant's claim of physical inability, any prejudice was limited by the trial court's limiting instructions, and the presentation of the evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Arteaga v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2434, 2014 WL 866461 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 5

1080. Jury charge was not erroneous because the alleged error did not suggest that defendant acted with the intent to arouse or gratify his sexual desire when read in the context of the next sentence, in which the trial court clearly stated that the jury had to find, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the act was committed. There was no error in the second paragraph simply because it failed to track the language of this rule. Arteaga v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2434, 2014 WL 866461 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 5 2014).

1081. In a criminal proceeding, the document filed by the State served a dual purpose as both a motion to enhance punishment and as notice to defendant of intent to enhance punishment based on his prior convictions. Because defendant pled true to the enhancement allegations and stipulated to the evidence in support of them, any error by the State in alleging the prior convictions in the form of a motion, as opposed to in the form of a notice, was harmless. Green v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1753 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 19 2014).

1082. On appeal of defendant's conviction for aggravated robbery, he claimed the trial court abused its discretion when it allowed evidence of four prior convictions that were over ten years old to be admitted during the guilt/innocence phase of the trial. Because defendant introduced the evidence of his prior convictions on direct examination, he had waived any error. Richardson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1723, 2014 WL 645801 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 14 2014).

1083. During defendant's trial for murdering her tenth husband, the court did not err in admitting testimony of defendant's affairs, including her recent sexual encounter with one lover and her communications with an ex-husband, for the limited purpose of showing an absence of mistake or accident and motive to kill. Maxwell v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1514, 2014 WL 556377 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 12 2014).

1084. At defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony that he committed extraneous offenses in that he supplied drugs to the victim in the course of his sexual assaults. The evidence helped to fill in the gaps and explain the circumstances surrounding the offense. Washington v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 933 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 30 2014).

1085. Although the trial court erred when it failed to grant defendant's motions to sever, based upon the overwhelming evidence of guilt as to each offense, defendant's substantial rights were not adversely affected by the joinder of the offenses of sexual assault, aggravated sexual assault, and indecency with a child by exposure into a single trial. Because the trial court in a separate trial for each offense could have admitted evidence of the other offenses to show same transaction context or to rebut defendant's suggestion of fabrication, separate juries would have heard similar evidence. Rodriguez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1018 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 30 2014).

1086. Testimony of two other purported victims of sexual assault by a defendant was properly admitted since the defendant raised the issue of consent and opened the door to evidence of the defendant's intent to engage and a pattern of engaging in sex with victims while they were unable to consent. Dilg v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 963, 2014 WL 458019 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 29 2014).

1087. In an arson case arising from an apartment complex fire, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous offenses because defendant had argued that she did not start the fire and that the investigators were not able to rule out an accident as the cause of the fire, and in order to show that defendant had a motive and to indicate the lack of accident, evidence of her volatile relationship with one of the complex's residents and evidence that she had set fire to his car on a previous occasion was relevant apart from showing conformity with character; it did not matter that the resident was not named as the victim or the complainant in the indictment. Sanders v. State,

1088. Two prior plans to rob the store and burn the store owner's home and stage a car accident directly rebutted defendant's claim of duress, and thus the evidence was admissible. Seibel v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 781, 2014 WL 261053 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 23 2014).

1089. In a burglary case, the evidence of a prior burglary was admissible during the guilt/innocence phase to prove identify. Because a credit card stolen from the first victim was found in the second victims' apartment and apparently was used to force open the locked door, it created a link between the crime; defendant was identified in store pictures as the person carrying the stolen wallet that contained the credit card. Martinez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 824, 2014 WL 458015 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 23 2014).

1090. Two prior plans to rob the store and burn the store owner's home and stage a car accident directly rebutted defendant's claim of duress, and thus the evidence was admissible. Seibel v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 781, 2014 WL 261053 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 23 2014).

1091. In a burglary case, the evidence of a prior burglary was admissible during the guilt/innocence phase to prove identify. Because a credit card stolen from the first victim was found in the second victims' apartment and apparently was used to force open the locked door, it created a link between the crime; defendant was identified in store pictures as the person carrying the stolen wallet that contained the credit card. Martinez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 824, 2014 WL 458015 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 23 2014).

1092. State was not required to give notice of the punishment phase testimony of two witnesses because, at no point, did defendant formally request notice prior to the commencement of the punishment phase. Also, the trial court's actions gave defendant several days to prepare for the testimony of the two new witnesses even though he was legally entitled to none. Flores v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 611, 2014 WL 235276 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 22 2014).

1093. State was not required to give notice of the punishment phase testimony of two witnesses because, at no point, did defendant formally request notice prior to the commencement of the punishment phase. Also, the trial court's actions gave defendant several days to prepare for the testimony of the two new witnesses even though he was legally entitled to none. Flores v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 611, 2014 WL 235276 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 22 2014).

1094. At defendant's trial for robbery, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony regarding his efforts to resist arrest because evidence relevant to his flight from the scene was a circumstance indicative of guilt. As defense counsel objected to the evidence about the details of the arrest on the grounds of relevance, defendant's argument under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not preserved for review. Johnson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 471, 2014 WL 222929 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 16 2014).

1095. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted testimony showing that defendant called his friend and asked him to change his testimony. Even if it did rise to the level of witness tampering, the testimony showing that defendant told the friends to tell the jury that he was holding a cell phone instead of a gun was admissible as evidence of consciousness of guilt. Dyer v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 524, 2014 WL 268571 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 16 2014).

1096. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence during the guilt/innocence phase of trial of an extraneous aggravated robbery where, through his testimony, defendant opened the door to this evidence. Thomas v. State,

2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 327, 2014 WL 117421 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 13 2014).

1097. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting an extraneous offense, a prior sexual assault, into evidence because defendant opened the door to its admissibility through his cross-examination of the victim, which implied that she consented to the sexual intercourse. Morales v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 312, 2014 WL 108770 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 10 2014).

1098. Evidence that defendant voluntarily took drugs on other occasions was relevant to rebut his involuntary intoxication affirmative defense, which would negate the element of his mens rea in this assault case, but even if the court assumed the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the evidence, the three convictions about which defendant complained were hardly the only evidence of his drug use, and the error, if any, did not affected defendant's substantial rights. Quinn v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 117 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 7 2014).

1099. In an aggravated assault with a deadly weapon case, the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence of prior violence by defendant toward the victim because it could help establish that the breakup motivated defendant to act violently toward the victim and by extension toward the boyfriend who had taken his place beyond the tendency of the evidence to show defendant's inclination toward violence. Gray v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3, 2014 WL 24410 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 2 2014).

1100. Trial court did not err during defendant's aggravated sexual assault trial in allowing the State to offer testimony from the victim during its rebuttal case that defendant sexually assaulted him on at least four occasions when he was twelve or thirteen because defendant had asserted that the victim consented to the alleged sexual encounter; the evidence thus tended to rebut the defensive theory of consent. Hernandez v. State, 426 S.W.3d 820, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2245, 2014 WL 887278 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 27 2014).

1101. At defendant's trial for capital murder where the indictment alleged that he committed the murder of the complainant in the course of committing a robbery the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of an extraneous robbery offense committed by defendant. Because defendant asserted there was no indication that a shooting took place during a robbery and the element of his specific intent to kill the complainant was at issue, the extraneous offense was admissible to rebut the defense theory. Smith v. State, 420 S.W.3d 207, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15280, 2013 WL 6699495 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 19 2013).

1102. Defendant did not show that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to specifically include a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection in his objection to testimony because trial counsel reasonably could have concluded that the testimony described past criminal behavior and not just inchoate statements. Perkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15003, 2013 WL 6569874 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 12 2013).

1103. Under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the police officer's testimony about the database entries was properly admitted because there was no evidence that the entries pertained to a crime or bad act connected with defendant. Loera v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15030, 2013 WL 6628959 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 12 2013).

1104. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses defendant allegedly committed in 1992 because the offenses were extremely similar, no alternative source of proof was available, and by attacking the truth of the child victim's testimony and outcries defendant attempted to eliminate the State's only source of proof. Cruz v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14659, 2013 WL 7964238 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 5 2013).

1105. Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing defendant's niece to testify about defendant's alleged sexual assault upon her because the testimony had logical relevance apart from character conformity when it showed that the alleged victim's allegations were less likely to be fabricated, was properly admitted to rebut the defense's theory of fabrication, and served to show defendant's course of conduct, motive, and intent. Munger v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14728, 2013 WL 6512674 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 5 2013).

1106. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's prior conviction of unlawfully carrying a weapon because it was relevant to rebutting his defensive theory of insanity, the trial court instructed the jury not to consider that as evidence he was guilty of the charged offense, and the State only asked two questions about the prior crime, one of which the jury was instructed to disregard. Thomas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14744, 2013 WL 6405479 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 5 2013).

1107. Witness's statement that defendant had previously been incarcerated was inadmissible under the rule, but the statement that defendant was an ex-con was not more inflammatory than statements made in other cases and an instruction to disregard was given, and thus there was no abuse of discretion in the denial of defendant's mistrial motion. Manderscheid v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14768, 2013 WL 6405470 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 5 2013).

1108. Trial court did not err in admitting testimony showing that defendant was the driver of a vehicle involved in a drive-by shooting four days before the alleged victim was shot because the evidence was probative to show opportunity and identity and to rebut defendant's defensive theory that he was not the perpetrator, and there was nothing confusing or misleading about the evidence. Williams v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14602, 2013 WL 6253764 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 4 2013).

1109. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence extraneous offense testimony because it was relevant to rebut defendant's theory of self-defense. Defendant raised the issue of self-defense when he testified that he felt threatened and thought his life was in grave danger at the time he shot at the front tire of the complainant's vehicle; the State presented evidence of two prior violent acts in which he acted as an aggressor and later asserted that he had acted in self-defense. Franks v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14442 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 26 2013).

1110. At defendant's trial for indecent exposure, the court did not err in allowing the State to question him regarding his prior conviction for indecency with a child because the circumstances surrounding the earlier offense made it more probable that defendant exposed himself with intent to arouse sexual desire. Rodriguez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14268, 2013 WL 6147789 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 21 2013).

1111. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence, Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), given the evidence already accumulated against defendant, and any error was harmless. Hicks v. State, 419 S.W.3d 555, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14091, 2013 WL 6076468 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 18 2013).

1112. Counsel could have found that he needed to present evidence of defendant's drug use and theft to explain his behavior and help explain why defendant ran from police, and this was not so outrageous that no attorney would have engaged in it. Williams v. State, 417 S.W.3d 162, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13978, 2013 WL 6028845 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 14 2013).

1113. Counsel might have opted not to object to gang affiliation questioning because he did not want to call attention to the evidence, and because he felt the answers adequately dispelled the gang notion, and defendant did not show ineffective assistance of counsel in this regard. Williams v. State, 417 S.W.3d 162, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS

13978, 2013 WL 6028845 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 14 2013).

1114. At defendant's trial for possession of a controlled substance, a witness's comment during direct examination that defendant was out on parole did not warrant a mistrial, because the State's questioning was developing the narrative, the State did not anticipate a reference to an extraneous offense, and the reference was not a concrete statement of a prior offense. The prompt objection and instruction to disregard prevented any elaboration on the offense. Joseph v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13998, 2013 WL 6045902 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 12 2013).

1115. On appeal of defendant's conviction for burglary of a habitation and possession of a controlled substance, cocaine, in an amount of less than one gram, he claimed that the State violated his right to a fair trial by introducing, without the required notice, evidence of his prior crimes, wrongs, or acts. Because defendant did not complain that he had not been given proper notice, the error was not preserved for review. Washington v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13793, 2013 WL 5952144 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 7 2013).

1116. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of an extraneous offense-indecency with a child by contact-against the victim's sister where the evidence showed the victim's allegations of indecency by grinding and other acts were less likely to be fabricated, as defendant claimed, because defendant had similar contact with the victim's sister in the same house under similar circumstances; defendant's conduct with the sister showed a similar motive, plan, opportunity, and intent to assault the victim. Delacruz v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13492, 2013 WL 5890796 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 31 2013).

1117. On appeal of defendant's conviction for two counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child and one count of continuous sexual abuse of a child, his complaint that the trial court erred by admitting a judgment to show that he had a prior conviction for indecency with a child was not preserved for review because defendant did not raise his Tex. R. Evid. 404 objection at trial. Loveday v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13364, 2013 WL 5874280 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 30 2013).

1118. In a murder case, the court erred by failing to require the State to redact portions of defendant's recorded statement admitting he had previously been in prison three times, but the error was harmless because the statement had no more than a slight effect on the jury's verdict. Barley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13313, 2013 WL 5827728 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 29 2013).

1119. Court did not err during defendant's felony murder trial in allowing testimony that he had been trying to sell a shotgun two or three days prior to the shooting; the testimony respecting the attempted sale of the shotgun was same transaction contextual evidence. Mcdonald v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13191, 2013 WL 5774874 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 23 2013).

1120. Appellant's solicitation came in a motion asking the trial court to order the State to give notice and that the order encompass discovery of all the State's evidence that would be used to establish each prior crime, but the trial court never ruled on the motion, which was required before the State's duty to produce or disclose was triggered; the court could not say the trial court erred in admitting the evidence even if prior notice of the State's intent to do so was not provided. Benitez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13146, 2013 WL 5782923 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 22 2013).

1121. State did provide notice of its intent to offer evidence of extraneous offenses related to a prior kidnapping involving the same victim as in the current case, and a supplemental notice was also filed in advance of the trial; the subject matter of the pictures in question overlapped with the subject matter of the victim's testimony, such that no harm resulted from the admission of the pictures, assuming the State failed to provide reasonable prior notice.

Benitez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13146, 2013 WL 5782923 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 22 2013).

1122. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence because in light of the defensive theory to attack State's evidence, evidence that defendant chewed and destroyed crack cocaine during a prior traffic stop increased the likelihood that defendant did the same during the instant traffic stop. The court could not hold that the probative value of showing a lack of accident or mistake was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or the misleading nature of the evidence. Williams v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12925, 2013 WL 5676226 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 17 2013).

1123. Evidence that the complainant's life had been threatened because she was a witness to the aggravated robbery was relevant and admissible because it refuted the defensive theory that she had fabricated the whole episode to conceal the fact that she had stolen the property herself; by attacking the complainant's credibility, defense counsel sought to undermine her identification of defendant as one of the thieves and, in doing so, negate one of the elements of the offense, i.e., defendant's identity. Wilhite v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12608, 2013 WL 5604741 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 10 2013).

1124. There was no indication that defendant requested notice of evidence of extraneous acts that the State intended to introduce, and thus no notice was required. Michaels v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12624, 2013 WL 5604757 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 10 2013).

1125. Evidence of defendant's absenteeism was intended to prove his identity, as his absenteeism was the event that led to him changing his name, and as the evidence was relevant as to his identity, it was admissible to prove such. Michaels v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12624, 2013 WL 5604757 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 10 2013).

1126. State did not emphasize defendant's absenteeism or draw any connection between this evidence and any other evidence, and nothing suggested that the admission of this evidence had an deleterious effect on the jury, such that any error was harmless. Michaels v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12624, 2013 WL 5604757 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 10 2013).

1127. Where the homeowner contracted for the completion of her home and failed to make payments, the evidence was sufficient to support the jury's fraud verdict because the homeowner's acts before and after her promise to the contractor were admissible under this rule as circumstantial evidence of her fraudulent intent. Testimony from the prior contractor and an electrician showed a pattern of misconduct involving the same construction project. Zorrilla v. Aypco Constr. Ii, Llc, 421 S.W.3d 54, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12440, 2013 WL 5506697 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 3 2013).

1128. Admission of the numerous bad acts committed by defendant prior to his burglary of a hotel were properly admitted to show his intent and motive to burglarize the hotel-to steal money in order to buy more crack-and also to rebut his defense that he was not the driver of a stolen vehicle that collided with a street sweeper. The evidence leading up to the collision showed that defendant was with another individual in the stolen vehicle all day and that the person he claimed was driving was not in the vehicle. Bell v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12086, 2013 WL 5522245 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 26 2013).

1129. Trial court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence of two witnesses concerning prior sexual assaults because defendant opened the door to the admission of evidence to rebut his defensive theory of fabrication. Implicit in defense counsel's opening statement was the victim fabricated her outcry and in his cross-examination of several witnesses counsel repeatedly asked witnesses about the custody battle between defendant and the victim's aunt and uncle and the victim's truthfulness. Jones v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12150, 2013

WL 5494678 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 26 2013).

1130. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting extraneous-offense evidence during defendant's trial on a charge of possession of less than one gram of cocaine because the extraneous offense, which was committed while defendant was on bail awaiting the instant trial, also involved possession of cocaine thereby establishing defendant's familiarity with the substance and the jury was given an appropriate limiting instruction; the extraneous offense involved over six grams of cocaine. Baker v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11745, 2013 WL 12297784 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 18 2013).

1131. Admission of extraneous-offense evidence, regarding defendant's two encounters with children in public restrooms, did not affect defendant's substantial rights because testimony regarding the encounters did not consume an inordinate amount of time during trial, the State focused the majority of its closing argument on the evidence establishing the charged offenses, and the trial court gave a limiting instruction. Hoard v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11760 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 18 2013).

1132. Extraneous burglary was nearly identical to the offenses in question, as the burglary took place at almost the same time of day with the same number of perpetrators of the same ethnic background and the stolen items were similar, and the evidence tipped in favor of admitting the extrinsic evidence going to the identity issue; a cautionary instruction was given, and the probative value of the evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect. Houston v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11753 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 17 2013).

1133. Evidence supported defendant's conviction of burglary and attempted burglary, given in part that he fit the description of one of the burglars, he was found in the immediate vicinity of the burgled houses, he resisted an officer's efforts to handcuff him and fled, and the evidence of the extraneous burglary committed six months later was so similar to the instant offenses that the offenses were marked by his handiwork providing circumstantial evidence of identity. Houston v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11753 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 17 2013).

1134. Trial court erred by admitting extraneous conduct evidence that he inappropriately touched another child a decade before instant assault because it had no relevance as to motive, issue of opportunity was not raised, defendant never claimed he lacked intent, and there was no logical link between the prior act and an ultimate plan to have sex with the instant victim. The error was not harmless because the evidence against defendant was not overwhelming and the evidence was inherently inflammatory. Sandoval v. State, 409 S.W.3d 259, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11657 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 13 2013).

1135. Evidence of defendant's gang affiliation was admissible to illuminate the nature of the crime alleged because his affiliation with the gang was evidence of his capacity to carry out the threat, or have it carried out, which in turn made it more likely that he made the threat as the witness testified. Simmang v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11529 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 11 2013).

1136. Although the State did not provide notice of its intent to introduce evidence of marijuana taken from defendant at the scene of his DWI arrest as required by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), defendant's counsel was aware of the existence of the marijuana evidence, did not ask for a continuance of the trial, and did not show how his trial strategy would have been different if he had been provided notice; therefore, any error was harmless. Voltmann v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11445 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 5 2013).

1137. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the three burglaries into evidence for purposes of identity because they were sufficiently similar to the charged offense. The three extraneous burglaries and the charged offense occurred during the daytime hours, in the same area, and close in time. Lawson v. State, 2013 Tex. App.

LEXIS 11334 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 4 2013).

1138. Evidence defendant had money to repay another's debt to the victim from selling drugs, and evidence defendant borrowed that money back to buy more drugs was not relevant to a fact of consequence and was inadmissible; the extraneous offense evidence was not necessary to the jury's understanding of the offense or rebut any defensive theories. Parker v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11232 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 30 2013).

1139. Extraneous offense evidence regarding drugs did not have a substantial effect on the verdict, as the jury was aware of drug use and defendant conceded he shot the victim. Parker v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11232 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 30 2013).

1140. Because the record did not clearly establish that defense counsel did not receive notice of the State's intent to introduce the testimony of defendant's girlfriend and the victim concerning defendant's attempts to persuade them to drop the charges, the court could not conclude that counsel's failure to object on the ground that he lacked notice under this rule constituted deficient performance. Agbogwe v. State, 414 S.W.3d 820, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11103 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 29 2013).

1141. Evidence of defendant's previous domestic violence offenses was properly admitted because it rebutted the defensive theory presented to the jury. Shelby v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10867 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 28 2013).

1142. Admission of extraneous offense evidence that defendant used illegal drugs was error because defendant's alleged heroin use was not necessary to the jury's understanding of whether or not defendant committed murder. However, the error was harmless because the witness testified to defendant's other drug use without objection, and the evidence was sufficient to support the conviction without the evidence of defendant's alleged heroin use. Boyd v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10875 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 27 2013).

1143. Because the similarities in the proximity of time and place, and the mode of commission of the three offenses (cars set on fire) constituted sufficiently distinguishing characteristics such that the State's introduction of the extraneous offenses to prove defendant's identity was permissible. Morin v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10549 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 22 2013).

1144. Similar crimes evidence admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) against a defendant convicted of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02(a)(2), if error, did not have a substantial effect on the jury's verdict given other evidence that defendant was the perpetrator of the assault. Tovar v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10404 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 20 2013).

1145. Despite defendant's contention to the contrary, the record showed that the trial court properly instructed the jury that it could consider the extraneous offense evidence only if it believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant had committed the offense and only in determining the motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident of defendant. Nash v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10452 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 20 2013).

1146. Decision to admit extraneous offense evidence as sufficiently similar was not arbitrary, as the victims were young females alone in their homes, the surviving victims identified defendant as the attacker who threatened to break their necks, and all were strangled to some degree; while there were differences in the offenses, defendant did not show the trial court acted unreasonably in finding the differences did not require exclusion. Reed v. State,

2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10489 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 20 2013).

1147. Decision that the extraneous offense evidence was not substantially outweighed by the potential for unfair prejudice was not an abuse of discretion, given that the evidence was compelling on the issue of identity, and the evidence, while sexual in nature, was unlikely to affect the jury in an irrational way based on the sexual characteristics of the murder in question. Reed v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10489 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 20 2013).

1148. Even if it was an abuse its discretion to admit extraneous offense evidence, the error was not reversible because the court had a fair assurance that it did not influence the jury or had but a slight effect, given that the record included other victim testimony identifying defendant as the man who attacked her, plus other witnesses identified defendant in a lineup. Reed v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10489 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 20 2013).

1149. Testimony from a State's witness that defendant appeared to be either high on drugs or coming off a high on the morning of his attack against the complainant was admissible because it established an affirmative link between defendant's earlier condition and the offense, rather than being mere background contextual evidence; defendant appeared high earlier in the day, asked the witness for money, and told the complainant he broke into her house because he was looking for money. Steele v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10488 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 20 2013).

1150. Even if the trial court erred by admitting a witness's testimony about the burglary of vehicle, the error was harmless given the strength of the State's case, the limited scope of the witness's testimony, defendant pleaded guilty before the jury to burglarizing the witness's vehicle, and an officer repeated the substance of the witness's testimony without objection. Rendon v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10103 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 14 2013).

1151. Accomplice's testimony that he and defendant were involved in another aggravated robbery of a taxi cab driver four days before the murder was not inadmissible because it showed that defendant was involved in a virtually identical aggravated robbery, it was relevant to show defendant's intent to commit a robbery, his intent to kill, and that it was reasonably foreseeable that a death would occur, and it rebutted defendant's contention that the accomplice murdered the taxi driver. Stephens v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10188 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 14 2013).

1152. Even if the trial court erred by allowing the State to elicit testimony from defendant's wife about an incident involving defendant and the child victim without notice, the error was harmless because defendant learned of the testimony before trial and he was prepared and cross-examined the wife about the incident. Lair v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9906 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 8 2013).

1153. Trial court did not err in including a reference to extraneous offenses because the jury charge properly instructed the jury in how it could consider the extraneous offense evidence, and it limited the jury's use of the evidence to only those purposes explicitly permitted by Texas Rules of Evidence. Perkinson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9948 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 8 2013).

1154. Any error in the admission of extraneous offenses evidence was not preserved for review because defendant did not explicitly challenge the admission of the evidence on appeal but rather, his argument was confined to the propriety of the limiting instruction contained in the jury charge. Perkinson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9948 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 8 2013).

1155. Even if the trial court erred in including a reference to extraneous offenses in the jury charge, defendant could not show that he was harmed by the error because if the trial court had sustained defense counsel's objection and excluded the instruction, the jury would have been free to consider evidence of defendant's extraneous offenses for any purpose, including character conformity. Perkinson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9948 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 8 2013).

1156. On appeal of defendant's conviction for robbery causing bodily injury and aggravated robbery with a deadly weapon, he claimed the trial court erred in considering information regarding an extraneous offense involving a cell phone. Because defendant failed to object to this evidence during his sentencing hearing, the issue was waived. Delgado v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9774 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 6 2013).

1157. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses committed against his younger stepdaughter because they were so intertwined with the sexual assaults against the older stepdaughter that the jury's understanding of the offenses would have been obscured without them. The evidence also rebutted the defensive theory of fabrication, was sufficiently similar to the charged offense, and only limited details were introduced. Campos v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9593 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 1 2013).

1158. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by permitting State to introduce evidence of sexual assault of one victim by accomplice because the facts of the case would have been incomplete and difficult to follow had it been excised from the sequence of events, as it occurred while other victim was being killed and before first victim was kidnapped and locked in her car. The probative force of the evidence and the State's need for the evidence favored admission and it took minimal time to develop. Smith v. State, 424 S.W.3d 588, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9093, 2013 WL 3832691 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 25 2013).

1159. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of an incident involving a pornographic video that defendant showed to his child sexual assault victim (his teenaged daughter) where the evidence constituted same-transaction contextual evidence because the showing of the pornographic video was intertwined with defendant's efforts to make the victim comfortable with the actual sexual acts perpetrated. The evidence provided pertinent background information that assisted the jury in understanding the underlying sexual assaults. Freeman v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8566 (Tex. App. Waco July 11 2013).

1160. Because evidence pertaining to defendant's showing of a pornographic video to his teenaged daughter constituted same-transaction contextual evidence in defendant's aggravated child sexual assault case, the notice provisions of the rules of evidence and the code of criminal procedure did not apply. Freeman v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8566 (Tex. App. Waco July 11 2013).

1161. Trial court was not obligated to issue an instruction limiting the usage of evidence pertaining to a pornographic video that defendant showed to his child sexual assault victim (his teenaged daughter) because the complained-of evidence constituted same-transaction contextual evidence; the evidence was properly received as general evidence. Freeman v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8566 (Tex. App. Waco July 11 2013).

1162. Identity of a person was at issue, the State had to prove that this person negotiated the drug sale, and the trial court admonished the jury that the extraneous offenses were to be considered only for the purposes of identifying appellant, such that the trial court did not err in allowing a witness to discuss appellant's extraneous offenses. Duarte v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8609 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 11 2013).

1163. In a case in which defendant was found guilty of two counts of indecency with a child for the sexual abuse of his granddaughter, a prior victim's testimony that defendant, a family friend, sexually assaulted her when she was seven years old was probative to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication and was admissible. Bible v. State, 2013

Tex. App. LEXIS 8354 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 10 2013).

1164. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant's complaint that he did not receive notice that extraneous evidence of a check-cashing incident would be used at trial was without merit as he acknowledged receiving the report which included the check-cashing incident. Cross v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8535 (Tex. App. Dallas July 10 2013).

1165. In an aggravated robbery case, the extraneous evidence of a check-cashing incident was same-transaction contextual evidence, and, as such, no notice that it would be introduced at trial was required. Cross v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8535 (Tex. App. Dallas July 10 2013).

1166. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant waived any straight forward, substantive objection to the admission of testimony concerning extraneous evidence of a check-cashing incident because he did not make that objection at trial. Cross v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8535 (Tex. App. Dallas July 10 2013).

1167. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting an extraneous offense regarding marijuana found on defendant's person and in his car because it was admissible same transaction contextual evidence; defendant's possession of an illegal substance explained his possible motive for hitting a detective and fleeing the scene before the drugs could be found, and he was not acting suspiciously until the detective moved closer. Finney v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8317 (Tex. App. Dallas July 8 2013).

1168. Defense counsel preserved for review the issue of whether the trial court erred in admitting an extraneous offense because defense counsel emphasized what rules his request for a running objection was based on, and the trial court stated that the evidence was admitted as inextricably intertwined with the offense. Finney v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8317 (Tex. App. Dallas July 8 2013).

1169. In a drug case, although a trial court should not have admitted two illegal arrest records during sentencing because the State failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the crimes had actually been committed by appellant in the two arrests, there was little to no affect on the jury where appellant had 35 arrest records. Simmons v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7833 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 27 2013).

1170. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the extraneous offense evidence (unadjudicated aggravated robbery) over defendant's objections, because the evidence supported the State's theory that defendant intended to participate in the offenses. Menendez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7742 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 26 2013).

1171. In a trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child, there was no error in admitting the victim's testimony that defendant physically abused the victim's pets because the evidence rebutted the defensive theory that the allegations were being fabricated and tended to explain why the victim and the siblings feared defendant, were compliant, and did not tell anyone about the abuse. Almager v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7614, 2013 WL 3355722 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 21 2013).

1172. Based on the trial court's instructions, defendant was required to raise a contemporaneous objection to the witnesses' testimony, but when they testified, counsel only objected once, and because he did not raise an extraneous offense objection at trial when the testimony was offered, the complaint was waived. Moore v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7436 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 19 2013).

1173. During defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation with intent to commit sexual assault, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in allowing a witness to testify that he made sexual advances toward her while they were on a date and that she rejected his advances because the testimony was relevant to determining his intent and state of mind when he entered the victim's house about two hours later. Badura v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7249 (Tex. App. Eastland June 13 2013).

1174. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant's statement to a witness who had been in jail with him before the trial, that defendant was the "shooter," where the State did not offer the inmate's testimony as evidence of an extraneous offense separate and apart from the charged offense but, instead offered the evidence as proof that defendant fired the shots that killed the victim. The statement was an admission by a party-opponent, supported the allegation that defendant killed the victim, directly contradicted defendant's defensive theory that his accomplices only named him as the shooter to get a reduced sentence, and was not likely to impress the jury in some irrational but nevertheless indelible way. Haynes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7232 (Tex. App. Eastland June 13 2013).

1175. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it permitted a witness who had been in jail with defendant before the trial to testify that defendant threatened to kill him where the threat was a relevant extraneous offense, as the testimony was evidence that defendant made the threat to instill fear in the witness and to prevent him from testifying. Defendant's actions were probative of guilt, and the testimony was not unfairly prejudicial because defendant did not try to connect his threat to a different offense, and because the record was devoid of any evidence that the threat was related to anything else. Haynes v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7232 (Tex. App. Eastland June 13 2013).

1176. Defendant claimed the trial court erred in admitting extraneous offense evidence at punishment because the notice was sent late, and although he also claimed the trial court erred in admitting such evidence at guilt-innocence, as he only pointed to evidence adduced during punishment, the court reviewed the issue under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 and not Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Spring v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7292 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 13 2013).

1177. Counsel asked to note his objection to evidence of gang membership now or at any time during the trial, and the trial court said, "Okay;" this statement did not constitute an adverse ruling for preservation purposes. Mendoza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7157 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 12 2013).

1178. Defendant did not make a proper Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection to the testimony of a witness, and although defendant objected, he said the testimony was speculative, but this did not comport with his complaint on appeal. Mendoza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7157 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 12 2013).

1179. Assuming defendant preserved error on the admission of evidence of his affiliation with the Mexican Mafia, the trial court abused its discretion in admitting the extraneous evidence because it did not provide context for the crime and was not necessary in this case, and the fear of one to testify alone did not warrant admission of the evidence, plus it did not explain why defendant shot the two victims in this case; thus, the State did not meet its burden of proving that the extraneous Mafia evidence was so intertwined with the shooting that the evidence was essential. Mendoza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7157 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 12 2013).

1180. Although the trial court erred in admitting the extraneous offense evidence, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that one witness's testimony proved the same facts as the testimony about which defendant complained, plus the State's theory did not benefit from introduction of the gang affiliation and there was no emphasis in the State's closing argument concerning gang affiliation, and thus the evidence did not have a substantial effect on the jury's verdict. Mendoza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7157 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 12 2013).

1181. Trial court did not err by admitting defendant's prior conviction into evidence because it was offered to prove that defendant was a felony in possession of a firearm on the date of his arrest and the trial court gave a limiting instruction. Colvin v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7128 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 12 2013).

1182. Defendant's conviction for abuse of official capacity was improper because the jury's verdict was substantially influenced by the admission of improper extraneous offense evidence and the error was not harmless, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the evidence of guilty was not overwhelming. The improper use of extraneous offense evidence included arguments by the State that defendant should be found guilty of the charged offense because he and his employees were in the "business" of criminal activity. Lomas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 6 2013).

1183. At defendant's trial for failure to comply with sex offender registration requirements, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling his objections to the admission of evidence of an extraneous bad act under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); the evidence that defendant moved several times while continuing to report his previous address to local law enforcement authorities had substantial probative value as to his knowledge of the reporting requirements and his intent respecting compliance. Hogan v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6706 (Tex. App. Dallas May 30 2013).

1184. Defendant's counsel was ineffective for opening the door to allow the State to introduce evidence of his prior convictions of sexual assault and sexual assault of a child by asking defendant's ex-girlfriend whether defendant was a violent person and she responded that he was not; therefore, on cross-examination the State was permitted to ask the ex-girlfriend whether she knew that defendant had pleaded guilty to two prior sexual assaults, allowing prejudicial and otherwise inadmissible evidence to be presented before the jury, which could not be considered sound trial strategy. The court held that defendant was prejudiced because the credibility of defendant's testimony was a key component of his defense strategy, given that he claimed he was trying to get away from the victim and had no intention of hurting anyone; although the trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction as to how it could consider the prior convictions, the instruction specifically allowed the jury to consider the convictions for the sole purpose of determining defendant's character for violence. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6365, 2013 WL 2301989 (Tex. App. Eastland May 23 2013).

1186. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing a witness to testify in appellant's aggravated assault on a peace officer trial that appellant pointed his gun at her before officers arrived; the State had given notice that it planned to call the witness about the confrontation that preceded the officers' arrival, but did not say that the witness planned to testify that appellant pointed the gun at her, and the trial court could have found that appellant's alleged action was part of the same transaction and bore on the reasonableness of appellant's expectation that the men were visitors rather than responding officers, and the trial court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the evidence without statutory notice being given under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Isaacson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5807 (Tex. App. Austin May 10 2013).

1187. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence that defendant kicked the victim after the murder because it was not an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), as it was questioning by law enforcement about defendant's role in the instant killing. In addition, a similar statement was admitted into evidence without objection. Childs v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5392 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 2 2013).

1188. Even though the trial court erred by admitting evidence that defendant was previously in prison or jail for another crime, was a gang member, or had sold or possessed marijuana under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the error was harmless because the net effect of the improperly admitted evidence was to show that defendant had some relatively minor criminal history, circumstantial evidence supported the verdict that defendant participated in the victim's murder, the State did not refer to defendant's previous conviction, imprisonment, gang affiliation, or marijuana sales during its jury argument, and the trial court limited the jury's consideration of all evidence of other offenses to a determination of defendant's state of mind at the time of the instant offense. Childs v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5392 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 2 2013).

1189. Trial court did not err during defendant's murder trial in admitting extraneous offense evidence of defendant's theft of a truck because the evidence was not relevant just to show character conformity, but was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to corroborate defendant's confession to police, in which he stated that he stole a green truck from a certain location and then drove that truck to the victim's home, where he then committed the murder. At trial, the State was able to corroborate that portion of defendant's confession by introducing evidence from a witness that his green truck had been stolen on the same day and from the same location as defendant indicated in his confession, and a police officer confirmed that he wrote a report for a stolen truck by the witness at the same time and location as described by defendant in his confession. Shuff v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5469 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 2 2013).

1190. Evidence of defendant's cocaine use after the charged murder offense was admissible to show his consciousness of guilt and had relevancy beyond character conformity because defendant stated that he went on a cocaine binge because he felt guilty about the murder. Shuff v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5469 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 2 2013).

1191. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of two additional stolen trailers on defendant's property under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because testimony established that defendant only had access and control of the property, and the evidence rebutted defendant's strategy of mistake or accident in which he attempted to cast doubt regarding his knowledge of the improper registration of the stolen trailers. Whited v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5225 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 30 2013).

1192. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence tending to show that a witness had observed defendant in possession of a firearm on the night of the robbery under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the testimony tended to establish defendant's identity as one of the gunmen during the robbery and to corroborate the accomplices' testimony and the evidence qualified as same transaction contextual evidence. The trial court could have found that the probative value of the evidence was high, as the victims of the robbery were unable to identify the men who had robbed them at gunpoint and the State needed the testimony to corroborate the accomplices' testimony who had identified defendant as one of the gunmen. Head v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5109 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 24 2013).

1193. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by finding that defendant had reasonable notice of extraneous offenses introduced into evidence by the State because, as to one set of offenses, although written notice was not provided 10 days prior to trial, defense counsel was given reasonable notice of those offenses through multiple conversations with the prosecutor more than 10 days prior to trial; as to another extraneous offense, the trial court could have impliedly found that even though neither written or oral notice was provided 10 days prior to trial, the State had reasonably notified defendant of the offense and the victim shortly after the State itself was informed of the circumstances of the offense. Even if the State had failed to provide reasonable notice, it was not harmful, as there was no allegation that the State acted in bad faith, defendant did not move for a continuance, and written notice was provided a week before the evidence was admitted at the punishment hearing. Head v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5109 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 24 2013).

1194. At defendant's assault trial, it was not error to admit evidence of defendant's prior robberies because identity was contested, and there were distinguishing characteristics common to the crimes. Plata v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4795 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 18 2013).

1195. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial because the officer's reference to defendant's "criminal history," without any further detail, was not so inflammatory that the trial court's instruction to disregard could not cure the harm. Francis v. State, 445 S.W.3d 307, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4815 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 18 2013).

1196. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of an aggravated robbery that occurred 45 minutes before the instant offense of murder under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the fact that defendant admitted to committing the robbery with a deadly weapon, the same gun that was used in the murder, tended to rebut his claim of duress. The trial court could have reasonably concluded that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because the evidence was highly probative, as it tended to rebut defendant's claim of duress, discussion of the offense only took one day of a six-day trial, it did not divert the jury's attention from the crucial issues in the case, and the State's need for the evidence was high, as it had no other direct evidence to rebut defendant's claim of duress. Ibarra v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4772, 2013 WL 1641493 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 17 2013).

1197. Officer's testimony did not constitute evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because he did not mention appellant's theft of a necklace from a pawn shop or any alleged offense other than the robbery, he did not testify regarding probable cause to stop the vehicle, and his explanation about the stop likely left the jury with the impression that the driver committed a traffic violation. Garza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4611 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 11 2013).

1198. Because appellant's contention that the officer's testimony constituted evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was rejected, his Tex. R. Evid. 403 contention was also rejected. Garza v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4611 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 11 2013).

1199. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that evidence that two co-defendants had committed a nearly identical robbery just a few days before the instant robbery and that defendant knew about that robbery was relevant to show defendant's intent to participate in the instant robbery and was relevant to the State's theory that defendant had conspired with the two co-defendants to commit the instant robbery. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence because the evidence tended to rebut defendant's theory that she had nothing to do with the instant robbery and capital murder. Ohlfs v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4660 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 11 2013).

1200. In a murder case in which defendant claimed self-defense, the trial court did not err by excluding evidence of the victim's prior arrest for a possible domestic situation; as a specific instance of conduct, the evidence was not admissible to show the victim's violent character under Tex. R. Evid. 404. Pointer v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4658 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 11 2013).

1201. Appellant claimed that the notice provided by the State, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), was incomplete and too late, and while the trial court overruled these objections at the time, the trial court invited defense counsel to revisit the issues and then a hearing would be conducted and a final ruling made, but appellant did not cite where he made a follow-up objection based on improper notice, and the court did not find any such objection; defense counsel did not ask for a hearing, renew any objection, or request a running objection, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1), and thus appellant did not preserve for review any error that might have taken place when the evidence was admitted without objection. Asael

Furquim Dearruda v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4657 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 11 2013).

1202. Appellant claimed he did not have enough time to prepare to refute the extraneous offense evidence given the late notice, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), but he did not seek a postponement or continuance on the basis of surprise, and thus he waived any complaint of surprise. Asael Furquim Dearruda v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4657 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 11 2013).

1203. Four days between the State's notice of its intent to use extraneous-offense evidence and defendant's trial was not unreasonable because the State provided notice upon discovering the trial was set for the following week and limited its use of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) evidence at trial to prior convictions only. Joseph v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4692, 2013 WL 1461841 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 11 2013).

1204. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's indecency with a child trial in admitting an extraneous offense and bad act testified to by another child under seventeen years of age who resided at the apartment complex where the incident took place because the extraneous offense evidence was relevant to prove the sole disputed issue at trial--knowledge that a child was present--and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. While the extraneous offense evidence was not overwhelming evidence of defendant's knowledge of the child's presence, it was some evidence of that vital fact, and the time needed to develop the evidence was inconsequential, while the need for the evidence weighed heavily in favor of its admission to prove knowledge. Henderson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4512 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 10 2013).

1205. During defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver methamphetamine, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting into a evidence a jail book-in card that reflected that he was unemployed; evidence of his unemployment was relevant to link him to the methamphetamine and his status as a narcotics dealer, especially given the quantity of methamphetamine in his possession. Wetmore v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4466, 2013 WL 1451164 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 9 2013).

1206. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense because he did not make the court aware he was objecting to the failure of the State to include the offense in a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) notice. Sanchez-Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4548 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 9 2013).

1207. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense of attempted capital murder, based on defendant swerving towards an officer laying traffic spikes, because the 40 minute chase that began in one county and ended in another was one, indivisible criminal transaction, and the need for context outweighed any unfairly prejudicial effect to defendant. Capps v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4438 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 5 2013).

1208. In the absence of a record, the court could not conclude that defense counsel's failure to object to the admission of defendant's prior marijuana conviction was so outrageous that no competent attorney would have engaged in it. The court further held that defendant also failed to show that a reasonable possibility existed that, but for counsel's error, the result of the trial would have been different because excluding the complained-of prior offense, the evidence amply supported defendant's convictions. Mccook v. State, 402 S.W.3d 47, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4337 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 4 2013).

1209. In a case where the victim's wife and appellant were having an affair, defense counsel was not ineffective for not objecting to the evidence regarding appellant's prior threats toward the victim as identity was an issue in the case and appellant's threats towards the victim could have been admitted to show proof of identity, motive, and intent under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Lemons v. State, 426 S.W.3d 267, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4227, 2013 WL

1339002 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 4 2013).

1210. During defendant's trial for robbery of a fast-food restaurant, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting evidence of another robbery at a nearby fast-food restaurant because the two robberies were similar; they both involved a single male actor wearing a ski mask with one hand gloved and the other ungloved, and the actor in each robbery held a gun in his ungloved right hand. Mcneil v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4234 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 3 2013).

1211. When defendant pleaded guilty to the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, the State gave reasonable notice of its intent to proffer evidence of extraneous offenses and prior convictions during the punishment phase. The extraneous offenses were contained in a police report given to defendant long before trial, and the State gave notice of the prior convictions in an amended motion to enhance punishment filed seven days before trial. Campbell v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4353 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 3 2013).

1212. At defendant's trial for unlawfully appropriating a firearm, the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence of another rifle theft and pawn transaction because it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to provide the same transaction context for the single theft of the rifles. Defendant's theft of the two rifles was a single act to deprive the victim of his property. Sutterfield v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3972, 2013 WL 1281843 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 28 2013).

1213. In a criminal mischief case, extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was properly used to show identity; although a trial court could have presumed that appellant's wife or someone else could have installed a jumper on an electric meter at his residence, finding one on appellant's business made it less likely that he was innocent. Giles v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4044, 2013 WL 1319343 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 28 2013).

1214. In defendant's burglary case, the court properly admitted evidence of other burglaries because they were committed in close proximity to defendant's home, the burglaries were similar, and the burglaries were both daytime residential burglaries by forced entry in which the homes were ransacked. The property stolen at the burglaries was commingled at defendant's residence. Box v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4077, 2013 WL 1319359 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 28 2013).

1215. Issue was whether the trial court erroneously denied a mistrial after sustaining an objection to extraneous offense evidence and instructing the jury to disregard, and appellant did not show that an officer's comment regarding the victim's initial hesitancy in pressing charges given appellant's past was so prejudicial that it was incurable, given in part that the certainty of appellant's conviction of sexual assault absent the officer's remark was high because the evidence proving the assault was overwhelming; appellant admitted taking photographs of the victim's genitalia while she was sleeping and admitted penetrating her with his finger. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4063, 2013 WL 1281917 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 28 2013).

1216. Appellant cited various cases, but his reliance was misplaced, given that the issue was whether the trial court erroneously denied a mistrial after sustaining an objection to extraneous offense evidence and issuing an instruction to disregard, not whether the trial court erred in admitting extraneous offense-evidence over objection, as it was in the cases cited; appellant did not address the issue or cite relevant authority. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4063, 2013 WL 1281917 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 28 2013).

1217. Appellant claimed the trial court erred in admitting evidence of extraneous offenses, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), but by testifying on direct that none of the allegations against him were true and that he was not investigated or convicted of prostitution, being a terrorist, or theft, other than a certain conviction, appellant created a false impression abut his criminal history, and thus under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), the State was entitled to impeach appellant with the complained-of evidence. Rowshan v. State, 445 S.W.3d 294, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2987, 2013 WL 1164404 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 21 2013).

1218. Appellant raised Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403 objections to a certain incident, but he did not claim that the extraneous offense evidence was improper character evidence, and as he did not object under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), his complaint on appeal did not comport with his objections at trial, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), and thus he did not preserve his complaint for review. Rudzavice v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3140, 2013 WL 1188924 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 21 2013).

1219. Even if the court found that appellant's objections fit within the confines of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), appellant did not object each time the State sought to introduce evidence of the incident, nor did appellant obtain a running objection or set forth a proper objection outside the jury's presence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1); because the evidence in question was admitted elsewhere without objection, any error in admitting the evidence was cured. Rudzavice v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3140, 2013 WL 1188924 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 21 2013).

1220. When asked if appellant ever tested positive for drugs, a community supervision officer testified no, and as this was not evidence of a bad act, the court's review was limited to testimony concerning other issues. Edmondson v. State, 399 S.W.3d 607, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3156, 2013 WL 1154210 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 21 2013).

1221. Although appellant objected to extraneous offense testimony due to lack of notice, exhibits stating those grounds for revocation had already been admitted into evidence; by not objecting to the lack of notice each time the evidence of community supervision violations was offered, any alleged error in admitting the testimony was cured by the exhibits already in evidence. Edmondson v. State, 399 S.W.3d 607, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3156, 2013 WL 1154210 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 21 2013).

1222. This was not a criminal case, and thus the notice provision of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not apply, and counsel could not be deemed ineffective for not requesting notice. In re R.L.A., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2745, 2013 WL 1092210 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 15 2013).

1223. Evidence was admissible for determining the children's best interests, and the testimony was relevant to the best interest factors, such that it was not necessary for the mother's counsel to object to the testimony about extraneous offenses, counsel was not ineffective for failing to do so, and the court overruled appellant's issue related to a Daubert hearing. In re R.L.A., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2745, 2013 WL 1092210 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 15 2013).

1224. Evidence of other crimes may be admissible if it is relevant for other purposes apart from showing character conformity. Wilson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2428 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 12 2013).

1225. Because the court agreed with the State's proposed justification under one basis regarding rebutting a defendant's explanation, the court did not address the other two concerning identity or impeaching testimony, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Wilson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2428 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 12 2013).

1226. Evidence that appellant possessed another stolen wallet was likely not probative of whether appellant had robbed the victim in this aggravated robbery case apart from character conformity, and while the State could not introduce the extraneous evidence to show appellant robbed the victim because he robbed the other person in the extraneous case, the State could introduce the evidence to show it was less likely appellant had innocently obtained the victim's purse because he also possessed a stolen wallet; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of the extraneous offense robbery, as this tended to show that appellant's explanation that he innocently obtained the purse from another party was false, and evidence of the prior robbery was relevant for the non-character purpose of rebutting the defensive theory. Wilson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2428 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 12 2013).

1227. Appellant did not object at trial on Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) grounds or any grounds that would have put the trial court on notice that he was objecting to the introduction of such evidence, plus his hearsay, speculation, and relevancy objections did not preserve error under Rule 404(b), such that he failed to preserve this issue for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Hawkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 7 2013).

1228. Even assuming the issue was preserved, a question did not relate to an extraneous offense, and the trial court sustained appellant's hearsay objection, after which appellant did not take any action, and as he obtained all the relief he requested, he could not complain on appeal. Hawkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 7 2013).

1229. Testimony was relevant to explain what led to the purchase of cocaine from appellant, and detective's testimony did not implicate appellant in any extraneous offense. Hawkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 7 2013).

1230. Appellant did not object to any of the prosecutor's statements on the ground that they constituted improper comments on extraneous offenses, and thus he failed to preserve error on this issue. Hawkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 7 2013).

1231. Although appellant objected to some comments on other grounds, his extraneous offense complaint did not comport with those raised at trial, and thus his trial objections were not sufficient to preserve error. Hawkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 7 2013).

1232. Court did not find that the complained-of statements amounted to improper comments concerning extraneous offenses. Hawkins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2282 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 7 2013).

1233. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of the burglary in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was necessary to show the chain of events that occurred immediately prior to the shooting, why the officer was in pursuit of defendant's brother, and led to the confrontation between defendant and the officer and defendant's shooting the officer. Castillo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2034, 2013 WL 781776 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 1 2013).

1234. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence that defendant had previously, knowingly disregarded the lawful commands of a police officer because the State was entitled to rebut defendant's assertion that had he known they were police officers, he would not have pointed his firearm at them. Flores v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1809 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 26 2013).

1235. Trial court erred in denying defendant's motion to sever two stalking charges for separate trials because the fact that the evidence of one charged offense might have been admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in the trial of the other charged offense was no proof that defendant was not harmed by being forced to proceed to trial under both together. Werner v. State, 445 S.W.3d 228, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1716, 2013 WL 824040 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 21 2013).

1236. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence that defendant lied about his military service because his fictitious military involvement and explanations to his wife about living at various military posts set forth the necessary facts to explain to the jury how defendant isolated the minor victim from her mother, defendant's wife, during the period of abuse; without defendant's stories of military service, the victim's testimony about the abuse made little or no sense. Seery v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2013 WL 683327 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 21 2013).

1237. Even though the trial court abused its discretion by admitting defendant's military record into evidence, as the fact that defendant was charged with escape and had been discharged for misconduct did not make it more or less likely that he had committed the sexual assault offenses, the error was harmless because there was evidence supporting defendant's conviction, other evidence showed that he was untruthful about his military service, and the State never mentioned the extraneous offenses contained in defendant's military record. Seery v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2013 WL 683327 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 21 2013).

1238. At defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court erred because it refused to allow defendant to cross-examine the State's witnesses in violation of his Sixth Amendment right to confrontation regarding the complainant's sexual assault of his younger sister. The impeachment evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to correct a false impression left with the jury that the complainant's emotional problems, watching pornography, and need for counseling arose as a result of his victimization by defendant. Johnson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1515, 2013 WL 531079 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 14 2013).

1239. Appellant did not request a limiting instruction regarding extraneous offenses offered during the punishment phase, but a trial court had a duty to provide such even without objection. Davis v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1452, 2013 WL 593484 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 14 2013).

1240. Failure to include a limiting instruction as to extraneous offense evidence admitted during the punishment phase did not cause appellant egregious harm, given that (1) the State did not mention the extraneous offense during voir dire or opening statements, (2) the State put on strong evidence of appellant's guilt of indecency, (3) the jury did not punish appellant's inappropriate touching of one victim more harshly based on the extraneous offense, and (4) the sentence fell within the lower half of the available range. Davis v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1452, 2013 WL 593484 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 14 2013).

1241. It was possible that counsel decided not to object to unfavorable evidence to avoid drawing emphasis to that evidence, and the court noted the extraneous offenses were not always inadmissible and counsel was not deficient for failing to make an objection that was futile; in any event, the record was silent as to counsel's strategy, and thus appellant did not rebut the presumption that counsel's performance was reasonable. Davis v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1452, 2013 WL 593484 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 14 2013).

1242. Evidence of extraneous bad acts were not admitted at the punishment phase of defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, because the State's questions on cross-examination regarding his other child were not evidence; therefore, the trial court was not required to provide a reasonable doubt jury instruction regarding extraneous offenses. Bolte v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1490, 2013 WL 593834 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 14 2013).

1243. Because appellant was given the opportunity to, and did, develop evidence to rebut a witness's testimony that appellant was angry with the victim for not bailing him out of jail, the alleged failure of the State to provide reasonable notice of the extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not affect appellant's substantial rights. Nieto v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1239, 2013 WL 485762 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 7 2013).

1244. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining the testimony of a witness that appellant had been in jail was not substantially more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because 1) the evidence had probative value as it demonstrated appellant's possible motive for shooting the victim; 2) the witness's testimony about motive was brief and directly relevant to appellant's motive and the intent element of the charged offense and, as such, had less potential to distract the jury from the charged offense; and 3) evidence of the reason appellant was in jail was excluded, which mitigated any potential for the jury to give undue weight to the evidence. Nieto v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1239, 2013 WL 485762 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 7 2013).

1245. At defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver a controlled substance, cocaine, in a drug free zone, the trial court did not err in admitting extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); evidence that defendant had constructively delivered drugs to an undercover officer two weeks before his arrest was relevant to show that, on the date of his arrest, he possessed the cocaine with the intent to deliver. Blue v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1231, 2013 WL 489998 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 7 2013).

1246. Even if the trial court erred by admitting into evidence a witness's testimony that defendant had been trying to send someone to harm him and his family, any error was cured when the same type of evidence concerning witnesses' fear of defendant was admitted elsewhere without objection, both before and after the complained-of testimony. Prior to the complained-of testimony, a co-defendant testified that he did not want to tell authorities about defendant's involvement in the offense because "snitches get stitches," and a second co-defendant testified that he gave three different statements to the police because he feared that defendant would harm his family in retaliation; after the complained-of testimony, defendant's ex-wife testified without objection that she came forward with what she knew about defendant's involvement because she feared that defendant would harm her because she no longer wanted to be involved with him. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1058, 2013 WL 476764 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 6 2013).

1247. Objection on relevance grounds did not preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1) as to an asserted Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) error. Helping Hands Home Care, Inc. v. Home Health of Tarrant County, Inc., 393 S.W.3d 492, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 820, 2013 WL 326319 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 29 2013).

1248. Trial court's extraneous offense instruction did not cause defendant egregious harm because defendant's driving offenses were irrelevant to an intent to deliver cocaine because the instruction neither suggested nor required that the jury draw any particular inference about defendant's intent based on the offenses he committed but rather permitted the jury to assign the offenses their appropriate relevance in determining defendant's intent. Limas v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 827, 2013 WL 328988 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 29 2013).

1249. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's prior misconduct with a teenager under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because defense counsel's questions exploring a civil lawsuit opened the door to evidence offered to rebut the implication that the victim's mother had induced the victim to fabricate charges against defendant to create grounds for a lawsuit with a potential financial payoff. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by concluding that the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the State's need for the evidence was substantial, given the lack of physical evidence to corroborate the testimony of the victim and his mother and testimony about the prior offense occupied very few pages of the record. Hetherington v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 437, 2013 WL 173760 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 17 2013).

1250. Evidence of defendant's prior conduct (violating a protective order that barred him from being at his wife's residence) was not probative of whether he violated a no-contact condition of probation, absent evidence that conduct occurred that would be a violation. If there is no evidence that the subsequent act occurred, then it is impossible to determine that the defendant acted in conformity with his prior behavior. Hacker v. State, 389 S.W.3d 860, 2013 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 157 (Tex. Crim. App. Jan. 16 2013).

1251. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that he held the child victim's mother at gunpoint several days after the alleged assault occurred under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it constituted same transaction contextual evidence and was relevant, as the evidence showed that defendant confronted the victim's mother because he wanted to interrogate the victim about the assault and showed the jury how defendant reacted violently to the victim's outcry; the evidence was also necessary to show how defendant gained access to the victim's house to leave a letter in which he admitted to touching the victim. The admission of the evidence did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 because it made a fact of consequence, defendant's touching of the victim's genitals, more probable. Rodriguez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 213, 2013 WL 135723 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 10 2013).

1252. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's girlfriend's testimony that defendant called her the day before the assault and threatened to harm her if he found her and the complainant together under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the testimony constituted admissible same-transaction contextual evidence. Defendant's telephone threat the day before placed the assault in context and was necessary to the jury's understanding of defendant's intent, state of mind, and motivation to forcibly enter the girlfriend's house and repeatedly stab the complainant; the evidence also tended to rebut defendant's self-defense theory. Morales v. State, 389 S.W.3d 915, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 109, 2013 WL 80154 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 8 2013).

1253. Trial court did not err by allowing the prosecutor to impeach defendant's witnesses concerning his good character and fitness for probation because the prosecutor rested his case in the punishment phase without referring to other convictions or wrongful acts, and therefore the State was not required to give defendant notice of extraneous offenses referred to during cross-examination under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 37.07. Morales v. State, 389 S.W.3d 915, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 109, 2013 WL 80154 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 8 2013).

1254. Trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to file a motion to secure notice from the State of its intent to introduce extraneous offense evidence because counsel was already aware of the evidence, as seen by counsel's preemptive attempts to exclude it by objecting. Matthews v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 47, 2013 WL 53748 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 3 2013).

1255. Because the record did not contain any evidence of trial counsel's strategy in failing to file a motion in limine to exclude extraneous offense evidence, the court was constrained to presume that counsel's performance was effective. Matthews v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 47, 2013 WL 53748 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 3 2013).

1257. Trial court did not err by allowing a physician to testify as an expert witness and testify generally as to the patterns of sexual offenders and how those offenders typically victimized children because the trial court could have concluded that the testimony would be helpful to the jury in its deliberations of the evidence and defendant failed to explain how the testimony about statistical correlations in families with sex offenders or the vulnerability of a child born into such a family carried with it unfair prejudice or how there was a clear disparity between its probative value and its degree of prejudice. Beltran v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10639 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 21 2012).

1258. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the State to present evidence of defendant's extraneous offenses in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) during rebuttal because the witness's testimony about defendant's sexual advances toward her tended to rebut his defensive theory of fabrication. In addition, the circumstances of defendant's sexual advances against the witness were sufficiently similar to those in the charged sexual assault against the victim to be admissible, as both the witness and the victim worked for defendant's cleaning business, both were illegal immigrants, and defendant made unwanted sexual advances toward both in a bathroom. Mcmorris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10545, 2012 WL 6629770 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 19 2012).

1259. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony about his 2007 sexual encounter with an adult female as the trial court found that the extraneous offense evidence was probative and relevant because the testimony tended to rebut the theories that defendant raised at trial. Cross v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10487, 2012 WL 6643832 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 19 2012).

1260. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the testimony of appellant's former girlfriend; other testimony was elicited in support of the defensive theory that appellant was not an abusive person, and the girlfriend's testimony that appellant physically abused her rebutted the defensive theory, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Garza v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10333 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 13 2012).

1261. Assuming the issue was preserved, and assuming that the trial court erred in admitting evidence that appellant was fired from a job for an alleged theft, appellant was unable to show harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), as the court was confident that the evidence had little or no effect on the jury; even assuming appellant's credibility was compromised, there was ample other evidence such that reasonable persons could have convicted appellant of capital murder of a child under the age of six, and the theft allegations were not related to the charged offense and was not mentioned again. Garza v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10333 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 13 2012).

1262. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's girlfriend's testimony that she lied to the police because she was scared of defendant, that they fought a lot, he would hit her, and that it was normal for them to fight. Even if the trial court had erred by admitting the evidence, the error was harmless because there was ample other evidence that it was normal for defendant and his girlfriend to fight and it was extremely doubtful that the jury gave much credence to the girlfriend's testimony concerning why she lied to police. Moreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10403, 2012 WL 6582556 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 13 2012).

1263. Trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting testimony by defendant's girlfriend regarding defendant's prior drug use; considering expert testimony concerning the effect of methamphetamine on defendant's mental health condition and any prescribed medication for the condition, the trial judge could have reasonably concluded that the evidence of defendant's prior use of methamphetamine tended to rebut defendant's insanity defense. Dana v. State, 420 S.W.3d 158, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10265, 2012 WL 6213501 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 12 2012).

1264. Defendant's statement to police that he had, 20 years earlier, been accused of improper conduct with his former stepdaughter, was not relevant to prove defendant's intent under Tex. R. Evid. 401 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and it was unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Defendant did not "open the door" to admission of the statement, Tex. R. Evid. 107, by responding to a question by the State. However, given the evidence of guilt, the error was harmless. Cressman v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9849, 2012 WL 5974013 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 29 2012).

1265. Where defendant was convicted for aggravated sexual assault of a child -- his daughter, testimony about an extraneous offense he committed against his son was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404 because it rebutted the defensive claim of fabrication. Because the similarity of the nature of the crime and the relationship of each victim involved in the two instances, the revelation of the previous conduct against the son diminished the possibility that the evidence of the daughter's recantation should be believed. Korp v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9832, 2012 WL 5961662 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 28 2012).

1266. In a sexual assault case, the court did not err by allowing a witness to testify that she had had sex with defendant because the prosecutor met with defendant's counsel minutes after learning of the witness's claim about having sex with defendant and the prosecutor later gave written notice of the State's intent to use that evidence. Additionally, the record included significant evidence, apart from the witness's testimony, of defendant actually having sex with underage girls and desiring to have sex with others. Cooper v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9643, 2012 WL 5869600 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 21 2012).

1267. In his aggravated assault on a peace officer trial, appellant opened the door to extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by giving misleading testimony concerning his relationship with a neighbor, the person he thought he shot; appellant's testimony was relevant and necessary to (1) clarify the false impression, (2) rebut the reasonableness of his self-defense theory, and (3) show that he was prohibited from possession a firearm outside his house as a bond condition. Moten v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9541, 2012 WL 5696200 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 15 2012).

1268. Concerning appellant's conviction of aggravated assault on a peace officer, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting appellant's testimony concerning a certain prior incident and the attendant consequences over appellant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403; appellant sought to establish a theory of self-defense, and testimony about the prior incident was probative in (1) clarifying the false impression appellant gave about his relationship with a neighbor, the person appellant thought he shot, (2) undermining his self-defense theory, and (3) showing that he was prohibited from possessing a gun outside his house on the date in question, and appellant did not overcome the presumption that the testimony about the incident was more probative than prejudicial. Moten v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9541, 2012 WL 5696200 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 15 2012).

1269. Appellant's testimony concerning a prior incident was admissible for more than one reason, and because the testimony touched on several other relevant issues at trial, a limiting instruction to determining appellant's credibility was not required. Moten v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9541, 2012 WL 5696200 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 15 2012).

1270. In undermining appellant's theory of self-defense, the evidence complained-of was also admissible to prove appellant's state of mind at the time of the shooting, and the trial court did not err in refusing to give a limiting instruction regarding appellant's testimony about a prior incident, in connection with his conviction of aggravated assault on a peace officer. Moten v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9541, 2012 WL 5696200 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 15 2012).

1271. Evidence admitted at defendant's trial did not refer to defendant's "flight," nor demonstrate defendant had fled Texas; rather, it showed defendant stated he was homeless to his probation officer, went to a homeless shelter in St. Louis, and was arrested there. Thus, the evidence presented at trial merely showed the circumstances surrounding defendant's arrest and did not characterize defendant's presence in St. Louis as the result of his "flight." Garner v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9404, 2012 WL 5503995 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 14 2012).

1272. In defendant's criminal solicitation of a minor case, the court did not err by allowing evidence of his Internet address book, which showed he had contacts with females with sexually suggestive and youthful names because the evidence was probative in that it tended to show defendant was not on the Internet looking for babysitting services. The evidence did not include any specifics of any extraneous misconduct and there was therefore little danger the jury would either give the evidence undue weight or decide the case on an improper basis. Meadows v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9416, 2012 WL 5504017 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 14 2012).

1273. In defendant's attempted sexual assault case, a witness's testimony regarding other inappropriate conduct allegedly perpetrated by defendant was properly admitted because the testimony showed that defendant acted inappropriately with other underage girls in the household and, thus, corroborated the victim's testimony and showed defendant's predilection for underage girls. Additionally, the State needed the testimony to rebut the mother's assertion that nothing inappropriate had ever transpired between defendant and the victim. Baker v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9345, 2012 WL 5458474 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 8 2012).

1274. In defendant's murder case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting testimony as evidence of identity because, in both offenses, a green vehicle blocked the roadway and a young man approached the blocked-in vehicle with a "silver" handgun. The witness identified defendant as the "young man" from her aggravated robbery, and he used an accomplice's mother's vehicle to commit that offense; the challenged evidence made defendant's identity more probable, took little time to develop, and supported the element of identity. Torres v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9134 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 1 2012).

1275. Trial court did not err by allowing the State to offer evidence that defendant sexually assaulted his stepdaughter when she was a child under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because defense counsel had made the implicit assertion that defendant had characteristics or had done things that were inconsistent with being the kind of person who would sexually assault a child or in allowing the State to rebut that assertion. Pittman v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9057 (Tex. App. Tyler Oct. 31 2012).

1276. Appellant only raised a general objection to the admission of extraneous offenses, which was insufficient to preserve a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection for review, and thus this issue was overruled. Martinez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8994 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 30 2012).

1278. In an indecent exposure case, the court properly allowed evidence of defendant's prior conviction of failing to register as a sex offender over his objection because it was a crime of deception and was a significant piece of evidence bearing on his character for truthfulness; the manner in which the State presented evidence of defendant's conviction did not likely leave an indelible impression on the jurors to encourage an irrational decision. Tristan v. State, 393 S.W.3d 806, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8895, 2012 WL 5285673 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 25 2012).

1279. In a murder case, the court properly admitted evidence relating to a prior burglary because defendant was alleged to have stolen a firearm and he later used that firearm to shoot at the property where the victim was killed; the burglary and the shooting could therefore be seen as "an indivisible criminal transaction." Shafer v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8941, 2012 WL 5292919 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 25 2012).

1280. Appellant's brief failed to contain record references to the testimony he claimed violated Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), but the State's brief filled in the void; the State included record references to certain testimony, but this was not included in appellant's Rule 404(b) complaint, and the court did not consider it further. Biera v. State, 391 S.W.3d 204, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8782, 2012 WL 5199374 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 22 2012).

1281. Evidence of drug use by appellant and others was relevant to show a motive for the robbery, and the trial court could have found that their drug issues provided a motive for individuals with no income. Biera v. State, 391 S.W.3d 204, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8782, 2012 WL 5199374 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 22 2012).

1282. One witness's car had a direct connection to the robbery, and testimony of an accomplice's use of the credit cards to keep gas in her vehicle was relevant to show the use of the witness's car at the time of the robbery, such that the trial court could have found that evidence of the accomplice's credit card use was relevant to show the identity of the accomplice and appellant as the robbers; the ruling that the credit card evidence had relevance beyond character conformity in appellant's aggravated robbery case was not an abuse of discretion. Biera v. State, 391 S.W.3d 204, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8782, 2012 WL 5199374 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 22 2012).

1283. As appellant's identity as a robber was a major dispute and the evidence corroborating accomplice-witness testimony was mostly circumstantial, the trial court could have considered other evidence, including stolen credit card evidence, probative and necessary; the credit card evidence had little prejudicial effect as character conformity evidence because there was testimony the card was not given to appellant, nothing showed the evidence tended to confuse or mislead the jury, and the jury was instructed on how to consider extraneous offense testimony, such that the court found no abuse of discretion in the trial court's finding that the evidence was not precluded by Tex. R. Evid. 403. Biera v. State, 391 S.W.3d 204, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8782, 2012 WL 5199374 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 22 2012).

1284. Court did not err in admitting extraneous-offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because, throughout trial, defendant's defensive theory was that the complainant consented to the sexual encounter; defendant neither objected to the instruction provided nor did he request a different limiting instruction that he deemed to be appropriate. The evidence was admissible under the opportunity, plan, and intent exceptions to Rule 404(b) and as evidence of modus operandi. Bailey v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8593, 2012 WL 4841465 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 11 2012).

1285. Defendant's conviction for engaging in organized crime was proper because the nonaccomplice evidence placed defendant at or near the scene of the crime at or about the time of its commission under suspicious circumstances and because, although the forensic examiner testified that he did not know who actually sent or received the text messages, the circumstances were sufficient to allow a jury reasonably to find that defendant sent and received the messages. Because intent to commit forgery could not be inferred, the prior conviction showing strikingly similar facts made the existence of a material fact, that was, whether defendant possessed forged checks with the intent to defraud or harm another, more probable, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) Franklin v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8513 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 10 2012).

1286. Appellant argued that the complainant's letter was not admissible because it contained extraneous bad act references, but the court found that the language was too vague to allow a definitive conclusion that the term "that" referenced sexual conduct, and the letter's mention of rape did not change this because the letter said the rape was imagined in a dream and was not an act that was attributed to appellant; because the letter did not describe any bad acts or criminal activity, it was not excludable. Conteh v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8440, 2012 WL 4788386 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

1287. Incidents about which appellant wanted to introduce testimony did not implicate himself, and the victim did not make any threat toward him, nor did the victim's prior conduct show that he had any animosity toward appellant, and the evidence was not probative of the victim's state of mind as it related to the situation with appellant two years after the incidents took place, given that before the shooting, the two did not know each other; while appellant could introduce reputation or opinion testimony suggesting the victim was the first aggressor, appellant could not introduce specific acts because that was not admissible for these purposes, and nothing showed that the proffered testimony would have been relevant for any purpose besides character conformity, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid.

404(b). Bottorff v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8220, 2012 WL 4477396 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 28 2012).

1288. At defendant's trial for DWI, the admission of medical records containing extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not have a substantial effect on the verdict because the jury heard evidence that defendant was passed out in his vehicle with a bottle of alcohol between his legs; the officer noticed defendant's glassy and bloodshot eyes, defendant admitted he consumed alcohol and prescription medications, and field sobriety test results suggested intoxication. The record contained sufficient evidence from which the jury could find defendant guilty of DWI beyond a reasonable doubt. Lorenz v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7777, 2012 WL 4017766 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 12 2012).

1289. All evidence admitted during the guilt/innocence phase of trial for aggravated sexual assault and sexual assault was readmitted during the punishment phase; because the evidence admitted during the guilt/innocence phase included extraneous offense evidence, the trial court erred in not instructing the jury concerning the burden of proof. Solis v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7512, 2012 WL 3833036 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 5 2012).

1290. Court reviewed whether appellant was harmed under the applicable case law standard for egregious harm, as appellant did not object to the omission of the instruction as to the burden of proof for extraneous offenses. Solis v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7512, 2012 WL 3833036 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 5 2012).

1291. Given that (1) the testimony presented for the first time in the punishment phase was only approximately 30 pages of the record, (2) the charge in the guilt/innocence phase instructed the jury concerning the extraneous offense burden of proof, (3) although such evidence was readmitted, no additional extraneous offense evidence was admitted during the punishment phase, and (4) the prosecutor told the jury it could consider the testimony if the jury believed it beyond a reasonable doubt, the omission of the instruction on the burden of proof regarding extraneous offenses did not amount to egregious harm. Solis v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7512, 2012 WL 3833036 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 5 2012).

1292. Court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence because the State was required to prove that defendant committed the aggravated assault with intent to participate as a member of a criminal street gang and the intent element was hotly contested because defendant asserted that the crimes were not gang-related but simply an argument over a woman that escalated into a fight; it was the State's theory that the gang members assaulted the victim in retaliation for him disrespecting another gang member by interfering with his advances on a woman. There was no evidence the jury gave the evidence undue weight. Romero v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7573, 2012 WL 3834917 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 5 2012).

1293. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it took into consideration during punishment an unadjudicated offense that had been dismissed, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a), as any error was harmless as the trial court considered the positive steps defendant had made since his arrest, but was uncertain that defendant understood the seriousness of the offense. Meighen v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7401, 2012 WL 3799664 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 31 2012).

1294. In a case involving burglary of a habitation, a trial court did not err by admitting evidence of appellant's subsequent assault on one apartment resident under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), who was attempting to retrieve the purse and keys of appellant's victim. This was admissible as same-transaction contextual evidence because it provided the jury with information essential to understanding the context and circumstances of blended or interwoven events, and a limiting instruction was not required. Jennings v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7400, 2012 WL 3765083 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 31 2012).

1295. In a tampering with evidence case, the court properly admitted Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) evidence that defendant police officer had been at parties and that he was drinking with underage females because defendant attempted to show that the State was engaging in selective prosecution, and the State introduced the evidence to rebut the defensive theory. The State's evidence to rebut the defensive theory was not overly broad, and the court heard the testimony outside the presence of the jury. Shults v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7478, 2012 WL 3799209 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 30 2012).

1296. In a domestic assault case, the court properly admitted evidence because the fact that defendant had a prior conviction for assault-family violence was an essential element of the repeat-offender charge, and the victim did not appear at trial to testify so the State needed the evidence to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication. Additionally, the victim's mother, when testifying to the extraneous offense, did not go into graphic detail regarding the circumstances surrounding the prior assault, and the documents relating to the offense also did not provide much detail in describing the assault. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7543 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 29 2012).

1297. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant offered to pay for an abortion for another teenager with whom he had sex without notice under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) because the evidence was adduced during sentencing on cross-examination in rebuttal to mitigation evidence and therefore was not subject to the notice requirement. Chavez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7127, 2012 WL 3629619 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 24 2012).

1299. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting hundreds of digital images of gay pornography seized from defendant's home computer, including some that depicted children, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the trial court found that a defense witness's testimony opened the door to the pornography, as the defense elicited testimony about her opinion as to whether defendant could have committed the charges complained of and as a result, left a false impression with the jury. The trial court did not err by admitting the evidence over defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the State did not spend an excessive amount of time on the evidence and the pictures were no more heinous than the testimony elicited of the victims. Pawlak v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7109, 2012 WL 3612493 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2012).

1300. Considering the admission of photographs of text messages under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the text conversations that led up appellant's arrival at his ex-girlfriend's home were relevant in order to prove the motive appellant had for having a gun, and the messages provided contextual evidence, as they were sent immediately before appellant arrived. Trammell v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7149, 2012 WL 3612518 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2012).

1301. In defendant's theft case, evidence of subsequent offenses was admissible because those offenses provided the jury with proof of defendant's identity, showed his knowledge, and showed a scheme -- all purposes expressly permitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and the trial court unequivocally overruled a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. At no point did defendant request that the findings and conclusions of the trial court's balancing test be placed on the record. Boswell v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7177, 2012 WL 3629922 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 23 2012).

1303. Trial court did not abuse its discretion to the extent that it determined that the State was not required to give notice of a witness's testimony that she and defendant had a pipe that they used to smoke methamphetamine because their use and possession of the pipe, which was allegedly destroyed in the patrol car, arose out of the same transaction and was part of the charged offense. Hernandez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7164, 2012 WL 3640012 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 23 2012).

1304. Appellant claimed he was deprived of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel when the trial court did not sustain an objection to the introduction of a custodial statement he made, but the court disagreed; appellant had been in jail for burglaries that were allegedly committed by him, he was represented by counsel, the objection related to testimony concerning contraband found in jail, to which he waived his rights, and the burglary cases and the contraband case did not arise from the same facts, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling the objection to the admission of extraneous conduct by appellant. Hernandez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7020, 2012 WL 3600192 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 22 2012).

1305. Court erred during defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child in admitting portions of recorded telephone conversations between defendant and a detective, which stated that defendant would rather spend time with kids, because while the evidence was relevant to intent under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the evidence was more prejudicial than probative. Dekneef v. State, 379 S.W.3d 423, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7024 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 22 2012).

1306. Because the extraneous offense evidence showed that appellant was arrested in close proximity to the victim's house after a reported break-in, the trial court was within its discretion to find that evidence of the prior burglary had non-character conforming relevance that rebutted appellant's defensive theory of conspiracy. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1307. There was no abuse of discretion by the trial court's admission of extraneous offense evidence, because all of the Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors weighed in favor of admitting the evidence. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1308. Probative nature of the extraneous offense was high as it arguably rebutted appellant's claim that the charges were fabricated as part of a conspiracy; the extraneous offense showed that appellant was arrested while driving his truck away from a lot behind the victim's house, the truck was spotted while police investigated a break-in report at the victim's house, and the break-in took place within days of the charged offense, and this weighed in favor of admitting the evidence. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1309. Potential of the extraneous offense evidence to impress the jury in an irrational but indelible way was not high, given that the evidence did not involve a crime of violence and the trial court gave a limiting instruction, and this factor weighed in favor of admitting the evidence. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1310. Extraneous offense was not discussed until cross-examination of appellant and then in the State's rebuttal case, and the testimony covered 50 pages out of more than 400 pages of testimony, which was not excessive; this factor weighed in favor of admitting the evidence. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1311. State's need for the evidence was high because it needed the extraneous offense evidence in order to rebut appellant's defensive theories, including conspiracy. Garcia v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6924, 2012 WL 3574715 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 21 2012).

1312. Defendant's relevancy objections did not preserve his argument that admission of extraneous offense evidence of uncharged sexual conduct violated Tex. R. Evid. 404; in any event, because the same evidence came in through other testimony without objection, any error was cured. Goodwin v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6918, 2012 WL 3590723 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 20 2012).

1313. Trial court did not err by admitting the testimony of an officer and a bail bondsman employee regarding defendant's prior arrest for felony possession of cocaine and subsequent bail under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the State was entitled to rebut defendant's testimony that he accidentally struck the police vehicles while attempting to flee and it tended to establish that defendant's motive for assaulting the officer was to avoid revocation of his felony bail. The court held that the admission of the evidence was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) created an inference that the assault on the officer was not accidental and defendant had a motive for attempting to flee; (2) the evidence exhibited little potential to improperly impress the jury; (3) the development of the evidence took only a short portion of the trial; and (4) the State needed the evidence because defendant testified that striking the officers' vehicles was accidental and he had no reason to flee from or assault the officer. Freeman v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6996 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 20 2012).

1314. Even though the trial court denied appellant's motion in limine regarding extraneous bad acts before trial, he still had to object to the evidence when the State offered it for admission; because appellant did not object at trial, he failed to preserve his complaint for review. Baldwin v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6857, 2012 WL 3525642 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2012).

1315. In a sexual assault case, the court did not err by allowing evidence of a 2008 kidnap and sexual assault of another victim because both victims were forcefully taken and isolated from anyone who could help them; after defendant had each woman in his car, he restrained each of them, and used derogatory terms towards both. He physically assaulted each woman; ripped off their clothing; and in each case forcefully penetrated their vaginas with his fingers or his hand. Ramos v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6780, 2012 WL 3363348 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 15 2012).

1316. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the State's witness's testimony was admissible to rebut defendant's testimony that he could not obtain a real gun because he was a felon and the false impression it created; the testimony was also admissible as proof of defendant's modus operandi as it showed defendant's opportunity, intent, preparation and plan to commit aggravated robbery. Owens v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6758, 2012 WL 3292962 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 14 2012).

1317. On appeal of defendant's conviction for robbery, he claimed he was deprived of his right to fair notice by the State's untimely disclosure of its intent to present evidence of his gang membership. Because the evidence was introduced at the punishment phase of trial, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07(3)(g)--rather than Tex. R. Evid. 404(b)--applied. Rea v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7063, 2012 WL 3601126 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 14 2012).

1318. At defendant's trial for family violence assault, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of his prior assault against the victim under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to explain the victim's fear of retaliation and to rebut the defensive theory that the victim fabricated the allegations. Stanley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS

1319. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of an extraneous murder pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) where it reasonably could have concluded that the extraneous murder was sufficiently similar to the instant murder such that evidence of the extraneous murder was admissible to prove identity in the instant case. Although there were some differences in the surrounding circumstances and the ways in which the instant victim and the other victim were murdered, there were also enough similarities such that the presence of defendant's DNA at the murder scene, either in or close to the victims' bodies, was not the only significant similarity that the two offenses had in common. Mcgregor v. State, 394 S.W.3d 90, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6552, 2012 WL 3244196 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 9 2012).

1320. Regarding appellant's convictions of robbery and aggravated robbery, identity was at issue, and each robbery, including the extraneous offense, took place at night in convenience or dollar stores, the perpetrator made victims retreat to the back of the store, the perpetrator demanded cash via a note in three of the four offenses, and in two of the robberies, appellant's note identified the cash denominations sought, and it was not an abuse of discretion to admit this evidence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); concerning the Tex. R. Evid. 403 component of this analysis, any prejudicial effect was mitigated because this was a bench trial, and the decision to admit the evidence was within the zone of reasonable disagreement. Williams v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6338, 2012 WL 3104390 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2012).

1321. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant during his trial for murdering his girlfriend's five-year-child because it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), as: (1) the identity of the perpetrator was in issue throughout the trial; (2) the overall pattern of abuse described by defendant's ex-girlfriend was significantly similar to the pattern of abuse described by his girlfriend; and (3) the ex-girlfriend's description of defendant's abuse of her son was strikingly similar to the girlfriend's description of defendant's deadly assault of her child. Castro v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6233, 2012 WL 3104817 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 2012).

1322. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses committed by defendant during his trial for murdering his girlfriend's five-year-child because it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403, as: (1) defendant's ex-girlfriend's testimony regarding defendant's distinctively similar pattern of assaultive behavior and manner of abuse toward her son strongly served to make it more probable that it was defendant that assaulted the child leading to her death; (2) the State's need for the testimony was high as only two people could testify regarding the events of the day the child died presented completely contradictory accounts of those events; 93) the trial court instructed the jury regarding the appropriate use of the testimony; and (4) the nature of defendant's assault on his ex-girlfriend's child, which did not cause his death or apparently any serious or permanent injury, was less emotional than the testimony regarding the nature of his assault on his girlfriend's child. Castro v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6233, 2012 WL 3104817 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 2012).

1323. Assuming that the admission of the extraneous offense evidence was error, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that (1) the State provided ample evidence of appellant's guilt of stalking, (2) the jury was charged on three of appellant's acts alleged in the indictment, (3) the victim testified about the incidents, and the jury was free to believe the victim's testimony, (4) the extraneous offense related to the spray-painting and "keying" of the victim's car, and like the alleged spray-painting incident on a different day, there were no witnesses to the acts, and (5) had witness testimony been available and offered that appellant committed the extraneous offenses, it could have been argued that the extraneous offense evidence influenced the jury, but in the absence of such eyewitness testimony, the court had a fair assurance that any error in admitting the evidence did not have an influence on the verdict. Crowley v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5875 (Tex. App. Eastland July 19 2012).

1324. Trial court did not err by admitting testimony by the shooter about previous attempts defendant had made on her husband's life under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the testimony was probative as the acts testified to were virtually identical to that with which defendant was charged, it tended to show defendant's motive and intent to end her husband's life, and a witness testified later, without objection, about two instances when defendant sought her advice or assistance in locating someone who could kill her husband, and therefore defendant was not harmed by the admission of the shooter's testimony. Grigsby v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5598, 2012 WL 2861670 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 12 2012).

1325. Court analyzed the extraneous offenses using the exceptions listed in Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because, while the list is not exclusive, it does outline the most common exceptions, and the State did not set forth any novel reason why this evidence was admissible; certain exceptions did not apply. Castle v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5570, 2012 WL 2862270 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1327. Appellant claimed that the victim was lying in his case, and the previous crimes did not increase the victim's credibility, and it was not evidence that rehabilitated her truthfulness character under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b); the extraneous offenses did not rebut any defensive theory. Castle v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5570, 2012 WL 2862270 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1328. As the extraneous offenses were not relevant for any reason beside character conformity, the trial court abused its discretion in admitting the evidence. Castle v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5570, 2012 WL 2862270 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1329. Because the extraneous offense evidence was not admissible, the court did not need to decide if the probative value of the evidence was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Castle v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5570, 2012 WL 2862270 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1330. Although the trial court erred in admitting extraneous offenses, the presentation thereof took a short amount of time, there were other witnesses during the State's case and they did not concern the extraneous offenses, there was only one mention of extraneous offenses in the State's closing argument, and the evidence of appellant's guilt of aggravated kidnapping was dependent on the victim's credibility, and the jury was convinced by her testimony; thus, the extraneous offense testimony likely had little effect on the verdict, and the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Castle v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5570, 2012 WL 2862270 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1331. Under the indictment for aggravated kidnapping, the State had to prove that appellant knowingly or intentionally abducted the victim by restricting her without her consent, which interfered with her liberty, or by confining her with the intent to prevent her liberation; as the State had to prove that appellant had the specific intent to prevent the victim's liberation by using or threatening deadly force, appellant's intent was inferred from the crime itself, and the extraneous offenses did not shed light on his intent, except to reemphasize that he had the intent required. Castle v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5570, 2012 WL 2862270 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1332. Incidents did not amount to a common plan or scheme, given that they did not indicate steps appellant took to prepare for the commission of the offense; appellant committed similar crimes in the past against the same victim. Castle v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5570, 2012 WL 2862270 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

1333. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's objection to testimony about an extraneous offense against a corrections officer under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the victim testified that defendant hit her with the corrections officer's riot baton, and therefore the question of how the baton went from the officer's holder to defendant's hand to being used against the victim in short order was contextual evidence relating to the charged assault. In addition, defendant's objection came well after the extensive testimony about defendant hitting the officer and he only object to the officer's description of her injury; the court further held that the admission of the officer's statement regarding a slight swelling of her face did not affect a substantial right. Mayfield v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5487, 2012 WL 2832529 (Tex. App. Tyler July 11 2012).

1334. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting portions of the victim's police interview during which he claimed defendant threatened to kill him like he had other boys because the statements were necessary to understand how defendant overcame the victim's resistance to the sexual assault and the evidence was relevant to rebut defendant's claim that he did not threaten the victim. The evidence was probative of whether defendant used or exhibited a deadly weapon to accomplish the assault, presentation of the evidence took little time, and the statements did not suggest an improper basis for deciding the case. Sandles v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5518, 2012 WL 3104377 (Tex. App. Dallas July 11 2012).

1335. Any error by the trial court in failing to given the jury a contemporaneous limiting instruction as the extraneous offenses admitted against defendant was harmless because the record reflected ample evidence of defendant's guilt, the extraneous evidence was not more heinous or inflammatory than the evidence pertaining to the charged offenses, and the jury charged contained a limiting instruction with regard to the extraneous conduct committed by defendant. Guardado v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5514, 2012 WL 2832561 (Tex. App. El Paso July 11 2012).

1336. Even though the trial court erred by admitting evidence concerning defendant's suicide attempt shortly after his arrest on the instant charges under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was not part of the same transaction and therefore the State was required to give notice before the day of trial, the error was harmless because: (1) defendant was not surprised; (2) he did not request a continuance; and (3) similar evidence was admitted elsewhere without objection. Fletcher v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5429, 2012 WL 2783298 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 10 2012).

1337. Counsel did not object to testimony as extraneous, but that the witness was not a proper outcry witness, and thus the objection below did not comport with the one on appeal, such that the complaint concerning extraneous offenses was not preserved for review. Martinez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5388, 2012 WL 2728886 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 9 2012).

1339. Because the complained of evidence was not introduced during the State's case-in-chief, but was instead offered in rebuttal to the defense raised by cross-examination of the State's witness, defendant was not entitled to notice pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). White v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5271 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 29 2012).

1340. Defendant waived any error in the admission of evidence of the additional injury to his daughter because he did not object to the admission of his written statement in which he admitted to throwing his daughter onto the bed prior to the date of the offense. Smith v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5167, 2012 WL 2469548 (Tex. App. Eastland

1341. Even if the trial court committed error when it admitted evidence of extraneous offenses, such was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2, given that (1) there was evidence not related to the extraneous offenses that did identify appellant as the shooter, (2) jurors were instructed that they could not consider the crimes unless they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that appellant committed them, and consideration of such was limited to whether there was motive, and (3) a witness did not testify that appellant was a pimp, but rather that he saw appellant interacting with prostitutes, which involved money and drugs. Coleman v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5106, 2012 WL 2402617 (Tex. App. Dallas June 27 2012).

1342. Because appellant did not object to the admission of extraneous offenses, he did not preserve the issue for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), and even had appellant preserved the issue, the result would still be the same; the identity of the perpetrator in the capital murder case was contested, the State needed the evidence of the extraneous offenses to connect appellant to the murder, and there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the extraneous offenses. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4834, 2012 WL 2312696 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 19 2012).

1343. Counsel was not ineffective for making a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection to extraneous offenses because it would have been overruled, as Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2 permitted the admissibility of evidence that defendant provided alcohol and pornography to the child victims to lure or groom them. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to make a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection because the factors of the balancing test weighed in factor of admitting the evidence, as it was probative of the relationship between defendant and the victims. Odom v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4316, 2012 WL 1964580 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 31 2012).

1344. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by admitting autopsy photographs of the victim that showed injuries to areas other than her vagina because they were admissible to show the context in which the offense occurred, as defendant's assaultive behavior was so connected to the sexual assault that they formed an indivisible criminal transaction. Coe v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4169, 2012 WL 1899179 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2012).

1345. Evidence regarding prior false allegations of sexual abuse by the child victim was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because defendant failed to show that the victim made any prior false allegations of sexual abuse against her grandmother or father and failed to show that any allegations were similar to the accusation in defendant's case. Luevano v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4108, 2012 WL 1883115 (Tex. App. El Paso May 23 2012).

1347. In a trial for injury to a child, in which the trial court admitted evidence of extraneous wrongs committed by defendant, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice because there appeared little chance that the evidence was likely to influence the jury irrationally, as the conduct at issue did not involve instances where defendant caused other injuries. Moreover, the State did not spend an excessive amount of time developing the evidence. Quirk v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4123, 2012 WL 1882934

(Tex. App. Beaumont May 23 2012).

1348. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of extraneous offenses under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that, beginning with the opening statement, defendant attempted to portray the victim as the aggressor and defendant as merely defending himself, and therefore the State was allowed to rebut with evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts where defendant was the aggressor. Castillo v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3997, 2012 WL 1764089 (Tex. App. Dallas May 18 2012).

1349. Court disagreed with the State that appellant waived error on a fourth admitted extraneous offense act, and thus the court addressed all four prior acts. Jurasek v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3973, 2012 WL 1810197 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 17 2012).

1350. For materiality and relevance purposes, the State's theory that appellant had ill will towards the victim was aided through introducing prior extraneous acts, and because the nature of the parties' relationship was material in order to show motive, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding the prior acts were admissible, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Jurasek v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3973, 2012 WL 1810197 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 17 2012).

1351. Appellant claimed that even if the extraneous acts were relevant, they should have not been admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403, but the State's establishment of motive relied almost exclusively on the extraneous acts against the victim or in retaliation for the current charge against appellant, and the parties' relationship was probative in helping develop the State's case and show motive; there was no abuse of discretion on the trial court's part in overruling appellant's objection. Jurasek v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3973, 2012 WL 1810197 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 17 2012).

1352. Defendant failed to show that her counsel was ineffective for failing to request notice of the State's intent to introduce evidence of extraneous offenses or bad acts during punishment, particularly the officer's testimony that defendant continued to post web-advertisements for escorting services up until the trial setting, because defendant did not identify what counsel could have discovered with timely notice of the State's intent. Defendant did not identify any particular witness or other evidence her counsel could have present to rebut the inference that she continued to work in the sex industry. Brown v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3685 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 10 2012).

1354. Appellant did not object to testimony on the ground that it was evidence of an extraneous offense, the jury could have inferred that appellant had an extensive history of crime and would be ineligible for parole, and the court rejected the claim that the trial court erred in admitting extraneous offenses into evidence. Young v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3770, 2012 WL 1664208 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 9 2012).

1355. Evidence of alleged abuse was needed to show what happened just before appellant drove past a house and threw a brick into the yard; the absence of this evidence would make the State's case incomplete, and the trial court did not err in overruling the objection to this evidence. Fletcher v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3437, 2012 WL 1549816 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 2 2012).

1357. In a driving while intoxicated case, a trial court did not err by allowing a police officer to give an opinion about appellant's intent to fight at the time of his arrest; the officer was not speculating about appellant's inner thoughts, rather, the officer was drawing an inference from her own observations. The information was relevant, it did not describe an extraneous offense or bad act, the inclusion of the information was not so prejudicial that it should have been excluded on that ground, and it was presented alongside copious evidence that appellant was driving while intoxicated and attempting to flee from police. Link v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3350, 2012 WL 1495182 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 30 2012).

1358. Under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, the evidence of harsh discipline imposed by defendant on his four children, including the victim of the aggravated sexual assaults, was admissible because it had significant probative value as that evidence served to explain to the jury how defendant perpetrated frequent sexual assaults on his young daughter over a period of years. Soria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3345, 2012 WL 1570969 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 27 2012).

1359. Evidence of defendant's harsh discipline of his children and testimony that the children feared him was admissible over a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection to explain why the victim of sexual assault did not make a prompt outcry. Soria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3345, 2012 WL 1570969 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 27 2012).

1360. Witness's testimony that the children were thin and that the home was dark and there was lots of stuff everywhere was not subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it did not describe bad acts or conduct of defendant. Soria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3345, 2012 WL 1570969 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 27 2012).

1362. During a capital murder trial, the court erred in its charge to the jury regarding extraneous acts of credit card abuse because it did not require the jury to find beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the extraneous acts. The error was harmless under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.19, because the jury was admonished by a limiting instruction to consider the credit card evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404 for the limited purpose of showing defendant's motive for the murders. Smith v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2890, 2012 WL 1263567 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 12 2012).

1363. At defendant's trial for delivery of a controlled substance, the trial court did not err by permitting the police captain to testify that he was pretty sure that two police officers attempting to conduct an undercover drug buy were describing defendant because the testimony did not necessarily suggest that defendant had committed any prior bad act; therefore, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not applicable. Green v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2666 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 5 2012).

1364. Defendant's conviction for aggravated robbery was proper because the trial court did not err in admitting extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Defendant had made a bomb threat at another nightclub on the same night as the offense and that was relevant to show that he had the intent to communicate a threat with the items in his bag at the nightclub. Aguirre v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2526, 2012 WL 1034911 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 29 2012).

1365. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not prohibit admission of evidence of a defendant's alleged status as a member of a gang. Lewis v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2248, 2012 WL 987797 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 22 2012).

1366. In a murder trial where defendant claimed he acted in self-defense, the trial court did not err by excluding testimony from a psychologist regarding the victim's acts of violence because the psychologist's knowledge of any acts committed by the victim came entirely from his review of the medical records which were not admitted into evidence. While specific acts of violent conduct committed by a victim were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and 405 to show the victim was the aggressor and defendant acted in self-defense, the psychologist's testimony that the victim had attacked his doctor and others would not have been relevant for any purpose other than character conformity. Mason v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2314, 2012 WL 1058792 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 22 2012).

1367. Even if the trial court erred by admitting extraneous offense evidence, the error did not affect defendant's substantial rights because: (1) the record did not indicate that the State specifically mentioned the agent's testimony regarding the 20 instances when similar counterfeit bills were passed; (2) the trial court instructed the jury that it could not consider extraneous offenses unless it found beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the offenses; and (3) the record contained sufficient other evidence to support defendant's forgery conviction. Mookdasnit v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2220, 2012 WL 983333 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 21 2012).

1368. Because appellant did not offer argument or authority on his claims under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, 404(b) and his claims for due process and due course of law, the complaints were inadequately briefed and presented nothing for review. Keate v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2117, 2012 WL 896200 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 16 2012).

1369. Defendant failed to show that his trial counsel was deficient in failing to make a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection where defendant failed to show that the trial court would have been required to sustain the objection; the evidence at issue was arguably admissible to explain why the victim finally reported the abuse to the police. Sanchez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2019, 2012 WL 868010 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 14 2012).

1370. Admission of a pistol into evidence during defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault was not prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Because the pistol fit the description of the gun used during the assault, defendant's possession of the pistol was circumstantial evidence that he had the opportunity and means to commit the armed assault. Sargeon v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1857, 2012 WL 761210 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 8 2012).

1371. Because the second instruction to the jury was a new and different instruction and contradicted the original correct instruction, the jury was free to disregard the initial instruction and to consider the extraneous offense evidence to determine defendant's guilt on the present robbery charge, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Heigelmann v. State, 362 S.W.3d 763, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1670, 2012 WL 688427 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 2 2012).

1372. Because the robberies occurred in the same geographic area within a relatively brief time frame, and all were committed by an assailant who covered his hands with socks or gloves, and whose face was completely covered by a similar covering, leaving only the eyes exposed, there are sufficient common characteristics between each of the robberies, that the extraneous offenses were relevant to prove identity and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 404(b). Heigelmann v. State, 362 S.W.3d 763, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1670, 2012 WL 688427 (Tex.

App. Texarkana Mar. 2 2012).

1373. Given the vague nature of a witness's allegations, it could hardly be said that he showed appellant committed some kind of a crime, and the history of the witness and appellant was not necessarily relevant; counsel asked what the parties' problem was, the witness answered, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the answer to stand. Vertiz v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1730, 2012 WL 690398 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 29 2012).

1374. In a sexual assault case, the court properly admitted testimony of another sexual assault victim who identified defendant as her attacker because, like the victim, the witness lived alone, and her attacker was a black male in his late twenties who broke in through the back patio door in the early morning hours. Like the victim's attacker, the witness's attacker demanded her ATM card. Ledbetter v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1472, 2012 WL 593424 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 24 2012).

1376. Although defendant testified he did not believe he was required to go to court because of the lawsuit he filed against the government, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), evidence that he concealed his identity and left the state was admissible and probative as to his mental state and whether he was aware that he committed a crime when he failed to appear in court. Marascio v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1178, 2012 WL 472920 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 15 2012).

1377. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in prohibiting a motorist from questioning a driver concerning her driving record. Carter v. Johnson, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1239, 2012 WL 566089 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 15 2012).

1378. Trial court did not err, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), by allowing the jury to hear evidence of defendant's extraneous offenses during the guilt/innocence stage of the trial because the evidence was not admitted to show that defendant had actually committed the prior offense, but to show that he had lied to the officer about whether he had been previously arrested. The trial court properly instructed the jury to use the evidence solely for the purpose of showing the existence of defendant's untruth about a prior arrest, providing some support for the officer to have a reasonable suspicion about the nature of defendant's activities. Davila v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 959, 2012 WL 376634 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 7 2012).

1379. Trial court did not err in the sentencing phase of defendant's trial by admitting into evidence testimony from a police officer concerning uncharged misconduct on defendant's part because Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) specifically provided that, notwithstanding Tex. R. Evid. 404, the trial court could admit, at the punishment stage, evidence of an extraneous crime or bad act that was shown beyond a reasonable doubt by evidence to have been committed by the defendant. Vinez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 817, 2012 WL 335557 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 1 2012).

1380. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a witness's testimony to rebut defendant's assertion that he would not sexually abuse a nine-year-old girl where the extraneous-offense evidence was not unfairly prejudicial and was probative of defendant's credibility--and his sexual attraction to nine-year-old girls--because it showed defendant's response on cross-examination was inconsistent with his history of assaulting another female when she was the same age (or about the same age) as the victim. The trial court minimized the potential of the witness's testimony to impress the jury in an irrational and indelible way by including a limiting instruction in its charge, the record showed that the witness's testimony was not lengthy, and the State did not need the witness's testimony to prove its case-in-chief. Jones v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 363, 2012 WL 130612 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 18 2012).

1381. Appellant objected on relevance grounds when one question was posed, but appellant did not further pursue the objection and only objected further on the grounds of speculation; the record did not show a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection, the trial court was not put on notice of the complaint that the evidence was improper character or extraneous offense evidence, the objections made did not preserve error for a complaint under Rule 404(b), and moreover an officer did not specifically refer to appellant's extraneous offense evidence. The issue was waived. Phillips v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 244, 2012 WL 113047 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 12 2012).

1382. Trial court did not err by admitting testimony from two witnesses about defendant's past use and sale of methamphetamine under Tex. R. Evid. 404 because defendant's relevance objection did not preserve his Rule 404 complaints and because he lodged no objection to the testimony about his past use and sale of methamphetamine by one of the witnesses. Norris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 108, 2012 WL 34453 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 4 2012).

1383. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), appellant put his relationship with the couple he lived with and their living arrangement at issue, and the impression left upon the jury through the couple's testimony was that they trusted appellant enough to allow him to live with them; appellant opened the door to the prosecution's questions on whether the couple asked appellant to leave and why, and the trial court did not err in admitting this evidence. Sampson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 111, 2012 WL 34457 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 4 2012).

1385. During defendant's trial for intentionally or knowingly causing serious bodily injury to a child, his eight-month-old daughter, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting evidence of extraneous bad acts showing that he had a drinking problem and had shaken the child's car seat in irritation after drinking alcohol on a prior occasion; the evidence was relevant to a non-character conformity issue of consequence, such as his intent. Guerrero v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10080, 2011 WL 6808314 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 22 2011).

1386. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's gang affiliation during the guilt phase of his trial because the evidence was relevant and admissible to show defendant's motive and to rebut his self-defense theory. The probative value of the evidence outweighed any unfair prejudice, and the State did not devote an excessive amount of time to presenting the evidence. Rodriguez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10156 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 22 2011).

1387. Evidence of appellant's prior drug use and drug sale involving the informant was relevant to disproving the defense theory that appellant had no knowledge of the drug deal, and the trial court could have found that appellant's previous drug-related transactions with the informant were probative to the jury's determining if the drugs were in appellant's possession, either actually or constructively; the trial court also could have admitted the extraneous crimes because they were probative to show appellant's presence at the place that was part of the plan to deliver the informant the drugs, and appellant's prior relationship with the informant was relevant to show appellant knew that his meeting with the informant was for delivering drugs. Anderson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10038, 2011 WL 6743297 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 21 2011).

1388. Trial court found in part that evidence of prior drug dealings between appellant and the informant might show knowledge, scheme or design, or absence of mistake or accident; the reasons the trial court gave were valid reasons for admitting the evidence for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Anderson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10038, 2011 WL 6743297 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 21 2011).

1389. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred by allowing the State to present evidence that defendant was in possession of a weapon the day before the murder under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because he failed to make an objection under Rule 404(b). Benitez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9871, 2011 WL 6306643 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 15 2011).

1390. State failed to establish the extraneous offenses beyond a reasonable doubt, as the jury was asked to rely on a witness's conclusory statement, and thus the trial court erred in admitting this testimony. Higginbotham v. State, 356 S.W.3d 584, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9731 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 14 2011).

1391. While the character of the erroneously admitted evidence weighed in favor of finding harm, the remaining factors favored a finding that the error did not result in harm, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that (1) the State's emphasis on the evidence was minimal, (2) the trial court correctly instructed the jury that the extraneous offense had to be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, (3) the instruction mitigated any harm that might have resulted from the error in allowing the testimony, and (4) the court presumed that the jury followed the instruction; the court had a fair assurance that the error did not influence the jury or had only a slight effect. Higginbotham v. State, 356 S.W.3d 584, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9731 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 14 2011).

1392. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting extraneous evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) of defendant's theft of his friend's gun, the aggravated assault of one victim, the killing of the victim from whom he stole the vehicle, and the robbery of yet another victim, because the State needed the evidence to give context to defendant's crime spree. Defendant did not rest between incidents and showed that he stole the gun to go after women with whom he had had personal relationships and to then effectuate his flight to his mother's home. Devoe v. State, 354 S.W.3d 457, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1669 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 14 2011).

1394. In a sexual abuse case, the evidence of defendant's conduct following his arrest was properly admitted because it was probative of defendant's consciousness of guilt. The State's need for the evidence was significant because the victim and defendant were the only two witnesses to the actual conduct, and defendant denied touching the victim; it was rational to conclude defendant threatened the victim and his best friend because defendant was guilty of the offense. Lofton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9664, 2011 WL 6225415 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 9 2011).

1395. Although appellant claimed a violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing testimony from the complainant that appellant showed her a computer clip of naked people immediately before he sexually assaulted her; the complainant's testimony, along with appellant asking the complainant if she knew what she was looking at on the clip, showed appellant's attempt to prepare the complainant to engage in sexual activity, and also showed his intent to commit aggravated sexual assault of a child. Williams v. State, 359 S.W.3d 272, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9573 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 7 2011).

1396. Although appellant's objection at trial was largely based on Tex. R. Evid. 403, he also objected to the introduction of photographs because they went to specific prior bad acts, and thus appellant preserved for review his claim that the trial court erred under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Falade v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9408, 2011 WL 5984536 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 1 2011).

1398. Court agreed that although a prior incident, wherein appellant was found in the attic of an apartment complex, was not a conventional extraneous offense, the incident qualified as prior misconduct and had the requisite similarities in order to be admissible on the issue of identity, and the court disagreed with the claim that the State failed to prove the incident beyond a reasonable doubt. Franklin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9335, 2011 WL 5925143 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2011).

1399. Given that officers testified that they spent hours investigating a man, appellant, who was crawling around in the attic space of an apartment complex, where it was very hot, a juror could have inferred that appellant was up to some misconduct regardless of whether the State proved it constituted a criminal offense under the Texas Penal Code; the court could not say that the trial court erred in allowing evidence of the incident that the State allegedly failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt. Franklin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9335, 2011 WL 5925143 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2011).

1400. Although appellant argued that the burglary in question and another incident contained only one similarity, the attic, in both cases, appellant entered shared attic space from units in which he had special access, the point of entrance was through a hole in a closet, and the court could not say that committing burglary by using the attic crawl space to enter an apartment was a typical entrance for such offenses and thus made appellant's actions similar in committing the same type of offense; the unusual characteristic common to both incidents created an inference that appellant was the person who committed the burglary, and the trial court did not err in admitting the extraneous act evidence for purposes of identity. Franklin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9335, 2011 WL 5925143 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2011).

1401. Complained-of error regarding extraneous offense evidence was not of constitutional dimension; therefore, the court had to disregard it unless it affected appellant's substantial rights. Franklin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9335, 2011 WL 5925143 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2011).

1402. Even if the trial court erred in admitting extraneous incident evidence, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that (1) while the evidence linking appellant to the crime was circumstantial, it was not so weak that the jury was substantially influenced by the extraneous incident evidence, (2) the State did not mention the incident until rebuttal, after appellant discussed it first, (3) the incident was not the entire emphasis of the State's closing argument, and (4) there was no evidence that the jury had difficulty reaching a verdict in this burglary case. Franklin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9335, 2011 WL 5925143 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2011).

1403. Victim's friend's testimony was clear and addressed the probability of the victim fabricating her allegations, and the testimony's potential for impressing the jury in an irrational manner was minimal as the friend's allegations were less egregious; the State needed the friend's testimony, and the trial court did not err in overruling appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to extraneous offense evidence in his aggravated sexual assault of a child trial. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9189, 2011 WL 5607620 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 17 2011).

1404. Regarding appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection to the extraneous offense evidence regarding him hitting the victim's mother, appellant's wife, the court noted that an extraneous offense was admissible to explain why a victim of sexual assault did not make a prompt outcry, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling appellant's objection in his aggravated sexual assault of a child case. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9189, 2011 WL 5607620 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 17 2011).

1405. In appellant's aggravated sexual abuse of a child case, the State argued that the evidence of appellant hitting the victim's mother, who was appellant's wife, tended to show that appellant used violence to silence the victim; given this, and (1) that an assault on the wife paled in comparison to the months of sexual abuse the victim testified to and would not irrationally impress the jury, (2) any distraction from the State's case was minimal, and (3) the State needed the evidence to rebut appellant's theory that the victim's accusation was fabricated and to provide a reason, fear and abuse, for the delayed outcry, the trial court did not err in overruling appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9189, 2011 WL 5607620 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 17 2011).

1406. In appellant's aggravated sexual abuse of a child case, the trial court properly overruled appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection and admitted extraneous offense evidence of him molesting the victim's child friend to rebut his defensive theories of fabrication by the victim and retaliation by the victim's mother. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9189, 2011 WL 5607620 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 17 2011).

1407. In a driving while intoxicated (DWI) case, it was error to admit the entirety of defendant's driving record because it contained evidence of extraneous offenses beyond the prior DWI convictions that were elements of a charged offense. However, the error was harmless because evidence of guilt was ample. Bridges v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9104, 2011 WL 5557534 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 16 2011).

1408. State's theory was that appellant killed his ex-wife in a rage when confronted about sexual conduct with her daughter, and appellant admitted being accused of molestation before he stabbed the ex-wife; the evidence concerning appellant's sexually-oriented emails and alleged fantasizing about his stepdaughter was probative of motive and intent under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), plus the trial court gave limiting instructions, and the court found no abuse of discretion on the trial court's part. Zavala v. State, 401 S.W.3d 171, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8671, 2011 WL 5156843 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2011).

1409. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting a jailhouse informant's testimony that defendant told him that he had been involved in a shoot-out with a rival gang under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it included the acts that occurred just before the charged offenses and explained why defendant would be fleeing from the police. The trial court did not err by overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection to the testimony because: (1) there was very little, if any, other evidence to show why defendant would have committed the offenses of assault on a public servant and evading arrest with a vehicle; (2) the trial court gave the jury the standard limiting instruction; and (3) the informant's entire testimony was only 35 pages of the reporter's record. Castillo v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8726, 2011 WL 5221238 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 26 2011).

1410. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence allegations made by the victim's sister under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the complained-of instances did not rise to the level of extraneous misconduct evidence. The prosecutor's comments during the opening statement did not include any specifics regarding the allegations made by the victim's sister, as neither defendant nor any specific act or conduct were mentioned, and the victim's mother did not include any specific information related to the sister's allegations. Guillory v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8337, 2011 WL 4996465 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 20 2011).

1411. State's Exhibit 221 had substantial probative value because it strongly tended to prove one of the elements of Counts 2 and 3, namely, that defendant acted with intent to participate in a criminal street gang, and for this same reason, the State had a considerable need for this evidence; any potential to create undue prejudice would have been counteracted by the trial court's limiting instruction which restricted the jury's consideration of the gang activity evidence to the intent element of Counts 2 and 3, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's objections and admitting State's Exhibit 221. White v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8118, 2011 WL 4825650 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 12 2011).

1412. Evidence of an extraneous offense was not admitted within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 404 because defendant answered in the negative when asked whether he had pulled a knife on his high school girlfriend when she broke up with him. Mcnatt v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8037, 2011 WL 4712002 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 6 2011).

1413. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's extraneous sexual offense with a child under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) during his trial for continuous sexual abuse of a child, indecency with a child, and three counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child; both victims were young girls, both had their privates rubbed by defendant, and both offenses occurred while the victims were in bed. Evidence of similar sexual conduct with another young girl tended to make defendant's theories of revenge, fabrication, and lack of opportunity much less probable. Struckman v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8042, 2011 WL 4712236 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 5 2011).

1414. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the extraneous-offense evidence that defendant had engaged in abusive behavior with a former cell mate, similar to what had been inflicted on the murder victim, rebutted the theory that defendant acted in self-defense. Svenningsen v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7681 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2011).

1415. Because the evidence of the similar abusive conduct by defendant against a former cell mate made defendant's self-defense theory much less probable and the State needed the extraneous offense evidence to question whether defendant acted in self defense at all, under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the former cell mate's testimony. Svenningsen v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7681 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 21 2011).

1416. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the captain to testify to clarify the extent of defendant's disciplinary record because defendant's testimony created a false impression that he had not been disciplined after the discovery of unsecured evidence in his office; while testifying as a rebuttal witness, the captain testified that defendant had in fact been suspended, and that that disciplinary action was taken as a result of the unsecured evidence investigation. Any prejudice stemming from the extraneous evidence did not outweigh its probative value, as the discussion with the captain consumed only a small portion of the record and was necessary to impeach defendant and to provide the jury with a complete and accurate understanding of the facts. Milton v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7592, 2011 WL 4361482 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 20 2011).

1417. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), letters from appellant to the victim were not admitted to show and did not tend to show that he acted in conformity with his character when he assaulted the victim, nor did the letters show that appellant was generally a bad or violent person, and the letters showed that he was trying to convince her not to testify against him; the trial court did not err in admitting the letters. Munsinger v. State, 2011 Tex. App.

1418. State needed to explain the relationship between appellant and the victim, and letters from appellant to the victim helped explain the dynamics of their relationship and thus were relevant; appellant did not identify specific instances of prior misconduct contained in the letters that were introduced or would suggest that he acted in conformity with his character in committing the offense, nor was it shown that the letters were more prejudicial than probative, and the trial court did not err in admitting the letters. Munsinger v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7318, 2011 WL 3915671 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 7 2011).

1419. Protective order was not evidence of a prior bad act and did not have the tendency to show that appellant acted in conformity with a character trait; it was an agreed order entered after the alleged assault and was not strictly germane to any contested issue, such that the trial court did not err in overruling appellant's objection that it was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Munsinger v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7318, 2011 WL 3915671 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 7 2011).

1420. Appellees' claimed that evidence of a company president's arrest and his actions was admissible to show intent, but his intent regarding agreements was not an issue in the case, plus nothing represented a routine practice of an organization or a regular response to a repeated situation. Nichols v. State, 349 S.W.3d 612, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7253 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 6 2011).

1421. Appellant's trial objection was based on Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), but on appeal he referred to Rule 404(a); the arguments differed and the issue was not preserved for review. Chitwood v. State, 350 S.W.3d 746, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7301 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 6 2011).

1422. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence that defendant had sexually assaulted another child under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 during his trial on charges of sexual assault and aggravated sexual assault because it rebutted the defenses of lack of opportunity and fabrication. Theragood v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7141, 2011 WL 3848840 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2011).

1423. To the extent appellant argued that only some evidence of his use and manufacture of methamphetamine should have been admitted, appellant failed to preserve that complaint by failing to object each time the evidence was offered, or by seeking a running objection. Escobedo v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7113, 2011 WL 3836438 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2011).

1424. Defendant's argument that although the State elected at the close of its case-in-chief and the jury was informed of that election, the State's election violated his due process rights was without merit where, because the State made a proper election, the trial court could order the State to elect before close of its evidence. Criswell v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7112, 2011 WL 3836442 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2011).

1425. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting photographs of defendant naked and/or exposing his genitals, penis, and anus under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the photographs were relevant to link defendant to the child pornography on his computer and showing intent. De Leon v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7029, 2011 WL 3847180 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 30 2011).

1426. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's possible gang affiliation under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 403 because the evidence that defendant initially approached a man and asked more than once if he was a member of a particular gang showed the context in which the encounter began that resulted in defendant shooting the victim. The trial court did not err by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial. Salazar v.

State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6835, 2011 WL 3770297 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 26 2011).

1427. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the State's notice of intent to use extraneous offenses was not unreasonable because fourteen days was an adequate period to eliminate the possibility of surprise as to a witness's testimony, and the court might have also determined that the State would call another witness to testify about that same event due to defendant's admissions to her regarding sexually molesting children during that same time period. Therefore, the possibility of surprise was eliminated as to the scope of the testimony. Quinones v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6891, 2011 WL 3841586 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 25 2011).

1428. Defendant's argument and questioning of the witnesses attempted to portray the victim as the aggressor and defendant as merely defending himself and lacking criminal intent; thus, the trial court's ruling that evidence of the prior assaults was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) was not an abuse of its discretion. Watkins v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6992, 2011 WL 3925583 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 24 2011).

1429. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's prior assault of another victim during his trial on charges of aggravated assault and manslaughter because it was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show defendant's intent and to rebut his theory of self-defense. Render v. State, 347 S.W.3d 905, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6623 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 18 2011).

1430. Court did not err during a trial for unlawfully delivering a controlled substance in overruling defendant's objection to evidence of other transactions under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because defendant's testimony on direct examination that defendant never offered to sell prescription drugs to an undercover officer was directly relevant to the charged offense and opened the door for the State to impeach defendant's testimony. Imade v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5698, 2011 WL 3064759 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 26 2011).

1431. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of other offenses that occurred on the day before the offenses for which he was convicted where the court could reasonably have deemed testimony about defendant's escape from custody on February 11 relevant to his motive, intent, plan, or absence of mistake in taking the actions he did on February 12; the trial court did not err by admitting the evidence because it could reasonably have decided that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice. Morse v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5173, 2011 WL 2651915 (Tex. App. Austin July 8 2011).

1432. Trial court did not err by including "corroboration" in the list of acceptable uses for extraneous offense evidence because the corroborative nature of the extraneous offense evidence was not unduly emphasized by including "corroboration" in the instruction, and "corroboration" was given no more or less emphasis than any other proper use of the extraneous evidence. Lacaze v. State, 346 S.W.3d 113, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5095 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 7 2011).

1433. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence three firearms that were not connected to the shooting that were found in defendant's motel room when he was arrested because: (1) defendant's possession of the firearms did not necessarily amount to extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); and (2) the evidence was probative of defendant's connection to the drug dealer's gang and to the State's efforts to prove that the victim was murdered in retaliation for informing on the drug dealer, Assuming that defendant was prejudiced, any error was harmless because there was ample evidence of defendant's guilt. Gonzalez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5139, 2011 WL 2652162 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 7 2011).

1434. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence three firearms that were not connected to the shooting that were found in defendant's motel room when he was arrested because: (1) the court did not believe that possession of a firearm was, in and of itself, extraneous misconduct; and (2) defendant made no assertion or argument that he was surprised or otherwise harmed by the State's failure to include the firearms in its Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) notice. Gonzalez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5139, 2011 WL 2652162 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 7 2011).

1435. Trial court did not err in overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection to a witness's testimony during defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation with the intent to commit theft because, from the witness's testimony, the jury could have reasonably inferred that defendant kicked in the witness's door in an attempt to evade detection by authorities following the burglary of the victim's home. Rankin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5125, 2011 WL 2651566 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 7 2011).

1436. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) is a rule of inclusion rather than exclusion. The rule excludes only that evidence that is offered or will be used solely for the purpose of proving bad character and hence conduct in conformity with that bad character. Rankin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5125, 2011 WL 2651566 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 7 2011).

1437. Even though the trial court erred by admitted evidence of extraneous misconduct that occurred two days after the date of the instant altercation, the error was harmless because: (1) the State presented considerable evidence of defendant's guilt, as numerous witnesses testified they saw defendant hit the victim; (2) there was considerable evidence of injuries to the victim; (3) the State did not reemphasize the details of the extraneous offense during closing argument; and (4) the trial court included a limiting instruction in the jury charge. Vaughn v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5037, 2011 WL 2621327 (Tex. App. Austin July 1 2011).

1438. At defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation based on evidence showing that defendant and his brother broke into a mobile home and stole a TV set, the trial court ruled that evidence of two extraneous burglaries committed by his brother was relevant, probative, and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). The appellate court held that defendant was not harmed by the admission of the evidence because it was not unduly emphasized by the State, and it did not have a substantial effect on the jury's verdict. Crutchfield v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4959, 2011 WL 2638402 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2011).

1439. Evidence of defendant's membership in the same gang as a witness was admissible to show that the witness was biased to testify in favor of defendant. The probative value of the impeachment evidence was high because the State wanted to show why the witness testified that he had lied to police about the statements defendant had made to him. Mccuin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5031, 2011 WL 2611234 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 30 2011).

1440. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection to the victim's testimony about what appellant had told her concerning a prior offense, and even assuming appellant was correct, there were other exceptions under which the trial court could have admitted the evidence, including rebuttal of a defensive theory; evidence that appellant had similarly tied up another girl had the tendency to rebut the theory that the victim had fabricated her outcry. Reyes v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4811, 2011 WL 2507002 (Tex. App. Austin June 24 2011).

1441. Defendant did not demonstrate that the State's failure to give reasonable notice of the extraneous offenses would have affected his trial strategy because defendant had the opportunity to cross-examine the victim, the source of the extraneous offense testimony. Defendant did not argue that his defensive strategy would have changed had the State provided more than six days' notice of the extraneous offenses. Martines v. State, 371 S.W.3d 232, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4773, 2011 WL 2502839 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 23 2011).

1442. Trial court erred by admitting into evidence other lawsuits, verdicts, and judgments against the corporation that owned and operated the cemetery concerning the double sale of burial plots because the evidence was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, as the events occurred at different cemeteries with different employees, they occurred more than a year apart, and there was no evidence that the events were part of a system, scheme, or plan. The error was not harmless because appellants' attorney intended for the evidence to be a significant and pervasive part of the trial; because there was no evidence of three of the four appellants suffered compensable mental anguish, the jury's award of $ 100,000 to each had to have been based on something other than properly admitted evidence. Serv. Corp. Int'l v. Guerra, 348 S.W.3d 221, 2011 Tex. LEXIS 417, 54 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1191 (Tex. 2011).

1443. Because evidence provided necessary context and showed appellant's motive for shooting at an officer, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence under an exception to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Benites-vijil v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4574, 2011 WL 2435942 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 16 2011).

1444. Trial court did not err in declining to exclude extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403, given that (1) the State needed the testimony in question to establish that appellant had previously been seen holding a weapon that was similar to the one he used to threaten an officer, (2) the impermissible inference of character conformity was minimized by the trial court's limiting instruction, and (3) the amount of time used for the testimony was not excessive. Benites-vijil v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4574, 2011 WL 2435942 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 16 2011).

1445. Appellant provided a general discussion on the application of Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404, and 405, most of which was not germane to the punishment phase, but he failed to specify the bad acts or extraneous offenses he found inadmissible or provide any references to their admission over objection; in the absence of references and citation of authority, this complaint under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) was waived. Crutchfield v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4490, 2011 WL 2420380 (Tex. App. Tyler June 15 2011).

1446. Appellant did not point to any bad act or extraneous offense for which the proof was doubtful, and the proof of the extraneous offenses introduced was uncontradicted, such that he suffered no egregious harm. Crutchfield v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4490, 2011 WL 2420380 (Tex. App. Tyler June 15 2011).

1447. At defendant's trial for attempted burglary of a habitation with intent to commit theft, the State was permitted to offer evidence regarding the theft of a vehicle in the same neighborhood because the vehicle's keys were found in defendant's pocket. The evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) rebut the defense theory that defendant was merely trespassing and lacked intent to commit burglary. Dickson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4774 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 6 2011).

1448. Jury's request for previous charges and convictions did not implicate Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) but was a request for the relevant exhibits. Alvis v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4301, 2011 WL 2120510 (Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2011).

1449. Jury could reasonably infer that the letter was written by defendant, and that he composed it with an eye toward establishing an alibi or exculpatory evidence regarding his pending charge; all this made a fact of consequence, that defendant knowingly or intentionally possessed the drugs found in the police car where he had just been sitting, more probable, and the letter was relevant evidence. In re F.R., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4104, 2011 WL 2175857 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 27 2011).

1450. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant was not harmed by the trial court's erroneous admission of statements at the penalty phase from an outcry witness concerning an extraneous offense even though the State's notice of intent was unreasonable under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) for lack of any reference to the county in which the act allegedly occurred or its date.

The error was harmless because the alleged incident was part of the series of events for which defendant was being prosecuted, and there was no indication that he was surprised by the allegations or statements. Schatte v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4100, 2011 WL 2112025 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 26 2011).

1451. Evidence of bathing incident between defendant and his niece was admissible, Tex. R. Evid. 402, 403, 404(b), as it showed the nature of defendant's relationship with and mindset towards his niece, Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 Gragert v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3948, 2011 WL 2027955 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 24 2011).

1452. Because the jury was not informed of any details of appellant's prior conviction, the trial court promptly instructed the jury to disregard, and evidence of other misconduct was already admitted, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying appellant's mistrial motion. Cox v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3733, 2011 WL 1884794 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 18 2011).

1453. Challenged testimony of two witnesses illustrated the nature of the relationship between decedent and appellant, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a), and the requirements of the statute had been met; because this was a case in which the prior relationship between the victim and appellant was a material issue, the admissibility requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) were also met. Sanders v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3673, 2011 WL 1843508 (Tex. App. Dallas May 16 2011).

1454. Trial court acted within its discretion in allowing the experts to discuss the details of the patient's offenses and other bad acts he committed that were contained in the records they reviewed in determining that the patient was a sexually violent predator because having each expert explain which facts were considered and how those facts influenced his evaluation assisted the jury in weighing each expert's testimony and the opinion each offered regarding the ultimate issue in the case. In re Day, 342 S.W.3d 193, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3573 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 12 2011).

1455. At defendant's criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, a witness was permitted to testify that defendant said that he had given the victim a vaginal exam; Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not apply, because the testimony was not about an extraneous act or offense. Babineaux v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3632, 2011 WL 1833123 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 12 2011).

1456. State relied on a photograph to show the blood and cuts on appellant's hands in order to prove that he was the assailant, and the State did not argue that the photograph proved that appellant was in a gang, and nothing indicated that the photograph would be seen as a gang sign, such that the photograph was not evidence of other crimes under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Barron v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3330, 2011 WL 1744110 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 4 2011).

1457. Even though the trial court erred by failing to include extraneous offense limiting instructions in the jury charge during the guilt phase of defendant's trial, the error was harmless because: (1) the complainant and two officers testified that defendant, a convicted felon, possessed a firearm at the time of his arrest; (2) defense counsel admitted during closing arguments that the evidence was probably sufficient to support a conviction for that offense; (3) the trial court provided the requisite oral instruction twice to the jury and included it in the written charge in the companion case; and (4) the prosecutor did not emphasize the extraneous offenses during closing arguments. Williams v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3312 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 3 2011).

1458. Even though the trial court erred by failing to provide a written instruction to the jury regarding the extraneous offenses during the punishment phase as required by Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(b) (Supp. 2009), the error was harmless because: (1) defendant received the minimum sentence for the being a felon in possession of a firearm offense; and (2) as to the aggravated robbery offense, defendant stipulated to nine prior felony convictions, he received a sentence on the low end of the statutory range, the evidence of the extraneous offenses was strong and uncontroverted, and the prosecutor mentioned the extraneous offenses only once during closing arguments. Williams v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3312 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 3 2011).

1459. Child victim's testimony that defendant assaulted her mother immediately after she confronted him about the sexual abuse was relevant to show defendant's unsettled and combative demeanor after the incident, which indicated a consciousness of guilt and as an assault against an adult witness, could be seen as tampering with the witness. Therefore, the evidence was admissible and trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to object. Cueva v. State, 339 S.W.3d 839, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3333 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 2 2011).

1460. Extraneous offense evidence was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to rebut the defense's theory that appellant had no opportunity to commit the offense. Calvin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3091, 2011 WL 1562138 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 21 2011).

1461. Appellant did not seem to raise the overruling of the Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection as an issue on appeal, but in any event the court did not find that the trial court erred in overruling the Rule 403 objection because the probative value of the extraneous offense evidence was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice. Calvin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3091, 2011 WL 1562138 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 21 2011).

1462. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, evidence that defendant was driving a vehicle that matched the description of the vehicle involved in the shooting and that he attempted to flee from officers when one of them tried to pull him over was probative of his consciousness of guilt and relevant to prove his identity under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). The trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the evidence was relevant for purposes other than character conformity. Owens v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2871, 2011 WL 1435499 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 14 2011).

1463. Appellant raised fabrication by the victim as his defense theory during opening statements, which opened the door to the admission of another witness's testimony of abuse by appellant, used by the State to rebut appellant's theory; the trial court did not err in admitting this testimony. Layer v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2648, 2011 WL 1331538 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 7 2011).

1464. Appellant testified that the complainant pulled a knife and attempted to stab him first, and thus the trial court was within its discretion to exclude the evidence as offered solely to show character conformity, under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Smith v. State, 355 S.W.3d 138, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2426 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2011).

1465. Because it was countered by the direct evidence that the trial court admitted, any error made in excluding the complainant's earlier stabbing incident did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict, under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the jury chose to reject appellant's claims that he acted in self-defense and defense of third party, as was the jury's province. Smith v. State, 355 S.W.3d 138, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2426 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2011).

1466. Use of the words depicted in the tattoos to show the complainant was a bad person and that he acted in conformity with his bad character during the altercation weighed against admission, as this would have been improper; because the words presented a danger of unfair prejudice, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Smith v. State, 355 S.W.3d 138, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2426 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2011).

1467. Even if the trial court erred by admitting evidence of an extraneous sexual assault during sentencing on the ground that the State did not properly provide defendant notice of its intention to do so, the error was harmless because defendant did not claim that the evidence caused him surprise, as the sexual assault was a charge pending against defendant in the same court as the instant charges and the trial court determined defendant had actual notice of the charge. Gonzalez v. State, 337 S.W.3d 473, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1967 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 17 2011).

1468. State's reference to prior burglaries in its opening statement was a passing reference, and given the brief reference, the lack of connection to appellant, and the immediate instruction to disregard, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying appellant's motion for a mistrial. Shipp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1976, 2011 WL 1005459 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 17 2011).

1469. Extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in defendant's prosecution for aggravated sexual assault by threat because that evidence indicated that defendant grabbed a New York victim's breast with sufficient force to cause her pain and that the assault would have ended in sexual assault had the victim not escaped. The extraneous offense evidence rebutted defendant's theory that the Texas victim was lying about the nonconsensual nature of the sexual activity as the circumstances in both cases were similar. Sanchez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2019, 2011 WL 946992 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 17 2011).

1470. When defendant was charged with causing injury to an elderly person by reckless conduct, the State was permitted to rebut defendant's claim of self-defense with evidence of his prior assault conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). The evidence was quite probative and did not have a tendency to confuse or mislead the jury. Kelley v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1780, 2011 WL 832862 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 9 2011).

1471. State did not use the photograph to prove defendant's gang activity; the photograph was admitted to prove defendant's identity as the assailant and it was properly admitted to prove the identity of the perpetrator of the crime, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b).

1472. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence concerning a syringe found in defendant's sock in jail following his arrest because the evidence was relevant to establish defendant's knowledge of the methamphetamine and to rebut the defensive theory that defendant had no knowledge of the methamphetamine in either the van or in the vehicle defendant was riding in. Defendant failed to establish that the probative value of the evidence was significantly or substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, defendant's knowledge of the methamphetamine was seriously contested, the time necessary to present the evidence represented a negligible portion of the State's case, and limiting instructions were given. Phillips v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1383, 2011 WL 652846 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 23 2011).

1473. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of the circumstances of defendant' arrest in July 2004 because evidence that defendant possessed methamphetamine at his father's residence on a later occasion was circumstantial evidence that defendant intentionally or knowingly possessed methamphetamine on an earlier occasion. Defendant's knowledge of the methamphetamine was seriously contested, the time necessary to present the evidence represented a negligible portion of the State's case, and limiting instructions were given. Phillips v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1383, 2011 WL 652846 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 23 2011).

1474. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to introduce evidence of the meaning of the victim's teardrop tattoo because defendant's determination that he needed to shoot the victim in self-defense could not have been based on apprehension of the victim's previous violent acts or reputation as demonstrated by the tattoo because defendant was unaware of the victim's teardrop tattoo. Hines v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 950, 2011

WL 494737 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 10 2011).

1475. Testimony that defendant sought to proffer from the complainant about a prior incident in which she allegedly attacked him did nothing more than show character conformity; the trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to admit character evidence, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). James v. State, 335 S.W.3d 719, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1004 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 10 2011).

1476. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that defendant, after committing the charged offense and on the same day, had ordered two minor girls walking down a street to get in his van where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence regarding defendant's encounter with the minor girls was relevant and admissible because that evidence revealed defendant's true plans about his encounter with the victim on the day he committed the offense. The trial judge could have reasonably concluded that the inherent probative force of the evidence, along with the State's need for the evidence, substantially outweighed the danger of any unfair prejudice to defendant, and the presentation of the extraneous offense evidence did not consume an inordinate amount of time. Frank v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 762, 2011 WL 379041 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 2 2011).

1477. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of guns and cash during his capital murder trial because, to put the conspiracy offense in context, evidence that defendant and his sons were drug dealers who dealt in large amounts of cash and guns to protect their drugs and case was necessary, and therefore the evidence was same-transaction contextual evidence and background contextual evidence excepted from Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Davis v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 835, 2011 WL 322877 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 2 2011).

1478. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's drug transaction and drug use during his capital murder trial because it was same-transaction contextual evidence and background contextual evidence that put in context the conspiracy offense that defendant was charged with; the State sought to show that defendant was an active participant with his sons in a large-volume and dangerous drug business, and not just an after the fact bus driver, to explain why defendant would have entered into the conspiracy with his sons to rob the victim. Given the State's need for circumstantial evidence to prove that defendant entered into the conspiracy to rob the victim, the court could not say that there was a clear disparity between the danger of unfair prejudice posed by the evidence and its probative value. Davis v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 835, 2011 WL 322877 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 2 2011).

1479. In a forgery case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of three other forged checks as relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 404 to prove defendant's guilty knowledge and intent. The fact that each of these forgeries was substantially identical tended to rebut defendant's claim that she had passed the first check without knowing that it was forged. Williams v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 857, 2011 WL 350477 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 2 2011).

1480. Jury could have found from the evidence that appellant remained a member of a certain gang, despite his protestations that he stopped being a member 19 years before trial; the court rejected appellant's argument that the gang evidence was inadmissible at punishment because it did not pertain to appellant's admitted gang membership 19 years before. Gilmore v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 616 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2011).

1481. Gang evidence admitted at punishment was relevant under case law and probative of appellant's character, the testimony did not consume an inordinate amount of time at the hearing, and the jury sentenced appellant to much lower than the permitted 99 years in each possession with intent to deliver case, such that the probative value of the gang evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Gilmore v. State, 2011

Tex. App. LEXIS 616 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2011).

1482. Regarding evidence admitted at punishment concerning the character and reputation of the gang, the evidence supported the conclusion that appellant was still a member at the time of the offenses; testimony that the gang was engaged in crime satisfied the second prong of case law regarding when gang affiliation evidence was admissible. Gilmore v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 616 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2011).

1483. Appellant failed to raise an argument in the trial court and failed to preserve for review the claim that certain gang evidence was inadmissible during the punishment phase. Gilmore v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 616 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 28 2011).

1485. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) is not applicable to the prior bad acts of a dog. The rule specifically relates to "a person." Smith v. State, 337 S.W.3d 354, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 594 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 27 2011).

1486. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), defendant's opening statement was sufficient to raise a theory of fabrication that entitled the State to offer extraneous-offense evidence in rebuttal because defendant's attorney provided the victim's motive for fabricating her story; he said that there was no evidence to support her allegations; and he claimed that her story changed. Gaytan v. State, 331 S.W.3d 218, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 444 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 21 2011).

1487. Another sexual assault victim's testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to rebut the defense's claim of fabrication or frame-up by the victim and because the evidence had relevance apart from character conformity. Dreyer v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 353, 2011 WL 193494 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 19 2011).

1489. Evidence pertaining to appellant's conduct with two other women, where he allegedly anally raped one and forced the other to engaged in sexual acts at gunpoint, had logical relevance apart from character conformity because it showed that the victim's allegations were less likely to be fabricated, plus it rebutted appellant's statements that he would not have engaged in the alleged conduct; thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling appellant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Jordan v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10244, 2010 WL 5541695 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 30 2010).

1490. Extraneous offenses occurred relatively close in time, involved highly unusual events that were unlikely to repeat themselves inadvertently, rebutted appellant's fabrication allegation, and the prosecutor did not seek to offer the evidence until after appellant testified in the guilt/innocence phase; in reviewing the balancing factors under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court found no abuse of discretion by the trial court in finding that the value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Jordan v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10244, 2010 WL 5541695 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 30 2010).

1491. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting into evidence five child pornography photographs found on defendant's computer; his possession or viewing of child pornography was relevant circumstantial evidence of his intent to arouse or gratify his sexual desire. Wooley v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10306 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 30 2010).

1492. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a witness's testimony because whether the witness's testimony about an incident of intoxication unrelated to the current felony driving while intoxicated offense was relevant and admissible under the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; furthermore, even if the trial court erred in admitting the challenged testimony, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the State placed extremely little emphasis on the witness's testimony that he had previously seen defendant intoxicated. Snyder v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10203, 2010 WL 5541120 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 29 2010).

1493. Because the evidence of the drug deal was admissible to explain the reason the two men were planning to meet, and was an intertwined, inseparable part of the victim's murder, the evidence of the drug sale was admissible as same transaction contextual evidence and, as such, did not implicated Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Arias v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10217, 2010 WL 5541118 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 29 2010).

1494. Photographs of defendant's tattoos on his hand and across his stomach were admissible for purposes of identification under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and the danger of unfair prejudice resulting from the admission of that evidence did not substantially outweigh its probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 403 where the tattoos were physical evidence linking defendant to a nickname that several witnesses used in identifying defendant and where the jury already heard testimony regarding defendant's gang membership. Arias v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10217, 2010 WL 5541118 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 29 2010).

1495. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting extraneous offense evidence of another robbery under the identity exception to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because both robberies were committed in the same area within an hour of each other, a clean-cut African-American man approached the victims on foot just after they had exited their vehicles in the parking lots of their respective apartment complexes, both victims heard the sound of a gun cocking just before they saw a man with a silver gun, both victims saw a red bandana, the man with the gun immediately asked for the victims' purse/wallet and took their cell phones, and both victims identified defendant as the robber. The trial court did not err by failing to exclude the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the evidence was probative as it assisted the jury in determining the robber's identity; (2) identity was the seminal issue in dispute; (3) the trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction; and (4) the testimony about the other robbery was only about 30 pages of the reporter's record. Carroll v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10003, 2010 WL 5142386 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 15 2010).

1496. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b) in admitting evidence of defendant's extraneous misconduct where the evidence was admitted for purposes other than character conformity and was more probative than prejudicial because the State's need for the evidence was considerable, and although the content of the evidence was emotional, it made the existence of a material and, perhaps, the ultimate disputed fact at trial-defendant's identity as the perpetrator-more probable. Because the pattern and characteristics of the alleged offense against the victim were so distinctively similar to the misconduct adduced in the evidence that a "signature" by defendant was apparent, the evidence showed a modus operandi that the State used both in its identifying of defendant as the perpetrator and in establishing the manner in which defendant committed the offense. Curcuru v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9748, 2010 WL 5020178 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 9 2010).

1497. In a murder case, photographs of a van that had been set on fire were not unduly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and were relevant to establishing that the fire was intentionally set; defendant's counsel was not ineffective for not objecting to some of the photographs; and the extraneous offense of the burning of the van was admissible as same transaction contextual evidence and thus did not require a limiting instruction. Balderas v.

State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9752, 2010 WL 5621288 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 9 2010).

1498. While the parties had stipulated to the characterization of prior acts as extraneous offenses, based on the language "on or about" in the indictment, the prior acts were not extraneous as they were allegedly committed before the return of the indictment and within the limitations period for aggravated sexual assault of a child in Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 12.01(5). Garza v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9613, 2010 WL 5106329 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2010).

1499. Prior convictions were admitted solely to attack appellant's credibility, and it was improper for the State to address the prior convictions to argue appellant had victimized other people in the past; however, reversal was not required because (1) the prior convictions were admitted before the jury and the argument had not injected new facts harmful to the accused, (2) the trial court sustained the objection and instructed the jury to disregard, and (3) the evidence supporting appellant's possession with intent to deliver cocaine conviction was sufficiently strong to assure the court of a high certainty that the jury would have found her guilty even had the improper argument been excluded. Kibble v. State, 340 S.W.3d 14, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9572 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 2 2010).

1500. Even if the admission of testimony regarding appellant's possession of illegal drugs was erroneous, the error, if any, was harmless because the same or similar testimony was introduced elsewhere without objection. Watkins v. State, 333 S.W.3d 771, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9641 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 1 2010).

1501. Even if the trial court erred by failing to instruct the jury regarding the burden of proof for extraneous offenses, any such error did not egregiously harm defendant because defendant was convicted of causing the victim's death by acting alone or as a party to her murder; evidence that he attempted to conceal evidence by destroying a car was only part of the evidence that the jury had to consider in assessing punishment. The evidence also showed that defendant was involved in gang activity, offered conflicting information to police about his own involvement in the crime, and assisted the victim's murderer before, during, and after the crime. Smith v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9419, 2010 WL 4878847 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 30 2010).

1502. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying appellant's motion for a mistrial, given that the complained-of testimony, wherein a witness said appellant pushed her around when she was pregnant, was not so inflammatory as to have undermined the efficacy of the trial court's instruction to disregard; the trial court explained that the State had no right to preemptively admit extraneous offenses in anticipation of cross-examination and the prosecutor did not report the error or make any reference to the testimony in closing arguments, plus the evidence against appellant was particularly strong, and absent the comment, his conviction was relatively certain. Escudero v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9431, 2010 WL 4840501 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 30 2010).

1503. Trial court could have concluded appellant's niece's testimony was offered to rebut appellant's defense of fabrication, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the testimony as relevant rebuttal evidence. Dial v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9273, 2010 WL 4705529 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2010).

1504. Appellant complained about the harm he suffered when the jury heard reference to his extraneous offenses on recordings, but the references were brief and followed by limiting instructions, and one reference was testified to by another witness, such that the court overruled this issue. Dial v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9273, 2010 WL 4705529 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2010).

App. LEXIS 9273, 2010 WL 4705529 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2010).

1506. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection; given his sole defensive theory of fabrication, the inherent probative force of the niece's testimony, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), strongly served to make the existence of a fact of consequence more probable, and considering the Tex. R. Evid. 403 factors, the balancing determination by the trial court did not show a clear abuse of discretion, as the trial court gave limiting instructions and the presentation of the testimony was brief and not particularly graphic. Dial v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9273, 2010 WL 4705529 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2010).

1507. In defendant's prosecution for aggravated sexual assault of a child, assuming without deciding that the State failed to give defendant proper notice of its use of extraneous offenses under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 3, no harm was shown as defendant never argued surprise and defendant challenged the complainant's credibility regarding the extraneous offenses on cross-examination. Mccullough v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9059, 2010 WL 4611660 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 16 2010).

1508. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) prohibited evidence of the victim's mother prior misconduct--her assault of the victim in 2003--to show that, in 2008, the mother acted in conformity with her misconduct in 2003; the trial court could find that the mother's prior assault of the victim was not almost identical to the acts of the charged crime. Quiroz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8939, 2010 WL 4492939 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 10 2010).

1509. Testimony of two police officers that defendant had twice before been found in possession of cocaine while in or near the vehicle in which the cocaine for the present possession offense was found was plainly relevant, beyond mere character conformity, to rebut defendant's suggestion that he was an innocent victim of circumstance, and, under the circumstances, a trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by admitting the officers' testimony to rebut defendant's claim that he was unaware of the cocaine found in the vehicle. It was also not an abuse of discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 for the trial court to conclude that the relevance of the testimony, which consumed only sixteen pages of the reporter's record, outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice or confusion of the issues. Bell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9034, 2010 WL 4595704 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 9 2010).

1510. In a case in which defendant was convicted of cocaine possession, a probation officer's testimony did not place defendant's drug use in the context of his operation of the vehicle in which the cocaine was found because, insofar as it served to prove defendant's knowing possession of cocaine on the date of the instant offense, it did so only by showing that defendant was a chronic drug abuser, i.e., by character conformity. However, in light of the other evidence properly admitted, the admission of the probation officer's testimony did not affect defendant's substantial rights pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Bell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9034, 2010 WL 4595704 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 9 2010).

1511. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the evidence of the shooting of the first victim and the other evidence collected at the crime scene pertaining to the shooting (such as the truck in the culvert) demonstrated defendant's motive, intent, and identity with regard to the aggravated robbery of the driver and the second victim, who was shot when defendant tried to steal the driver's car. Wilson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8685, 2010 WL 4261872 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 28 2010).

1512. Counsel was not ineffective during defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault for failing to object to evidence that defendant used marijuana because the victim's testimony regarding defendant's marijuana usage was arguably admissible as evidence of plan and preparation under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Anderson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8487, 2010 WL 4140317 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 20 2010).

1513. Even though the trial court erred by allowing the State to ask a police officer if defendant had assaulted two other inmates upon arriving at the city's holding facility, as it showed defendant's propensity to be aggressive and perpetrate assaults, the error was harmless because there was a significant amount of evidence that went to the issue of defendant's intent and the State mentioned the evidence only minimally during closing arguments. Parson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8330, 2010 WL 4053782 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 15 2010).

1514. Victims testified that defendant made them watch pornographic images and videos depicting both children and adults, that defendant made them perform acts depicted in the pornographic images they were forced to watch, and that defendant would make them remove their clothing as they were watching the videos then sexually assault them afterward; based on that testimony, the evidence regarding child pornography found on the DVD's constituted same-transaction-contextual evidence and the evidence of child pornography was so intertwined with the sexual assaults of the victims that the jury's understanding of the offenses would have been obscured without it. The evidence was also admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) on the issue of defendant's intent, and although the evidence of child pornography was undoubtedly prejudicial, the State limited the visual evidence to two 30-second segments, and the appellate court could not say that the district court abused its discretion by ruling that under Tec. R. Evid. 403 the probative value of that evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Bonner v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7440, 2010 WL 3503858 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 8 2010).

1515. Indictment is not evidence of guilt; thus, the phrase "a child welfare complaint" in the indictment was not extraneous-offense evidence prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Beck v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7265, 2010 WL 3434075 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 1 2010).

1516. Trial court did not err by allowing defendant's daughter to testify that he had repeatedly sexually abused her because it was relevant rebuttal evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), as it was clear from the record that defense counsel raised the defensive theory of fabrication during his opening statement, cross-examination of the State's witnesses, and case-in-chief. Castro v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7120, 2010 WL 3418273 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 31 2010).

1517. In defendant's aggravated assault case, the court did not err in admitting evidence that defendant's coparticipant had pointed a gun at another woman soon before the charged conduct because the State's theory was that defendant and the coparticipant were intentionally threatening young women with the rifle while driving through a parking lot. The State was thus entitled to use the prior victim's testimony to show the context in which the charged offense occurred in order to establish defendant's intent to threaten the victim. Mitchell v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7105, 2010 WL 3418223 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 31 2010).

1518. During grandparents' trial for the murder of one granddaughter and serious bodily injury to another granddaughter, defense counsels' performance was not deficient when they failed to object under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to testimony that Texas Child Protective Services (CPS) had once been called to the granddaughters' school because they had been seen eating out of trash cans; counsel could have determined that the jury should have known that CPS had already investigated the grandparents and closed the investigation. Ramirez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7169 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2010).

1519. Portions of a video during which defendant admitted to a police officer to having been pulled over based on a report of a similar road rage incident, in which defendant had been accused of threatening to pull a gun on another driver, was properly admitted during defendant's trial for deadly conduct in connection with a road rage incident because the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to rebut the defensive theory. Hughes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7233, 2010 WL 3442203 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2010).

1520. Because challenged evidence had relevance apart from character conformity, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling appellant's Tex. R. Evid. 404 objection. Lewis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7292, 2010 WL 3433992 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2010).

1521. Defendant's contention that the State failed to provide reasonable notice of extraneous offenses that it intended to offer under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was rejected because: (1) the State choose not to introduce evidence of theft of the electronic device charger; (2) defense counsel admitted that he had notice that the State intended to offer evidence related to the burglary of a skate shop; and (3) defendant was not surprised or harmed by the introduction of evidence relating to a robbery because prior to defendant's trial, the State produced transcripts of court proceedings against an accomplice for that robbery that disclosed defendant's role in the robbery and the potential witnesses against him, and the State's witness list in the instant case disclosed the robbery victim's identity. Davis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6949, 2010 WL 3341514 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2010).

1522. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of a prior robbery during defendant's aggravated robbery trial because: (1) it was committed the evening prior to the instant robbery; (2) defendant and his accomplice acted together in both robberies; (3) both robberies were committed against lone, older women using surprise, speed, and strength through force or the threat of force; and (4) both robberies were committed while using the same vehicle as a means of escape. Therefore, the probative value of the evidence was great, as it showed that defendant and his accomplice acted together in a continuing criminal enterprise and rebutted defendant's theory that he was not a party to the instant robbery but was merely present in the vehicle while it occurred. Davis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6949, 2010 WL 3341514 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 25 2010).

1523. State gave defendant notice that it intended to introduce defendant's prior criminal trespass under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) where the prosecutor stated on the record that several months before trial, he had delivered to defendant numerous discovery documents, including a copy of the offense report that referenced a statement that the instant burglary victims had report to authorities that defendant had criminally trespassed on their residence. Even if the State had not provided such notice, defendant was not harmed because his counsel made no claim that he was actually surprised by the evidence, and in light of the fact that the criminal trespass involved the same property and the same property owners as the charged offense, it was unlikely that defendant was aware that the State would attempt to admit the evidence. Castle v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7039, 2010 WL 3370057 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 25 2010).

1524. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred allowing into evidence information about his alleged prior bad acts in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404 because defendant did not object each time the witness testified about defendant's purported extraneous bad acts, nor did he obtain a running objection from the trial court. Even if he had preserved the claim, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony because it fell within the purview of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, as the testimony described the history of the relationship between defendant and the child victim and established defendant's consistently hostile behavior or his statement of made as it related to the victim. Samora v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6759, 2010 WL 3279536 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 19 2010).

1525. Evidence of trace quantities of controlled substances that were found in defendant's car during the same search in which the methadone was found was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), even though it was not admissible as same transaction contextual evidence, because the evidence constituted a recognized link to drug possession and refuted defendant's contention that his possession of the pill bottle containing methadone was merely inadvertent. Lamkin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6484, 2010 WL 3170647 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 12 2010).

1526. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 404(b), the trial court could have reasonably determined that the testimony about appellant's pretrial supervision and having been found competent to stand trial in a separate case was relevant rebuttal testimony that appellant was motivated to commit the underlying offenses to demonstrate that he was not competent to stand trial in the other case. Espinosa v. State, 328 S.W.3d 32, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6341 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 5 2010).

1527. Evidence that appellant was on pretrial supervision in another case in which he was found competent was probative of determining his motive for committing the offenses and thus the evidence was needed by the State to rebut appellant's insanity claim; the trial court protected the jury from deciding the matter on an improper basis, there was no indication that the evidence would confuse the jury, nor did it take an inordinate amount of time to present the evidence, and the decision to admit the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403 was not an abuse of discretion. Espinosa v. State, 328 S.W.3d 32, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6341 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 5 2010).

1528. Court did not err by admitting evidence that he threatened the witness, because this was evidence of a consciousness of guilt and the witness's testimony described threats that were directly connected to the offenses for which defendant was indicted, engaging in organized criminal activity by conspiring to manufacture methamphetamine. Gillmore v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6303, 2010 WL 3049040 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 5 2010).

1529. Court abused its discretion when it allowed the State to introduce evidence that defendant failed to appear for two drug tests, however, the error did not affect defendant's substantial rights, because the evidence was brief and was not emphasized by the State, defendant had a prior criminal record, and there was direct evidence connecting defendant with the syringe that contained a trace amount of methamphetamine. Hood v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6301, 2010 WL 3049030 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 5 2010).

1530. During defendant's trial for possession of child pornography, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting nine photographs recovered from his cell phone depicting naked adult females because the pictures depicting adults in similar poses as those depicted in the pictures of his niece rebutted the defensive theory that he only possessed the pictures of his niece for the purpose of trying to help her. Morris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6282 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 5 2010).

1531. Admission of evidence related to a second victim of an alleged sexual assault involved in two other indictments than those on which appellant was being tried was proper under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as same transaction contextual evidence because the offenses involving both victims, who were kidnapped and assaulted together, were so intermixed as to form a single, indivisible criminal transaction and it would have been impracticable to avoid describing one when narrating the other. Downs v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6241, 2010 WL 3030487 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 4 2010).

1532. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), namely a firearm that was found in defendant's vehicle because, although defendant's first question to the officer was specific as to whether weapons were found on defendant's person, defendant's follow-up question was more general and asked the officer whether weapons were found. The officer's negative response left the jury with the impression that defendant had no weapons, but because a loaded weapon was found in the general vicinity of the driver's side floorboard, it was possible that defendant was either armed during the burglary or was attempting to arm himself when the officers ordered him to exit his own vehicle; therefore, the evidence was relevant and admissible to correct the false impression left by the officer's testimony. Thomas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6207 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 3 2010).

1533. Witness did not answer the question to which appellant objected, and the testimony did not show evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), such that the court overruled appellant's claim of error in this regard. Hawkins v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6090, 2010 WL 3092642 (Tex. App. Eastland July 29 2010).

1534. In a case in which a trial court admitted the testimony of an apartment manager observing that a number of people would come and go from defendant's apartment, it could not be concluded that the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the witness to so testify because that alone was not evidence of a bad act or crime; or, at least such an interpretation would fall within the zone of reasonable disagreement. Mooring v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5879, 2010 WL 2891762 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 23 2010).

1535. Defendant failed to meet his burden to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the admission of extraneous offenses because the court could not conclude that the trial court would have erred by overruling such an objection, and therefore defendant failed to show a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's error, the result of the trial would have been different. It was within the trial court's discretion to conclude that counsel's cross-examination of the victim called into question a material detail of defendant and, as a result, put defendant's identity at issue; in addition, the record showed that the extraneous offense was sufficiently similar to the instant offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because both were acts of indecency towards a child, were committed on the morning of October 6, 2008, were committed between the hours of 7 a.m. and 8 a.m., were committed in the same kind of car, and occurred within a one block radius. Woods v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5894 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 22 2010).

1536. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting extraneous offense evidence of a robbery for the permissible purpose of proving defendant's identity under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because defendant conceded that the only issue at trial was whether he was the killer depicted on the surveillance tape and because a comparison of the robbery and the instant offense showed a high degree of similarity. Both crimes, which were committed a week apart, occurred in convenience stores when only one person was working, defendant and his accomplice pretended to purchase beer, the clerks were attacked with the same gun, and that gun and defendant's shoes had the victim's DNA on them. Dodson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5859, 2010 WL 2889693 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 22 2010).

1537. Trial court did not err by admitting into evidence testimony about extraneous acts described by a child witness under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because one of the defenses was that the victim had erred in identifying defendant, and the child witness's reliability in being able to identify defendant five years after he had allegedly committed the previous acts was for the jury to decide; if the jury chose to believe that defendant committed the previous bad acts, those acts could assist it in determining whether the victim had made a mistake in identifying defendant in the charged offense. Gillespie v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5701, 2010 WL 2839481 (Tex. App. Dallas July 21 2010).

1539. Defendant had not preserved for appellate review his complaint concerning the timeliness of the State's notice of its intent to introduce evidence of extraneous offenses during trial where defendant objected to the reasonableness of the State's notice, but he did not request that the trial court grant him a continuance. In any event, it could not be said that the trial court abused its discretion when it overruled defendant's objection to the reasonableness of the State's notice under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 3 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the trial court could have determined that the State's notice was adequate and reasonable under the circumstances of the case. Greer v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5632, 2010 WL 2813404 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2010).

1540. In a case in which defendant was convicted of felony possession of a controlled substance by fraud under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.129(a)(5), (d), the trial court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence where, to the extent that there were differences between the instant offense and the extraneous offense, the offenses were sufficiently similar to be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) for purposes of proving defendant's identity because: (1) the two offenses were committed within six weeks of each other; (2) in each instance, defendant presented a fraudulent prescription for 120 pills of dihydrocodeinone (an amount far in excess of normal prescription amounts); (3) the prescription slip had been created using an incorrect typeface and physician signature (as opposed to theft of an actual physician's prescription pad); (4) neither named physician had a patient by the name of the person listed on the prescription to receive the dihydrocodeinone; and (5) an employee from each pharmacy noticed defendant's distinctive tattoo and identified him from a photo line-up. Greer v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5632, 2010 WL 2813404 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2010).

1541. Strength of the State's need for the evidence supported the trial court's decision to admit the extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403; although the State's evidence of identity was strong, appellant challenged the probative value of much of the evidence, and the extraneous offense evidence was not unfairly prejudicial. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5084, 2010 WL 2650008 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 6 2010).

1542. For purposes of a Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis, the charged and extraneous offenses were identical in a number of respects and thus highly probative on the issue of identity; although appellant argued that identity was not seriously contested at trial, defense counsel raised the issue at opening statements, during trial, and in closing arguments. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5084, 2010 WL 2650008 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 6 2010).

1543. Second and third factors of a Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis weighed in favor of the trial court's decision to admit extraneous offense evidence; the trial court gave a limiting instruction and the State did not spend an unduly lengthy amount of time to develop the evidence. Fletcher v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5084, 2010 WL 2650008 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 6 2010).

1544. During defendant's trial for murdering his wife, the court did not err in admitting an exhibit containing his voluntary statement to the police for the purpose of establishing the nature of his relationship with his wife prior to her death because the State was entitled to present evidence to rebut defendant's identity theory by demonstrating that he had a history of ongoing violent conduct toward his wife; the evidence of domestic abuse contained in the exhibit did not run afoul of the limitations imposed by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Allen v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4925 (Tex. App. El Paso June 30 2010).

1545. Evidence of an extraneous robbery was offer to show identity, and for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), (1) given the similar distinctive characteristics shared by both robberies, a witness's identification of appellant as the robber in the extraneous offense case provided compelling evidence of his identity as the robber of the instant robbery, (2) the court did not see how the evidence of the extraneous robbery had the potential to impress the jury irrationally, plus the jury's consideration was properly limited, and (3) the State needed the evidence because the reliability of the direct evidence could be undermined; despite the inordinate time involved in proving the extraneous robbery, the court believed that the probative value of the evidence of that robbery was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4999 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2010).

1546. Twenty-seven percent of the State's direct examination was devoted to proof of an extraneous offense; the evidence was needed and inherently probative, but the expenditure of so much time proving the extraneous offense risked diverting the jury's attention from the charged offense. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4999 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2010).

1547. Because the challenged testimony did not establish prior criminal conduct by appellant, it was not improper extraneous offense evidence. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4999 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2010).

1548. Court held there was no error in the admission of extraneous evidence and the prosecutor was allowed to refer to evidence and made deductions therefrom; the prosecutor's argument was not so egregious as to have denied appellant a fair trial, and in the absence of any objection, no error was preserved. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4999 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2010).

1549. In a prosecution of defendant for engaging in organized criminal activity, any error by the trial court in admitting evidence of defendant's prior convictions was cured when defendant took the stand and testified as to his knowledge and intent. Regardless of what evidence preceded it, defendant's testimony put his knowledge, intent, and plans directly at issue. Leblue v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4822, 2010 WL 2540490 (Tex. App. Austin June 24 2010).

1550. Court abused its discretion in overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objections, because the court impermissibly allowed the State to interject extremely prejudicial evidence of multiple other sexual offenses allegedly committed by defendant (and others), when the evidence of extraneous acts admitted did not show a plan to sexually assault the two alleged victims, but rather it was evidence of repeated occurrences of the same bad act, compounded by numerous additional bad acts. Pittman v. State, 321 S.W.3d 565, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4504 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

1551. In defendant's aggravated assault trial for shooting his ex-girlfriend, the victim's sister and best friend were properly permitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to testify that defendant threatened to shoot them because the evidence constituted same transaction contextual evidence, as defendant's actions formed an indivisible criminal transaction that began with threatening e-mails and culminated with the shooting. In addition, the testimony tended to make the State's theory of the case more probably and helped to rebut defendant's defensive theory. Brown v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4445 (Tex. App. Dallas June 14 2010).

1552. Defendant's conviction for indecency with a child by contact was proper because he presented nothing for review regarding the testimony he sought to elicit on cross-examination and because he failed to establish that any prior allegations of abuse were both false and similar in nature to the allegations at issue in the current case. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding such evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Sosa v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4428, 2010 WL 2330304 (Tex. App. Austin June 10 2010).

1553. Denial of writ of habeas corpus was proper, because the prosecutor did not intend to goad the petitioner into moving for a mistrial by calling the petitioner a bully during the prosecutor's opening statement; the prosecutor's comment was arguably not clearly erroneous since his reference to the petitioner's reputation did not necessarily contravene the motion in limine or the trial court's instructions regarding extraneous offenses and other bad acts, none of which mentioned or referred to reputation or character trait evidence. Ex Parte Cedillo, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3939, 2010 WL 2136607 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 27 2010).

1554. Notice requirements of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) did not apply to the evidence of defendant's trips to truancy court, because the State did not question defendant on this matter during its case in chief on punishment, but rather during its cross-examination of defendant. Torres v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3904, 2010 WL 2044900 (Tex. App. Dallas May 25 2010).

1555. Even if defendant had objected to a witness's testimony at trial, the trial court would not have abused its discretion in allowing the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), given that evidence that defendant had delivered drugs to another person about two weeks before his arrest was relevant to show that, on the date of his arrest, he possessed the methamphetamine with the intent to deliver. Gately v. State, 321 S.W.3d 72, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3785 (Tex. App. Eastland May 20 2010).

1556. Evidence of prior convictions was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in defendant's trial for evading arrest or detention using a motor vehicle because that evidence was relevant to the element of identity, which defendant put squarely at issue by urging the defensive theory that another person had been driving the car during the pursuit. Thus, the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence with a limiting instruction that the jury was to consider the evidence only for the purpose of showing defendant's motive, as a repeat offender who would be subject to a long prison sentence, to fabricate a story that another person had been driving. Guerra v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3845, 2010 WL 2010929 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 20 2010).

1557. Although defendant, who was convicted of the offense of bodily injury to his wife, argued that the trial court erred in denying his motion for mistrial when a witness referred to an extraneous offense, the testimony was not so prejudicial and of such character to suggest the impossibility of withdrawing the impression produced on the minds of the jurors. Jauregui v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3856, 2010 WL 1997771 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 19 2010).

1558. Trial court's decision to admit a videotape under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) fell within the zone of reasonable disagreement, given that (1) the charge contained a limiting instruction of how the evidence of another wrong was to be considered, and (2) the videotape, which showed defendant struggling with police, was probative of the issue of whether defendant intentionally kicked an officer or did so by accident; the actions depicted on the videotape did not warrant the conclusion that the probative value was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the videotape into evidence on substantive grounds. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1559. Defendant argued that he did not receive proper notice regarding a witness's extraneous-offense testimony, but the notice requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) applied only to evidence presented during the State's case-in-chief, not to rebuttal evidence. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1560. Defendant argued that a description, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), did not properly indicate that the assault was of a public servant, but the State's next entry on the notice had the same date and a similar cause number and contained an offense description of resisting arrest and search. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1561. Some of the prior acts depicted in a videotape were discussed without objection during certain testimony; as a general rule, overruling an objection to evidence would not result in reversal when other such evidence was received without objection, either before or after the complained-of ruling. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1562. While the State argued that a videotape constituted same-transaction evidence, the court disagreed because the events underlying the charged offense could be easily understood without reference to the videotape. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1563. Given that (1) the prosecutor called defense counsel to inform him of the existence of a videotape as soon as the prosecutor learned of it, and he narrated a portion of the events to counsel, and (2) a copy of the videotape was made available on April 9th, and counsel received the video on April 13th, the day before trial, the trial court did not err in finding that the prosecution gave counsel reasonable notice of the evidence. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1564. Even if defendant had shown that the trial court abused its discretion in either admitting the videotape or in finding that notice was reasonable under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), defendant failed to show what harm resulted under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the other evidence provided reasonable assurance that even the erroneous admission of the videotape would have had only a slight effect, if any, on the jury, and defendant did not show how the lack of reasonable notice prejudiced the defense in any way. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1565. Although defendant claimed that the admission of a videotape violated his rights under U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1 and Tex. Const. art. I, § 19, the trial court did not err in admitting the videotape and even the erroneous admission of extraneous-offense evidence did not constitute constitutional error. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1566. For purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.01(a)(7), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a detective's testimony as rebuttal evidence, given that defendant's sister's testimony regarding defendant's physical disabilities could conceivably support the defensive theory in an assault trial that defendant kicked the officer unintentionally or by accident; the admission of the detective's testimony on rebuttal to show intent or absence of mistake for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) fell within the zone of reasonable disagreement, and the court could not find that the effect of the detective's testimony was substantially more prejudicial than probative under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1567. Defendant did not show how the testimony of a detective, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.01 and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), affected his substantial rights, as the other evidence offered by the State provided reasonable assurance that even erroneous admission of the testimony would have had only a slight effect, if any, on the jury. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3619, 2010 WL 1930106 (Tex. App. Austin May 13 2010).

1568. Court did not err in allowing two witnesses for the State to testify about defendant's prior bad acts, because there was no evidence that the officer's reference to defendant being a registered sex offender was calculated to inflame the minds of the jury, and the testimony of defendant's wife that she would not let her daughter around someone who was capable of committing sexual assault opened the door to impeach her testimony with her knowledge that defendant was a registered sex offender. Brownlee v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3679 (Tex. App. Eastland May 13 2010).

1569. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, his daughter, the testimony by a witness that she was also sexually assaulted by defendant was not offered purely for character conformity purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), but was offered to rebut the defense theory that the victim was untruthful and fabricated her allegations. Hence, the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony. Saunders v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3358, 2010 WL 1796232 (Tex. App. El Paso May 5 2010).

1570. For purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.14, the trial court's extraneous offense instruction accurately stated the applicable law, and the second paragraph of the instruction simply contained additional instructions to the jury concerning the purposes for which it could consider particular extraneous offenses; the trial court did not err by denying the re-worded instruction defendant requested. Graves v. State, 310 S.W.3d 924, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3388 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 5 2010).

1571. Before jurors can consider any of a defendant's extraneous offenses, they must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the extraneous offenses. Graves v. State, 310 S.W.3d 924, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3388 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 5 2010).

1572. Because the incident the store was not another robbery, the photographs could not have been shown to the jury to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and the trial court did not err in finding that Rule 404(b) did not preclude inclusion of the photographs taken during the store accident and arrest in defendant's aggravated robbery trial. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3387, 2010 WL 1780138 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 5 2010).

1573. Court did not need to address defendant's unpreserved Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) contention. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3387, 2010 WL 1780138 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 5 2010).

1574. State did not allege, and there was no testimony, that it was defendant's vehicle that was used in a previous robbery or that defendant had committed it; thus, the testimony, which did not refer to any prior bad act, was not barred by Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it was not being used to show action in conformity therewith in defendant's aggravated robbery trial. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3387, 2010 WL 1780138 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 5 2010).

1576. Defendant did not object to the reference to any extraneous offenses until after a videotape had played in its entirety, and this was not timely for preservation purposes, such that the court overruled the issue. Reagan v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3158, 2010 WL 1712485 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 28 2010).

1577. Defendant did not present any authority related to her claim as to why an act did not constitute a bad act or why the State's notice was inadequate; the sole reference was a regurgitation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), which was insufficient, and thus under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h), the issue was inadequately briefed, and therefore waived. Latimer v. State, 319 S.W.3d 128, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3149 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 28 2010).

1578. Defendant's intent, and the absence of mistake or accident, was a fact of consequence in this case alleging a violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 62.055(a), and evidence of defendant's employment and failure to report his employment status was relevant because it tended to establish an elemental fact and rebut a defensive theory; the fact that defendant did not inform the police department of his employment was some evidence establishing his intent to violate the registration requirements, and it was sufficient that the evidence provided a small nudge toward proving or disproving a fact of consequence, and the trial court did not err in admitting this evidence. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2899, 2010 WL 1611006 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 22 2010).

1579. Defendant's objections under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and 403 were untimely because they were made after a witness had already testified several times regarding the alleged sexual assault, and error was not preserved under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A). Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2899, 2010 WL 1611006 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 22 2010).

1580. Court agreed there were differences between the shooting in this case and the attempted shooting of another person, but the degree of similarity required to rebut a defensive issue was not as great as when the evidence was offered under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to prove identity; what was similar was that defendant acted intentionally to shoot another person, and in light of defendant's accident defense, the trial court's decision to allow the extraneous offense evidence to rebut his theory was not an abuse of discretion. King v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2811, 2010 WL 1510204 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 16 2010).

1581. It is not enough that the evidence is relevant; pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 403, the probative value of the evidence must not be substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading the jury, or by considerations of delay or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. King v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2811, 2010 WL 1510204 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 16 2010).

1582. Jury could have found from the evidence that defendant previously tried to shoot another person and was a violent person, which was the inference forbidden for this kind of evidence, but a significant amount of time was not required to develop the evidence, and the State had need for this evidence to establish a fact of consequence, which was defendant's intent, and the evidence supported the trial court's ruling to admit the extraneous evidence. King v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2811, 2010 WL 1510204 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 16 2010).

1583. Reasonable minds could have differed as to the admission of evidence because of a tenuous connection between the incidents and because of the chance that the jury would look unfavorably on defendant, who had previously tried to shoot another individual, and these kinds of rulings are subject to harmless error analysis; given that the jury found insufficient evidence that defendant acted intentionally, the jury did not misuse the evidence or make the forbidden inference that he intended to shoot the victim, and any residual bias the jury might have against defendant because of certain evidence would not necessarily intrude on the jury's evaluation of the evidence. King v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2811, 2010 WL 1510204 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 16 2010).

1584. During defendant's trial for theft over $ 100,000 but less than $ 200,000, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting the testimony of other home repair customers of defendant; the evidence was admissible to show defendant's intent. The evidence from the other customers showed that defendant took money for work that defendant never intended to complete. Lopez v. State, 316 S.W.3d 669, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2633 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 15 2010).

1585. Defendant did not preserve his complaint for review, given that (1) a motion in limine did not preserve error, (2) defendant received no adverse ruling from the trial court as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1), and (3) to the extent defendant complained about the restricted testimony the trial judge allowed, defendant did not object, and thus nothing was presented for review; however, even if error were preserved, no extraneous offense evidence was admitted before the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the complained-of evidence. Downey v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2722 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 6 2010).

1586. Admission of the evidence showing that defendant's son's siblings were also victims of medical child abuse by defendant was permissible to provide context to the offenses of injury to a child, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b); the complained-of evidence showed that defendant's conduct toward her son was not isolated behavior, but rather was part of an overall pattern of conduct of medical abuse involving all three of her children, and because it was admissible as same transaction contextual evidence, Rule 404(b) did not require the exclusion of the evidence. Williamson v. State, 356 S.W.3d 1, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3432 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 6 2010).

1587. Evidence indicating that defendant's son's siblings had also been subject to medical child abuse was relevant to understanding the magnitude of the motivational force, which the average person would have difficulty comprehending; the medical record and testimonial evidence showing that the siblings were also victims of medical child abuse was relevant to prove motive and the evidence was admissible pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in defendant's injury to a child trial. Williamson v. State, 356 S.W.3d 1, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3432 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 6 2010).

1588. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the extraneous offense testimony that defendant sexually molested the witness as a child, because the extraneous offense was clearly similar to the charged offense of aggravated sexual assault of a child, both children were tenants of defendant, defendant baby-sat both children and he assumed a familiar type of relationship with both children to the extent he was considered a putative grandparent, and the sexual assaults in each instance occurred over extended periods of time and both children were young in age. Rotz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2050, 2010 WL 1076270 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 24 2010).

1589. Defendant had made a relevancy objection at trial, but this did not preserve error concerning a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b)claim, and thus he could not argue on appeal that the evidence constituted inadmissible character evidence, which he did not assert in the trial court. Gilmore v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1944 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 18 2010).

1590. During defendant's murder trial, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting a transcript of defendant's conversation with a codefendant because it was highly probative to establish a motive and identity for participating in the murder. Reta v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1482, 2010 WL 724395 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2010).

1591. Evidence of extraneous offenses against the victim, defendant's adopted daughter, was highly probative because it demonstrated the history and progression of the relationship between the victim and defendant and provided insight into their states of mind, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, plus the evidence was necessary to help the jury understand why the victim delayed in disclosing the offenses and the State needed the evidence; the trial court could have found that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Saenz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1519 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2010).

1592. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to the victim's testimony about all the times he had sexually assaulted her over a two-year period because defendant did not object that the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect; defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection was not sufficient to preserve review under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Mayfield v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1387 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 26 2010).

1593. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the evidence of the prior theft of a truck to show defendant's knowledge or intent for the instant theft of a truck, because both the thefts involved cargo of food, and the jury could infer from defendant's participation in the prior theft and disposal of its cargo that defendant knew the current truck was stolen and that defendant intended to deprive the owner of the property. Hart v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1630, 2010 WL 851405 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 26 2010).

1594. In order to refute defendant's self-defense claim in his murder trial, based on the 2004 murder of his brother, it was relevant for the State to show that on another occasion, defendant used a knife to cut a man, without provocation or threat; thus, that 2006 offense was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to rebut the self-defense theory. Oakes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1349, 2010 WL 668541 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 25 2010).

1595. Court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the evidence over the Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection, because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the probative value of co-defendant's statement on the video recording was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice; the recordings contained a statement by co-defendant that he and the victim bought Oxycontin from defendant before the victim learned of her pregnancy, and defendant and co-defendant's case was their claimed concern for the victim's unborn child. Scroggs v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1248 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 23 2010), opinion withdrawn, substituted opinion at No. 07-07-453-CR, No. 07-07-454-CR, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3769 (Tex. App -- Amarillo May 19, 2010, pet. ref'd).

1596. Ex-wife's testimony that defendant had touched her during their marriage in ways or under circumstances that she found objectionable had little if any tendency to suggest, beyond mere character conformity, that defendant had deliberately penetrated his minor daughters with his finger. Schoff v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1350, 2010 WL 668904 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 23 2010).

1597. There was nothing showing that a continuance was requested, and given that defendant's complaint related to surprise, his claim that the trial court erred in admitting extraneous offenses for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) was not preserved for review. Storey v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1219, 2010 WL 605712 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 22 2010).

1598. Information contained in the documents involved prior instances of defendant selling drugs and tended to establish his knowledge about the drugs in the house, their purpose, and his role in their sale, and thus the trial court's decision to admit the evidence did not amount to an abuse of discretion; furthermore, the same type of evidence came in through other sources and thus the court could not find that the decision to admit the information was harmful, even if inadmissible. Storey v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1219, 2010 WL 605712 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 22 2010).

1599. Defendant waived his assertion that the trial court erred in relying on allegedly inaccurate extraneous offenses listed in the pre-sentence investigation report, because defendant waived this contention by failing to first object or make the required showing before raising the issue on appeal. Harrison v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1141, 2010 WL 547388 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 18 2010).

1600. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the contested items, because the evidence defendant complained of was much less graphic and disturbing than the pictures for which he was indicted, defendant's knowledge of and preoccupation with pictures of children, both those that might be termed pornographic and otherwise, was critical to proving the State's case of possession of child pornography, and the items did not distract the jury from their main inquiry, nor, did the evidence create a situation where the jury would give undue credence to the evidence; an officer found the two pictures that were the basis of defendant's indictments, along with computer generated pictures of young girls engaged in various sexual acts, magazine advertisements of children with the heads and faces cut out, adult pornography, and a spiral notebook with handwritten sexually explicit stories about young females. Bolles v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1080, 2010 WL 539684 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 16 2010).

1601. Counsel was not ineffective for eliciting evidence from defendant's girlfriend about previous drug transactions and failing to object to such testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because the record supported a conclusion that this was part of counsel's trial strategy to show that the arresting officer and defendant's girlfriend were not credible. Chandler v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 963, 2010 WL 457444 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 11 2010).

1602. Counsel's questioning of a witness was not the only instance in which the door was opened for the State to submit extraneous offense evidence; defendant's testimony belied his contention that counsel's alleged wrongful questioning of the witness was the sole cause for opening the door to the admission of rebuttal testimony, and the court could not say that counsel's questioning of the witness was not the result of a strong and reasonable trial strategy, such that defendant did not meet his burden to overcome the presumption that counsel provided professional and reasonable assistance. Robertson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 969, 2010 WL 466902 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 11 2010).

1603. Witnesses were the victims of the extraneous offense and thus their testimony about the impact that the offense had on them was not victim impact testimony. Thompson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 994 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 11, 2010).

1604. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence of a prior robbery because the identity of the robber was at issue; defendant persistently attacked the victim's certainty of identification and offered an alibi for his presence at the time the robbery took place. Additionally, both the robber in the instant case and the prior case had features and dress in common, both tried to hide their faces, both were brandishing a pistol, and both were seen leaving and departing in a blue vehicle. Lively v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 863 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 5 2010).

1605. Extraneous evidence linked defendant to a car chase and thus sufficient evidence existed for the jury to find that defendant committed the extraneous offenses, and the trial court did not err in admitting this evidence as relevant to punishment, for purposes of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1). Frederickson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 830, 2010 WL 395183 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 4 2010).

1606. Evidence of extraneous offenses admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 403 given that (1) sufficient evidence existed for the jury to find that he committed the offenses, (2) defendant sought probation, but evidence of the extraneous offenses showed that he was not a good probation candidate, (3) the evidence did not appeal to improper emotion or create confusion, and (4) the evidence was not cumulative. Frederickson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 830, 2010 WL 395183 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 4 2010).

1607. Court properly excluded character evidence because defendant testified that the victim told him "he's been in a lot of fights and that he's been in trouble for fighting." That general statement was not sufficient to establish that defendant was aware that the victim had committed an assault for which he was placed on deferred adjudication community supervision. Evans v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 810, 2010 WL 376940 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 3 2010).

1608. Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not violated by evidence that defendant was arrested on a Kansas warrant because the jury was not told what charges defendant faced but only that the warrant issued after defendant disobeyed instructions to remain. It was reasonable to conclude that the warrant was contextual evidence; it was offered during a chronological description of the Kansas law enforcement officials' actions and was mentioned as the basis for defendant's subsequent arrest. Ward v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 590, 2010 WL 337139 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 29 2010).

1609. In a drug case, evidence of defendant's prior arrest was inadmissible because any relevance of evidence showing an arrest eight years prior to trial for transporting methamphetamine, as opposed to evidence that defendant had transported methamphetamine or been convicted of that offense, was relatively slight with respect to showing defendant's knowledge that there was marihuana in the truck he was driving; on the other hand a showing that defendant had previously been arrested for transporting methamphetamine was highly prejudicial. Rascon v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 593, 2010 WL 337044 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 29 2010).

1610. In defendant's drug case, the court did not err by admitting evidence of an extraneous drug offense because the officer testified that he purchased methamphetamine from defendant, which made the intent to deliver much more probable, and the circumstances of the offense were just a simple transaction, which involved no violence or any potential inflaming factors. The testimony of was not a time consuming part of the trial, and while intent might have been proven by circumstantial evidence, the evidence was needed to rebut the defensive theories brought out during cross-examination of the witnesses. Padilla v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 674, 2010 WL 337673 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 29 2010).

1611. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted other acts evidence that defendant removed a windowscreen on the witness's enclosed patio, squatted in the dark wearing only boxer-shorts, and told her he wanted to get inside her apartment and needed a place to hide because the evidence proved that defendant was in the vicinity of the victim's apartment and was looking for a place to hide near the time of the murder. Additionally, the testimony was not particularly emotional or otherwise likely to inflame the jury, and the State did not have other evidence to show defendant's behavior and presence near the time of the murder. Gregory v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 618, 2010 WL 323884 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 28 2010).

1612. In a driving while intoxicated case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object or request a limiting instruction with regard to a witness's testimony about defendant's bribery of a witness because evidence of the alleged bribe was admissible to impeach the witness's testimony and to indicate defendant's consciousness of guilt. The record reflected that counsel objected to the testimony, and defendant did not show how any limiting instruction would have been consistent with the defensive issues raised at trial. White v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 406, 2010 WL 196938 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 21 2010).

1613. Any error in the admission of prior acts testimony was harmless because the complainant testified to years of sexual abuse at the hands of defendant, her grandfather, and a detective testified that during his interview with the complainant, the complainant told him about having sexual intercourse with her grandfather. In light of the more detailed, first-hand testimony of the complainant, the mother's testimony regarding defendant's behavior towards her did not influence the jury or had but a slight effect. Barrera v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 401, 2010 WL 188312 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 21 2010).

1614. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of his eleven-year-old step-grandson in admitting pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) the testimony of defendant's nephew (one of the State's rebuttal witnesses) that defendant had sexually assaulted him where defendant's defense was that his step-grandson and his granddaughter were fabricating their accusations because defendant had testified in his own behalf and after having been fully admonished as to the consequences, and he denied sexually assaulting not only the victim but also his granddaughter. Moreover, there was no merit in defendant's argument that any remoteness of the extraneous offense automatically made the testimony irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Espinoza v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 559, 2010 WL 227680 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 21 2010).

1615. In defendant's indecency trial, and in relation to his nephew's testimony that defendant sexually assaulted him, the defense was that the victim in the current case and the nephew fabricated their accusations, such that the trial court's ruling to allow the nephew's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not outside the zone of reasonableness; the court also disagreed with defendant's argument that any remoteness of the extraneous offense automatically made the testimony irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. Espinoza v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 523, 2010 WL 227661 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 21 2010).

1616. Testimony was nonresponsive to the question asked, was vague, and did not refer to any particular offense, plus the testimony was not emphasized or later referred to; although the testimony informed the jury that defendant was on probation, the response was not calculated to inflame the jury and the court presumed that the jury followed the trial court's instruction to disregard the testimony, and given the evidence, the reference to defendant's status as a probationer likely had little or no effect on the jury's conviction. Wingard v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9880

(Tex. App. Tyler Dec. 31 2009).

1617. Testimony about defendant's failure to cooperate with a deputy sheriff and attempt to flee was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as same transaction contextual evidence in a theft case because it tended to establish intent; moreover, its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Matthews v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9816, 2009 WL 5155688 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 30 2009).

1618. In defendant's sexual assault case, the court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence because the disputed testimony was relevant for several reasons; the disputed evidence was relevant because DNA evidence left by the anal sexual assault connected defendant to the charged offense, and the evidence at trial showed that the same individual committed all of the sexual offenses. The complainant's testimony was relevant as same transaction contextual evidence to show the events in question were closely interwoven and to aid the jury in understanding the context in which those events transpired. Walker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9780, 2009 WL 5103274 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 29 2009).

1619. Counsel was ineffective because counsel's conduct in introducing and opening the door to a prior sexual assault and other "bad acts" evidence, along with his failure to object or request a limiting instruction, showed his lack of investigation of the relevant law and facts in advance of trial. Such conduct led to the admission of evidence that undermined defendant's credibility, which was dependent on the strength of his own credibility as compared to that of the complainant. Garcia v. State, 308 S.W.3d 62, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9692 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 23 2009).

1620. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court did not err in admitting evidence that the child was in counseling since the alleged sexual assaults and that defendant's children were removed because evidence regarding the child's need for counseling was probative circumstantial evidence that increased the likelihood that she was sexually abused by defendant, and evidence that it was necessary to remove the children was probative circumstantial evidence that tended to show that the state believed something was occurring that warranted removal. Herrera v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9690, 2009 WL 4981327 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 23 2009).

1621. In defendant's aggravated kidnapping case, the court did not err by admitting extraneous offense involving the same victim because the intent to terrorize, harm, or abuse the victim must have been present prior to or at the particular time; thus, evidence of extraneous misconduct prior to the abduction was relevant apart from showing character conformity because it made more probable the elemental fact of defendant's intent at the time of the abduction. Additionally, only a small percentage of the time expended in the four-day jury trial was devoted to mention of the extraneous offenses. Crews v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9677, 2009 WL 4907423 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 22 2009).

1622. Defendant failed to show that the trial court erred in ruling that the probative value of evidence of the third-party's fingerprint was not prejudicial and outweighed any prejudicial effect, because the investigator testified that the third-party's name was developed in the case as a witness and that defendant and the third-party were friends, the jury did not hear any evidence of any extraneous-offense conduct, and defendant had not pointed to any place in the record showing that the evidence of extraneous-offense conduct was presented to the jury. McKnight v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9532, 2009 WL 4840201 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 17 2009).

1623. Defendant did not object to certain extraneous evidence by the victim and related evidence was admitted without objection as to other witnesses, plus the jury was given a limiting instruction, such that any error that might have occurred was harmless. Dempsey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9537, 2009 WL 4840158 (Tex. App.

Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 17 2009).

1625. Pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), defendant waived his complaint about the admission of a prior fight because he failed to continuously object to the evidence and he allowed the same evidence to come in through another witness without objection, which cured the error, plus the trial court instructed the jury about the limited purpose of the evidence, such that any error that might have occurred was harmless. Dempsey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9537, 2009 WL 4840158 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 17 2009).

1626. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), evidence of defendant's gang affiliation had some tendency to show that defendant had a motive to commit the crime; the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing evidence of defendant's gang affiliation to be introduced to support the State's motive. Dempsey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9537, 2009 WL 4840158 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 17 2009).

1627. In defendant's capital murder case, the court did not err by admitting evidence of extraneous murders because defendant opened the door by deliberately choosing to question the witness about the extraneous murders. The State was presenting the evidence to rebut defendant's claim of self-defense. Williams v. State, 301 S.W.3d 675, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1751 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1628. In an indecency with a child case, the court erred by admitting extraneous offense evidence due to the lack of similarity between the extraneous offenses and the charged offenses, the duration in time of twenty years between the offenses, and the lack of evidence concerning a continuing course of conduct by defendant. The extraneous acts did not take place in defendant's home and defendant did not ask the witness to touch himself or defendant. Crocker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9432, 2009 WL 4725299 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 11 2009).

1629. In a sexual assault case, a court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence that defendant had threatened a witness not to testify because defendant threatened to accuse the witness and his wife of sexually abusing defendant's girlfriend's children if the witness testified against him. The testimony was relevant to show defendant's consciousness of guilt. Ramsey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9449, 2009 WL 4755175 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 10 2009).

1630. In defendant's indecency with a child case, the court properly allowed testimony of an officer that he had seen defendant watching children on a playground with binoculars because much of the State's case was built around the theory of "grooming" and that defendant spent significant time with the victim; because the bulk of the defensive case consisted of witnesses who said defendant had provided safe child care, that evidence was relevant to rebutting the defensive theory. Additionally, the time spent proving the extraneous act was negligible. Orange v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8934, 2009 WL 3851068 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 19 2009).

1631. Defense opened the door to extraneous offense evidence from another girl, who said defendant sexually assaulted her, when the defense left a false impression that defendant would never commit aggravated sexual assault of a child; while prejudicial, the probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, the girl's testimony was brief and not cumulative, and it could be argued that it had the potential to assist defendant, given that the girl was shaky while testifying, but the victim was calm and composed, which raised the argument that maybe not the same thing happened to the victim. Reyes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8842, 2009

WL 3856198 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 18 2009).

1632. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted evidence from a witness that defendant liked young girls and oral sex because defendant was accused of fondling the breast of his victim and of performing oral sex on the victim who was ten years old, the evidence pertained to defendant's thoughts and did not implicate any conduct on his part, defendant's statements were the primary evidence of his intent and state of mind, and, the State had a significant need for the evidence. Jones v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8923, 2009 WL 3858016 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 18 2009).

1633. Balancing the factors for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting extraneous offense evidence, given that (1) intent of defendant was a contested fact and evidence regarding intent was thus necessary, (2) evidence of the extraneous offense was highly probative as to intent based on timing, (3) the extraneous offense and the current offense were similar, (4) the evidence was not inflammatory or repetitive, and (5) the jury was instructed that the extraneous offense could be considered only in determining intent. Talley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8830 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 17 2009).

1634. Defendant's contention regarding extraneous offenses on appeal did not comport with her trial objections, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a); in any event, witness testimony showed that defendant selected store items and concealed them in a purse, then met a friend, who concealed the purse under a jacket and left the store, such that the evidence was sufficient to show that defendant was a party to the offense of theft at the store. Talley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8830 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 17 2009).

1635. Defense counsel's performance was not deficient, because defendant failed to rebut the presumption that defense counsel's decision to not object to the extraneous offense and prior bad acts evidence was the product of sound trial strategy, because counsel sought to show that the relationship between defendant and the complainant was volatile and sexual, and that they often fought and reconciled by having sex. Harrison v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8776 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 13 2009).

1636. On appeal, defendant argued that testimony was inadmissible under extraneous evidence grounds, but defendant's hearsay objection did not preserve the issue for appellate review on a different theory. Norman v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8796, 2009 WL 3805830 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 12 2009).

1637. Trial court's prompt instruction to the jury to disregard a statement cured the reference to defendant's prior incarceration; this was not an extreme case where the statement was clearly calculated to inflame the jury. Cherry v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8787, 2009 WL 3805850 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 12 2009).

1638. In defendant's murder case, the court did not err by allowing the State to present the testimony of two witnesses in rebuttal regarding other sexual offenses alleged to have been committed by defendant because the best evidence that the State had to connect defendant to the murder was the fact that defendant had been with the victim until shortly before the murder, the statements of the two seasoned felons, whose credibility had been strongly attacked, and DNA evidence in the vehicle which was not particularly strong. Therefore, the State had a need for the evidence. Additionally, the presentation of the testimony did not take such a great amount of time as to confuse or distract the jury from the main issue of the case. Asberry v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8512 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 4 2009).

1639. Officer's reference to an extraneous offense was cured by a sustained objection and an instruction to disregard, the statement was not calculated to inflame the jury, and the court had to assume that the jury properly heeded the trial court's instructions, as defendant did not prove otherwise, such that the trial court properly denied defendant's motion for a mistrial. Caldwell v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8585, 2009 WL 3646094 (Tex. App.

Waco Nov. 4 2009).

1640. Trial court abused its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's prior burglary arrest pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) where the tendency of the evidence was to show defendant was a bad person or that his character conformed to that of a person from whom criminal conduct might be expected. However, the error did not influence the jury, or had but a slight effect on its verdict of guilt, because the State's presentation of the alleged burglary, although factually detailed, was brief and received only passing mention in closing argument, and because the propensity and potency of the evidence to characterize defendant as a criminal was blunted by the previous, unopposed, admission of evidence of his prior conviction for manslaughter. Tello v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8401, 2009 WL 3518006 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 30 2009).

1641. Trial court erroneously admitted a 1993 judgment convicting defendant of misdemeanor assault where the judgment was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it had no relevance apart from proof of character conformity. Moreover, evidence of the conviction was not available for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the record contained no evidence that the victim of the assault was female, and there was thus no proof that it was a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude. Tello v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8401, 2009 WL 3518006 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 30 2009).

1642. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted excerpts from defendant's civil deposition and witness testimony because the defense was theorizing that the victim fabricated the allegations against defendant, and by offering the excerpts where he admitted to performing sexual acts with the witness the State was attempting to show that defendant's claim of fabrication-for-money defense was less probable. The witness's testimony was brief and the court gave a limiting instruction. Slutz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8326 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 29 2009).

1643. There was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404 when a juvenile witness testified that defendant gave her Advil or Tylenol because the witness did not testify about an act of misconduct or a crime to which defendant was connected. Thus, the statement did not demonstrate that an extraneous offense occurred. Stine v. State, 300 S.W.3d 52, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8121 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 21 2009).

1644. In defendant's drug case, the court properly admitted evidence of defendant's gang affiliation at sentencing because the presentation of the evidence took only a short time and the probative value of the evidence was high. Defendant's prior admission of his affiliation with a prison gang and the reputation of that gang for commission of offenses, both inside prison and in the general community, was a factor that the jury was entitled to consider in determining defendant's propensity for further criminal activity should he be released from incarceration. Meier v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8078, 2009 WL 3335282 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 16 2009).

1645. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence because defendant brought identity into issue, the witnesses were able to specifically testify about defendant's identity, and the poor lighting made it difficult for most of the complainants to specify the exact color of the "dark colored" clothing. The witness's identification of the assailants' clothing and the red bandana was important to the State's case-in-chief. Trevino v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8044, 2009 WL 3321417 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 15 2009).

1646. Because a roommate's testimony helped to affirmatively link defendant to the cocaine found in their apartment and to establish that defendant possessed it with the intent to deliver, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b) to show intent, motive, opportunity, and lack of mistake. Hatcher v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8045, 2009 WL 3326758 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 15 2009).

1647. In defendant's murder case, a witness's testimony that defendant wanted to go kill someone and that he had a gun was not inadmissible evidence of an extraneous offense because defendant's statements and actions made it more probable that he did intend to seriously injure or kill the victim. The fact that he had a gun at the time was prejudicial, but it did not outweigh the probative value of his admission and his action at the time. Walton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8046, 2009 WL 3326759 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 15 2009), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 512, 178 L. Ed. 2d 379, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 8559 (U.S. 2010).

1648. Defendant had been identified as the person who used a knife in an altercation with his stepfather,and his flight when confronted by the police was relevant to the issue of whether or not he committed the crime; the relevancy requirement was satisfied. Nothing suggested that defendant's flight to avoid arrest was related to circumstances other than the charged offense, and the trial court did not err in admitting the evidence of flight. Drake v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8001, 2009 WL 3295580 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 14 2009).

1649. There was no evidence that at the time of the altercation defendant and his brother were defending their mother against a violent act by the stepfather; under the circumstances presented, considering the other evidence of stepfather's violence admitted, the trial court did not err in excluding the specific evidence of the stepfather's violence toward the mother at defendant's trial for murdering the stepfather. Drake v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8001, 2009 WL 3295580 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 14 2009).

1650. In a murder case, evidence of defendant's drug dealing was properly admitted because, according to a witness, defendant and the victim were rival drug dealers, and proof of motive was important to the State's case because the State was unable to produce an eyewitness who actually saw defendant shoot the victim. The time spent attempting to prove that defendant sold illegal drugs was not out of proportion to the time required to present such evidence. Koy Timon Moore v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7847 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

1651. Court assumed without deciding that the trial court erred under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in admitting a witness's testimony that defendant sold the witness drugs the day of defendant's arrest, but in applying a harm analysis under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), the court found no harm; defendant never made the claim that he was surprised by the State's decision to call the witness to testify, defendant did not seek a continuance, and defense counsel was able to cross-examine the witness, such that defendant's substantial rights were not affected by the admission of the evidence. McClenny v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7908, 2009 WL 3246774 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 8 2009).

1652. Where defendant claimed self-defense in his criminal prosecution for murder, the trial court did not err by excluding testimony from five witnesses to show that the complainant had an aggressive character; the evidence was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), because defendant did not offer any explanation as to how the complainant's acts toward others were probative as to the complainant's state of mind during the incident with defendant. Barnes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7931, 2009 WL 3248172 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 8 2009).

1654. When defense counsel accepted the State's assertion that it had provided proper notice under Tex. R. Evid. 404, he relieved the trial court of any obligation to look into the type of notice that was given or to determine whether it was timely, and counsel's acceptance of the State's assertion that it had provided proper notice operated to withdraw his objection; the trial court was no longer required to inquire into notice, the State was not given an chance to further develop the record concerning notice, and the exclusion of evidence based on lack of notice was no longer requested, such that the court could not reverse on this issue. Jackson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7751, 2009 WL 3153271 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 1 2009).

1655. Court did not err by admitting extraneous offense evidence of defendant's assaultive behavior occurring prior to, and after, the sexual assault because the extraneous offense evidence was admissible to show the context in which the criminal act occurred because defendant's assaultive behavior was "blended, or connected" to the sexual assault forming an "indivisible criminal transaction." Moreover, the evidence was helpful to the jury in their determination whether defendant used or exhibited a deadly weapon during the "same criminal episode." Quincy v. State, 304 S.W.3d 489, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7645 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 30 2009).

1656. Defendant did not establish a basis in the trial court for admission of this evidence as an exception to the rules by relating his attorney's past bar grievance history as relevant in a way that might overcome the precepts of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b)-like motive, intent, plan, or pattern; in addition, defendant did not present any evidence that knowing his attorney's history with other clients would have factored into his decision to take a plea, where he made no inquiry into the attorney's history prior to taking the plea, and pointed to no affirmative misrepresentation by the attorney made in connection with the information relevant to the plea. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding such evidence from defendant's motion for a new trial hearing. Starz v. State, 309 S.W.3d 110, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7711 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 30 2009).

1657. Punishment phase extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 because there was evidence that defendant was the only adult with the complainant, the autopsy showed a variety of injuries to the complainant, and a doctor testified that the injuries all occurred within the same twenty-four-hour period. Roberts v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7816, 2009 WL 6338618 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 24 2009).

1658. Where defendant told a confidential informant that she was manufacturing methamphetamine at the site, the officer found methamphetamine, manufacturing precursors, and drug manufacturing paraphernalia in plain sight when they executed a search warrant; at defendant's trial for possession of a controlled substance in violation of Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.115, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence of additional items found in the camper including: a plastic bag containing 2.2 grams of a white powder believed to be methamphetamine, a twelve gauge shotgun, four lithium batteries, five boxes of pseudoephedrine pills, a wooden box containing miscellaneous drug paraphernalia, a syringe with a clear liquid inside, a bottle of muriatic acid, a bottle of iodine, and a gas generator. The items seized during the search of the camper were relevant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), because they were part of an indivisible criminal transaction. Judd v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7400, 2009 WL 3019712 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 23 2009).

1659. Witness's testimony was relevant to rebut the contention that defendant would have stopped if the victim really meant no because the testimony evidenced that, shortly before this incident, defendant did not stop in response to an unambiguous no and the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it found that the witness's testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in defendant's trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11. Villarreal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7305, 2009 WL 2965281 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 17 2009).

1660. In deference to defendant's challenge to the extraneous offense evidence, the court did not include that in its factual sufficiency review of his conviction under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11. Villarreal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7305, 2009 WL 2965281 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 17 2009).

1661. Trial court ruled that testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and when the trial court gave a limiting instruction, defendant did not object; defendant's contention that the trial court failed to correctly instruct the jury had not been preserved. Villarreal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7305, 2009 WL 2965281 (Tex. App.

Eastland Sept. 17 2009).

1662. Decision to admit the extraneous-offense evidence was within the zone of reasonable disagreement, because although the testimony regarding the extraneous sexual assaults had the potential to inflame the jury, the evidence was relevant to rebut defendant's theory of fabrication, the testimony was not particularly graphic, nor lengthy, and the trial court instructed the jury to consider the testimony only for a limited purpose. Abrego v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7288, 2009 WL 2959640 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 16 2009).

1663. Because defendant did not object to the admission of the additional extraneous offenses during the punishment stage of his trial, he waived this issue on appeal. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

1664. Cross examination of a witness sufficiently opened the door to extraneous offense evidence by placing identity in issue, as, in part, counsel implied through questioning that the witness's identification could be faulty and counsel drew attention to the fact that the witness said the most distinctive identifier about the suspect was his voice, but the lineup suspects were not asked to say anything. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

1665. Extraneous offense testimony was similar enough to the charged offense to be considered testimony about a signature crime. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

1666. Given that (1) witness one's testimony was probative on the issue of defendant's identity and was used to support witness two's testimony and was thus highly probative, (2) the need for the extraneous offense testimony was high because all other identification evidence was disputed, (3) the extraneous offense testimony of witness two did not have the tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis, (4) witness one's testimony did not consume so much time that it would have confused the jury, and (5) witness one's testimony was not cumulative and it was unlikely the jury gave the testimony improper weight, such that the probative value of witness one's testimony was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice and the trial court did not err in admitting witness one's testimony. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

1667. For extraneous offense purposes, defendant placed his identity in issue by asserting an alibi. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

1668. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining there were sufficient similarities in the two robberies to find the testimony of a witness relevant to the issue of defendant's identity; the statements made by the suspect in the course of the robberies, the use of a telephone cord to tie up the victim, and the distinct way the suspect asked the witness to open a display case, and then forced him or her into the office were sufficiently unique to constitute a signature crime and the extraneous offense was not admitted for the purpose of proving character conformity, but rather for the permissible purpose of proving the suspect's identity. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

1669. Extraneous offense was highly probative on the issue of identity because of its similarity to the charged offense, the evidence was only introduced after defendant asserted an alibi, thus making the evidence probative to disprove that defense, and all the evidence bearing on identity was disputed, thus elevating the State's need for extraneous offense testimony; given that (1) the testimony was not so graphic or appalling that it would impress the jury in some irrational, but indelible way, (2) the trial court gave a limiting instruction, (3) the extraneous offense testimony was presented after all the evidence of the charged crime was presented and it did not consume an inordinate amount of time, (4) there was nothing about the witness's testimony that would cause jurors to improperly rely on her statements, and (5) her testimony was not repetitive of other evidence already admitted, the danger of unfair prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the extraneous offense evidence and the trial court did not err in admitting it. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

1670. In a case of harassment of a public servant, which arose from defendant's conduct while being arrested, evidence of why the officer had been dispatched was admissible over a Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objection to place the events in context and because the extraneous offenses were intertwined with the officer's initial contact with defendant. Martinez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7207, 2009 WL 2914154 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 11 2009).

1671. State inmate was denied habeas relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254(d) because, inter alia, the State's failure to notify him of its intent to introduce prior bad act evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) at his third trial for murdering his wife did not violate due process, as it failed to raise an issue of federal constitutional dimension. Garcia v. Quarterman, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82214 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 10 2009).

1672. During defendant's criminal trial for multiple counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child by contact, defendant was not entitled to a mistrial based on the State's question to the complainant's mother if she had visited defendant in jail. The trial court sustained defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 404 objection and instructed the jury to disregard the question. Madden v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7084, 2009 WL 2857269 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 3 2009).

1673. In a child sexual assault case involving a victim who was 10 at the time of the offenses and 24 at the time of trial, evidence of extraneous offenses was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404 to rebut defensive theories that defendant lacked opportunity and that the complainant fabricated his allegations. Given the similarities of action, place, and modus operandi, the time differential alone did not render the evidence irrelevant or lacking in probative value. Villa v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6965, 2009 WL 2914255 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 31 2009).

1674. District attorney assured the trial court the inclusion of defendant's references to extraneous involvement with the criminal justice system was unintentional, and the court saw no abuse of discretion in the trial court's apparent acceptance of that explanation. Cordova v. State, 296 S.W.3d 302, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6931 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 31 2009).

1675. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a mistrial; there was nothing especially inflammatory about the references the jury heard to defendant's prior experience with a court-appointed attorney and his record, the statements complained about were of the nature courts had found curable by instructions to disregard, and the curative instructions were given as promptly as possible under the circumstances and their presumed curative effect was not allayed. Cordova v. State, 296 S.W.3d 302, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6931 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 31 2009).

1676. In an aggravated assault case, extraneous conduct of theft of a firearm was properly admitted because the victim testified that defendant had showed him a pistol that defendant had stolen, and it was clear that the evidence was offered to negate defendant's theory that the victim was the first aggressor and establish that defendant intentionally attacked the victim because defendant believed that the victim had "snitched" on him. While the evidence was prejudicial, such prejudice was not unfair. White v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6875, 2009 WL 2914480 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 28 2009).

1677. In defendant's murder case, the court did not err by admitting the evidence showing the commission of arson because the "other purpose" extraneous offense evidence offered by the State regarding the arson arose out of the same transaction as the murder. The evidence of the arson was closely related in time, location, and subject matter to the charged offense of murder. Gallegos v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6707, 2009 WL 2623356 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 26 2009).

1678. In defendant's drug case, the court did not err by allowing the State to introduce evidence regarding defendant's alleged driving while intoxicated stop because testimony regarding the officer's observations of defendant before, during, and after the traffic stop gave the jury information essential to understanding the context and circumstances of defendant's arrest and subsequent charges. The officer described defendant's erratic driving that led to the stop, his physical condition during the stop, and his behavior during the field sobriety tests. Mason v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6705, 2009 WL 2623363 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 26 2009).

1679. Defendant's objection to extraneous offense evidence that four truckloads of stolen car parts were found at his house, along with evidence that he had purchased stolen car parts in the past, was preserved for appellate review because a bench conference conducted outside of the jury's presence provided the trial court the opportunity to consider the necessary factors and rule on the objection. Marban v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6760, 2009 WL 2618343 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

1680. Objection to extraneous offense evidence was not successful because testimony that stolen parts were removed from defendant's residence after his arrest, along with testimony that defendant had purchased stolen parts, was probative evidence of the elements of the offense of engaging in organized criminal activity; the testimony was evidence relevant to the element of combination and the collaboration in carrying on criminal activities, and the probative value of this evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. The evidence tended to prove defendant had the intent to establish, maintain, or participate in a combination or in the profits of a combination, an essential element of the offense of engaging in organized criminal activities. Marban v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6760, 2009 WL 2618343 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

1681. In a child pornography case, habeas relief was denied to an accused on the basis of ineffectiveness of trial counsel relating to a failure to request Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) notice because trial counsel's affidavit stated that he did not make the request since the State provided the information prior to trial; the State's discovery response and trial counsel's affidavit also indicated that the State had an open-file policy which permitted trial counsel to inspect and review the State's files up to the day of trial. Moreover, the accused failed to show that the failure to make Rule 404(b) objections was professionally unreasonable or would have changed the outcome of the case. Ex Parte Yusafi, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6715, 2008 WL 6740798 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 26 2009).

1682. Court properly admitted testimony because the witness's testimony rebutted defendant's theory that he did not intend to commit the alleged offense, and the witness's testimony showed that defendant was involved in a similar crime involving intent to commit a robbery subsequent to kidnapping the victim. Additionally, the evidence was presented in a short and concise manner and did not include unnecessarily graphic details. Dale v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6417, 2009 WL 2525421 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 19 2009).

1683. In defendant's manslaughter case, the court properly admitted evidence about an incident in 2004 when defendant pointed a gun at a motorist and pulled the trigger because he testimony of the victim of the deadly conduct was relevant to rebut the defense of accident and mistake in the shooting of the victim. Immediately prior to the testimony, the trial court instructed the jury that the evidence was being admitted for the limited purpose of whether it rebutted the defensive theory of accident. King v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6447, 2009 WL 2517174

(Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 19 2009).

1684. Court properly admitted evidence that defendant sexually assaulted his step-daughter twenty-five years earlier because both victims were defendant's step-daughters; both were ten when defendant sexually assaulted them; both were similar in appearance; and defendant abused both of them for several years. The State demonstrated that it needed this evidence to rebut defendant's claim of fabrication, and the time needed to develop the evidence amounted to about 116 pages out of the 426 pages of testimony. Newton v. State, 301 S.W.3d 315, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6534 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 19 2009).

1685. Court did not erroneously admit evidence of an undercover drug buy the day before defendant's warrant was executed because the evidence of the undercover buy served to make a fact of consequence--defendant's care, custody, and control of the contraband with intent to distribute--more or less probable than without the evidence. Further, the court instructed the jury that it could consider the evidence of the undercover drug buy only if it believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the offense. Stewart v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6391, 2009 WL 2488504 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 17 2009).

1686. In a burglary trial, reversible error occurred under Tex. R. Evid. 404 when the State introduced evidence that the complainant's girlfriend was suffering from mental retardation and that defendant engaged in sex with her shortly after the alleged burglary. The evidence was not relevant to alibi because, contrary to the State's argument, defendant did not assert a defense of alibi by stating that he did not remember on which Friday night he went to a bar with the complainant and then to the complainant's home. Rodriguez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6335, 2009 WL 5821033 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 13 2009).

1687. In defendant's assault on a public servant case, the court properly admitted evidence of his prior arrests because the extraneous-arrest evidence was probative of both how well a character witness knew defendant and the foundation for her characterization of him, the trial court gave a limiting instruction, the extraneous arrests took up only four pages in the 564-page record, the question of whether defendant was threatening the officers was directly related to his intent, and the State did not have other evidence with which to rebut the witness's characterization of defendant's character. Morales v. State, 293 S.W.3d 901, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6241 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

1688. In defendant's murder case, the court properly excluded evidence that the victim purportedly was always armed with a gun because defendant failed to satisfy his burden of producing evidence demonstrating his shooting of the victim stemmed from a reasonable belief that the victim was attempting to use unlawful deadly force at that exact moment, the two had no prior relationship, and the trial court did permit defendant to establish that the victim's reputation in the community for violence was bad. Welch v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6292, 2009 WL 2461172 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 12 2009).

1689. Detective's testimony was relevant to explain how defendant became a suspect; the testimony did not present evidence of a prior crime or connect defendant to any crime or bad act. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1690. Defendant opened the door to admission of the extraneous offense evidence to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1691. Extraneous offenses were sufficiently similar to the charged offense and, assuming the witnesses have a motive to lie, it was sufficiently different from the current victim's alleged motive; the extraneous offenses were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to rebut defendant's theory of fabrication. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App.

LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1692. Given that the extraneous offense evidence was admissible to rebut defendant's theory of fabrication, the inherent probative value of the evidence was great, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1693. While the offenses were no doubt prejudicial, they were not unfairly so in proportion to their probative value; moreover, the jury received an instruction limiting their consideration of the offenses to the issue of fabrication, and this factor favored admissibility under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1694. Although the State spent some time developing the evidence, it was not excessive and this factor favored admissibility of the extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1695. Defendant argued that the State could have introduced witness testimony or physical evidence to corroborate the victim's story, but the record did not indicate that the State had such other evidence; thus, it needed this evidence to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication and this factor favored admissibility of the extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1696. Because all the factors weighed in favor of admissibility, the extraneous-offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1697. Allowing the State to rebut the defensive theory of fabrication with extraneous-offense evidence did not violate defendant's due process rights. Galvez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6300, 2009 WL 2476600 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 12 2009).

1698. In a child sexual assault case, the court properly allowed the victim's brother to testify regarding extraneous offenses against him because the boys were the same age when defendant allegedly sexually abused them, and the manner and location of the abuse alleged by the brothers were identical. A substantial part of defendant's cross examination of the victim was devoted to the attempt to undermine the victim's credibility. Boyd v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5970, 2009 WL 2370730 (Tex. App. Tyler July 31 2009).

1700. State's supplemental notice coupled with the production of a videotaped statement of the eyewitness gave defendant reasonable notice of the nature and content of the expected testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37. Even if it were error to admit the evidence, defendant did not attempt to establish how his defense strategy might have differed or whether he was unable to prepare his defense in order to show reversible error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2. Anderson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5919, 2009 WL 2341865 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 2009).

1701. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), a witness's testimony was admissible as proper rebuttal evidence to show that defendant had the requisite intent to rob or violate or abuse the victim sexually, which was necessary to establish the offense of aggravated kidnapping; given that the witness's testimony showed that defendant was involved in a similar crime, it was at least subject to reasonable disagreement that the witness's testimony made defendant's defensive theory of lack of intent more or less probable, plus under Tex. R. Evid. 105(a), the trial court admitted the evidence for its noncharacter conformity purpose of determining defendant's intent, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting this evidence. Dale v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5784, 2009 WL 2264230 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 29 2009).

1702. Because defendant claimed he lacked intent to commit the offense of aggravated kidnapping during his opening statement, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting a witness's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) as rebuttal evidence. Dale v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5784, 2009 WL 2264230 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 29 2009).

1703. Under the Tex. R. Evid. 403 balancing test, the probative value of a witness's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given that (1) the testimony was probative to rebut defendant's defensive theory of a lack of intent, which was an issue in the aggravated kidnapping case, (2) the evidence was presented in a short and concise manner, (3) the testimony was preceded by a limiting instruction, plus the jury charge clarified that the evidence was offered only for its noncharacter conformity purpose of determining defendant's intent, and (4) while the witness's testimony injured defendant's case, it did not adversely affect defendant beyond its purpose of tending to prove his intent to commit the offense, and the trial court did not err in admitting the testimony. Dale v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5784, 2009 WL 2264230 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 29 2009).

1704. Trial court did not err in admitting evidence of defendant's extraneous conduct in his trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child; the evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404(b) and under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, as bearing on the state of mind of defendant and the child and as demonstrating the relationship between them. Robinson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5700, 2009 WL 2196085 (Tex. App. Tyler July 24 2009).

1705. Although there were dissimilarities between the two burglaries, the record contained no evidence that the State was intentionally misleading the trail court rather than simply arguing its position that the burglaries were sufficiently similar to amount to signature offenses; even if the court found such evidence, the error was harmless because the court found that the signature element of the two crimes was not in the dissimilarities defendant cited, the other similarities or dissimilarities were merely similarities that would be common to the type of crime itself and, unlike the evidence of the medical scrubs in both cases, did not affect the court's determination as to the admissibility of evidence of the extraneous offense. The court overruled defendant's due process argument in this regard. Perez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5689, 2009 WL 2195417 (Tex. App. Austin July 23 2009).

1706. Defendant was correct that certain similarities between the offense at issue and the extraneous offense were merely similarities common to the type of crime at issue, burglary, but they were significantly similar in that they occurred in close proximity on the same day and in both cases, witnesses observed a man wearing blue scrubs and a hat around the same time the crime was committed, and unknown persons wearing blue scrubs were not often seen wandering residential neighborhoods; given that defendant, who was not a health care worker, was found to be in possession of two pairs of blue scrubs when a search warrant of his residence was executed, admission of the extraneous offense for purposes of identification under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was a proper exercise of discretion by the trial court. Perez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5689, 2009 WL 2195417 (Tex. App. Austin July 23 2009).

1707. Court properly admitted defendant's threat to take the officer's gun and kill him because that was probative evidence of defendant's precise intentions at the time he was assaulting the officer. It offered significant proof of defendant's commission of the charged offense of attempting to take a weapon from a peace officer with the intention of harming the officer. Presley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5613, 2009 WL 2152559 (Tex. App. Dallas July 21 2009).

1708. Trial court could have found that evidence of defendant's drug dealing, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), had some logical relevance aside from character conformity, plus the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given the other evidence admitted at trial, including evidence of defendant's gang membership; assuming it was error to admit the extraneous offense evidence, defendant's substantial rights were not affected under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that the jury was instructed to use the evidence for the limited purpose of determining a relationship between defendant and another and the drug dealing was not mentioned by the State in closing arguments and thus was not emphasized. Mata v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5410, 2009 WL 2045250 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 15 2009).

1709. During defendant's trial for assaulting a corrections officer with a razor blade, the trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) in permitting the State to elicit evidence as to whether razor blades had been found in defendant's mouth because the evidence was used to rebut defendant's evidence that it was impossible to possess a razor blade because of the security measures employed by the prison. Byrd v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4970, 2009 WL 1900412 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 1 2009).

1710. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting extraneous offense evidence in defendant's trial for indecency with a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11(a)(1); defendant's opening statement opened the door to admission of the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to combat the defensive theory of fabrication by the victim, and the probative value of rebutting the allegations of fabrication and accidental touching outweighed the prejudicial impact for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Norwood v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4979, 2009 WL 1941291 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 30 2009).

1711. Court properly allowed the State to put on evidence showing extraneous offenses committed by defendant against the accomplice because it showed why the accomplice went through with the crime and why she did not tell the police the truth; the testimony specifically showed that defendant had threatened her in the past with his fists and a gun. Shy v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4921, 2009 WL 1844328 (Tex. App. Dallas June 29 2009).

1712. It was clear that defendant was not harmed by the admission of the complained-of extraneous evidence; therefore, the court assumed, without deciding or commenting, that the trial court erred by admitting the evidence and proceeded directly to the harm analysis under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Lewis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4889, 2009 WL 1813132 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 25 2009).

1713. Because the court was addressing the harm from the admission of extraneous offense evidence, which was non-constitutional error, Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) applied. Lewis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4889, 2009 WL 1813132 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 25 2009).

1714. Any error in admitting extraneous offense evidence was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that (1) the State presented ample evidence of defendant's guilt of murder, (2) the disputed evidence did not serve to improperly bolster other evidence against defendant, but was proffered to help the factfinder in understanding the circumstances under which defendant obtained a murder weapon, (3) the State spent little time eliciting the disputed testimony and made no reference to it in closing argument, and (4) the trial court gave a limiting instruction regarding extraneous offense testimony, which instruction the jury was presumed to have followed, and this presumption was not rebutted by defendant. Lewis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4889, 2009 WL 1813132 (Tex.

App. Houston 1st Dist. June 25 2009).

1715. Where defendant was convicted of three counts of promotion of child pornography and four counts of possession of child pornography, the trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) by admitting an exhibit showing a list of subfolders and 900 file names from defendant's computer. The evidence relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 for the State to show that defendant organized, stored, and shared the downloaded images; the exhibit was the best and least prejudicial method of rebutting the defense theory that he may have downloaded images of child pornography accidentally or shared them without knowledge of their content. Wenger v. State, 292 S.W.3d 191, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4859 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 25 2009).

1716. Even if the trial court erred by allowing the State to introduce any of defendant's recorded phone conversations under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), any error was harmless because the jury heard ample evidence of defendant's guilt apart from the conversations, the State did not rely upon the conversations during either its opening or closing statements, and the conversations did not constitute a critical part of the State's case. Jimenez v. State, 307 S.W.3d 325, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4701 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 24 2009).

1717. Defendant failed to preserve error on his contention that the State committed prosecutorial misconduct by eliciting testimony suggesting that defendant stole the gun because defendant objected only at the beginning of the witness's testimony but did not object to the remainder. Defendant objected to admission of the testimony on relevancy grounds, but did not assert that introduction of the allegedly irrelevant testimony constituted prosecutorial misconduct warranting a mistrial. Thibodeaux v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4964, 2009 WL 1748747 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 23 2009).

1718. In defendant's aggravated robbery case, the court properly admitted evidence of an extraneous aggravated robbery because the extraneous offense and the instant offense occurred on the same night, within an hour of each other, in the same area, in each offense, two men approached the complainants while each complainant was in his or her car, held the complainants at gunpoint, and shot the complainants. Additionally, the State's need for the evidence was significant because, although one complainant identified defendant as the second perpetrator, the record also showed that the complainant could not see defendant's face because of the bandana. Hackaday v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4501, 2009 WL 1687957 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 18 2009).

1719. In defendant's capital murder case, the court properly admitted evidence of an aggravated robbery because the defensive claims that defendant raised by his statements placed the intent element of his capital murder offense at issue, which entitled the State to rebut defendant's claimed lack of intent with evidence of his unadjudicated extraneous offense of the aggravated robbery. Gomez v. Tex., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4521, 2009 WL 1688233 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 18 2009).

1720. In a driving while intoxicated case, defendant did not preserve an issue relating to extraneous offense evidence for appellate review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 because no objection was lodged; the record was replete with evidence of a homicide, its investigation, and a grand jury's return of a "no-bill" in favor of defendant. Vanderburgh v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4643, 2009 WL 1740053 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 18 2009).

1721. In a case involving indecency with a child, defendant's due process rights were not violated by the admission of extraneous offense evidence because it was admissible to rebut the contention that a victim was fabricating her allegations and that defendant was not the type of person who would have engaged in these acts. Bass v. Tex., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736, 2009 WL 3839003 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 18 2009).

1722. In a case involving indecency with a child, a trial court did not err by refusing to admit into evidence a grand jury's no-bill relating to an extraneous offense because it was not material to the defense of the case at hand. Bass

v. Tex., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736, 2009 WL 3839003 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 18 2009).

1723. Although defendant complained about the State's reference to defendant's prior conviction and argued that the State was attempting to show the jury that defense counsel did not know the law, it appeared that the State was referring to the law applicable to the use of evidence admitted in the absence of a limiting instruction; when the State asked defendant about the prior conviction, counsel did not request a limiting instruction, nor did the jury charge contain any such instruction, and thus the conviction was before the jury for all purposes and the State's reference to the conviction was not improper argument, plus the State's remarks appeared to have been in response to defense counsel's argument. Vega v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4102, 2009 WL 1617670 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 10 2009).

1724. Even if arguments were improper, they were not so prejudicial that a mistrial was required, as the trial court instructed the jury that defendant's prior conviction could be considered for impeachment only, in essence telling the jury to disregard the State's argument, and the trial court instructed the jury to disregard the other argument, such that the instructions cured any error. Vega v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4102, 2009 WL 1617670 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 10 2009).

1725. In a sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted uncharged offense evidence because the State provided defendant with notice that it intended to introduce evidence that defendant engaged in sexual contact with a child, the notice was more than ten days before trial, and several of the uncharged offenses had been presented in the original indictment but were subsequently quashed. Accordingly, defendant had the requisite notice of the State's intent to introduce evidence of the uncharged offenses, and that evidence was properly admitted pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37. Brite v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4096, 2009 WL 1617741 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 10 2009).

1726. State did not offer evidence to show that defendant acted in conformity with his past crimes of selling narcotics to the victim, and instead the evidence served to establish defendant's relationship with the victim, such that the trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion to suppress Lee v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3879, 2009 WL 1562861 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 4 2009).

1727. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in admitting evidence of his unlawful entry into the victims' house months earlier, but he did not object to this evidence; the rules of evidence, including Tex. R. Evid. 103(d), do not preclude taking notice of fundamental errors affecting substantial rights that were not brought to the attention of the trial court, but defendant's reliance on case law was misplaced because it applied only to charge error, and thus defendant failed to preserve his complaint regarding extraneous offense evidence. Santos v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3876, 2009 WL 1563571 (Tex. App. Austin June 3 2009).

1728. Counsel's failure to object to extraneous offense evidence did not show that counsel was functioning ineffectively; counsel could have reasonably concluded that the previous offense was relevant, and hence admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), to prove defendant's knowledge of the victims' house and his intent to steal their property in his burglary trial and to substantiate defendant's identity as the burglar, and it was also reasonable for counsel to conclude that the evidence was more probative than unfairly prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Counsel could not be deemed ineffective for failing to object to evidence that was, on balance, unobjectionable. Santos v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3876, 2009 WL 1563571 (Tex. App. Austin June 3 2009).

1729. Even if the trial court granted defendant's motion in limine, his complaint about the admission of extraneous offenses would not have been preserved, as counsel did not object upon the elicitation of these offenses and jury argument relying on the same. Harrison v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4058, 2009 WL 1579002 (Tex. App. Waco

1730. Evidence that defendant, in committing the offense of sexual assault, violated the conditions of his stepbrother's community supervision that an unsupervised child under 17 not be at his place of residence was part of the context of the crime of sexual assault and was not an extraneous bad act and thus the State's introduction of this evidence was not in violation of the trial court's order, which only related to extraneous bad acts; the trial court appeared to have been under the impression that the evidence was not contextual and was subject to the notice requirement and that adequate notice had been given, but because the evidence related to the context of the offense and not conduct that was extraneous to his commission of that offense, the trial court was in error in its reasoning and the court rejected the assumption that the evidence consisted of extraneous bad acts. Worthy v. State, 295 S.W.3d 685, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3672 (Tex. App. Eastland May 28 2009).

1731. In addition to the sordid details of the offenses described by the victim, the jury heard testimony of defendant's criminal past, defendant testified in some detail about the circumstances of his juvenile adjudications, and nothing suggested that the lack of notice from the State prevented or hampered his ability to defend against the evidence; the verdicts of 20 and 25 years in prison on two counts of aggravated sexual assault and no fine was at the lower end of the punishment range and the admission of the juvenile adjudications had but a slight effect on the jury, such that it did not affect defendant's substantial rights under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Ruiz v. State, 293 S.W.3d 685, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3632 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 27 2009).

1732. Had the trial court heard certain evidence as a preliminary matter, it would not have abused its discretion in concluding a jury could find beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the extraneous acts and the court could not hold trial counsel's performance was deficient for failing to object to the evidence or to request a hearing on the admissibility of the evidence. Ruiz v. State, 293 S.W.3d 685, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3632 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 27 2009).

1733. Defendant failed to demonstrate how the punishment assessed by the jury would have been different had his trial counsel requested a hearing; the trial court included an instruction under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, the court presumed that the jury did not consider the complained-of evidence for purposes of punishment unless it was convinced defendant committed those bad acts, and defendant failed to show that counsel was ineffective. Ruiz v. State, 293 S.W.3d 685, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3632 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 27 2009).

1734. Notices referred to 27 crimes or bad acts allegedly committed by defendant, but did not mention two juvenile adjudications and it was error to admit evidence of those adjudications; the court had to decide whether the error was harmful. Ruiz v. State, 293 S.W.3d 685, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3632 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 27 2009).

1735. Because defendant did not assert an extraneous evidence objection and testimony about the badge was subsequently elicited without objection, the issue had not been preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A). Newport v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3711 (Tex. App. Dallas May 26 2009).

1736. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in overruling his motion for mistrial after the prosecutor broached the subject of an extraneous offense, but the trial court did not abuse its discretion in the motion because the improper testimony was not clearly calculated to inflame the juror's minds nor was it of such a character as to suggest the impossibility of withdrawing the impression left on the jury, plus the trial court's instruction to disregard was prompt and unequivocal and was fully sufficient to cure any harm. Newport v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3711 (Tex. App. Dallas May 26 2009).

1737. Defendant presented a true motion in limine and sought to prevent particular matters from coming before the jury, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and while on appeal he pointed to specific portions thereof, he did not permit the trial court an opportunity to determine whether that testimony was admissible at the time it was introduced, and thus error was not preserved; even if it was preserved, because the assaults on defendant's wife and her father were part of the same criminal transaction as the burglary and kidnapping, the evidence was properly admitted as same transaction contextual evidence. Francisco v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3408 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 19 2009).

1738. Examination did open the door to the State's question concerning defendant's child protective services history, as defense counsel asked questions concerning background checks on all of the child's adult family members except defendant and the only possible relevance of these questions would have been to show that other family members had a history of bad acts concerning children; it would have been fundamentally unfair to allow defense counsel to ask these questions about all other family members and not allow the State to ask the same question about defendant, the child's mother, in defendant's injury to a child trial. Gutierrez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3296, 2009 WL 1335154 (Tex. App. Dallas May 14 2009).

1739. Once the jury had heard evidence that defendant's husband, sister, brother-in-law, and mother had all been investigated by child protective services (CPS) and that the investigator found some CPS history on those people, then evidence of any similar background check on defendant became highly probative in defendant's injury to a child trial; while the evidence would make an impression on the jury, the court viewed that fact in light of the evidence the jury had already heard about other family members, the evidence took minimal time to develop, the State did need the evidence of defendant's background to give a fair treatment of the subject to the jury, and although the court did not question that the evidence was prejudicial to defendant, the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Gutierrez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3296, 2009 WL 1335154 (Tex. App. Dallas May 14 2009).

1740. Trial court erred when extraneous offense evidence of marihuana possession was admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because it did not relate to defendant's perception or state of mind in a murder case; even if it was relevant, the probative value was weak and substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. However, defendant's substantial rights under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) were not affected because defendant admitted shooting the victim, he had threatened the victim previously, a witness testified about crack cocaine on her person, and the forensic evidence showed that the victim was shot at close range with a gun found in defendant's possession. Harbert v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3305 (Tex. App. Eastland May 14 2009).

1741. In defendant's murder case, the court properly allowed witnesses to testify about defendant's participation in a subsequent bank robbery because the court acted to limit the references to defendant's participation in the bank robbery to the sole issue of his participation in the bank robbery as a driver, and connecting the vehicle from the robbery to the vehicle observed at the murder scene was probative evidence because it placed defendant at the scene near the time of the murder. Williams v. State, 290 S.W.3d 407, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3371 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 14 2009).

1742. Defendant in a child sexual assault case waived his objection to testimony regarding extraneous bad acts, including two prior incidents involving the same victim, which he contended were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), by failing to object to the evidence when it was offered at trial as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Walker v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3249, 2009 WL 1314227 (Tex. App. Tyler May 13 2009).

1743. In a trial for indecency with a child, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 21.11(b), there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, 404, in admitting extraneous offense evidence. Evidence of possession of child pornography was relevant to defendant's intent to arouse or gratify his sexual desire; evidence of methamphetamine use was relevant to show defendant's state of mind at the time of the charged offense and tended to show how the offense unfolded and progressed; and evidence that defendant physically abused the victim and two other children, in addition to providing context about the relationship between the victim and defendant, was admissible to show the victim's state of mind and explain why the victim did not speak up earlier about the abuse. Stinson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3186, 2009 WL 1267348 (Tex. App. Dallas May 8 2009).

1744. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's mistrial motion because although a witness's comment about prior bad acts was not responsive to the State's question and was prejudicial to defendant, it was not of such character that an instruction to disregard could not have removed the impression produced in jurors' minds, plus the trial court confirmed with the State after the comment was made that the witness had been subsequently admonished not to mention any prior bad acts in her testimony; the trial court's prompt instruction was sufficient to cure the prejudice caused by the comment. Jaquez v. Tex., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3111 (Tex. App. Eastland May 7 2009).

1745. Omission of a reasonable doubt instruction did not constitute error because the State did not offer evidence of any extraneous offense; a witness's comment about such was not responsive to the State's question, the trial court instructed the jury to disregard the comment, the court presumed the jury followed the instruction, it would have been unreasonable to have required the trial court to include the reasonable doubt instruction about the witness's comment after the trial court previously told the jury to disregard it, and a trial court was not required to sua sponte instruct the jury on the burden of proof to be used when considering evidence of an extraneous offense during the guilt phase. Jaquez v. Tex., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3111 (Tex. App. Eastland May 7 2009).

1746. There was no motion for a new trial and nothing explained why trial counsel did not object to the complained-of extraneous offenses; the court was not required to speculate on trial counsel's actions when confronted with a silent record and defendant did not overcome the presumption that counsel's actions were based on sound trial strategy. Mercado v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3141 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 7 2009).

1747. During defendant's criminal trial for the sexual asault of a child, the State was permitted to introduce extraneous offense evidence that defendant encouraged the victim's involvement in several crimes to rebut defense counsel's opening remarks that defendant was a positive influence on the victim. The trial court determined the extraneous offense evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to correct the false impression created by the defense. Ytuarte v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3056, 2009 WL 1232327 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 6 2009).

1748. In a sexual assault of a child case, evidence that defendant had been subjected to unusual sexual events in his youth and that he related those events to the sexual assault of the child tended to rebut a contention that any contact with the child's penis was simply an accident, and therefore, the evidence was properly admitted. Additionally, the evidence took no additional time to develop initially, and was mentioned again during the trial only when defendant took the stand and denied making some of the statements. Watterson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2938, 2009 WL 1148751 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 29 2009).

1749. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony and evidence of an extraneous offense committed by defendant against a witness because the extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted to rebut a defensive theory of fabrication and frame-up. The witness identified defendant in court, and testified that he tried to put his hands down her pants. Wells v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2762, 2009 WL 1108796 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 23 2009).

1750. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony and evidence of an extraneous offense committed by defendant against a witness because the extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted to rebut a defensive theory of fabrication and frame-up. The witness identified defendant in court, and testified that he tried to put his hands down her pants. Wells v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2767, 2009 WL 1108665 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 23 2009).

1751. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err in admitting testimony and evidence of an extraneous offense committed by defendant against a witness because the extraneous offense evidence was properly admitted to rebut a defensive theory of fabrication and frame-up. The witness identified defendant in court, and testified that he tried to put his hands down her pants. Wells v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2768, 2009 WL 1108663 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 23 2009).

1752. Court assumed without deciding error in the admission of the extraneous offense and proceeded directly to a harm analysis under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because this was nonconstitutional error. Burton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2781, 2009 WL 1086934 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 23 2009).

1753. Any error in admitting extraneous offense evidence did not have a substantial effect on the verdict and did not affect defendant's substantial rights, such that any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), given that (1) the State presented ample evidence of defendant's guilt of aggravated robbery, (2) the only evidence directly supporting one defense theory was a single affirmative response by defendant's former girlfriend, who admitted to having prior felony convictions, and the only evidence of defendant's alibi defense was defendant's father's testimony, (3) although the State referenced the extraneous offense in its closing argument, the State did so to rebut defendant's fabrication and alibi defenses, plus the State told the jury to consider the extraneous offense evidence for rebuttal only, and (4) the trial court also provided a limiting instruction and defendant did not rebut the presumption that the jury followed the instructions given. Burton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2781, 2009 WL 1086934 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 23 2009).

1754. Where defendant did not raise an objection in the trial court based on inadmissibility of evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) due to character conformity, the argument was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Mincey v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2825, 2009 WL 1058734 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 21 2009).

1755. Defendant pleaded guilty to assault and aggravated assault and several exhibits were introduced concerning previous charges and convictions, plus many other unadjudicated bad acts were introduced; thus, even if the failure to object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to certain unadjudicated bad acts was error, which the court did not decide, the error did not deprive defendant of a fair trial. Schroeder v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2688, 2009 WL 1035223 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 16 2009).

1756. In a sexual assault of a child case, evidence of defendant's arrest for possession of child pornography was properly admitted because it explained the reason for the investigation of defendant, the State needed it to adequately describe the circumstances of the charged offenses, and the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Greene v. State, 287 S.W.3d 277, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2855 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 16 2009).

1757. In a sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of statements defendant made to a witness and the child about his feelings for the child because it was relevant to, and highly probative of, defendant's state of mind and the relationship between defendant and the child. The record did not demonstrate that the probative value of this evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Greene v. State, 287 S.W.3d 277, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2855 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 16 2009).

1758. Court properly admitted extraneous offense evidence because the extraneous offenses admitted tended to "make the existence" of a fact of consequence "more probable" and established that: defendant's gang was a criminal street gang, defendant had an affiliation with the gang, and defendant committed the instant offense as a member of a criminal street gang. Furthermore, the probative force and the State's need to admit the extraneous offenses outweighed the factors that favored exclusion; the evidence was not only relevant, but essential to the State's burden of proof. Fuentes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2544, 2009 WL 997508 (Tex. App. Houston 14th

Dist. Apr. 14 2009).

1759. During defendant's murder trial, the detective testified that he had seen defendant in a crime stoppers listing on an unrelated shooting. Assuming that the testimony violated Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), defendant was not entiitled to a mistrial because the trial judge instructed the jury to disregard the statement. Gamboa v. State, 296 S.W.3d 574, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 512 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1760. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing defendant from cross-examining the complainant about her previous false allegations of sexual assault. The evidence was relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show the complainant's bias against defendant and her possible motive to testify falsely against him. Hammer v. State, 296 S.W.3d 555, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 513 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1761. Defendant's objection to the offer of extraneous offense evidence of all purposes was sustained, but defendant did not object further or ask for a continuing objection and he acquiesced to the trial court's action in admitting the evidence for a limited purpose; thus, he did not preserve a challenge to the admission of the extraneous offense evidence for a limited purpose under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1). Berkley v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2194, 2009 WL 885951 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 2 2009).

1762. Drive-by was attempted intimidation of a potential witness and the arrest led to the discovery of one of the weapons used in the murder. The full proof by testimony of the organized crime combination under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 71.02 could not be given without showing that transaction; the testimony was admissible because Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) excluded same transaction evidence from its notice requirements in criminal cases. Saenz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2254 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 2 2009).

1763. Despite a mother's argument that it was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), a trial court did not err by admitting evidence concerning an oldest daughter, who was not part of a termination of parental rights proceeding, because such evidence was probative of whether the termination was in the best interest of four other children under the factors set forth in Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 263.307; the State had to prove, by clear and convincing evidence, both the grounds for termination and that termination was in the best interest of the children. It was not necessary for the appellate court to decide whether this issue was preserved by a nonparticularized objection because, even if error was preserved, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence, which related to a history of abusive or assaultive conduct by the children's family. In re J.A.P., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2422, 2009 WL 839953 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 1 2009).

1764. Act of cross-dressing constitutes "other acts" under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Fox v. State, 283 S.W.3d 85, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2433 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

1765. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve error relating to the admission of testimony from the mother of the victim that the family had moved many times to get away from defendant's violent behavior. Although defendant argued to a trial court that he had not opened the door to evidence of abuse by cross-examining the mother, he did not object that admission of the evidence violated Tex. R. Evid. 403, Tex. R. Evid. 404, and Tex. R. Evid. 405, as he argued on appeal. Gamble v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2134, 2009 WL 806879 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 27 2009).

1766. In a sexual assault of a child case, the court reversibly erred by admitting extraneous acts evidence because defendant's practice of not using a condom while engaged in consensual sex with an adult companion, or informing the companion of his HIV positive status, had the practical effect of prejudicing any defense raised by defendant regarding the complainant's credibility. Such an effect would have been detrimental to defendant, who sought to discredit the complainant by pointing out factual variances in his outcries, and by suggesting that the complainant was motivated to fabricate the assault to avoid being schooled in an alternative education program. Lopez v. State, 288 S.W.3d 148, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2050 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 26 2009).

1767. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's motion for a mistrial after his former girlfriend testified that defendant had been in and out of prison because the State's questioning of the girlfriend after defendant's objection made it clear that she was referring to the single conviction for possessing marijuana, which was an offense the State was required to prove as part of its case in chief, which charged defendant with possession of a firearm by a felon in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 46.04. Defendant also declined a the offered limiting instruction, which would have cured any error. Rice v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2062, 2009 WL 790178 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2009).

1768. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of voice messages defendant left for his former girlfriend in which he threatened to kill her husband because the evidence was properly admitted to prove defendant's knowledge and intent; a reasonable person could view the messages as creating an inference that defendant, knowing he would see the husband that day, intentionally brought the gun with him in order to harm or further threaten the husband. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's Tex. R. Evid. 403 objections because the messages were left a few hours before defendant drove to the husband's home with a gun in the back of his truck, the trial court specifically directed the State not to delve into the details of the messages, the time the State needed to admit the messages was minimal, and the evidence was an integral part of the State's theory that defendant took the gun with him to further threaten the husband. Rice v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2062, 2009 WL 790178 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2009).

1769. In defendant's aggravated assault case, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) did not exclude evidence of third-party threats against the complainants because it was relevant to explain the inconsistencies in the complainants' testimony; evidence of threats against any witnesses to the shootings tended to explain the complainants' motivation to potentially understate the number of their family members that, in fact, might have witnessed the shootings. Cox v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1902, 2009 WL 807491 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 19 2009).

1770. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the utility knife, the pocket knife, and wire cutters that were found on defendant's person after his arrest into evidence because the items were probative, as they showed defendant's intent as well as the context and circumstances of his actions of entering the victims' garage, and the probative value did not substantially outweigh the risk of unfair prejudice. The State spent relatively little time developing the evidence and the evidence did not have a tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis. Enloe v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 19 2009).

1771. In an aggravated assault case, the trial court did not err in admitting the victim's videotaped statement because defendant raised the issue of self-defense. A witness testified that in defendant's altercation with the victim, the victim was the aggressor and defendant tried to resist retaliating; as a result of that testimony, defendant's alleged assault of the victim was relevant rebuttal evidence to prove that defendant acted with the requisite intent. In re B.H., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1852, 2009 WL 692613 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 18 2009).

1772. In a murder case, evidence of a prior relationship between defendant and his victim was properly admitted into evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a); moreover, the evidence was not offered to show that defendant acted in conformity with his propensity for violence, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Evidence that defendant had beaten the victim in the past was no more inflammatory or prejudicial than the evidence that he beat the victim on the night of the murder. Chavez v. State, 399 S.W.3d 168, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1840, 2009 WL 700658 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 18 2009).

1773. In defendant's assault case, the court did not abuse its discretion by admitting photographs of injuries to the victim's husband's upper arm, neck, wrist, and forehead and a photograph of a broken chair to fully understand the context of the altercation. It was also within the court's discretion to conclude that the injuries to the victim's husband and the means by which they were inflicted were so connected to the injuries alleged in the indictment as to form an indivisible criminal transaction. Lopez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1755, 2009 WL 638182 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 12 2009).

1774. In a murder case, the court properly admitted evidence of a subsequent shooting involving defendant because, in both cases, defendant fired a gun from the driver's side window, once when he was sitting on the passenger side, both incidents occurred in the early morning, and in each instance defendant was responding to a perceived slight to one of his friends, rather than to himself, by conducting a drive-by shooting. Additionally, defendant's alibi defense and challenges to witness credibility raised identity, and in light of the importance of proving the identity of the perpetrator, the State had a strong need for the challenged evidence. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1725, 2009 WL 585986 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 10 2009).

1775. Case law held that a Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection was not implicitly contained in relevancy or Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) objections and rather, a specific Tex. R. Evid. 403 objection had to be raised to preserve error; the court does not hold, however, that a litigant must expressly invoke "Rule 403" to preserve error. Shackelford v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1441, 2009 WL 508478 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 3 2009).

1776. In defendant's sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err in excluding his offer of proof at trial concerning an earlier outcry of sexual abuse by the victim regarding another individual because the testimony of the victim's mother in defendant's offer of proof provided only indirect evidence of any statement by the child. Although it was clear from the mother's testimony that she believed defendant's sister was coaching the child in the 2001 incident, no evidence showed that the specific statement attributed to the victim, then five years old, was false. Gonzales v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1435, 2009 WL 498032 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 27 2009).

1777. In a case involving sexual assault of a child, the State's notice of its intent to use extraneous offenses was not unreasonable because it involved a time span of 6 years; because the testimony regarding when defendant lived in El Salvador was not precise, the notice giving a range of dates for the extraneous offenses alleged to have occurred in El Salvador was not unreasonable. Even if the notice was unreasonable, the error was not harmful because defendant did not contend that he was surprised, he did not seek a continuance, and he failed to show how his defense strategy had been different had the intent notice been more specific. Sagastume v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1093, 2009 WL 387182 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 18 2009).

1778. Contrary to defendant's assertion, the State was not required to give notice of extraneous offenses under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) in connection with the offenses found in defendant's presentence investigation report, as the Texas Rules of Evidence, including Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), did not apply to a presentence investigation report; the court agreed with the reasoning in case law that a trial court could consider evidence in a presentence investigation report that could not have otherwise been introduced at the punishment stage and thus the trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion to delete the extraneous offenses in the report and admitting the related testimony. The court noted there the record did not show a request by defendant for notice under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 nor a discovery order requiring the State to give such notice. Desanges v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1050, 2009 WL 349805 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

1779. Defendant failed preserve error because he failed to object under either Tex. Rs. Evid. 403 or 404 to admission of prior offenses; the State posed questions to defendant to clarify the nature of the prior convictions, and counsel objected neither to the court's ruling allowing the evidence nor to the procedure used to arrive at the ruling. Williams v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1032, 2009 WL 350608 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

1780. Victim's knowledge of defendant's violent past was not relevant in a retaliation-by-threat case, because the witness did not testify that his knowledge that defendant had actually killed a person contributed to his fear. Under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), the trial court erred by admitting evidence of defendant's prior murder conviction. Pollard v. State, 277 S.W.3d 25, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 233 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

1781. Trial court found that a witness's statement went to the very heart of the case, hindered defendant's constitutional right to a fair trial, and contributed to his conviction under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 42.09(2), and since defendant was not provided notice of the extraneous offense, he was not able to investigate, prepare, or defend the issue, which is exactly the type of situation Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was adopted to prevent; the trial court found harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), it was not outside the zone of reasonable disagreement for the trial court to conclude that an instruction to disregard did not cure the error, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting a new trial. State v. Clayton, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 906, 2009 WL 322869 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 11 2009).

1782. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, prior bad acts evidence was properly admitted at sentencing because the collective testimony was probative of defendant's ongoing, repeated pattern of abuse, which the witnesses could not individually establish, and the collective testimony assisted the jury in evaluating defendant's character and his moral blameworthiness for punishment purposes. Cintron v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 889, 2009 WL 330963 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 11 2009).

1783. Extraneous offense evidence in a pistol, bullets, and marijuana were relevant apart from proving defendant's action in conformity therewith, and thus the evidence was admissible. Mathis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1466, 2009 WL 3003252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 10 2009).

1784. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 403 in admitting extraneous offense evidence in defendant's capital murder trial, given that (1) the evidence tended to make some facts more or less probable, (2) it was unlikely that the jury was impressed in an indelible way by admission of a pistol, marijuana, and bullets, (3) the State did not emphasize the evidence or spend an inordinate amount of time developing the evidence, despite the State's need to development evidence in light of the circumstantial case, and (4) in considering the overwhelming evidence of defendant's guilt, it was unlikely that the evidence had anything more than a slight effect on the jury's considerations. Mathis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1466, 2009 WL 3003252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 10 2009).

1785. Marijuana and bullets were relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to proving or disproving a fact of consequence beyond mere action in conformity with bad character under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), given that (1) the bullets found in defendant's apartment were the same caliber and manufactured by the same company as those found at the crime scene, (2) possession of the casings was not indicative of illegal activity but the bullets provided a connection to the murder, and (3) testimony suggested that defendant took some marijuana from the victim, which could have established motive and corroborated a witness's account of the events after the murder. Mathis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1466, 2009 WL 3003252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 10 2009).

1786. Because defendant fled and pointed a pistol at officer when they attempted to arrest him, the gun was admissible and relevant to display a consciousness of guilt. Mathis v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1466, 2009 WL 3003252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 10 2009).

1787. Alleged error regarding the admission of an extraneous offense was disregarded in a robbery case under the standard in Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because defendant's substantial rights were not affected; there was ample evidence of defendant's guilt, a limiting instruction was given, and there was other evidence regarding defendant's untruthfulness. Moreover, whether or not defendant had stolen a truck used to flee the robbery scene had minimal relevance as to whether he used a deadly weapon during the robbery. Crump v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 760,

2009 WL 279606 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 5 2009).

1788. In a case involving the possession of hydrocodone, there was no error in admitting evidence of an extraneous offense under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) based on the holding of Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296, 124 S. Ct. 2531 (2004), because that holding stated that a jury was required to make factual determinations in a jury trial; moreover, it held that a trial judge was unable to usurp the province of a jury in making determinations of fact. Defendant unsuccessfully tried to argue that, because no jury had ever found him guilty of the extraneous offense, it was improper to submit it to the jury in the instant case. Smith v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 751, 2009 WL 279490 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 5 2009).

1789. In a case involving the possession of hydrocodone, the State was properly allowed to introduce extraneous offense evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) showing that defendant had subsequently been arrested for the same offense because this rebutted defendant's assertions that was unaware that the pills were in his car and that they belonged to someone else. Moreover, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Smith v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 751, 2009 WL 279490 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 5 2009).

1790. Because defendant did not establish that his trial counsel actively represented his own self-interest during the punishment phase of trial, his ineffective-assistance claim failed; although defendant argued that counsel was conflicted by his own self-interest as a victim of an extraneous offense, he failed to explain how counsel, who stated on the record that he did not wish to press charges, could personally benefit from admission of the assault evidence, plus counsel consistently represented defendant's interests by objecting to the evidence and attempting to minimize its effect on the jury. Berry v. State, 278 S.W.3d 492, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 752 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 4 2009).

1791. In defendant's sexual assault case, the complainant's single statement about defendant being violent did not influence the jury in reaching a guilty verdict because the record was replete with testimony and physical evidence supporting the allegations, and a doctor found two transections in the victim's hymen, which indicated vaginal penetration. Gonzales v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 680, 2009 WL 242531 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 3 2009).

1792. In defendant's sexual assault case, a court did not err by allowing extraneous offense evidence under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(g) and Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) because, although the State did not provide prior notice of its intent to utilize the evidence, the State presented the evidence during cross examination of defendant. Hope v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 657, 2009 WL 223134 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 30 2009).

1793. Trial court did not err by refusing to grant a mistrial based on defendant's assertion that Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) was violated when a witness testified that defendant's wife had stated that defendant had murdered someone; the statement was in the middle of the testimony, it was not repeated, it was not connected to a charged assault, and the jury was told to disregard the testimony. Moreover, nothing in the record suggested that the jury would have rendered a different verdict without the complained-of statement. Hecht v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 521, 2009 WL 200979 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 29 2009).

1794. During defendant's criminal trial for assault family violence under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.01(a)(1), (b)(2), the trial court did not err by allowing the prosecution to read a stipulation to the jury in which defendant admitted a prior conviction for family violence. There was no violation of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Davila v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1568 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 29 2009).

1795. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103(d), occasions in taking notice of fundamental errors not brought to the attention of the trial court were rare and defendant simply stated that fundamental error existed while failing to point to any reason or authority to support that conclusion; moreover, Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), cited by defendant, was inapplicable in this context because it referred to extraneous offenses, and the prosecutor's use of the term "home invasion" was in reference to the offense for which defendant was on trial, burglary, not to any extraneous offense, and thus fundamental error was not shown. Anderson v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 406 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 22 2009).

Rule 405 Methods of Proving Character

(a) By Reputation or Opinion.

(1) In General.--When evidence of a person's character or character trait is admissible, it may be proved by testimony about the person's reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination of the character witness, inquiry may be made into relevant specific instances of the person's conduct.

(2) Accused's Character in a Criminal Case.--In the guilt stage of a criminal case, a witness may testify to the defendant's character or character trait only if, before the day of the offense, the witness was familiar with the defendant's reputation or the facts or information that form the basis of the witness's opinion.

(b) By Specific Instances of Conduct.--When a person's character or character trait is an essential element of a charge, claim, or defense, the character or trait may also be proved by relevant specific instances of the person's conduct.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : General Overview

1. Drug use is not an essential element of the crime of possession of a controlled substance; a defendant may not, therefore, use specific instances of drug use; rather, he may only use reputation or opinion testimony to prove his good character. Norton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Aggravated Offenses

2. In an aggravated assault case under Tex. Penal Code Ann. §§ 22.01(a)(1) and 22.02(a), defendant was not entitled to use a specific act of violence to show that the victim was the first aggressor as only opinion and reputation testimony was admissible to show the victim's character for violence and defendant's use was an attempt to prove that the victim's conduct in conformity with his violent character, which Tex. R. Evid. 404(a) and 405(a) prohibited; also, the record did not suggest that defendant attempted to use a witness's testimony that the victim had choked her for any admissible purpose. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the witness's testimony. Hawthorne v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1728, 2011 WL 846121 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 9 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : General Overview

3. In a trial for child sexual assault, testimony about extraneous acts was properly admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 38.37, notwithstanding Tex. R. Evid. 404 and 405. The testimony from a complainant, defendant's stepdaughter, concerned two sexual encounters and was highly probative of both defendant's intent to engage in the charged offenses and the states of mind of defendant and the stepdaughter. Miller v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6227 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 4 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Kidnapping : General Overview

4. In a case charging that defendant kidnapped a car salesperson to collect a debt, defendant should have been permitted to introduce testimony from five business associates that defendant was an honest, non-violent businessperson, whom they trusted; character evidence in the form of an opinion was a proper way of introducing such evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 405. Melgar v. State, 236 S.W.3d 302, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2207 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

5. In a case charging that defendant kidnapped a car salesperson to collect a debt, defendant should have been permitted to introduce testimony from five business associates that defendant was an honest, non-violent businessperson, whom they trusted; the error in excluding the evidence required reversal under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because the excluded evidence went to the heart of defendant's sole defense, that, in light of the opinions given by the business associates, it was unlikely that defendant would kidnap someone in an effort to collect a debt. Melgar v. State, 236 S.W.3d 302, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2207 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Stalking : General Overview

6. In a stalking case, the trial court did not err by allowing the cross-examination of a defense witness regarding whether she was aware that defendant had been charged with a crime following an alleged domestic violence incident with the victim and whether she was aware that he had violated a protective order and assaulted his former wife; this evidence was relevant to defendant's good character after the witness testified that she had called the victim and asked her to give defendant another chance. Allen v. State, 218 S.W.3d 905, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2527 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

7. In a retaliation case, a court properly refused to allow defendant to question the State's character witnesses as to the victim's prior crimes where the remoteness of the prior convictions tended to diminish any potential they might have for impressing the jury in some improper manner, defendant called other witnesses who testified that the victim's character for truthfulness was not good, and thus, his need to cross-examine the State's witnesses regarding the victim's prior convictions was lessened. Moore v. State, 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Riot, Rout & Unlawful Assembly

8. In a trial for aggravated assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404, 405 in admitting evidence of defendant's gang affiliation because the evidence raised an inference that defendant's motive for stabbing the complainant was to harm him because of his race. Defendant stated during booking that he was a member of a particular gang and did not want to be jailed with any black people. Martin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5624, 2011 WL 2937423 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 21 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

9. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court assumed the admission of pornographic photographs of adult women taken from his computer was erroneous. The State argued that defendant "opened the door" to the admission of the photographs when he told the jury that sexually assaulting a child was against his morals. Breland v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5925 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 28 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

10. In a prosecution for aggravated sexual assault, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous acts of child sexual abuse that occurred in another county because the court instructed that the jury could not consider testimony regarding defendant having committed extraneous offenses for any purpose unless it found and believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed such other offenses and that it could only consider the testimony for the specific purposes listed in the charge, including its bearing on the previous and subsequent relationship between the defendant and the child. Foley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14638, 2013 WL 6244540 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 3 2013).

11. In a trial for indecency with children, defendant should have been allowed to elicit testimony that he had a reputation in the community for the ethical treatment of children; the error in excluding that evidence was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), even though there was other testimony as to his reputation for being peaceful and law-abiding, because evidence of a reputation as being law-abiding was far too generic to address the specific character trait of pedophilia. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9788 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 9 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : Elements

12. Complainant testified that defendant fondled and kissed her in an escalating fashion when she was between the ages of six and 10, that he felt her under her clothes when she was 10, and that he had sexual intercourse with her when she was 13. Because the testimony was relevant to the state of mind of the complainant and defendant, as well as to the previous and subsequent relationship between the complainant and defendant, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, the trial court did not err in admitting the extraneous offense evidence. Parker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8834 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 12 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : Penalties

13. In a penalty trial for aggravated-sexual assault of a child, it was proper to allow the State to ask defendant's mother whether she had heard about an extraneous offense after she testified that her son was a good boy and that she knew he did not do it. Burke v. State, 371 S.W.3d 252, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8368, 2011 WL 5023008 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 20 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Sentencing

14. After a witness testified at a punishment hearing in an aggravated assault case that defendant was a good person who needed counseling, the State's "have you heard" questions relating to defendant's history of domestic violence were proper under Tex. R. Evid. 405; thus, counsel was not ineffective for failing to raise objections that would have been overruled. Worry v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3307, 2010 WL 1784022 (Tex. App. Tyler May 5 2010).

15. Defendant in a methamphetamine possession case failed to show that his counsel was ineffective when evidence of an extraneous offense of manufacture of controlled substance was admitted during the punishment phase under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07. Counsel only told defendant he would not be indicted for the extraneous offense, not that it was inadmissible. Talbert v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5697 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

16. Defendant's counsel was ineffective for opening the door to allow the State to introduce evidence of his prior convictions of sexual assault and sexual assault of a child by asking defendant's ex-girlfriend whether defendant was a violent person and she responded that he was not; therefore, on cross-examination the State was permitted to ask the ex-girlfriend whether she knew that defendant had pleaded guilty to two prior sexual assaults, allowing prejudicial and otherwise inadmissible evidence to be presented before the jury, which could not be considered sound trial strategy. The court held that defendant was prejudiced because the credibility of defendant's testimony was a key component of his defense strategy, given that he claimed he was trying to get away from the victim and had no intention of hurting anyone; although the trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction as to how it could consider the prior convictions, the instruction specifically allowed the jury to consider the convictions for the sole purpose of determining defendant's character for violence. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6365, 2013 WL 2301989 (Tex. App. Eastland May 23 2013).

17. In a sexual assault trial, counsel was not shown to be ineffective in failing to request a limiting instruction when the victim testified, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 § 2, about other extraneous acts of sexual abuse defendant committed against her because the record contained no explanation for counsel's decision. Taylor v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 581 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 26 2012).

18. Defendant failed to show that his trial counsel's conduct was so outrageous that no competent attorney would have engaged in it because even though defendant argued that his trial counsel "opened the door" for admission of evidence regarding his prior felony conviction for the offense of possession of a controlled substance to be admitted by placing a reputation witness on the stand and failed to object to the form of the State's cross-examination questions of his reputation witness, Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) did not draw a distinction between "reputation" witnesses and "opinion" witnesses and did not limit cross-examination of character witnesses to any particular form. Further, it could not be said that trial counsel's decision to solicit character testimony from a witness was not grounded in sound trial strategy. Kemp v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9213, 2009 WL 4405793 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Burdens of Proof : Prosecution

19. In the punishment phase of a murder trial, the trial court was not required to instruct the jury that the State had to prove beyond a reasonable doubt extraneous offenses for which defendant had previously been convicted. Johnson v. State, 176 S.W.3d 94, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9589 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Cross-Examination

20. Defendant failed to show that his trial counsel's conduct was so outrageous that no competent attorney would have engaged in it because even though defendant argued that his trial counsel "opened the door" for admission of evidence regarding his prior felony conviction for the offense of possession of a controlled substance to be admitted by placing a reputation witness on the stand and failed to object to the form of the State's cross-examination questions of his reputation witness, Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) did not draw a distinction between "reputation" witnesses and "opinion" witnesses and did not limit cross-examination of character witnesses to any particular form. Further, it could not be said that trial counsel's decision to solicit character testimony from a witness was not grounded in sound trial strategy. Kemp v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9213, 2009 WL 4405793 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 3 2009).

21. In a stalking case, the trial court did not err by allowing the cross-examination of a defense witness regarding whether she was aware that defendant had been charged with a crime following an alleged domestic violence incident with the victim and whether she was aware that he had violated a protective order and assaulted his former wife; this evidence was relevant to defendant's good character after the witness testified that she had called the victim and asked her to give defendant another chance. Allen v. State, 218 S.W.3d 905, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2527 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Impeachment

22. State was not required to tender proof that certain other offenses were committed before asking "have you heard" or "did you know" questions to a witness who testified about defendant's character during the punishment phase of trial because the State was not attempting to admit evidence of extraneous offenses under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, but instead was seeking to impeach the credibility of a character witness's opinion about defendant in accordance with Tex. R. Evid. 405. Nunez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5480 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 1 2013).

23. In defendant's retaliation case, the error in sustaining the State's objection to defendant's impeachment of the State's character witness was harmless; three defense witnesses testified that the victim had a poor character for truthfulness and defendant further impeached the victim with a prior inconsistent statement, but the victim's testimony regarding the elements of the offense was corroborated by several other witnesses, and was contradicted only by defendant's bald denials. Moore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3017 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Waco July 21, 2004), substituted opinion at 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Self-Defense

24. In defendant's murder case, the court did not erroneously exclude evidence regarding the victim's violent character because the evidence did not tend to show that the victim was the first aggressor; the fact that victim once told a witness that he would "take care of her husband and brother if they came looking for her" did not serve to demonstrate the victim's intent the night of the murder. Defendant's preferred testimony that the victim was a member of a prison gang that was "running fast" and "doing hits" was similarly irrelevant other than to show the victim's character conformity. Vasquez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7428, 2012 WL 6863860 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 27 2012).

25. Defendant's prior crimes or bad acts could be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, intent, plan, knowledge, or lack of mistake or accident, and when a defendant claimed self-defense, the State could introduce evidence of other violent acts where the defendant was an aggressor in order to show intent, and the appellate court saw no reason to depart from precedent and found that the trial court properly admitted the evidence of the extraneous offenses. Hamilton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5444 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Limiting Instructions

26. In a sexual assault trial, counsel was not shown to be ineffective in failing to request a limiting instruction when the victim testified, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37 § 2, about other extraneous acts of sexual abuse defendant committed against her because the record contained no explanation for counsel's decision. Taylor v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 581 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 26 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Alternatives : Probation : General Overview

27. Although the witness testified she was familiar with defendant's poor reputation for being a peaceful and law-abiding citizen and reputation evidence was admissible pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 405(a), the foundation was insufficient to establish the proper predicate for reputation testimony under Rule 405(a), and the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the witness to testify that defendant's reputation for being peaceable and law-abiding was bad. Manning v. State, 126 S.W.3d 552, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9861 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Evidence

28. State was not required to tender proof that certain other offenses were committed before asking "have you heard" or "did you know" questions to a witness who testified about defendant's character during the punishment phase of trial because the State was not attempting to admit evidence of extraneous offenses under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, but instead was seeking to impeach the credibility of a character witness's opinion about defendant in accordance with Tex. R. Evid. 405. Nunez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5480 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 1 2013).

29. In a penalty trial for aggravated-sexual assault of a child, it was proper to allow the State to ask defendant's mother whether she had heard about an extraneous offense after she testified that her son was a good boy and that she knew he did not do it. Burke v. State, 371 S.W.3d 252, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8368, 2011 WL 5023008 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 20 2011).

30. Where defendant was tried for aiding seven men escape from prison, evidence of the post-escape crimes committed by the seven men bore heavily upon defendant's character and moral blameworthiness; the evidence was admissible to help the jury determine an appropriate sentence for defendant's crimes. Rodriguez v. State, 163 S.W.3d 115, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1084 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

31. Testimony of an assistant district attorney regarding her opinion of a defendant's character, which was formed based upon two separate child protective services investigations, was properly admitted during the punishment phase of the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) where the witness based her opinion on facts that occurred prior to the day of the charged offense and was familiar with the underlying facts or information on which her opinion was based. The State was not required to show that the opinion was based upon a community observation or talking to people in the community. Hollingsworth v. State, 15 S.W.3d 586, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 2033 (Tex. App. Austin 2000).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Sex Offenders : General Overview

32. In a case in which defendant was convicted of violating the terms of his civil conviction under the Texas Civil Commitment of Sexually Violent Predators Act, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. ch. 841, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence of specific instances of defendant's compliance with his commitment order because that evidence was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a), 405(a). Moreover, because the State did not ever imply that defendant had violated the terms of commitment before the charged offenses, the State did not open the door to evidence of defendant's compliance prior to those offenses. Jones v. State, 333 S.W.3d 615, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3997 (Tex. App. Dallas May 29 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Briefs

33. Under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(e), (g), (h), defendant waived any claims to error under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) because defendant's brief discussed only Tex. R. Evid. 404(a). Error under R. 404(a) was also inadequately briefed with regard to unanswered questions about contraband. Sanchez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7130 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 4 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

34. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve error relating to the admission of testimony from the mother of the victim that the family had moved many times to get away from defendant's violent behavior. Although defendant argued to a trial court that he had not opened the door to evidence of abuse by cross-examining the mother, he did not object that admission of the evidence violated Tex. R. Evid. 403, Tex. R. Evid. 404, and Tex. R. Evid. 405, as he argued on appeal. Gamble v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2134, 2009 WL 806879 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 27 2009).

35. Under Tex. R. App. P. 33, defendant did not preserve a complaint, and any error was cured, with regard to the admission of extraneous offense evidence; he did not request a running objection to evidence concerning the offense and did not object to the evidence that the State elicited on cross-examination of defendant. Davila v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6865 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 2 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Mistrial

36. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial based on the prosecutor's asking defendant's wife during the punishment phase regarding whether she was aware of a prior DWI incident involving defendant because the prosecutor acted in good-faith when he asked the question based on a Texas Crime Information Center report showing that defendant was involved in a prior DWI incident. Defendant had offered his wife's testimony to establish his eligibility for probation and to prevent the suspension of his driver's license, and therefore the State had the right to ask questions tending to rebut defendant's eligibility for probation and to rebut the wife's testimony. Owens v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1766, 2013 WL 657787 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 21 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

37. Where a defense witness testified during defendant's indecent exposure trial that defendant's reputation for truthfulness was excellent and that she had never witnessed anything inappropriate about him, under Tex. R. Evid. 405, it was proper for the State to counter that testimony by inquiring whether the witness was familiar with any specific instances of untruthful or inappropriate conduct by defendant. Tennison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2120 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 16 2006).

38. In defendant's retaliation case, the error in sustaining the State's objection to defendant's impeachment of the State's character witness was harmless; three defense witnesses testified that the victim had a poor character for truthfulness and defendant further impeached the victim with a prior inconsistent statement, but the victim's testimony regarding the elements of the offense was corroborated by several other witnesses, and was contradicted only by defendant's bald denials. Moore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3017 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Waco July 21, 2004), substituted opinion at 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

39. Although the witness testified she was familiar with defendant's poor reputation for being a peaceful and law-abiding citizen and reputation evidence was admissible pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 405(a), the foundation was insufficient to establish the proper predicate for reputation testimony under Rule 405(a), and the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the witness to testify that defendant's reputation for being peaceable and law-abiding was bad. Manning v. State, 126 S.W.3d 552, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9861 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

40. Defendant was not substantially harmed by the trial court's error in admitting a witness's reputation testimony because evidence of the victim's character as a peaceful person was properly presented to the jury. Cruz v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9002 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 15 2007).

41. In a trial for indecency with children, defendant should have been allowed to elicit testimony that he had a reputation in the community for the ethical treatment of children; the error in excluding that evidence was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), even though there was other testimony as to his reputation for being peaceful and law-abiding, because evidence of a reputation as being law-abiding was far too generic to address the specific character trait of pedophilia. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9788 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 9 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Reputation : General Overview

42. Although the witness testified she was familiar with defendant's poor reputation for being a peaceful and law-abiding citizen and reputation evidence was admissible pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 405(a), the foundation was insufficient to establish the proper predicate for reputation testimony under Rule 405(a), and the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the witness to testify that defendant's reputation for being peaceable and law-abiding was bad. Manning v. State, 126 S.W.3d 552, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9861 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2003).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Curative Admissibility

43. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a mistrial based on the prosecutor's asking defendant's wife during the punishment phase regarding whether she was aware of a prior DWI incident involving defendant because the prosecutor acted in good-faith when he asked the question based on a Texas Crime Information Center report showing that defendant was involved in a prior DWI incident. Defendant had offered his wife's testimony to establish his eligibility for probation and to prevent the suspension of his driver's license, and therefore the State had the right to ask questions tending to rebut defendant's eligibility for probation and to rebut the wife's testimony. Owens v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1766, 2013 WL 657787 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 21 2013).

44. In a murder trial, defendant opened the door to evidence of his past misconduct because his brother testified that defendant had a mellower and more peaceful disposition than his brothers. The same testimony cured error in extraneous-offense evidence admitted prior to the testimony. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7938, 2012 WL 4101900 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 19 2012).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

45. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the officers' testimony regarding their opinions of defendant's bad character where, in the officer's 26 years of law enforcement, he was familiar with defendant, he had experience with defendant, and had been familiar with him for "several years." Smith v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6567 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 18 2005).

46. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court assumed the admission of pornographic photographs of adult women taken from his computer was erroneous. The State argued that defendant "opened the door" to the admission of the photographs when he told the jury that sexually assaulting a child was against his morals. Breland v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5925 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 28 2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Limited Admissibility

47. In a case where two people were being tried for aggravated sexual abuse of a child, "have you heard" questions under Tex. R. Evid. 405 were properly asked when witnesses testified about the character of the co-defendant; defendant failed to request a limiting instruction under Tex. R. Evid. 105, so she could not challenge the issue on appeal; the evidence was not offered to prove the extraneous offense, but to test the qualification of the witnesses to testify regarding character. Little v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4194 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 30 2007).

Evidence : Relevance : Character Evidence

48. Even if the victim's conduct at the car dealership showed her ability to "intimidate, harass, manipulate, and physically abuse" defendant, the conduct was not relevant because it did not involve the victim injuring herself or fabricating allegations that defendant injured her. It, therefore, was not relevant evidence essential to prove the theory of defense, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the witness's testimony. Vasquez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3714, 2014 WL 1413809 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 7 2014).

49. Because proving that the complainant had fabricated her allegations was not dependent exclusively upon the character of the victim, testimony as to the complainant's alleged character trait of lying to law enforcement was not admissible under this rule during defendant's trial for attempted sexual performance by a child. Clark v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1765, 2014 WL 708910 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 19 2014).

50. Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of extraneous offenses and evidence of defendant's reputation because a witness testified as to her opinion of defendant and the State was entitled to test her knowledge about specific instances of conduct by asking a series of "did you know" questions. Warren v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14124, 2013 WL 6095675 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 19 2013).

51. Defendant's conviction for burglary of a habitation was proper because, when two witness's testified that defendant was a good person who would not have committed crimes absent the outside influence of either his brother or other older men, they were testifying to defendant's good character. Therefore, it was permissible for the State to cross-examine them concerning their awareness of relevant specific instances of defendant's conduct. Juarez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9622 (Tex. App. Dallas July 31 2013).

52. In a murder case in which defendant claimed self-defense, the trial court did not err by excluding evidence of the victim's prior arrest for a possible domestic situation; because nothing in the record showed defendant was aware that the victim had been arrested, the prior conduct was not admissible as "communicated character" evidence. "Uncommunicated character" evidence was available only through reputation and opinion testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a). Pointer v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4658 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 11 2013).

53. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's request to present evidence of an assault victim's arrest for having a blackjack or club because there was no evidence that defendant had knowledge of those specific acts. Williams v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 839, 2013 WL 341900 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 30 2013).

54. Defendant's conviction for continuous sexual abuse of a child was proper because the trial court did not erred by allowing defendant's brother to testify regarding what defendant's wife told the brother about an alleged extraneous sexual offense since the brother testified that defendant was not the type of person who would abuse children. Therefore, it was permissible for the State to cross-examine the brother regarding his awareness of relevant specific instances of defendant's conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a). Lopez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 338 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 3 2013).

55. Incidents about which appellant wanted to introduce testimony did not implicate himself, and the victim did not make any threat toward him, nor did the victim's prior conduct show that he had any animosity toward appellant, and the evidence was not probative of the victim's state of mind as it related to the situation with appellant two years after the incidents took place, given that before the shooting, the two did not know each other; while appellant could introduce reputation or opinion testimony suggesting the victim was the first aggressor, appellant could not introduce specific acts because that was not admissible for these purposes, and nothing showed that the proffered testimony would have been relevant for any purpose besides character conformity, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Bottorff v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8220, 2012 WL 4477396 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 28 2012).

56. Appellant wanted to offer evidence of specific instances of conduct of the victim, but he was not entitled to offer evidence of any specific prior violent acts in order to show the victim was the first aggressor; the proffered testimony was an attempt to prove the victim's conduct in conformity with his character for violence, which was prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 404(a), 405(a). Bottorff v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8220, 2012 WL 4477396 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 28 2012).

57. In defendant's murder case, the court did not erroneously exclude evidence regarding the victim's violent character because the evidence did not tend to show that the victim was the first aggressor; the fact that victim once told a witness that he would "take care of her husband and brother if they came looking for her" did not serve to demonstrate the victim's intent the night of the murder. Defendant's preferred testimony that the victim was a member of a prison gang that was "running fast" and "doing hits" was similarly irrelevant other than to show the victim's character conformity. Vasquez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7428, 2012 WL 6863860 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 27 2012).

58. In a murder trial, it was error to exclude evidence of defendant's peaceful character through a friend who had known him for almost 30 years. Turner v. State, 413 S.W.3d 442, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6619 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 9 2012).

59. Defendant could only offer evidence of his good character trait as a non-drug user in the form of reputation or opinion testimony, and evidence that showed defendant passed a drug test was evidence in the form of a specific instance of conduct, and thus was inadmissible character evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 405; the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding this evidence. Arreola v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4166, 2012 WL 1868680 (Tex. App. Eastland May 24 2012).

60. State was allowed to rebut testimony about appellant's character for truthfulness by asking about specific conduct instances, and appellant did not claim they were irrelevant, and they shared many similarities; the court is aware of no authority that restricts the State from asking whether the witness had heard that the defendant was convicted of a particular crime. Ethridge v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3110, 2012 WL 1379648 (Tex. App. Tyler

Apr. 18 2012).

61. In a murder trial where defendant claimed he acted in self-defense, the trial court did not err by excluding testimony from a psychologist regarding the victim's acts of violence because the psychologist's knowledge of any acts committed by the victim came entirely from his review of the medical records which were not admitted into evidence. While specific acts of violent conduct committed by a victim were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and 405 to show the victim was the aggressor and defendant acted in self-defense, the psychologist's testimony that the victim had attacked his doctor and others would not have been relevant for any purpose other than character conformity. Mason v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2314, 2012 WL 1058792 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 22 2012).

62. Witness was asked her opinion of the kind of person appellant was, and the witness responded that he was a "good guy," and the court did not find this testimony could be interpreted so broadly as to have implied that he never engaged in criminal conduct, and thus the testimony did not create a false impression of law abiding conduct; however, it was permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 405 for the State to test the witness's knowledge about specific instances of conduct by asking "did you know" questions, and the court found no error in the admission of the testimony concerning a previous conviction. Hernandez v. State, 351 S.W.3d 156, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7297 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 7 2011).

63. Even assuming evidence was erroneously admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 405, the error was harmless because another witness was questioned about appellant's past criminal history and the jury was given much information about such history, to which there was no defense objection. Hernandez v. State, 351 S.W.3d 156, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7297 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 7 2011).

64. Appellant provided a general discussion on the application of Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404, and 405, most of which was not germane to the punishment phase, but he failed to specify the bad acts or extraneous offenses he found inadmissible or provide any references to their admission over objection; in the absence of references and citation of authority, this complaint under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a) was waived. Crutchfield v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4490, 2011 WL 2420380 (Tex. App. Tyler June 15 2011).

65. Use of the words depicted in the tattoos to show the complainant was a bad person and that he acted in conformity with his bad character during the altercation weighed against admission, as this would have been improper; because the words presented a danger of unfair prejudice, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Smith v. State, 355 S.W.3d 138, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2426 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2011).

66. In an aggravated assault case under Tex. Penal Code Ann. §§ 22.01(a)(1) and 22.02(a), defendant was not entitled to use a specific act of violence to show that the victim was the first aggressor as only opinion and reputation testimony was admissible to show the victim's character for violence and defendant's use was an attempt to prove that the victim's conduct in conformity with his violent character, which Tex. R. Evid. 404(a) and 405(a) prohibited; also, the record did not suggest that defendant attempted to use a witness's testimony that the victim had choked her for any admissible purpose. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the witness's testimony. Hawthorne v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1728, 2011 WL 846121 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 9 2011).

67. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to introduce evidence of the meaning of the victim's teardrop tattoo because defendant's determination that he needed to shoot the victim in self-defense could not have been based on apprehension of the victim's previous violent acts or reputation as demonstrated by the tattoo because defendant was unaware of the victim's teardrop tattoo. Hines v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 950, 2011

WL 494737 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 10 2011).

68. Counsel asked a witness about the decedent's reputation, but the witness twice said he did not know and the trial court halted any further questioning; based on the record, the court found that appellant failed to lay the proper predicate that the witness was substantially familiar with the decedent's reputation for aggression, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 405(a), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to permit further questioning, and appellant's right to compel favorable witnesses under U.S. Const. amend. VI was not violated. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8834, 2010 WL 4361885 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 4 2010).

69. Even though the substance of the proposed testimony regarding prior violent acts by the decedent appeared in the record through affidavits attached to appellant's motion for a new trial, the court was faced with the issue, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103(b), that the evidence was not offered at trial, and the trial court did not have the opportunity to rule on the admissibility of the testimony, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a); absent a ruling by the trial court on the portion of the evidence of which appellant complained, the court had no cognizable complaint on which to pass judgment, and appellant waived this issue. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8834, 2010 WL 4361885 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 4 2010).

70. Testimony of appellant's witnesses that they believed appellant could abide by community supervision conditions under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 42.12, § 11, and testimony that appellant was not a drug dealer and had not received text messages referencing drugs entitled the State to cross-examine these witnesses with "did you know" questions regarding the details of appellant's arrest and his receipt of drug-related text messages, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1). Barrientos v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8879, 2010 WL 4395423 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 4 2010).

71. After a witness testified at a punishment hearing in an aggravated assault case that defendant was a good person who needed counseling, the State's "have you heard" questions relating to defendant's history of domestic violence were proper under Tex. R. Evid. 405; thus, counsel was not ineffective for failing to raise objections that would have been overruled. Worry v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3307, 2010 WL 1784022 (Tex. App. Tyler May 5 2010).

72. Court properly excluded character evidence because defendant testified that the victim told him "he's been in a lot of fights and that he's been in trouble for fighting." That general statement was not sufficient to establish that defendant was aware that the victim had committed an assault for which he was placed on deferred adjudication community supervision. Evans v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 810, 2010 WL 376940 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 3 2010).

73. In defendant's murder case, the court properly excluded evidence that the victim purportedly was always armed with a gun because defendant failed to satisfy his burden of producing evidence demonstrating his shooting of the victim stemmed from a reasonable belief that the victim was attempting to use unlawful deadly force at that exact moment, the two had no prior relationship, and the trial court did permit defendant to establish that the victim's reputation in the community for violence was bad. Welch v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6292, 2009 WL 2461172 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 12 2009).

74. Court did not err by refusing to allow defense counsel to cross-examine a police officer about prior incidents in which the officer allegedly used excessive force because the officer's character was not an essential element of the charge, claim, or defense to attempting to take a weapon from a peace officer, and the proffered testimony was not material because it did not address any fact of importance to the outcome of the action. Rico v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4141, 2009 WL 1623343 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 11 2009).

75. In a case in which defendant was convicted of violating the terms of his civil conviction under the Texas Civil Commitment of Sexually Violent Predators Act, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. ch. 841, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence of specific instances of defendant's compliance with his commitment order because that evidence was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a), 405(a). Moreover, because the State did not ever imply that defendant had violated the terms of commitment before the charged offenses, the State did not open the door to evidence of defendant's compliance prior to those offenses. Jones v. State, 333 S.W.3d 615, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3997 (Tex. App. Dallas May 29 2009).

76. In defendant's murder case, the trial court did not err in allowing testimony about defendant's character because defendant's case was based on the defensive theory that the victim was the first aggressor and that defendant acted in self-defense and in defense of his mother. The State was allowed to rebut that with character evidence that defendant was aggressive and not protective toward his mother. Henricks v. State, 293 S.W.3d 267, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3562 (Tex. App. Eastland May 21 2009).

77. To the extent that Hardman v. State suggests that prior convictions or specific acts of misconduct are admissible to prove the violent character of the deceased in a self-defense case, it is contrary to the cited opinions of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals. Nolan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8662 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 31 2008).

78. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2), 405, the trial court did not err in refusing to allow defendant to offer evidence of the victim's two assault convictions; the mere fact that the victim assaulted another in 2001 did not suggest any intent or motive for the victim to attack defendant years later, no connection was shown with the victim's more recent assault conviction and the events in question, and neither conviction was relevant to demonstrate either the reasonableness of defendant's fear of danger, for self-defense purposes, or that the victim was the first aggressor. Nolan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8662 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 31 2008).

79. Both character evidence in the form of opinion testimony and extraneous-offense testimony may be admissible during trial, even if the opinion testimony is based on facts brought forth from the extraneous-offense testimony. Sims v. State, 273 S.W.3d 291, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 820 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

80. Defendant was not substantially harmed by the trial court's error in admitting a witness's reputation testimony because evidence of the victim's character as a peaceful person was properly presented to the jury. Cruz v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9002 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 15 2007).

81. Appellate court had reversed the judgment of conviction, holding that the trial court erred in permitting the State to ask a witness "were you aware" questions, but none of the cases relied on by the appellate court supported its holding that the witness's nonresponsive and volunteered testimony did not open the door to character evidence; the witness offered evidence of defendant's character through her statement that he was a good and sweet boy, and although defendant did not intentionally elicit this character testimony, the nonresponsiveness of the statement did not change the fact that it was character evidence offered by a defense witness, and the trial court correctly permitted the State to rebut this evidence with evidence of defendant's prior convictions. Harrison v. State, 241 S.W.3d 23, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1226 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

82. Under Tex. R. Evid. 405, if the defendant offers evidence of his good character, the prosecution can introduce its own character evidence to rebut the implications of the defendant's character evidence; there is no nonresponsiveness exception to this right. Harrison v. State, 241 S.W.3d 23, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1226 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

83. Trial court did not err when it permitted the State to ask defendant's sister if she knew that he had been arrested for two other criminal offenses because the questions were not impermissible on the ground that it was not shown that defendant was convicted of the offenses as the question was a test of the witness's knowledge of the facts and circumstances of defendant's life; defendant did not show that the State lacked a factual basis for the questions. Thomas v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7203 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 31 2007).

84. Defendant sought to introduce evidence that the victim's involvement in a gay dating service was admissible as character evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 405, but the character trait essential to the defense was not whether the victim was a sexually active person, but whether he was a violent person capable of sexually assaulting another man, and the fact that the victim participated in a dating service was irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401 to this inquiry, and the victim's participation in the service was not admissible as character evidence; it was also not improper to rule against its admission for purposes of proving intent and motive for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), and evidence proving an individual used a dating service in no way tends to prove the individual had the intent or motive to rape someone who would not consent to sexual relations. Arredondo v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6686 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 22 2007).

85. In a case where two people were being tried for aggravated sexual abuse of a child, "have you heard" questions under Tex. R. Evid. 405 were properly asked when witnesses testified about the character of the co-defendant; defendant failed to request a limiting instruction under Tex. R. Evid. 105, so she could not challenge the issue on appeal; the evidence was not offered to prove the extraneous offense, but to test the qualification of the witnesses to testify regarding character. Little v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4194 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 30 2007).

86. In a case charging that defendant kidnapped a car salesperson to collect a debt, defendant should have been permitted to introduce testimony from five business associates that defendant was an honest, non-violent businessperson, whom they trusted; the error in excluding the evidence required reversal under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because the excluded evidence went to the heart of defendant's sole defense, that, in light of the opinions given by the business associates, it was unlikely that defendant would kidnap someone in an effort to collect a debt. Melgar v. State, 236 S.W.3d 302, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2207 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

87. In a retaliation case that involved a threat against a witness, the trial court properly allowed defendant's sister to be cross-examined under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) regarding her knowledge of a prior offense after she testified that defendant was not the kind of person to carry out such a threat. Whitehead v. State, 220 S.W.3d 171, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1989 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

88. Even assuming defendant's assertion that defense counsel needed an additional objection during defendant's cross-examination was correct, defendant had to show that the evidence was inadmissible for purposes of an ineffective assistance of counsel claim; a defense witness testified that defendant was nonviolent and defendant testified to not carrying a gun, so defendant failed to show that the references to extraneous offenses were inadmissible for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 405(a). Cooper v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1230 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 20 2007).

89. Court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel; the court assumed a strategic motive of counsel given the silent record, defendant failed to show that counsel's alleged failures to object were unreasonable and (1) it was reasonable for counsel to have found that certain evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 803(2), given that defendant's wife was extremely upset and nervous when talking to an officer about the incident, (2) counsel could have found that protective orders and testimony concerning defendant's wife's applying for the orders were not proof of extraneous offenses under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), given that they were issued in response to the same conduct that defendant was on trial for, (3) counsel could have found that defendant's wife's father's testimony opened the door to cross-examination regarding defendant's character by referencing specific examples of defendant's conduct for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 405, and (4) counsel might have believed that the wife's inconsistent statements were admissible to impeach her testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Romero v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10723 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 15 2006).

90. During the punishment stage of defendant's murder trial, his wife testified that he was a loving husband and a wonderful father; the State was permitted to question defendant's wife about going to the police department to file a report against defendant for assault to rebut her testimony of defendant's good character. Banks v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8901 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 5 2006).

91. It was not an error for the trial court to overrule defendant's objections, during the punishment phase, to questions the State asked a witness regarding a criminal charge against defendant that had been dismissed because by raising the defensive theory that defendant was a nice guy or of good character, defendant, through the witness, opened the door for the State to cross-examine the witness regarding an extraneous offense if the extraneous offense would tend to correct the false impression left by the witness's direct examination. Romero v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7552 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 24 2006).

92. During defendant's trial for cocaine possession, the trial court did not err in not allowing defendant to elicit testimony from his girlfriend that he did not use cocaine as evidence tending to prove that he would not have possessed the cocaine because the testimony was not being offered in the form of reputation or opinion testimony and, thus, was inadmissible character evidence. Norton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2006).

93. Drug use is not an essential element of the crime of possession of a controlled substance; a defendant may not, therefore, use specific instances of drug use; rather, he may only use reputation or opinion testimony to prove his good character. Norton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 28 2006).

94. Where a defense witness testified during defendant's indecent exposure trial that defendant's reputation for truthfulness was excellent and that she had never witnessed anything inappropriate about him, under Tex. R. Evid. 405, it was proper for the State to counter that testimony by inquiring whether the witness was familiar with any specific instances of untruthful or inappropriate conduct by defendant. Tennison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2120 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 16 2006).

95. In connection with defendant's trial for indecency with a child, because defense counsel's questions to defendant's mother inquired about his character for moral and safe relations with small children and young girls, not his general character, the State's questions related to defendant's prior robbery conviction were not relevant for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) and were not proper impeachment questions. However, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because evidence of the robbery conviction was properly admitted later during defendant's testimony and on cross-examination, it did not appear that defendant was forced to take the stand to explain the robbery conviction, and once defendant took the stand, the State could have impeached defendant's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) by introducing evidence of the robbery conviction. Reeders v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7682 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 14 2005).

96. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the officers' testimony regarding their opinions of defendant's bad character where, in the officer's 26 years of law enforcement, he was familiar with defendant, he had experience with defendant, and had been familiar with him for "several years." Smith v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6567 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 18 2005).

97. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court assumed the admission of pornographic photographs of adult women taken from his computer was erroneous. The State argued that defendant "opened the door" to the admission of the photographs when he told the jury that sexually assaulting a child was against his morals. Breland v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5925 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 28 2005).

98. Defendant did not place character or reputation at issue through a particular witness's testimony, and thus the State should not have been allowed, under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a), 404(a)(1), to ask the witness "were you aware" questions, and although the court did not approve of the prosecution's arguments, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because the error probably did not influence the jury or had only a slight influence on the jury's verdict. Harrison v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5705 (Tex. App. Waco July 20 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at, review dismissed by 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8654 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 19, 2005).

99. Direct testimony regarding specific instances of conduct was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(1)(A), 405(b) because one's character trait was not an essential element of a theft charge; defendant did not segregate and offer the admissible evidence, and thus the trial court did not err in refusing to admit the evidence in defendant's theft trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 31.03(a). Biagas v. State, 177 S.W.3d 161, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 947 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

100. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit evidence of the victim's violent character under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(2), 405(a) in connection with defendant's murder trial; defendant failed to provide any evidence that connected the victim's previous violent acts with the events leading up to the victim's murder or any evidence that shed light on the victim's state of mind or intention in inciting the altercation with defendant. Toledo v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9596 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 28 2004).

101. In a retaliation case, a court properly refused to allow defendant to question the State's character witnesses as to the victim's prior crimes where the remoteness of the prior convictions tended to diminish any potential they might have for impressing the jury in some improper manner, defendant called other witnesses who testified that the victim's character for truthfulness was not good, and thus, his need to cross-examine the State's witnesses regarding the victim's prior convictions was lessened. Moore v. State, 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

102. In defendant's retaliation case, the error in sustaining the State's objection to defendant's impeachment of the State's character witness was harmless; three defense witnesses testified that the victim had a poor character for truthfulness and defendant further impeached the victim with a prior inconsistent statement, but the victim's testimony regarding the elements of the offense was corroborated by several other witnesses, and was contradicted only by defendant's bald denials. Moore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3017 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Waco July 21, 2004), substituted opinion at 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

103. Testimony of an assistant district attorney regarding her opinion of a defendant's character, which was formed based upon two separate child protective services investigations, was properly admitted during the punishment phase of the trial under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) where the witness based her opinion on facts that occurred prior to the day of the charged offense and was familiar with the underlying facts or information on which her opinion was based. The State was not required to show that the opinion was based upon a community observation or talking to people in the community. Hollingsworth v. State, 15 S.W.3d 586, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 2033 (Tex. App. Austin 2000).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

104. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, the victim's testimony regarding prior incidents of abuse was properly admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 38.37 and Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404, 405. Because defendant had lived with the victim's family for five years, the extraneous acts evidence helped to support the victim's credibility by placing the events in context. Allred v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3118 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 20 2006).

105. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, the victim's testimony regarding prior incidents of abuse was properly admitted; because defendant had lived with the victim's family for five years, the extraneous acts evidence helped to support the victim's credibility by placing the events in context. Allred v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3118 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 20 2006).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

106. Defendant's counsel was ineffective for opening the door to allow the State to introduce evidence of his prior convictions of sexual assault and sexual assault of a child by asking defendant's ex-girlfriend whether defendant was a violent person and she responded that he was not; therefore, on cross-examination the State was permitted to ask the ex-girlfriend whether she knew that defendant had pleaded guilty to two prior sexual assaults, allowing prejudicial and otherwise inadmissible evidence to be presented before the jury, which could not be considered sound trial strategy. The court held that defendant was prejudiced because the credibility of defendant's testimony was a key component of his defense strategy, given that he claimed he was trying to get away from the victim and had no intention of hurting anyone; although the trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction as to how it could consider the prior convictions, the instruction specifically allowed the jury to consider the convictions for the sole purpose of determining defendant's character for violence. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6365, 2013 WL 2301989 (Tex. App. Eastland May 23 2013).

107. In a murder trial where defendant claimed he acted in self-defense, the trial court did not err by excluding testimony from a psychologist regarding the victim's acts of violence because the psychologist's knowledge of any acts committed by the victim came entirely from his review of the medical records which were not admitted into evidence. While specific acts of violent conduct committed by a victim were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404 and 405 to show the victim was the aggressor and defendant acted in self-defense, the psychologist's testimony that the victim had attacked his doctor and others would not have been relevant for any purpose other than character conformity. Mason v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2314, 2012 WL 1058792 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 22 2012).

108. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to introduce evidence of the meaning of the victim's teardrop tattoo because defendant's determination that he needed to shoot the victim in self-defense could not have been based on apprehension of the victim's previous violent acts or reputation as demonstrated by the tattoo because defendant was unaware of the victim's teardrop tattoo. Hines v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 950, 2011 WL 494737 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 10 2011).

109. Court properly excluded character evidence because defendant testified that the victim told him "he's been in a lot of fights and that he's been in trouble for fighting." That general statement was not sufficient to establish that defendant was aware that the victim had committed an assault for which he was placed on deferred adjudication community supervision. Evans v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 810, 2010 WL 376940 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 3 2010).

110. In defendant's murder case, the court properly excluded evidence that the victim purportedly was always armed with a gun because defendant failed to satisfy his burden of producing evidence demonstrating his shooting of the victim stemmed from a reasonable belief that the victim was attempting to use unlawful deadly force at that exact moment, the two had no prior relationship, and the trial court did permit defendant to establish that the victim's reputation in the community for violence was bad. Welch v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6292, 2009 WL 2461172 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 12 2009).

111. In defendant's murder case, the court properly excluded evidence that the victim purportedly was always armed with a gun because defendant failed to satisfy his burden of producing evidence demonstrating his shooting of the victim stemmed from a reasonable belief that the victim was attempting to use unlawful deadly force at that exact moment, the two had no prior relationship, and the trial court did permit defendant to establish that the victim's reputation in the community for violence was bad. Welch v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6292, 2009 WL 2461172 (Tex. App. Beaumont Aug. 12 2009).

112. In a case involving aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve error relating to the admission of testimony from the mother of the victim that the family had moved many times to get away from defendant's violent behavior. Although defendant argued to a trial court that he had not opened the door to evidence of abuse by cross-examining the mother, he did not object that admission of the evidence violated Tex. R. Evid. 403, Tex. R. Evid. 404, and Tex. R. Evid. 405, as he argued on appeal. Gamble v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2134, 2009 WL 806879 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 27 2009).

113. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted evidence about defendant shoving his son, the complainant's brother, during an argument with the complainant because, although it was not physical violence against the complainant, it occurred within the context of acts of violence by defendant against her and was further evidence of defendant's attempts to keep his son out of the relationship between him and his daughter. Mayer v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9483 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 18 2008).

114. In a murder trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 404, 405 in excluding evidence of the victim's gang involvement. Assuming that the victim shot at defendant, doing so was an unambiguous act of aggression and violence that needed no explanation; thus, the proffered testimony did nothing more than show character conformity. London v. State, 325 S.W.3d 197, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9039 (Tex. App. Dallas 2008).

115. Defendant in a methamphetamine possession case failed to show that his counsel was ineffective when evidence of an extraneous offense of manufacture of controlled substance was admitted during the punishment phase under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07. Counsel only told defendant he would not be indicted for the extraneous offense, not that it was inadmissible. Talbert v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5697 (Tex. App. Eastland July 31 2008).

116. Both character evidence in the form of opinion testimony and extraneous-offense testimony may be admissible during trial, even if the opinion testimony is based on facts brought forth from the extraneous-offense testimony. Sims v. State, 273 S.W.3d 291, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 820 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

117. Complainant testified that defendant fondled and kissed her in an escalating fashion when she was between the ages of six and 10, that he felt her under her clothes when she was 10, and that he had sexual intercourse with her when she was 13. Because the testimony was relevant to the state of mind of the complainant and defendant, as well as to the previous and subsequent relationship between the complainant and defendant, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.37, § 2, the trial court did not err in admitting the extraneous offense evidence. Parker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8834 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 12 2006).

118. Where a defense witness testified during defendant's indecent exposure trial that defendant's reputation for truthfulness was excellent and that she had never witnessed anything inappropriate about him, under Tex. R. Evid. 405, it was proper for the State to counter that testimony by inquiring whether the witness was familiar with any specific instances of untruthful or inappropriate conduct by defendant. Tennison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2120 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 16 2006).

119. Where defendant was tried for aiding seven men escape from prison, evidence of the post-escape crimes committed by the seven men bore heavily upon defendant's character and moral blameworthiness; the evidence was admissible to help the jury determine an appropriate sentence for defendant's crimes. Rodriguez v. State, 163 S.W.3d 115, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1084 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

120. Defendant's prior crimes or bad acts could be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, intent, plan, knowledge, or lack of mistake or accident, and when a defendant claimed self-defense, the State could introduce evidence of other violent acts where the defendant was an aggressor in order to show intent, and the appellate court saw no reason to depart from precedent and found that the trial court properly admitted the evidence of the extraneous offenses. Hamilton v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5444 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 16 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

121. Court did not err by refusing to allow defense counsel to cross-examine a police officer about prior incidents in which the officer allegedly used excessive force because the officer's character was not an essential element of the charge, claim, or defense to attempting to take a weapon from a peace officer, and the proffered testimony was not material because it did not address any fact of importance to the outcome of the action. Rico v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4141, 2009 WL 1623343 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 11 2009).

122. Where defendant was tried for aiding seven men escape from prison, evidence of the post-escape crimes committed by the seven men bore heavily upon defendant's character and moral blameworthiness; the evidence was admissible to help the jury determine an appropriate sentence for defendant's crimes. Rodriguez v. State, 163 S.W.3d 115, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1084 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : General Overview

123. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the court properly admitted evidence about defendant shoving his son, the complainant's brother, during an argument with the complainant because, although it was not physical violence against the complainant, it occurred within the context of acts of violence by defendant against her and was further evidence of defendant's attempts to keep his son out of the relationship between him and his daughter. Mayer v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9483 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 18 2008).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Acts

124. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of his young daughter, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404, 405; Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, section 3(a) in admitting punishment evidence regarding defendant's sexual activity as a minor with a younger cousin and sibling; the State legitimately could use the evidence to demonstrate that defendant's adult sexual misconduct was deeply rooted in his childhood and not a new manifestation of a recent relapse into drug use. Fox v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1205, 2011 WL 582726 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 17 2011).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Crimes : General Overview

125. In a trial for child sexual assault, testimony about extraneous acts was properly admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 38.37, notwithstanding Tex. R. Evid. 404 and 405. The testimony from a complainant, defendant's stepdaughter, concerned two sexual encounters and was highly probative of both defendant's intent to engage in the charged offenses and the states of mind of defendant and the stepdaughter. Miller v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6227 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 4 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Crimes : Child Molestation Cases

126. In a prosecution for aggravated sexual assault, the trial court did not err in admitting evidence of extraneous acts of child sexual abuse that occurred in another county because the court instructed that the jury could not consider testimony regarding defendant having committed extraneous offenses for any purpose unless it found and believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed such other offenses and that it could only consider the testimony for the specific purposes listed in the charge, including its bearing on the previous and subsequent relationship between the defendant and the child. Foley v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14638, 2013 WL 6244540 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 3 2013).

127. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, the victim's testimony regarding prior incidents of abuse was properly admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. art. 38.37 and Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404, 405. Because defendant had lived with the victim's family for five years, the extraneous acts evidence helped to support the victim's credibility by placing the events in context. Allred v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3118 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 20 2006).

128. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, the victim's testimony regarding prior incidents of abuse was properly admitted; because defendant had lived with the victim's family for five years, the extraneous acts evidence helped to support the victim's credibility by placing the events in context. Allred v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3118 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 20 2006).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Autopsies

129. In an assault trial, it was proper under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 § 3(a) and Tex. R. Evid. 405, to admit an autopsy photo of a child victim in a prior manslaughter conviction; although the photograph may have been disturbing, it depicted nothing more than the reality of the crime committed. Aragon v. State, 229 S.W.3d 716, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 871 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : General Overview

130. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the officers' testimony regarding their opinions of defendant's bad character where, in the officer's 26 years of law enforcement, he was familiar with defendant, he had experience with defendant, and had been familiar with him for "several years." Smith v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6567 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 18 2005).

131. In a murder case, evidence of defendant's cocaine dealing was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a) to rebut character evidence that defendant was not violent. Taylor v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2338 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 10, 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : Opinion & Reputation

132. In a murder trial court, it was error to exclude a defense witness's opinion of a State witness's truthfulness because the opinion was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a); unlike Tex. R. Evid. 405(a), Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) imposed no requirement, when the witness to be impeached was not the accused, that the impeaching witness be familiar with the reputation of the impeached witness or with the underlying facts or information upon which the opinion was based. Peterson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10431 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Conduct

133. In a murder trial, there was no error in excluding a witness's testimony regarding prior acts of violence against her by the victim to rebut another witness's testimony that he had never known the victim to be violent in the past.

Because of the remoteness of the victim's acts and subsequent conviction, the excluded testimony had less probative value to rebut testimony about a more recent observation of the victim's character. Turner v. State, 413 S.W.3d 442, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6619 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 9 2012).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Opinion Testimony : General Overview

134. In a murder case in which defendant claimed self-defense, the trial court did not err by excluding evidence of the victim's prior arrest for a possible domestic situation; because nothing in the record showed defendant was aware that the victim had been arrested, the prior conduct was not admissible as "communicated character" evidence. "Uncommunicated character" evidence was available only through reputation and opinion testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 405(a). Pointer v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4658 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 11 2013).

Contracts Law : Remedies : Specific Performance

1. In a collection suit by a creditor that purchased the debt from a credit card company, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the deposition of the creditor's employee concerning a different case because that deposition did not pertain to the credit card company. The deposition was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 406. Simien v. Unifund Ccr Partners, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2687, 2010 WL 1492267 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 15 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Briefs

2. In a case involving cruelty to animals, defendant failed to adequately brief an error alleging that she was not allowed to present evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 406 regarding her past practice of caring for other animals; defendant did not present any legal authority or citation in support of her assertion that the trial court committed reversible error in denying her presentation of this evidence or that she was prevented from presenting a complete defense, which deprived her of due process. Moreover, she did not address any of the governing legal principles supporting her argument that the trial court committed error nor did she apply them to the facts of the case; also, her conclusory statements that contained no authority presented nothing for appellate review. Vavrecka v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 474, 2009 WL 179203 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 27 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Cognizable Issues : General Overview

3. State court could not admit testimony concerning the fact that a murder victim had once stopped to help change a stranded motorist's tire under Tex. R. Evid. 406: (1) for purposes of applying that rule, "habit" refers to a specific reaction to a specific set of stimuli that is reflexive, repeated, and invariable in nature; and (2) the testimony referred to one instance involving operative facts that were dissimilar from the action which the prosecution sought to establish, which was that the victim stopped and picked up his hitchhiking killer just prior to his murder. The admission of the evidence, even if erroneous, did not amount to a cognizable U.S. Const. amend. VIII, XIV, violation for purposes of obtaining federal habeas corpus relief for the convicted killer because the evidence was cumulative of other evidence that was admitted without objection at the murder trial. Pursley v. Dretke, 114 Fed. Appx. 630, 2004 U.S. App. LEXIS 24094 (5th Cir. Tex. 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 986, 125 S. Ct. 1859, 161 L. 5. Defendant's contention that the trial court erred by not allowing her to present testimony regarding her drinking habits was rejected because she testified without objection that she always carried cash for a taxi, had a taxi cab company programmed into her telephone, or shared a ride with another person, and counsel did not make an offer of proof regarding any additional evidence to be admitted. Pierce v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9876 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 7 2013).

6. Defendant's contention that the trial court erred by not allowing her to present testimony regarding her drinking habits was rejected because she testified without objection that she always carried cash for a taxi, had a taxi cab company programmed into her telephone, or shared a ride with another person, and counsel did not make an offer of proof regarding any additional evidence to be admitted. Pierce v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9876 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 7 2013).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

7. In a case in which a client sued an attorney and a law firm for breach of fiduciary duty, fraud, negligence (legal malpractice), and negligent misrepresentation, which was premised on the contention that the trial judge in the underlying action did not tell the attorney the parties would be limited to five days to try the case, the equal inference rule did not apply, and the trial court erred in granting no-evidence summary judgment on that ground because the record as a whole contained sufficient circumstantial evidence to enable a reasonable juror to infer that the alleged conversation in which the judge told the attorney he would limit trial time did not occur. The judge's testimony that it was his habit or practice not to limit the time to try a case, not to engage in substantive conversations about a case with only one side, and not to discuss pending cases in social settings, was evidence tending to make it less probable the purported conversation with the attorney occurred, and the pretrial history of the underlying litigation, together with the judge's testimony, taken as a whole and viewed in the light most favorable to the client, was sufficient to raise a fact issue on whether the judge made the alleged comment to the attorney. Total Clean, Llc v. Cox Smith Matthews, Inc., 330 S.W.3d 657, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8369 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 20 2010).

Evidence : Relevance : Routine Practices

8. During defendant's trial for intentionally or knowingly causing serious bodily injury to a child, his eight-month-old daughter, the court did not err in admitting evidence regarding his habitual alcohol use; evidence that he spoke with his wife that day about getting a divorce, along with evidence showing that he might have been under the influence of alcohol at the time of the incident, brought the admissibility of his behavior while under the influence of alcohol within the zone of reasonable disagreement. Guerrero v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10080, 2011 WL 6808314 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 22 2011).

9. Appellees' claimed that evidence of a company president's arrest and his actions was admissible to show intent, but his intent regarding agreements was not an issue in the case, plus nothing represented a routine practice of an organization or a regular response to a repeated situation. Nichols v. State, 349 S.W.3d 612, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7253 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 6 2011).

10. There was no abuse of discretion in the trial court's exclusion of the nurse's testimony, because although the nurse testified that she interacted with the doctor before the incident, she did not state what those interactions entailed, how often they occurred, or whether they consisted of consultations, and such testimony alone certainly did not establish the predicate for the admissibility of evidence of the doctor's habit or routine practice; to the extent that the testimony invoked the doctor's habit or routine practice in participating in consultations after the incident, that testimony would not suffice to establish the doctor's conduct on the day of the incident, as the doctor testified that he changed the way he communicated with nurses concerning consultations after the incident occurred. Ortiz v. Glusman, 334 S.W.3d 812, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1094 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 16 2011).

11. In a case in which a client sued an attorney and a law firm for breach of fiduciary duty, fraud, negligence (legal malpractice), and negligent misrepresentation, which was premised on the contention that the trial judge in the underlying action did not tell the attorney the parties would be limited to five days to try the case, the equal inference rule did not apply, and the trial court erred in granting no-evidence summary judgment on that ground because the record as a whole contained sufficient circumstantial evidence to enable a reasonable juror to infer that the alleged conversation in which the judge told the attorney he would limit trial time did not occur. The judge's testimony that it was his habit or practice not to limit the time to try a case, not to engage in substantive conversations about a case with only one side, and not to discuss pending cases in social settings, was evidence tending to make it less probable the purported conversation with the attorney occurred, and the pretrial history of the underlying litigation, together with the judge's testimony, taken as a whole and viewed in the light most favorable to the client, was sufficient to raise a fact issue on whether the judge made the alleged comment to the attorney. Total Clean, Llc v. Cox Smith Matthews, Inc., 330 S.W.3d 657, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8369 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 20 2010).

12. Employer was not entitled to writ of mandamus to compel arbitration with the employee, because although the employer provided admissible routine practice evidence that it had entered into a binding arbitration agreement with the employee, the employer was unable to provide the trial court with an arbitration agreement signed by the employee; the employer's proof was not conclusive. In re Astro Air, L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7550, 31 I.E.R. Cas. (BNA) 1046 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 15 2010).

13. Defendant's conviction for indecency with a child by contact was proper because he presented nothing for review regarding the testimony he sought to elicit on cross-examination and because he failed to establish that any prior allegations of abuse were both false and similar in nature to the allegations at issue in the current case. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding such evidence. Sosa v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4428, 2010 WL 2330304 (Tex. App. Austin June 10 2010).

14. In a case involving cruelty to animals, defendant failed to adequately brief an error alleging that she was not allowed to present evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 406 regarding her past practice of caring for other animals; defendant did not present any legal authority or citation in support of her assertion that the trial court committed reversible error in denying her presentation of this evidence or that she was prevented from presenting a complete defense, which deprived her of due process. Moreover, she did not address any of the governing legal principles supporting her argument that the trial court committed error nor did she apply them to the facts of the case; also, her conclusory statements that contained no authority presented nothing for appellate review. Vavrecka v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 474, 2009 WL 179203 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 27 2009).

15. Evidence that the victim's partner believed him to have sex with other men at the victim's clients' homes did not demonstrate a habitual behavior of raping men for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 406, and thus the trial court did not err in excluding it. Arredondo v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6686 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 22 2007).

16. State court could not admit testimony concerning the fact that a murder victim had once stopped to help change a stranded motorist's tire under Tex. R. Evid. 406: (1) for purposes of applying that rule, "habit" refers to a specific reaction to a specific set of stimuli that is reflexive, repeated, and invariable in nature; and (2) the testimony referred to one instance involving operative facts that were dissimilar from the action which the prosecution sought to establish, which was that the victim stopped and picked up his hitchhiking killer just prior to his murder. The admission of the evidence, even if erroneous, did not amount to a cognizable U.S. Const. amend. VIII, XIV, violation for purposes of obtaining federal habeas corpus relief for the convicted killer because the evidence was cumulative of other evidence that was admitted without objection at the murder trial. Pursley v. Dretke, 114 Fed. Appx. 630, 2004 U.S. App. LEXIS 24094 (5th Cir. Tex. 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 986, 125 S. Ct. 1859, 161 L. Ed. 2d 745, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 3133, 73 U.S.L.W. 3620 (2005).

17. Where defendant did not establish that the woman carried a knife with any degree of frequency and regularity, the appellate court could not say that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to admit her testimony as habit evidence since the testimony did not establish that carrying a knife for self-protection was a regular response to a repeated specific situation. Davis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6400 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 15 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 544 U.S. 1038, 125 S. Ct. 2265, 161 L. Ed. 2d 1069, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 4047, 73 U.S.L.W. 3672 (2005).

Rule 407 Subsequent Remedial Measures; Notification of Defect

(a) Subsequent Remedial Measures.--When measures are taken that would have made an earlier injury or harm less likely to occur, evidence of the subsequent measures is not admissible to prove:

-- negligence;

-- culpable conduct;

-- a defect in a product or its design; or

-- a need for a warning or instruction.

But the court may admit this evidence for another purpose, such as impeachment or - if disputed - proving ownership, control, or the feasibility of precautionary measures.

(b) Notification of Defect.--A manufacturer's written notification to a purchaser of a defect in one of its products is admissible against the manufacturer to prove the defect.

Comment to 2015 Restyling: Rule 407 previously provided that evidence was not excluded if offered for a purpose not explicitly prohibited by the Rule. To improve the language of the Rule, it now provides that the court may admit evidence if offered for a permissible purpose. There is no intent to change the process for admitting evidence covered by the Rule. It remains the case that if offered for an impermissible purpose, it must be excluded, and if offered for a purpose not barred by the Rule, its admissibility remains governed by the general principles of Rules 402, 403, 801, etc.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Harmless Error Rule

1. Evidence of subsequent remedial measures was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 407 in a premises liability case because there was no dispute about how the curb should have been painted where the injured party fell; however, the admission of this evidence was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a) because no contested issue was affected by the ruling. Christus Health Southeast Tex. v. Wilson, 305 S.W.3d 392, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 592 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 29 2010).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

2. Trial court did not act without guiding rules or principles when it determined that the Taproot Incident Report was inadmissible as a subsequent remedial measure; the report could not be used to show feasibility, there was cumulative evidence to the same effect, and the workers would not suffer unfair prejudice from its exclusion. Belmarez v. Formosa Plastics Corp., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7945, 2011 WL 4696750 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 30 2011).

Evidence : Relevance : Subsequent Remedial Measures

3. Claimant presented more than a scintilla of evidence that the property owner exercised control over the sidewalk where the injury occurred, because the claimant presented an invoice from a construction company addressed to the owner with a proposal to repair the sidewalk where the injury occurred, which showed that the owner solicited a bid and possibly undertook to repair the sidewalk after the claimant was injured; evidence of subsequent remedial measures was admissible to prove control when the issue was controverted. Cohen v. Landry's Inc., 442 S.W.3d 818, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 9136 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 19 2014).

4. Absent a request that the trial court admit evidence of a subsequent remedial measure with a limiting instruction under Tex. R. Evid. 105(b) that the jury could consider it only for the products liability claims, the trial court did not err in not admitting the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 407(a). Moreover, because the claimants did not argue at trial that the evidence was admissible to show control, they failed to preserve this argument for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Tidwell v. Terex Corp., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7724 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

5. In a negligence suit under the Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.S. § 30104, the trial court abused its discretion because it prohibited an injured seaman who slipped and fell on deck from impeaching the captain under Tex. R. Evid. 407(a) by questioning him about the subsequent painting of the boat's entire wooden deck with non-skid paint. The exclusion of this evidence was harmful, as the seaman was unable to effectively counter the false impression that non-skid paint should not be used on wooden decks. Hewitt v. Ryan Marine Servs., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6808, 2012 WL 3525408 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 16 2012).

6. Trial court did not act without guiding rules or principles when it determined that the Taproot Incident Report was inadmissible as a subsequent remedial measure; the report could not be used to show feasibility, there was cumulative evidence to the same effect, and the workers would not suffer unfair prejudice from its exclusion. Belmarez v. Formosa Plastics Corp., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7945, 2011 WL 4696750 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 30 2011).

7. In a product liability action against a tire manufacturer, the trial court was within its discretion in excluding evidence regarding nylon cap plies; the trial court was free to conclude that the feasibility exception in Tex. R. Evid. 407(a) did not apply since there was no testimony or other evidence demonstrating that the addition of a nylon cap ply, at some point after the accident, could have established the feasibility of a safer alternative design in 1997. Hathcock v. Hankook Tire Am. Corp., 330 S.W.3d 733, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 10032 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 17 2010).

8. In a product liability action, evidence of recall letters regarding a prescription pain patch were properly admissible in evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 407(b) for the purpose of determining whether the defect identified by a family's expert witnesses existed when the drug manufacturer put the patch into the decedent's hands. Alza Corp. v. Thompson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2347, 2010 WL 1254610 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 1 2010).

9. Tex. R. Evid. 407(b) allows a written ratification by a manufacturer of a product defect to be admitted against the manufacturer on the issue of existence of the defect to the extent that it is relevant. The fact that recall letters are admissible is settled by the existence of Rule 407(b).. Alza Corp. v. Thompson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2347, 2010 WL 1254610 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 1 2010).

10. Evidence of subsequent remedial measures was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 407 in a premises liability case because there was no dispute about how the curb should have been painted where the injured party fell; however, the admission of this evidence was harmless error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a) because no contested issue was affected by the ruling. Christus Health Southeast Tex. v. Wilson, 305 S.W.3d 392, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 592 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 29 2010).

11. In a premises liability suit, evidence of subsequent remedial measures taken by a store following a customer's injuries was inadmissible to show liability under Tex. R. Evid. 407; thus, the customer failed to show that the store had actual or constructive knowledge of the allegedly dangerous condition. Clark v. Lowe's Home Ctrs., Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9106 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 15 2007).

12. Evidence of subsequent remedial measures should not have been admitted to impeach the maintenance supervisor for the Texas Department of Transportation since the survivors tendered his testimony, however, the error in admitting other evidence of the subsequent remedial measures was rendered harmless because the survivors' exhibits, both in evidence after the Department's utterance of "no objection" to them, showed the trees, their location, and the sight lines before and after the trees were cut. While the two exhibits did not explicitly demonstrate that the Department cut the trees, a logical deduction was, and the jury could have properly concluded that, the trees, on the Department right-of-way, had been removed by the Department, and any error was rendered harmless if the objecting party subsequently permitted the same or similar evidence to be introduced without objection. Tex. DOT v. Pate, 170 S.W.3d 840, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6484 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

Torts : Negligence : Proof : Evidence : Prior & Subsequent Events

13. In a negligence suit under the Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.S. § 30104, the trial court abused its discretion because it prohibited an injured seaman who slipped and fell on deck from impeaching the captain under Tex. R. Evid. 407(a) by questioning him about the subsequent painting of the boat's entire wooden deck with non-skid paint. The exclusion of this evidence was harmful, as the seaman was unable to effectively counter the false impression that non-skid paint should not be used on wooden decks. Hewitt v. Ryan Marine Servs., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6808, 2012 WL 3525408 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 16 2012).

14. In a premises liability suit, evidence of subsequent remedial measures taken by a store following a customer's injuries was inadmissible to show liability under Tex. R. Evid. 407; thus, the customer failed to show that the store had actual or constructive knowledge of the allegedly dangerous condition. Clark v. Lowe's Home Ctrs., Inc., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9106 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 15 2007).

(2)conduct or statements made during compromise negotiations about the claim.

Comment to 2015 Restyling: Rule 408 previously provided that evidence was not excluded if offered for a purpose not explicitly prohibited by the Rule. To improve the language of the Rule, it now provides that the court may admit evidence if offered for a permissible purpose. There is no intent to change the process for admitting evidence covered by the Rule. It remains the case that if offered for an impermissible purpose, it must be excluded, and if offered for a purpose not barred by the Rule, its admissibility remains governed by the general principles of Rules 402, 403, 801, etc.

The reference to "liability" has been deleted on the ground that the deletion makes the Rule flow better and easier to read, and because "liability" is covered by the broader term "validity." Courts have not made substantive decisions on the basis of any distinction between validity and liability. No change in current practice or in the coverage of the Rule is intended.

Finally, the sentence of the Rule referring to evidence "otherwise discoverable" has been deleted as superfluous. The intent of the sentence was to prevent a party from trying to immunize admissible information, such as a pre-existing document, through the pretense of disclosing it during compromise negotiations. But even without the sentence, the Rule cannot be read to protect pre-existing information simply because it was presented to the adversary in compromise negotiations.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Relevance

1. Because settlement agreements were directly relevant to the settlement credit under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 33.012 and to potential witness bias under Tex. R. Evid. 408, their discovery by a non-settling defendant was authorized by Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.3(g), and production was required under Tex. R. Civ. P. 194.2(h), 194.3. Mandamus relief was appropriate from the partial denial of a motion to compel discovery because there was no adequate remedy on appeal. In re Univar USA, Inc., 311 S.W.3d 175, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2907 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 21 2010).

Civil Procedure : Settlements : Settlement Agreements : General Overview

2. Because the bus company sought to prove that the truck driver had an incentive to lie about the accident because he was a party-defendant to the suit at the time he gave his deposition testimony but had settled before the time of trial, it was not improper for the plaintiffs' counsel to argue that the truck driver had no incentive to lie about his recollection of events under this rule. Via Metro. Transit Auth. v. Barraza, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14609, 2013 WL 6255761 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 4 2013).

Civil Procedure : Pretrial Matters : Separate Trials

3. Because an insurer had offered to settle in full its insured's contract claims for underinsured motorist coverage, severance of the insured's claims under the policy from her extra-contractual bad faith claims was required to avoid the unfair dilemma of whether the insurer should include or exclude evidence of its settlement offer.

4. In a case against an insurer, a trial court abused its discretion in refusing to sever a contract claim from extracontractual claims because: (1) the claims were not inextricably intertwined; and (2) evidence of a settlement offer by the insurer would not be admissible on the contract claim under Tex. R. Evid. 408, and thus a fair trial on the contract claim would become unlikely. In re Allstate Ins. Co., 232 S.W.3d 340, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6428 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007).

5. Trial court erred in denying an insurer's motion to sever and abate a bad faith claim from a contract claim; because the insurer had made a settlement offer on the contract claim, severance and abatement were required to protect the insurer's right to exclude evidence of an offer to compromise as to the contract claim. In re Progressive County Mut. Ins. Co., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 889 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 8 2007).

Civil Procedure : Judgments : Relief From Judgment : Motions for New Trials

7. Agreed order in a medical disciplinary proceeding, which specified that it was a settlement agreement, was inadmissible in a medical malpractice case and thus did not constitute newly discovered evidence for purposes of a new trial. Allen v. Scott, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 572 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 25 2008).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review

8. In a personal injury case, failure to object waived a claim that statements made in compromise negotiations were inadmissible and were improperly admitted at a hearing on a motion to dismiss; an objection was required to preserve error, as provided in Tex. R. Evid. 408. Hamrick v. Lopez, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8113 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 11 2007).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion

9. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the property owner's May 12 letter from evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 408 because it was not a demand letter sufficient to trigger a forfeiture under the terms of the lease but rather was part of a settlement demand offered solely to prove the oil company's liability for forfeiture of the leases. Vinson Minerals, Ltd. v. Xto Energy, Inc., 335 S.W.3d 344, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9970, 179 Oil & Gas Rep. 1058 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2010).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Harmless Error Rule

10. Regardless of whether there was a basis on which the trial court could have admitted appellees' evidence of either settlement offer, appellees failed to explain how, under the circumstances, the exclusion of its proposed settlement offers probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment, as the jury awarded appellant damages well in excess of the settlement offers, and therefore, to the extent that there was any error in the exclusion of the settlement offers, such error was harmless. Wps, Inc. v. Expro Ams., Llc, 369 S.W.3d 384, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 892, 2012 WL 310937 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 31 2012).

Evidence : Relevance : Compromise & Settlement Negotiations

11. Documents relating to settlement negotiations were admissible to prove notice in an insurance coverage dispute. The documents could not be construed as a concession by either party and were not offered as evidence of an agreement acknowledging liability. Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's v. Chi. Bridge & Iron Co., 406 S.W.3d 326, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7856, 2013 WL 3270615 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 27 2013).

12. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in appellant driver's personal injury action by allowing a line of questioning pertaining to his ability to pay for future medical care for his injuries because appellant was not asked, and no evidence was admitted that showed that he settled with other defendants before trial or the amount of the settlement. Moreover, because appellant had raised the issue of his ability to pay on direct examination, the defense's questions challenging his stated reason on direct for the delay in treatment-inability to pay-were relevant for impeachment purposes, and why he delayed medical treatments was contested and relevant as to the appropriate amount of several categories of damages. Kosaka v. Hook & Anchor Marine & Watersports, LLC, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9487, 2012 WL 5476844 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 8 2012).

13. Under Tex. R. Evid. 408, the trial court did not err by admitting evidence that the contractor's buyer had ratified the lines transfer; the lines transfer was ratified in relation to all individuals and entities, including the creditors such as the contractor. Citizens Nat'l Bank of Tex. v. Nxs Constr., Inc., 387 S.W.3d 74, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9059 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 1 2012).

14. In appellee's action to establish that he was the record title owner of mineral estates, appellant introduced two correspondence packets from appellee's attorney. The correspondence was not inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 408, because the letters were clarifications of appellee's claims rather than offers of settlement or compromise. El Paso Prod. Oil & Gas Usa, L.P. v. Sellers, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6154, 2012 WL 3041327 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 26 2012).

15. In defendant's trial for possession of a controlled substance and endangering a child, the trial court did not err in admitting a polygraph examiner's testimony about defendant's pre-test statement. The statement was not inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 408, because Rule 408 was not applicable to any agreement between the State and defendant concerning her polygraph examination. Herbert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3126, 2012 WL 1366576 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 18 2012).

16. Regardless of whether there was a basis on which the trial court could have admitted appellees' evidence of either settlement offer, appellees failed to explain how, under the circumstances, the exclusion of its proposed settlement offers probably caused the rendition of an improper judgment, as the jury awarded appellant damages well in excess of the settlement offers, and therefore, to the extent that there was any error in the exclusion of the settlement offers, such error was harmless. Wps, Inc. v. Expro Ams., Llc, 369 S.W.3d 384, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 892, 2012 WL 310937 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 31 2012).

17. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid.408, an owner's settlement offer was offered to show that he attempted to pay his overdue assessments, late fees, and attorney fees, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of the offer; moreover, the same evidence was admitted earlier without objection, and even if the trial court abused its discretion, the issue was not preserved for appeal under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Hidden Forest Homeowners Ass'n v. Hern, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4313, 2011 WL 2238563 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 8 2011).

18. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the property owner's May 12 letter from evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 408 because it was not a demand letter sufficient to trigger a forfeiture under the terms of the lease but rather was part of a settlement demand offered solely to prove the oil company's liability for forfeiture of the leases. Vinson Minerals, Ltd. v. Xto Energy, Inc., 335 S.W.3d 344, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9970, 179 Oil & Gas Rep.

1058 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2010).

19. Defendant failed to preserve for review her assertion that the trial court erred in failing to hold a hearing on the voluntariness of her confession, because the issue regarding the voluntariness of the confession was not raised, the record revealed that the subject of defendant's confession was not mentioned during the pre-trial hearing, and trial counsel's initial objection did not put the trial court on notice that defendant was seeking to contest the voluntariness of her confession; nothing in Tex. R. Evid. 408 mentioned, alluded to, or could be considered to encompass the voluntariness of a confession. Crittenden v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3049 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 23 2010).

20. Because settlement agreements were directly relevant to the settlement credit under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 33.012 and to potential witness bias under Tex. R. Evid. 408, their discovery by a non-settling defendant was authorized by Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.3(g), and production was required under Tex. R. Civ. P. 194.2(h), 194.3. Mandamus relief was appropriate from the partial denial of a motion to compel discovery because there was no adequate remedy on appeal. In re Univar USA, Inc., 311 S.W.3d 175, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2907 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 21 2010).

21. In a case alleging negligent spraying of herbicide, the trial court's exclusion from evidence of a notice of violation, findings, and an order issued by the Texas Agriculture Commission could have been proper under either Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the evidence was potentially confusing or under Tex. R. Evid. 408 because it involved a settlement. Davis v. Jordan, 305 S.W.3d 895, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1151 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 17 2010).

22. In a father's suit to modify the parent-child relationship, the trial court did not err in allowing the mother's counsel to reference negotiations related to the parties' agreed modification of the property settlement provisions of their divorce decree because while settlement negotiations were inadmissible to prove a party's liability, they could be admitted for other reasons, such as establishing a party's state of mind. The statements at issue referred to a post-divorce agreed modification of the divorce decree, in which the mother agreed to release the father from a large portion of his financial obligations under the decree, and the mother took the position at trial that she had done so in an attempt to maintain a cooperative relationship for the child's sake after the parties' divorce. Silverman v. Johnson, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7176, 2009 WL 2902716 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 26 2009).

23. Although a lottery commission maintained that settlement letters were expressly excepted from disclosure under Tex. Gov't Code Ann. § 552.101 because they contained information considered confidential by judicial decision, there is, however, no judicially recognized privilege exempting settlement negotiations from disclosure, nor do Texas courts recognize a common-law right to withhold settlement negotiations as confidential communications; although settlement negotiations are inadmissible at trial to prove liability for or invalidity of a claim or its amount under Tex. R. Evid. 408, they are admissible for other purposes and are not exempt from discovery under the rules of civil procedure or evidence, as Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.3 allowed discovery of matters not privileged that were relevant and Tex. R. Evid. 408, 501-513 identified discovery privileges, none of which protects settlement negotiations. Abbott v. Gametech Int'l, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4554, 2009 WL 1708815 (Tex. App. Austin June 17 2009).

24. Agreed order in a medical disciplinary proceeding, which specified that it was a settlement agreement, was inadmissible in a medical malpractice case and thus did not constitute newly discovered evidence for purposes of a new trial. Allen v. Scott, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 572 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 25 2008).

25. In a personal injury case, failure to object waived a claim that statements made in compromise negotiations were inadmissible and were improperly admitted at a hearing on a motion to dismiss; an objection was required to preserve error, as provided in Tex. R. Evid. 408. Hamrick v. Lopez, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8113 (Tex. App.

Beaumont Oct. 11 2007).

26. In a case against an insurer, a trial court abused its discretion in refusing to sever a contract claim from extracontractual claims because: (1) the claims were not inextricably intertwined; and (2) evidence of a settlement offer by the insurer would not be admissible on the contract claim under Tex. R. Evid. 408, and thus a fair trial on the contract claim would become unlikely. In re Allstate Ins. Co., 232 S.W.3d 340, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6428 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007).

27. In this bench trial in which an employer challenged the reasonableness of the number of hours worked by the employee's attorney for attorney fee purposes under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the court was unable to find that the trial court abused its discretion by finding relevant settlement offers on the matter of whether the attorney's claim of the number of hours he worked was reasonable. Vernon v. CAC Distribs., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6294 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 9 2007).

28. Evidence was offered for aiding the trial court in determining the reasonableness of attorney fees under the Fair Labor Standards Act and the court was unable to conclude that the trial court abused its discretion by determining that Tex. R. Evid. 408 did not prohibit the admission of settlement negotiations on the limited matter of the reasonableness of the number of hours worked by the attorney; the trial court did not err in finding that Tex. R. Evid. 408 was not violated. Vernon v. CAC Distribs., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6294 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 9 2007).

29. Tex. R. Evid. 408 does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose. Vernon v. CAC Distribs., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6294 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 9 2007).

30. Denial of the relator's motion to sever was improper pursuant to Tex. R. Civ. P. 41 and 174(b) where the trial of the contractual claims, along with the bad faith claims would not have afforded the relator an adequate remedy by appeal. Given that the fact finder must consider the promptness of the relator's attempt to settle the claim in deciding the bad faith issue, the court was unpersuaded by the real parties' assertion that the settlement offer was irrelevant to the bad faith claim, Tex. R. Evid. 408. In re Allstate Tex. Lloyd's, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7333 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 2 2005).

31. With respect to breach of contract and promissory estoppel claims, a letter written in connection with the settlement of an unrelated lawsuit was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 as proof of an agreement to pay a claimed sum; hence, it was not barred by Tex. R. Evid. 408. MG Bldg. Materials, Ltd. v. Moses Lopez Custom Homes, Inc., 179 S.W.3d 51, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5796 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

32. In property owners' suit against an oil and gas lessee to recover damages caused to their surface estate by the lessee's operations at and reentry of an abandoned oil and gas well, the trial court had not erred in allowing the introduction of an unsolicited and unaccepted offer by the lessee to purchase one of the tracts of land as evidence of market value of the property because the offer did not constitute an inadmissible offer of settlement under Tex. R. Evid. 408. The offer stated specifically that it was not a settlement offer and did not ask the owners to compromise their claim in any way. Mieth v. Ranchquest, Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11938 (Mar. 17, 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

33. Trial court properly excluded evidence in defendant's trial for capital murder that defendant was offered a plea bargain of 55 years where such evidence was more prejudicial than probative because the different motives for the offer would confuse the jury. Prystash v. State, 3 S.W.3d 522, 1999 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 97 (Tex. Crim. App. 1999).

Evidence : Relevance : Pleas & Related Statements

34. Trial court properly excluded evidence in defendant's trial for capital murder that defendant was offered a plea bargain of 55 years where such evidence was more prejudicial than probative because the different motives for the offer would confuse the jury. Prystash v. State, 3 S.W.3d 522, 1999 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 97 (Tex. Crim. App. 1999).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

35. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in appellant driver's personal injury action by allowing a line of questioning pertaining to his ability to pay for future medical care for his injuries because appellant was not asked, and no evidence was admitted that showed that he settled with other defendants before trial or the amount of the settlement. Moreover, because appellant had raised the issue of his ability to pay on direct examination, the defense's questions challenging his stated reason on direct for the delay in treatment-inability to pay-were relevant for impeachment purposes, and why he delayed medical treatments was contested and relevant as to the appropriate amount of several categories of damages. 36. With respect to breach of contract and promissory estoppel claims, a letter written in connection with the settlement of an unrelated lawsuit was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 as proof of an agreement to pay a claimed sum; hence, it was not barred by Tex. R. Evid. 408. MG Bldg. Materials, Ltd. v. Moses Lopez Custom Homes, Inc., 179 S.W.3d 51, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5796 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

Evidence : Scientific Evidence : Polygraphs

37. In defendant's trial for possession of a controlled substance and endangering a child, the trial court did not err in admitting a polygraph examiner's testimony about defendant's pre-test statement. The statement was not inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 408, because Rule 408 was not applicable to any agreement between the State and defendant concerning her polygraph examination. Herbert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3126, 2012 WL 1366576 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 18 2012).

39. Determining whether an appeal regarding the sufficiency of an expert report under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.351(l) is frivolous, when the doctor has agreed to be sanctioned for the conduct at issue, does not relate to liability or validity of the claim or amount, and is therefore a permissible purpose for which a settlement agreement can be considered under Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 164.002(d) and Tex. R. Evid. 408. Even considering such a settlement agreement, a doctor asserted reasonable grounds and therefore his appeal was not frivolous. Kloeris v. Stockdale, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2317, 2010 WL 1241305 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 1 2010).

Insurance Law : Bad Faith & Extracontractual Liability : General Overview

40. Because an insurer had offered to settle in full its insured's contract claims for underinsured motorist coverage, severance of the insured's claims under the policy from her extra-contractual bad faith claims was required to avoid the unfair dilemma of whether the insurer should include or exclude evidence of its settlement offer.

41. Trial court erred in denying an insurer's motion to sever and abate a bad faith claim from a contract claim; because the insurer had made a settlement offer on the contract claim, severance and abatement were required to protect the insurer's right to exclude evidence of an offer to compromise as to the contract claim. In re Progressive County Mut. Ins. Co., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 889 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 8 2007).

Real Property Law : Property Valuation

42. Defendant's unaccepted offer to purchase permanently damaged property for its full value stated that it was not a settlement offer; because it was not a settlement offer, it did not have to be excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 408. However, the offer was irrelevant to the issue of fair market value and should have been excluded for that reason. Mieth v. Ranchquest, Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4601 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20 2004), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 177 S.W.3d 296, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2079 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Payment of Medical Expenses

1. Under Tex. R. Evid. 409, a tortfeasor may voluntarily pay the person it injures, and the payment cannot then be asserted as an admission that the tortfeasor was negligent. Therefore, the payments to the employee for medical and lost wages, and the employee's acceptance of them, did not raise evidence sufficient to prohibit the employee from enforcing the terms of the written agreement, in which he did not waive his right to sue the hospital. Silsbee Hosp., Inc. v. George, 163 S.W.3d 284, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3236 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

Rule 410 Pleas, Plea Discussions, and Related Statements

(a) Prohibited Uses in Civil Cases.--In a civil case, evidence of the following is not admissible against the defendant who made the plea or was a participant in the plea discussions:

(1)a guilty plea that was later withdrawn;

(2)a nolo contendere plea;

(3)a statement made during a proceeding on either of those pleas under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 11 or a comparable state procedure; or

(4)a statement made during plea discussions with an attorney for the prosecuting authority if the discussions did not result in a guilty plea or they resulted in a later-withdrawn guilty plea.

(b) Prohibited Uses in Criminal Cases.--In a criminal case, evidence of the following is not admissible against the defendant who made the plea or was a participant in the plea discussions:

(1)a guilty plea that was later withdrawn;

(2)a nolo contendere plea that was later withdrawn;

(3)a statement made during a proceeding on either of those pleas under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 11 or a comparable state procedure; or

(4)a statement made during plea discussions with an attorney for the prosecuting authority if the discussions did not result in a guilty or nolo contendere plea or they resulted in a later-withdrawn guilty or nolo contendere plea.

(c) Exception.--In a civil case, the court may admit a statement described in paragraph (a)(3) or (4) and in a criminal case, the court may admit a statement described in paragraph (b)(3) or (4), when another statement made during the same plea or plea discussions has been introduced and in fairness the statements ought to be considered together.

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Perjury : General Overview

1. PlPlea bargaining is statutorily recognized in Texas under Tex. Code Crim. P. art. 26.13(a)(2), but a "timely pass for plea" procedure, in which a defendant charged with murder entered a plea of guilty, and the trial court heard the case on stipulated facts, then announced a proposed decision with defendant being allowed to withdraw the plea if he was unhappy with the sentence, was not the equivalent of a plea negotiation within the meaning of Fed. R. Crim. P. 11, and defendant's statements made during the proceeding which directly contradicted his statements before the grand jury which returned the murder indictment were not inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 410(3) as being made during plea negotiations and could be used against defendant in a prosecution for aggravated perjury. State v. Bowie, 137 S.W.3d 95, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1902 (Tex. App. Tyler 2003), reversed by 135 S.W.3d 55, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 898 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004), questioned by Rush v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8146 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 30, 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Guilty Pleas : General Overview

2. Defendant's murder conviction was proper because he was not permitted to argue for the first time on appeal that the recordings at issues contained statements about plea bargaining in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 410. Capps v. State, 244 S.W.3d 520, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9602 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Guilty Pleas : Admissibility at Trial

3. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant's letter to an officer regarding his plea agreement because the statements were not covered by Tex. R. Evid. 410. In addition, the letter's probative value was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the letter was probative of whether defendant committed the charged offense; (2) given the brevity and clarity of the letter and the fact that it was directly related to the charged offense, the amount of time required to develop it was negligible; and (3) the letter was important to the prosecution's case and had a significant tendency to make defendant's guilt more probable. Willis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5931, 2010 WL 2935772 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 28 2010).

4. Admission at trial of a stipulation that defendant signed in conjunction with a prior guilty plea was reversible error because his sworn testimony bolstered the victim's testimony, discredited his alibi, and was magnified by the prosecutor's rebuttal argument. Johnson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10628 (Tex. App. Tyler Nov. 24 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Guilty Pleas : Changes & Withdrawals

5. In a case where defendant pleaded guilty, but later succeeded in having his plea withdrawn, Tex. R. Evid. 410(3) barred the admission at trial of defendant's plea proceeding testimony in which defendant claimed he lied to the grand jury about acting in self-defense. Bowie v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1811 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 28 2003), affirmed by 135 S.W.3d 55, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 898 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

6. Tex. R. Evid. 410(3) does not protect only a defendant's plea itself from being admitted at a trial following the withdrawal of the plea, rather, Rule 410(3) protects the statements made in the course of plea proceedings. Bowie v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1811 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 28 2003), affirmed by 135 S.W.3d 55, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 898 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Guilty Pleas : No Contest Pleas

7. Nolo contendere plea, under Texas law, could not be used against defendant in a civil suit based on securities fraud because it did not constitute an admission under Tex. R. Evid. 410(2). Floyd v. State, 914 S.W.2d 658, 1996 Tex. App. LEXIS 16 (Tex. App. Texarkana 1996).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Sentencing

8. Tex. R. Evid. 410 did not apply where defendant had entered a plea of nolo contendere. Accordingly, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object under that rule to use at sentencing of a letter that had been produced by defense counsel for the State's consideration during plea bargain negotiations. Weinn v. State, 281 S.W.3d 633, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1015 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 12 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Impeachment

9. During a capital murder trial, the trial court erred in allowing the State to proceed with impeachment questions relating to statements defendant made during plea negotiations; the prosecutor's questions violated Tex. R. Evid. 410. Abdygapparova v. State, 243 S.W.3d 191, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8205 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : General Overview

10. Under Tex. R. Evid. 410(3), the trial court erred in admitting defendant's stipulation made during a timely pass for a plea proceeding that he had committed sexual assault of a child, as charged. The error was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because, aside from the stipulation, no other evidence corroborated the testimony of the victim, who had twice recanted her accusations, that contact had occurred. Rush v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8146 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 30 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : Prosecutorial Misconduct

11. Although it was improper for the prosecutor to comment in front of the jury about plea negotiations, no reversible error resulted because the comment arose after defendant raised the issue, the trial court immediately instructed the jury to disregard the prosecutor's statement, and there was undisputed evidence that defendant took the theft victim's property without permission. Bassett v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7081, 2014 WL 2993814 (Tex. App. Dallas June 30 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

12. Although defendant's motion to suppress his stipulation did not urge its inadmissibility under Tex. R. Evid. 410(3), but asserted that it was involuntary, the error was preserved under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) because the trial court based its ruling on a subsequently reversed decision. Rush v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8146 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 30 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

13. Defendant failed to preserve, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, an argument that admitted recordings contained statements about plea bargaining in violation Tex. R. Evid. 410 because defendant did not object below. Capps v. State, 244 S.W.3d 520, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9602 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007), (Tex. App. -- Fort Worth, pet. ref'd).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

14. In a capital murder trial, references to the proffer and plea negotiations at the punishment phase by defendant and his father during their cross-examination by the State, after the defense had arguably opened the door to the evidence during its direct examination of the witnesses, did not substantially or injuriously influence the jury's verdict at the punishment phase. The defense relied heavily on the plea negotiations in support of its mitigation case that defendant was willing to accept responsibility and plead guilty to as many life sentences as the State wanted in order to spare his family the ordeal of a trial. Whitaker v. State, 286 S.W.3d 355, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 873 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

Evidence : Judicial Admissions : General Overview

15. Nolo contendere plea, under Texas law, could not be used against defendant in a civil suit based on securities fraud because it did not constitute an admission under Tex. R. Evid. 410(2). Floyd v. State, 914 S.W.2d 658, 1996 Tex. App. LEXIS 16 (Tex. App. Texarkana 1996).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

16. In a case where defendant pleaded guilty, but later succeeded in having his plea withdrawn, Tex. R. Evid. 410(3) barred the admission at trial of defendant's plea proceeding testimony in which defendant claimed he lied to the grand jury about acting in self-defense. Bowie v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1811 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 28 2003), affirmed by 135 S.W.3d 55, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 898 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

17. Tex. R. Evid. 410(3) does not protect only a defendant's plea itself from being admitted at a trial following the withdrawal of the plea, rather, Rule 410(3) protects the statements made in the course of plea proceedings. Bowie v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1811 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 28 2003), affirmed by 135 S.W.3d 55, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 898 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

18. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant's letter to an officer regarding his plea agreement because the statements were not covered by Tex. R. Evid. 410. In addition, the letter's probative value was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because: (1) the letter was probative of whether defendant committed the charged offense; (2) given the brevity and clarity of the letter and the fact that it was directly related to the charged offense, the amount of time required to develop it was negligible; and (3) the letter was important to the prosecution's case and had a significant tendency to make defendant's guilt more probable. Willis v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5931, 2010 WL 2935772 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 28 2010).

19. Court erred in failing to instruct the jury to disregard the State's reference to plea negotiations because, given the manner in which the State's question to defendant was posed, one could reasonably interpret it as disclosing that plea negotiations had occurred, that potential offers were made and rejected, and that defendant's desires presented the major obstacle to arriving at a bargain. Bowley v. State, 280 S.W.3d 530, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1448 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 2 2009).

Evidence : Relevance : Pleas & Related Statements

20. Plain language of the rule renders inadmissible any statement made in the course of plea discussions with an attorney for the prosecuting authority, not only statements first induced by a particular promise. Canfield v. State, 429 S.W.3d 54, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1682, 2014 WL 576261 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 13 2014).

21. Assuming without deciding that defendant showed counsel's failure to object to the State's use of defendant's affidavit signed during plea negotiations amounted to deficient performance, defendant failed to demonstrate that he was prejudiced; in light of the charges, his testimony, and his defense, the fact that he engaged in some type of plea negotiations would not necessarily have been contrary to his version of events. Canfield v. State, 429 S.W.3d 54, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1682, 2014 WL 576261 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 13 2014).

22. Because defendant's letter, which defendant claimed discussed ongoing plea negotiations between his attorney and the State, was directed at his wife, not the prosecuting attorney, the trial court did not err in admitting the letter. Beans v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1159, 2014 WL 357340 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2014).

23. Recording of defendant's phone call to his wife from jail was properly admitted because his statements about the possibility of taking a plea were not made to an attorney accountable to the prosecuting authority, nor were they were made to, or in the presence of, any attorney. Aekins v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13694, 2013 WL 5948188 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 6 2013).

24. Appellant objected to evidence that referenced a plea agreement, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 410, and the trial court admonished the jury; the trial court did not err in denying a mistrial, as the evidence was admitted inadvertently, the court did not think it would be a surprise to the jury that the State had offered to resolve the case if appellant pleaded guilty, and this was not the kind of evidence that would inflame the jury. Munsinger v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7318, 2011 WL 3915671 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 7 2011).

25. Defendant failed to preserve for review her assertion that the trial court erred in failing to hold a hearing on the voluntariness of her confession, because the issue regarding the voluntariness of the confession was not raised, the record revealed that the subject of defendant's confession was not mentioned during the pre-trial hearing, and trial counsel's initial objection did not put the trial court on notice that defendant was seeking to contest the voluntariness of her confession; Tex. R. Evid. 410 dealt with inadmissibility of pleas, plea discussions, and related statements, and was directed at the use of statements made during unsuccessful plea negotiations. Crittenden v.

State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3049 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 23 2010).

26. Defendant's convictions for aggravated robbery and unlawful possession of a firearm were proper because the trial court did not err in admitting a State exhibit since the State's exhibit was addressed to the detectives or the district attorney and the plain language of Tex. R. Evid. 410(4) applied only to discussion with the prosecuting authority, not detectives. Thus, purported plea offers or other statements to anyone other than an attorney for the prosecution were not covered by R. 410. Carter v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5918, 2009 WL 2343725 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31 2009).

27. In a capital murder trial, references to the proffer and plea negotiations at the punishment phase by defendant and his father during their cross-examination by the State, after the defense had arguably opened the door to the evidence during its direct examination of the witnesses, did not substantially or injuriously influence the jury's verdict at the punishment phase. The defense relied heavily on the plea negotiations in support of its mitigation case that defendant was willing to accept responsibility and plead guilty to as many life sentences as the State wanted in order to spare his family the ordeal of a trial. Whitaker v. State, 286 S.W.3d 355, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 873 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

28. Court erred in failing to instruct the jury to disregard the State's reference to plea negotiations because, given the manner in which the State's question to defendant was posed, one could reasonably interpret it as disclosing that plea negotiations had occurred, that potential offers were made and rejected, and that defendant's desires presented the major obstacle to arriving at a bargain. Bowley v. State, 280 S.W.3d 530, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1448 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 2 2009).

29. Defendant's murder conviction was proper because he was not permitted to argue for the first time on appeal that the recordings at issues contained statements about plea bargaining in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 410. Capps v. State, 244 S.W.3d 520, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9602 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

30. Trial court erred by allowing the State to ask defendant questions relating to statements she made during plea negotiations because defendant's responses during cross-examination did not leave a false impression with the jury and the prosecutor's cross-examination was an attempt to show that defendant was lying to the jury based on her statements made during the plea negotiations. Abdygapparova v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5806 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 25 2007).

31. During the punishment phase of a sexual assault case, the State's references on cross-examination and in closing argument to previous plea discussions were not improper because defendant, not the State, first presented testimony regarding the prior plea discussions when he said that he wanted to plead guilty months earlier. Drone v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6071 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 13 2006).

32. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in allowing the State to discuss the fact that defendant offered money to the victim's family, an offer apparently made in plea negotiations, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 410, but defendant did not object when the discussion of financial resources was first admitted or later when defendant was questioned regarding the offer to pay; defense counsel asked defendant questions on the subject, and a final objection to the matter came after the question had already been answered, and thus, the court held that defendant failed to preserve error on the issue under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Freeman v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3528 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 27 2006).

33. Under Tex. R. Evid. 410(3), the trial court erred in admitting defendant's stipulation made during a timely pass for a plea proceeding that he had committed sexual assault of a child, as charged. The error was not harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because, aside from the stipulation, no other evidence corroborated the testimony of the victim, who had twice recanted her accusations, that contact had occurred. Rush v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8146 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 30 2005).

34. Although defendant's motion to suppress his stipulation did not urge its inadmissibility under Tex. R. Evid. 410(3), but asserted that it was involuntary, the error was preserved under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) because the trial court based its ruling on a subsequently reversed decision. Rush v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8146 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 30 2005).

35. Trial court did not err in admitting the testimony concerning statements defendant made during the plea bargain conference, because the plea bargain discussions were successful; Tex. R. Evid. 410(4) only made inadmissible statements in the course of plea discussions that did not result in a plea of guilty, a plea of nolo contendere, or in situations in which one of those pleas was withdrawn. May v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1885 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 10 2005).

36. Admission of defendant's statements in two trials was improper where punishment testimony offered in the course of a "timely pass for plea" proceeding was protected by Tex. R. Evid. 410, and although the "timely pass for plea" procedure was not identical to procedures under Fed. R. Crim. P. 11, it was comparable to those procedures and consistent with, insofar as it did not conflict with, State plea procedures. Bowie v. State, 135 S.W.3d 55, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 898 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

37. Admission of defendant's statements in two trials was improper where punishment testimony offered in the course of a "timely pass for plea" proceeding was protected by Tex. R. Evid. 410, and although the "timely pass for plea" procedure was not identical to procedures under Fed. R. Crim. P. 11, it was comparable to those procedures and consistent with, insofar as it did not conflict with, State plea procedures. Bowie v. State, 135 S.W.3d 55, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 898 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004).

38. PlPlea bargaining is statutorily recognized in Texas under Tex. Code Crim. P. art. 26.13(a)(2), but a "timely pass for plea" procedure, in which a defendant charged with murder entered a plea of guilty, and the trial court heard the case on stipulated facts, then announced a proposed decision with defendant being allowed to withdraw the plea if he was unhappy with the sentence, was not the equivalent of a plea negotiation within the meaning of Fed. Evid. 410(3) as being made during plea negotiations and could be used against defendant in a prosecution for aggravated perjury. State v. Bowie, 137 S.W.3d 95, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1902 (Tex. App. Tyler 2003), reversed by 135 S.W.3d 55, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 898 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004), questioned by Rush v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8146 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 30, 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

39. Although the landlord argued that the trial court abused its discretion in admitting certain evidence, the testimony objected to was relevant to the issue of mitigation and was therefore admissible; the presence of conflicting evidence established that an instructed verdict would have been improper. Western Skies Partnership/Physicians Healthcare Assocs., L.C. v. Physician's Healthcare Assocs., L.C., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4438 (Tex. App. El Paso May 13 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : Inadmissibility

40. During a capital murder trial, the trial court erred in allowing the State to proceed with impeachment questions relating to statements defendant made during plea negotiations; the prosecutor's questions violated Tex. R. Evid. 410. Abdygapparova v. State, 243 S.W.3d 191, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8205 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2007).

Rule 411 Liability Insurance

Evidence that a person was or was not insured against liability is not admissible to prove whether the person acted negligently or otherwise wrongfully. But the court may admit this evidence for another purpose, such as proving a witness's bias or prejudice or, if disputed, proving agency, ownership, or control.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Pretrial Matters : Separate Trials

1. Because Tex. R. Evid. 411 precludes the introduction of insurance upon the issue of whether a person acted negligently or wrongfully and because evidence that a driver was underinsured was not offered for certain exceptions, it appeared the rule supported severance; an insurer was joined based on the driver being underinsured, and given that the trial court did not err in granting summary judgment, the driver was not liable, the insurance issue was moot, and the trial court did not err in severing appellants' claims against the driver for convenience and to avoid prejudice, for purposes of Tex. R. Civ. P. 174(b). Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

Civil Procedure : Trials : Jury Trials : Jury Instructions : General Overview

2. Although insurance coverage should not have been mentioned in a personal injury action involving a fall through a skylight, the trial court properly instructed the jury not to consider the improper statement. Because the size of the verdict was supported by evidence, nothing suggested that the jury did not follow the court's instruction. Taylor v. Am. Fabritech, Inc., 132 S.W.3d 613, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2550 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review

3. Award of damages to the son in his action against his parents after he fell and broke his elbow at their home was proper because, apart from arguing against the motion in limine under Tex. R. Evid. 411, the son never raised any complaint about the exclusion of insurance once voir dire commenced, and was well established that an adverse ruling on a motion in limine was insufficient to preserve a complaint for appellate review. Thus, his argument that the trial court abused its discretion by filing ot declare a mistrial sua sponte during voir dire was not considered, Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Perez v. Perez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 962, 2013 WL 398932 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 31 2013).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Harmless Error Rule

4. Even if the admission of evidence concerning a condominium association having insurance was improper, the error was harmless because the association was permitted to counter the admission of the existence of insurance coverage with evidence that its insurer had already denied its claim, and the trial court instructed the jury to disregard the existence of insurance for any purpose other than rebutting the association's defensive theory. Canyon Vista Prop. Owners Ass'n v. Laubach, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1099, 2014 WL 411646 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 31 2014).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Procedural Due Process : Double Jeopardy

5. In defendant's manslaughter case, a court erred by failing to dismiss defendant's case, on double jeopardy grounds, where the court granted a mistrial, and the prosecutor should have known that his question concerning the insurance carrier's finding of negligence was improper and created a substantial risk that a mistrial would result. Therefore, because the prosecutor intentionally or recklessly caused the trial to end in a mistrial, defendant was entitled to relief. Ex parte Wheeler, 146 S.W.3d 238, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6706 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Involuntary Manslaughter : General Overview

6. Tex. R. Evid. 411 applies equally to criminal cases in which a defendant has been charged with the offenses of manslaughter and criminally negligent homicide. Ex parte Wheeler, 146 S.W.3d 238, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6706 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Involuntary Manslaughter : Elements

7. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 403, the testimony of a claims representative for defendant's insurer that the insurer was liable was not barred by Tex. R. Evid. 411 because it allowed for an inference of fault on the part of defendant, which was a fact of consequence in the manslaughter prosecution under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.04. Mitchell v. State, 377 S.W.3d 21, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8970, 2011 WL 5994154 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 9 2011).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Curative Admissibility

8. Evidence that a condominium association had insurance was admissible in a condominium owner's action for damages to the floor under his unit because the association opened the door to being cross-examined on the issue of its insurance coverage, evidence of insurance was cumulative, and the owner's counsel sought to cross-examine an association board member on the issue of insurance for the purposes of impeachment. Canyon Vista Prop. Owners Ass'n v. Laubach, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1099, 2014 WL 411646 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 31 2014).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

9. Mistrial was properly granted in a manslaughter/criminally negligent homicide trial after the prosecutor asked defendant's expert about a finding by defendant's insurer that defendant was at fault. The question was manifestly improper under Tex. R. Evid. 401-403, but Tex. R. Evid. 411 was inapplicable because the question went to the insurer's ultimate decision to accept fault by its insured, rather than to the existence of insurance. Ex parte Wheeler, 203 S.W.3d 317, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1968 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

Evidence : Relevance : Liability Insurance

10. Evidence that a condominium association had insurance was admissible in a condominium owner's action for damages to the floor under his unit because the association opened the door to being cross-examined on the issue of its insurance coverage, evidence of insurance was cumulative, and the owner's counsel sought to cross-examine an association board member on the issue of insurance for the purposes of impeachment. Canyon Vista Prop. Owners Ass'n v. Laubach, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1099, 2014 WL 411646 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 31 2014).

11. Even if the admission of evidence concerning a condominium association having insurance was improper, the error was harmless because the association was permitted to counter the admission of the existence of insurance coverage with evidence that its insurer had already denied its claim, and the trial court instructed the jury to disregard the existence of insurance for any purpose other than rebutting the association's defensive theory. Canyon Vista Prop. Owners Ass'n v. Laubach, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1099, 2014 WL 411646 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 31 2014).

12. Evidence of insurance was not admissible in the trial of the passenger's personal injury claims against the company, but evidence of the company's insurance and the passenger's uninsured/underinsured coverage was required to establish any such claims. In re Arcababa, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13571, 2013 WL 5890109 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 31 2013).

13. Allowing evidence of insurance would have violated the company's right to have its liability decided without mention of insurance, but excluding such evidence would have prejudiced the passenger's presentation of her uninsured/underinsured motorist claim; the company's argument was sufficient to inform the trial court that prejudice would result from the simultaneous trial of the passenger's insurance and personal injury claims. In re Arcababa, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13571, 2013 WL 5890109 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 31 2013).

14. In an negligence case where a property owner alleged damages to a fence, a boat, and trees, to the extent appellant complained about the trial court's alleged refusal to permit him to mention his homeowner's insurance coverage, the evidence was not admissible to prove liability or the lack thereof. Jones v. Warren, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11044 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 29 2013).

15. As the trial court clearly understood the basis of appellant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 411, the issue was preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A). Nguyen v. Myers, 442 S.W.3d 434, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2085, 2013 WL 1277838 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 14 2013).

16. Even if the trial court erred in overruling appellant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 411, any error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a)(1), given that (1) it was undisputed that appellant caused the accident, (2) appellee was injured, and (3) some of the treatment he received was reasonable and necessary; the court could not find that the verdict turned on the isolated mention of insurance companies. Nguyen v. Myers, 442 S.W.3d 434, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2085, 2013 WL 1277838 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 14 2013).

17. Award of damages to the son in his action against his parents after he fell and broke his elbow at their home was proper because, apart from arguing against the motion in limine under Tex. R. Evid. 411, the son never raised any complaint about the exclusion of insurance once voir dire commenced, and was well established that an adverse ruling on a motion in limine was insufficient to preserve a complaint for appellate review. Thus, his argument that the trial court abused its discretion by filing ot declare a mistrial sua sponte during voir dire was not considered, Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Perez v. Perez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 962, 2013 WL 398932 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 31 2013).

18. Pursuant to Tex. R. Civ. P. 41, absent a bifurcation order under Tex. R. Civ. P. 174(b), it was necessary to sever negligence claims against a driver and his employer from the claimant's underinsured motorist (UIM) claim against his insurer because the insurance evidence necessary to recover UIM benefits under Tex. Ins. Code Ann. § 1952.106 was inadmissible in the negligence action under Tex. R. Evid. 411. In re James Michael Reynolds & Pelhams Indus. Warehouse, 369 S.W.3d 638, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3878 (Tex. App. Tyler May 16 2012).

19. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401 and 403, the testimony of a claims representative for defendant's insurer that the insurer was liable was not barred by Tex. R. Evid. 411 because it allowed for an inference of fault on the part of defendant, which was a fact of consequence in the manslaughter prosecution under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.04. Mitchell v. State, 377 S.W.3d 21, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8970, 2011 WL 5994154 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 9 2011).

20. Because Tex. R. Evid. 411 precludes the introduction of insurance upon the issue of whether a person acted negligently or wrongfully and because evidence that a driver was underinsured was not offered for certain exceptions, it appeared the rule supported severance; an insurer was joined based on the driver being underinsured, and given that the trial court did not err in granting summary judgment, the driver was not liable, the insurance issue was moot, and the trial court did not err in severing appellants' claims against the driver for convenience and to avoid prejudice, for purposes of Tex. R. Civ. P. 174(b). Dickerson v. State Farm Lloyd's Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6061, 2011 WL 3334964 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 3 2011).

21. Given that an insurer's attorney was never designated of record to be the insured's attorney, there was no basis for invoking Tex. R. Civ. P. 12 to challenge the attorney's actions in misrepresenting his identity to the jury, and the trial court thus erred in allowing the attorney to conceal and deliberately misrepresent his identity before the jury, and because there was no designation or notice of substitution in accordance with Tex. R. Civ. P. 10, there was no basis for the trial court to have recognized the attorney as the insured's attorney; even assuming that the attorney had the insured's consent to representation and assuming that Tex. R. Civ. P. 10 would not have been violated by the attorney's participation without a designation of record, the court agreed with the injured passenger that there was also a fatal conflict of interest that still would have rendered the trial court's ruling erroneous; the court did not see the issues created by the trial court's ruling to be evidentiary in nature so as to have come under the purview of Tex. R. Evid. 411. Perez v. Kleinert, 211 S.W.3d 468, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11080 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

22. Injection of insurance did not cause the rendition of an improper jury verdict where but for a contractor's faulty installation of a heating unit, a fire would not have occurred and the damages would not have existed. Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Abell, 157 S.W.3d 886, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1102 (Tex. App. El Paso 2005).

23. Tex. R. Evid. 411 applies equally to criminal cases in which a defendant has been charged with the offenses of manslaughter and criminally negligent homicide. Ex parte Wheeler, 146 S.W.3d 238, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6706 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

24. In defendant's manslaughter case, a court erred by failing to dismiss defendant's case, on double jeopardy grounds, where the court granted a mistrial, and the prosecutor should have known that his question concerning the insurance carrier's finding of negligence was improper and created a substantial risk that a mistrial would result. Therefore, because the prosecutor intentionally or recklessly caused the trial to end in a mistrial, defendant was entitled to relief. Ex parte Wheeler, 146 S.W.3d 238, 2004 Tex. (a) In General.--The following evidence is not admissible in a prosecution for sexual assault, aggravated sexual assault, or attempt to commit sexual assault or aggravated sexual assault:

(1)reputation or opinion evidence of a victim's past sexual behavior; or

(2)specific instances of a victim's past sexual behavior.

(1)the court admits the evidence in accordance with subdivisions (c) and (d);

(2)the evidence:

(A)is necessary to rebut or explain scientific or medical evidence offered by the prosecutor;

(B)concerns past sexual behavior with the defendant and is offered by the defendant to prove consent;

(C)relates to the victim's motive or bias;

(E)is constitutionally required to be admitted; and

(3)the probative value of the evidence outweighs the danger of unfair prejudice.

(d) Record Sealed.--The court must preserve the record of the in camera hearing, under seal, as part of the record.

(e) Definition of "Victim." --In this rule, "victim" includes an alleged victim.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Procedural Due Process : Scope of Protection

1. State trial court's exclusion of evidence of a complainant's statements prior to her involvement with the prisoner did not constitute error so extreme that it constituted denial of fundamental fairness and due process under the Fourteenth Amendment; the referenced hearsay statements, which the prisoner claimed were admissible under

Tex. R. Evid. 412(b), were not of the complainant's prior sexual history or behavior, but rather, of her sexual awareness, attitudes, or wishes that did not rebut or explain the State's scientific evidence; therefore, the exclusion of the statements did not provide a basis for federal habeas corpus relief. Galloway v. Dretke, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38726 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 12 2005).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Confrontation

2. At defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court erred because it refused to allow defendant to cross-examine the State's witnesses in violation of his Sixth Amendment right to confrontation regarding the complainant's sexual assault of his younger sister. The impeachment evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412 to correct a false impression left with the jury that the complainant's emotional problems, watching pornography, and need for counseling arose as a result of his victimization by defendant. Johnson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1515, 2013 WL 531079 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 14 2013).

3. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, there was no violation of the Confrontation Clause when the trial court limited defendant's cross-examination of the complainant's cousin to exclude evidence, under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and Tex. R. Evid. 412, of a past physical relationship between the cousin and the complainant; a review of the cousin's sealed in-camera testimony revealed that the so-called physical relationship did not include any sexual contact; thus, contrary to defendant's assertion, the defense's line of cross-examination would not have explained any bias or motive for the complainant to fabricate the explicit details of the sexual assault described in direct testimony. Peten v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9815 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 13 2007).

4. In camera proceeding contemplated by Tex. R. Evid. 412 is an adversarial hearing at which the parties are present and the attorneys are permitted to question witnesses. LaPointe v. State, 225 S.W.3d 513, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 505 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1015, 128 S. Ct. 544, 169 L. Ed. 2d 381 (2007).

5. Where defendant was initially denied the adversarial hearing required by Tex. R. Evid. 412, a retrospective hearing conducted on remand was proper; defense counsel's questions regarding child custody, the victim's alcohol use, and whether the victim was taking medication for bipolar disorder were not inquiries into the victim's past sexual history and did not fall within the order at trial; those questions therefore fell outside the scope of the remand order, and the trial court did not err to exclude them. LaPointe v. State, 225 S.W.3d 513, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 505 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1015, 128 S. Ct. 544, 169 L. Ed. 2d 381 (2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

6. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err by excluding hearsay testimony about the victim's prior sexual activity as the probative value of this hearsay would not have outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. James v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7972 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 29 2005).

7. In a sexual assault case, a court properly excluded evidence of the victim's fight with her boyfriend and her antidepression medication where those circumstances did not involve specific instances of the victim's past sexual behavior. Chavira v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5653 (Tex. App. Tyler June 23 2004).

8. Evidence of sperm located on a victim's clothing after a sexual assault was not relevant at trial because there was no evidence that defendant ejaculated during the crime. Davis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3815 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 29 2004).

9. Before a trial court may admit Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(A-E) evidence, it must find that the probative value of said evidence outweighs the danger of unfair prejudice. Mungaray v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2595 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 24 2004).

10. Trial court utilizes a two-step test in determining the admissibility of previous-sexual-conduct evidence: (1) the evidence must fall within one of the five enumerated circumstances in Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2); and (2) its probative value must outweigh the danger of unfair prejudice. Both prongs of the test must be established in order for the evidence to be admitted. Mungaray v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2595 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 24 2004).

11. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, the court did not err in refusing evidence of a purported previous sexual assault committed by defendant's brother upon the complainant. The probative value of this evidence was thin compared to the prejudicial effect it would have. Mungaray v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2595 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 24 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

12. There was no error in excluding evidence that a child sexual assault victim had gonorrhea because defendant did not inform the trial court that he intended to elicit the testimony, made no argument to the trial court linking the diagnosis to any motive or bias, and did not argue that the probative value of the evidence outweighed any unfair prejudice. Cantu v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8574 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 7 2014).

13. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021 involving a four-year-old girl and where defendant sought to introduce evidence that the victim had been sexually abused by another family member prior to the accusations made against defendant to explain the testimony from the sexual assault nurse examiner who examined the child and found evidence that the child had engaged in sexual intercourse, the trial court did not err in ruling that the evidence was inadmissible and did not fall within the exception of Tex. R. Evid. 412 because there was no evidence of prior penetration even if there was evidence of touching and the sexual assault nurse could nto say when the victim's penetrating injury occurred. Alvarado v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1479, 2012 WL 593564 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

14. In a case where defendant was convicted of two counts of sexual assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.011, the excluded evidence, with which defendant attempted to show the victim's licentious character, was properly excluded as it did not fall into any of the Tex. R. Evid. 412 exceptions. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

15. In a trial for aggravated assault on a child, defendant was not deprived of his Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel, even though counsel violated Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 412(b), (c), by introducing evidence about two other situations in which defendant had sexual conduct with girls who were three years younger than him and younger than the age for consensual sex, because the evidence could have been introduced to show a pattern of consensual activities and of involvment with girls relatively close to defendant in age. McGuire v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 673, 2010 WL 322988 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 29 2010).

16. In a trial for sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, there was no error in excluding evidence as to whether the complainant had engaged in sexual conduct with a younger cousin, whether the complainant allowed one or more pets to play with the complainant's sexual organs, whether the complainant's parent had told an employee about fearing that the complainant would accuse the parent's new romantic partner of molestation, or whether the complainant's parent kept pornography in the home. Todd v. State, 242 S.W.3d 126, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9053 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

17. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child who was younger than 14 case, defendant did not allege that there was any evidence controverting the victim's testimony that she and defendant had sexual intercourse of September 19, 2003; further, defendant did not explain how the probative value of evidence of the child's past sexual behavior outweighed the danger of undue prejudice; thus, defendant failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion in excluding the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 412. Guerrero v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3723 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 3 2006).

18. In defendant's criminal prosecution for sexual assault of a child, the nurse testified that the complainant's hymen had been torn by blunt force trauma. The complainant was permitted to testify that defendant was the only person with whom she had sexual intercourse; no violation of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b) was shown, because the complainant's testimony concerned the absence of past sexual behavior. Ghant v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 13 2006).

19. In defendant's criminal prosecution for sexual assault of a child, the trial court denied defendant's request to question the victim concerning prior sexual abuse by her uncle. Ghant v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 13 2006).

20. In defendant's criminal prosecution for sexual assault of a child, the nurse testified that the complainant's hymen had been torn by blunt force trauma; the complainant was permitted to testify that defendant was the only person with whom she had sexual intercourse; no violation of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b) was shown, because the complainant's testimony concerned the absence of past sexual behavior. Ghant v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 13 2006).

21. In defendant's criminal prosecution for sexual assault of a child, the trial court denied defendant's request to question the victim concerning prior sexual abuse by her uncle. Ghant v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 13 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Brady Materials : Brady Claims

22. In a trial for child sexual assault, no Brady violation occurred from any delay in the State's disclosure of a report indicating that the complainant was the victim of a prior sexual assault that the mother delayed reporting to authorities. Noting that under Tex. R. Evid. 412, evidence of specific instances of an alleged victim's past sexual behavior was inadmissible unless certain requirements were satisfied, the court reasoned that the State did not have a duty to disclose the information because the incident report was not admissible. Read v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5910, 2010 WL 2904627 (Tex. App. Dallas July 27 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : In Camera Inspections

23. Defendant's contention that the trial court improperly failed to hold an in camera hearing required by this rule was rejected because the trial court did hold such a hearing, permitted defense counsel to argue why the proffered evidence was admissible, made its ruling, and provided an explanation for it. Mbata v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3241, 2014 WL 1285756 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

24. In a trial for aggravated assault on a child, defendant was not deprived of his Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel, even though counsel violated Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), 412(b), (c), by introducing evidence about two other situations in which defendant had sexual conduct with girls who were three years younger than him and younger than the age for consensual sex, because the evidence could have been introduced to show a pattern of consensual activities and of involvment with girls relatively close to defendant in age. McGuire v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 673, 2010 WL 322988 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 29 2010).

25. In a sexual assault case, defendant was unable to establish that he received ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to obtain a ruling on several pre-trial motions since there was no showing that they would have changed the outcome of the case, and he was unable to establish that he would have benefitted from the testimony of his roommate if the trial had been delayed to obtain such; moreover, the claim was also meritless based on a failure to object to a prosecutor's closing argument since a comment regarding victim's rights did not conflict with Tex. R. Evid. 412, and a comment regarding a failure to testify was directed at defendant's roommate, but not defendant. Benjamin v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Closing Arguments : Defendant's Failure to Testify

26. In a sexual assault case, defendant was unable to establish that he received ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to obtain a ruling on several pre-trial motions since there was no showing that they would have changed the outcome of the case, and he was unable to establish that he would have benefitted from the testimony of his roommate if the trial had been delayed to obtain such; moreover, the claim was also meritless based on a failure to object to a prosecutor's closing argument since a comment regarding victim's rights did not conflict with Tex. R. Evid. 412, and a comment regarding a failure to testify was directed at defendant's roommate, but not defendant. Benjamin v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7010 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Confrontation

27. In a case in which defendant was convicted of five counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021(a)(1)(B), (2)(B), although the complainant's credibility was an issue because she was the sole witness to the alleged sexual conduct by defendant, the trial court did not abuse its discretion or violate defendant's confrontation rights by preventing the jury from viewing her pregnancy based on Tex. R. Evid. 412 because defendant had not shown that her pregnancy was relevant to motive or bias, and because the exclusion served to avoid prejudice to the complainant and confusion of the issues. When the complainant was on the witness stand, the jury had an unobstructed view of her face, so they could observe her demeanor and assess her credibility, and defendant was not prevented from cross-examining her. Morgan v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3402, 2009 WL 1372965 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 14 2009).

28. Because defendant did not show that his seven-year-old sexual assault victim made any false prior allegations of sexual abuse against her twelve year-old neighbor that were similar to the allegations in defendant's case, and because the trial court could limit cross-examination to prevent confusion of the issues and undue prejudice, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in limiting cross-examination to exclude such references. Lempar v. State, 191 S.W.3d 230, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10667 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

29. Trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding a child sexual assault victim's relationships with two different boys and her actions and comments involving two cousins did not deprive defendant of his constitutional right to a fair trial where the trial court could have determined, based on the chronology of the events, that they did not explain the State's medical evidence regarding the time of the penetration of the victim's hymen, and, although the trial court excluded the equivocal testimony of the victim's mother about the victim's veracity, the victim's aunt was allowed to testify that she had a bad reputation for being untruthful, and the victim herself admitted lying to defendant, her father, about her report card. Accordingly, the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the matters had, at best, marginal relevance to the victim's alleged motive to testify falsely against defendant, that they would have unduly harassed the victim and confused the issues, and that the danger of unfair prejudice from the evidence would have outweighed its probative value. Pogue v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7819 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2005).

30. Tex. R. App. P. 412(c) required the trial court to afford defendant and his counsel an opportunity to be present and cross-examine the alleged victim at an in camera hearing to determine the admissibility of evidence of the alleged victim's previous sexual conduct; although the trial court erred in barring defendant's counsel from the in camera hearing, the trial court could, pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 44.4, correct the error by holding a proper hearing and again making a determination of what evidence would be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412. LaPointe v. State, 166 S.W.3d 287, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3153 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

31. District court violated defendant's right to confront witnesses against him, and it deprived him of the right to effective assistance of counsel, when it excluded defense counsel from an in camera hearing with the complainant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 412. There was nothing about the rape shield law's requirements that prohibited counsel from attending the hearing. LaPointe v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1968 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 17 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 166 S.W.3d 287, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3153 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

32. Trial court's failure to afford parties the opportunity to be present at an in camera hearing and to examine an alleged rape victim regarding specific instances of previous sexual conduct violates a defendant's constitutional rights to confrontation and to effective assistance of counsel. LaPointe v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1968 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 17 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 166 S.W.3d 287, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3153 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Counsel : Constitutional Right

33. Tex. R. App. P. 412(c) required the trial court to afford defendant and his counsel an opportunity to be present and cross-examine the alleged victim at an in camera hearing to determine the admissibility of evidence of the alleged victim's previous sexual conduct; although the trial court erred in barring defendant's counsel from the in camera hearing, the trial court could, pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 44.4, correct the error by holding a proper hearing and again making a determination of what evidence would be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412. LaPointe v. State, 166 S.W.3d 287, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3153 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

34. District court violated defendant's right to confront witnesses against him, and it deprived him of the right to effective assistance of counsel, when it excluded defense counsel from an in camera hearing with the complainant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 412. There was nothing about the rape shield law's requirements that prohibited counsel from attending the hearing. LaPointe v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1968 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 17 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 166 S.W.3d 287, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3153 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

35. Trial court's failure to afford parties the opportunity to be present at an in camera hearing and to examine an alleged rape victim regarding specific instances of previous sexual conduct violates a defendant's constitutional rights to confrontation and to effective assistance of counsel. LaPointe v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1968 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 17 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 166 S.W.3d 287, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3153 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Cross-Examination

36. Court did not err in prohibiting cross-examination of the complainant regarding the matters discussed during the rape shield evidentiary hearings because the jury was cognizant of the complainant's purported motive or bias, which defendant's counsel emphasized in his closing argument, and the complainant's credibility was called into question when counsel vigorously cross-examined her, causing her to admit to lapses of memory and to try to explain contradicting portions of her testimony. Dees v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15404, 2013 WL 6869865

(Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 27 2013).

37. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of two witnesses concerning the child victim's prior sexual history because defendant's defense was that the victim was lying, and he was not prohibited from presenting that defense at trial. Defendant had the opportunity to cross-examine the allege false impression left by the victim's testimony by cross-examining her at trial; he was not entitled to correct the alleged false impression by calling other witnesses. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8246, 2012 WL 4497999 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 28 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Impeachment

38. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 412 in excluding questions to the complaining witness about prior sexual conduct, despite defendant's arguments that the complainant's statements to the police about the conduct were inconsistent with the complainant's testimony that the complainant was in love with defendant; even if the witness did create a false impression by the testimony, the court did not understand that to be an exception to Tex. R. Evid. 412. State v. Dudley, 223 S.W.3d 717, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3328 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Evidence

39. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of his 12-year-old daughter, evidence that the victim had been previously assaulted by another relative was properly excluded in the punishment phase after the victim described the impact of the assault, including three attempted suicides, in part because the prior assault did not fit into any of the exceptions under Tex. R. Evid. 412. Delapaz v. State, 297 S.W.3d 824, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7510 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 24 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Briefs

40. In a trial for sexual assault and indecency with a child, defendant failed to preserve for review an argument that he was erroneously prevented him from presenting or eliciting evidence of the complainant's sexual history and sexual sophistication in part because he failed to direct the court to any portion of the record where he adhered to the requirements of this rule. Martinez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3827, 2014 WL 1396705 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 9 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Records on Appeal

41. Defendant's motion to unseal portions of the reporter's record that were sealed pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 412 was granted as to the attorneys of record because Rule 412 did not preclude unsealing the record of the in camera proceeding for defense counsel on appeal because it seemed better for the system of justice, as well as to assure defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel on appeal, that defendant's appellate counsel have limited access to the sealed record in order to assert the arguments he deemed best through the use of his professional judgment. The court further held that the complainant's privacy rights and defendant's right to a meaningful appeal could be adequately protected through specific orders from the court. Dees v. State, 508 S.W.3d 312, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1731, 2013 WL 627046 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 21 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Remands & Remittiturs

42. Remedy for a trial court's failure to follow the requirement of an adversarial hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 412 is to abate the appeal and remand the case to the trial court to conduct a proper hearing retrospectively. LaPointe v. State, 225 S.W.3d 513, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 505 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1015, 128

S. Ct. 544, 169 L. Ed. 2d 381 (2007).

43. Where defendant was initially denied the adversarial hearing required by Tex. R. Evid. 412, a retrospective hearing conducted on remand was proper; defense counsel's questions regarding child custody, the victim's alcohol use, and whether the victim was taking medication for bipolar disorder were not inquiries into the victim's past sexual history and did not fall within the order at trial; those questions therefore fell outside the scope of the remand order, and the trial court did not err to exclude them. LaPointe v. State, 225 S.W.3d 513, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 505 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1015, 128 S. Ct. 544, 169 L. Ed. 2d 381 (2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

44. Defendant in a trial for sexual assault of a child failed to preserve for review his argument that evidence of the victim's sexual conduct was admissible pursuant to an exceptions to the rape shield law, Tex. Evid. R. 412(b)(2)(E) and the Confrontation Clause. Because he never raised that argument before the trial court, the reviewing court considered only whether the evidence was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, and affirmed the exclusion. Eaves v. State, 141 S.W.3d 686, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4728 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

45. In a trial for sexual assault and indecency with a child, defendant failed to preserve for review an argument that he was erroneously prevented him from presenting or eliciting evidence of the complainant's sexual history and sexual sophistication in part because he failed to direct the court to any portion of the record where he adhered to the requirements of this rule. Martinez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3827, 2014 WL 1396705 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 9 2014).

46. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve the argument that it was improper to exclude evidence of the complainant's sexual history because the record did not contain an offer of proof from which the reviewing court could analyze the excluded testimony. Cordero v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2834, 2012 WL 1248064 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 11 2012).

47. Defendant waived any argument based on Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E) by failing to argue in the trial court that the nurse's testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E). Murphy v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 4372 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 5 2008).

48. In a child sexual assault case, defendant was not denied the right to confront and cross-examine the complainant about allegations of previous sexual behavior because defendant's trial objections did not raise his constitutional rights, nor did they apprise the trial court that the evidence should have been admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 412; accordingly, defendant failed to preserve error on the issue of his constitutional right to confront the complainant. Leachman v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7345 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 17 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

49. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred by instructing the jury that one victim was a virgin prior to the crime because he failed to object, despite the opportunity to do so. After the Tex. R. Evid. 412 hearing, but with the jury absent, the trial court informed the parties that it would so instruct the jury, the jury was brought in, and the instruction was given. Young v. State, 382 S.W.3d 414, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8627, 2012 WL 4874628 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 16 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Jury Instructions

50. Defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his claim that the trial court erred by instructing the jury that one victim was a virgin prior to the crime because he failed to object, despite the opportunity to do so. After the Tex. R. Evid. 412 hearing, but with the jury absent, the trial court informed the parties that it would so instruct the jury, the jury was brought in, and the instruction was given. Young v. State, 382 S.W.3d 414, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8627, 2012 WL 4874628 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 16 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

51. In a trial for sexual assault, defendant failed, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, to preserve an argument that evidence relating to the complainant's sexual history was admissible under the Tex. R. Evid. 412 to rebut or explain scientific or medical evidence offered by the State; although defendant raised other grounds for admission of the evidence, defendant did not assert that the impeachment evidence was necessary to rebut or explain scientific or medical evidence offered by the State. Godbolt v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6295 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 9 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

52. Trial court's decision to deny defendant the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses about the victim's accusation of sexual assault against another person was not an abuse of discretion because specific instances could not be inquired into under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), defendant never made a showing that the victim's allegation was false, and defendant was allowed to cross-examine witnesses regarding the victim's recantation of her accusation against her brother. Odom v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5009, 2014 WL 1882754 (Tex. App. Waco May 8 2014).

53. Trial court did not err by excluding evidence about the victim's past sexual behavior with her boyfriend because it was not necessary to rebut a physician's testimony, as the record showed that when the physician testified about the absence of malingering and secondary gain he was conveying his opinions about the statements the victim had made to him regarding the sexual abuse by defendant. Kissoon v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11045 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 29 2013).

54. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the victim's prior sexual history to explain the existence of another male's DNA on his wife's mattress because there was no evidence that the victim's prior sexual conduct with anyone other than defendant ever occurred on the wife's bed. Seery v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2013 WL 683327 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 21 2013).

55. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the victim's prior sexual history to show the victim's motive to fabricate the allegations against defendant because he was not denied the opportunity to present his fabrication defense and the victim's prior sexual history did not tend to establish that she fabricated the story because she was having sex with others. Seery v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2013 WL 683327 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 21 2013).

56. Trial court did not err by excluding evidence of the victim's prior sexual conduct with her boyfriend and subsequent abortion under Tex. R. Evid. 412 because evidence that the victim had engaged in sexual conduct with her boyfriend 11 days before the assault would not have explained or rebutted the State's medical evidence regarding notches a nurse observed on the victim's hymen that were indicative of an injury inflicted no more than 24 hours before the exam. The evidence regarding the victim's pregnancy and abortion did not support the theory that the victim fabricated a story that she was sexually assaulted by defendant in order to conceal the fact that she had previously had sexual contact with her boyfriend because the victim's assumption that her pregnancy resulted from the sexual assault was reasonable, since the pregnancy test given during the sexual assault exam was negative. Rivera v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7691, 2010 WL 3619945 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 15 2010).

57. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child who was younger than 14 case, defendant did not allege that there was any evidence controverting the victim's testimony that she and defendant had sexual intercourse of September 19, 2003; further, defendant did not explain how the probative value of evidence of the child's past sexual behavior outweighed the danger of undue prejudice; thus, defendant failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion in excluding the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 412. Guerrero v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3723 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 3 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

58. Even though the trial court erred by excluding a witness's testimony that the victim had performed oral sex on defendant two days before the sexual assault, as consent was at issue even before the witness testified and the evidence had probative value that outweighed the danger of undue prejudice, the error was harmless because defendant was able to produce considerable evidence that the victim had shown sexual interest in defendant before the assault. The witness testified that defendant and the victim had had sexually charged contact and had gone together into the witness's bedroom. Gotcher v. State, 435 S.W.3d 367, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6181, 2014 WL 2576061 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 10 2014).

59. No prejudice resulted from any error in excluding, from a sexual assault and kidnapping trial, recorded conversations between defendant and the victim because defendant was able to present the substance of his defense that the victim voluntarily met him and consented to all of the sexual interactions, and there was overwhelming evidence showing that she did not consent. Jordan v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5733, 2012 WL 2981103 (Tex. App. Austin July 11 2012).

60. Even if the trial court violated defendant's Confrontation Clause rights by excluding evidence of the victim's past sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412, the error was harmless because even though the victim's testimony against defendant was important to the State's case, the State relied on other testimony and scientific evidence to establish that defendant had sexually assaulted the victim; the victim's epithelial cells and defendant's sperm cells were found on two towels next to the bed that they shared and on a sheet taken from their bed and defendant's ex-wife and the victim's brother testified to suspicious behavior between defendant and the victim, including that they shared a bedroom. While defendant's testimony showed that the victim had threatened to tell the police about their relationship, it did not establish that she threatened to falsely accuse him of sexual assault. Green v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6147, 2011 WL 3426278 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 4 2011).

61. In a trial for a teacher's sexual assault of a minor student, there was no reversible error in the exclusion of evidence regarding the student's alleged prior sexual relationships, even if the trial court erred in failing to hold the required in camera hearing, because the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2; the hamlessness determination was based on a record that did not include the actual excluded testimony but did include the teacher's theory of what the testimony was expected to show. Evidence indicating that the student had intercourse with someone other than teacher did not, by itself, tend to prove or disprove that the student would fabricate sexual assault charges for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(C); further, the record included compelling evidence of an actual sexual relationship between teacher and the student. San Pedro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1552 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 27 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Procedural Default : General Overview

62. State prisoner, in his 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254 petition, argued that the complainant's prior statements were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b); the issue had been procedurally defaulted, however, and was barred from consideration by the federal habeas court; previously, in denying relief on this claim, the state habeas court based its decision upon the alternative grounds of procedural default and a rejection of the merits; in its turn, the federal court was obliged to deny habeas relief on account of the procedural default because the prisoner did not show good "cause" and "prejudice" or a miscarriage of justice. Galloway v. Dretke, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38726 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 12 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Procedural Default : Actual Innocence & Miscarriage of Justice

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Review : Specific Claims : Ineffective Assistance

65. Texas inmate who was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.011 was not entitled to habeas relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254 because his trial counsel was not ineffective in failing to argue during the punishment phase that the victim's sexual behavior was constitutionally required to be admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); the inmate failed to show that the evidence was both constitutionally required and relevant for purposes of Rule 412(b) or that the evidence would have been admitted had the argument been made. Piper v. Thaler, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1326 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 6 2011).

Evidence : Hearsay : General Overview

66. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault and solicitation of a minor, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit evidence showing that the complainant had knowledge of sexual matters before these alleged events occurred because the evidence was hearsay. While certain evidence of past activities may be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412, the latter does not trump application of the hearsay rules. Landers v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2982, 2011 WL 1496154 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 19 2011).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Prior Statements by Witnesses : General Overview

67. State trial court's exclusion of evidence of a complainant's statements prior to her involvement with the prisoner did not constitute error so extreme that it constituted denial of fundamental fairness and due process under the Fourteenth Amendment; the referenced hearsay statements, which the prisoner claimed were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b), were not of the complainant's prior sexual history or behavior, but rather, of her sexual awareness, attitudes, or wishes that did not rebut or explain the State's scientific evidence; therefore, the exclusion of the statements did not provide a basis for federal habeas corpus relief. Galloway v. Dretke, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38726 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 12 2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Curative Admissibility

68. There was no err in denying defendant's request to present testimony during the guilt/innocence phase from a physician that performed a pelvic examination of the complainant during the previous year based upon an allegation that defendant had sexually assaulted her at that time, because Tex. R. Evid. 412 contained five exceptions, and the rule of optional completeness under Tex. R. Evid. 107 was not listed as one of the exceptions. Williams v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8754, 2010 WL 4324430 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 28 2010).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

69. In an aggravated sexual assault case, the trial court properly excluded, under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(c), (b)(3), test results reporting that the complainant's blood tested positive for chlamydia; evidence indicating that the complainant had sex with someone else did not imply that she would fabricate sexual assault charges against defendant. Scott v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1872 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 10 2005).

70. Defendant did not establish the relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, of certain evidence regarding the alleged sexual relationship between the two victims, who were step-brothers, as a material issue in the case in which he was found guilty of two counts of fondling/indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, so as to justify admission of evidence of an alleged victim's sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); thus, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Hale v. State, 140 S.W.3d 381, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Rulings on Evidence

71. In camera proceeding contemplated by Tex. R. Evid. 412 is an adversarial hearing at which the parties are present and the attorneys are permitted to question witnesses. LaPointe v. State, 225 S.W.3d 513, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 505 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1015, 128 S. Ct. 544, 169 L. Ed. 2d 381 (2007).

72. State trial court's exclusion of evidence of a complainant's statements prior to her involvement with the prisoner did not constitute error so extreme that it constituted denial of fundamental fairness and due process under the Fourteenth Amendment; the referenced hearsay statements, which the prisoner claimed were admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b), were not of the complainant's prior sexual history or behavior, but rather, of her sexual awareness, attitudes, or wishes that did not rebut or explain the State's scientific evidence; therefore, the exclusion of the statements did not provide a basis for federal habeas corpus relief. Galloway v. Dretke, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38726 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 12 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

73. Even though the trial court erred by excluding a witness's testimony that the victim had performed oral sex on defendant two days before the sexual assault, as consent was at issue even before the witness testified and the evidence had probative value that outweighed the danger of undue prejudice, the error was harmless because defendant was able to produce considerable evidence that the victim had shown sexual interest in defendant before the assault. The witness testified that defendant and the victim had had sexually charged contact and had gone together into the witness's bedroom. Gotcher v. State, 435 S.W.3d 367, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6181, 2014 WL 2576061 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 10 2014).

74. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence of the minor victim's prior sexual conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 412 to explain the State's medical evidence because, even though the State opened the door to the victim's prior sexual history by asking whether ongoing sexual assaults could explain the nonexistence of trauma in a nonacute exam, the evidence could have been introduced without inquiry into the victim's prior sexual history, and therefore the probative value of the evidence did not outweigh its prejudicial effect. Seery v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2013 WL 683327 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 21 2013).

75. In defendant's indecency with a child case, the court did not err by excluding evidence related to the victim's sexual relationship with her boyfriend who lived at the residence where the events took place because the victim's sexual history and relationship with her boyfriend had little or no probative value. The defensive theory was that the victim was motivated to fabricate the allegations because of defendant's complaints to the victim about her boyfriend's failure to contribute to household expenses; however, evidence of the victim's sexual relationship with her boyfriend would show only that she was sexually active with an older male who lived in the apartment. Franklin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 619, 2010 WL 337334 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 29 2010).

76. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not err by excluding hearsay testimony about the victim's prior sexual activity as the probative value of this hearsay would not have outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. James v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7972 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 29 2005).

77. Trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding a child sexual assault victim's relationships with two different boys and her actions and comments involving two cousins did not deprive defendant of his constitutional right to a fair trial where the trial court could have determined, based on the chronology of the events, that they did not explain the State's medical evidence regarding the time of the penetration of the victim's hymen, and, although the trial court excluded the equivocal testimony of the victim's mother about the victim's veracity, the victim's aunt was allowed to testify that she had a bad reputation for being untruthful, and the victim herself admitted lying to defendant, her father, about her report card. Accordingly, the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the matters had, at best, marginal relevance to the victim's alleged motive to testify falsely against defendant, that they would have unduly harassed the victim and confused the issues, and that the danger of unfair prejudice from the evidence would have outweighed its probative value. Pogue v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7819 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2005).

78. Before a trial court may admit Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(A-E) evidence, it must find that the probative value of said evidence outweighs the danger of unfair prejudice. Mungaray v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2595 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 24 2004).

79. Trial court utilizes a two-step test in determining the admissibility of previous-sexual-conduct evidence: (1) the evidence must fall within one of the five enumerated circumstances in Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2); and (2) its probative value must outweigh the danger of unfair prejudice. Both prongs of the test must be established in order for the evidence to be admitted. Mungaray v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2595 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 24 2004).

80. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, the court did not err in refusing evidence of a purported previous sexual assault committed by defendant's brother upon the complainant. The probative value of this evidence was thin compared to the prejudicial effect it would have. Mungaray v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2595 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 24 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

81. Before a trial court may admit Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(A-E) evidence, it must find that the probative value of said evidence outweighs the danger of unfair prejudice. Mungaray v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2595 (Tex. App.

El Paso Mar. 24 2004).

82. Trial court utilizes a two-step test in determining the admissibility of previous-sexual-conduct evidence: (1) the evidence must fall within one of the five enumerated circumstances in Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2); and (2) its probative value must outweigh the danger of unfair prejudice. Both prongs of the test must be established in order for the evidence to be admitted. Mungaray v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2595 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 24 2004).

83. In a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, the court did not err in refusing evidence of a purported previous sexual assault committed by defendant's brother upon the complainant. The probative value of this evidence was thin compared to the prejudicial effect it would have. Mungaray v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2595 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 24 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

84. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by precluding defense counsel from asking a witness whether she saw the child victim play with her sexual organs based on Tex. R. Evid. 412 because the testimony was not enough to make it probable that a three-year-old child masturbating in some vague way two days before the assault caused the presence of physical trauma two days later. In addition, the incomplete information was of minimal probative value, even if relevant. Turner v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12690, 2013 WL 5614311 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 10 2013).

85. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because, with regard to the victim's alleged prior sexual behavior, other than her involvement, there was no similarity between those incidents and the current allegations against defendant currently, Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, and 412(b). Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

86. Evidence of sperm located on a victim's clothing after a sexual assault was not relevant at trial because there was no evidence that defendant ejaculated during the crime. Davis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3815 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 29 2004).

87. Defendant did not establish the relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, of certain evidence regarding the alleged sexual relationship between the two victims, who were step-brothers, as a material issue in the case in which he was found guilty of two counts of fondling/indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, so as to justify admission of evidence of an alleged victim's sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); thus, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Hale v. State, 140 S.W.3d 381, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : General Overview

88. There was no err in denying defendant's request to present testimony during the guilt/innocence phase from a physician that performed a pelvic examination of the complainant during the previous year based upon an allegation that defendant had sexually assaulted her at that time, because Tex. R. Evid. 412 contained five exceptions, and the rule of optional completeness under Tex. R. Evid. 107 was not listed as one of the exceptions. Williams v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8754, 2010 WL 4324430 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 28 2010).

89. Decision refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant regarding the sexual abuse allegations against her father was affirmed because defendant failed to demonstrate that cross-examining the complainant regarding her allegations against her father was constitutionally required, and the district court's decision to limit the cross-examination did not violate the defendant's constitutional right to confront the witnesses against him; evidence demonstrating that the complainant had made allegations against her father, without more, would not have been relevant to a determination of whether the complainant fabricated her allegations against defendant, defendant failed to produce any evidence indicating that the complainant's prior allegations against her father were false, and the complainant's credibility had already been impeached through the testimony of one of the State's witnesses indicating that the complainant had made false allegations against other individuals while in therapy. Davis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6360 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 9 2007).

90. Defendant argued on appeal that evidence of the victim's prior accusations was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412 and violated U.S. Const. amend. VI, but at trial, defendant did not mention Tex. R. Evid. 412(b) and did not argue that the Confrontation Clause applied; because defendant did not make an offer of proof, it was not clear whether defendant intended to recall prior witnesses or introduce testimony from a new witness, and because defendant failed to put the trial court on notice as to the evidence, no error was preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Estes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5028 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 13 2006).

91. In defendant's sexual assault on a child case, evidence that one victim had previously had sex with another victim did not fall under any of the exceptions to Tex. R. Evid. 412; the proposed question asked about any sexual activity between the victims occurring prior to the date of the incident, but that question was not highly probative of whether the victim had a motive to lie about sexual activity between the victims during the incident with defendant. Hatter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4516 (Tex. App. Austin May 26 2006).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Rape Shield Laws

92. Court properly excluded testimony because the proffered testimony centered on what the victim told the witness regarding a boy wanting to have sexual intercourse with her, and therefore, the testimony was improper under this section. Vega v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7948 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 24 2014).

93. During defendant's trial for sexual abuse of his daughter, the court did not err in prohibiting defendant from interrogating his daughter about her failure to report her brother's alleged sexual assault; there was no evidence or indication that her brother was her assailant instead of defendant, only that he was possibly an additional assailant. James v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6994 (Tex. App. Austin June 27 2014).

94. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in excluding evidence of two prior sexual abuse incidents because defendant made no effort to establish that the evidence fell into one of the five categories in Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2). Cowell v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6278, 2014 WL 2583675 (Tex. App. Dallas June 10 2014).

95. Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence concerning the complainant's claimed past sexual history involving another man, because defendant did not meet the threshold requirements of the rule for the court to conduct an in camera hearing, when defendant did not inform the court out of the jury's hearing prior to asking the question. Cuevas v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4844, 2014 WL 1830116 (Tex. App. Dallas May 5 2014).

96. Defendant's contention that the trial court improperly failed to hold an in camera hearing required by this rule was rejected because the trial court did hold such a hearing, permitted defense counsel to argue why the proffered evidence was admissible, made its ruling, and provided an explanation for it. Mbata v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3241, 2014 WL 1285756 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 26 2014).

97. Exclusion of testimony by defendant's wife, who was also the complainant's older sister, regarding the alleged prior sexual abuse of the complainant by the complainant's father was proper under the rape shield law because, to the extent that defendant sought to introduce the testimony to attack the identity element of the crime, the complained-of testimony was irrelevant to the issue of whether he committed the charged offenses of sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child during the time period described in the indictment; the complainant and her mother refuted the complained-of testimony. Johnson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1369, 2014 WL 505332 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 6 2014).

98. Court did not err in prohibiting cross-examination of the complainant regarding the matters discussed during the rape shield evidentiary hearings because the jury was cognizant of the complainant's purported motive or bias, which defendant's counsel emphasized in his closing argument, and the complainant's credibility was called into question when counsel vigorously cross-examined her, causing her to admit to lapses of memory and to try to explain contradicting portions of her testimony. Dees v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15404, 2013 WL 6869865 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 27 2013).

99. Court properly excluded testimony regarding the victim's prior "sexual act" involving alleged penetration of her vagina because witnesses did not give evidence of penetration, and the victim would have had private facts made public when those private facts did not serve to explain the presence of the tear in her hymen. Montgomery v. State, 415 S.W.3d 580, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13141, 2013 WL 5782920 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 22 2013).

100. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by precluding defense counsel from asking a witness whether she saw the child victim play with her sexual organs based on Tex. R. Evid. 412 because the testimony was not enough to make it probable that a three-year-old child masturbating in some vague way two days before the assault caused the presence of physical trauma two days later. In addition, the incomplete information was of minimal probative value, even if relevant. Turner v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12690, 2013 WL 5614311 (Tex. App. Amarillo Oct. 10 2013).

101. Trial court did not err by excluding evidence about the victim's past sexual behavior with her boyfriend because it was not necessary to rebut a physician's testimony, as the record showed that when the physician testified about the absence of malingering and secondary gain he was conveying his opinions about the statements the victim had made to him regarding the sexual abuse by defendant. Kissoon v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11045 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 29 2013).

102. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by impliedly concluding that the probative value of evidence of the complainant's sexual relationships with other individuals did not outweigh the danger of unfair prejudice and, thus, the proffered evidence was inadmissible. Ferree v. State, 416 S.W.3d 2, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10609 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 22 2013).

103. Appellant claimed counsel showed his unfamiliarity with the law, including Tex. R. Evid. 412, but appellant did not show that counsel performed deficiently in questioning the child concerning her sexual history in appellant's aggravated sexual assault of a child trial, and that another attorney would have pursued a different line of questioning did not overcome the presumption that counsel rendered reasonable assistance. Garcia v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2868, 2013 WL 1149288 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 20 2013).

104. Defendant's motion to unseal portions of the reporter's record that were sealed pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 412 was granted as to the attorneys of record because Rule 412 did not preclude unsealing the record of the in camera proceeding for defense counsel on appeal because it seemed better for the system of justice, as well as to assure defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel on appeal, that defendant's appellate counsel have limited access to the sealed record in order to assert the arguments he deemed best through the use of his professional judgment. The court further held that the complainant's privacy rights and defendant's right to a meaningful appeal could be adequately protected through specific orders from the court. Dees v. State, 508 S.W.3d 312, 2013 Tex.

105. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence of the minor victim's prior sexual conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 412 to explain the State's medical evidence because, even though the State opened the door to the victim's prior sexual history by asking whether ongoing sexual assaults could explain the nonexistence of trauma in a nonacute exam, the evidence could have been introduced without inquiry into the victim's prior sexual history, and therefore the probative value of the evidence did not outweigh its prejudicial effect. Seery v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2013 WL 683327 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 21 2013).

106. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the victim's prior sexual history to explain the existence of another male's DNA on his wife's mattress because there was no evidence that the victim's prior sexual conduct with anyone other than defendant ever occurred on the wife's bed. Seery v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2013 WL 683327 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 21 2013).

107. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the victim's prior sexual history to show the victim's motive to fabricate the allegations against defendant because he was not denied the opportunity to present his fabrication defense and the victim's prior sexual history did not tend to establish that she fabricated the story because she was having sex with others. Seery v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2013 WL 683327 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 21 2013).

108. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because, with regard to the victim's alleged prior sexual behavior, other than her involvement, there was no similarity between those incidents and the current allegations against defendant currently, Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402, 403, and 412(b). Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

109. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of two witnesses concerning the child victim's prior sexual history because defendant's defense was that the victim was lying, and he was not prohibited from presenting that defense at trial. Defendant had the opportunity to cross-examine the allege false impression left by the victim's testimony by cross-examining her at trial; he was not entitled to correct the alleged false impression by calling other witnesses. Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8246, 2012 WL 4497999 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 28 2012).

110. Where defendant was convicted for continuous sexual abuse of a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to allow him to cross-examine the victim about her sexual relations with her boyfriend. After holding an in camera hearing to determine whether the proposed evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412, the trial court sustained the prosecutor's relevance objection, and defense counsel withdrew the question. Dukes v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6151 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 26 2012).

111. Plain and ordinary meaning of the term "whore" is a woman who engages in sexual acts for money, but on the other hand, the plain and ordinary meaning of the term "bitch" is a lewd or immoral woman; the court believes that these terms are commonly used to reference "sexual matters," which would violate Tex. R. Evid. 412, plus the agreed-upon motion in limine between the parties in this case. Dale v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3127, 2012 WL 1382446 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 18 2012).

112. Victim referred to herself as a "bitch/whore" on her MySpace page, and this statement did not fall within any of the exceptions listed in Tex. R. Evid. 412(b); the admission was not necessary to rebut or explain evidence, the statement did not concern the history between the victim and appellant, the statement did not go to the issue of consent, the statement was not constitutionally required to be admitted, and the statement was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because it did not concern anything about the victim being convicted of a crime, and as the court did not see how the statement was necessary to show bias or motive, the trial court's decision to exclude the statement was not outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Dale v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3127, 2012 WL 1382446 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 18 2012).

113. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021 involving a four-year-old girl and where defendant sought to introduce evidence that the victim had been sexually abused by another family member prior to the accusations made against defendant to explain the testimony from the sexual assault nurse examiner who examined the child and found evidence that the child had engaged in sexual intercourse, the trial court did not err in ruling that the evidence was inadmissible and did not fall within the exception of Tex. R. Evid. 412 because there was no evidence of prior penetration even if there was evidence of touching and the sexual assault nurse could nto say when the victim's penetrating injury occurred. Alvarado v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1479, 2012 WL 593564 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

114. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault on his 12-year-old daughter, the trial court properly excluded a recent sexual incident involving the victim and a boy at school because nothing in the record established that the victim made any false rape allegation. Armstrong v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9760, 2011 WL 6188608 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 14 2011).

115. Court saw no connection between the victim's relationship with her female friend and any motive for her to exaggerate the incident in question involving appellant juvenile, and the nature of the victim's relationship with her friend did not make the victim's account of the incident involving appellant more or less probable; even assuming the victim were homosexual, a person's sexual orientation, alone, had no bearing on his or her propensity for truthfulness, and injecting evidence of a witness's sexual orientation into trial under circumstances like those in this case would risk derailing the focus of the trial and putting the victim on trial, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 412(a), (b)(2)(C). In re O.O.A., 358 S.W.3d 352, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7416 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 13 2011).

116. Evidence of one's sexual orientation may be relevant to show bias under unique circumstances when coupled with a logical connection to one's motive to testify in a certain manner, but that was not the case here, and the evidence of the victim's sexual orientation was inadmissible and irrelevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402; furthermore, under these circumstances when there was no connection between the victim's relationship with her female friend and any motive for her to exaggerate the incident involving appellant juvenile, any de minimis probative value of that information would be substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice in putting the victim on trial for her sexual orientation. In re O.O.A., 358 S.W.3d 352, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7416 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 13 2011).

117. Appellant did not attempt to explain how he was denied the opportunity to present a viable defense through the application of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(3), and he did not meet his burden to show how the rule permitted the admission of the testimony in question; as appellant did not show why the leeway discussed in case law should apply, the court could not allow him to forego addressing Rule 412(b)(3) and show how the supposed probative value of the evidence outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Nichols v. State, 349 S.W.3d 612, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7253 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 6 2011).

118. Case law did state that in trials involving sexual assault, the Rules of Evidence should be used sparingly to exclude relevant, otherwise admissible evidence that might bear upon the credibility of eitified in estimating a business's sales tax liability and authorized to employ an estimate and/or sampling audit procedure where the evidence at trial included: (1) a comptroller supervisor's testimony concerning required documents that the business did not provide; (2) documents showing the calculations and method employed by the audit division to estimate the tax deficiencies; (3) documents from the administrative proceeding as to the business's first audit; (4) written correspondence between the parties as to both audits; and (5) the comptroller's final determinations of the tax deficiencies. The trial court reasonably could have credited the State's testimonial and documentary evidence to find that the business did not provide the necessary documents during the audit period and to uphold the method employed by the auditors. Chitwood v. State, 350 S.W.3d 746, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7301 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 6 2011).

119. Even if the trial court violated defendant's Confrontation Clause rights by excluding evidence of the victim's past sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412, the error was harmless because even though the victim's testimony against defendant was important to the State's case, the State relied on other testimony and scientific evidence to establish that defendant had sexually assaulted the victim; the victim's epithelial cells and defendant's sperm cells were found on two towels next to the bed that they shared and on a sheet taken from their bed and defendant's ex-wife and the victim's brother testified to suspicious behavior between defendant and the victim, including that they shared a bedroom. While defendant's testimony showed that the victim had threatened to tell the police about their relationship, it did not establish that she threatened to falsely accuse him of sexual assault. Green v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6147, 2011 WL 3426278 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 4 2011).

120. Where defendant and the complainant met through a social networking website and the complainant represented that she was 18 years old, where the complainant accepted defendant's friend request and that gave defendant access to her private information, including that fact the complainant was actually 14 years of age, where the pair agreed to meet and defendant immediately recognized that the girl was under the age of 17, and where, according to the complainant, the pair had sex twice at defendant's apartment, and where defednant was charged with sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 412 in excluding evidence regarding the complainant's sexual history because a sexual assault complainant was not a volunteer for an exercise in character assassination and defendant's theory that the complainant lied about her involvement with him in order to protect her other sexual partners was simply too tenuous. Nevelow v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5543, 2011 WL 2899377 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 21 2011).

121. In a case where defendant was convicted of two counts of sexual assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.011, the excluded evidence, with which defendant attempted to show the victim's licentious character, was properly excluded as it did not fall into any of the Tex. R. Evid. 412 exceptions. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

122. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault and solicitation of a minor, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit evidence showing that the complainant had knowledge of sexual matters before these alleged events occurred because the evidence was hearsay. While certain evidence of past activities may be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412, the latter does not trump application of the hearsay rules. Landers v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2982, 2011 WL 1496154 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 19 2011).

123. Even assuming that a trial court erred in excluding evidence of a child sexual assault victim's past sexual behavior, the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(a) because the exclusion did not contribute to defendant's conviction; the State presented scientific evidence showing that the victim's epithelial cells and defendant's sperm cells were found on towels next to the bed they shared and on a sheet taken from the bed. Green v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2827, 2011 WL 1435638 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 14 2011).

124. Texas inmate who was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.011 was not entitled to habeas relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254 because his trial counsel was not ineffective in failing to argue during the punishment phase that the victim's sexual behavior was constitutionally required to be admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); the inmate failed to show that the evidence was both constitutionally required and relevant for purposes of Rule 412(b) or that the evidence would have been admitted had the argument been made. Piper v. Thaler, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1326 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 6 2011).

125. Trial court did not err by excluding evidence of the victim's prior sexual conduct with her boyfriend and subsequent abortion under Tex. R. Evid. 412 because evidence that the victim had engaged in sexual conduct with her boyfriend 11 days before the assault would not have explained or rebutted the State's medical evidence regarding notches a nurse observed on the victim's hymen that were indicative of an injury inflicted no more than 24 hours before the exam. The evidence regarding the victim's pregnancy and abortion did not support the theory that the victim fabricated a story that she was sexually assaulted by defendant in order to conceal the fact that she had previously had sexual contact with her boyfriend because the victim's assumption that her pregnancy resulted from the sexual assault was reasonable, since the pregnancy test given during the sexual assault exam was negative. Rivera v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7691, 2010 WL 3619945 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 15 2010).

126. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court, applying the balancing test in Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(3), properly prohibited defendant from cross-examining several witnesses about whether the victim had made accusations against others of sexual assault; evidence of the victim's conduct in other circumstances was of little relevance to the cogent question in the trial. Hubbard v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3408, 2010 WL 1818950 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 7 2010).

127. Tex. R. Evid. 412 restricts certain evidence that might otherwise be admissible; its exception from application to evidence "that is constitutionally required to be admitted," Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E), does nothing to trump the admissibility standards of Tex. R. Evid. 403 because both rules are subject to the same constitutional constraints. Hubbard v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3408, 2010 WL 1818950 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 7 2010).

128. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court did not err by excluding testimony by the victim that she had been previously sexually assaulted by a maintenance worker because the complained-of testimony was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); evidence that a third party laid down on the victim's back and "humped" her by moving in a back and forth motion while fully clothed was not sufficiently similar to defendant's licking the victim's female sexual organ, kissing her on the cheeks and mouth, and exposing his penis to her. Bryan v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2144, 2010 WL 1137038 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 25 2010).

129. Rule applies to evidence of a victim's "past sexual behavior," and courts do not limit its application to consensual behavior. Bryan v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2144, 2010 WL 1137038 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 25 2010).

130. Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(C) applies only to evidence relating to motive or bias of the alleged victim, not any third party. Bryan v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2144, 2010 WL 1137038 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 25 2010).

131. Court disagreed that the medical evidence was vague and thus the court could not conclude that the victim's prior sexual history was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(A) to rebut or explain the evidence the State offered; there was no indication that the victim's sexual history would reveal that she had a relationship with any of defendant's male blood relatives, who were included in the donor pool. Reyes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8842, 2009 WL 3856198 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 18 2009).

132. Court disagreed that the victim's prior sexual history was necessary to attack the victim's credibility because the evidence did not meet any of the exceptions listed in Tex. R. Evid. 412 and thus the trial court did not err in refusing to admit the victim's prior sexual history. Reyes v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8842, 2009 WL 3856198 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 18 2009).

133. Court found no error in the supplementation of the record in this case, given that the court reporter sealed the transcript for delivery to the court for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 412(d); defendant was not entitled to review the sealed record from the in camera hearing conducted pursuant to Rule 412 to determine what complaints to raise on appeal. Escobar v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8118 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 21 2009).

134. Following case law, the court applies Tex. R. Evid. 412 in the limited context where an underlying sexual assault offense predicates a non-sexual assault charge. Woods v. State, 301 S.W.3d 327, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 10 2009).

135. Because the underlying offense in the instant case was sexual assault, the court applied Tex. R. Evid. 412 in determining the admissibility of the victim's prior sexual assault and of counseling she had received relating to the prior assault. Woods v. State, 301 S.W.3d 327, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 10 2009).

136. Victim's previous sexual assault did not fit within any of the enumerated exceptions under Tex. R. Evid. 412, given that (1) the prior assault was not necessary to rebut evidence offered by the State, (2) the prior assault did not involve defendant and he failed to show in what way the previous assault showed the victim's bias, if any, (3) the previous assault was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 nor constitutionally required to be admitted, and (4) because the previous assault was not probative, that value, if any, was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(3), such that the victim's previous sexual assault and counseling was inadmissible under Rule 412. Woods v. State, 301 S.W.3d 327, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 10 2009).

137. Even if Tex. R. Evid. 412 was not applicable, the victim's sexual history was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 403, given that there was nothing reflecting that the prior sexual assault made the victim's lack of consent more or less probable and the probative value, if any, was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect because the evidence had the potential to impress the jury in a irrational and indelible way and defendant cited to little if any need for the evidence. Woods v. State, 301 S.W.3d 327, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7252 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 10 2009).

138. In a case in which defendant was convicted of five counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021(a)(1)(B), (2)(B), although the complainant's credibility was an issue because she was the sole witness to the alleged sexual conduct by defendant, the trial court did not abuse its discretion or violate defendant's confrontation rights by preventing the jury from viewing her pregnancy based on Tex. R. Evid. 412 because defendant had not shown that her pregnancy was relevant to motive or bias, and because the exclusion served to avoid prejudice to the complainant and confusion of the issues. When the complainant was on the witness stand, the jury had an unobstructed view of her face, so they could observe her demeanor and assess her credibility, and defendant was not prevented from cross-examining her. Morgan v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3402, 2009 WL 1372965 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 14 2009).

139. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing defendant from cross-examining the complainant about her previous false allegations of sexual assault. The evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412 to show the complainant's bias against defendant and her possible motive to testify falsely against him. Hammer v. State, 296 S.W.3d 555, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 513 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

140. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit evidence of the daughter's past sexual history because the evidence did not come within any exception to Tex. R. Evid. 412's general prohibition and the daughter did not testify to her own sexual experience or lack thereof. Biggers v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8439 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 6, 2008).

141. Defendant waived any argument based on Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E) by failing to argue in the trial court that the nurse's testimony was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E). Murphy v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 4372 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 5 2008).

142. In defendant's criminal prosecution for sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in refusing to allow his request to introduce evidence regarding the child's past sexual conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 412; the doctor's physical findings did not conclusively show that the child was sexually abused by defendant; therefore, the fact that she had sex with his younger brother was immaterial. Rivera v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2992 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 24 2008).

143. Appellant's aggravated sexual assault conviction was upheld because it was not an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of the complainant's kissing and flirting with another person at a party under a "rape shield" law since, inter alia, (1) evidence of the complainant's sexual conduct with another man, whether a stranger or not, was not evidence of consent with appellant, and (2) appellant provided no support for the argument that the evidence was probative of the complainant's "motive and bias" in testifying about whether the encounter with appellant was consensual. Barrera v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8662 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 31 2007).

144. Defense counsel's concise statement and examination of the victim's father was reasonably specific to have shown the trial court the substance of the excluded evidence and to preserve error for review, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33, Tex. R. Evid. 103; counsel made a reasonably specific summary of the evidence and argued the relevancy thereof, it was apparent by the State's Tex. R. Evid. 412 objection that it knew the precise nature of the excluded evidence, and the trial court was aware of the testimony defendant was trying to illicit by the nature of the trial court's ruling. Ladesic v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8106 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 11 2007).

145. Although defendant argued that certain factors showed the victim's motive in accusing defendant of sexual assault, the evidence suggesting that she lied about their sexual encounters was extremely thin; defendant did not demonstrate a definite and logical link between the victim's past sexual conduct and the alleged motive and bias under Tex. R. Evid. 412, and thus the trial court did not err in excluding the evidence to show the victim's motive or bias, and additionally, what little probative value, if any, the other "sexual acts" content provided would have been far outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice and embarrassment to the victim, especially given her young age. Ladesic v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8106 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 11 2007).

146. In defendant's trial for sexual assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.011, there was no evidence regarding either counsel's strategy regarding the failure to bring forth evidence of an alleged sexual relationship between defendant and the victim, and it was possible that second counsel proceeded as he did because he knew that trial counsel would have testified that defendant never told him about the relationship, and thus defendant failed to overcome the presumption that second counsel's conduct was reasonable; even if trial counsel had acknowledged being told of the claimed relationship, there was no reasonable probability that this would have affected the outcome of the proceeding because defendant testified that the alleged penetration of the victim's mouth did not occur, and in light of his denial, trial counsel could have reasonably concluded that consent was not an issue and there was no basis under Tex. R. Evid. 412 for the admission of evidence regarding the victim's past sexual conduct. Brissette v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7941 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 2 2007).

147. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence regarding the victim's prior sexual behavior for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 412; the victim's testimony that she did not know what was happening referred to defendant sexually assaulting her, and although defense counsel argued that defendant's presence at the victim's house was part of an ongoing pattern of the victim having people over for the purpose of having sex, the evidence did not support this conclusion, as the victim had sex with one other person and the fact that she was afraid to tell her mother about defendant for fear her mother would learn of her past sexual activity in no way impeached her credibility concerning whether defendant forced her to have sex with him. Ezell v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS

7712 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 26 2007).

148. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve error regarding his inquiry into complainant's sexual experience by not making an offer of proof; the reviewing court rejected the argument that it should have been apparent to the trial court that defendant was attempting to introduce medical evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 412. Alfaro v. State, 224 S.W.3d 426, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10463 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

149. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021(a)(1)(B)(ii), evidence of an alleged prior sexual encounter between defendant and the 13-year-old complainant was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 412(a); the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(B) as evidence of consent because consent was irrelevant to the charge of aggravated sexual assault of a child, nor was the evidence admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(B) absent any explanation by defendant as to how the alleged prior encounter would have tended to show motive and bias by the complainant. James v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9274 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 26 2006).

150. Under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E), the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it decided that evidence of the victim's prior sexual history was inadmissible to attack her credibility because (1) the victim testified, in an in camera hearing, to participating in sexual activities with a cousin in the first grade and when she was 14 or 15 years old; (2) she did not retract or deny those statements at any time; and (3) defendant did not offer any evidence to establish the falsity of the victim's claim. Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8826 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 12 2006).

151. Even if the victim's prior sexual activity was part of the reason for a staged suicide attempt, it was not apparent how it showed motive or bias or was otherwise probative, and the court found that defendant did not seek admission of the excluded evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 412, nor did defendant 's brief challenge the trial court's ruling that the evidence was unfairly prejudicial, such that the issues were not preserved for review. Molinar v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8373 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 26 2006).

152. Although defendant attempted during the punishment phase to recall the victim to develop her sexual history, Tex. R. Evid. 412 was not limited in its applicability to the guilt-innocence phase of the trial. Molinar v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8373 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 26 2006).

153. Court noted that under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1), evidence could be offered on relevant issues during sentencing, and defendant did not explain how the victim's past sexual relationships with others or the extent of the appearance of a relationship between defendant and the victim would have had any bearing on punishment or mitigation, let alone for any purpose that would have been allowed under Tex. R. Evid. 412, such that the trial court did not err in excluding this testimony. Molinar v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8373 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 26 2006).

154. In a child sexual assault case, defendant was not denied the right to confront and cross-examine the complainant about allegations of previous sexual behavior because defendant's trial objections did not raise his constitutional rights, nor did they apprise the trial court that the evidence should have been admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 412; accordingly, defendant failed to preserve error on the issue of his constitutional right to confront the complainant. Leachman v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7345 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 17 2006).

155. Court acknowledged the trial court's concern that conducting a hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 412 did not alleviate the emotional impact on the victim of answering questions from the accused regarding her past sexual conduct; however, Tex. R. Evid. 412 acts primarily as an evidentiary shield, preventing the defendant from shifting the focus of trial from his conduct to the character of the victim, and to the extent it is shown that a witness is uniquely vulnerable or needs protection from specific acts of intimidation, the trial court has discretion to fashion a remedy that both protects the witness and ensures adequate confrontation, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 611(a). LaPointe v. State, 196 S.W.3d 831, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

156. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the victim's statements made during an emergency room visit; even taking the report as true, the evidence was not admissible as an exception under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b), the report at best contained only speculation by the victim that she might have been sexually assaulted, and the victim testified to making up the story to cover for the real reason for her injuries. LaPointe v. State, 196 S.W.3d 831, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

157. Defendant was given latitude in exploring the victim's prior sexual conduct at the in camera hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 412 and despite the questioning, defendant did not elicit admissible evidence of such conduct; evidence of the victim's relationship with another man and the fact that he could not be excluded as a contributor of DNA found on a bottle collected from defendant's apartment was admitted at defendant's trial for aggravated kidnapping, assault-family violence, and aggravated sexual assault. LaPointe v. State, 196 S.W.3d 831, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

158. Defendant did not present any expert testimony or establish that the victim's bipolar disorder or problems with substance abuse would have affected the victim's ability to recall the events or testify at trial, and the jury heard of the victim's hospitalization for alcoholism, and the trial court did not err in excluding further evidence of the disorder and abuse problems in the in camera hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 412. LaPointe v. State, 196 S.W.3d 831, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

159. Court's opinion abating defendant's appeal was not a reviewable decision, and thus defendant's pro se petition for discretionary review was not a proper petition and could not have deprived the trial court of jurisdiction, and thus the trial court had jurisdiction to conduct the hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 412 that the court had ordered. LaPointe v. State, 196 S.W.3d 831, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

160. Right to confrontation entitled defendant to question witnesses regarding motive and bias at trial, and the record did not indicate that any limitations were placed on defendant's ability to raise certain issues before the jury; Tex. R. Evid. 412 only prohibited cross-examination with regard to instances of prior sexual conduct, and the trial court correctly limited the scope of the hearing to eliciting specific evidence of the victim's prior sexual conduct. LaPointe v. State, 196 S.W.3d 831, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

161. Although defendant vaguely asserted that time did not permit the issuance of subpoenas for medical records, defendant did not show what records were sought or how they were useful, and the trial court did not err in overruling in part defendant's continuance motion or by denying defendant's request to recall another witness in connection with hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 412. LaPointe v. State, 196 S.W.3d 831, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

162. Trial court's in camera hearing was conducted in compliance with Tex. R. Evid. 412 and the court overruled defendant's related issues. LaPointe v. State, 196 S.W.3d 831, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4736 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

163. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child who was younger than 14 case, defendant did not allege that there was any evidence controverting the victim's testimony that she and defendant had sexual intercourse of September 19, 2003; further, defendant did not explain how the probative value of evidence of the child's past sexual behavior outweighed the danger of undue prejudice; thus, defendant failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion in excluding the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 412. Guerrero v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3723 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 3 2006).

164. In defendant's criminal prosecution for sexual assault of a child, the nurse testified that the complainant's hymen had been torn by blunt force trauma. The complainant was permitted to testify that defendant was the only person with whom she had sexual intercourse; no violation of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b) was shown, because the complainant's testimony concerned the absence of past sexual behavior. Ghant v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 13 2006).

165. In defendant's criminal prosecution for sexual assault of a child, the trial court denied defendant's request to question the victim concerning prior sexual abuse by her uncle. Ghant v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 13 2006).

166. In defendant's criminal prosecution for sexual assault of a child, the nurse testified that the complainant's hymen had been torn by blunt force trauma; the complainant was permitted to testify that defendant was the only person with whom she had sexual intercourse; no violation of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b) was shown, because the complainant's testimony concerned the absence of past sexual behavior. Ghant v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 13 2006).

167. In defendant's criminal prosecution for sexual assault of a child, the trial court denied defendant's request to question the victim concerning prior sexual abuse by her uncle. Ghant v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 13 2006).

168. In an aggravated sexual assault case against a juvenile, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 412(a), the trial court properly excluded testimony that the victim was seen simulating sex with two dolls. In re J.G., 195 S.W.3d 161, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 812 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

169. Because defendant did not show that his seven-year-old sexual assault victim made any false prior allegations of sexual abuse against her twelve year-old neighbor that were similar to the allegations in defendant's case, and because the trial court could limit cross-examination to prevent confusion of the issues and undue prejudice, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in limiting cross-examination to exclude such references. Lempar v. State, 191 S.W.3d 230, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10667 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

170. Trial court did not err in excluding testimony of a witness concerning the victim's sexual activities; the testimony consisted of speculation that the victim and another engaged in some sort of sexual activity, the court questioned whether the evidence qualified as a specific instance of past sexual behavior as contemplated by Tex. R. Evid. 412, it was difficult to find that the evidence explained or rebutted the medical evidence, for purposes of Rule 412(b)(2)(A), and the prejudicial effect of the testimony outweighed the probative value such that the evidence constituted inadmissible hearsay. Kennedy v. State, 184 S.W.3d 309, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10126 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

171. By Tex. R. Evid. 412's express language, the issues regarding the victim's allegations of abuse and alleged fabrication did not concern defendant's indecency with a child convictions. Kennedy v. State, 184 S.W.3d 309, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10126 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

172. Evidence from a witness that the victim said she had 33 sexual partners did not rebut or explain, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(A), the medical evidence, given that there was no evidence as to when the alleged encounters took place, and the excluded evidence constituted inadmissible hearsay; even if the trial court had been incorrect in its application of Rule 412, the court would have upheld the ruling on an alternative holding. Kennedy v. State, 184 S.W.3d 309, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10126 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

173. Trial court's exclusion of evidence regarding a child sexual assault victim's relationships with two different boys and her actions and comments involving two cousins did not deprive defendant of his constitutional right to a fair trial where the trial court could have determined, based on the chronology of the events, that they did not explain the State's medical evidence regarding the time of the penetration of the victim's hymen, and, although the trial court excluded the equivocal testimony of the victim's mother about the victim's veracity, the victim's aunt was allowed to testify that she had a bad reputation for being untruthful, and the victim herself admitted lying to defendant, her father, about her report card. Accordingly, the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the matters had, at best, marginal relevance to the victim's alleged motive to testify falsely against defendant, that they would have unduly harassed the victim and confused the issues, and that the danger of unfair prejudice from the evidence would have outweighed its probative value. Pogue v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7819 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2005).

174. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, as defense counsel had no evidence of the victim's prior sexual history to rebut medical evidence and only sought to admit testimony about the victim's sexual activities after her physical examination, the testimony was irrelevant and therefore inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412. Castellanos v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6621 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 18 2005).

175. Excluded testimony only established that the victim had previously used condoms during sex, but it did not establish that the sexual intercourse between she and defendant was consensual, and the appellate court agreed with the State's contentions both at trial and on appeal that the evidence did not fall within any of the Tex. R. Evid. 412 exceptions for admitting specific instances of previous sexual conduct; therefore, the trial court's ruling denying defendant the opportunity to cross-examine the victim about her prior sexual experience with condoms was not in error. Patel v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6023 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 28 2005).

176. Tex. R. App. P. 412(c) required the trial court to afford defendant and his counsel an opportunity to be present and cross-examine the alleged victim at an in camera hearing to determine the admissibility of evidence of the alleged victim's previous sexual conduct; although the trial court erred in barring defendant's counsel from the in camera hearing, the trial court could, pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 44.4, correct the error by holding a proper hearing and again making a determination of what evidence would be admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412. LaPointe v. State, 166 S.W.3d 287, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3153 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

177. Evidence of the complainant's relationship with other adult men was not evidence regarding either the circumstances of the offense or defendant himself, nor is it evidence a juror might have regarded as reducing defendant's moral blameworthiness; therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the complainant's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 412 and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a). Ellison v. State, 165 S.W.3d 774, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2776 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2005).

178. District court violated defendant's right to confront witnesses against him, and it deprived him of the right to effective assistance of counsel, when it excluded defense counsel from an in camera hearing with the complainant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 412. There was nothing about the rape shield law's requirements that prohibited counsel from attending the hearing. LaPointe v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1968 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 17 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 166 S.W.3d 287, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3153 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

179. Trial court's failure to afford parties the opportunity to be present at an in camera hearing and to examine an alleged rape victim regarding specific instances of previous sexual conduct violates a defendant's constitutional rights to confrontation and to effective assistance of counsel. LaPointe v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1968 (Tex.

App. Austin Mar. 17 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 166 S.W.3d 287, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3153 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

180. In an aggravated sexual assault case, the trial court properly excluded, under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(c), (b)(3), test results reporting that the complainant's blood tested positive for chlamydia; evidence indicating that the complainant had sex with someone else did not imply that she would fabricate sexual assault charges against defendant. Scott v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1872 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 10 2005).

181. There was no abuse of discretion by not allowing the witness to testify about the victim's alleged history of prostitution in defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault because defendant did not argue that the excluded testimony satisfied the minimum requirement of relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, nor had defendant argued that if the excluded testimony was relevant, it properly fell within the confines of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b). Orellana v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 380 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 20 2005).

182. In a sexual assault case, a court properly excluded evidence of the victim's fight with her boyfriend and her antidepression medication where those circumstances did not involve specific instances of the victim's past sexual behavior. Chavira v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5653 (Tex. App. Tyler June 23 2004).

183. Tex. R. Evid. 412 was inapplicable because the testimony by the victim's uncle did not concern the victim's sexual reputation or prior sexual behavior, but rather her threat to falsely accuse him if he did not change his behavior towards her. Hamrick v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4418 (Tex. App. El Paso May 13 2004).

184. The victim's sending a picture of herself in a swimsuit over the internet to a boy was not within the meaning of "sexual behavior" under Tex. R. Evid. 412; therefore, Tex. R. Evid. 412 was not the appropriate rule for determining the admissibility of this evidence. Because the victim's sending a picture of herself in a swimsuit over the internet to a boy tended to establish motive, it should have been admitted, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), subject to the balancing test of Tex. R. Evid. 403. Thomas v. State, 137 S.W.3d 792, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4361 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

185. Trial court did not err by refusing to exclude evidence that a victim of sexual abuse had been involved in other sexual contact because there was nothing to show that the other activities established the victim's bias or motive; the minor victim alleged that sexual contact had also occurred with a 17-year-old and a seven-year-old. Leachman v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3283 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 8 2004).

186. Defendant did not establish the relevancy, Tex. R. Evid. 401, of certain evidence regarding the alleged sexual relationship between the two victims, who were step-brothers, as a material issue in the case in which he was found guilty of two counts of fondling/indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, so as to justify admission of evidence of an alleged victim's sexual behavior under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); thus, the evidence was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 402. Hale v. State, 140 S.W.3d 381, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2333 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

187. Under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b), in a prosecution for sexual assault, evidence of specific instances of an alleged victim's past sexual behavior is not admissible except in limited circumstances. Hughes v. State, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 7624 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 15 2001).

188. Evidence of one victim's prior sexual conduct was unnecessary to rebut or explain medical testimony offered by state; thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding such evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b). Hughes v. State, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 7624 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 15 2001).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Acts

189. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the court did not err by excluding testimony by the victim that she had been previously sexually assaulted by a maintenance worker because the complained-of testimony was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E); evidence that a third party laid down on the victim's back and "humped" her by moving in a back and forth motion while fully clothed was not sufficiently similar to defendant's licking the victim's female sexual organ, kissing her on the cheeks and mouth, and exposing his penis to her. Bryan v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2144, 2010 WL 1137038 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 25 2010).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Crimes : General Overview

190. In defendant's indecency with a child case, the court did not err by excluding evidence related to the victim's sexual relationship with her boyfriend who lived at the residence where the events took place because the victim's sexual history and relationship with her boyfriend had little or no probative value. The defensive theory was that the victim was motivated to fabricate the allegations because of defendant's complaints to the victim about her boyfriend's failure to contribute to household expenses; however, evidence of the victim's sexual relationship with her boyfriend would show only that she was sexually active with an older male who lived in the apartment. Franklin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 619, 2010 WL 337334 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 29 2010).

191. Evidence of sperm located on a victim's clothing after a sexual assault was not relevant at trial because there was no evidence that defendant ejaculated during the crime. Davis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3815 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 29 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Crimes : Child Molestation Cases

192. Where defendant was convicted of indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, he failed to prove that the trial court erred by ruling that a question concerning the witness' prior false allegation of abuse was improper under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) which forbade inquiry into specific instances of a witness' conduct for the purpose of attacking or impeaching that witness' credibility. While the State's objection was based on Tex. R. Evid. 412, it did not apply in this case because the alleged false accusations concerned defendant's alleged molestation of his biological daughter and not the alleged victim. Pierson v. State, 398 S.W.3d 406, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4868 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 19 2013).

193. Because defendant did not raise certain arguments under Tex. R. Evid. 412 before the trial court, nor were the complaints apparent from the context in which they occurred, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant did not preserve error for review; the trial court indicated that the testimony sought was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412 and defendant made an offer of proof, but defendant did not offer any other grounds for admitting the excluded testimony when the offer of proof was made. Denton v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6662 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 27 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : General Overview

194. Under Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(E), the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it decided that evidence of the victim's prior sexual history was inadmissible to attack her credibility because (1) the victim testified, in an in camera hearing, to participating in sexual activities with a cousin in the first grade and when she was 14 or 15 years old; (2) she did not retract or deny those statements at any time; and (3) defendant did not offer any evidence to establish the falsity of the victim's claim. Thomas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8826 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 12 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : General Overview

195. In defendant's trial for sexual assault on a child, defendant argued that the trial court failed to permit him to question the victim about entries in her diaries relating to her sexual activity with persons other than defendant, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(C); however, any motive the complainant might have had to concoct a sexual assault charge against defendant was well developed by defendant's counsel at trial, without resort to evidence of the other alleged sexual liaisons with boys. Herrera v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1703 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 20 2004).

196. In defendant's trial for sexual assault on a child, defendant argued that the trial court failed to permit him to question the victim about entries in her diaries relating to her sexual activity with persons other than defendant, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 412(b)(2)(C); however, any motive the complainant might have had to concoct a sexual assault charge against defendant was well developed by defendant's counsel at trial, without resort to evidence of the other alleged sexual liaisons with boys. Herrera v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1703 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 20 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : Specific Instances

197. Trial court's decision to deny defendant the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses about the victim's accusation of sexual assault against another person was not an abuse of discretion because specific instances could not be inquired into under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), defendant never made a showing that the victim's allegation was false, and defendant was allowed to cross-examine witnesses regarding the victim's recantation of her accusation against her brother. Odom v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5009, 2014 WL 1882754 (Tex. App. Waco May 8 2014).

198. Where defendant was convicted of indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, he failed to prove that the trial court erred by ruling that a question concerning the witness' prior false allegation of abuse was improper under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) which forbade inquiry into specific instances of a witness' conduct for the purpose of attacking or impeaching that witness' credibility. While the State's objection was based on Tex. R. Evid. 412, it did not apply in this case because the alleged false accusations concerned defendant's alleged molestation of his biological daughter and not the alleged victim. Pierson v. State, 398 S.W.3d 406, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4868 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 19 2013).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bias, Motive & Prejudice

199. At defendant's trial for the aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court erred because it refused to allow defendant to cross-examine the State's witnesses in violation of his Sixth Amendment right to confrontation regarding the complainant's sexual assault of his younger sister. The impeachment evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412 to correct a false impression left with the jury that the complainant's emotional problems, watching pornography, and need for counseling arose as a result of his victimization by defendant. Johnson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1515, 2013 WL 531079 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 14 2013).

200. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing defendant from cross-examining the complainant about her previous false allegations of sexual assault. The evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 412 to show the complainant's bias against defendant and her possible motive to testify falsely against him. Hammer v. State, 296 S.W.3d 555, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 513 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : General Overview

201. In defendant's trial for sexual assault on a child, defendant argued that the trial court failed to permit him to question the victim about entries in her diaries relating to her sexual activity with persons other than defendant, in violation of Tex. 2. Although a lottery commission maintained that settlement letters were expressly excepted from disclosure under Tex. Gov't Code Ann. § 552.101 because they contained information considered confidential by judicial decision, there is, however, no judicially recognized privilege exempting settlement negotiations from disclosure, nor do Texas courts recognize a common-law right to withhold settlement negotiations as confidential communications; although settlement negotiations are inadmissible at trial to prove liability for or invalidity of a claim or its amount under Tex. R. Evid. 408, they are admissible for other purposes and are not exempt from discovery under the rules of civil procedure or evidence, as Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.3 allowed discovery of matters not privileged that were relevant and Tex. R. Evid. 408, 501-513 identified discovery privileges, none of which protects settlement negotiations. Abbott v. Gametech Int'l, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4554, 2009 WL 1708815 (Tex. App. Austin June 17 2009).

Evidence : Privileges : General Overview

4. District attorney and the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services raised various arguments as to why the officer's testimony was privileged, but (1) there was no rule or statute that gave police officers a privilege from being called to testify, (2) Tex. R. Evid. 501 stated that except as otherwise provided, no person had a privilege to refuse to be a witness, (3) the full nature and extent of the officer's testimony was not easily ascertainable before the officer actually testified, (4) the court was not provided with a basis upon which the court could evaluate the officer's future testimony, and (5) there were procedural tools that could be used to prohibit disclosure of privileged information; the court could not find that the trial court erred in compelling the officer to testify, such that mandamus relief was not appropriate. In re Hays County Crim. Dist. Attorney's Office & Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8088, 2010 WL 3927615 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 1 2010).

6. Essential to a case law holding was the concept that federal courts were authorized under Fed. R. Evid. 501 to determine new discovery privileges, but Texas courts have no such authority; Tex. R. Evid. 501 provides that only privileges grounded in certain specified sources--the Constitution, statute, the rules of evidence, or other rules established pursuant to statute--are recognized in Texas, and the court has no authority to create a new common-law discovery privilege protecting settlement negotiations. Abbott v. Gametech Int'l, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4554, 2009 WL 1708815 (Tex. App. Austin June 17 2009).

7. Tex. R. Evid. 501 did not recognize a private investigator privilege and the investigators' reliance on the Texas Private Investigators and Private Security Agencies Act, Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 1702.001 et seq., was misplaced because the investigators could be compelled by a trial court in a civil matter to disclose information. Landry v. Burge, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 6606 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 2 2000).

9. In proceedings to terminate a mother's parental rights to four children, the trial court properly admitted the testimony and report of a psychologist who examined the mother because the mother was informed her communications with the psychologist would not be privileged, the communications occurred in a court-ordered evaluation that related to the mother's mental or emotional condition, and the psychologist's evaluation was relevant to the mother's abilities to parent the children. 12. In a nuisance and negligence case, several homeowners were required to disclose the names and telephone numbers of persons contacted in a telephone poll under Tex. R. Civ. P. 194.2(f)(4)(A) because the results of the poll were relied upon by their testifying expert, and the documents were not privileged as a scientific study under Tex. R. Evid. 501 or 45 C.F.R. § 46.116(a)(5). In re Jobe Concrete Prods., 101 S.W.3d 122, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9268 (Tex. App. El Paso 2002).

1. Denial of relator's mandamus proceeding after the trial court ordered relator to produce documents that relator contended were not subject to discovery relief was proper, in part because the absence of statutory protection for reports to the Consumer Product Safety Act was also fatal to any argument that the Rule provided a basis for the recognition of a self-critical analysis privilege. Rule 503 Lawyer-Client Privilege

(a) Definitions.--In this rule:

(1)A "client" is a person, public officer, or corporation, association, or other organization or entity - whether public or private - that:

(A)is rendered professional legal services by a lawyer; or

(B)consults a lawyer with a view to obtaining professional legal services from the lawyer.

(2)A "client's representative" is:

(A)a person who has authority to obtain professional legal services for the client or to act for the client on the legal advice rendered; or

(B)any other person who, to facilitate the rendition of professional legal services to the client, makes or receives a confidential communication while acting in the scope of employment for the client.

(3)A "lawyer" is a person authorized, or who the client reasonably believes is authorized, to practice law in any state or nation.

(4)A "lawyer's representative" is:

(A)one employed by the lawyer to assist in the rendition of professional legal services; or

(B)an accountant who is reasonably necessary for the lawyer's rendition of professional legal services.

(5)A communication is "confidential" if not intended to be disclosed to third persons other than those:

(A)to whom disclosure is made to further the rendition of professional legal services to the client; or

(B)reasonably necessary to transmit the communication.

(b) Rules of Privilege.

(1) General Rule.--A client has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent any other person from disclosing confidential communications made to facilitate the rendition of professional legal services to the client:

(A)between the client or the client's representative and the client's lawyer or the lawyer's representative;

(B)between the client's lawyer and the lawyer's representative;

(C)by the client, the client's representative, the client's lawyer, or the lawyer's representative to a lawyer representing another party in a pending action or that lawyer's representative, if the communications concern a matter of common interest in the pending action;

(D)between the client's representatives or between the client and the client's representative; or

(E) among lawyers and their representatives representing the same client.

(2) Special Rule in a Criminal Case.--In a criminal case, a client has a privilege to prevent a lawyer or lawyer's representative from disclosing any other fact that came to the knowledge of the lawyer or the lawyer's representative by reason of the attorney-client relationship.

(c) Who May Claim.--The privilege may be claimed by:

(1) the client;

(2) the client's guardian or conservator;

(3) a deceased client's personal representative; or

(4) the successor, trustee, or similar representative of a corporation, association, or other organization or entity - whether or not in existence.

The person who was the client's lawyer or the lawyer's representative when the communication was made may claim the privilege on the client's behalf - and is presumed to have authority to do so.

(d) Exceptions.--This privilege does not apply:

(1) Furtherance of Crime or Fraud.--If the lawyer's services were sought or obtained to enable or aid anyone to commit or plan to commit what the client knew or reasonably should have known to be a crime or fraud.

(2) Claimants Through Same Deceased Client.--If the communication is relevant to an issue between parties claiming through the same deceased client.

(3) Breach of Duty By a Lawyer or Client.--If the communication is relevant to an issue of breach of duty by a lawyer to the client or by a client to the lawyer.

(4) Document Attested By a Lawyer.--If the communication is relevant to an issue concerning an attested document to which the lawyer is an attesting witness.

(5) Joint Clients.--If the communication:

(A) is offered in an action between clients who retained or consulted a lawyer in common;

(B) was made by any of the clients to the lawyer; and

(C) is relevant to a matter of common interest between the clients.

1. Chapter 7 trustee was correct when he claimed that some documents he was ordered to produce in an adversary proceeding were privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 503 irrespective of the common interest privilege, and did not have to be produced. However, the court rejected the trustee's argument that the applicable date for applying the common interest privilege was the date the debtor declared bankruptcy and not the date the trustee filed his adversary proceeding; Rule 503(b)(1)(C) had a "pending action" requirement, and the date the trustee filed his action was the date that requirement arose. Schmidt v. Rodriguez (in re Rodriguez), 2012 Bankr. LEXIS 4233 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Sept. 12 2012).

Civil Procedure : Counsel : General Overview

2. In a divorce action, the trial court properly denied the husband's motion to substitute counsel on the ground of disqualification under Tex. Disciplinary R. Prof. Conduct 1.09(a)(3), because the wife had consulted an attorney from the same firm; the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the wife, who was a client as defined in Tex. R. Evid. 503(a)(1), divulged confidential information, within the meaning of Tex. Disc. R. Prof. Conduct 1.05(a), during her meeting with the attorney. In re Gerry, 173 S.W.3d 901, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8637 (Tex. App. Tyler 2005).

Civil Procedure : Counsel : Disqualifications

3. In a defamation action, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying a motion to disqualify defense counsel; although there was evidence of a joint defense agreement that existed in prior litigation, defense counsel was not shown to have had access to any confidential information to which the joint defense privilege applied. Peeler v. Baylor Univ., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7283, 38 Media L. Rep. (BNA) 1411 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 16 2009).

4. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it disqualified a husband's lawyer in a divorce case in accordance with Tex. Disciplinary R. Prof. Conduct 1.05(b)(3) and Tex. R. Evid. 503(a)(1) based on possible disclosure of confidential information when the wife consulted the lawyer. In re Englehardt, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8170 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 11 2006).

5. Law firm had to be disqualified from representing an environmental services company in a licensing dispute with a corporate executive because the joint defense privilege of Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(C) protected confidential communications made by the executive to one of the firm's lawyers in a prior case involving similar issues at another company. In re Sharplin, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6834 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 3 2006).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Methods : Oral Depositions

6. Injured pedestrian could not discover information communicated to and from the attorney as counsel for the vehicle owner's corporations because such information was privileged under Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.5 and Tex. R. Evid. 503; however, the attorney was required to testify as to non-privileged communications made to him in his capacity as corporate secretary. In re Southpak Container Corp., 418 S.W.3d 360, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14633, 2013 WL 6237695 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 3 2013).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Motions to Compel

7. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by ordering the production of a joint defense agreement because the insurer, who was opposing production, never satisfied its burden to support its claim of privilege. In re Lexington Ins. Co., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1053 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 2 2004).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Privileged Matters : General Overview

8. In a mandamus proceeding involving a discovery dispute in a case against an insurer for violations of the insurance code, breach of contract, and breach of Stowers duty in a related personal injury case, the waiver of the attorney-client privilege by one of the insurer's insureds did not operate to waive the other insured's privilege as well, as the underlying litigation in the case was not a suit between trial counsel's two joint clients. No authority has been found to support an argument that one client may waive the attorney-client privilege on behalf of another client. In re Unitrin County Mut. Ins. Co., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5797, 2010 WL 2867326 (Tex. App. Austin July 22 2010).

9. In a mandamus proceeding involving a discovery dispute in a case against an insurer for violations of the insurance code, breach of contract, and breach of Stowers duty in a related personal injury case, the insurer had properly made a prima facie showing of privilege as to certain documents the trial court had ordered to be produced because the documents were sufficient to support a rational inference that the attorney-client and work-product privileges applied. Because the insurer had made a prima facie showing of privilege and tendered documents for inspection, the trial court's failure to conduct an in camera review before compelling production was an abuse of discretion, subject to mandamus relief. In re Unitrin County Mut. Ins. Co., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5797, 2010 WL 2867326 (Tex. App. Austin July 22 2010).

10. In an auto accident case, the appellate court rejected the decedent's parents' claims that the trial court abused its discretion in overruling their objections to the auto insurer's claim that documents about the insurer's investigations regarding who was driving at the time of the accident were privileged under the attorney-client privilege in Tex. R. Evid. 503 and the work-product privilege in Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.5 because Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.4 specifically allows affidavits as evidence to support a privilege; the crime/fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege in Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(1) did not apply merely because the parents' cause of action involved fraudulent conduct; rather the parents were required to show the alleged fraud occurred at or during the time the document was prepared and in order to perpetrate the fraud. Coats v. Ruiz, 198 S.W.3d 863, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7108 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

11. Trial court erred by granting crusher manufacturer's motion to compel discovery because relators established that the disputed documents were protected by the attorney-client, joint defense, and work product privileges under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.5, and the manufacturer did not establish a prima facie case of contemplated fraud or that the crime-fraud exception provided in Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(1) was applicable. In re Seigel, 198 S.W.3d 21, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1332 (Tex. App. El Paso 2006).

12. Where documents filed by a borrower with a trial court under seal, which a lender sought to have released, did not contain or refer to any communications between the borrower and his attorneys, and where the borrower's attorneys were not acting in a legal capacity in the instances, the attorney-client privilege was not implicated because the communications at issue did not involve the rendition of professional legal services pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1). Kelly v. Gaines, 181 S.W.3d 394, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7969 (Tex. App. Waco 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9628 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 16, 2005).

13. Conditional grant of the relators' petition for a writ of mandamus was proper where the information sought was confidential communications between the client and attorney. Further, an order that the attorney's fees be disclosed was improper because the fees were patently irrelevant and were not reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. In re AIG Aviation (Texas), Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7323 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 26 2004).

14. Where defendant company served on plaintiffs a privilege log describing the documents withheld from discovery pursuant to the work-product privilege in Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.5 and the attorney-client privilege in Tex. R

Evid. 503, and tendered the documents to the court, and where plaintiffs requested a hearing challenging the company's privilege claims, the trial court abused its discretion in denying defendant's claim of privilege without conducting an in-camera review. In re DuPont de Nemours & Co., 136 S.W.3d 218, 2004 Tex. LEXIS 445, 47 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 583 (Tex. 2004).

15. In a contract case involving a fraud counterclaim, the trial court did not err by excluding a letter to an attorney that tended to suggest fraud; the inadvertent production of the letter did not waive the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.3(d), and the fraud exception of Tex. R. Evid. 503 did not apply because there was no evidence of an ongoing or contemplated fraud when the letter was written. Warrantech Corp. v. Computer Adapters Servs., 134 S.W.3d 516, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3212 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

16. Driver's witness statement was privileged because the insurance adjuster recorded the witness statement while acting as driver's representative, and thus statement constituted confidential communications between a client, a client's attorney, and a client's representatives for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of professional legal services to the client; the insurance adjuster's role in recording the witness statements in lieu of the relator's legal defense would reasonably be interpreted as representing the client, such that the adjuster's role in collecting the driver's witness statement was as a representative acting with the purpose of obtaining and facilitating the driver's legal representation, rendering their communication protected by the attorney-client privilege. In re Arden, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2596 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 24 2004).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Privileged Matters : Attorney-Client Privilege

17. Trial court did not improperly require production of privileged communications in a motor vehicle collision case; an order stating that assertions of privilege had to be established by evidence, and via a privilege log if requested, comported with the governing law. In re Kristensen, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8404, 2014 WL 3778903 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 31 2014).

18. Relator was entitled to mandamus relief, because the cited rules of civil procedure did not extend to the witness's communications protected by the attorney-client privilege; the witness was retained to work for relator on the administration of the trust. In re Segner, 441 S.W.3d 409, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14796 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 5 2013).

19. Injured pedestrian could not discover information communicated to and from the attorney as counsel for the vehicle owner's corporations because such information was privileged under Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.5 and Tex. R. Evid. 503; however, the attorney was required to testify as to non-privileged communications made to him in his capacity as corporate secretary. In re Southpak Container Corp., 418 S.W.3d 360, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14633, 2013 WL 6237695 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 3 2013).

20. Trial court abused its discretion by not conducting an in camera inspection before ordering production because a bank established a prima facie case for the work product and attorney-client privileges by presenting affidavits of bank officers and an attorney, while a borrower did not make a prima facie showing of the crime-fraud exception absent evidence to rebut the presumption a third party's payment was a purchase of the loan. In re Park Cities Bank, 409 S.W.3d 859, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10254 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 15 2013).

21. Prima facie showing was made that the common interest privilege applied to documents pertaining to a pending action within the relevant time periods, but not as to other documents outside the time periods or not shown to relate to the pending action. In re Park Cities Bank, 409 S.W.3d 859, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10254 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 15 2013).

22. Where defendant attorney placed documents in his former business partner's computer while defendant was working as a network administrator for the company, he took steps to protect confidentiality by setting up the network such that only he had access to the documents; after he was locked out of the office and no longer working for the company, he understood that someone else had gained access over network permissions but failed to notify the third party or anyone else about the confidential material on the hard drive and failed to ask for it to be deleted or returned. In a dispute concerning the administration of a trust, the issue of whether defendant waived the right to claim the attorney-client privilege and work-product protection as to the documents was not governed by Tex. R. Evid. 503 because the disclosure did not occur in discovery in a court proceeding; applying the common law waiver rule, the district court held that defendant waived the privilege because he failed to take reasonable steps to protect confidentiality. Alpert v. Riley, 267 F.R.D. 202, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38331, 76 Fed. R. Serv. 3d (Callaghan) 542, 82 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. (CBC) 484 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 19 2010).

23. In an oil and gas lease dispute, court erred in compelling relator to produce a memorandum because the crime-fraud exception did not apply; the "evidence" demonstrating that relator engaged its attorney for fraudulent purposes was the opposing party's own allegations of fraud, which served as the basis of its lawsuit. In re Small, 346 S.W.3d 657, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4114 (Tex. App. El Paso June 10 2009).

24. In an oil and gas lease dispute, court abused its discretion by ordering emails to be disclosed because the emails were not disclosed to any party other than those individuals involved in the furtherance of the attorney's representation of relators. Therefore, there was no waiver by disclosure, and the trial court abused its discretion by ordering the emails to be disclosed on that ground. In re Small, 346 S.W.3d 657, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4114 (Tex. App. El Paso June 10 2009).

25. In a suit brought against an insurer by an insured's judgment creditor, the insurer could not assert the attorney-client privilege of Tex. R. Evid. 503 or the work product privilege of Tex. R. Civ. P. 192 on behalf of the insured with regard to a claims file because the insured's assignment of its rights to its judgment creditor waived the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 511; however, the insurer's Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 privilege log established that some communications between counsel and the insurer were covered by the insurer's own attorney-client privilege. In re General Agents Ins. Co. of Am., Inc., 224 S.W.3d 806, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3690 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

26. Chemical company was entitled to conditional mandamus relief when a trial court ordered the company to produce a confidential research memorandum prepared by an attorney from a law firm that had represented the company in a failed real estate transaction; although a limited partnership claimed that the trial court had discretion to order production of a writing used to refresh memory for the purpose of testifying and Tex. R. Evid. 612 generally dealt with writings used to refresh recollection, the memorandum also was privileged, and Tex. R. Evid. 503 rather than Tex. R. Evid. 612 described the circumstances under which a document subject to the attorney-client privilege was subject to disclosure; the company did not waive the privilege on the ground that the memorandum established that the company possessed a certain document on an earlier date than admitted by the company through its witnesses and in the company's discovery responses because the witness testified that he did not recall whether he had a copy of the document when he helped draft a certain document and the company amended the relevant discovery response to reflect that its counsel possessed the document in question ten days before the date of an initial research memorandum; thus, the memorandum was consistent with the discovery responses. In re Chevron Phillips Chem. Co. LP, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 25 2006).

27. Chemical company was entitled to conditional mandamus relief when a trial court ordered the company to produce a confidential research memorandum prepared by an attorney from a law firm that had represented the company in a failed real estate transaction because the memorandum was privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and the company did not waive that privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 511 through voluntary disclosure of a significant part of the memorandum in a second memorandum that counsel distributed to a third party, as the company did not voluntarily disclose any part of the memorandum; a limited partnership (LP) seeking disclosure of the memorandum argued that because the disclosed memorandum was based upon the privileged memorandum, the company waived its privilege; however, the LP failed to distinguish between using core attorney work product to prepare a document for dissemination to third parties and disclosing the privileged document itself. In re Chevron Phillips Chem. Co. LP, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 25 2006).

28. Chemical company was entitled to conditional mandamus relief when a trial court ordered the company to produce a confidential research memorandum prepared by an attorney from a law firm that had represented the company in a failed real estate transaction because the memorandum was privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and the company did not waive that privilege through offensive use of the memorandum because its production was not the only means through which a limited partnership might obtain the evidence it claimed was outcome determinative of the company's claims. In re Chevron Phillips Chem. Co. LP, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 25 2006).

29. Attorney-client privilege was not satisfied; in all its briefing, there was no mention of the attorney-client privilege with respect to five documents, and the only reason cited for asserting the privilege with respect to the 11 documents plaintiff obtained from its insurance broker was that defendant itself claimed privilege with respect to its own communications with the broker. Kimberly-Clark Corp. v. Cont'l Cas. Co., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63576 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 18 2006).

30. Although certain documents were not protected by Tex. R. Civil Procedure : Discovery : Privileged Matters : Work Product : Waivers

31. Relator was not entitled to mandamus relief because the trial court did not abuse its discretion by compelling counsel for the driver of a vehicle insured by a policy issued by relator to produce his complete defense file to the driver's estate representative in subsequent litigation between relator and the assignees of the insureds' claims. The trial court did not disregard established rules and principles when it declined to recognize the insurance company's assertion of privilege in the face of the insured's assignment of the claim and the right to waive attorney-client and work product privileges. In re Mid Century Ins. Co., 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2804, 2014 WL 989726 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 13 2014).

32. Crime/fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(1) did not apply to a judgment creditor's claim of fraudulent transfer because there was no concealment. Civil Procedure : Remedies : Writs : General Overview

33. In a bank's breach of contract suit against a bank member, the trial court's disqualification of the member's counsel was an abuse of discretion as the trial court found facts regarding counsel's alleged knowledge of the bank's confidential or proprietary information which were unsupported by probative evidence; while, pursuant to its commercial employment contract with a debt collection company (where the member's counsel previously worked as corporate counsel) a bank affiliate provided the company with certain confidential or proprietary information from a variety of sources, one being the bank, this contractual relinquishment of the bank's confidential or proprietary information to the company did not occur during any pending action and therefore could not concern a matter of common interest therein for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(C); further, the bank and its affiliate were never clients of the member's counsel, and the bank presented no evidence that either it or its affiliate were ever a codefendant with the company in which shared confidences were exchanged in furtherance of a joint defense. Civil Procedure : Remedies : Writs : Common Law Writs : Mandamus

34. Employer's writ of mandamus was conditionally granted and the trial court was directed to vacate her order denying the employer's motion for protection of the July 14, 2010 conversation between the former employee and employer's counsel and enter an order granting the motion; under Tex. R. Evid. 503, the trial court abused its discretion in determining that the employer failed to prove attorney-client privilege applied to a conversation between the employee and employer's counsel, and that communication was confidential. In re United States Waste Mgmt. Res., L.L.C., 387 S.W.3d 92, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9152 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 2 2012).

35. In a mandamus proceeding involving a discovery dispute in a case against an insurer for violations of the insurance code, breach of contract, and breach of Stowers duty in a related personal injury case, the insurer had properly made a prima facie showing of privilege as to certain documents the trial court had ordered to be produced because the documents were sufficient to support a rational inference that the attorney-client and work-product privileges applied. Because the insurer had made a prima facie showing of privilege and tendered documents for inspection, the trial court's failure to conduct an in camera review before compelling production was an abuse of discretion, subject to mandamus relief. In re Unitrin County Mut. Ins. Co., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5797, 2010 WL 2867326 (Tex. App. Austin July 22 2010).

36. Trial court abused its discretion in ordering an oral deposition of an attorney for a non-party fact witness on the subject matter of the underlying litigation without first requiring a showing that less intrusive discovery methods were unavailable to obtain the work-product information. In re Burroughs, 203 S.W.3d 858, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8300 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Robbery : General Overview

37. In a trial for an aggravated robbery that occurred in a motel, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit into evidence, as an admission by a party opponent, the complainant's civil pleading in his lawsuit against the motel; the complainant was not a party opponent. Because the court found that the civil pleading would contain inadmissible hearsay, it did not reach the issue of whether admission of the pleading would also be barred by the attorney-client privilege Tex. R. Evid. 503. Davis v. State, 177 S.W.3d 355, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2714 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Sentencing

38. In a drug trial, defense counsel was not rendered ineffective at the sentencing stage by failing to object to the State's questioning of a defense expert about testing administered to defendant for attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) and about notes taken during an interview of defendant because the information was not a privileged communication under Tex. R. Evid. 503. Under Tex. R. Evid. 705(a), once defendant's witness offered an expert opinion, the State was entitled to examine the witness about the factual underpinning of that opinion. Weinn v. State, 281 S.W.3d 633, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1015 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 12 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

39. Trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to move to quash the State's subpoena for medical records containing information about defendant's prior bad acts and extraneous offenses or for allowing defendant to testify to prior bad acts and extraneous offenses during defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child trial where the defense's primary strategy was to confess to prior wrongs and offenses, to demonstrate defendant's honesty, to show the jury that defendant was sincerely penitent about his prior bad acts and recognized the errors in his prior thoughts, and to show that he was actively and successfully changing his ways through therapy. An integral part of the strategy was for defendant to show that he was in therapy and making progress, and, given counsel's evident strategy, he might well have determined that it was better to allow the State to access therapy records revealing prior bad acts, and to open his witness to the State's examination concerning those acts, than to forego the strategy of defendant's testifying fully to matters showing his remorse, honesty, and improvement through therapy. Berg v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1315 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 17 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

40. Defendant's claim that a trial court erred by refusing to allow his former attorney to testify absent a complete waiver of the attorney-client privilege was not preserved for review where the proffered testimony did not implicate a confidential communication between defendant and the former attorney which would be covered under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(A), but instead implicated the work product of the former attorney and was covered by Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(2), which was expressly designated as a special rule of privilege in criminal cases. According to the record, the trial judge and both attorneys focused their contentions and analysis on the attorney-client communication privilege, but the work-product privilege was not addressed by either attorney or the judge because defendant did not contend that the evidence was admissible under the special provision covering attorney work-product privilege or inform the trial court that the attorney-client privilege was not applicable, and, regarding the waiver of his privilege, defendant's final statement was that he declined to waive his privilege. Cameron v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1018 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 8 2006).

41. Defendant failed to preserve for review his argument that the trial court erred in refusing to allow his former trial attorney to testify absent a complete waiver of the attorney-client privilege. The court did not decide if the lawyer-client privilege was implicated. Cameron v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7412 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 16 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

42. In a drug case, defendant did not have to waive his attorney-client privilege to obtain testimony from a former attorney regarding the attorney's notes on conflicting information in the police report; no waiver was required under the work product privilege of Tex. R. Evid. 503, and a discussion regarding the admissibility of the evidence, combined with defendant's offer of proof, sufficed to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 and Tex. R. Evid. 103 as to the exclusion of the evidence. Cameron v. State, 241 S.W.3d 15, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1120 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

43. In a murder trial, defendant waived any argument under Tex. R. Evid. 503, 701, 704 to allowing a State's witness to speculate regarding what defendant told his trial counsel. There were no objections on grounds relating to those rules, as required to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Young v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8022, 2009 WL 3295763 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 14 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

44. Court improperly admitted evidence of defendant's former trial counsel's work product through a witness's testimony about his telephone conversation with counsel because the telephone conversation in connection with representation of defendant constituted protected work product; the witness evaluated defendant and was retained to do so at counsel's request. However, the error was harmless because the State did not emphasize the witness's testimony regarding his conversation with counsel, nor did the State refer to that testimony during closing argument. Wright v. State, 374 S.W.3d 564, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5046, 41 Media L. Rep. (BNA) 1533, 2012 WL 2389455 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 26 2012).

Estate, Gift & Trust Law : Powers of Attorney : Durable Powers

45. Because the person holding defendant's durable power of attorney was not a licensed attorney and could not act on defendant's behalf in his criminal prosecution, defendant could not invoke the attorney-client privilege to exclude a recording of his phone conversation with his attorney in fact under Tex. R. Evid. 503. Mcdonald v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7977, 2010 WL 3910424 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 30 2010).

Evidence : Authentication : Self-Authentication

46. Where defendant company served on plaintiffs a privilege log describing the documents withheld from discovery pursuant to the work-product privilege in Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.5 and the attorney-client privilege in Tex. R Evid. 503, and tendered the documents to the court, and where plaintiffs requested a hearing challenging the company's privilege claims, the trial court abused its discretion in denying defendant's claim of privilege without conducting an in-camera review. In re DuPont de Nemours & Co., 136 S.W.3d 218, 2004 Tex. LEXIS 445, 47 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 583 (Tex. 2004).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Visual Formats

47. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault on a child, there was no error in admitting into evidence a videotape depicting defendant and his ex-wife acting out a father/daughter fantasy. The videotape was not covered by the attorney-client privilege, even though the phrase "attorney/client privilege" was written on the outside of the tape. Richert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7719 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

Evidence : Documentary Evidence : Completeness

48. Probate court did not abuse its discretion by admitting redacted billing statements and excluding unredacted statements in a dispute over attorney's fees and expenses because the rule of optional completeness under Tex. R. Evid. 106, 107 was not an exception to the attorney-client privilege, and it did not mandate a waiver of the privilege. Even if the rule of optional completeness was found to apply, an administrator did not show that unredacted statements were necessary for the probate court to understand the attorney's fees recoverable from an estate; significant information was provided to the court in the redacted billing statements, and, when combined with the testimony of the guardian's attorneys, further information was not necessary for the court to understand the matter. In the Estate of Johnston, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4255, 2012 WL 1940656 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 30 2012).

Evidence : Hearsay : Rule Components

49. In a trial for an aggravated robbery that occurred in a motel, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit into evidence, as an admission by a party opponent, the complainant's civil pleading in his lawsuit against the motel; the complainant was not a party opponent. Because the court found that the civil pleading would contain inadmissible hearsay, it did not reach the issue of whether admission of the pleading would also be barred by the attorney-client privilege Tex. R. Evid. 503. Davis v. State, 177 S.W.3d 355, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2714 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

Evidence : Privileges : General Overview

50. Investigators' disclosure of the law firm or asbestos company that hired them was not protected by Tex. R. Evid. 503 because the mere identity of the law firm or asbestos company would not reveal the purpose for which the investigators were hired. Landry v. Burge, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 6606 (Tex. App. Dallas Oct. 2 2000).

Evidence : Privileges : Attorney-Client Privilege

51. Where defendant's cell mate was a former attorney who surrendered his license to practice law in lieu of disciplinary proceedings, he was not a "lawyer" as defined in Tex. R. Evid. 503(a)(1). The cell mate was permitted to testify that defendant had confessed to him; the attorney-client privilege did not apply. Salatini v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10664 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 28, 2005).

52. Defendant's conviction for murder was proper pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1) because her attorney-client privilege was not violated. The court was unable to find any authority to support the proposition that the State could not inquire whether, how often, how long, and how recently defendant had met with her attorneys. Pierce v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6229 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 3 2005).

53. In a retaliation trial, which arose from defendant's statement to his interpreter that he was going to kill the prosecutor in a previous burglary case, the trial court did not err in admitting the interpreter's testimony. The attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1) did not apply because Rule 503(a)(5) defines a confidential communication as one made in furtherance of the rendition of professional legal services, and defendant's statement to his interpreter was not made for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of professional legal services. Aviles v. State, 165 S.W.3d 437, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3575 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

54. Attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1) does not apply when a criminal defendant makes a threat in the presence of his court-appointed interpreter because such a threat is not confidential under Rule 503(a)(5), which defines a confidential communication as one made in furtherance of the rendition of professional legal services. Aviles v. State, 165 S.W.3d 437, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3575 (Tex. App. Austin 2005).

55. Attorney-client privilege protects confidential communications made for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of professional legal services to the client under Tex. R. Evid. 503; the burden of establishing the privilege is on the party asserting it. Harvey v. State, 97 S.W.3d 162, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 6934 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2002).

Evidence : Privileges : Attorney-Client Privilege : General Overview

56. Trial court did not improperly require production of privileged communications in a motor vehicle collision case; an order stating that assertions of privilege had to be established by evidence, and via a privilege log if requested, comported with the governing law. In re Kristensen, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8404, 2014 WL 3778903 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 31 2014).

57. Upon entry of an agreed final divorce decree, the husband filed a motion for new trial in which he alleged his attorney lacked the authority to sign a settlement agreement on his behalf while he was in federal prison. The trial court did not abuse its discretion when it excluded certain exhibits consisting of emails about the settlement offer as they were privileged attorney-client communications and no basis for waiver of the attorney-client privilege had been argued. Phillips v. Phillips, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15275, 2013 WL 6726819 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist.

Dec. 19 2013).

58. Relator was entitled to mandamus relief, because the cited rules of civil procedure did not extend to the witness's communications protected by the attorney-client privilege; the witness was retained to work for relator on the administration of the trust. In re Segner, 441 S.W.3d 409, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14796 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 5 2013).

59. Court improperly admitted evidence of defendant's former trial counsel's work product through a witness's testimony about his telephone conversation with counsel because the telephone conversation in connection with representation of defendant constituted protected work product; the witness evaluated defendant and was retained to do so at counsel's request. However, the error was harmless because the State did not emphasize the witness's testimony regarding his conversation with counsel, nor did the State refer to that testimony during closing argument. Wright v. State, 374 S.W.3d 564, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5046, 41 Media L. Rep. (BNA) 1533, 2012 WL 2389455 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 26 2012).

60. During defendant's trial for bail jumping and failure to appear at trial for theft, his previous defense counsel in the theft case was not permitted to testify as to any communication he had with defendant because the trial court sustained defendant's objection on the basis of the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 503. Kay v. State, 340 S.W.3d 470, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1392 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 16 2011).

61. Conclusory statement that did not identify confidential communications was insufficient to invoke the Tex. R. Evid. 503(b) attorney-client privilege in a case of securities fraud and misapplication of fiduciary property. Head v. State, 299 S.W.3d 414, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7628 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 30 2009).

62. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 503(a)(5) and(b), production of Document # 25 would not be compelled because it facilitated obtaining legal advice. In-house counsel prepared the report at the request of a turbine manufacturer's highest officers and in-house counsel after a fire and the death of a worker. Suzlon Wind Energy Corp. v. Shippers Stevedoring Co., 662 F. Supp. 2d 623, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5422, 78 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. (CBC) 650 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 27 2009).

63. One of the sanctions imposed against a former chief financial officer prohibited him from using any of the privileged documents, even if the documents were determined not to be protected from discovery by the attorney-client privilege on appeal, and he did not appeal the trial court's order imposing these sanctions and any complaint he might have had about that order was waived; as a result, even if the court concluded that certain documents were not privileged, the company waived the privilege, or the trial court erred when it ruled that the documents were not admissible, the officer was prohibited from using the documents, and thus the trial court did not need to decide the merits on the officer's claim of error in this regard. Knapp v. Wilson N. Jones Mem'l Hosp., 281 S.W.3d 163, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1087 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 17 2009).

64. The State's query as to whether defendant had changed his defensive theory did not call for a disclosure of confidential communications. Saucedo v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3908 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 22 2008).

65. Parties did not discuss how they were harmed by the admission of evidence, testimony from a former attorney, or how its admission probably resulted in the rendition of an improper verdict, and a review of the record revealed that reversal was not warranted, given that (1) the statement had nothing to do with the pivotal question before the jury, (2) the attorney stated that he had no knowledge of what was intended regarding an agreement, (3) the parties did not assert a privilege objection to later testimony, and (4) there were several witnesses and other evidence that directly addressed the material issue. Boulle v. Boulle, 254 S.W.3d 701, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3604 (Tex. App.

Dallas 2008).

66. Trial court abused its discretion in ordering an oral deposition of an attorney for a non-party fact witness on the subject matter of the underlying litigation without first requiring a showing that less intrusive discovery methods were unavailable to obtain the work-product information. In re Burroughs, 203 S.W.3d 858, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8300 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2006).

67. Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it disqualified a husband's lawyer in a divorce case in accordance with Tex. Disciplinary R. Prof. Conduct 1.05(b)(3) and Tex. R. Evid. 503(a)(1) based on possible disclosure of confidential information when the wife consulted the lawyer. In re Englehardt, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8170 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 11 2006).

68. Attorney-client privilege was not satisfied; in all its briefing, there was no mention of the attorney-client privilege with respect to five documents, and the only reason cited for asserting the privilege with respect to the 11 documents plaintiff obtained from its insurance broker was that defendant itself claimed privilege with respect to its own communications with the broker. Kimberly-Clark Corp. v. Cont'l Cas. Co., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63576 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 18 2006).

69. In a bank's breach of contract suit against a bank member, the trial court's disqualification of the member's counsel was an abuse of discretion as the trial court found facts regarding counsel's alleged knowledge of the bank's confidential or proprietary information which were unsupported by probative evidence; while, pursuant to its commercial employment contract with a debt collection company (where the member's counsel previously worked as corporate counsel) a bank affiliate provided the company with certain confidential or proprietary information from a variety of sources, one being the bank, this contractual relinquishment of the bank's confidential or proprietary information to the company did not occur during any pending action and therefore could not concern a matter of common interest therein for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(C); further, the bank and its affiliate were never clients of the member's counsel, and the bank presented no evidence that either it or its affiliate were ever a codefendant with the company in which shared confidences were exchanged in furtherance of a joint defense. In re Dalco, 186 S.W.3d 660, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1709 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2006).

70. Trial court erred by granting crusher manufacturer's motion to compel discovery because relators established that the disputed documents were protected by the attorney-client, joint defense, and work product privileges under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.5, and the manufacturer did not establish a prima facie case of contemplated fraud or that the crime-fraud exception provided in Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(1) was applicable. In re Seigel, 198 S.W.3d 21, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1332 (Tex. App. El Paso 2006).

71. Defendant's claim that a trial court erred by refusing to allow his former attorney to testify absent a complete waiver of the attorney-client privilege was not preserved for review where the proffered testimony did not implicate a confidential communication between defendant and the former attorney which would be covered under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(A), but instead implicated the work product of the former attorney and was covered by Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(2), which was expressly designated as a special rule of privilege in criminal cases. According to the record, the trial judge and both attorneys focused their contentions and analysis on the attorney-client communication privilege, but the work-product privilege was not addressed by either attorney or the judge because defendant did not contend that the evidence was admissible under the special provision covering attorney work-product privilege or inform the trial court that the attorney-client privilege was not applicable, and, regarding the waiver of his privilege, defendant's final statement was that he declined to waive his privilege. Cameron v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1018 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 8 2006).

72. Where documents filed by a borrower with a trial court under seal, which a lender sought to have released, did not contain or refer to any communications between the borrower and his attorneys, and where the borrower's attorneys were not acting in a legal capacity in the instances, the attorney-client privilege was not implicated because the communications at issue did not involve the rendition of professional legal services pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1). Kelly v. Gaines, 181 S.W.3d 394, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7969 (Tex. App. Waco 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9628 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 16, 2005).

73. Plaintiff insurer argued that the district court abused its discretion in allowing the insurer's former counsel to testify that during the policy period he, on behalf of the insurer, communicated to defendant insureds that the insurer considered the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA) placement of the insureds' site on the Superfund List as a claim against the insureds under an environmental impairment liability policy. The attorney's testimony described the communications between himself and the attorneys and agents of the insureds and his independent inference and conclusion based upon them. The attorney testified that he, as the insurer's representative, and his counterparts representing the insureds treated the inclusion of the site as a claim by EPA against the insureds. Such testimony did not disclose any "confidential communications" between the insurer and him as its attorney under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b). Int'l Ins. Co. v. RSR Corp., 426 F.3d 281, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 20225, 35 Envtl. L. Rep. 20192 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005).

74. Plaintiff insurer argued that the district court abused its discretion in allowing the insurer's former counsel to testify that during the policy period he, on behalf of the insurer, communicated to defendant insureds that the insurer considered the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA) placement of the insureds' site on the Superfund List as a claim against the insureds under an environmental impairment liability policy. The attorney's testimony described the communications between himself and the attorneys and agents of the insureds and his independent inference and conclusion based upon them. The attorney testified that he, as the insurer's representative, and his counterparts representing the insureds treated the inclusion of the site as a claim by EPA against the insureds. Such testimony did not disclose any "confidential communications" between the insurer and him as its attorney under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b). Int'l Ins. Co. v. RSR Corp., 426 F.3d 281, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 20225, 35 Envtl. L. Rep. 20192 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005).

75. Defendant's conviction for murder was proper pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1) because her attorney-client privilege was not violated. The court was unable to find any authority to support the proposition that the State could not inquire whether, how often, how long, and how recently defendant had met with her attorneys. Pierce v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6229 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 3 2005).

76. Trial court erred by allowing a consumer to withhold certain documents from disclosure because the documents did not contain confidential attorney-client communications and because the consumer's attorneys were not acting in a legal capacity in those instances; the attorney-client privilege was not implicated because the communications did not involve the rendition of professional legal services for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1). Kelly v. Gaines, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5554 (Tex. App. Waco July 13 2005), opinion withdrawn by 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7966 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 28, 2005), substituted opinion at 181 S.W.3d 394, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7969 (Tex. App. Waco 2005).

77. Although a family counselor was an employee of the same entity that contracted with an attorney to provide legal services to a mother in a termination of parental rights case, she did not fall within the definition of a "representative of the lawyer" under Tex. R. Evid. 504(a)(4)(A); the counselor testified about the mother's counseling and the services provided by the entity, including food, clothing, transportation for job applications, housing, and legal services. In re K.C.P., 142 S.W.3d 574, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7102 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

78. In a contract case involving a fraud counterclaim, the trial court did not err by excluding a letter to an attorney that tended to suggest fraud; the inadvertent production of the letter did not waive the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.3(d), and the fraud exception of Tex. R. Evid. 503 did not apply because there was no evidence of an ongoing or contemplated fraud when the letter was written. Warrantech Corp. v. Computer Adapters Servs., 134 S.W.3d 516, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3212 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

79. Former employees' motion to compel production of documents related to investigation of the corporation's employees, and the documents related to the corporation's investigation of the "surreptitious backups" allegedly made by the former employees, should have been granted with the exception of the redactions of three documents, which contained purely legal advice, because the corporation failed to show that the documents were confidential communications made for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of professional legal services to the corporation; the mere fact that the corporation may have been contemplating litigation did not establish that the communications to and from its outside counsel were made for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of legal advice, and the documents were not exempt from discovery under the work product doctrine because the corporation's primary motivation in preparing the investigatory documents was the protection of its confidential information, and not to aid in possible future litigation. Navigant Consulting, Inc. v. Wilkinson, 220 F.R.D. 467, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5439 (N.D. Tex. 2004).

80. Motion for protection that was sought to prevent disclosure of communications between an attorney and a client that were allegedly privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 511 was improperly denied under Tex. R. Evid. 503 because there was no evidence of a voluntary disclosure or a consent to disclosure in an assignment of a "Stowers" claim against an insurer in a personal injury matter. In re Cooper, 47 S.W.3d 206, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 3624 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2001).

81. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 503(b) the buyers could not depose the builders attorney because the attorney's advice to his clients were as protected as the builders' communication to their client; thus, the trial court did not err in issuing a protective order. Boales v. Brighton Builders, Inc., 29 S.W.3d 159, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 4472 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2000).

Evidence : Privileges : Attorney-Client Privilege : Elements

82. Chapter 7 trustee was correct when he claimed that some documents he was ordered to produce in an adversary proceeding were privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 503 irrespective of the common interest privilege, and did not have to be produced. However, the court rejected the trustee's argument that the applicable date for applying the common interest privilege was the date the debtor declared bankruptcy and not the date the trustee filed his adversary proceeding; Rule 503(b)(1)(C) had a "pending action" requirement, and the date the trustee filed his action was the date that requirement arose. Schmidt v. Rodriguez (in re Rodriguez), 2012 Bankr. LEXIS 4233 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Sept. 12 2012).

83. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by impliedly finding that the privileged information sought did not go to the very heart of the affirmative relief sought or that this information, if believed by the fact finder, in all probability would not be outcome determinative of the claim asserted. Lesikar v. Moon, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7311, 2012 WL 3776365 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

84. Court sustained a Chapter 7 trustee's objection to certain documents sought in an adversary proceeding on the grounds that they were privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(C) where the documents related to communications that occurred after the date an adversary complaint was filed and where the alleged common interest between the trustee and petitioning creditors was an indemnity cause of action against a lessee for the benefit of the debtor's estate. The fact that the trustee and the petitioning creditors were on opposite sides of the adversary proceeding did not prevent the trustee from invoking the privilege where the two sides shared a common interest. Schmidt v. Rodriguez (in re Rodriguez), 2012 Bankr. LEXIS 3620 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Aug. 7 2012).

85. Documents listed in a privilege log were subject to the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b) because they dealt with subject matter that called for an attorney's consideration and legal advice, were made for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of legal advice, or summarized legal advice. Privilege was not waived under the offensive use doctrine because none of the documents were outcome determinative. Balestri v. Hallwood Group Inc. (in re Hallwood Energy, L.P.), 2010 Bankr. LEXIS 2717 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. Aug. 10 2010).

86. Trial court did not err by admitting the statement defendant made to the offense advocate during the prison's disciplinary process in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 503(a)(3) because the record contained no evidence that the advocate was an attorney or whether defendant held the reasonable belief that she was. It was also unclear whether the statement was made in confidence or was an oral statement defendant gave during the hearing; defendant's alleged disclosure of the same statement to a sergeant prior to his statement at the hearing suggested that he did not intend the communication to be confidential. Sanchez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2432, 2009 WL 838223 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

Evidence : Privileges : Attorney-Client Privilege : Exceptions

87. Trial court abused its discretion by not conducting an in camera inspection before ordering production because a bank established a prima facie case for the work product and attorney-client privileges by presenting affidavits of bank officers and an attorney, while a borrower did not make a prima facie showing of the crime-fraud exception absent evidence to rebut the presumption a third party's payment was a purchase of the loan. In re Park Cities Bank, 409 S.W.3d 859, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10254 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 15 2013).

88. Employee's version of her conversation with the employer's counsel failed to establish any acts by counsel that rose to the level of suborning perjury; the trial court abused its discretion to the extent it concluded that the employee established the crime-fraud exception, Tex. R. Evid. 503(d). In re United States Waste Mgmt. Res., L.L.C., 387 S.W.3d 92, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9152 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 2 2012).

89. Probate court did not abuse its discretion by admitting redacted billing statements and excluding unredacted statements in a dispute over attorney's fees and expenses because the rule of optional completeness under Tex. R. Evid. 106, 107 was not an exception to the attorney-client privilege, and it did not mandate a waiver of the privilege. Even if the rule of optional completeness was found to apply, an administrator did not show that unredacted statements were necessary for the probate court to understand the attorney's fees recoverable from an estate; significant information was provided to the court in the redacted billing statements, and, when combined with the testimony of the guardian's attorneys, further information was not necessary for the court to understand the matter. In the Estate of Johnston, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4255, 2012 WL 1940656 (Tex. App. San Antonio May 30 2012).

90. Appellants did not challenge the ruling that a prima facie case for fraud under Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(1) had been established by writ of mandamus, and even if the evidence was part of a motion in limine discussion, a ruling on such a motion preserved nothing for review; furthermore, when documents were offered at trial, counsel said he had no objection, the subject matter of the documents was also discussed without objection, and appellants failed to preserve their complaint for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a) and the issue was waived. Rancho La Valencia, Inc. v. Aquaplex, Inc., 357 S.W.3d 137, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8935 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 9 2011).

91. Attorneys presented uncontroverted evidence that there was no aggregate settlement and all negotiations were individual, that the clients were not joint clients, and that there was no sharing of clients' medical records, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding the joint client exception did not apply. In re Hernandez,

2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7981, 2011 WL 4600706 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 6 2011).

92. Court abused its discretion in issuing the sanction order, because there was no evidence to support the finding that the company's attorney accused counsel for the petitioner in open court of knowingly suborning perjury; the argument the attorney made that the crime-fraud exception applied did not, by itself, implicate any wrongdoing, and the attorney specifically clarified that the company was seeking to apply the exception based only on the conduct of the party to the suit and he did not mean to "cast aspersions" on counsel. Rodriguez v. Mumbojumbo, L.L.C., 347 S.W.3d 924, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6809 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 25 2011).

93. During defendant's trial for bail jumping and failure to appear at trial for a theft charge, his previous defense counsel was permitted to testify that defendant left the courthouse during a break after he was convicted for theft. Because anyone present in the courtroom that day was able to observe this, the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(2) did not apply to his attorney's personal observations. Kay v. State, 340 S.W.3d 470, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1392 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 16 2011).

94. Texas Court of Criminal Appeals has held Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(2) includes the work-product privilege and, therefore, the court holds the exceptions of Rule 503(d) also apply to the work-product privilege in the proper circumstances. Woodruff v. State, 330 S.W.3d 709, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9569 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 3 2010), *cert. denied,*132 S. Ct. 502, 181 L. Ed. 2d 347, 2011 U.S. LEXIS 7788 (2011).

95. Appellant failed to show the crime-fraud exception applied to the facts of this case because he did not show the attorney's services were sought or obtained to enable or aid in the commission of a crime. Woodruff v. State, 330 S.W.3d 709, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9569 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 3 2010), *cert. denied,*132 S. Ct. 502, 181 L. Ed. 2d 347, 2011 U.S. LEXIS 7788 (2011).

96. In an oil and gas lease dispute, court erred in compelling relator to produce a memorandum because the crime-fraud exception did not apply; the "evidence" demonstrating that relator engaged its attorney for fraudulent purposes was the opposing party's own allegations of fraud, which served as the basis of its lawsuit. In re Small, 346 S.W.3d 657, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4114 (Tex. App. El Paso June 10 2009).

97. Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(5) and a common interest theory did not apply because plaintiff insured's counsel in an underlying third party's suit represented only the insured, not defendant insurer, and counsel had even noted a conflict with the insurer as to coverage issues and had stated it would not share its legal opinions with the insurer. Fugro-Mcclelland Marine Geosciences, Inc. v. Steadfast Ins. Co., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102997 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 19 2008).

98. During defendant's murder trial, the court did not err by allowing a legal assistant to testify that he and defendant were friends, that he contacted defendant when he learned defendant's wife was killed, and defendant told him that he had "messed up" and "was in real trouble this time;" the evidence did not establish an attorney-client relationship. Volrie v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6574 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 16 2007).

99. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by holding that the documents the church sought from the law firm in its breach of fiduciary duty action, namely documents from the firm's representation of the building's co-owner in 2003, were protected by the attorney-client privilege and that the church had failed to make a prima facie showing that the discovery sought was relevant to an issue so as to be excepted from the privilege; because the church failed to raise a fact issue as to whether it had actually disclosed specific confidential information to appellees, any error regarding the church's discovery of information would be harmless; the scope of discovery relevant to breach of duty would necessarily reflect that substantive standard of proof, which, under the church's theory of the case, was that breach could be proven merely by establishing a substantial relationship between appellees' prior and subsequent representations, a theory that the court rejected. Capital City Church of Christ v. Novak, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4148 (Tex. App. Austin May 23 2007).

100. Crime/fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(1) did not apply to a judgment creditor's claim of fraudulent transfer because there was no concealment. In re General Agents Ins. Co. of Am., Inc., 224 S.W.3d 806, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3690 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

101. Trial court did not err in finding that documents were discoverable and the crime-fraud exception under Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(1) did not apply, thus making requested mandamus relief inappropriate; the company's general assertions did not specify the nexus between each of the documents it sought to compel and its claims of fraud. In re JDN Real Estate-McKinney L.P., 211 S.W.3d 907, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11087 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

102. In an auto accident case, the appellate court rejected the decedent's parents' claims that the trial court abused its discretion in overruling their objections to the auto insurer's claim that documents about the insurer's investigations regarding who was driving at the time of the accident were privileged under the attorney-client privilege in Tex. R. Evid. 503 and the work-product privilege in Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.5 because Tex. R. Civ. P. 193.4 specifically allows affidavits as evidence to support a privilege; the crime/fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege in Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(1) did not apply merely because the parents' cause of action involved fraudulent conduct; rather the parents were required to show the alleged fraud occurred at or during the time the document was prepared and in order to perpetrate the fraud. Coats v. Ruiz, 198 S.W.3d 863, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7108 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

Evidence : Privileges : Attorney-Client Privilege : Scope

103. Defendant did not divulge any confidential communications given to defense counsel or provided him by counsel, and the court did not find that the testimony was inadmissible. Williams v. State, 417 S.W.3d 162, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13978, 2013 WL 6028845 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 14 2013).

104. Prima facie showing was made that the common interest privilege applied to documents pertaining to a pending action within the relevant time periods, but not as to other documents outside the time periods or not shown to relate to the pending action. In re Park Cities Bank, 409 S.W.3d 859, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10254 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 15 2013).

105. Employer's writ of mandamus was conditionally granted and the trial court was directed to vacate her order denying the employer's motion for protection of the July 14, 2010 conversation between the former employee and employer's counsel and enter an order granting the motion; under Tex. R. Evid. 503, the trial court abused its discretion in determining that the employer failed to prove attorney-client privilege applied to a conversation between the employee and employer's counsel, and that communication was confidential. In re United States Waste Mgmt. Res., L.L.C., 387 S.W.3d 92, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9152 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 2 2012).

106. Court sustained a Chapter 7 trustee's objection to certain documents sought in an adversary proceeding on the grounds that they were privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(C) where the documents related to communications that occurred after the date an adversary complaint was filed and where the alleged common interest between the trustee and petitioning creditors was an indemnity cause of action against a lessee for the benefit of the debtor's estate. The fact that the trustee and the petitioning creditors were on opposite sides of the adversary proceeding did not prevent the trustee from invoking the privilege where the two sides shared a common interest. Schmidt v. Rodriguez (in re Rodriguez), 2012 Bankr. LEXIS 3620 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Aug. 7 2012).

107. Although certain documents were not protected by Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(C) because the communications were made prior to the date an adversary complaint was filed, they were protected from discovery by Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3) and (b)(4). Schmidt v. Rodriguez (in re Rodriguez), 2012 Bankr. LEXIS 3620 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Aug. 7 2012).

108. Attorney-client privilege, Tex. R. Evid. 503, did not apply to protect communications between the insurer's lawyer and the employer during the underlying administrative proceedings where the insurer failed to show that the communications were privileged and the allied litigant doctrine was inapplicable; the insurer and employer were not joint clients. In re Xl Specialty INS. Co., 373 S.W.3d 46, 2012 Tex. LEXIS 568, 55 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1081 (Tex. 2012).

109. Court concludes the distinction between core work product and other work product applies in criminal cases; any facts divulged to the assistant district attorney would be other work product and would be discoverable upon a showing of substantial need and the inability to obtain its substantial equivalent by other means without undue hardship. Woodruff v. State, 330 S.W.3d 709, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9569 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 3 2010), *cert. denied,*132 S. Ct. 502, 181 L. Ed. 2d 347, 2011 U.S. LEXIS 7788 (2011).

110. Trial court did not err in denying examination of the assistant district attorney, who reviewed taped recordings of appellant's conversations with counsel; while substantial need might have been demonstrated if the recordings contained useful information, the recordings did not contain any useful information, and there was no substantial need to question the assistant district attorney. Woodruff v. State, 330 S.W.3d 709, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9569 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 3 2010), *cert. denied,*132 S. Ct. 502, 181 L. Ed. 2d 347, 2011 U.S. LEXIS 7788 (2011).

111. Because the person holding defendant's durable power of attorney was not a licensed attorney and could not act on defendant's behalf in his criminal prosecution, defendant could not invoke the attorney-client privilege to exclude a recording of his phone conversation with his attorney in fact under Tex. R. Evid. 503. Mcdonald v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7977, 2010 WL 3910424 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 30 2010).

112. Defendant's claim that a trial court erred in allowing the testimony of an attorney for defendant's son was not preserved for review because defendant did not object to the State calling the attorney as a witness under the rule; in any event, defendant's standing to invoke the son's lawyer-client privilege was not supported by the rule. Brumbalow v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5333, 2010 WL 2696712 (Tex. App. Eastland July 8 2010).

113. Insurer was entitled to mandamus relief because a trial court erred in ordering the production of documents in a suit against the insurer for fraud; the documents, which included memoranda, claims and damages summaries, and case evaluations, met the requirements of the attorney-client privilege in Tex. R. Evid. 503(b) or the work product privilege in Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.5(a). In re Harco Nat'l Ins. Co., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4899, 2010 WL 2555629 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 24 2010).

114. In a defamation action, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying a motion to disqualify defense counsel; although there was evidence of a joint defense agreement that existed in prior litigation, defense counsel was not shown to have had access to any confidential information to which the joint defense privilege applied. Peeler v. Baylor Univ., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7283, 38 Media L. Rep. (BNA) 1411 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 16 2009).

115. In an attorney disciplinary matter, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by having the attorney's trust account records considered with regard to the charge that he commingled his personal funds with his client trust account funds as there exists no right to privacy of financial documentation that has been shared with a third party, such as a bank, and they were not protected by the attorney-client privilege as they were properly obtained by the Commission for Lawyer Discipline via subpoena. Whether the Commission failed to provide notice of the subpoena to the attorney or not, the attorney failed to challenge the subpoena in response to the Commission's motion to compel the trust account records. Neely v. Comm'n for Lawyer Discipline, 302 S.W.3d 331, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7253 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 10 2009).

116. In an oil and gas lease dispute, court abused its discretion by ordering emails to be disclosed because the emails were not disclosed to any party other than those individuals involved in the furtherance of the attorney's representation of relators. Therefore, there was no waiver by disclosure, and the trial court abused its discretion by ordering the emails to be disclosed on that ground. In re Small, 346 S.W.3d 657, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4114 (Tex. App. El Paso June 10 2009).

117. Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(5) and a common interest theory did not apply because plaintiff insured's counsel in an underlying third party's suit represented only the insured, not defendant insurer, and counsel had even noted a conflict with the insurer as to coverage issues and had stated it would not share its legal opinions with the insurer. Fugro-Mcclelland Marine Geosciences, Inc. v. Steadfast Ins. Co., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102997 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 19 2008).

118. The attorney-client privilege protected confidential communications between the client and attorney and the indictment that a grand jury returns is not a confidential communication between the client and the attorney, nor is a copy thereof. Dotson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5355 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 17 2008).

119. Documentary evidence was not be privileged where the bankruptcy trustee failed to carry the burden of showing that they would disclose confidential communications made for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of professional legal services to the debtor. Meralex, L.P. v. In re Heritage Org., L.L.L. (In re Heritage Org., L.L.C.), 2007 Bankr. LEXIS 3843, 49 Bankr. Ct. Dec. (LRP) 33 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. Nov. 15 2007).

120. Court of appeals erred in construing Tex. R. Evid. 503 when it held that the attorney-client privilege did not exist in defendant's murder trial because the attorney who testified had declined to represent defendant at the end of their consultation; a question remained, however, whether the crime-fraud exception applied in defendant's case; once the attorney started to elicit from defendant such incriminating information that a person would feel free to share only with his attorney, the attorney was bound by the same duties of confidentiality that an attorney owed a client that he agreed to represent even though the attorney eventually decided not to represent defendant. Mixon v. State, 224 S.W.3d 206, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 654 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

121. Attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 503 applies in cases where the record shows that the defendant consulted a lawyer with a view to obtaining legal services from him, even though the lawyer ultimately declined to represent the client. Mixon v. State, 224 S.W.3d 206, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 654 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

122. Trial court did not err in determining that a city did not waive, pursuant to the offensive-use doctrine, the ability to assert privilege, as the company did not point the court to any evidence supporting the third element of the offensive-use doctrine establishing the evidence was not available from other sources; mandamus relief was not appropriate. In re JDN Real Estate-McKinney L.P., 211 S.W.3d 907, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11087 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

123. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 503 and Tex. R. Civ. P. 192, the court found certain documents privileged, given that they contained information regarding strategy, one document was a part of a string of emails that were privileged, and the documents contained confidential information and discussed research and negotiations; the trial court abused its discretion by granting a motion to compel as to these documents and mandamus relief was conditionally granted. In re JDN Real Estate-McKinney L.P., 211 S.W.3d 907, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11087 (Tex.

App. Dallas 2006).

124. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 503 and Tex. R. Civ. P. 192, certain documents were not privileged, given that they did not address anything confidential; thus, for mandamus purposes, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting a motion to compel as to these documents. In re JDN Real Estate-McKinney L.P., 211 S.W.3d 907, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11087 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

125. Emails inquired about an alleged discrepancy between documents produced, and a company did not show that the city intended to waive the privilege; while the city failed to diligently screen the documents, and while the court did not condone such conduct, the court did not find that the conduct alone in this case waived of claim of privilege, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid.193, and the company did not prove, for mandamus purposes, that the trial court abused its discretion when it found that the city did not waive by undue delay, the ability to assert privilege. In re JDN Real Estate-McKinney L.P., 211 S.W.3d 907, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11087 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

126. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 503(b), the evidence showed that a city and a development corporation were both represented by attorneys and they shared a common interest, the company pointed to no authority for the claim that the common interest privilege was separate from the attorney client privilege and case law suggested to the contrary, and the company did not point to any authority to support the claim that the pending action provision of Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(C) applied to entities who shared a common interest and were represented by the same counsel; for mandamus purposes, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it found that a city did not waive, under Tex. R. Evid. 511(1), by disclosure to the development corporation, the ability to assert privilege. In re JDN Real Estate-McKinney L.P., 211 S.W.3d 907, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11087 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

127. Presentation was not privileged because in camera review of the presentation slides did not show that the communication was to facilitate obtaining legal advice; only one of 13 bullet points referred to lawyers; phrase "Bury them with lawyers," appeared with following items: "Encourage attrition," "Pick at margins," and "No more service transfer." Clover Staffing, LLC v. Johnson Controls World Servs., 238 F.R.D. 576, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88238 (S.D. Tex. 2006).

128. Emails sent at the suggestion of defendant's legal department to gather information that could be used in negotiating with plaintiff to attempt to resolve contract issues were privileged. Clover Staffing, LLC v. Johnson Controls World Servs., 238 F.R.D. 576, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88238 (S.D. Tex. 2006).

129. Documents, described as financial analyses performed to provide the legal department with the information it requested, so that the legal department could assist business people in negotiating with plaintiff, were privileged; the evidence showed that these documents were communications made to facilitate the rendition of legal advice to the client. Clover Staffing, LLC v. Johnson Controls World Servs., 238 F.R.D. 576, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88238 (S.D. Tex. 2006).

130. Law firm had to be disqualified from representing an environmental services company in a licensing dispute with a corporate executive because the joint defense privilege of Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(C) protected confidential communications made by the executive to one of the firm's lawyers in a prior case involving similar issues at another company. In re Sharplin, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6834 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 3 2006).

Evidence : Privileges : Attorney-Client Privilege : Waiver

131. Relator was not entitled to mandamus relief because the trial court did not abuse its discretion by compelling counsel for the driver of a vehicle insured by a policy issued by relator to produce his complete defense file to the driver's estate representative in subsequent litigation between relator and the assignees of the insureds' claims.

The trial court did not disregard established rules and principles when it declined to recognize the insurance company's assertion of privilege in the face of the insured's assignment of the claim and the right to waive attorney-client and work product privileges. In re Mid Century Ins. Co., 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2804, 2014 WL 989726 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 13 2014).

132. Attorney-client privilege was waived as to the allegations contained in the creditors' proofs of claim and the factual basis for the proofs of claim because the creditors' attorney signed the proofs of claim, and this made the attorney a fact witness as to the allegations contained in the proofs of claim. Schmidt v. Rodriguez (in re Rodriguez), 2013 Bankr. LEXIS 5048, 2013 WL 2450925 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. June 5 2013).

133. Elements for the doctrine of waiver by offensive use were satisfied because the creditors sought affirmative relief, the factual assertions contained in the proofs of claim were outcome determinative, and the only means by which the objecting party-in-interest could have obtained the evidence initially used by the creditors in support of their proofs of claim was by making inquiry of the attorney who signed the proofs of claim. Schmidt v. Rodriguez (in re Rodriguez), 2013 Bankr. LEXIS 5048, 2013 WL 2450925 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. June 5 2013).

134. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by impliedly finding that the privileged information sought did not go to the very heart of the affirmative relief sought or that this information, if believed by the fact finder, in all probability would not be outcome determinative of the claim asserted. Lesikar v. Moon, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7311, 2012 WL 3776365 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 30 2012).

135. In defendant's trial for possession of a controlled substance and endangering a child, the trial court did not err in admitting a polygraph examiner's testimony about defendant's pre-test statements which defendant claimed contained confidential information under both the attorney-client and work-product privileges under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b). The totality of the circumstances supported a finding of waiver, because defense counsel disclosed defendant's pre-test statements to the State. Herbert v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3126, 2012 WL 1366576 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 18 2012).

136. Documents listed in a privilege log were subject to the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b) because they dealt with subject matter that called for an attorney's consideration and legal advice, were made for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of legal advice, or summarized legal advice. Privilege was not waived under the offensive use doctrine because none of the documents were outcome determinative. Balestri v. Hallwood Group Inc. (in re Hallwood Energy, L.P.), 2010 Bankr. LEXIS 2717 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. Aug. 10 2010).

137. In a mandamus proceeding involving a discovery dispute in a case against an insurer for violations of the insurance code, breach of contract, and breach of Stowers duty in a related personal injury case, the waiver of the attorney-client privilege by one of the insurer's insureds did not operate to waive the other insured's privilege as well, as the underlying litigation in the case was not a suit between trial counsel's two joint clients. No authority has been found to support an argument that one client may waive the attorney-client privilege on behalf of another client. In re Unitrin County Mut. Ins. Co., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5797, 2010 WL 2867326 (Tex. App. Austin July 22 2010).

138. Where defendant attorney placed documents in his former business partner's computer while defendant was working as a network administrator for the company, he took steps to protect confidentiality by setting up the network such that only he had access to the documents; after he was locked out of the office and no longer working for the company, he understood that someone else had gained access over network permissions but failed to notify the third party or anyone else about the confidential material on the hard drive and failed to ask for it to be deleted or returned. In a dispute concerning the administration of a trust, the issue of whether defendant waived the right to claim the attorney-client privilege and work-product protection as to the documents was not governed by Tex. R.

Evid. 503 because the disclosure did not occur in discovery in a court proceeding; applying the common law waiver rule, the district court held that defendant waived the privilege because he failed to take reasonable steps to protect confidentiality. Alpert v. Riley, 267 F.R.D. 202, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38331, 76 Fed. R. Serv. 3d (Callaghan) 542, 82 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. (CBC) 484 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 19 2010).

139. By assigning his rights and claims to a bankruptcy trustee, an insured did not assign the right to waive the attorney-client privilege, under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and Tex. R. Evid. 511, because the assignment language in the bankruptcy order did not specifically waive the attorney-client privilege, and the cooperation language did not impliedly waive the attorney-client privilege, especially in light of the insured's intent not to waive the privilege. In re Hicks, 252 S.W.3d 790, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2990 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

140. By executing an authorization for release of an insurer's file, the insured did not waive attorney-client privilege, under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and Tex. R. Evid. 511, with regard to an attorney's litigation file because the record did not reflect that the insured consented to disclosure of privileged material in the attorney's litigation file. In re Hicks, 252 S.W.3d 790, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2990 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

141. In a drug case, defendant did not have to waive his attorney-client privilege to obtain testimony from a former attorney regarding the attorney's notes on conflicting information in the police report; no waiver was required under the work product privilege of Tex. R. Evid. 503, and a discussion regarding the admissibility of the evidence, combined with defendant's offer of proof, sufficed to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 and Tex. R. Evid. 103 as to the exclusion of the evidence. Cameron v. State, 241 S.W.3d 15, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1120 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

142. In a suit brought against an insurer by an insured's judgment creditor, the insurer could not assert the attorney-client privilege of Tex. R. Evid. 503 or the work product privilege of Tex. R. Civ. P. 192 on behalf of the insured with regard to a claims file because the insured's assignment of its rights to its judgment creditor waived the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 511; however, the insurer's Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 privilege log established that some communications between counsel and the insurer were covered by the insurer's own attorney-client privilege. In re General Agents Ins. Co. of Am., Inc., 224 S.W.3d 806, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3690 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

143. Chemical company was entitled to conditional mandamus relief when a trial court ordered the company to produce a confidential research memorandum prepared by an attorney from a law firm that had represented the company in a failed real estate transaction; although a limited partnership claimed that the trial court had discretion to order production of a writing used to refresh memory for the purpose of testifying and Tex. R. Evid. 612 generally dealt with writings used to refresh recollection, the memorandum also was privileged, and Tex. R. Evid. 503 rather than Tex. R. Evid. 612 described the circumstances under which a document subject to the attorney-client privilege was subject to disclosure; the company did not waive the privilege on the ground that the memorandum established that the company possessed a certain document on an earlier date than admitted by the company through its witnesses and in the company's discovery responses because the witness testified that he did not recall whether he had a copy of the document when he helped draft a certain document and the company amended the relevant discovery response to reflect that its counsel possessed the document in question ten days before the date of an initial research memorandum; thus, the memorandum was consistent with the discovery responses. In re Chevron Phillips Chem. Co. LP, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 25 2006).

144. Chemical company was entitled to conditional mandamus relief when a trial court ordered the company to produce a confidential research memorandum prepared by an attorney from a law firm that had represented the company in a failed real estate transaction because the memorandum was privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and the company did not waive that privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 511 through voluntary disclosure of a significant part of the memorandum in a second memorandum that counsel distributed to a third party, as the company did not voluntarily disclose any part of the memorandum; a limited partnership (LP) seeking disclosure of the memorandum argued that because the disclosed memorandum was based upon the privileged memorandum, the company waived its privilege; however, the LP failed to distinguish between using core attorney work product to prepare a document for dissemination to third parties and disclosing the privileged document itself. In re Chevron Phillips Chem. Co. LP, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 25 2006).

145. Chemical company was entitled to conditional mandamus relief when a trial court ordered the company to produce a confidential research memorandum prepared by an attorney from a law firm that had represented the company in a failed real estate transaction because the memorandum was privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and the company did not waive that privilege through offensive use of the memorandum because its production was not the only means through which a limited partnership might obtain the evidence it claimed was outcome determinative of the company's claims. In re Chevron Phillips Chem. Co. LP, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 25 2006).

Evidence : Privileges : Government Privileges : Waiver

146. Defendant's claim that a trial court erred by refusing to allow his former attorney to testify absent a complete waiver of the attorney-client privilege was not preserved for review where the proffered testimony did not implicate a confidential communication between defendant and the former attorney which would be covered under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(A), but instead implicated the work product of the former attorney and was covered by Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(2), which was expressly designated as a special rule of privilege in criminal cases. According to the record, the trial judge and both attorneys focused their contentions and analysis on the attorney-client communication privilege, but the work-product privilege was not addressed by either attorney or the judge because defendant did not contend that the evidence was admissible under the special provision covering attorney work-product privilege or inform the trial court that the attorney-client privilege was not applicable, and, regarding the waiver of his privilege, defendant's final statement was that he declined to waive his privilege. Cameron v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1018 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 8 2006).

Evidence : Privileges : Psychotherapist-Patient Privilege

147. Trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to move to quash the State's subpoena for medical records containing information about defendant's prior bad acts and extraneous offenses or for allowing defendant to testify to prior bad acts and extraneous offenses during defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child trial where the defense's primary strategy was to confess to prior wrongs and offenses, to demonstrate defendant's honesty, to show the jury that defendant was sincerely penitent about his prior bad acts and recognized the errors in his prior thoughts, and to show that he was actively and successfully changing his ways through therapy. An integral part of the strategy was for defendant to show that he was in therapy and making progress, and, given counsel's evident strategy, he might well have determined that it was better to allow the State to access therapy records revealing prior bad acts, and to open his witness to the State's examination concerning those acts, than to forego the strategy of defendant's testifying fully to matters showing his remorse, honesty, and improvement through therapy. Berg v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1315 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 17 2005).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

148. Trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to move to quash the State's subpoena for medical records containing information about defendant's prior bad acts and extraneous offenses or for allowing defendant to testify to prior bad acts and extraneous offenses during defendant's aggravated sexual assault of a child trial where the defense's primary strategy was to confess to prior wrongs and offenses, to demonstrate defendant's honesty, to show the jury that defendant was sincerely penitent about his prior bad acts and recognized the errors in his prior thoughts, and to show that he was actively and successfully changing his ways through therapy. An integral part of the strategy was for defendant to show that he was in therapy and making progress, and, given counsel's evident strategy, he might well have determined that it was better to allow the State to access therapy records revealing prior bad acts, and to open his witness to the State's examination concerning those acts, than to forego the strategy of defendant's testifying fully to matters showing his remorse, honesty, and improvement through therapy. Berg v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1315 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 17 2005).

Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : Involuntary Termination : Procedure

149. In a case in which a mother's parental rights were terminated, the trial court did not err in refusing to allow the mother to call the amicus attorney as a witness; the amicus attorney served as counsel of record representing the best interest of the child by questioning witnesses and introducing evidence, and she did not testify as to attorney fees or any other matter. In the Interest of J.K.F., 345 S.W.3d 706, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5382 (Tex. App. Dallas July 14 2011).

Insurance Law : Motor Vehicle Insurance : Obligations : Disclosure

150. Motion for protection that was sought to prevent disclosure of communications between an attorney and a client that were allegedly privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 511 was improperly denied under Tex. R. Evid. 503 because there was no evidence of a voluntary disclosure or a consent to disclosure in an assignment of a "Stowers" claim against an insurer in a personal injury matter. In re Cooper, 47 S.W.3d 206, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 3624 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2001).

Legal Ethics : Client Relations : Client Funds

151. In an attorney disciplinary matter, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by having the attorney's trust account records considered with regard to the charge that he commingled his personal funds with his client trust account funds as there exists no right to privacy of financial documentation that has been shared with a third party, such as a bank, and they were not protected by the attorney-client privilege as they were properly obtained by the Commission for Lawyer Discipline via subpoena. Whether the Commission failed to provide notice of the subpoena to the attorney or not, the attorney failed to challenge the subpoena in response to the Commission's motion to compel the trust account records. Neely v. Comm'n for Lawyer Discipline, 302 S.W.3d 331, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7253 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 10 2009).

Legal Ethics : Client Relations : Confidentiality of Information

152. Court of appeals erred in construing Tex. R. Evid. 503 when it held that the attorney-client privilege did not exist in defendant's murder trial because the attorney who testified had declined to represent defendant at the end of their consultation; a question remained, however, whether the crime-fraud exception applied in defendant's case; once the attorney started to elicit from defendant such incriminating information that a person would feel free to share only with his attorney, the attorney was bound by the same duties of confidentiality that an attorney owed a client that he agreed to represent even though the attorney eventually decided not to represent defendant. Mixon v. State, 224 S.W.3d 206, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 654 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

153. Trial court erred by granting crusher manufacturer's motion to compel discovery because relators established that the disputed documents were protected by the attorney-client, joint defense, and work product privileges under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.5, and the manufacturer did not establish a prima facie case of contemplated fraud or that the crime-fraud exception provided in Tex. R. Evid. 503(d)(1) was applicable. In re Seigel, 198 S.W.3d 21, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1332 (Tex. App. El Paso 2006).

154. Plaintiff insurer argued that the district court abused its discretion in allowing the insurer's former counsel to testify that during the policy period he, on behalf of the insurer, communicated to defendant insureds that the insurer considered the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA) placement of the insureds' site on the Superfund List as a claim against the insureds under an environmental impairment liability policy. The attorney's testimony described the communications between himself and the attorneys and agents of the insureds and his independent inference and conclusion based upon them. The attorney testified that he, as the insurer's representative, and his counterparts representing the insureds treated the inclusion of the site as a claim by EPA against the insureds. Such testimony did not disclose any "confidential communications" between the insurer and him as its attorney under Tex. R. Evid. 503(b). Int'l Ins. Co. v. RSR Corp., 426 F.3d 281, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 20225, 35 Envtl. L. Rep. 20192 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005).

155. Plaintiff insurer argued that the district court abused its discretion in allowing the insurer's former counsel to testify that during the policy period he, on behalf of the insurer, communicated to defendant insureds that the insurer considered the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA) placement of the insureds' site on the Superfund List as a claim against the insureds under an environmental impairment liability policy. Legal Ethics : Client Relations : Conflicts of Interest

156. In a divorce action, the trial court properly denied the husband's motion to substitute counsel on the ground of disqualification under Tex. Disciplinary R. Prof. Conduct 1.09(a)(3), because the wife had consulted an attorney from the same firm; the trial court reasonably could have concluded that the wife, who was a client as defined in Tex. R. Evid. 503(a)(1), divulged confidential information, within the meaning of Tex. Disc. R. Prof. Conduct 1.05(a), during her meeting with the attorney. In re Gerry, 173 S.W.3d 901, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8637 (Tex. App. Tyler 2005).

Legal Ethics : Client Relations : Perjury

157. Court abused its discretion in issuing the sanction order, because there was no evidence to support the finding that the company's attorney accused counsel for the petitioner in open court of knowingly suborning perjury; the argument the attorney made that the crime-fraud exception applied did not, by itself, implicate any wrongdoing, and the attorney specifically clarified that the company was seeking to apply the exception based only on the conduct of the party to the suit and he did not mean to "cast aspersions" on counsel. Rodriguez v. Mumbojumbo, L.L.C., 347 S.W.3d 924, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6809 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 25 2011).

Legal Ethics : Sanctions : Suspensions

158. Where defendant's cell mate was a former attorney who surrendered his license to practice law in lieu of disciplinary proceedings, he was not a "lawyer" as defined in Tex. R. Evid. 503(a)(1). The cell mate was permitted to testify that defendant had confessed to him; the attorney-client privilege did not apply. Salatini v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10664 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 28, 2005).

Torts : Intentional Torts : Breach of Fiduciary Duty : General Overview

159. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by holding that the documents the church sought from the law firm in its breach of fiduciary duty action, namely documents from the firm's representation of the building's co-owner in 2003, were protected by the attorney-client privilege and that the church had failed to make a prima facie showing that the discovery sought was relevant to an issue so as to be excepted from the privilege; because the church failed to raise a fact issue as to whether it had actually disclosed specific confidential information to appellees, any error regarding the church's discovery of information would be harmless; the scope of discovery relevant to breach of duty would necessarily reflect that substantive standard of proof, which, under the church's theory of the case, was that breach could be proven merely by establishing a substantial relationship between appellees' prior and subsequent representations, a theory that the court rejected. Capital City Church of Christ v. Novak, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4148 (Tex. App. Austin May 23 2007).

Tex. Evid. R. 504

THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH August 16, 2020

Rule 504 Spousal Privileges

(a) Confidential Communication Privilege.

(1) Definition.--A communication is "confidential" if a person makes it privately to the person's spouse and does not intend its disclosure to any other person.

(2) General Rule.--A person has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent any other person from disclosing a confidential communication made to the person's spouse while they were married. This privilege survives termination of the marriage.

(3) Who May Claim.--The privilege may be claimed by:

(A)the communicating spouse;

(B)the guardian of a communicating spouse who is incompetent; or

(C)the personal representative of a communicating spouse who is deceased.

The other spouse may claim the privilege on the communicating spouse's behalf - and is presumed to have authority to do so.

(4) Exceptions.--This privilege does not apply:

(A) Furtherance of Crime or Fraud.--If the communication is made - wholly or partially - to enable or aid anyone to commit or plan to commit a crime or fraud.

(B) Proceeding Between Spouse and Other Spouse or Claimant Through Deceased Spouse.--In a civil proceeding:

(i)brought by or on behalf of one spouse against the other; or

(ii)between a surviving spouse and a person claiming through the deceased spouse.

(C) Crime Against Family, Spouse, Household Member, or Minor Child.--In a:

(i)proceeding in which a party is accused of conduct that, if proved, is a crime against the person of the other spouse, any member of the household of either spouse, or any minor child; or

(ii)criminal proceeding involving a charge of bigamy under Section 25.01 of the Penal Code.

(D) Commitment or Similar Proceeding.--In a proceeding to commit either spouse or otherwise to place the spouse or the spouse's property under another's control because of a mental or physical condition.

(E) Proceeding to Establish Competence.--In a proceeding brought by or on behalf of either spouse to establish competence.

(b) Privilege Not to Testify in Criminal Case.

(1) General Rule.--In a criminal case, an accused's spouse has a privilege not to be called to testify for the state. But this rule neither prohibits a spouse from testifying voluntarily for the state nor gives a spouse a privilege to refuse to be called to testify for the accused.

(2) Failure to Call Spouse.--If other evidence indicates that the accused's spouse could testify to relevant matters, an accused's failure to call the spouse to testify is a proper subject of comment by counsel.

(3) Who May Claim.--The privilege not to testify may be claimed by the accused's spouse or the spouse's guardian or representative, but not by the accused.

(4) Exceptions.--This privilege does not apply:

(A) Certain Criminal Proceedings.--In a criminal proceeding in which a spouse is charged with:

(i)a crime against the other spouse, any member of the household of either spouse, or any minor child; or

(ii)bigamy under Section 25.01 of the Penal Code.

(B) Matters That Occurred Before the Marriage.--If the spouse is called to testify about matters that occurred before the marriage.

Comment to 1998 change The rule eliminates the spousal testimonial privilege for prosecutions in which the testifying spouse is the alleged victim of a crime by the accused. This is intended to be consistent with Code of Criminal Procedure article 38.10, effective September 1, 1995.

Comment to 2015 Restyling: Previously, Rule 504(b)(1) provided that, "A spouse who testifies on behalf of an accused is subject to cross-examination as provided in Rule 611(b)." That sentence was included in the original version of Rule 504 when the Texas Rules of Criminal Evidence were promulgated in 1986 and changed the rule to a testimonial privilege held by the witness spouse. Until then, a spouse was deemed incompetent to testify against his or her defendant spouse, and when a spouse testified on behalf of a defendant spouse, the state was limited to cross-examining the spouse about matters relating to the spouse's direct testimony. The quoted sentence from the original Criminal Rule 504(b) was designed to overturn this limitation and allow the state to crossexamine a testifying spouse in the same manner as any other witness. More than twenty-five years later, it is clear that a spouse who testifies either for or against a defendant spouse may be crossexamined in the same manner as any other witness. Therefore, the continued inclusion in the rule of a provision that refers only to the cross-examination of a spouse who testifies on behalf of the accused is more confusing than helpful. Its deletion is designed to clarify the rule and does not change existing law.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : General Overview

1. Trial court did not err by ordering defendant's wife to testify after she claimed her spousal privilege because there was an exception to the spousal privilege under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.10 and Tex. R. Evid. 504(b)(4)(A) that eliminated the spousal testimonial privilege for prosecutions in which the testifying spouse was the alleged victim of the crime by the accused. Defendant was charged with a criminal trespass of his wife's residence, which he had never inhabited, following a heated altercation between them, therefore his offense came within both the language of Rule 504(b)(4)(A) and the policy it sought to promote. Jackson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3631 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 5 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : General Overview

2. Under Tex. R. Evid. 504, the prosecutor in a murder case was properly permitted to comment on the failure of defendant's spouse to testify because there was other evidence indicating that the spouse could have testified to relevant matters, including that the spouse was present during the search of their apartment when investigators found a bullet. Vasquez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2952 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 24 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : General Overview

3. There was no error in the State calling defendant's wife to invoke her spousal privilege in the jury's presence because the jury did not hear the wife specifically say that she was asserting her spousal privilege, defense counsel mentioned the privilege in front of the jury when he objected, and the jury had already heard the wife provide testimony detrimental to defendant, namely, that defendant had been drinking beer on the night of the offense. Chavez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4927, 2011 WL 2624006 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 30 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Confrontation

4. Co-arrestee's statements to his girlfriend, later his common-law wife, regarding a large amount of methamphetamine that went undiscovered by officers during a traffic stop were non-testimonial for purposes of the Confrontation Clause and were statements against penal interest and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 803(24). Because the speaker and his girlfriend were not married at the time of the statements, the marital privilege of Tex. R. Evid. 504 did not apply. Walker v. State, 406 S.W.3d 590, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3046, 2013 WL 1154209 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 21 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Cognizable Issues : Ineffective Assistance

5. Although trial counsel performed objectively unreasonably by failing to interview the husband to determine if he could or would assert a marital privilege that omission did not prejudice the inmate's defense; the husband's testimony provided nuance to the case but did not alter the entire evidentiary picture. The evidence of the inmate's guilt was overwhelming, even absent the husband's testimony, and his testimony, in most regards, only corroborated other sources. Carty v. Thaler, 583 F.3d 244, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 20803 (5th Cir. Tex. 2009).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Statements Against Interest

6. R. Evid. 803(24). Because the speaker and his girlfriend were not married at the time of the statements, the marital privilege of Tex. R. Evid. 504 did not apply. Walker v. There was no error in the State calling defendant's wife to invoke her spousal privilege in the jury's presence because the jury did not hear the wife specifically say that she was asserting her spousal privilege, defense counsel mentioned the privilege in front of the jury when he objected, and the jury had already heard the wife provide testimony detrimental to defendant, namely, that defendant had been drinking beer on the night of the offense. Chavez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4927, 2011 WL 2624006 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 30 2011).

8. Even if the trial court erred under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 28.01, § 1 and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 33.03 in conducting a pretrial hearing in appellant's absence, appellant was not harmed, given that (1) counsel waived appellant's right to be present, (2) even if appellant was present to claim that he knew his wife intended to invoke the spousal privilege, the legal questions for the trial court would not have changed and appellant could not claim the privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 504(b)(3) on his wife's behalf, (3) nothing showed that a fair hearing was thwarted by his absence, (4) appellant's absence could not have contributed to his conviction or punishment, and (5) any error resulting from appellant's absence did not amount to reversible error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2. Williams v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3799, 2011 WL 1888258 (Tex. App. Dallas May 19 2011).

9. In defendant's drug case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing defendant's purported wife to testify because there had not been a ceremonial marriage at the time of the alleged offenses, they did not file a joint tax return, and the purposted wife did not take defendant's name. Kennedy v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 4607 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 19 2008).

10. Court properly allowed the testimony of a witness whom defendant claimed was his common law wife because the evidence suggested that defendant and the witness were not common law husband and wife, the witness repeatedly denied that defendant participated in the drug transaction, and there was other competent evidence supporting defendant's participation. Kennedy v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3424 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 8 2008).

11. Trial court did not err by ordering defendant's wife to testify after she claimed her spousal privilege because there was an exception to the spousal privilege under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.10 and Tex. R. Evid. 504(b)(4)(A) that eliminated the spousal testimonial privilege for prosecutions in which the testifying spouse was the alleged victim of the crime by the accused. Defendant was charged with a criminal trespass of his wife's residence, which he had never inhabited, following a heated altercation between them, therefore his offense came within both the language of Rule 504(b)(4)(A) and the policy it sought to promote. Jackson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3631 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 5 2005).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Adverse Spousal Testimony : General Overview

12. Although defendant argued that his trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance during the guilt-innocence phrase of his murder trial by calling defendant's wife as a witness, thus allowing the State to cross-examine her, rather than claiming a spousal privilege, this point of error was overruled. Given the overwhelming weight of the evidence presented to the jury, defendant did not demonstrate that a different verdict would have been returned had his wife not testified as she did. Jones v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7960, 2011 WL 4610057 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 6 2011).

13. Although trial counsel performed objectively unreasonably by failing to interview the husband to determine if he could or would assert a marital privilege that omission did not prejudice the inmate's defense; the husband's testimony provided nuance to the case but did not alter the entire evidentiary picture. The evidence of the inmate's guilt was overwhelming, even absent the husband's testimony, and his testimony, in most regards, only corroborated other sources. Carty v. Thaler, 583 F.3d 244, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 20803 (5th Cir. Tex. 2009).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Adverse Spousal Testimony : Exceptions

14. Trial court did not err in admitting defendant's wife to testimony because, in the absence of an agreement to be married and of holding out, defendant failed to establish a sufficient foundation to invoke the spousal privilege; the privilege would not prevent the wife from testifying voluntarily for the State, even over defendant's objection, Tex. R. Evid. 504(b)(1). Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5215, 2012 WL 2509693 (Tex. App. Dallas June 28 2012).

15. Trial court did not erroneously permit the State to question defendant's wife as a witness during defendant's capital murder trial; the spousal privilege was inapplicable under Tex. R. Evid. 504(b)(4)(A) because defendant was charged with the murder of a 14-year-old minor. Rodriguez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1162 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 19 2008).

16. Because defendant stipulated to the admission of letters he wrote to his wife after he was arrested for the victim's murder, he waived the marital privilege. Because his wife testified voluntarily about the letters' contents, Tex. R. Evid. 504 did not prevent her from testifying about the letters' contents. Cavazos v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2049 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 15 2007).

17. Trial court did not err in overruling defendant's wife's invocation of her testimonial privilege where the State proved that the victim was a minor at the time that defendant shot him; since defendant was charged with a crime against a minor, the trial court did not err. Hernandez v. State, 205 S.W.3d 555, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4426 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2006).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Adverse Spousal Testimony : Scope

18. In a trust dispute, a trial court did not err in refusing to strike testimony as privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 504(a) because the communication at issue took place before a third party, and corroboration of the presence of a third party was not required. Cooper v. Cochran, 288 S.W.3d 522, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2522 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 9 2009).

19. In a trust dispute, a trial court did not err in refusing to strike testimony as privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 504(a) because the communication at issue took place before a third party, and corroboration of the presence of a third party was not required.

20. Defendant failed with his claim that a trial court's compelling testimony from his alleged wife violated the spousal privilege where the third element of an informal marriage was not established under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 2.401(a)(2); no testimony or other evidence established that defendant and his alleged wife had represented before the date of the offense that they were husband and wife. Only the alleged wife testified regarding whether she and defendant had an informal marriage, and her comments regarding the informal marriage were inconsistent. Davis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5903 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2006).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Adverse Spousal Testimony : Waiver

21. Court did not abuse its discretion nor violate the husband-wife privilege that existed between defendant and his wife when it allowed an officer to testify concerning the wife's statement to her during the initial discovery and investigation of the incident because the two statements made by defendant were similar enough to result in a waiver of the husband-wife privilege concerning defendant's statement to the wife that he killed a woman. The "significant part" of defendant's statement, which he also disclosed to his mother, was the admission that he killed a person and that the person's body was in his apartment; therefore, he waived application of the husband wife privilege. Davis v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 712 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 27 2005).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Confidential Communications : General Overview

22. Defendant's wife's response to a question was that no communication took place with defendant on a certain subject, and thus the court had no basis to find error in the trial court's ruling that overruled defendant's objection; even assuming error, it was harmless because beyond the challenged testimony, there was other evidence establishing that defendant violated the terms of his community supervision as alleged, and there was no abuse of discretion in the decision to revoke. Washington v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3698, 2014 WL 1379643 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 8 2014).

23. Defendant candidly acknowledges that the violation of an evidentiary rule, such as under the husband-wife privilege, is not constitutional error; when dealing with such an error, it was to be disregarded as harmless if it did not affect defendant's substantial rights. Washington v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3698, 2014 WL 1379643 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 8 2014).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Confidential Communications : Criminal Proceedings

24. Confidential-communication privilege did not apply under Tex. R. Evid. 504(a)(4)(C) because defendant was charged with a crime against a person who was a member of his household under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. §§ 71.005 and 71.006. Welch v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5114 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 25 2013).

25. Defendant's murder conviction was proper pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 504 because the calls between himself and his current wife were not privileged since defendant did not have the requisite expectation of privacy; the calls were made while he was in jail and he conceded that, while in one jail, he signed a statement acknowledging that the telephone calls might be monitored by the sheriff; in regard to time spent in the other jail, defendant testified that he knew that all of his telephone calls were being recorded. Capps v. State, 244 S.W.3d 520, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9602 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

26. In a murder trial, there was no error in allowing into evidence recorded admissions that defendant made in phone calls from jail; although some calls were with defendant's spouse, the calls were not privileged because defendant did not have the requisite expectation of privacy under Tex. R. Evid. 504. Capps v. State, 244 S.W.3d 520, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9602 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007), (Tex. App. -- Fort Worth, pet. ref'd).

27. Trial court did not err by ordering defendant's wife to testify after she claimed her spousal privilege because there was an exception to the spousal privilege under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.10 and Tex. R. Evid. 504(b)(4)(A) that eliminated the spousal testimonial privilege for prosecutions in which the testifying spouse was the alleged victim of the crime by the accused. Defendant was charged with a criminal trespass of his wife's residence, which he had never inhabited, following a heated altercation between them, therefore his offense came within both the language of Rule 504(b)(4)(A) and the policy it sought to promote. Jackson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3631 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 5 2005).

28. Court did not abuse its discretion nor violate the husband-wife privilege that existed between defendant and his wife when it allowed an officer to testify concerning the wife's statement to her during the initial discovery and investigation of the incident because the two statements made by defendant were similar enough to result in a waiver of the husband-wife privilege concerning defendant's statement to the wife that he killed a woman. The "significant part" of defendant's statement, which he also disclosed to his mother, was the admission that he killed a person and that the person's body was in his apartment; therefore, he waived application of the husband wife privilege. Davis v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 712 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 27 2005).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Confidential Communications : Elements

29. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in holding that defendant did not carry his burden of proof in establishing that a common-law marriage existed, for purposes of invoking the spousal privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 504; defendant had to show that he and the woman agreed to be married, were living together as husband and wife, and represented themselves to others as such, but the evidence was inconsistent with an informal marriage agreement, as the woman referred to defendant as her boyfriend and never referred to him as her husband, and the trial court had to resolve the conflicting evidence. Freeman v. State, 230 S.W.3d 392, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3965 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Confidential Communications : Exceptions

30. Tape recording was identified as a conversation between defendant, his wife, and her boyfriend, and there was no indication whether or not the boyfriend overhead the conversation between defendant and his wife; thus, the record did not show that the admission of the tape recording would have been prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 504, there might have been strategic reasons for counsel not objecting, and the court could not find ineffective assistance as claimed in light of the silent record. Dodson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5530 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 29 2006).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Confidential Communications : Scope

31. Because there was no reasonable expectation of privacy in the back seat of a police car, the conversation between defendant and his wife was not protected by spousal privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 504(a)(1). Hernandez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6356, 2009 WL 2476523 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 13 2009).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Confidential Communications : Waiver

32. Petition for writ of mandamus directing a trial court to vacate its order denying relators' motion to compel was denied because relators did not cite any authority holding that the offensive use waiver applied to the spousal communications privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 504(a). In re Corcoran, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1410, 2012 WL 590813 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 23 2012).

33. Because defendant stipulated to the admission of letters he wrote to his wife after he was arrested for the victim's murder, he waived the marital privilege. Because his wife testified voluntarily about the letters' contents, Tex. R. Evid. 504 did not prevent her from testifying about the letters' contents. Cavazos v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2049 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 15 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Preliminary Questions : Admissibility of Evidence : Existence of Privileges

34. In defendant's drug case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by allowing defendant's purported wife to testify because there had not been a ceremonial marriage at the time of the alleged offenses, they did not file a joint tax return, and the purposted wife did not take defendant's name. Kennedy v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 4607 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 19 2008).

Family Law : Marriage : Proof : Common Law Marriages : Elements : General Repute

35. Trial court did not err in admitting defendant's wife to testimony because, in the absence of an agreement to be married and of holding out, defendant failed to establish a sufficient foundation to invoke the spousal privilege; the privilege would not prevent the wife from testifying voluntarily for the State, even over defendant's objection, Tex. R. Evid. 504(b)(1). Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5215, 2012 WL 2509693 (Tex. App. Dallas June 28 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

1. In a trial for child sexual assault, it was reasonable to conclude that defendant's communication to his priest was not made to the priest as a spiritual advisor and thus was not privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 505 because the priest called defendant to put him on notice that he was aware of the sexual assault allegations against defendant. Gutierrez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8952, 2010 WL 4484350 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Suppression of Evidence

2. Denial of defendant's motion to suppress statements he made to his church elders confessing to a murder under Tex. R. Evid. 505 was proper as he never told the elders he wanted his communication to be kept private, and his parents testified that defendant knew the matter was no longer going to be confidential once he confessed. Leach v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6684 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 4, 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Credibility

3. In a trial for attempted sexual assault, there was no error in excluding evidence that defendant's spouse told the pastor at church that the spouse was having an affair, evidence that defendant sought to show the spouse's motive to testify for the State; what the spouse told the pastor was covered by the privilege in Tex. R. Evid. 505, and, although there was evidence of a voluntary disclosure to defendant, defendant did not urge waiver under Tex. R. Evid. 511 either at trial or on appeal. Campbell v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1707 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 6 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

4. In a juvenile defendant's murder case, a court properly admitted testimony of a hospital chaplain who visited with defendant because defendant's conduct in making similar inculpatory statements to the nurses and security guards supported the trial court's finding that defendant did not make the statements to the chaplain with a reasonable expectation of confidentiality. In addition, any error was harmless; four other witnesses testified to similar statements defendant made while in the hospital that implicated him in the shooting death of the victim. In re E.C.D., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1270 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 21 2007).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Statements of Child Abuse

5. In a prosecution for indecency with a child, the clergymen privilege did not apply to statements of child abuse made by defendant to an elder in the church. Almendarez v. State, 153 S.W.3d 727, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 449 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

6. Texas Code of Criminal Procedure has no provision for a clergyman privilege; thus, Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 261.202 takes precedence over Tex. R. Evid. 505. Almendarez v. State, 153 S.W.3d 727, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 449 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

Evidence : Privileges : Clergy Communications

7. In a prosecution for indecency with a child, the clergymen privilege did not apply to statements of child abuse made by defendant to an elder in the church. Almendarez v. State, 153 S.W.3d 727, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 449 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

8. Texas Code of Criminal Procedure has no provision for a clergyman privilege; thus, Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 261.202 takes precedence over Tex. R. Evid. 505. Almendarez v. State, 153 S.W.3d 727, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 449 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

9. Defendant's motion to exclude information on the basis that the information was confidentially communicated to a clergyman was properly denied under Tex. R. Evid. 505(a)(1) and (b) because the information was communicated during meetings with a bishop that were administrative in nature, because the bishop did not communicate with defendant in the bishop's professional character as a spiritual adviser, and because the communication was thus not privileged. Maldonado v. State, 59 S.W.3d 251, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 5819 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2001).

Evidence : Privileges : Clergy Communications : General Overview

10. Evidence : Privileges : Clergy Communications : Exceptions

11. Trial court did not err by admitting the father's communications with a clergyman because this was a proceeding regarding the abuse or neglect of a child and therefore the father was not entitled to invoke the clergy privilege. In the Interest of W.B.W., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5562, 2012 WL 2856067 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Judicial Officers : Magistrates : Standards of Review

1. Under Texas law, the trade secret privilege was not absolute, and a magistrate judge clearly erred in denying a motion to compel in its entirety based on trade secret privilege where the documents provided for in camera review did not represent the full range of discovery sought, and plaintiffs' assertion of the privilege was overly broad. Given the relevance of the information, it was necessary for the judge to weigh the specific, particularized injury that disclosure would cause plaintiffs against defendant's need for the information. Orthoflex, Inc. v. Thermotek, Inc., 990 F. Supp. 2d 675, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 182853, 2013 WL 6980482 (N.D. Tex. Dec. 10 2013).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Methods : Requests for Production & Inspection

2. In an assessment appeal, a ruling that the appraisal district's requests for production were overbroad meant that the taxpayers' claim of trade secret privilege could not be considered until after the appraisal district served document requests that complied with the Texas Rules of Civil Procedure. In re Premcor Ref. Group, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5850, 2009 WL 2253290 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 30 2009).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Privileged Matters : General Overview

3. Relators, who sought a writ of mandamus, could not assert a trade secret privilege in response to a motion to compel a stock register because the relators failed to present the claim of privilege before the trial court. In re Union Energy, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8486 (Tex. App. Tyler Oct. 31, 2008).

Civil Procedure : Remedies : Writs : Common Law Writs : Mandamus

4. Corporation president was entitled to mandamus relief, Tex. R. App. P. 52, because the items requested by the LLC were trade secrets and not discoverable as privileged information pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 507; the president met his burden of showing that the corporation's list of suppliers was trade secret and the LLC did not show that disclosure was necessary. In re Rockafellow, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5495, 2011 WL 2848638 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 19 2011).

5. In an antitrust case, mandamus relief was conditionally granted because a competitor failed to show that a disclosure of disputed trade secret information was necessary to the fair adjudication of its claims; therefore, the trial court erred by ordering the disclosure. In re Waste Mgmt. of Tex., Inc., 286 S.W.3d 615, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3671 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 28 2009).

Evidence : Privileges : Trade Secrets : General Overview

6. Although a party resisting presuit discovery submitted only a conclusory affidavit and thus failed to prove that the information sought would require disclosure of information protected by the trade secret privilege, the trial court abused its discretion when it ordered the discovery without making the required finding that the likely benefit of allowing a deposition to be taken to investigate a potential claim outweighed the burden or expense. In re Cauley, 437 S.W.3d 650, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7933, 2014 WL 3615786 (Tex. App. Tyler July 23 2014).

7. Diversion company that sold hair care products outside of their authorized distribution channels showed that its supplier list was a carefully guarded trade secret that was essential to its business under Tex. R. Evid. 507; the products' manufacturer failed to show necessity for the information because it had not pursued other avenues of discovery. In re Rockafellow, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5421, 2013 WL 1836451 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 30 2013).

8. In an assessment appeal, a ruling that the appraisal district's requests for production were overbroad meant that the taxpayers' claim of trade secret privilege could not be considered until after the appraisal district served document requests that complied with the Texas Rules of Civil Procedure. In re Premcor Ref. Group, Inc., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5850, 2009 WL 2253290 (Tex. App. Beaumont July 30 2009).

9. In an antitrust case, mandamus relief was conditionally granted because a competitor failed to show that a disclosure of disputed trade secret information was necessary to the fair adjudication of its claims; therefore, the trial court erred by ordering the disclosure. In re Waste Mgmt. of Tex., Inc., 286 S.W.3d 615, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3671 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 28 2009).

10. Relators, who sought a writ of mandamus, could not assert a trade secret privilege in response to a motion to compel a stock register because the relators failed to present the claim of privilege before the trial court. In re Union Energy, Inc., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8486 (Tex. App. Tyler Oct. 31, 2008).

11. Writ of mandamus was conditionally granted in favor of the company because the company established that the data requested by the claimant in the breach of contract action were trade secrets, and the claimant failed to show that disclosure of the information was necessary to prevent fraud or injustice; while some of the underlying data was publicly available, the forecasts and conclusions of the company and its consultants were not, and the data was carefully guarded and was obtainable only by company personnel on a need-to-know basis. In re XTO Res. I, LP, 248 S.W.3d 898, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2237 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

12. In an action alleging breach of a partnership agreement, the trial court could reasonably order production of purported trade secrets because information about finances and the partnership's largest customers was necessary to an adjudication of the value of an interest in the partnership. In re West Tex. Positron, Ltd., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 496 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 20 2005).

13. Without evidence establishing any of the conventional trade secret factors with regard to the company's database used to "trend" accident and injury claims, the company failed to demonstrate that the trial court erred in overruling its trade secret objection to providing deposition testimony on the creation and use of the database; the company cited no authority that a conclusory opinion that information was a trade secret or was not used industry-wide, or a mere desire to avoid disclosing information to others, was sufficient to establish the privilege. In re Lowe's Cos., 134 S.W.3d 876, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4432 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

14. Tire manufacturer successfully resisted discovery of its chemical formula for its "skim stock," a rubber compound used in tire manufacturing, in a products liability action against it because it had been conceded by the party seeking discovery that the formula was a trade secret under Tex. R. Evid. 507, and that party failed to demonstrate that the information was necessary for a fair trial. In re Continental Gen. Tire, 979 S.W.2d 609, 1998 Tex. LEXIS 149, 42 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 141 (Tex. 1998).

Evidence : Privileges : Trade Secrets : Elements

15. Trial court's grant of a brokerage firm's petition for presuit discovery from former employees and their company under Tex. R. Civ. P. 202 was an abuse of discretion because the information sought, details regarding a risk-management program developed by the employees, constituted trade secret information protected under Tex. R. Evid. 507. In re Prairiesmarts Llc, 421 S.W.3d 296, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 791, 2014 WL 252092 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 23 2014).

16. Trial court's grant of a brokerage firm's petition for presuit discovery from former employees and their company under Tex. R. Civ. P. 202 was an abuse of discretion because the information sought, details regarding a risk-management program developed by the employees, constituted trade secret information protected under Tex. R. Evid. 507. In re Prairiesmarts Llc, 421 S.W.3d 296, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 791, 2014 WL 252092 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 23 2014).

17. Corporation president was entitled to mandamus relief, Tex. R. App. P. 52, because the items requested by the LLC were trade secrets and not discoverable as privileged information pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 507; the president met his burden of showing that the corporation's list of suppliers was trade secret and the LLC did not show that disclosure was necessary. In re Rockafellow, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5495, 2011 WL 2848638 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 19 2011).

18. Tire manufacturer was entitled to mandamus relief directing a trial court to vacate its order compelling the production of documents in a wife's product liability action because the manufacturer established six of the six factors to determine whether a trade secret existed; in her motion to compel, the wife did not discuss her heightened burden for obtaining trade secret information. In re Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 392 S.W.3d 687, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4690 (Tex. App. Dallas June 23 2010).

19. Company manager testified that the requested documentation regarding tire testing would reveal testing techniques, and the company closely guarded the data obtained from its testing because such would have given valuable information to competitors; the court agreed that the company's testing techniques, protocols, and results were trade secrets, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 507, and the burden shifted to plaintiffs to show that the information was necessary for a fair adjudication of their claims. Schmidt v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28596 (E.D. Tex. July 31 2002).

20. Although plaintiffs claimed that the information requested, which the company claimed was a trade secret, was relevant, they had to show more; a plaintiff must also show the information is necessary for a fair adjudication of their claims. Schmidt v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28596 (E.D. Tex. July 31 2002).

21. Plaintiffs adequately showed the necessity of testing information regarding certain tires that were the subject of this lawsuit, and the court found the necessity outweighed the risk of potential harm of disclosure to the company, but the court limited the production to substantially similar tires for a certain period. Schmidt v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28596 (E.D. Tex. July 31 2002).

22. As for certain tires, plaintiffs did not carry their burden under Tex. R. Evid. 507 of showing that the testing information was sufficiently necessary to their case to outweigh the harm that disclosure might have on the company; plaintiffs' claims centered on a different kind of tire, and thus the information as to other tires was not shown to be necessary to the claim. Schmidt v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28596 (E.D. Tex. July 31 2002).

Evidence : Privileges : Trade Secrets : Scope

23. Under Texas law, the trade secret privilege was not absolute, and a magistrate judge clearly erred in denying a motion to compel in its entirety based on trade secret privilege where the documents provided for in camera review did not represent the full range of discovery sought, and plaintiffs' assertion of the privilege was overly broad. Given the relevance of the information, it was necessary for the judge to weigh the specific, particularized injury that disclosure would cause plaintiffs against defendant's need for the information. Orthoflex, Inc. v. Thermotek, Inc., 990 F. Supp. 2d 675, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 182853, 2013 WL 6980482 (N.D. Tex. Dec. 10 2013).

24. Galveston Central Appraisal District (GCAD) failed to adequately demonstrate its need for the requested information,because alternative methods of appraisal were available and it presented no evidence that those methods would not produce competent evidence of the market value of the refinery, two other valid methods of appraisal were available, and GCAD did not show that these methods would not provide a competent appraisal and evidence of the market value of the property. In re Refining-Texas, Lp, 415 S.W.3d 567, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12962 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 17 2013).

25. Tire manufacturer was entitled to mandamus relief directing a trial court to vacate its order compelling the production of documents in a wife's product liability action because the manufacturer established six of the six factors to determine whether a trade secret existed; in her motion to compel, the wife did not discuss her heightened burden for obtaining trade secret information. In re Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 392 S.W.3d 687, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4690 (Tex. App. Dallas June 23 2010).

Evidence : Privileges : Trade Secrets : Waiver

26. Trial court's rulings granting and overruling trade secret objections were inconsistent and the trial court erred in compelling production of trade secret information with no showing that the disclosure was necessary; the trial court did not make a necessity determination and even if disclosure was necessary, the trial court had not signed a protective order to prevent disclosure beyond what was necessary. Conditional mandamus relief was warranted. In re Universal Coin & Bullion, Ltd., 218 S.W.3d 828, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1987 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

27. Company proved its customer list and contact information were trade secrets the company protected, and once the company established the privilege, the burden shifted to the reporter to show the information was necessary, but the trial court's order compelled production while deferring such a determination and the reporter did not show why the trade secret information was necessary to defend the claim against him. In re Universal Coin & Bullion, Ltd., 218 S.W.3d 828, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1987 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2007).

30. Although a party resisting presuit discovery submitted only a conclusory affidavit and thus failed to prove that the information sought would require disclosure of information protected by the trade secret privilege, the trial court abused its discretion when it ordered the discovery without making the required finding that the likely benefit of

31. Trial court's grant of a brokerage firm's petition for presuit discovery from former employees and their company under Tex. R. Civ. P. 202 was an abuse of discretion because the information sought, details regarding a risk-management program developed by the employees, constituted trade secret information protected under Tex. R. THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH August 16, 2020

Rule 508 Informer's Identity Privilege

(a) General Rule.--The United States, a state, or a subdivision of either has a privilege to refuse to disclose a person's identity if:

(1)the person has furnished information to a law enforcement officer or a member of a legislative committee or its staff conducting an investigation of a possible violation of law; and

(2)the information relates to or assists in the investigation.

(b) Who May Claim.--The privilege may be claimed by an appropriate representative of the public entity to which the informer furnished the information. The court in a criminal case must reject the privilege claim if the state objects.

(c) Exceptions.

(1) Voluntary Disclosure; Informer a Witness.--This privilege does not apply if:

(A)the informer's identity or the informer's interest in the communication's subject matter has been disclosed - by a privilege holder or the informer's own action - to a person who would have cause to resent the communication; or

(B)the informer appears as a witness for the public entity.

(2) Testimony About the Merits.

(A) Criminal Case.--In a criminal case, this privilege does not apply if the court finds a reasonable probability exists that the informer can give testimony necessary to a fair determination of guilt or innocence. If the court so finds and the public entity elects not to disclose the informer's identity:

(i)on the defendant's motion, the court must dismiss the charges to which the testimony would relate; or

(ii)on its own motion, the court may dismiss the charges to which the testimony would relate.

(B) Certain Civil Cases.--In a civil case in which the public entity is a party, this privilege does not apply if the court finds a reasonable probability exists that the informer can give testimony necessary to a fair determination of a material issue on the merits. If the court so finds and the public entity elects not to disclose the informer's identity, the court may make any order that justice requires.

(C) Procedures.

(i) If it appears that an informer may be able to give the testimony required to invoke this exception and the public entity claims the privilege, the court must give the public entity an opportunity to show in camera facts relevant to determining whether this exception is met. The showing should ordinarily be made by affidavits, but the court may take testimony if it finds the matter cannot be satisfactorily resolved by affidavits.

(ii) No counsel or party may attend the in camera showing.

(iii) The court must seal and preserve for appeal evidence submitted under this subparagraph (2)(C). The evidence must not otherwise be revealed without the public entity's consent.

(3) Legality of Obtaining Evidence.

(A) Court May Order Disclosure.--The court may order the public entity to disclose an informer's identity if:

(i)information from an informer is relied on to establish the legality of the means by which evidence was obtained; and

(ii)the court is not satisfied that the information was received from an informer reasonably believed to be reliable or credible.

(B) Procedures.

(i) On the public entity's request, the court must order the disclosure be made in camera.

(ii) No counsel or party may attend the in camera disclosure.

(iii) If the informer's identity is disclosed in camera, the court must seal and preserve for appeal the record of the in camera proceeding. The record of the in camera proceeding must not otherwise be revealed without the public entity's consent.

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Confrontation

1. In finding that the rape shield statute, Tex. R. Evid. 412, requires an adversarial hearing, the reviewing court rejected the State's argument, based on Tex. R. Evid. 508, that including the parties required explicit direction in the Texas rules; the procedure in Tex. R. Evid. 508 was referred to as "disclosure," while the in camera procedure in Tex. R. Evid. 412 was referred to as a "hearing," and hearings were ordinarily adversarial. LaPointe v. State, 225 S.W.3d 513, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 505 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1015, 128 S. Ct. 544, 169 L. Ed. 2d 381 (2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Delivery, Distribution & Sale

2. In defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver a controlled substance, cocaine, under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112(c), defense counsel's failure to pursue the identity of an informant and have it sealed for appellate review under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) did not constitute ineffective assistance because although defendant's motion to discover the informant's identity alleged that the informant was present during times concerning the transaction upon which the charges against him were based, the record did not reflect that the informant participated in the offense nor does it reflect that the informant was present when the offense was committed or at the time of arrest. Also, defendant failed to establish that the informant would have been a material witness. Charlot v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 5736 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 1999).

3. Where confidential informant (CI) only supplied information which established probable cause necessary for the issuance of a search warrant for methamphetamine and the CI did not supply the information upon which the State relied for a conviction on manufacturing methamphetamine, but rather the detective supplied that particular information, the testimony elicited at the hearing did not satisfy defendant's initial burden to show that the CI might be able to give testimony necessary to a fair determination of his guilt or innocence on manufacturing methamphetamine and did not trigger the procedural requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) requiring the State to disclose the identity of the CI. Long v. State, 137 S.W.3d 726, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3940 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : General Overview

4. Trial court did not abuse discretion in denying a defendant's motion to disclose the identity of a confidential informant, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508(c), where defendant did not satisfy his burden to show that informant's testimony was necessary to a fair determination of guilt or innocence of violating Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112(d); the informant was not present during raid of defendant's home during which cocaine was found. Herrera v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1353 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 16 2006).

5. In a juvenile defendant's challenge to his adjudication as a delinquent upon a finding that he violated his community supervision conditions by possessing marijuana within 1,000 feet of property owned by a school, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in not ordering the State to divulge the name of the confidential informant who implicated defendant as defendant did not demonstrate that the informant would have been able to give any testimony necessary to a fair determination of defendant's guilt or innocence; the informant provided information to the investigating officer that was proven to be accurate and reliable in this case, and the informant was not present at the scene at the time of the search. In re J.M.A.B., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10341 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 30 2006).

6. Where confidential informant (CI) only supplied information which established probable cause necessary for the issuance of a search warrant for methamphetamine and the CI did not supply the information upon which the State relied for a conviction on manufacturing methamphetamine, but rather the detective supplied that particular information, the testimony elicited at the hearing did not satisfy defendant's initial burden to show that the CI might be able to give testimony necessary to a fair determination of his guilt or innocence on manufacturing methamphetamine and did not trigger the procedural requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) requiring the State to disclose the identity of the CI. Long v. State, 137 S.W.3d 726, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3940 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Search & Seizure : Search Warrants : Confidential Informants : General Overview

7. While the information of a confidential informant formed the probable cause basis for the search warrant, but the informant was not present when the warrant was executed, the informant's testimony might have been relevant to the issue of probable cause, but not to the actual offense. The defendant did not show that the testimony would significantly aid in the determination of guilt or innocence, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion to compel disclosure of the confidential informant. Parks v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2112 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 16 2006).

8. Court did not err by failing to order the State to reveal the identity of a confidential informant where defendant sought the informant's identity to explore the justification for the "no knock" search warrant, and that was not a material issue relating to a fair determination of an issue of guilt or innocence and thus was not the purpose for which disclosure of the informant's identity was permitted. The argument that the informant could have identified other occupants who "could have been responsible for the contraband" was nothing more than mere conjecture or supposition unsupported by any evidence. Patterson v. State, 138 S.W.3d 643, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6082 (Tex. App. Dallas 2004).

9. Where confidential informant (CI) only supplied information which established probable cause necessary for the issuance of a search warrant for methamphetamine and the CI did not supply the information upon which the State relied for a conviction on manufacturing methamphetamine, but rather the detective supplied that particular information, the testimony elicited at the hearing did not satisfy defendant's initial burden to show that the CI might be able to give testimony necessary to a fair determination of his guilt or innocence on manufacturing methamphetamine and did not trigger the procedural requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) requiring the State to disclose the identity of the CI. Long v. State, 137 S.W.3d 726, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3940 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

10. Because the trial court properly ruled that the State was not required to disclose the identity of the confidential informant (CI) pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508, defendant's trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to subpoena the CI because trial counsel did not know the identity of the CI. Long v. State, 137 S.W.3d 726, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3940 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Search & Seizure : Search Warrants : Confidential Informants : Identity of Informant

11. Denial of defendant's motion for disclosure of the confidential informant's identity was not outside of the zone of reasonable disagreement because the confidential informant was not an eyewitness to the offense for which defendant was charged. The informant made a controlled buy at some point within forty-eight hours before the execution of the search warrant but defendant was not charged with any alleged criminal activity that occurred during the controlled buy. Phillips v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8741 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 16 2013).

12. Trial court did to err by failing to order the disclosure of a confidential informant's identity or by failing to conduct an in camera hearing because defendant failed to met the threshold burden of showing that the informant's testimony was necessary to a fair determination of guilt or innocence, as the informant's information was not used to establish defendant's identity or his connection to the home and there was no evidence that the informant participated in the charged offenses. Haggerty v. State, 429 S.W.3d 1, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8465 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 11 2013).

13. Where the failure of a search warrant affidavit to establish a first informant's reliability or credibility did not affect the legality of the search warrant, a trial court committed no error in refusing to direct the disclosure of the first confidential informant's identity under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(3); a second confidential informant had supplied the same information to the police, i.e., that defendant was selling crack cocaine. Jones v. State, 338 S.W.3d 725, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2924 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 14 2011).

14. Trial court did not err by refusing to identify the first confidential informant under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(3) because the second confidential informant provided the same information to the police, namely that defendant was selling crack cocaine. Jones v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 820 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 31 2011).

15. Appellant failed to preserve error as to whether he was entitled to either the disclosure of a confidential informant's identity under Tex. R. Evid. 508 or an in camera examination of the informant, given that (1) appellant never asked that the trial court direct the State to disclose the informant's identify, and (2) at trial, appellant argued that he was entitled to ask an officer certain questions about the informant to determine if the person was credible and reliable; appellant's claims at trial did not comport with his claims on appeal. Butler v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9825, 2010 WL 5132557 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 14 2010).

16. Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(3) applied, as the informant participated in the transactions that resulted in probable cause to search appellant's residence. Butler v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9825, 2010 WL 5132557 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 14 2010).

17. Trial court's rulings reflected the finding that the trial court judge was satisfied that the information upon which the warrant was based was received from an informant reasonably believed to be credible or reliable for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 508; appellant pointed to no evidence to the contrary and he failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion in denying his motion to suppress. Butler v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9825, 2010 WL 5132557 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 14 2010).

18. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to grant defendant's motion to disclose the identity of a confidential informant because the informant was neither a participant nor a material witness to the commission of the charged offense, as the indicted offense occurred 24 hours after the informant's second drug purchase when the police executed the search warrant at the apartment, and the charges were based on the drug evidence found during the search. Pierce v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8825, 2010 WL 4352710 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 4 2010).

19. Defendant failed to show that the trial court erred by refusing to grant his motion to disclose the identity of a confidential informant, because the informant's testimony related only to the officer's formation of whether probable cause could have existed during the investigation of whether defendant was selling narcotics, and the evidence did not establish that the informant's testimony would have significantly aided the jury in determining defendant's guilt or innocence; the evidence upon which defendant's conviction was based was gained from a search of his person and not from the testimony or presence of an informant at the scene. Sanchez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3429, 2010 WL 1840238 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 6 2010).

20. In defendant's drug case, the identity informants was not material to the case and the testimony was not necessary to aid the jury because defendant was not charged in the instant case with the murder that the informants provided information on. The informants were not involved in the execution of the search warrant; they only provided names for the detective to investigate. Padilla v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 674, 2010 WL 337673 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 29 2010).

21. Court properly denied defendant's motion to disclose the identity of a confidential informant because the informant's testimony that the cocaine sold to the informant came from the kitchen cabinet would not have absolved defendant from criminal responsibility for the cocaine in the cabinet. Defendant had access to the apartment as shown by his possession of a key to the apartment and his entry into the apartment with the key, and he also had a receipt for payment of rent on the apartment. Granville v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 650, 2009 WL 225390 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 2 2009).

22. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 508, the trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion to disclose a confidential informant because the informant was not a fact witness, but merely provided probable cause for the issuance of the search warrant; the informant was not present when the search warrant was executed, whether defendant possessed or sold drugs to the informant at other times had no bearing upon whether he possessed cocaine with intent to deliver at the time of the search, and defendant did not show that the informant was a material witness or that the informant's testimony was needed to determine guilt or innocence. Gipson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3919 (Tex. App. Dallas May 22 2007).

23. Defendant was charged with a separate offense while he was outside the house; the person described in the search warrant affidavit as being in control of the house did not match defendant's description. Furthermore, there was no indication that the confidential informant was present when defendant committed the offense; thus, defendant did not demonstrate that the informant's testimony was necessary to a fair determination of guilt or innocence, and the trial court properly overruled defendant's motion to disclose the informant's identity and refused to hold an in camera hearing. Williams v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3588 (Tex. App. El Paso May 10 2007).

24. Although the trial court might not have articulated the proper standard in refusing to order the disclosure of an informant for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 508(a), the court agreed that disclosure was not required; the officer testified to the informant's reliability and the court was unable to say that the informant's testimony would have been necessary or the trial court's decision was unreasonable, and the trial court was entitled to believe the officer, such that the trial court's order was not an abuse of discretion. Nash v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8144 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 13 2006).

25. Trial court did not err in refusing to allow defense counsel to question an investigator as to when drug buys at defendant's home occurred because the timing would reveal the identity of the confidential informant, contrary to Tex. R. Evid. 508, and the identity was not necessary to a determination of guilt because defendant had pleaded guilty. Further, this issue was not preserved for review because counsel moved on without objection. Rios v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5627 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 23 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : Informants : General Overview

26. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine an officer about the reliability and identity of the confidential informant because defendant did not carry his burden under Tex. R. Evid. 508 to show that the informant was a material witness or that the informant's testimony was necessary to fairly determine defendant's guilt or innocence; defendant was not arrested and charged with the possession offense witnessed by the informant, but rather was arrested and charged for possessing with intent to deliver the cocaine discovered during the later search of the house; there was no evidence that the informant was present when the search warrant was executed, and whether defendant possessed and sold drugs to the informant or others had no bearing on whether he possessed cocaine with the intent to deliver at the time of the search. Jenkins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3266 (Tex. App. Dallas May 7 2008).

27. Because an informant was present at the drug deal and defendant's arrest, he was an eyewitness to the charged offense, thus triggering the procedural requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 508. Guijon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9207 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 20 2007).

28. Court rejected defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, as counsel testified to the ramifications under Tex. R. Evid. 508 of the State's failure to disclose a confidential informant, counsel testified that he did not pursue disclosure because he already had access to the information, the court deferred to the trial court's determination, the failure to file a motion to disclose was a strategic decision, and he had no need to file a motion to disclose what he already knew, plus it was possible counsel consulted with the inmate and found that production of the informant would not have provided any favorable evidence; the inmate failed to show that counsel performed deficiently or that the inmate would not have pleaded guilty, plus speculation about what the State might have done did not show that counsel's conduct had a prejudicial effect on the outcome of the proceeding. Guijon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9207 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 20 2007).

29. Because an inmate failed to show that counsel's failure to file a motion to disclose an informant's identity under Tex. R. Evid. 508 was ineffective assistance, or that the inmate's plea was involuntary, the trial court did not err in denying the inmate's application for a writ of habeas corpus on this issue. Guijon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9207 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 20 2007).

30. In a drug case, defendant did not receive ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to attempt to identify a confidential informant (CI) under Tex. R. Evid. 508 because there was nothing in the record suggesting that the trial court did not believe that the CI was reliable or credible; moreover, defense counsel argued that the issue at the suppression hearing was not guilt or innocence, but the legality of the search. McNickles v. State, 230 S.W.3d 816, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5395 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

31. Defendant was charged with a separate offense while he was outside the house; the person described in the search warrant affidavit as being in control of the house did not match defendant's description. Furthermore, there was no indication that the confidential informant was present when defendant committed the offense; thus, defendant did not demonstrate that the informant's testimony was necessary to a fair determination of guilt or innocence, and the trial court properly overruled defendant's motion to disclose the informant's identity and refused to hold an in camera hearing. Williams v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3588 (Tex. App. El Paso May 10 2007).

32. In a case of possession of a firearm by a felon, defendant was not entitled to disclosure of an informant's identity under Tex. R. Evid. 508(a) because it would not significantly aid him; defendant admitted that he had been convicted of a felony and that he had been carrying a firearm, and the informant's testimony would not have shown otherwise. Clark v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6958 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 7 2006).

33. While the information of a confidential informant formed the probable cause basis for the search warrant, but the informant was not present when the warrant was executed, the informant's testimony might have been relevant to the issue of probable cause, but not to the actual offense. The defendant did not show that the testimony would significantly aid in the determination of guilt or innocence, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion to compel disclosure of the confidential informant. Parks v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2112 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 16 2006).

34. Where defendant pleaded guilty to possession with intent to deliver a controlled substance, he failed to show that the confidential informer induced him to commit the offense. The court properly denied his motion to compel disclosure of the informer's identity pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508(c), because he was unable to pursue an entrapment defense. Brice v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7971 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 26 2005).

35. In a trial for possession of marijuana, the trial court properly allowed the State not to disclose the identity of an informant, despite defendant's argument that the informant could have provided information about how drugs were distributed, because the method by which narcotics were being distributed was not necessary for determining guilt for the charged offense. Defendant also did not provide supporting argument as to why information about the house where the arrest occurred was necessary for a fair determination of guilt or innocence. Olivarez v. State, 171 S.W.3d 283, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4210 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

36. There was no error in denying defendant's motion for discovery of the identity of the confidential informant because defendant's argument that the informant "might have been able" to provide exculpatory information was nothing more than conjecture or supposition unsupported by any evidence; defendant failed to carry the threshold burden of making a plausible showing of how the informant's information could be important. Dickson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4151 (Tex. App. Dallas May 27 2005).

37. Court concluded that assertions made by defendants implicated Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2); the trial court's ordering the disclosure of an informant's identity under Rule 508(c)(2) was an abuse of discretion because the evidence failed to show that the informant might have been able to provide testimony that was needed in order to determine guilt or innocence. State v. Sotelo, 164 S.W.3d 759, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3664 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2005).

38. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that disclosure of an informant's identity was not necessary where the affiant testified that he had used the informant in the past and that the informant had proven credible. Selph v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2854 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 14 2005).

39. Where the trial court did not abuse its discretion in not requiring disclosure of an informant's identity, an in camera hearing was not required under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(3) to determine the informant's identity and to preserve the trial court's determination of the informant's credibility for appellate review. Selph v. State, 2005 Tex. App.

LEXIS 2854 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 14 2005).

40. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2), a defendant had the threshold burden to show that an informant's identity had to be disclosed and that the informant's potential testimony would significantly aid him; the trial court conducted an in camera interview with the informant in which the informant stated that he was not present during the drug transaction, such that, based upon the evidence developed during in camera review, there was not a reasonable probability that the informant could have provided testimony necessary to the determination of defendant's guilt. Cannady v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4584 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20 2004).

41. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2), a defendant had the threshold burden to show that an informant's identity had to be disclosed and that the informant's potential testimony would significantly aid him; the trial court conducted an in camera interview with the informant in which the informant stated that he was not present during the drug transaction, such that, based upon the evidence developed during in camera review, there was not a reasonable probability that the informant could have provided testimony necessary to the determination of defendant's guilt. Cannady v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4584 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 20 2004).

42. In defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver a controlled substance, cocaine, under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112(c), defense counsel's failure to pursue the identity of an informant and have it sealed for appellate review under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) did not constitute ineffective assistance because although defendant's motion to discover the informant's identity alleged that the informant was present during times concerning the transaction upon which the charges against him were based, the record did not reflect that the informant participated in the offense nor does it reflect that the informant was present when the offense was committed or at the time of arrest. Also, defendant failed to establish that the informant would have been a material witness. Charlot v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 5736 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 1999).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : Informants

43. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion to disclose the confidential informant's identity or by declining to conduct an in camera inspection under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) because defendant did not make a plausible showing of how the informant's testimony may have been relevant to his guilt or innocence. The evidence showed that the informant's tip was used only to establish surveillance of the vehicle and for starting an investigation of the possible possession of narcotics, and no evidence was presented that the informant was a participant in the charged offense or present when the agents conducted the search of the vehicle; the informant's information was not used to establish defendant's identity or to establish that he possessed the marijuana. Sanchez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9230, 2011 WL 5844518 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 22 2011).

44. In a prosecution of defendant for possession of a controlled substance, the trial court's determination that defendant did not show that disclosure of a confidential informant's identity was necessary to a fair determination of guilt was not outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it denied defendant's motion to compel disclosure of the informant. Johnson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2062, 2010 WL 1077419 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 24 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : Informants : Privilege

45. Court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to conduct an in camera hearing to determine whether to compel the identity of the confidential informant, because there was no evidence in the record showing that the informant's testimony would significantly aid the jury in determining guilt or innocence; there was no plausible showing of how the testimony could be important, and defendant merely speculated that the informant might provide relevant information. Morin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7554, 2010 WL 3582382 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 15 2010).

46. Trial court did not err by denying defendant's request for disclosure of the identity of the State's confidential informant because defendant's assertion that the informant could have given testimony implicating someone else for the cocaine and marijuana found inside his place of business was based on mere conjecture. Horn v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5819, 2014 WL 2505587 (Tex. App. Tyler May 30 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Discovery by Defendant : Informants : Scope

47. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion to disclose the confidential informant's identity or by declining to conduct an in camera inspection under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) because defendant did not make a plausible showing of how the informant's testimony may have been relevant to his guilt or innocence. The evidence showed that the informant's tip was used only to establish surveillance of the vehicle and for starting an investigation of the possible possession of narcotics, and no evidence was presented that the informant was a participant in the charged offense or present when the agents conducted the search of the vehicle; the informant's information was not used to establish defendant's identity or to establish that he possessed the marijuana. Sanchez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9230, 2011 WL 5844518 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 22 2011).

48. Defendant who pleaded guilty to possession of methamphetamine failed to demonstrate that the trial court should have ordered the State to reveal a confidential informant's identity pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2), because defendant offered no evidence that the informant's testimony was necessary to determine any material issue, and there was no evidence that the informant participated in the offense or witnessed the offense or the arrest. Morrell v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2573, 2009 WL 1011114 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 15 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Suppression of Evidence

49. Disclosure of an informant's identity was not required for purposes of a motion to suppress because the trial court implicitly found, by denying the motion to suppress without requiring disclosure, that the informant was reliable. Bland v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6744 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 14 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

50. In a drug case, defendant did not receive ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to attempt to identify a confidential informant (CI) under Tex. R. Evid. 508 because there was nothing in the record suggesting that the trial court did not believe that the CI was reliable or credible; moreover, defense counsel argued that the issue at the suppression hearing was not guilt or innocence, but the legality of the search. McNickles v. State, 230 S.W.3d 816, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5395 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

51. Ineffective assistance of counsel claim was not supported by a failure to file a motion to disclose the identity of a confidential informant pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508 because trial counsel appeared to be accurate in the assessment that the defense could not meet its burden. Sanchez v. State, 243 S.W.3d 57, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4264 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

52. Because the trial court properly ruled that the State was not required to disclose the identity of the confidential informant (CI) pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508, defendant's trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to subpoena the CI because trial counsel did not know the identity of the CI. Long v. State, 137 S.W.3d 726, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3940 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

53. In defendant's trial for possession with intent to deliver a controlled substance, cocaine, under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 481.112(c), defense counsel's failure to pursue the identity of an informant and have it sealed for appellate review under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) did not constitute ineffective assistance because although defendant's motion to discover the informant's identity alleged that the informant was present during times concerning the transaction upon which the charges against him were based, the record did not reflect that the informant participated in the offense nor does it reflect that the informant was present when the offense was committed or at the time of arrest. Also, defendant failed to establish that the informant would have been a material witness. Charlot v. State, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 5736 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 30 1999).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Judicial Discretion

54. Under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(3), trial court did not abuse its discretion in conducting an in camera hearing regarding evidence that could have revealed the identity of a confidential informant where the State requested the in camera hearing and, even if the State did not request the hearing, the rule in question did not preclude the trial court from conducting an in camera hearing sua sponte in proper circumstances. Hackleman v. State, 919 S.W.2d 440, 1996 Tex. App. LEXIS 649 (Tex. App. Austin 1996).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Presentation

55. Under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(3), trial court did not abuse its discretion in conducting an in camera hearing regarding evidence that could have revealed the identity of a confidential informant where the State requested the in camera hearing and, even if the State did not request the hearing, the rule in question did not preclude the trial court from conducting an in camera hearing sua sponte in proper circumstances. Hackleman v. State, 919 S.W.2d 440, 1996 Tex. App. LEXIS 649 (Tex. App. Austin 1996).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Defenses : Entrapment

56. Exception to the State's informer privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 508 was not established because an alleged informant did not witness a traffic stop or search where drugs were found; moreover, the entrapment defense was not shown where the alleged informant merely made repeated phone calls to defendant about buying drugs. Avalos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3539 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 15 2008).

57. Where defendant pleaded guilty to possession with intent to deliver a controlled substance, he failed to show that the confidential informer induced him to commit the offense. The court properly denied his motion to compel disclosure of the informer's identity pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508(c), because he was unable to pursue an entrapment defense. Brice v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7971 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Sept. 26 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : General Overview

58. Considering all of the circumstances of the case, the trial court's denial of defendant's motion to reveal the informant was proper and not an abuse of discretion as the record showed that: (1) the trial court ruled that defendant had made a plausible showing of need for the informant's identity; (2) the State invoked the privilege not to disclose pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508; and (3) the State asked to present affidavits for in camera examination by the trial court to refute defendant's showing of need. The record showed that the affidavits were presented to the trial court prior to its final ruling, and defendant's silence acted as acquiescence to the State's request to have the affidavit included in the record and the trial court's granting of said request. Johnson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5807, 2010 WL 2853598 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 21 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : General Overview

59. Under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(3), trial court did not abuse its discretion in conducting an in camera hearing regarding evidence that could have revealed the identity of a confidential informant where the State requested the in camera hearing and, even if the State did not request the hearing, the rule in question did not preclude the trial court from conducting an in camera hearing sua sponte in proper circumstances. Hackleman v. State, 919 S.W.2d 440, 1996 Tex. App. LEXIS 649 (Tex. App. Austin 1996).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

60. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motions to discover the identity of the State's confidential informant under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) because while it was possible that the informant could have testified that defendant was not the person who sold the informant drugs, the testimony would likely not have significantly aided defendant because his guilt for the two crimes, possessing cocaine while intending to deliver it and unlawful possession of a firearm, were not dependent upon his being the seller or on his participation in any of the drug purchases made by the informant. Harris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 732, 2012 WL 254086 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 26 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Witnesses

61. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine an officer about the reliability and identity of the confidential informant because defendant did not carry his burden under Tex. R. Evid. 508 to show that the informant was a material witness or that the informant's testimony was necessary to fairly determine defendant's guilt or innocence; defendant was not arrested and charged with the possession offense witnessed by the informant, but rather was arrested and charged for possessing with intent to deliver the cocaine discovered during the later search of the house; there was no evidence that the informant was present when the search warrant was executed, and whether defendant possessed and sold drugs to the informant or others had no bearing on whether he possessed cocaine with the intent to deliver at the time of the search. Jenkins v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3266 (Tex. App. Dallas May 7 2008).

Evidence : Privileges : General Overview

62. Appellant's issues did not provide him with greater relief than the court's current disposition to reverse and remand for a new trial, given that (1) harmful error from the denial of a motion to suppress required reversal and remand, (2) assuming appellant was free to have the confidential informant disclosed, the State would have had the option to disclose the informant or dismiss the charges as to which the testimony would relate, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2), and (3) as the State did not have to make an election much less chose to not disclose an informant's identity, the court did not have authority to dismiss any charges; because review of other issues would not result in greater relief than the current disposition, the court did not need to reach those issues. Farias v. State, 426 S.W.3d 198, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9325 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 1 2012).

63. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 508, the trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion to disclose a confidential informant because the informant was not a fact witness, but merely provided probable cause for the issuance of the search warrant; the informant was not present when the search warrant was executed, whether defendant possessed or sold drugs to the informant at other times had no bearing upon whether he possessed cocaine with intent to deliver at the time of the search, and defendant did not show that the informant was a material witness or that the informant's testimony was needed to determine guilt or innocence. Gipson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3919 (Tex. App. Dallas May 22 2007).

Evidence : Privileges : Government Privileges : General Overview

64. Although the record showed that the State did not timely disclose an informer's identity, the record did not show that the State invoked a privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 508 by refusing to disclose the identity, and thus the trial court erred in dismissing, under Rule 508, indictments against defendant for possession of at least 400 grams of cocaine and investing funds to further the commission of the offense of possession of at least 400 grams of a controlled substance. State v. Sustaita, 186 S.W.3d 1, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8073 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

Evidence : Privileges : Government Privileges : Official Information Privilege : Informer Privilege

65. During defendant's trial for delivery of methamphetamine, the court did not err when it ruled that it was satisfied that information was received from an informer reasonably believed to be reliable or credible; the "Legality of Obtaining Evidence" exception in Tex. R. Evid. 508(c) did not apply because an officer testified that he had used the informant in the past and the information had proven to be true. Rust v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8532 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 6 2014).

66. Defendant did not testify personally, nor did he submit evidence suggesting that the drugs he possessed were not his, that the informant could know to whom the drugs actually belonged, or that defendant was an unwilling participant in the transaction with the officer; defendant did not make a plausible showing the informant could give necessary testimony. Thomas v. State, 417 S.W.3d 89, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13614, 2013 WL 6019528 (Tex. App. Amarillo Nov. 4 2013).

67. When the State voluntarily discloses a confidential informant's identity for the first time at trial, the defendant must either object or request a continuance in order to preserve a rule violation for appellate review; because defendant did neither in this case, this claim was waived. Perez v. State, 414 S.W.3d 784, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10588 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 22 2013).

68. Trial court found that the informant was reliable and credible, that the informant was not present when the search warrant was executed, the informant did not see anybody else at the residence, and the informant's testimony would not be helpful; the trial court did not err in denying defendant's request for disclosure of the informant's identity. Brock v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10649 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 22 2013).

69. Although defendant, who claimed that his right of confrontation was violated when a witness was allowed to testify using a pseudonym, contended his trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance because trial counsel did not request a dismissal of the charges under Tex. R. Evid. 508, the trial court would not have been compelled to dismiss the charges had trial counsel requested it. Defendant made no showing that he was harmed in any way by the trial court's refusal to require the State to reveal the witness's name. Smith v. State, 392 S.W.3d 190, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9716, 2012 WL 5986460 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 28 2012).

70. Where defendant was convicted of possession of methamphetamine after a confidential informant told police that a man driving a vehicle matching the description of defendant's vehicle would be carrying a half-pound of methamphetamine, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying his motion to compel disclosure of the informant's identity in light of the qualified privilege set forth in Tex. R. Evid. 508. Defendant failed to make a plausible showing that the informant could give testimony necessary to a fair determination of his guilt or innocence. Aumock v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1011, 2012 WL 390818 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 8 2012).

71. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motions to discover the identity of the State's confidential informant under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) because while it was possible that the informant could have testified that defendant was not the person who sold the informant drugs, the testimony would likely not have significantly aided defendant because his guilt for the two crimes, possessing cocaine while intending to deliver it and unlawful possession of a firearm, were not dependent upon his being the seller or on his participation in any of the drug purchases made by the informant. Harris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 732, 2012 WL 254086 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 26 2012).

72. Because the informant was not present when officers executed a warrant and found contraband, the informant would not have been expected to be able to provide testimony on guilt or innocence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2), and thus the court's focus was under Rule 508(c)(3). Camp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10060, 2011 WL 6774042 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 22 2011).

73. Appellant did not show that the Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) exception applied, given that (1) the conclusion that the informant would be necessary in determining appellant's innocence or guilt was not based on any evidence presented, (2) there was no indication that the informant participated in the offense or was shown to be a material witness, and (3) the basis of the charge against appellant was the cocaine seized during a search, not the information the informant related. Camp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10060, 2011 WL 6774042 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 22 2011).

74. Defense counsel argued that it was not known whether the informant was credible, but the issue was not whether the parties or the trial court might now believe or disbelieve the informant, but whether the trial court found the informant was reasonably believed to be credible when the search warrant was applied for. Camp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10060, 2011 WL 6774042 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 22 2011).

75. Defense counsel said there were many discrepancies in what the affiant said versus what was found, but the issue was whether the trial court was satisfied that the informant was reasonably found to be reliable when the warrant was applied for; the affiant averred belief that the informant's information was reliable given past dealings and the basis for this belief was cited, and thus appellant's claim questioning the informant's reliability was based only on speculation. Camp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10060, 2011 WL 6774042 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 22 2011).

76. Because appellant did not challenge the issuance of the warrant or argue that the affidavit did not show probable cause, she failed to develop evidence to subvert the finding that the informant was reasonably believed, and thus the exception under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(3) had not been triggered; with nothing indicating that the officer, when making out the affidavit, did not believe the informant to be reliable, even a direct challenge to the warrant would not have required a disclosure of the informant's identity, and nothing undermined the trial court's apparent finding of the reliability of the informant. Camp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10060, 2011 WL 6774042 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 22 2011).

77. Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(3) exception involves where the informant's information is relied on to justify getting the evidence, that is, issuing the search warrant. Camp v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 10060, 2011 WL 6774042 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 22 2011).

78. Appellant did not raise any potential defenses except that the confidential informer might have had information about whether appellant was involved in the delivery of the substances, but even if both informants testified that appellant was not involved in the delivery or possession on the day of the controlled buys, that did not mean that he did not possess with intent to deliver on another day; the trial court did not err in refusing to hold an in camera hearing on the identify of the informants under Tex. R. Evid. 508, and even if the trial court did err, there was no harm because the jury convicted appellant of the lesser-included offense of possession. Griffin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1594, 2011 WL 754349 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 3 2011).

79. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to grant defendant's motion to disclose the identity of a confidential informant because the informant was neither a participant nor a material witness to the commission of the charged offense, as the indicted offense occurred 24 hours after the informant's second drug purchase when the police executed the search warrant at the apartment, and the charges were based on the drug evidence found during the search. Pierce v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8825, 2010 WL 4352710 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 4 2010).

80. Considering all of the circumstances of the case, the trial court's denial of defendant's motion to reveal the informant was proper and not an abuse of discretion as the record showed that: (1) the trial court ruled that defendant had made a plausible showing of need for the informant's identity; (2) the State invoked the privilege not to disclose pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508; and (3) the State asked to present affidavits for in camera examination by the trial court to refute defendant's showing of need. The record showed that the affidavits were presented to the trial court prior to its final ruling, and defendant's silence acted as acquiescence to the State's request to have the affidavit included in the record and the trial court's granting of said request. Johnson v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5807, 2010 WL 2853598 (Tex. App. Amarillo July 21 2010).

81. There was no abuse of discretion in refusing to require the State to disclose the identity of its confidential informant, because the record did not reflect that the informant was present when defendant was arrested, nor did it show that the informant participated in the offense for which defendant was arrested. Richie v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1772, 2010 WL 878729 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 11 2010).

82. Defendant who pleaded guilty to possession of methamphetamine failed to demonstrate that the trial court should have ordered the State to reveal a confidential informant's identity pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2), because defendant offered no evidence that the informant's testimony was necessary to determine any material issue, and there was no evidence that the informant participated in the offense or witnessed the offense or the arrest. Morrell v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2573, 2009 WL 1011114 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 15 2009).

83. Court properly denied defendant's motion to disclose the identity of a confidential informant because the informant's testimony that the cocaine sold to the informant came from the kitchen cabinet would not have absolved defendant from criminal responsibility for the cocaine in the cabinet. Defendant had access to the apartment as shown by his possession of a key to the apartment and his entry into the apartment with the key, and he also had a receipt for payment of rent on the apartment. Granville v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 650, 2009 WL 225390 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 2 2009).

84. Where a confidential informant (CI) led police to defendant who was driving a car with an expired registration, the police conducted a traffic stop and saw one kilo of cocaine in plain view; defendant failed to show that disclosure of the CI's identity under Tex. R. Evid. 508(c)(2) was necessary to a fair determination of his guilt of the offense of possession with intent to deliver cocaine. The trial court did not err in overruling his motion to disclose the informant's identity, because the CI was not at the scene and there was never an actual hand-to-hand delivery made. Reed v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9823 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 4 2008).

85. Exception to the State's informer privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 508 was not established because an alleged informant did not witness a traffic stop or search where drugs were found; moreover, the entrapment defense was not shown where the alleged informant merely made repeated phone calls to defendant about buying drugs. Avalos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3539 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 15 2008).

86. In a drug case, an affidavit offered by defendant in support of his request for the identity of an alleged informant was not deficient because it was a statement in writing, signed by defendant, sworn before a deputy district clerk, and certified by the deputy district clerk under a county seal. Avalos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3539 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 15 2008).

87. Informant could offer no testimony about the actual offense and there was no evidence that the informant participated in the offense for which defendant was charged, nor was there evidence that the informant was an eyewitness to the search, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 508; the informant's testimony would only have been relevant to the issue of probable cause, thus making it unnecessary for the identity of the informant to be disclosed, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to hold an in-camera hearing or to disclose the identity of the informant. Johnson v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3494 (Tex. App. Waco May 14 2008).

88. In a juvenile defendant's challenge to his adjudication as a delinquent upon a finding that he violated his community supervision conditions by possessing marijuana within 1,000 feet of property owned by a school, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in not ordering the State to divulge the name of the confidential informant who implicated defendant as defendant did not demonstrate that the informant would have been able to give any testimony necessary to a fair determination of defendant's guilt or innocence; the informant provided information to the investigating officer that was proven to be accurate and reliable in this case, and the informant was not present at the scene at the time of the search. In re J.M.A.B., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10341 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 30 2006).

89. Trial court did not err in refusing to allow defense counsel to question an investigator as to when drug buys at defendant's home occurred because the timing would reveal the identity of the confidential informant, contrary to Tex. R. Evid. 508, and the identity was not necessary to a determination of guilt because defendant had pleaded guilty. Further, this issue was not preserved for review because counsel moved on without objection. Rios v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5627 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 23 2014).

Evidence : Privileges : Government Privileges : Waiver

90. During defendant's trial for delivery of methamphetamine, the court did not err when it ruled that it was satisfied that information was received from an informer reasonably believed to be reliable or credible; the "Legality of Obtaining Evidence" exception in Tex. R. Evid. 508(c) did not apply because an officer testified that he had used the informant in the past and the information had proven to be true. Rust v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8532 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 6 2014).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Rape Shield Laws

91. In finding that the rape shield statute, Tex. R. Evid. 412, requires an adversarial hearing, the reviewing court rejected the State's argument, based on Tex. R. Evid. 508, that including the parties required explicit direction in the Texas rules; the procedure in Tex. R. Evid. 508 was referred to as "disclosure," while the in camera procedure in Tex. R. Evid. 412 was referred to as a "hearing," and hearings were ordinarily adversarial. LaPointe v. State, 225 S.W.3d 513, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 505 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1015, 128 S. Ct. 544, 169 L. Ed. 2d 381 (2007).

Governments : Courts : Clerks of Court

92. In a drug case, an affidavit offered by defendant in support of his request for the identity of an alleged informant was not deficient because it was a statement in writing, signed by defendant, sworn before a deputy district clerk, and certified by the deputy district clerk under a county seal. Avalos v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3539 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 15 2008).

Rule 509 Physician-Patient Privilege

(a) Definitions.--In this rule:

(1)A "patient" is a person who consults or is seen by a physician for medical care.

(2)A "physician" is a person licensed, or who the patient reasonably believes is licensed, to practice medicine in any state or nation.

(C)participating in the diagnosis and treatment under the physician's direction, including members of the patient's family.

(c) General Rule in a Civil Case.--In a civil case, a patient has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent any other person from disclosing:

(2) Consent.--If the patient or a person authorized to act on the patient's behalf consents in writing to the release of any privileged information, as provided in subdivision (f).

(3) Action to Collect.--In an action to collect a claim for medical services rendered to the patient.

(4) Party Relies on Patient's Condition.--If any party relies on the patient's physical, mental, or emotional condition as a part of the party's claim or defense and the communication or record is relevant to that condition.

(5) Disciplinary Investigation or Proceeding.--In a disciplinary investigation of or proceeding against a physician under the Medical Practice Act, Tex. Occ. Code § 164.001 et seq., or a registered nurse under Tex. Occ. Code § 301.451 et seq. But the board conducting the investigation or proceeding must protect the identity of any patient whose medical records are examined unless:

(A)the patient's records would be subject to disclosure under paragraph (e)(1); or

(B)the patient has consented in writing to the release of medical records, as provided in subdivision (f).

(6) Involuntary Civil Commitment or Similar Proceeding.--In a proceeding for involuntary civil commitment or court-ordered treatment, or a probable cause hearing under Tex. Health & Safety Code:

(C)title 7, subtitle D (Persons With an Intellectual Disability Act).

(7) Abuse or Neglect of "Institution" Resident.--In a proceeding regarding the abuse or neglect, or the cause of any abuse or neglect, of a resident of an "institution" as defined in Tex. Health & Safety Code § 242.002.

(f) Consent For Release of Privileged Information.

(1) Consent for the release of privileged information must be in writing and signed by:

(A)the patient;

(B)a parent or legal guardian if the patient is a minor;

(C)a legal guardian if the patient has been adjudicated incompetent to manage personal affairs;

(D)an attorney appointed for the patient under Tex. Health & Safety Code title 7, subtitles C and D;

(E)an attorney ad litem appointed for the patient under Tex. Estates Code title 3, subtitle C;

(F)an attorney ad litem or guardian ad litem appointed for a minor under Tex. Fam. Code chapter 107, subchapter B; or (G)a personal representative if the patient is deceased.

(2) The consent must specify:

(A)the information or medical records covered by the release;

(B)the reasons or purposes for the release; and

(C)the person to whom the information is to be released.

(3) The patient, or other person authorized to consent, may withdraw consent to the release of any information. But a withdrawal of consent does not affect any information disclosed before the patient or authorized person gave written notice of the withdrawal.

(4) Any person who receives information privileged under this rule may disclose the information only to the extent consistent with the purposes specified in the consent.

Comment to 1998 change This comment is intended to inform the construction and application of this rule. Prior Criminal Rules of Evidence 509 and 510 are now in subparagraph (b) of this Rule. This rule governs disclosures of patient-physician communications only in judicial or administrative proceedings. Whether a physician may or must disclose such communications in other circumstances is governed by Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 4495b, § 5.08. Former subparagraph (d)(6) of the Civil Evidence Rules, regarding disclosures in a suit affecting the parent-child relationship, is omitted, not because there should be no exception to the privilege in suits affecting the parent-child relationship, but because the exception in such suits is properly considered under subparagraph (e)(4) of the new rule (formerly subparagraph (d)(4)), as construed in R.K. v. Ramirez, 887 S.W.2d 836 (Tex. 1994). In determining the proper application of an exception in such suits, the trial court must ensure that the precise need for the information is not outweighed by legitimate privacy interests protected by the privilege. Subparagraph (e) of the new rule does not except from the privilege information relating to a nonparty patient who is or may be a consulting or testifying expert in the suit.

Comment to 2015 Restyling: The physician-patient privilege in a civil case was first enacted in Texas in 1981 as part of the Medical Practice Act, formerly codified in Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. art. 4495b. That statute provided that the privilege applied even if a patient had received a physician's services before the statute's enactment. Because more than thirty years have now passed, it is no longer necessary to burden the text of the rule with a statement regarding the privilege's retroactive application. But deleting this statement from the rule's text is not intended as a substantive change in the law.

The former rule's reference to "confidentiality or" and "administrative proceedings" in subdivision (e) [Exceptions in a Civil Case] has been deleted. First, this rule is a privilege rule only. Tex. Occ. Code § 159.004 sets forth exceptions to a physician's duty to maintain confidentiality of patient information outside court and administrative proceedings. Second, by their own terms the rules of evidence govern only proceedings in Texas courts. See Rule 101(b). To the extent the rules apply in administrative proceedings, it is because the Administrative Procedure Act mandates their applicability. Tex. Gov't Code § 2001.083 provides that "[i]n a contested case, a state agency shall give effect to the rules of privilege recognized by law." Section 2001.091 excludes privileged material from discovery in contested administrative cases.

Statutory references in the former rule that are no longer up-to-date have been revised. Finally, reconciling the provisions of Rule 509 with the parts of Tex. Occ. Code ch. 159 that address a physician-patient privilege applicable to court proceedings is beyond the scope of the restyling project.

Pre-March 1, 1998 Comment This rule only governs disclosures of patient-physician communications in judicial or administrative proceedings. Whether a physician may or must disclose such communications in other circumstances is governed by Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. , art. 4495b, Sec. 5.08.

Pre-March 1, 1998 comment on subdivision (d)(4). The entire subdivision is rewritten.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Privileged Matters : General Overview

1. In a medical negligence case arising from treatment of the patient's ankle, the patient was entitled to conditional mandamus relief from the order compelling production of medical records relating to her pregnancies in convention of the physician-patient privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 509 as the records were not relevant to the doctor's defense. In re Drews, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8587, 2012 WL 4854716 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 12 2012).

2. In the petitioner's suit for damages against the driver arising from their car accident, denial of the petitioner's motion to quash the driver's request for the petitioner's medical records under Tex. R. Evid. 509 was proper as the petitioner failed to present any evidence that the medical clinic possessed information not relevant to the suit. In re Cynthia Kethley, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4956 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2009).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Protective Orders

3. Mandamus relief was conditionally granted to a doctor in a case where a protective order was entered prohibiting ex parte contacts with a patient's non-party treating physicians after a release was signed under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.052 because there was no privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 509, the patient and her husband failed to show the necessary harm, there was no preemption by the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996, 42 U.S.C.S. §§ 1320d to 1320d-8, and there was no adequate remedy at law. In re Collins, 286 S.W.3d 911, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 318, 52 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 813 (Tex. 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Suppression of Evidence

4. Trial court did not err by refusing to suppress evidence of confessions defendant allegedly made during the course of substance abuse treatment because defendant was not being treated voluntarily when he was under court order. Absalon v. State, 478 S.W.3d 1, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1583 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 13 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

5. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the admission of statements defendant made to various mental health professionals and to the reports those professionals made to the trial court because they were not privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 509, as defendant was undergoing court-ordered counseling rather than voluntary counseling and the primary purpose of the counseling was not centered on treatment for abuse of alcohol by defendant but rather to address defendant's sexual problems. Weeks v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1428, 2013 WL 557015 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 14 2013).

Evidence : Inferences & Presumptions : General Overview

6. Mental health history of a patient who died of internal bleeding following gall bladder surgery was not a "part" of the defense for purposes of the patient-litigant exception to the physician privilege. The defensive theory that the patient's alcohol use caused the bleeding was in the nature of an inferential rebuttal and thus was not an ultimate issue of fact that alone had legal significance. In re Nance, 143 S.W.3d 506, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7318 (Tex. App. Austin 2004).

Evidence : Privileges : Doctor-Patient Privilege

7. Communications made by defendant to a professional in the course of a court-ordered examination relating to the patient's mental or emotional condition or disorder in an involuntary civil commitment proceeding do not fall within the doctor-patient privilege pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 509(d) and Tex. R. Evid. 510(d)(4). Dudley v. State, 730 S.W.2d 51, 1987 Tex. App. LEXIS 6922 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 1987).

Evidence : Privileges : Doctor-Patient Privilege : General Overview

8. Physician-patient privilege did not preclude ordering a truck driver who had been involved in a collision to provide a medical records release authorization, absent a prima facie showing that the physician-patient privilege applied to the records, and the driver's medical certifications did not render the information irrelevant because it was possible that the driver might have had an undisclosed medical condition. In re Kristensen, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8404, 2014 WL 3778903 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 31 2014).

9. In a medical negligence case arising from treatment of the patient's ankle, the patient was entitled to conditional mandamus relief from the order compelling production of medical records relating to her pregnancies in convention of the physician-patient privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 509 as the records were not relevant to the doctor's defense. In re Drews, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8587, 2012 WL 4854716 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 12 2012).

10. In a proceeding to appoint a guardian, the ward failed to preserve for review his argument that a certificate of medical examination was rendered inadmissible by the fact that he did not waive physician-patient privilege in writing; the ward did not object, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, when the guardian offered the certificate. Robinson v. Willingham, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2788 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 6 2006).

11. In a medical malpractice suit, the district court judge abused his discretion by granting the estate's motion to compel production of documents protected by the privileges set forth in Tex. R. Evid. 509 and Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 159.002; the redaction of identifying patient information from the records did not defeat the medical records privilege. In re Tenet Healthcare, Ltd., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2640 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 31 2006).

12. Plaintiff's claim under the Federal Tort Claims Act that the Secretary of the Department of Air Force violated the physician-patient privilege under Tex. R. Evid. § 509 when he disclosed plaintiff's medical records to the Assistant United States Attorney handling plaintiff's medical malpractice case failed to state a cause of action because plaintiff waived the privilege to his medical records when he filed the medical malpractice action against the Air Force. Aldridge v. Sec'y, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24598 (N.D. Tex. Oct. 24 2005).

13. Mandamus relief was conditionally granted against the trial court's order directing the hospital to provide the medical records of ER patients because the evidence did not show whether the medical conditions were an "ultimate" issue in the plaintiffs' negligence action against the hospital, which was the test to determine whether the records fell within the litigation exception, Tex. R. Evid. 509(e)(4) to the physician-patient privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 509. Because the plaintiffs did not argue, and nothing in the record suggested, that the other patients' conditions were a part of their claim, the trial court was required to determine whether the other patients' conditions were merely an evidentiary issue or were an ultimate issue in the action. In re Christus Health Southeast Tex., 167 S.W.3d 596, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5013 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

14. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that defendant's statements made to a social worker in group therapy sessions were not privileged communications under Tex. R. Evid. 509(b) because he was not treated for depression and alcohol abuse. Licea v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9464 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Oct. 28 2004).

15. Petition for a writ of mandamus was granted in a negligence case where a trial court denied a motion to compel and limited discovery because the information sought fell within the abuse-and-neglect exceptions to the physician-patient privilege and the mental health information privilege; the complaint alleged that a patient was injured by several falls at a nursing home, and the patient was sexually assaulted by another resident, who was receiving mental health treatment. In re Arriola, 159 S.W.3d 670, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5038 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

16. Abuse-and-neglect exceptions to Tex. R. Evid. 509 and Tex. R. Evid. 510 do not apply only to proceedings brought by appropriate law enforcement agencies because they apply to "any proceeding regarding the abuse or neglect, or the cause of any abuse or neglect, of the resident of an institution." In re Arriola, 159 S.W.3d 670, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5038 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

17. Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 241.153, Tex. Hum. Res. Code Ann. § 102.003(j), Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 242.501(a)(8), 40 Tex. Admin. Code § 19.407, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 611.002, and Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 159.002(a) do not prevent disclosure of information that falls under the abuse-and-neglect exceptions to Tex. R. Evid. 509 and Tex. R. Evid. 510. In re Arriola, 159 S.W.3d 670, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5038 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

18. Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 151.002(a)(12) defines a physician as a person licensed to practice medicine in Texas, and Tex. R. Evid. 509(a)(2) defines a physician as a person licensed to practice medicine in any state or nation, or reasonably believed by the patient so to be. In re Fort Worth Children's Hosp., 100 S.W.3d 582, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1820, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P16545 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

19. Where relator hospital sought mandamus relief from the trial court's orders requiring it to produce (a) the names and face sheets of all infants who received the vitamin supplement E-Ferol while patients at the hospital in 1984, and (b) the names of those patients' parents, in an underlying medical malpractice action against the hospital, and the trial court appointed a guardian ad litem for nonparty patients ordering the hospital to turn over the discovery materials to the guardian ad litem, the writ of mandamus was conditionally granted because: (1) the hospital records were not privileged under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 241.152, and § 241.152(19) provided an exception for documents disclosed subject to a trial court order, (2) the hospital failed to prove that the records were created or maintained by a physician, thus, they were not subject to the physician-patient privilege under either Tex. R. Evid. 509 or Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 159.002, and the hospital had no standing to assert the privilege on behalf of the nonparty patients, (3) the hospital records were relevant to any issue in the underlying lawsuit under Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.3(a), not just a party's physical, mental, or emotional condition because the records were not privileged, and (4) the trial court abused its discretion in appointing a guardian ad litem under Tex. R. Civ. P. 173 for the nonparty patients who were not minors where there was no evidence that any of the nonparty patients were incompetent. In re Fort Worth Children's Hosp., 100 S.W.3d 582, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1820, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P16545 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

Evidence : Privileges : Doctor-Patient Privilege : Elements

20. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the admission of statements defendant made to various mental health professionals and to the reports those professionals made to the trial court because they were not privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 509, as defendant was undergoing court-ordered counseling rather than voluntary counseling and the primary purpose of the counseling was not centered on treatment for abuse of alcohol by defendant but rather to address defendant's sexual problems. Weeks v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1428, 2013 WL 557015 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 14 2013).

Evidence : Privileges : Doctor-Patient Privilege : Exceptions

21. Billing records for procedures unrelated to the patient's hand injury were protected by the physician-patient privilege and were not discoverable under the exceptions to that privilege raised by the neighbor; the trial court clearly abused its discretion by ordering their production in response to items 1 and 2 of the January deposition notice and items 4 through 9 of the November deposition notice. In re Jarvis, 431 S.W.3d 129, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11281, 2013 WL 4759648 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 30 2013).

22. Court did not err during defendant's trial for possession of child pornography, indecency with a child, and aggravated sexual assault of a child in denying defendant's motion to suppress because records from a healing center were not privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 509(b); the records established that defendant sought treatment for sexual issues, not alcohol or drug abuse. Murray v. State, 392 S.W.3d 702, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9597, 2010 WL 4924913 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 6 2010).

23. In the petitioner's suit for damages against the driver arising from their car accident, denial of the petitioner's motion to quash the driver's request for the petitioner's medical records under Tex. R. Evid. 509 was proper as the petitioner failed to present any evidence that the medical clinic possessed information not relevant to the suit. In re Cynthia Kethley, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4956 (Tex. App. Tyler June 30 2009).

24. Information relevant to a claim for damages arising from a doctor's alleged failure to timely diagnose a patient's cancer clearly was not subject to the privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 509 where the patient had signed a release of information under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.052. In re Collins, 286 S.W.3d 911, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 318, 52 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 813 (Tex. 2009).

25. Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.052 does not change existing law and therefore does not prohibit a defendant from communicating ex parte with a claimant's treating physicians and health care providers; however, because Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.052 does not prohibit the issuance of a protective order to protect privileged information that is irrelevant to a health care liability claim, it must be concluded that the legislature did not intend to overrule or modify Mutter v. Wood, 744 S.W.2d 600 (Tex. 1988) or Durst v. Hill Country Mem'l Hosp., 70 S.W.3d 233 (Tex. App.-San Antonio 2001, no pet.). In re Collins, 224 S.W.3d 798, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3644 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007), mand. granted, 286 S.W.3d 911, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 318 (Tex. 2009).

26. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by prohibiting ex parte communications with a health care liability claimant's nonparty treating physicians when the claimant had signed a statutorily required authorization for release of health information and filed a medical malpractice suit against a treating physician because the trial court's order prohibited postsuit ex parte communications between the physician and the claimant's nonparty treating physicians and thus did not prevent the physician from obtaining the claimant's health information, but only excluded ex parte communications as a means for obtaining the information; the trial court reasonably could have determined that the prohibition of ex parte communications was necessary to protect the claimant's privileged information. In re Collins, 224 S.W.3d 798, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3644 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007), mand. granted, 286 S.W.3d 911, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 318 (Tex. 2009).

27. In a divorce case, a petition for a writ of mandamus based on an order to produce substance abuse records was granted in part because the information was to be used in best interest of the child analysis, so good cause was shown; moreover, the information was subject to disclosure under Tex. R. Evid. 509, and Tex. R. Civ. P. 192; however, records containing what a father told his caregivers or references to third parties were not subject to disclosure. In re A., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11108 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 28 2006).

28. In a divorce and child custody matter, the court did not err in admitting the mother's medical and mental health records because the jury was asked to determine who should be appointed managing conservator of the children and therefore, the mother's medical condition relating to her personality and bipolar disorders was relevant to the issue of whether appointing her sole managing conservator was in her children's best interests. Garza v. Garza, 217 S.W.3d 538, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8746 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

Evidence : Privileges : Doctor-Patient Privilege : Scope

29. During defendant's trial for possession of child pornography and sexual assault of a child, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 509(b) in refusing to exclude his records from a treatment center because his treatment plan focused on his sexual issues, not drug or alcohol problems. Murray v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 959, 2014 WL 316604 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 29 2014).

30. Billing records for procedures unrelated to the patient's hand injury were protected by the physician-patient privilege and were not discoverable under the exceptions to that privilege raised by the neighbor; the trial court clearly abused its discretion by ordering their production in response to items 1 and 2 of the January deposition notice and items 4 through 9 of the November deposition notice. In re Jarvis, 431 S.W.3d 129, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11281, 2013 WL 4759648 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Aug. 30 2013).

31. Peer review reports of nonparties that contained the identity, diagnosis, evaluation, or treatment of a patient by a physician and were created or maintained by a physician were protected by disclosure from Tex. R. Evid. 509(c)(2) and Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 159.002(b), and redaction of identifying information was not sufficient to protect the nonparties. Mandamus was therefore granted to cause a trial court to vacate its order compelling production of insurers' peer review reports for non-parties. In re Netherlands Ins. Co., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2340 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 8 2009).

32. Allegation that one of the minors suffered emotional shock in an automobile collision was not a sufficient basis to make his mental or emotional condition an issue on which the jury would be required to make a factual determination, and thus the minor's communications with the psychiatrist were protected by the physician-patient privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 509(c)(2). In re Toyota Motor Corp., 191 S.W.3d 498, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4669 (Tex. App. Waco 2006).

Evidence : Privileges : Government Privileges : Waiver

33. Plaintiff's claim under the Federal Tort Claims Act that the Secretary of the Department of Air Force violated the physician-patient privilege under Tex. R. Evid. § 509 when he disclosed plaintiff's medical records to the Assistant United States Attorney handling plaintiff's medical malpractice case failed to state a cause of action because plaintiff waived the privilege to his medical records when he filed the medical malpractice action against the Air Force. Aldridge v. Sec'y, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24598 (N.D. Tex. Oct. 24 2005).

34. Davis test for waiving a privilege by offensive use was not satisfied where there was no indication that the mental health records of a patient who died from internal bleeding after an operation were the only source from which defendants could obtain information about the deceased's drinking habits. In re Nance, 143 S.W.3d 506, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7318 (Tex. App. Austin 2004).

Evidence : Privileges : Psychotherapist-Patient Privilege : General Overview

35. Petition for a writ of mandamus was granted in a negligence case where a trial court denied a motion to compel and limited discovery because the information sought fell within the abuse-and-neglect exceptions to the physician-patient privilege and the mental health information privilege; the complaint alleged that a patient was injured by several falls at a nursing home, and the patient was sexually assaulted by another resident, who was receiving mental health treatment. In re Arriola, 159 S.W.3d 670, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5038 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

36. Abuse-and-neglect exceptions to Tex. R. Evid. 509 and Tex. R. Evid. 510 do not apply only to proceedings brought by appropriate law enforcement agencies because they apply to "any proceeding regarding the abuse or neglect, or the cause of any abuse or neglect, of the resident of an institution." In re Arriola, 159 S.W.3d 670, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5038 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

37. Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 241.153, Tex. Hum. Res. Code Ann. § 102.003(j), Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 242.501(a)(8), 40 Tex. Admin. Code § 19.407, Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 611.002, and Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 159.002(a) do not prevent disclosure of information that falls under the abuse-and-neglect exceptions to Tex. R. Evid. 509 and Tex. R. Evid. 510. In re Arriola, 159 S.W.3d 670, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5038 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

Evidence : Privileges : Psychotherapist-Patient Privilege : Exceptions

38. In a personal injury case, mandamus relief was conditionally granted in favor of an injured party because there was no exception to privilege for mental health records under Tex. R. Evid. 509 and Tex. R. Evid. 510 based on the defensive assertion that injuries and mental anguish were caused by a pre-existing condition. In re Pennington, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5359 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 16 2008).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Burdens of Proof : General Overview

39. Mandamus relief was conditionally granted against the trial court's order directing the hospital to provide the medical records of ER patients because the evidence did not show whether the medical conditions were an "ultimate" issue in the plaintiffs' negligence action against the hospital, which was the test to determine whether the records fell within the litigation exception, Tex. R. Evid. 509(e)(4) to the physician-patient privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 509. Because the plaintiffs did not argue, and nothing in the record suggested, that the other patients' conditions were a part of their claim, the trial court was required to determine whether the other patients' conditions were merely an evidentiary issue or were an ultimate issue in the action. 40. In a divorce and child custody matter, the court did not err in admitting the mother's medical and mental health records because the jury was asked to determine who should be appointed managing conservator of the children and therefore, the mother's medical condition relating to her personality and bipolar disorders was relevant to the issue of whether appointing her sole managing conservator was in her children's best interests. Garza v. Garza, 217 S.W.3d 538, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8746 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

Family Law : Family Protection & Welfare : Involuntary Commitment

41. Communications made by defendant to a professional in the course of a court-ordered examination relating to the patient's mental or emotional condition or disorder in an involuntary civil commitment proceeding do not fall within the doctor-patient privilege pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 509(d) and Tex. R. Evid. 510(d)(4). Dudley v. State, 730 S.W.2d 51, 1987 Tex. App. LEXIS 6922 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 1987).

Family Law : Guardians : General Overview

42. In a proceeding to appoint a guardian, the ward failed to preserve for review his argument that a certificate of medical examination was rendered inadmissible by the fact that he did not waive physician-patient privilege in writing; the ward did not object, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, when the guardian offered the certificate. Robinson v. Willingham, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2788 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 6 2006).

Healthcare Law : Business Administration & Organization : Patient Confidentiality : General Overview

43. Peer review reports of nonparties that contained the identity, diagnosis, evaluation, or treatment of a patient by a physician and were created or maintained by a physician were protected by disclosure from Tex. R. Evid. 509(c)(2) and Tex. Occ. Code Ann. § 159.002(b), and redaction of identifying information was not sufficient to protect the nonparties. Mandamus was therefore granted to cause a trial court to vacate its order compelling production of insurers' peer review reports for non-parties. In re Netherlands Ins. Co., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2340 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 8 2009).

Healthcare Law : Business Administration & Organization : Patient Confidentiality

44. Mandamus relief was conditionally granted to a doctor in a case where a protective order was entered prohibiting ex parte contacts with a patient's non-party treating physicians after a release was signed under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.052 because there was no privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 509, the patient and her husband failed to show the necessary harm, there was no preemption by the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996, 42 U.S.C.S. §§ 1320d to 1320d-8, and there was no adequate remedy at law. In re Collins, 286 S.W.3d 911, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 318, 52 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 813 (Tex. 2009).

Public Health & Welfare Law : Healthcare : Mental Health Services : Treatment

45. In a divorce case, a petition for a writ of mandamus based on an order to produce substance abuse records was granted in part because the information was to be used in best interest of the child analysis, so good cause was shown; moreover, the information was subject to disclosure under Tex. R. Evid. 509, and Tex. R. Civ. P. 192; however, records containing what a father told his caregivers or references to third parties were not subject to disclosure. In re A., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11108 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 28 2006).

Torts : Malpractice & Professional Liability : Healthcare Providers

46. Information relevant to a claim for damages arising from a doctor's alleged failure to timely diagnose a patient's cancer clearly was not subject to the privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 509 where the patient had signed a release of information under Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.052. In re Collins, 286 S.W.3d 911, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 318, 52 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 813 (Tex. 2009).

47. Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 74.052 does not change existing law and therefore does not prohibit a defendant from communicating ex parte with a claimant's treating physicians and health care providers; however, because Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. 48. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by prohibiting ex parte communications with a health care liability claimant's nonparty treating physicians when the claimant had signed a statutorily required authorization for release of health information and filed a medical malpractice suit against a treating physician because the trial court's order prohibited postsuit ex parte communications between the physician and the claimant's nonparty treating physicians and thus did not prevent the physician from obtaining the claimant's health information, but only excluded ex parte communications as a means for obtaining the information; the trial court reasonably could have determined that the prohibition of ex parte communications was necessary to protect the claimant's privileged information. (C) the court imposes appropriate safeguards against unauthorized disclosure.

(5) Party Relies on Patient's Condition.--If any party relies on the patient's physical, mental, or emotional condition as a part of the party's claim or defense and the communication or record is relevant to that condition.

(6) Abuse or Neglect of "Institution" Resident.--In a proceeding regarding the abuse or neglect, or the cause of any abuse or neglect, of a resident of an "institution" as defined in Tex. Health & Safety Code § 242.002.

Comment to 1998 change This comment is intended to inform the construction and application of this rule. This rule governs disclosures of patient-professional communications only in judicial or administrative proceedings. Whether a professional may or must disclose such communications in other circumstances is governed by Tex. Health & Safety Code §§ 611.001 -- 611.008. Former subparagraph (d)(6) of the Civil Evidence Rules, regarding disclosures in a suit affecting the parent-child relationship, is omitted, not because there should be no exception to the privilege in suits affecting the parent-child relationship, but because the exception in such suits is properly considered under subparagraph (d)(5), as construed in R.K. v. Ramirez, 887 S.W.2d 836 (Tex. 1994). In determining the proper application of an exception in such suits, the trial court must ensure that the precise need for the information is not outweighed by legitimate privacy interests protected by the privilege. Subparagraph (d) does not except from the privilege information relating to a nonparty patient who is or may be a consulting or testifying expert in the suit.

Pre-March 1, 1998 Comment This rule only governs disclosures of patient/professional communications in judicial or administrative proceedings. Whether a professional may or must disclose such communications in other circumstances is governed by Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 5561h.

Comment to 2015 Restyling: The mental-health-information privilege in civil cases was enacted in Texas in 1979. Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. art. 5561h (later codified at Tex. Health & Safety Code § 611.001 et seq.) provided that the privilege applied even if the patient had received the professional's services before the statute's enactment. Because more than thirty years have now passed, it is no longer necessary to burden the text of the rule with a statement regarding the privilege's retroactive application. But deleting this statement from the rule's text is not intended as a substantive change in the law.

Tex. Health & Safety Code ch. 611 addresses confidentiality rules for communications between a patient and a mental-health professional and for the professional's treatment records. Many of these provisions apply in contexts other than court proceedings. Reconciling the provisions of Rule 510 with the parts of chapter 611 that address a mental-health-information privilege applicable to court proceedings is beyond the scope of the restyling project.

1. In an action alleging breach of contract and other tort causes of action, mandamus relief was appropriate because a trial court erred by allowing the continuation of a therapist's deposition without limitation where communication between the therapist and an agent did not fall under the patient-litigant exception to Tex. R. Evid. 510. The agent did not allege a mental injury that exceeded the common emotional reaction to an injury or loss. In re Whipple, 373 S.W.3d 119, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1248, 2012 WL 556313 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 16 2012).

Evidence : Inferences & Presumptions : General Overview

2. Mental health history of a patient who died of internal bleeding following gall bladder surgery was not a "part" of the defense for purposes of the patient-litigant exception to the physician privilege; the defensive theory that the patient's alcohol use caused the bleeding was in the nature of an inferential rebuttal and thus was not an ultimate issue of fact that alone had legal significance. The physician-patient privilege applied, although plaintiffs' had waived their mental health information privilege claim by failing to assert it specifically in the trial court. In re Nance, 143 S.W.3d 506, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7318 (Tex. App. Austin 2004).

Evidence : Privileges : Doctor-Patient Privilege

3. Communications made by a defendant to a professional in the course of a court-ordered examination relating to the patient's mental or emotional condition or disorder in an involuntary civil commitment proceeding do not fall within the doctor-patient privilege pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 509(d) and Tex. R. Evid. 510(d)(4). Dudley v. State, 730 S.W.2d 51, 1987 Tex. App. LEXIS 6922 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 1987).

4. In a proceeding to appoint a guardian, the ward failed to preserve for review his argument that a certificate of medical examination was rendered inadmissible by the fact that he did not waive physician-patient privilege in writing; the ward did not object, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, when the guardian offered the certificate. Robinson v. Willingham, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2788 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 6 2006).

5. Petition for a writ of mandamus was granted in a negligence case where a trial court denied a motion to compel and limited discovery because the information sought fell within the abuse-and-neglect exceptions to the physician-patient privilege and the mental health information privilege; the complaint alleged that a patient was injured by several falls at a nursing home, and the patient was sexually assaulted by another resident, who was receiving mental health treatment. In re Arriola, 159 S.W.3d 670, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5038 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2004).

6. Abuse-and-neglect exceptions to Tex. R. Evid. 509 and Tex. R. 8. In a divorce case, a petition for a writ of mandamus based on an order to produce substance abuse records was granted in part because the information was to be used in best interest of the child analysis, so good cause was shown; moreover, the information was subject to disclosure under Tex. R. Evid. 510, and Tex. R. Civ. P. 192; however, records containing what a father told his caregivers or references to third parties were not subject to disclosure. In re A., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11108 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 28 2006).

9. In a divorce and child custody matter, the court did not err in admitting the mother's medical and mental health records because the jury was asked to determine who should be appointed managing conservator of the children and therefore, the mother's medical condition relating to her personality and bipolar disorders was relevant to the issue of whether appointing her sole managing conservator was in her children's best interests. Garza v. Garza, 217 S.W.3d 538, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8746 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

14. Son's past mental problems were distinct from the mental anguish associated with the death of his mother from allegedly negligent treatment by medical providers. 20. Trial court did not err by granting possession of the property to the bank in the forcible-detainer action because the evidence was sufficient to establish that the bank had a superior right to immediate possession of the property since the notices to the former homeowners informed them that their tenancy was being terminated and that they were required to vacate the property. THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH August 16, 2020

Rule 511 Waiver by Voluntary Disclosure

(a) General Rule.A person upon whom these rules confer a privilege against disclosure waives the privilege if:

(1)the person or a predecessor of the person while holder of the privilege voluntarily discloses or consents to disclosure of any significant part of the privileged matter unless such disclosure itself is privileged; or

(2)the person or a representative of the person calls a person to whom privileged communications have been made to testify as to the person's character or character trait insofar as such communications are relevant to such character or character trait.

(b) Lawyer-Client Privilege and Work Product; Limitations on Waiver.Notwithstanding paragraph (a), the following provisions apply, in the circumstances set out, to disclosure of a communication or information covered by the lawyer-client privilege or work-product protection.

(1) Disclosure Made in a Federal or State Proceeding or to a Federal or State Office or Agency; Scope of a Waiver.--When the disclosure is made in a federal proceeding or state proceeding of any state or to a federal office or agency or state office or agency of any state and waives the lawyer-client privilege or work-product protection, the waiver extends to an undisclosed communication or information only if:

(A)the waiver is intentional;

(B)the disclosed and undisclosed communications or information concern the same subject matter; and

(C)they ought in fairness to be considered together.

(2) Inadvertent Disclosure in State Civil Proceedings.--When made in a Texas state proceeding, an inadvertent disclosure does not operate as a waiver if the holder followed the procedures of Rule of Civil Procedure 193.3 (d).

(3) Controlling Effect of a Court Order.--A disclosure made in litigation pending before a federal court or a state court of any state that has entered an order that the privilege or protection is not waived by disclosure connected with the litigation pending before that court is also not a waiver in a Texas state proceeding.

(4) Controlling Effect of a Party Agreement.--An agreement on the effect of disclosure in a state proceeding of any state is binding only on the parties to the agreement, unless it is incorporated into a court order.

Comment to 2015 Restyling: The amendments to Rule 511 are designed to align Texas law with federal law on waiver of privilege by voluntary disclosure. Subsection (a) sets forth the general rule. Subsection (b) incorporates the provisions of Federal Rule of Evidence 502. Like the federal rule, subsection (b) only addresses disclosure of communications or information covered by the lawyer-client privilege or work-product protection. These amendments do not affect the law governing waiver of other privileges or protections.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Privileged Matters : General Overview

1. In a mandamus proceeding involving a discovery dispute in a case against an insurer for violations of the insurance code, breach of contract, and breach of Stowers duty in a related personal injury case, the waiver of the attorney-client privilege by one of the insurer's insureds did not operate to waive the other insured's privilege as well, as the underlying litigation in the case was not a suit between trial counsel's two joint clients. No authority has been found to support an argument that one client may waive the attorney-client privilege on behalf of another client. In re Unitrin County Mut. Ins. Co., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5797, 2010 WL 2867326 (Tex. App. Austin July 22 2010).

2. Documents were deemed confidential under the parties' protective order and the inadvertent disclosure of those documents by other persons, including a clerk of court in another state, did not render the documents public, and the manufacturer and company took sufficient action to maintain the confidentiality of the documents such that they warranted confidential treatment under the order's plain terms and mandamus relief under Tex. Gov't Code Ann. § 22.002(a) was appropriate; the court further noted that the disclosure of the documents was not voluntary for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 511(1). In re Ford Motor Co., 211 S.W.3d 295, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 1297, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 291, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17664 (Tex. 2006).

3. No matter how many people eventually saw the materials, disclosures by a third-party, whether mistaken or malevolent, do not waive the privileged nature of the information; this principle should apply with particular force when documents are entrusted to a court. In re Ford Motor Co., 211 S.W.3d 295, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 1297, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 291, CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P17664 (Tex. 2006).

4. In a suit brought against an insurer by an insured's judgment creditor, the insurer could not assert the attorney-client privilege of Tex. R. Evid. 503 or the work product privilege of Tex. R. Civ. P. 192 on behalf of the insured with regard to a claims file because the insured's assignment of its rights to its judgment creditor waived the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 511; however, the insurer's Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 privilege log established that some communications between counsel and the insurer were covered by the insurer's own attorney-client privilege. In re General Agents Ins. Co. of Am., Inc., 224 S.W.3d 806, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3690 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

5. Chemical company was entitled to conditional mandamus relief when a trial court ordered the company to produce a confidential research memorandum prepared by an attorney from a law firm that had represented the company in a failed real estate transaction because the memorandum was privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and the company did not waive that privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 511 through voluntary disclosure of a significant part of the memorandum in a second memorandum that counsel distributed to a third party, as the company did not voluntarily disclose any part of the memorandum; a limited partnership (LP) seeking disclosure of the memorandum argued that because the disclosed memorandum was based upon the privileged memorandum, the company waived its privilege; however, the LP failed to distinguish between using core attorney work product to prepare a document for dissemination to third parties and disclosing the privileged document itself. In re Chevron Phillips Chem. Co. LP, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 25 2006).

6. Work-product privilege protected prosecutors from testifying in a malicious prosecution suit when they had already released the prosecution file to the real party in interest; the Supreme Court of Texas held that the district attorney's office did not waive its work-product privilege against testifying by producing the prosecution file. In re Bexar County Crim. Dist. Attorney's Office, 224 S.W.3d 182, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 431, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 733 (Tex. 2007).

7. In a trial for attempted sexual assault, there was no error in excluding evidence that defendant's spouse told the pastor at church that the spouse was having an affair, evidence that defendant sought to show the spouse's motive to testify for the State; what the spouse told the pastor was covered by the privilege in Tex. R. Evid. 505, and, although there was evidence of a voluntary disclosure to defendant, defendant did not urge waiver under Tex. R. Evid. 511 either at trial or on appeal. Campbell v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1707 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 6 2008).

8. In a bankruptcy action, the debtor could not claim that juror statements he used to support a motion to amend a judgment entered in his employment discrimination case were privileged and could not be used by bankruptcy trustee to show that jury did not intent to award future wages as damages because he disclosed them to a third party and Fed. R. Evid. 606(b) did not apply because the jurors' statements were used to determine the harms for which the jury intended to compensate the debtor, not to determine whether the verdict was valid. Pequeno v. Schmidt (In re Pequeno), 126 Fed. Appx. 158, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 3721 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005).

Evidence : Privileges : Attorney-Client Privilege : General Overview

9. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that defendant waived the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 511 when defendant asserted that the letter defendant wrote to defense counsel supported the defenses and defendant was surprised the State did not have it. Jones v. State, 181 S.W.3d 875, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 139 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

10. Because the State sought to benefit from the purported waiver under Tex. R. Evid. 511 of defendant's attorney-client privilege, the State bore the burden of going forward with evidence that supported a finding of waiver. Jones v. State, 181 S.W.3d 875, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 139 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

11. Contrary to defendant's argument, being cognizant of the full ramifications of the attorney-client privilege or knowingly and voluntarily relinquishing the protections afforded by the privilege is not the standard under which the appellate court reviews a potential waiver of an evidentiary privilege; on the contrary, such a privilege is waived by voluntary disclosure of the substantive privileged matter, under Tex. R. Evid. 511(1). Jones v. State, 181 S.W.3d 875, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 139 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

12. Motion for protection that was sought to prevent disclosure of communications between an attorney and a client that were allegedly privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 511 was improperly denied under Tex. R. Evid. 503 because there was no evidence of a voluntary disclosure or a consent to disclosure in an assignment of a "Stowers" claim against an insurer in a personal injury matter. In re Cooper, 47 S.W.3d 206, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 3624 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2001).

Evidence : Privileges : Attorney-Client Privilege : Waiver

13. Bankruptcy court properly ordered the Chapter 7 trustee to turn over to the police cassette tapes of conversations between appellant and the decedent attorney, a former member of the debtor firm, because appellant waived his attorney-client privilege when the tapes were sold to a third party for use in a published book; appellant executed a written waiver of attorney-client privilege with respect to the tapes, and the tapes were disclosed to a third party for the purpose of writing a book about appellant life. Appellant also clearly stated that he had no objection to the police listening to the contents of the cassette tapes, and such statement alone constituted a waiver of the attorney/client privilege. Watson v. Payne (in re Veigel), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40865 (E.D. Tex. Mar. 24 2013).

14. In a mandamus proceeding involving a discovery dispute in a case against an insurer for violations of the insurance code, breach of contract, and breach of Stowers duty in a related personal injury case, the waiver of the attorney-client privilege by one of the insurer's insureds did not operate to waive the other insured's privilege as well, as the underlying litigation in the case was not a suit between trial counsel's two joint clients. No authority has been found to support an argument that one client may waive the attorney-client privilege on behalf of another client. In re Unitrin County Mut. Ins. Co., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5797, 2010 WL 2867326 (Tex. App. Austin July 22 2010).

15. By assigning his rights and claims to a bankruptcy trustee, an insured did not assign the right to waive the attorney-client privilege, under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and Tex. R. Evid. 511, because the assignment language in the bankruptcy order did not specifically waive the attorney-client privilege, and the cooperation language did not impliedly waive the attorney-client privilege, especially in light of the insured's intent not to waive the privilege. In re

Hicks, 252 S.W.3d 790, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2990 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

16. By executing an authorization for release of an insurer's file, the insured did not waive attorney-client privilege, under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and Tex. R. Evid. 511, with regard to an attorney's litigation file because the record did not reflect that the insured consented to disclosure of privileged material in the attorney's litigation file. In re Hicks, 252 S.W.3d 790, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2990 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

17. In a suit brought against an insurer by an insured's judgment creditor, the insurer could not assert the attorney-client privilege of Tex. R. Evid. 503 or the work product privilege of Tex. R. Civ. P. 192 on behalf of the insured with regard to a claims file because the insured's assignment of its rights to its judgment creditor waived the attorney-client privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 511; however, the insurer's Tex. R. Civ. P. 193 privilege log established that some communications between counsel and the insurer were covered by the insurer's own attorney-client privilege. In re General Agents Ins. Co. of Am., Inc., 224 S.W.3d 806, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3690 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

18. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 503(b), the evidence showed that a city and a development corporation were both represented by attorneys and they shared a common interest, the company pointed to no authority for the claim that the common interest privilege was separate from the attorney client privilege and case law suggested to the contrary, and the company did not point to any authority to support the claim that the pending action provision of Tex. R. Evid. 503(b)(1)(C) applied to entities who shared a common interest and were represented by the same counsel; for mandamus purposes, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it found that a city did not waive, under Tex. R. Evid. 511(1), by disclosure to the development corporation, the ability to assert privilege. In re JDN Real Estate-McKinney L.P., 211 S.W.3d 907, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11087 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

19. Chemical company was entitled to conditional mandamus relief when a trial court ordered the company to produce a confidential research memorandum prepared by an attorney from a law firm that had represented the company in a failed real estate transaction because the memorandum was privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 503 and the company did not waive that privilege under Tex. R. Evid. 511 through voluntary disclosure of a significant part of the memorandum in a second memorandum that counsel distributed to a third party, as the company did not voluntarily disclose any part of the memorandum; a limited partnership (LP) seeking disclosure of the memorandum argued that because the disclosed memorandum was based upon the privileged memorandum, the company waived its privilege; however, the LP failed to distinguish between using core attorney work product to prepare a document for dissemination to third parties and disclosing the privileged document itself. In re Chevron Phillips Chem. Co. LP, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9186 (Tex. App. Beaumont Oct. 25 2006).

20. In a bankruptcy action, the debtor could not claim that juror statements he used to support a motion to amend a judgment entered in his employment discrimination case were privileged and could not be used by bankruptcy trustee to show that jury did not intent to award future wages as damages because he disclosed them to a third party and Fed. R. Evid. 606(b) did not apply because the jurors' statements were used to determine the harms for which the jury intended to compensate the debtor, not to determine whether the verdict was valid. Pequeno v. Schmidt (In re Pequeno), 126 Fed. Appx. 158, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 3721 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005).

Evidence : Privileges : Marital Privileges : Adverse Spousal Testimony : Waiver

21. Court did not abuse its discretion nor violate the husband-wife privilege that existed between defendant and his wife when it allowed an officer to testify concerning the wife's statement to her during the initial discovery and investigation of the incident because the two statements made by defendant were similar enough to result in a waiver of the husband-wife privilege concerning defendant's statement to the wife that he killed a woman. The

"significant part" of defendant's statement, which he also disclosed to his mother, was the admission that he killed a person and that the person's body was in his apartment; therefore, he waived application of the husband wife privilege. Davis v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 712 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 27 2005).

23. Motion for protection that was sought to prevent disclosure of communications between an attorney and a client that were allegedly privileged under Tex. R. Evid. 511 was improperly denied under Tex. R. Evid. 503 because there was no evidence of a voluntary disclosure or a consent to disclosure in an assignment of a "Stowers" claim against an insurer in a personal injury matter. (a) Comment or Inference Not Permitted.--Except as permitted in Rule 504(b)(2), neither the court nor counsel may comment on a privilege claim-whether made in the present proceeding or previously-and the factfinder may not draw an inference from the claim.

(b) Claiming Privilege Without the Jury's Knowledge.--To the extent practicable, the court must conduct a jury trial so that the making of a privilege claim is not suggested to the jury by any means.

(c) Claim of Privilege Against Self-Incrimination in a Civil Case.--Subdivisions (a) and (b) do not apply to a party's claim, in the present civil case, of the privilege against self-incrimination.

(d) Jury Instruction.--When this rule forbids a jury from drawing an inference from a privilege claim, the court must, on request of a party against whom the jury might draw the inference, instruct the jury accordingly.

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Privileged Matters : General Overview

1. In appellants' civil misrepresentation action against appellee bank to recover losses sustained from a factoring client, who was recommended by appellee bank's president, an adverse inference could be drawn pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 513(c) from the fact that appellants' agent invoked his self-incrimination privilege where the agent/witness was so closely related to appellants that his statement could be deemed an admission under Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(2), especially where the questions related to the bank's defense regarding the cause of the losses. Wil-Roye Inv. Co. II v. Wash. Mut. Bank, F.A., 142 S.W.3d 393, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4982 (Tex. App. El Paso 2004).

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Protective Orders

2. In a contract case, the trial court's indefinite postponement of discovery without a specific assertion of the Fifth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. V, self-incrimination privilege in response to a discovery inquiry, and without any showing of the nature and scope of an alleged investigation, was an abuse of discretion for which mandamus relief was appropriate. Pursuant to Tex. R. Civ. P. 192.6 and Tex. R. Evid. 513(c), it is improper to file a motion for protection solely to avoid the assertion of the Fifth Amendment privilege, and the resulting adverse inference, in a civil case. Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Substantial Evidence : Sufficiency of Evidence

3. In a divorce proceeding in which the wife alleged that the husband had intentionally and knowingly assaulted her, causing bodily injury, there was factually sufficient evidence to prove the assault based on the wife's testimony and the inference that might reasonably be drawn by the trier of fact under Tex. R. Evid. 513(c) by the husband's invocation of his Fifth Amendment right when asked about the incident. In re Marriage of Loggins, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6507 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 25 2006).

4. In a termination of parental rights case where the father was in jail awaiting the resolution of pending criminal charges, the trier of fact was free to draw negative inferences from the father's invocation of his Fifth Amendment rights in response to numerous questions about the events that occurred when he was arrested. In the Interest of K.L.E.C., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13977, 2013 WL 6050850 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 14 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : General Overview

6. In a drug case, a court erred by refusing defendant's requested adverse inference instruction after a co-defendant exercised his right to remain silent because defendant was charged as a party to the co-defendant's offense, and an adverse inference could have tended to incriminate defendant. In addition, the only evidence that directly linked defendant to the cocaine came from the State's paid confidential informant, and the jury had a difficult time reaching a verdict; therefore, the trial court's refusal to give the instruction caused "some harm" to defendant. Torres v. State, 137 S.W.3d 191, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2939 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : General Overview

7. There was no error in the State calling defendant's wife to invoke her spousal privilege in the jury's presence because the jury did not hear the wife specifically say that she was asserting her spousal privilege, defense counsel mentioned the privilege in front of the jury when he objected, and the jury had already heard the wife provide testimony detrimental to defendant, namely, that defendant had been drinking beer on the night of the offense. Chavez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4927, 2011 WL 2624006 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 30 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Particular Instructions : Adverse Inference

8. Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Prosecutorial Misconduct : Prohibitions Against Improper Statements

9. Although defendant claimed that a trial court violated Tex. R. Evid. 513 by allowing a prosecutor to ask a witness if she would waive her attorney-client privilege, because defendant's first objection did not comport with the complaint on appeal, existing case law required the reviewing court to hold that the objection did not preserve defendant's complaint. Moreover, although defendant's second objection comported with his point on appeal, by the time counsel articulated it at trial, it was too late to preserve defendant's complaint pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A) because it was not presented until after the prosecutor asked numerous times whether the witness would waive her privilege and even explained the privilege to her. Lucio v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3241 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 29 2010).

Evidence : Inferences & Presumptions : General Overview

12. Since Tex. R. Evid. 513(a) prohibits drawing any inference from a claim of privilege in a civil case, such as a hospital's confidentiality privilege as to credentialing and peer review, the injured patient was required to show that the hospital acted maliciously in credentialing the surgeon without access to evidence of what happened, or did not happen, in the credentialing process. However, the patient failed to show that the hospital had actual knowledge that the surgeon still had a drug problem or knowledge of prior incidents of incompetency at another medical facility or that the hospital acted with conscious disregard of the risks posed to patients due to the surgeon's drug problem or incompetence. Romero v. KPH Consol., Inc., 166 S.W.3d 212, 2005 Tex. LEXIS 427, 48 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 752 (Tex. 2005).

13. In a contract case, the trial court's indefinite postponement of discovery without a specific assertion of the Fifth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. Evidence : Inferences & Presumptions : Inferences

15. At a termination of parental rights hearing where the father refused to answer questions about whether he was addicted to methamphetamine and sold drugs, the trier of fact was permitted to draw negative inferences from his invocation of the Fifth Amendment. In the Interest of J.A.L., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 15294, 2013 WL 7083191 (Tex.

App. Eastland Dec. 19 2013).

16. 17. On a wife's petition for a protective order against her former husband, the trial court, as the factfinder, was free under Tex. R. Evid. 513(c) to draw negative inferences from the husband's invocation of his self-incrimination privilege. Houchin v. Houchin, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6762 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 31 2013).

18. Insureds under a directors and officers policy were entitled to a preliminary injunction under Fed. R. Civ. P. 65 requiring the insurer to advance defense costs in underlying Securities and Exchange Commission civil and criminal actions; in applying the eight corners rule and declining to draw an adverse inference under Fed. R. Evid. 501 and Tex. R. Evid. 513 from the insureds' refusal to testify in support of their application for a preliminary injunction, the district court found that the insureds demonstrated a substantial likelihood of succeeding on their claim that the money laundering exclusion did not work to deny coverage. Pendergest-holt v. Certain Under Writers at Lloyd's of London, 681 F. Supp. 2d 816, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5912 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 26 2010).

19. In a personal injury case, although a jury could have drawn a negative inference from an employee's repeated invocations of the Fifth Amendment privilege, it did not rise to the level of evidence of gross negligence under the clear and convincing evidence standard since there was no direct or circumstantial evidence that the employee had actual awareness of the extreme risk created by his act of taking his eyes off the road to pick up a pack of crackers while driving to satisfy the subjective element of gross negligence; moreover, no reasonable factfinder could have formed a firm belief or conviction that, from the prospective viewpoint of the employee, there was an extreme degree of risk of serious injury to motorists following behind him when his action did not involve a collision of his vehicle with another vehicle or force another vehicle off the roadway. Therefore, there was insufficient evidence to support a finding of gross negligence. Matbon, Inc. v. Gries, 288 S.W.3d 471, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 268 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 15 2009).

20. Evidence was legally and factually sufficient to support that the father demonstrated an inability to provide the child with a safe environment under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 161.001(1)(N)(iii), given that (1) the father testified that he was homeless and unemployed prior to being incarcerated, (2) he invoked the Fifth Amendment when questioned concerning the current criminal charges against him, and under Tex. R. Evid. 513(c), a jury in a civil case could draw negative inferences from repeated invocations of the Fifth Amendment, (3) an undercover police officer testified that he purchased crack cocaine from the father, and (4) the guardian ad litem testified that the father was unable to provide a safe environment for the child; although the father testified that he planned to provide the child with a safe environment, a reasonable jury could have formed a firm belief that he showed an inability to provide that environment. White v. Tex. Dep't of Family & Protective Servs., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9508 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 19 2008).

21. In a guardian's action against her ex-husband and his second wife (respondents) for conversion, breach of fiduciary duty, and constructive fraud for allegedly using funds from a personal injury settlement belonging to the guardian and ex-husband's son to purchase a farm for respondents, respondents failed to conclusively prove that they used their personal funds for the down payment and monthly payments for the farm as required by Tex. R. Civ. P. 279 because the jury was free to draw negative inferences from respondents' repeated invocations of their rights under U.S. Const. amend. V pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 513(c), and to disregard the ex-husband's deposition testimony as not credible. Wilz v. Flournoy, 228 S.W.3d 674, 2007 Tex. LEXIS 602, 50 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 975 (Tex. 2007).

25. Reasonable fact finder could infer that management company owner misrepresented and withheld material information about the projects in order to induce the investors to make their original investment; there was evidence the owner admitted making misrepresentations, which constituted probative evidence of the elements of their claim, and the trial court was also free to draw negative inferences from the owner's invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination. 28. In a burglary and aggravated assault case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion during the punishment phase of the trial by not allowing defendant's attorney to question the victims regarding their alleged involvement in drug activities as the testimony, whether relevant or not, could have been properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 513 because it was offered to allow the jury to consider their assertions of their Fifth Amendment rights and refusal to testify. McKaine v. State, 170 S.W.3d 285, 2005 Tex. Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : Involuntary Termination : Procedure

36. In a parental rights termination case, the court was free to draw a negative inference from the father's assertion of his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination when asked about his methamphetamine use while he cared for his children, ages 2 and 3. In the Interest of V.J.G., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3493, 2013 WL 1224897 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 26 2013).

Healthcare Law : Business Administration & Organization : Hospital Privileges : General Overview

37. Since Tex. R. Evid. 513(a) prohibits drawing any inference from a claim of privilege in a civil case, such as a hospital's confidentiality privilege as to credentialing and peer review, the injured patient was required to show that the hospital acted maliciously in credentialing the surgeon without access to evidence of what happened, or did not happen, in the credentialing process. However, the patient failed to show that the hospital had actual knowledge that the surgeon still had a drug problem or knowledge of prior incidents of incompetency at another medical facility or that the hospital acted with conscious disregard of the risks posed to patients due to the surgeon's drug problem or incompetence. Romero v. KPH Consol., Inc., 166 S.W.3d 212, 2005 Tex. LEXIS 427, 48 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 752 (Tex. 2005).

Insurance Law : Business Insurance : Directors & Officers Liability Insurance : Obligations : Defense

38. Insureds under a directors and officers policy were entitled to a preliminary injunction under Fed. R. Civ. P. 65 requiring the insurer to advance defense costs in underlying Securities and Exchange Commission civil and criminal actions; in applying the eight corners rule and declining to draw an adverse inference under Fed. R. Evid. 501 and Tex. R. Evid. 513 from the insureds' refusal to testify in support of their application for a preliminary injunction, the district court found that the insureds demonstrated a substantial likelihood of succeeding on their claim that the money laundering exclusion did not work to deny coverage. Pendergest-holt v. Certain Under Writers at Lloyd's of London, 681 F. Supp. 2d 816, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5912 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 26 2010).

Torts : Negligence : General Overview

39. In a personal injury case, although a jury could have drawn a negative inference from an employee's repeated invocations of the Fifth Amendment privilege, it did not rise to the level of evidence of gross negligence under the clear and convincing evidence standard since there was no direct or circumstantial evidence that the employee had actual awareness of the extreme risk created by his act of taking his eyes off the road to pick up a pack of crackers while driving to satisfy the subjective element of gross negligence; moreover, no reasonable factfinder could have formed a firm belief or conviction that, from the prospective viewpoint of the employee, there was an extreme degree of risk of serious injury to motorists following behind him when his action did not involve a collision of his vehicle with another vehicle or force another vehicle off the roadway. Therefore, there was insufficient evidence to support a finding of gross negligence. Matbon, Inc. v. Gries, 288 S.W.3d 471, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 268 (Tex. App. Eastland Jan. 15 2009).

Rule 601 Competency to Testify in General; "Dead Man's Rule"

(a) In General.--Every person is competent to be a witness unless these rules provide otherwise. The following witnesses are incompetent:

(1) Insane Persons.--A person who is now insane or was insane at the time of the events about which the person is called to testify.

(2) Persons Lacking Sufficient Intellect.--A child - or any other person - whom the court examines and finds lacks sufficient intellect to testify concerning the matters in issue.

(b) The "Dead Man's Rule."

(1) Applicability.--The "Dead Man's Rule" applies only in a civil case:

(A)by or against a party in the party's capacity as an executor, administrator, or guardian; or

(B)by or against a decedent's heirs or legal representatives and based in whole or in part on the decedent's oral statement.

(2) General Rule.--In cases described in subparagraph (b)(1)(A), a party may not testify against another party about an oral statement by the testator, intestate, or ward. In cases described in subparagraph (b)(1)(B), a party may not testify against another party about an oral statement by the decedent.

(3) Exceptions.--A party may testify against another party about an oral statement by the testator, intestate, ward, or decedent if:

(A)the party's testimony about the statement is corroborated; or

(B)the opposing party calls the party to testify at the trial about the statement.

(4) Instructions.--If a court excludes evidence under paragraph (b)(2), the court must instruct the jury that the law prohibits a party from testifying about an oral statement by the testator, intestate, ward, or decedent unless the oral statement is corroborated or the opposing party calls the party to testify at the trial about the statement.

Comment to 2015 Restyling: The text of the "Dead Man's Rule" has been streamlined to clarify its meaning without making any substantive changes. The text of former Rule 601(b) (as well as its statutory predecessor, Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. art. 3716) prohibits only a "party" from testifying about the dead man's statements. Despite this, the last sentence of former Rule 601(b) requires the court to instruct the jury when the rule "prohibits an interested party or witness" from testifying. Because the rule prohibits only a "party" from testifying, restyled Rule 601(b)(4) references only "a party," and not "an interested party or witness." To be sure, courts have indicated that the rule (or its statutory predecessor) may be applicable to a witness who is not nominally a party and inapplicable to a witness who is only nominally a party. See, e.g., Chandler v. Welborn, 156 Tex. 312, 294 S.W.2d 801, 809 (1956); Ragsdale v. Ragsdale, 142 Tex. 476, 179 S.W.2d 291, 295 (1944). But these decisions are based on an interpretation of the meaning of "party." Therefore, limiting the court's instruction under restyled Rule 601(b)(4) to "a party" does not change Texas practice. In addition, restyled Rule 601(b) deletes the sentence in former Rule 601(b) that states "[e]xcept for the foregoing, a witness is not precluded from giving evidence ...because the witness is a party to the action ..." This sentence is surplusage. Rule 601(b) is a rule of exclusion. If the testimony falls outside the rule of exclusion, its admissibility will be determined by other applicable rules of evidence.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Supporting Materials : General Overview

1. Upon review of a summary judgment motion, the appellant failed to preserve for review objections to deposition testimony of a deceased witness that may have been inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 601(b), and the trial court failed to rule on the objections as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 Allen v. Albin, 97 S.W.3d 655, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9291 (Tex. App. Waco 2002).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Supporting Materials : Affidavits

2. Affidavit of a 12-year-old minor that there was no cautioning sign in a grocery store, submitted in support of his father's slip and fall action against the store, was competent under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2) in the absence of any examination of the child by the trial court. Pipkin v. Kroger Texas, L.P., 383 S.W.3d 655, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7627, 2012 WL 3860582 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 6 2012).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review

3. Upon review of a summary judgment motion, the appellant failed to preserve for review objections to deposition testimony of a deceased witness that may have been inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 601(b), and the trial court failed to rule on the objections as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 Allen v. Albin, 97 S.W.3d 655, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9291 (Tex. App. Waco 2002).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Confrontation

4. Trial court's in camera competency hearing with a six-year-old child victim without defendant or attorneys present complied with Tex. R. Evid. 601 and did not violate defendant's right to confrontation under U.S. Const. amend. VI, because the hearing did not pertain to the facts and he was able to fully cross-examine the child at trial. Gilley v. State, 383 S.W.3d 301, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8517, 2012 WL 4815533 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 11 2012).

Contracts Law : Contract Interpretation : Parol Evidence : General Overview

5. Claimants were not allowed to introduce parol evidence to establish survivorship interests in alleged joint accounts because there was no fraud nor mistake pled, nor any claim that certificate of deposit (CD) agreements were incomplete or ambiguous; relying on Tex. Prob. Code Ann. § 439, the Deadman's Statute under Tex. R. Evid. 601, the parol evidence rule, the "four corners of the document" rule, hearsay under Tex. R. Evid. 801, and double hearsay, an estate was correct in asserting that the claimants could not use extrinsic evidence in an attempt to get around the four corners of the CDs. Clark v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2211 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 27 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

6. Where the child victim testified that defendant did something "nasty" to her three times, her testimony was sufficient to prove that defendant intended to arouse or gratify a sexual desire. The victim was a competent witness under Tex. R. Evid. 601. Ashton v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2005 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 17 2005).

7. Permitting a child witness to testify without a determination of her competency was proper where the child, a sexual assault victim, was 13 at the time of the offense and 15 when she testified at trial, and the trial court had heard her testify outside the presence of the jury and before the jury and had an opportunity to see her, and to observe her demeanor, her manner in answering questions, and her apparent possession or lack of intelligence. Barfield v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6858 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 29 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

8. Child sexual assault victim was not incompetent to testify because a review of the child's testimony demonstrated her ability to observe intelligently the sexual assault by defendant, recall the event, and narrate it. Therefore, the record did not establish, on its face, that the child was incompetent to testify. Turley v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7198, 2010 WL 3420800 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 1 2010).

9. Under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a), the reviewing court declined to disregard the testimony of a child complainant in a trial for sexual abuse, notwithstanding defendant's argument that as the youngest of three sisters, the complainant might desire only to be involved with her sisters, who were also complainants, and the events that were circling around them. Palmer v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3156 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 29 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Right to Counsel : Critical Stage

10. Defendant was not denied his Sixth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. VI, right to counsel when the trial court conducted its pretrial competency examination of the child victim in camera with the court reporter in attendance but in the absence of defendant and the attorneys because it was not a critical stage of the proceedings, given defense counsel's later opportunities to challenge the child victim's deficiencies during the trial itself. Gilley v. State, 418 S.W.3d 114, 2014 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 3 (Tex. Crim. App. Jan. 15 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Child Witnesses

11. In defendant's assault trial, counsel was not ineffective in failing to object to the child victim's competency as a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 601, as nothing in the record suggested that he was not competent to testify. Kakembo v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4383, 2014 WL 1663324 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 23 2014).

12. Trial court's in camera competency hearing with a six-year-old child victim without defendant or attorneys present complied with Tex. R. Evid. 601 and did not violate defendant's right to confrontation under U.S. Const. amend. VI, because the hearing did not pertain to the facts and he was able to fully cross-examine the child at trial. Gilley v. State, 383 S.W.3d 301, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8517, 2012 WL 4815533 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 11 2012).

13. Four-year-old child victim's testimony against her 11-year-old brother was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2) because although she had a short attention span and did not always want to answer questions, she showed that she knew the difference between a lie and the truth and answered the questions asked of her. In re K.H., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2343, 2009 WL 962469 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 8 2009).

14. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial judge could have properly found the victim competent to testify as she was 14 years old at the time of trial, the judge made sure the victim understood that she could not discuss her testimony with other witnesses or be in the courtroom while another witness was testifying, and the victim indicated several times that she understood the judge's instructions. Castillo v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4745 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 20 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : General Overview

15. Murder victims' neighbor was competent to testify because she testified that she saw a small black vehicle parked on the street in front of the home on the day of the shooting. Furthermore, she identified a picture of a vehicle as being the same model as the vehicle she observed; any inconsistencies or inabilities to recall certain facts did not render the neighbor incompetent to testify, but went to the credibility of her testimony -- an issue for the jury. Robinson v. State, 368 S.W.3d 588, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483, 2012 WL 593558 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Credibility

16. Nothing in the record reflected an abuse of discretion by a trial court in permitting a witness who defendant claimed was intoxicated to testify because the possibility that the witness was intoxicated at the time of trial was a factor that the jury could have considered in evaluating her credibility. Therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion to strike her testimony. Horace v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2208, 2012 WL 983337 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 21 2012).

17. During a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child by contact, the twelve-year-old victim's responses to the prosecutor's questions and her testimony indicated she had the ability to intelligently recall and narrate the events, understood the difference between the truth and a lie, and understood that she had a responsibility to testify truthfully; therefore, her competence to testify was established under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2). Any inconsistencies the victim's version of events did not render her incompetent to testify, but went to the credibility of her testimony -- an issue to be resolved by the jury. Leal v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1663, 2011 WL 807476 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 9 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Presentation

18. Child was competent to testify, because he testified to knowing the difference between the truth and a lie, and testified in detail about the first time defendant sexually assaulted him. Rodas-Rivera v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 79, 2014 WL 50809 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 7 2014).

19. In an aggravated sexual assault case, defendant waived, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, a challenge to the victim's competency by failing to object in the trial court, and the victim's demeanor indicated that he was competent to testify within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 601. Castrejon v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6775 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 22 2005).

20. Where the child victim testified that defendant did something "nasty" to her three times, her testimony was sufficient to prove that defendant intended to arouse or gratify a sexual desire. The victim was a competent witness under Tex. R. Evid. 601. Ashton v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2005 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 17 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

21. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by failing to sua sponte conduct a hearing to determine a child sexual assault victim's mental competency or in overruling defendant's motion for a mistrial where defendant's own question to the State's expert of whether the victim's story appeared to be realistic induced the response that, in the witness's opinion, the victim was telling the truth. Furthermore, defendant had not preserved error because although he was aware before trial that the victim had mental problems, at no time did he object to the victim's testimony on the ground that she was not mentally competent to testify. Fox v. State, 175 S.W.3d 475, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7071 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

22. In an aggravated sexual assault case, defendant waived, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, a challenge to the victim's competency by failing to object in the trial court, and the victim's demeanor indicated that he was competent to testify within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 601. Castrejon v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6775 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 22 2005).

23. At his trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant did not object to the substance or the manner of the trial court's determination that the child was competent to testify and he did not object to the admission of her testimony. Consequently, he did not preserve the competency issue for review. Turley v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4876 (Tex. App. Tyler May 28 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

24. Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, he failed to preserve his objection to the competency of a child witness whose testimony may have suggested she did not understand her obligation to be truthful; the defendant did not make an objection on the record. Rodriguez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6108 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 13 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

25. In a sexual assault of a child case, defendant failed to preserve his complaint of the child's competency to testify because the trial court found the child competent to testify, and defendant did not object, nor did he object when the trial court made its finding of competency. Furthermore, defendant did not make any objections when the child testified in the presence of the jury. Martin v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8437 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 6, 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

26. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the younger of the two victims, who was three years old at the time of the offense and five years old at the time of trial, was competent to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 601 because although the victim's responses showed some conflict and confusion, her testimony overall indicated sufficient accuracy in her recollection in that she was able to recall and narrate details of the event by giving specific testimony about the location, timing, and details. Wagner v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2423 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Mistrial

27. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining a witness to be a competent witness; as such, it could not be concluded that the trial court abused its discretion by denying defendant's motion for mistrial. Utley v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 268, 2014 WL 97303 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 9 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Witnesses

28. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by finding the moderately mentally retarded complainant competent to testify because her testimony showed she possessed the ability to observe the alleged sexual assault at the time of the occurrence, was capable of recollecting the events, and was capable of narrating the events. Her mental status did not automatically render her incompetent to testify but it affect her credibility and the weight of her testimony. Hogan v. State, 440 S.W.3d 211, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13092 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 22 2013).

29. In an aggravated sexual assult case where defendant sexually assaulted his two stepdaughters, both the trial court and the prosecutor used abstract questioning as well as concrete examples to inquire into and establish each child's capacity to narrate the events, understanding of the difference between the truth and a lie, and understanding of her obligation to tell the truth; the children's responses indicated that they each had the ability to intelligently recall and narrate the events, understood the difference between the truth and a lie, and understood their moral responsibility to tell the truth; based on the children's answers to the qualification questions and their testimony as a whole, which was coherent and offered specific testimony about the location, timing, and details of the offenses, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 601, the children were competent to testify; thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the children were competent to testify. De Los Santos v. State, 219 S.W.3d 71, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10076 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : De Novo Review : Motions to Suppress

30. In a hearing on a motion to suppress, an officer's purported lack of independent knowledge of events surrounding an investigative stop did not make the officer incompetent as a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 601 in part because the rules of evidence (except for those rules concerning privileges) did not apply to suppression hearings. Belcher v. State, 244 S.W.3d 531, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9883 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Definitions

31. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault on a child case, although the court erred by finding the child victim competent to testify because he was unable to demonstrate that he had the capacity to recollect and narrate events relating to the transaction at issue, the error was harmless. The victim's testimony provided nothing the jury could use to determine guilt or innocence, and the outcry witness's testimony was sufficient to sustain defendant's conviction. Morrison v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1529 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 1 2007).

Estate, Gift & Trust Law : Nonprobate Transfers : Jointly Held Property : Bank Accounts

32. Claimants were not allowed to introduce parol evidence to establish survivorship interests in alleged joint accounts because there was no fraud nor mistake pled, nor any claim that certificate of deposit (CD) agreements were incomplete or ambiguous; relying on Tex. Prob. Code Ann. § 439, the Deadman's Statute under Tex. R. Evid. 601, the parol evidence rule, the "four corners of the document" rule, hearsay under Tex. R. Evid. 801, and double hearsay, an estate was correct in asserting that the claimants could not use extrinsic evidence in an attempt to get around the four corners of the CDs. Clark v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2211 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 27 2008).

Estate, Gift & Trust Law : Will Contests : General Overview

33. In a will contest, the trial court should have ordered disclosure of an Adult Protective Services (APS) file regarding the decedent and should have allowed the deposition of the APS case worker, in part because the case worker was able to corroborate, as required by Tex. R. Evid. 601(b), a phone call with the decedent's daughter that was part of the investigation. In re Chesses, 388 S.W.3d 330, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4270, 2012 WL 1943764 (Tex. App. El Paso May 30 2012).

Evidence : Competency : General Overview

34. Defendant was not entitled to a Crawford analysis, because the child was physically present in the courtroom for the duration of the trial, defendant had ample opportunity to call her for cross-examination and place her competency to testify at issue, and by failing to call her to the stand defendant invited the constitutional error; defendant did not request that the trial court assess and rule on the child's competency as a witness, meaning that the appellate court must presume she would have been a competent witness. Trevizo v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 652, 2014 WL 260591 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 22 2014).

35. Defendant was not entitled to a Crawford analysis, because the child was physically present in the courtroom for the duration of the trial, defendant had ample opportunity to call her for cross-examination and place her competency to testify at issue, and by failing to call her to the stand defendant invited the constitutional error; defendant did not request that the trial court assess and rule on the child's competency as a witness, meaning that the appellate court must presume she would have been a competent witness. Trevizo v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 652, 2014 WL 260591 (Tex. App. El Paso Jan. 22 2014).

36. Child was competent to testify, because he testified to knowing the difference between the truth and a lie, and testified in detail about the first time defendant sexually assaulted him. Rodas-Rivera v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 79, 2014 WL 50809 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 7 2014).

37. At the punishment phase of defendant's trial for unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony from defendant's sister about her removal from her home to foster care after she wrote a letter describing defendant's sexual abuse. Defendant did not challenge his sister's competency at trial under Tex. R. Evid. 601 and there was nothing in the record indicating she was not able to relate the occurrences, notwithstanding her discomfort with the situation. Ajvazi v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8900, 2012 WL 5293346 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 26 2012).

38. Record showed that appellee's lost profits for a mowing cycle was a certain amount, and appellee, as owner of his business, was competent to testify as to his profit margin. Park v. Payne, 381 S.W.3d 615, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6351 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 2 2012).

39. Nothing in the record reflected an abuse of discretion by a trial court in permitting a witness who defendant claimed was intoxicated to testify because the possibility that the witness was intoxicated at the time of trial was a factor that the jury could have considered in evaluating her credibility. Therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion to strike her testimony. Horace v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2208, 2012 WL 983337 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 21 2012).

40. Murder victims' neighbor was competent to testify because she testified that she saw a small black vehicle parked on the street in front of the home on the day of the shooting. Furthermore, she identified a picture of a vehicle as being the same model as the vehicle she observed; any inconsistencies or inabilities to recall certain facts did not render the neighbor incompetent to testify, but went to the credibility of her testimony -- an issue for the jury. Robinson v. State, 368 S.W.3d 588, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1483, 2012 WL 593558 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 24 2012).

41. Appellant did not object to testimony on a competency basis at trial, so it would not serve as grounds for reversal unless it constituted fundamental error under Tex. R. Evid. 103(d). Ates v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9777 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 10 2010).

42. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial judge could have properly found the victim competent to testify as she was 14 years old at the time of trial, the judge made sure the victim understood that she could not discuss her testimony with other witnesses or be in the courtroom while another witness was testifying, and the victim indicated several times that she understood the judge's instructions. Castillo v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4745 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 20 2007).

43. Despite some inconsistencies, there was evidence that a witness, who was mentally retarded, possessed the capability to observe intelligently at the time of defendant's attack on her, as well as the capacity to recollect and narrate, and thus the trial court did not err in finding that the witness had the capacity to testify pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 601 and in admitting the testimony. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2741 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 10 2007).

44. Defendant failed to raise complaints at trial, such that defendant was not entitled to raise the issue of competency of child witnesses for the first time on appeal, pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Guillory v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 649 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 31 2007).

45. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 601 by ruling that a seven-year-old complainant was competent to testify and by permitting her to testify about events that occurred when she was four; the complainant's responses during both the competency hearing and the trial were never inconsistent, and were direct, clear, and forthright; despite her references to the possibility that she dreamed the sexual assaults, she attributed that possibility to the length of time that had elapsed since they had occurred, and she denied fabricating her story. Hunter v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1783 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 9 2006).

46. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by failing to sua sponte conduct a hearing to determine a child sexual assault victim's mental competency or in overruling defendant's motion for a mistrial where defendant's own question to the State's expert of whether the victim's story appeared to be realistic induced the response that, in the witness's opinion, the victim was telling the truth. Furthermore, defendant had not preserved error because although he was aware before trial that the victim had mental problems, at no time did he object to the victim's testimony on the ground that she was not mentally competent to testify. Fox v. State, 175 S.W.3d 475, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7071 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

47. In an aggravated sexual assault case, defendant waived, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, a challenge to the victim's competency by failing to object in the trial court, and the victim's demeanor indicated that he was competent to testify within the meaning of Tex. R. Evid. 601. Castrejon v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6775 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 22 2005).

48. Where the child victim testified that defendant did something "nasty" to her three times, her testimony was sufficient to prove that defendant intended to arouse or gratify a sexual desire. The victim was a competent witness under Tex. R. Evid. 601. Ashton v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2005 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 17 2005).

49. In a drug case, an eight-year-old child was competent to testify about drug manufacturing by defendant, a mother, because the child was able to answer questions outside of the jury's presence regarding name, age, school, and the difference between a lie and the truth. The child was not incompetent based on a failure to properly identify the color of the judge's robe. Frizzell v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9669 (Tex. App. Tyler Oct. 29 2004).

50. In a white male job candidate's discrimination action against a college based on the college's selection of a younger black female for the position of psychology instructor, the trial court erred in striking the deposition testimony of the director of the liberal arts department because it raised a question of material fact as to whether race and age were motivating factors, there was no separate hearing on the director's competency, and the existence of a guardianship did not automatically render the director incompetent as a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a). Kokes v. Angelina College, 148 S.W.3d 384, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8182 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2004).

51. Trial court did not err in admitting the testimony of the complainant when defendant objected on the basis of her being a child witness not competent to testify, despite the child's confusing and inconsistent responses as the role of the trial court was to make the initial determination of competency, not to assess the credibility or weight to be given the testimony. In re A.W., 147 S.W.3d 632, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8153 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

52. Under Tex. R. Evid. 601, every person was competent to be a witness except as otherwise provided in these rules; an Intoxilyzer instrument was a computer, not a person, and by definition, therefore, the Intoxilyzer was not a declarant. Torres v. State, 109 S.W.3d 602, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 4773 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

Evidence : Competency : Dead Man's Acts : General Overview

53. Party made several conclusory statements regarding Tex. R. Evid. 601(b) in its brief on the merits, but cited no authority in support of its position, and thus any complaint regarding the admissibility of this testimony was therefore waived. Mustang Amusements, Inc. v. Sinclair, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8338, 2009 WL 3487796 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 28 2009).

54. Because a witness was not a party to the lawsuit and the wife failed to contend that the witness had an interest in the claims being litigated, this was fatal to the wife's complaints because Tex. R. Evid. 601(b) applied to testimony of a party or one having an interest in the matter. Pasley v. Pasley, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6680 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 18 2005).

55. Trial court did not err in excluding, under Tex. R. Evid. 601(b), the surviving partner's testimony on an issue because there was insufficient corroboration. Coleman v. Coleman, 170 S.W.3d 231, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6557 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

56. Dead Man's Rule did not apply to exclude plaintiff's testimony about decedent's gift of a pracel of land in an action to quiet title because plaintiff was not suing in her capacity as an heir of the decedent's estate, and defendant was sued in his individual capacity, not in his capacity as an heir, executor, administrator, guardian, or legal representative of decedent's estate. Conner v. Johnson, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9633 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Oct. 28 2004).

57. Upon review of a summary judgment motion, the appellant failed to preserve for review objections to deposition testimony of a deceased witness that may have been inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 601(b), and the trial court failed to rule on the objections as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 Allen v. Albin, 97 S.W.3d 655, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 9291 (Tex. App. Waco 2002).

Evidence : Competency : Dead Man's Acts : Scope

58. Texas Dead Man's Rule, Tex. R. Evid. 601(b), did not apply to a federal estate tax dispute. Although Fed. R. Evid. 601 provided that in civil cases where state law supplies the "rule of decision" concerning a claim or defense, state law was used to determine a witness's competency, the rule of decision in federal question cases was federal law. Keller v. United States, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73789, 104 A.F.T.R.2d (RIA) 2009-6015, 2009-2 U.S. Tax Cas. (CCH) P60579 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 20 2009).

Evidence : Competency : Dead Man's Acts : Waiver

59. Where decedent's wife testified as to their agreement to be married, the trial court construed decedent's will as if a common law marriage existed; on appeal, decedent's children argued that the wife's testimony did not meet the requirements of the Dead Man's Statute under Tex. R. Evid. 601 because it was not corroborated by other evidence. The Court of Appeals of Texas would not address the argument, because no objection was made at trial as required by Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1). In the Estate of Landers, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7196, 2010 WL 3420905 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 1 2010).

Evidence : Competency : Disability : General Overview

60. To the extent appellant relied on instances of confusing or contradictory statements of the victim, such responses were credibility matters for the jury, not matters of competence. Luria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8646, 2012 WL 4900908 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 17 2012).

Evidence : Competency : Disability : Children

61. In defendant's assault trial, counsel was not ineffective in failing to object to the child victim's competency as a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 601, as nothing in the record suggested that he was not competent to testify. Kakembo v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4383, 2014 WL 1663324 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 23 2014).

62. Defendant was not denied his Sixth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. VI, right to counsel when the trial court conducted its pretrial competency examination of the child victim in camera with the court reporter in attendance but in the absence of defendant and the attorneys because it was not a critical stage of the proceedings, given defense counsel's later opportunities to challenge the child victim's deficiencies during the trial itself. Gilley v. State, 418 S.W.3d 114, 2014 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 3 (Tex. Crim. App. Jan. 15 2014).

63. Although the trial court's examination may have been short, the complainant promised to tell the truth and showed she knew the duty to be truthful; the record did not reflect that she testified to events she did not remember, and while her responses showed some confusion, overall, her testimony indicated sufficient accuracy in her recollection, and any inconsistent testimony about a specific event might affect her credibility, but not her competency. Torres v. State, 424 S.W.3d 245, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1900, 2014 WL 685844 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 20 2014).

64. Although the complainant had difficulty recalling some collateral matters, a child's inability to testify to collateral matters did not affect the child's competency, and the record showed she possessed the ability to observe events and was capable of recollecting them. Torres v. State, 424 S.W.3d 245, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1900, 2014 WL 685844 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 20 2014).

65. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by finding that the child victim was competent to testify because defendant did not point to any testimony in the record that he claimed demonstrated a lack of the ability to relate the events that occurred, Medellin v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 12913, 2013 WL 5676224 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 17 2013).

66. Affidavit of a 12-year-old minor that there was no cautioning sign in a grocery store, submitted in support of his father's slip and fall action against the store, was competent under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2) in the absence of any examination of the child by the trial court. Pipkin v. Kroger Texas, L.P., 383 S.W.3d 655, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7627, 2012 WL 3860582 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 6 2012).

67. During a criminal trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child by contact, the twelve-year-old victim's responses to the prosecutor's questions and her testimony indicated she had the ability to intelligently recall and narrate the events, understood the difference between the truth and a lie, and understood that she had a responsibility to testify truthfully; therefore, her competence to testify was established under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2). Any inconsistencies the victim's version of events did not render her incompetent to testify, but went to the credibility of her testimony -- an issue to be resolved by the jury. Leal v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1663, 2011 WL 807476 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 9 2011).

68. In a child sexual abuse case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2) by treating as competent a child witness who testified to events he had seen at age two. The witness coherently described what he had seen and gave consistent answers on cross-examination. Ates v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 860 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 4 2011).

69. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child by not conducting a further inquiry into the ten-year-old complainant's competency as a witness where, after the complainant was sworn in, and before she began her direct testimony, the trial court had sua sponte asked her if she knew what it meant to tell the truth and if she knew she was sworn to tell the truth, and she answered affirmatively to both questions. The trial court then asked her if she understood that it was a "bad thing" if she did not tell the truth, and she said "yes." Rodriguez v. State, 345 S.W.3d 504, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 834 (Tex. App. Waco Feb. 2 2011).

70. Admitting a child's testimony was not fundamental error under Tex. R. Evid. 103(d), given that (1) the child successfully answered a series of questions about his age and interests, and nothing suggested that he was unable to intelligently observe what he witnessed, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2), (2) his testimony was not essential to appellant's conviction under Tex. Penal Code Ann. §§ 21.11, 22.021, as the victim's testimony did not require corroboration under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.07(a), (b)(1), and (3) the State did not elect to seek a conviction on the basis of the episode about which the witness testified. Ates v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9777 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 10 2010).

71. Child sexual assault victim was not incompetent to testify because a review of the child's testimony demonstrated her ability to observe intelligently the sexual assault by defendant, recall the event, and narrate it. Therefore, the record did not establish, on its face, that the child was incompetent to testify. Turley v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7198, 2010 WL 3420800 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 1 2010).

72. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of his four-year-old daughter, the trial court did not err in finding the victim competent to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2); the record of the victim's entire testimony showed that she demonstrated her knowledge of facts by identifying her family and colors and counting from one to ten. Ramos v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3698, 2010 WL 1965886 (Tex. App. Dallas May 6 2010).

73. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in finding that the child victim was competent to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2), but he did not object to her testimony until the conclusion of his cross-examination, plus the trial court did not rule on the objection, but permitted the State to proceed with redirect examination, after which defendant conducted additional cross examination and did not assert any further objections; under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, defendant did not preserve for review the issue he raised. Caudill v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3310, 2010 WL 1784031 (Tex. App. Tyler May 5 2010).

74. Even if defendant had preserved the claim that the child victim was incompetent to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2), the issue was without merit; the child's testimony contained conflicts as to where the assault occurred, but these issues did not make her an incompetent witness, and only after the child acknowledged the necessity of responding to questions truthfully did the trial court permit her to testify, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing her testimony. Caudill v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3310, 2010 WL 1784031 (Tex. App.

Tyler May 5 2010).

75. In defendant's indecency case, even if the trial court erred in determining that the victim was competent to testify, the court would still consider her testimony in reviewing the sufficiency of the evidence. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 948, 2010 WL 457131 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 11 2010).

76. Victim's responses to the qualification questions from counsel and the trial court regarding her ability to testify truthfully were equivocal regarding her competency to testify, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2), but the court had to review the child's entire testimony in determining if there was an abuse of discretion. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 948, 2010 WL 457131 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 11 2010).

77. Victim was able to observe the events of her encounter with defendant, recollect those events, and narrate them at trial, and considering her testimony as a whole, the court found that her testimony was admissible for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2), and thus the failure of trial counsel to object to the admissible testimony did not support a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. Garcia v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 948, 2010 WL 457131 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 11 2010).

78. Considering the child victim's responses to the prosecutor's qualification questions as well as her testimony as a whole, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by finding the child competent to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2); the child successfully answered questions concerning her name, birthday, and current age, she said she knew the difference between telling the truth and telling a lie, she promised to tell the truth, plus her testimony demonstrated that she was able to understand questions asked of her and intelligently frame answers to those questions, and while she could not recall all the details of the sexual assaults, she could recall and relate that defendant improperly touched her and where she was touched, for purposes of defendant's trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. §§ 22.021, 21.11. Debbs v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6103, 2009 WL 2397112 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 5 2009).

79. Four-year-old child victim's testimony against her 11-year-old brother was properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2) because although she had a short attention span and did not always want to answer questions, she showed that she knew the difference between a lie and the truth and answered the questions asked of her. In re K.H., 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2343, 2009 WL 962469 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 8 2009).

80. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the younger of the two victims, who was three years old at the time of the offense and five years old at the time of trial, was competent to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 601 because although the victim's responses showed some conflict and confusion, her testimony overall indicated sufficient accuracy in her recollection in that she was able to recall and narrate details of the event by giving specific testimony about the location, timing, and details. Wagner v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2423 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 31 2009).

81. In a sexual assault of a child case, defendant failed to preserve his complaint of the child's competency to testify because the trial court found the child competent to testify, and defendant did not object, nor did he object when the trial court made its finding of competency. Furthermore, defendant did not make any objections when the child testified in the presence of the jury. Martin v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8437 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 6, 2008).

82. Defendant cited no authority, and the court found none, requiring the trial court to question a child on the child's understanding of the punishment that will be inflicted should he or she lie and thus the court was unable to say that the trial court's failure to so question the child rendered the decision to permit her to testify an abuse of discretion; the court reviewed the body of the child's testimony and it demonstrated that the child was able to intelligently observe the events on the night of her mother's death, and could, for the most part, recollect those events and narrate them, and considering the child's responses to the trial court's qualification questions as well as her testimony as a whole, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by finding the child competent to testify in defendant's murder trial, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2). Davis v. State, 268 S.W.3d 683, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6566 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

83. By overruling defendant's objections to the child's competency and permitting her to testify, the trial court implicitly found the child competent to testify, and for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(2)(A), nothing more was required. Davis v. State, 268 S.W.3d 683, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6566 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

84. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021, defendant did not object to the child's testimony for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2) and thus the claim was not preserved for review under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; even if preserved, the court found no error because although the child's testimony contained conflicting answers, that did not alone make the child an incompetent witness, and the child consistently testified to defendant's assaults and the location of the crime, such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the child had the capacity to observe, recollect, and truthfully describe the events that were the basis of her testimony. Quam v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3133 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 25 2007).

85. In defendant's aggravated sexual assault on a child case, although the court erred by finding the child victim competent to testify because he was unable to demonstrate that he had the capacity to recollect and narrate events relating to the transaction at issue, the error was harmless. The victim's testimony provided nothing the jury could use to determine guilt or innocence, and the outcry witness's testimony was sufficient to sustain defendant's conviction. Morrison v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1529 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 1 2007).

86. In an aggravated sexual assult case where defendant sexually assaulted his two stepdaughters, both the trial court and the prosecutor used abstract questioning as well as concrete examples to inquire into and establish each child's capacity to narrate the events, understanding of the difference between the truth and a lie, and understanding of her obligation to tell the truth; the children's responses indicated that they each had the ability to intelligently recall and narrate the events, understood the difference between the truth and a lie, and understood their moral responsibility to tell the truth; based on the children's answers to the qualification questions and their testimony as a whole, which was coherent and offered specific testimony about the location, timing, and details of the offenses, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 601, the children were competent to testify; thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the children were competent to testify. De Los Santos v. State, 219 S.W.3d 71, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10076 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

87. Assuming without deciding that defendant preserved error, pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1, as to complaints on appeal related to the competency of the child witness under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2) in defendant's trial for aggravated assault of a child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021(a)(1)(B)(i), and assuming that error occurred, the court found that reversible error was not shown for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.2; by the time of trial, the child was undergoing speech therapy, answered questions articulately, and understood them, and the court had no doubt that the child demonstrated the competency to intelligently observe the events in question, such that defendant presented no prejudice. Ozuna v. State, 199 S.W.3d 601, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7134 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

88. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in allowing the minor child to testify, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 601, given that the trial court asked the child questions to determine if the child knew the difference between a truth and a lie, the child was able to articulate events in his life and his age at the time the events occurred, and the child was able to perceive the events of the alleged crime and relate the evidence to the jury. Castillo v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6839 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 3 2006).

89. Case law identifies factors for the court to consider in determining a witness's competency, and the trial court is not required to make a finding on the record concerning these factors; thus, the court rejected defendant's claim to the contrary in defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child. Castillo v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6839 (Tex. App. Eastland Aug. 3 2006).

90. Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, he failed to preserve his objection to the competency of a child witness whose testimony may have suggested she did not understand her obligation to be truthful; the defendant did not make an objection on the record. Rodriguez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6108 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 13 2006).

91. In a termination of parental rights proceeding, the trial court admitted evidence from the court-appointed special advocate regarding outcry statements of abuse from the children without showing that the children were competent witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 601; any error was harmless, because the same evidence was introduced elsewhere during trial without objection. In re K.R.C., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5819 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 6 2006).

Evidence : Competency : Disability : Mental Incapacity

92. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by finding the moderately mentally retarded complainant competent to testify because her testimony showed she possessed the ability to observe the alleged sexual assault at the time of the occurrence, was capable of recollecting the events, and was capable of narrating the events. Her mental status did not automatically render her incompetent to testify but it affect her credibility and the weight of her testimony. Hogan v. State, 440 S.W.3d 211, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13092 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 22 2013).

93. Appellant, in claiming the victim, a 19-year-old mentally disabled woman, was incompetent, requested a hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a)(2), and the trial court found the victim competent, and during cross-examination, defense counsel re-urged the competency objection; appellant's motion did not only seek a hearing, but exclusion of the victim's testimony, and this was a timely request stating grounds for exclusion, which was pursued to an adverse ruling for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), and thus appellant preserved this issue for review by obtaining an adverse ruling on the evidence's admissibility outside of the jury's presence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1). Luria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8646, 2012 WL 4900908 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 17 2012).

94. Victim, a 19-year-old mentally disabled woman, showed that she possessed the ability to intelligently perceive events, recall them, and convey them using dolls and words; the court deferred to the trial judge, and held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding the victim competent to testify in appellant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a disabled person. Luria v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8646, 2012 WL 4900908 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 17 2012).

95. Because appellant failed to request a hearing on the victim's alleged incompetence or object to her testimony, appellant did not preserve his complaint regarding her competence; in any event, her testimony provided sufficient evidence supporting a finding that she was competent under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a), given that (1) she testified that she had not suffered blackouts since 2008, she did not have visions or hear voices, and she was able to work and maintain her house, (2) she remembered the details of the assault, she did not suffer a blackout on that day, and none of her other personalities were present that day, (3) she had the ability to understand questions and frame answers, and (4) although she definitely suffered from a mental disability, she was competent to observe the events in question and had the capacity to recollect those events and recount them in a narrative format. Lewis v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 100, 2012 WL 29326 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 5 2012).

96. Record was silent regarding trial counsel's reason for not requesting a competency hearing of the victim, and thus appellant failed to overcome the strong presumption that trial counsel rendered effective assistance; because the court found no reason to reject the victim's testimony, prejudice to appellant was not shown. Lewis v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 100, 2012 WL 29326 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 5 2012).

97. Although the father was incompetent to testify at trial, because the father did not demonstrate, argue, or even contend that the admission of his testimony resulted in an improper judgment, his Tex. R. Evid. 601 argument had to fail. In the Interest of R.M.T., 352 S.W.3d 12, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8070 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 5 2011).

98. Court properly found a drug informant competent to testify -- despite being bipolar -- because she was able to function in everyday life, she had a college degree in English, and nothing indicated that the informant was unable to observe intelligently the events surrounding her phone conversations with defendant. In short, the record demonstrated that the trial court reasonably could have found that the informant was competent to testify. Kennedy v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3583 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 21 2009).

99. Despite some inconsistencies, there was evidence that a witness, who was mentally retarded, possessed the capability to observe intelligently at the time of defendant's attack on her, as well as the capacity to recollect and narrate, and thus the trial court did not err in finding that the witness had the capacity to testify pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 601 and in admitting the testimony. Lewis v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2741 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 10 2007).

100. Trial court did not err in ruling that a 17-year-old sexual assault victim was not incompetent to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 601 by reason of mental retardation; the victim was able to state her name, age, and school, she knew defendant and related the general act he committed upon her, and she knew the difference between truths and lies. Harper v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8069 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 11 2006).

101. Evidence was factually sufficient to support defendant's conviction of the kidnapping and sexual assault of a disabled adult woman, as she testified that defendant took her to his apartment three times against her will, defendant sexually assaulted her there, and she identified defendant's apartment, the bed where the assault took place, and the bedspread that was on the bed at the time, which defendant had later washed; defendant did not challenge the victim's mental capacity to testify at trial, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 601, to the extent that the victim's mental capacity could have been a factor in assessing her truthfulness and credibility, the court deferred to the jury, and the court found that the jury was rationally justified in finding guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Oliver v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4547 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 25 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Statements of Child Abuse

102. In a termination of parental rights proceeding, the trial court admitted evidence from the court-appointed special advocate regarding outcry statements of abuse from the children without showing that the children were competent witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 601; any error was harmless, because the same evidence was introduced elsewhere during trial without objection. In re K.R.C., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5819 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 6 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : General Overview

103. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by failing to sua sponte conduct a hearing to determine a child sexual assault victim's mental competency or in overruling defendant's motion for a mistrial where defendant's own question to the State's expert of whether the victim's story appeared to be realistic induced the response that, in the witness's opinion, the victim was telling the truth. Furthermore, defendant had not preserved error because although he was aware before trial that the victim had mental problems, at no time did he object to the victim's testimony on the ground that she was not mentally competent to testify. Fox v. State, 175 S.W.3d 475, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7071 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Objections

104. Where decedent's wife testified as to their agreement to be married, the trial court construed decedent's will as if a common law marriage existed; on appeal, decedent's children argued that the wife's testimony did not meet the requirements of the Dead Man's Statute under Tex. R. Evid. 601 because it was not corroborated by other evidence. The Court of Appeals of Texas would not address the argument, because no objection was made at trial as required by Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(1). In the Estate of Landers, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7196, 2010 WL 3420905 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 1 2010).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Preliminary Questions : Admissibility of Evidence : Witness Qualifications

105. In a hearing on a motion to suppress, an officer's purported lack of independent knowledge of events surrounding an investigative stop did not make the officer incompetent as a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 601 in part because the rules of evidence (except for those rules concerning privileges) did not apply to suppression hearings. Belcher v. State, 244 S.W.3d 531, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9883 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Rulings on Evidence

106. In a termination of parental rights proceeding, the trial court admitted evidence from the court-appointed special advocate regarding outcry statements of abuse from the children without showing that the children were competent witnesses under Tex. R. Evid. 601; any error was harmless, because the same evidence was introduced elsewhere during trial without objection. In re K.R.C., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5819 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 6 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : General Overview

107. Even if appellant adequately briefed her points, there was no abuse of discretion in the trial court's evidentiary rulings, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 402, 601, 802 and Tex. R. App. P. 44.1. Pool v. Diana, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2208 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 24 2010).

108. Defendant failed to raise complaints at trial, such that defendant was not entitled to raise the issue of competency of child witnesses for the first time on appeal, pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a). Guillory v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 649 (Tex. App. San Antonio Jan. 31 2007).

Family Law : Guardians : General Overview

109. In a white male job candidate's discrimination action against a college based on the college's selection of a younger black female for the position of psychology instructor, the trial court erred in striking the deposition testimony of the director of the liberal arts department because it raised a question of material fact as to whether race and age were motivating factors, there was no separate hearing on the director's competency, and the existence of a guardianship did not automatically render the director incompetent as a witness under Tex. R. Evid. 601(a). Kokes v. Angelina College, 148 S.W.3d 384, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8182 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2004).

Public Health & Welfare Law : Healthcare : Services for Disabled & Elderly Persons

110. In a will contest, the trial court should have ordered disclosure of an Adult Protective Services (APS) file regarding the decedent and should have allowed the deposition of the APS case worker, in part because the case worker was able to corroborate, as required by Tex. R. Evid. 601(b), a phone call with the decedent's daughter that was part of the investigation. In re Chesses, 388 S.W.3d 330, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4270, 2012 WL 1943764 (Tex. App. El Paso May 30 2012).

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Supporting Materials : Affidavits

1. In an investor's suit alleging that a securities brokerage firm had negligently failed to supervise its employee in the sale of a portion of the employee's outside businesses to the investor, a manager's summary-judgment affidavit showed that she had personal knowledge regarding the firm's lack of notice of the transaction, which the manager obtained both in the course of her job duties and from conversations she had with an attorney. Fernea v. Merrill Lynch Pierce Fenner & Smith, Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 172 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 7 2011).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Substantial Evidence : Sufficiency of Evidence

2. In an alimony dispute, the evidence was legally insufficient to sustain the award because the only evidence presented as to the husband's income was testimony from the wife that he had not provided any information establishing that 25% of his gross monthly income would be less than 5 million; that did not provide any actual evidence that the husband had a total gross income of $ 20 million dollars or more from January 1, 2002 to September 21, 2006. The wife acknowledged on appeal that she was "not privy to the husband's personal income information," and admitted that she failed to come forward with information regarding the husband's gross income. Sembritzky v. Shanks, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9754 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 8 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : General Overview

3. In a cocaine possession trial, there was no error in admitting an officer's testimony that defendant passenger jointly possessed cocaine or in admitting the officer's testimony explaining how he believed the bag of cocaine became positioned behind the driver's seat. The testimony was rationally based on the circumstances the officer perceived in the course of arresting defendant and investigating the case. Salazar v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3983, 2014 WL 1408121 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 10 2014).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Kidnapping : Elements

4. Testimony of witness regarding the victim's kidnapping was not speculative and he was qualified to testify that the victim could not leave the vehicle because the witness had personal knowledge of a number of key facts, and he was present at material times. Saenz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2254 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 2 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : Capital Murder : General Overview

5. In defendant's capital murder case, a court did not err by permitting a witness to speculate that defendant's accomplice could not have taken the money from the cash register where the witness based his testimony on his observations. He could see where both robbers were located in relationship to the complainant and the cash drawer, and based on those observations, the witness drew an inference that only defendant was in a position to reach the cash drawer and take the money. Webber v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 15 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Destruction of Property : Elements

6. Where defendant used a car jack to strike the hood of the complainant's SUV, Tex. R. Evid. 602 permitted the arresting officer to testify that $1500 was the estimated cost of repairing the damage based on his years of experience with criminal mischief cases; the officer was also permitted to testify that the body shop's repair estimate was $ 1,530.01. Barnes v. State, 248 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4261 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

7. In a trial for indecency with a child, it was proper to exclude evidence of conduct by the complainant's mother, such as extramarital affairs and involvement in pornography and drug abuse; the reviewing court noted that much of the testimony probably also constituted objectionable speculation or hearsay, at least from the witnesses through whom defendant sought to introduce it. Jimenez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6538 (Tex. App. Waco July 26 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : Elements

8. In a driving while intoxicated trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 701, 602, in admitting lay opinion testimony concerning whether anyone else could have exited a burning vehicle, other than defendant. Taking into account that the witnesses were the only people present for the accident, other than the defendant, their rationally based perceptions put them in the best position to judge how likely the presence or non-presence of a second occupant would be. O'donoghue v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5532 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 15 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Sentencing

9. Defendant's counsel was not ineffective during the punishment phase of defendant's aggravated assault trial for failing to object to a county case worker supervisor's opinion about defendant's character where the case worker's testimony was in compliance with Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) and Tex. R. Evid. 602 because it was rationally based on her perception and was helpful to a determination of a fact in issue-defendant's punishment. Ramirez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 368, 2009 WL 1567340 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 22 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Evidence

10. Defendant's counsel was not ineffective during the punishment phase of defendant's aggravated assault trial for failing to object to a county case worker supervisor's opinion about defendant's character where the case worker's testimony was in compliance with Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a)(1) and Tex. R. Evid. 602 because it was rationally based on her perception and was helpful to a determination of a fact in issue-defendant's punishment. Ramirez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 368, 2009 WL 1567340 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 22 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

11. In a trial for indecency with a child under the age of 17 years, defendant objected, during a psychiatric witness's voir dire, to testimony regarding the complainant's statements about one incident; the separate objections under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), 602, 803(1) and 803(4), were overruled and appellant was not required to later repeat the individual objections before the jury. However, defendant argued on appeal that it was error to admit the hearsay statements for the purpose of medical diagnosis when the child did not have personal knowledge of the incident, in that the child was not sure whether he was touched by a penis or a finger; this argument appeared to be a unique blend of Tex. R. Evid. 602 and 803(4), which was not presented to the trial court with sufficient specificity to preserve the objection and which was also contrary to the law because defendant was not challenging the lack of personal knowledge by the witnesses. Ramirez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1063 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 5 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

12. By failing to object to trial counsel's affidavit on the grounds raised on appeal, namely that it was incompetent under Tex. R. Evid. 602, appellant failed to preserve his complaint for review. Ex Parte Gandara, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9395, 2011 WL 5995428 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 30 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

13. By failing to object to trial counsel's affidavit on the grounds raised on appeal, namely that it was incompetent under Tex. R. Evid. 602, appellant failed to preserve his complaint for review. Ex Parte Gandara, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9395, 2011 WL 5995428 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 30 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

14. In a robbery/murder trial, any error was harmless in admitting an investigator's arguably speculative testimony that defendant's fellow gang members did not testify due to their fear of retaliation. Vallejo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6952 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 6 2013).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Admissibility

15. State was properly allowed to demonstrate its version of defendant's murder of her husband in order to illustrate the state's theory that the multiple stabbing was planned rather than defensive, and Tex. R. Evid. 602 did not bar the demonstration because the state's witness who participated, a detective who viewed both the body and the scene, had personal knowledge of many of the details about which he testified, and he could reasonably deduce the remaining details from those details he personally knew. The court noted that case law, not Rule 602, was the primary guidepost for determining if a demonstration was appropriately admitted. Wright v. State, 178 S.W.3d 905, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9609 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2005).

Evidence : Demonstrative Evidence : Visual Formats

16. Even though the trial court erred by admitting into evidence an animation that purportedly reconstructed the events surrounding the shooting, because nothing in the record supported many of the details contained in the animation and the details were provided by nothing more than pure speculation on the creator's part, the error was harmless. The crux of the case against defendant was linking him to the conspiracy to get the informant, and two witness testified that defendant entered into an agreement with others to retaliate against an informant for giving police information that led to a friend's arrest; the animation did little to answer that question. Derrick v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4843 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 17 2013).

Evidence : Documentary Evidence : Affidavits

17. Certificate of marriage was not evidence that appellee entered into a valid marriage because the affiant did not make the certification based on personal knowledge as required by Tex. R. Evid. 602; the affiant admitted she did not know who the groom was at the ceremony. Nguyen v. Nguyen, 355 S.W.3d 82, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3221 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 24 2011).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Statements by Party Opponents : General Overview

18. In a wrongful death case, a court properly excluded expert deposition testimony on hearsay grounds where the expert was not an employee of defendant pharmacy, and there was no evidence that an agency relationship existed. When the family non-suited their claims against the doctor, the subject matter over which the expert was asked to give his opinion became moot; subsequently, he was not called at trial, and, therefore, the trial court excluded his testimony on hearsay grounds. McCluskey v. Randall's Food Mkts., Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9178 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 19 2004).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

19. In a murder case, the prosecutor's affidavit regarding trial strategy was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401and Tex. R. Evid. 602 at a new trial hearing because it addressed the issue of effective assistance and included some statements made from personal knowledge; defendant did not seek to limit the scope of the affidavit pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 105(a). Shanklin v. State, 190 S.W.3d 154, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10675 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Limited Admissibility

20. In a murder case, the prosecutor's affidavit regarding trial strategy was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401and Tex. R. Evid. 602 at a new trial hearing because it addressed the issue of effective assistance and included some statements made from personal knowledge; defendant did not seek to limit the scope of the affidavit pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 105(a). Shanklin v. State, 190 S.W.3d 154, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10675 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Rulings on Evidence

21. In defendant's trial for indecency with a child by contact, the trial court did not err by sustaining the State's objections to defense counsel's questions posed to the victim's friend regarding whether her brother's girlfriend was aware of any of the abuse allegations. Any awareness that the girlfriend had of the abuse allegations was beyond the personal knowledge of the witness under Tex. R. Evid. 602. Taylor v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1663, 2012 WL 662373 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 1 2012).

22. In a case in which a jury found that defendant juvenile engaged in delinquent conduct by committing the offenses of aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, the trial court did not err in excluding certain testimony of various witnesses and did not prevent defendant from fully presenting his defensive theory where: (1) the proffered testimony of the victim's mother as set forth in defendant's bill of exceptions was properly excluded as speculative pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 602; (2) the victim's mother was not shown to be qualified as an expert to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 702; (3) at trial, defendant was allowed to question the victim and her sister regarding the meeting they allegedly had with their grandparents during the time period after the victim's outcry but prior to the Monday morning interview with a deputy; and (4) the only testimony excluded by the trial court during defense counsel's examination of the victim and her sister was testimony regarding statements made by their grandparents during the alleged meeting, which was properly excluded on hearsay grounds pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 802. Although defendant's bill of exceptions set forth the testimony that he asserted that the victim would have offered regarding what she told her grandparents during the alleged meeting, defense counsel did not question the victim regarding what she told her grandparents during that meeting, and, additionally, defense counsel did not argue that the trial court improperly sustained the State's hearsay objections to statements of the grandparents. In re J.R.N., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2280, 2009 WL 6312273 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 1 2010).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

23. Even if defendant had timely objected to a similar crime's victim's testimony that defendant "cut this girl," to the extent the testimony implied that the witness had personal knowledge of the incident, Tex. R. Evid. 602, defense counsel later made it clear that the witness had no personal knowledge Tovar v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10404 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 20 2013).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

24. Trial court did not err by excluding an agent's testimony concerning the identity of the tipster because the agent stated he did not know but only had ideas as to who the tipster was. Ivie v. State, 407 S.W.3d 305, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4876 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 18 2013).

25. In defendant's evading arrest case, the court properly excluded a defense witness's testimony because the proffered testimony that it was "standard operating procedure" for law enforcement agencies in general to routinely make video and audio recordings of police pursuits was not germane. The witness did not have personal knowledge as to the standard procedures of the Corpus Christi Police Department regarding recordings of police pursuits. Gomez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1700 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 5 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : General Overview

26. In a wrongful death case, a court properly excluded expert deposition testimony on hearsay grounds where the expert was not an employee of defendant pharmacy, and there was no evidence that an agency relationship existed. When the family non-suited their claims against the doctor, the subject matter over which the expert was asked to give his opinion became moot; subsequently, he was not called at trial, and, therefore, the trial court excluded his testimony on hearsay grounds. McCluskey v. Randall's Food Mkts., Inc., 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9178 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 19 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Criminal Trials

27. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, defendant objected to testimony from an expert witness concerning whether the victim exhibited behaviors that were consistent which sexual abuse; the trial court overruled defendant's objection based on Tex. R. Evid. 602 for lack of personal knowledge; the expert spoke in generalities and never claimed that child complainants in sexual abuse cases always tell the truth. Ficarro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 26 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : General Overview

28. On appeal from his conviction for failing to stop at a clearly marked stop line while facing a red light, the appellate court determined that the municipal court did not err in overruling defendant's objections to questions that he claimed called for a conclusion of law or ultimate issue for the jury. The police officers testified based on their observations and experience in patrolling the same area where defendant was cited. Hassan v. State, 440 S.W.3d 684, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8853, 2012 WL 5288353 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 25 2012).

29. Where a habitual marijuana user fell from a steel structure while working, he was permitted to give his lay opinion testimony that he had normal use of his mental and physical faculties at the time of his injury. The jury was entitled to believe the employee's testimony, together with the testimony about the work activities the employee successfully completed prior to his fall. Am. Interstate Ins. Co. v. Hinson, 172 S.W.3d 108, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6350 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Opinion Testimony : Personal Perceptions

30. At defendant's trial for possession of cocaine with intent to deliver, a detective testified that defendant and two other people had responsibility for and possession of cocaine found in the hotel room; counsel was not ineffective for failure to object because the testimony was admissible as a lay opinion. The detective's personal knowledge of the matter formed the basis of his objective perception of events and his lay opinion testimony regarding the people in the motel room. Fletcher v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 940, 2014 WL 354508 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 30 2014).

31. Witness's testimony that he assumed he was in jail because of a shooting committed by defendant was within his personal knowledge, rationally based on his perception of events and experiences, including questioning of him by police about a firearm, was helpful to a clear understanding of his testimony. His testimony was therefore admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 602 and Tex. R. Evid. 701. Williams v. State, 402 S.W.3d 425, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7031 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 11 2013).

32. In a driving while intoxicated case, testimony from defendant's mother on the issue of whether defendant was intoxicated was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the mother did not personally observe a traffic stop or defendant's interaction with an arresting officer; the mother did not acquire personal knowledge at the time of the event. Because the testimony was not relevant, defendant's argument that her due process right to present a complete defense was violated was not addressed. Hartin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2765, 2009 WL 1076799 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2009).

33. In a driving while intoxicated case, there was no error in excluding testimony from defendant's mother regarding why defendant refused to cooperate with an arresting officer due to the mother's lack of personal knowledge. Even though the mother had knowledge of some past events concerning defendant that might have explained defendant's behavior, the mother was not present for the arrest. Hartin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2765, 2009 WL 1076799 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2009).

34. Officer was properly allowed to testify about the purpose of altering a shotgun to create a sawed-off shotgun because she had dealt with sawed-off shotguns on the firing range and in the field when investigating crimes, and because of her personal observations on the firing range and in the field, she was qualified to offer a lay opinion on the result of altering a shotgun. The question sought an explanation of what would be accomplished by sawing off the barrel of a shotgun, and the question was specifically limited to the officer's experience. Shelton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1802, 2009 WL 672011 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 12 2009).

35. Where defendant used a car jack to strike the hood of the complainant's SUV, Tex. R. Evid. 602 permitted the arresting officer to testify that $1500 was the estimated cost of repairing the damage based on his years of experience with criminal mischief cases; the officer was also permitted to testify that the body shop's repair estimate was $ 1,530.01. Barnes v. State, 248 S.W.3d 217, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4261 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

36. In a possession of a prohibited substance in a correctional facility case, defendant alleged that he gave false testimony at his cell mate's trial because he was coerced by gang members, but his cell mate did not testify that he had personal knowledge of the gang members at the correctional facility actually following the gang's rules to protect other gang members from prosecution; therefore, the cell mate's opinion testimony was not based on his perceptions; rather, the cell mate's opinion testimony was based on his speculative conclusions regarding what the gang members would have done to protect him from prosecution; accordingly, Tex. R. Evid. 701 was not met by the cell mate's testimony, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the State's objection to that testimony. Haggerty v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2130 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 20 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Lay Witnesses : Personal Knowledge

37. Petitioner failed to show the court erred in admitting speculative testimony, because the court could determine that the psychologist testifying about the process of evaluating sex offenders for behavioral abnormality and explaining how certain statistical studies correlated to risk of recidivism possessed sufficient knowledge to answer the question whether sex offenses were often under-reported or not reported at all. In re Commitment of Puckett, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6438, 2014 WL 2616915 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 12 2014).

38. Officer's testimony about inconsistencies in defendant's narrative was properly admitted, even though he did not personally hear what defendant told other officers in a 1982 interview, because the testifying officer had personal knowledge of what defendant said in a 2011 interview and reviewed the written record of the 1982 interview. Pena v. State, 441 S.W.3d 635, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5932 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 3 2014).

39. At defendant's trial for possession of cocaine with intent to deliver, a detective testified that defendant and two other people had responsibility for and possession of cocaine found in the hotel room; counsel was not ineffective for failure to object because the testimony was admissible as a lay opinion. The detective's personal knowledge of the matter formed the basis of his objective perception of events and his lay opinion testimony regarding the people in the motel room. Fletcher v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 940, 2014 WL 354508 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 30 2014).

40. Even if defendant had timely objected to a similar crime's victim's testimony that defendant "cut this girl," to the extent the testimony implied that the witness had personal knowledge of the incident, Tex. R. Evid. 602, defense counsel later made it clear that the witness had no personal knowledge Tovar v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10404 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 20 2013).

41. Advisor's "understanding" did not equate to personal knowledge and the court affirmed the ruling that struck portions of his affidavit. Vsr Fin. Servs. v. McLendon, 409 S.W.3d 817, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10187 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 14 2013).

42. Court presumed the trial court understood the basis for appellant's objection was a lack of personal knowledge because the trial court told the witness to answer if she knew, and thus appellant preserved error. Contreras v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9459 (Tex. App. Dallas July 30 2013).

43. Community supervision officer demonstrated her personal knowledge and her testimony was properly admitted, given that she identified appellant in open court and testified he was placed on community supervision in 2011, and she answered the question on court costs after being told she could answer if she knew. Contreras v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9459 (Tex. App. Dallas July 30 2013).

44. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow witnesses to be impeached by proof: (1) showing a bias or interest on the part of some other witness or information source, and (2) about which the witness had no personal knowledge. Estate of Muniz v. Ford Motor Co., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7158 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 12 2013).

45. Witness's testimony that he assumed he was in jail because of a shooting committed by defendant was within his personal knowledge, rationally based on his perception of events and experiences, including questioning of him by police about a firearm, was helpful to a clear understanding of his testimony. His testimony was therefore admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 602 and Tex. R. Evid. 701. Williams v. State, 402 S.W.3d 425, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7031 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 11 2013).

46. Witness testified as a lay person that by using crime scene measurements, photographs, statements, and an accident reconstruction software program, he created the animation, but nothing supported many of the details in the animation, which were provided by no more than pure speculation, and thus the trial court erred in admitting the animation, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, 701. Lewis v. State, 402 S.W.3d 852, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6923 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2013).

47. Finding error in the admission of computer generated animation under Tex. R. Evid. 602, 701 did not end the court's inquiry, as the court had to consider whether to disregard the error under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b); the court found that appellant's substantial rights were not affected and the error was harmless, given that the animation did little to answer whether appellant agreed to retaliate against someone, and there was testimony to that effect. Lewis v. State, 402 S.W.3d 852, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6923 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 29 2013).

48. Trial court did not err by excluding an agent's testimony concerning the identity of the tipster because the agent stated he did not know but only had ideas as to who the tipster was. Ivie v. State, 407 S.W.3d 305, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4876 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 18 2013).

49. Even though the trial court erred by admitting into evidence an animation that purportedly reconstructed the events surrounding the shooting, because nothing in the record supported many of the details contained in the animation and the details were provided by nothing more than pure speculation on the creator's part, the error was harmless. The crux of the case against defendant was linking him to the conspiracy to get the informant, and two witness testified that defendant entered into an agreement with others to retaliate against an informant for giving police information that led to a friend's arrest; the animation did little to answer that question. Derrick v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4843 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 17 2013).

50. Unsworn verification did not meet the requirements of Tex. R. Civ. P. 165a(3) and did not establish that it was based on personal knowledge as required by Tex. R. Evid. 602; thus, the trial court erred in reinstating the case after a dismissal for want of prosecution. Counsel's signature providing a certification under Tex. R. Civ. P. 13 could not substitute for a verification, and an affidavit later filed more than 30 days after the date of dismissal was untimely under Rule 165a and could not cure the defective verification. In re Valliance Bank, 422 S.W.3d 722, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9491, 2012 WL 5512455 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 15 2012).

51. In a negligence suit, it was an abuse of discretion to admit testimony of the contents of public records concerning the inspection results of fourteen hundred trucks in Canada and the braking and other problems allegedly found, when the actual reports were not themselves produced. The testifying witness was not present for the inspection of the many trucks inspected, and he had no personal knowledge of those inspections; he based his testimony on the government reports or studies that presumably contained the information. U-Haul Int'l, Inc. v. Waldrip, 380 S.W.3d 118, 2012 Tex. LEXIS 737, 55 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1345 (Tex. 2012).

52. Witness's testimony and statements were conclusory and not shown to be based on any personal knowledge of the witness, and thus the testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 602. In re Estate of Snow, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7450 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 30 2012).

53. Nothing explained the factual basis for one statement, and it was not shown to be within the witness's personal knowledge and was conclusory; it was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 602. In re Estate of Snow, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7450 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 30 2012).

54. Heirs did not show that a witness had personal knowledge that a widow was unable to balance her checkbook, and thus the statement was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 602. In re Estate of Snow, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7450 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 30 2012).

55. At the punishment phase of a criminal mischief trial, it was proper to admit testimony from the new husband of defendant's ex-wife regarding defendant's attempt to hit his ex-wife with his car because, contrary to defendant's argument, there was evidence that the new husband had personal knowledge of the incident. Moreno v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6018, 2012 WL 3025932 (Tex. App. El Paso July 25 2012).

56. In a murder trial, a witness was not allowed to speculate as to whether defendant and the complainant were arguing because she stated that she saw and heard the two arguing about whether defendant was supposed to give the complainant some money for her daughter. The witness's uncertainty seemed to have been about whether defendant actually owed the money, not whether they were arguing about the debt. Benard v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3928, 2012 WL 1795131 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 16 2012).

57. Exclusion of testimony did not result in reversible error, as there was no evidence that the witness had any first-hand knowledge, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, of appellant's health condition and the trial court did not err in sustaining the hearsay objection; although some of the proffered testimony was not hearsay and consisted of the witness's observations and inferences, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701, even that was cumulative, and thus the excluded testimony could not have added anything to the admitted evidence. Frangias v. State, 367 S.W.3d 806, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3065, 2012 WL 1356704 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 19 2012).

58. In defendant's trial for indecency with a child by contact, the trial court did not err by sustaining the State's objections to defense counsel's questions posed to the victim's friend regarding whether her brother's girlfriend was aware of any of the abuse allegations. Any awareness that the girlfriend had of the abuse allegations was beyond the personal knowledge of the witness under Tex. R. Evid. 602. Taylor v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1663, 2012 WL 662373 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 1 2012).

59. In a dispute concerning whether a workers' compensation claimant who was injured while driving home had been paid for driving other employees, the trial court reasonably could have excluded deposition testimony from two company executives based on relevance under Tex. R. Evid. 401, 402 and/or personal knowledge under Tex. R. Evid. 602. The executives did not know the claimant and were not present when he was hired, and testimony regarding the tax treatment of the payments was not material to whether the per diem payments were for driving. Tex. Prop. & Cas. Ins. Guar. Ass'n v. Brooks, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7269, 2011 WL 3890405 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 31 2011).

60. Certificate of marriage was not evidence that appellee entered into a valid marriage because the affiant did not make the certification based on personal knowledge as required by Tex. R. Evid. 602; the affiant admitted she did not know who the groom was at the ceremony. Nguyen v. Nguyen, 355 S.W.3d 82, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3221 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 24 2011).

61. In an action arising from breach of an agreement to purchase a residence, and in which the buyers' then attorney filed a lis pendens on the residence, the seller failed to show as a matter of law that the constructive lien language in a letter by the buyers' then attorney was a cause in fact of a third party's termination of its contract with the seller, where the testimonies of the seller and his real estate agent could not serve as basis for the seller's tortious interference with contract cause of action against the buyers because both the seller and his real estate agent testified that they had no personal knowledge of the reason the third party cancelled its contract with the seller. The third party's termination letter conclusively established that it cancelled the contract because the seller failed to remove the lis pendens, and the third party's actions were a natural and logical result of a lis pendens filing. Glenn v. Pack, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 390, 2011 WL 167254 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 13 2011).

62. With respect to the case underlying a legal malpractice action, former clients failed to prove that a real estate agent made any misrepresentation or omission in connection with the sale of a home as required by Tex. Bus. & Com. Code. Ann. § 27.01(1) as the seller's disclosure notice was not admitted into evidence and was not completed by the agent, the attorney had no personal knowledge of the facts necessary to prove the clients' claims, and a statement by one of the clients that she felt the agent made a false representation to her was merely conclusory. Webb v. Stockford, 331 S.W.3d 169, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 109 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 10 2011).

63. In an investor's suit alleging that a securities brokerage firm had negligently failed to supervise its employee in the sale of a portion of the employee's outside businesses to the investor, a manager's summary-judgment affidavit showed that she had personal knowledge regarding the firm's lack of notice of the transaction, which the manager obtained both in the course of her job duties and from conversations she had with an attorney. Fernea v. Merrill Lynch Pierce Fenner & Smith, Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 172 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 7 2011).

64. In a forcible detainer suit brought by a lender that purchased the property at a foreclosure sale, a paralegal employed by an affiliated service provider of the lender's counsel was a qualified witness with personal knowledge under Tex. R. Evid. 602, 803(6), 902(10) of business records regarding the foreclosure proceedings. Rodriguez v. Citimortgage, Inc., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 171, 2011 WL 182122 (Tex. App. Austin Jan. 6 2011).

65. Two witnesses were not present at the time of the accident and were not competent to testify as a fact witness regarding the speed of the drum at the time of the accident, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602. Blaine v. National-oilwell, L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9614, 2010 WL 4951779 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2010).

66. Expert's opinion that the speed of the sand line drum caused a worker's death was conclusory and unsupported by the facts, plus he improperly relied on witnesses who lacked personal knowledge under Tex. R. Evid. 602. Blaine v. National-oilwell, L.P., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9614, 2010 WL 4951779 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2010).

67. Trial court did not err in denying a hospital patient's motion for a grace period to file an expert report in a health care liability action; because the patient's second lawyer had no personal knowledge of the first lawyer's intent, and the first lawyer did not provide an affidavit, there was no evidence of mistake or accident and thus no basis for the requested grace period. Marks v. St. Luke's Episcopal Hosp., 319 S.W.3d 658, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 614, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1077 (Tex. 2010).

68. In an equipment supplier's breach of contract action against an electrical subcontractor, the court did not err in admitting testimony from the supplier's vice president about a change-order request and an agreed modification to a training requirement in the contract; the vice president's testimony was based on personal knowledge because the vice president testified only about matters that the vice president perceived firsthand. Austin Traffic Signal Constr. Co., L.P. v. Transdyn Controls, Inc., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7059, 2010 WL 3370292 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 24 2010).

69. In a case in which a jury found that defendant juvenile engaged in delinquent conduct by committing the offenses of aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, the trial court did not err in excluding certain testimony of various witnesses and did not prevent defendant from fully presenting his defensive theory where: (1) the proffered testimony of the victim's mother as set forth in defendant's bill of exceptions was properly excluded as speculative pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 602; (2) the victim's mother was not shown to be qualified as an expert to testify under Tex. R. Evid. 702; (3) at trial, defendant was allowed to question the victim and her sister regarding the meeting they allegedly had with their grandparents during the time period after the victim's outcry but prior to the Monday morning interview with a deputy; and (4) the only testimony excluded by the trial court during defense counsel's examination of the victim and her sister was testimony regarding statements made by their grandparents during the alleged meeting, which was properly excluded on hearsay grounds pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 802. Although defendant's bill of exceptions set forth the testimony that he asserted that the victim would have offered regarding what she told her grandparents during the alleged meeting, defense counsel did not question the victim regarding what she told her grandparents during that meeting, and, additionally, defense counsel did not argue that the trial court improperly sustained the State's hearsay objections to statements of the grandparents. In re J.R.N., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2280, 2009 WL 6312273 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 1 2010).

70. Creditor employee was qualified to testify to the accuracy of the business record documents, given that he stated that he had personal knowledge of the record, which he said were originals or exact duplicates of the records for the debtor's account. Simien v. Unifund Ccr Ptnrs, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9411 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 10 2009).

71. In a driving while intoxicated case, testimony from defendant's mother on the issue of whether defendant was intoxicated was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 701 because the mother did not personally observe a traffic stop or defendant's interaction with an arresting officer; the mother did not acquire personal knowledge at the time of the event. Because the testimony was not relevant, defendant's argument that her due process right to present a complete defense was violated was not addressed. Hartin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2765, 2009 WL 1076799 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2009).

72. In a driving while intoxicated case, there was no error in excluding testimony from defendant's mother regarding why defendant refused to cooperate with an arresting officer due to the mother's lack of personal knowledge. Even though the mother had knowledge of some past events concerning defendant that might have explained defendant's behavior, the mother was not present for the arrest. Hartin v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2765, 2009 WL 1076799 (Tex. App. Beaumont Apr. 22 2009).

73. Testimony of witness regarding the victim's kidnapping was not speculative and he was qualified to testify that the victim could not leave the vehicle because the witness had personal knowledge of a number of key facts, and he was present at material times. Saenz v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2254 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 2 2009).

74. Officer was properly allowed to testify about the purpose of altering a shotgun to create a sawed-off shotgun because she had dealt with sawed-off shotguns on the firing range and in the field when investigating crimes, and because of her personal observations on the firing range and in the field, she was qualified to offer a lay opinion on the result of altering a shotgun. The question sought an explanation of what would be accomplished by sawing off the barrel of a shotgun, and the question was specifically limited to the officer's experience. Shelton v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1802, 2009 WL 672011 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 12 2009).

75. In defendant's evading arrest case, the court properly excluded a defense witness's testimony because the proffered testimony that it was "standard operating procedure" for law enforcement agencies in general to routinely make video and audio recordings of police pursuits was not germane. The witness did not have personal knowledge as to the standard procedures of the Corpus Christi Police Department regarding recordings of police pursuits. Gomez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1700 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 5 2009).

76. Court properly excluded defendant's father's testimony regarding whether defendant had ever received felony probation because there was uncontroverted evidence that defendant had not resided with his father his entire life, and, in fact, had been to Alaska for several months. Mansfield v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5615 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 29 2008).

77. Attorney testified without objection as an expert witness on attorney fees, and an expert was not required to have personal knowledge on the matters about which he testified, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, 703; the attorney testified that he reviewed the former attorney's file, level of experience, and the work performed and opined that the former attorney's fees were reasonable and necessary, plus the attorney testified about his own representation, and this testimony supported the jury's award of fees. Arthur J. Gallagher & Co. v. Dieterich, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5639 (Tex. App. Dallas July 29 2008).

78. In defendant's murder case, the trial court did not abridge her right to present a complete defense by excluding the State's notice of extraneous offenses and the testimony of two State's witnesses because defendant's evidence was excluded because the witnesses did not have personal knowledge of the extraneous offenses; therefore, their testimony would have been unreliable; moreover, the trial court permitted defendant to testify that she knew one witness had been accused of committing several armed robberies and that he had assaulted his girlfriend. Williams v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2874 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 22 2008).

79. In a cocaine possession case, a police officer's testimony that drug dealers often rented cars in other people's names and that they might accept unemployment checks and credit cards as payment for narcotics was not expert opinion testimony because it was based on his personal experience as an officer and did not require significant expertise. Hayes v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 745 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 1 2008).

80. In an alimony dispute, the evidence was legally insufficient to sustain the award because the only evidence presented as to the husband's income was testimony from the wife that he had not provided any information establishing that 25% of his gross monthly income would be less than 5 million; that did not provide any actual evidence that the husband had a total gross income of $ 20 million dollars or more from January 1, 2002 to September 21, 2006. The wife acknowledged on appeal that she was "not privy to the husband's personal income information," and admitted that she failed to come forward with information regarding the husband's gross income. Sembritzky v. Shanks, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9754 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 8 2008).

81. Trial court erred in overruling the company's objections to the affidavit of the owners' attorney and to the attached exhibits; the attorney was a witness in this regard and his testimony did not fall within any of the five exceptions enumerated in Tex. Disciplinary R. Prof. Conduct 3.08, the attorney was an inappropriate person to present any facts as to the question at issue, but even if the trial court found that one of the Rule 3.08 exceptions applied to the attorney, the affidavit still failed because it contained hearsay and conclusory remarks and failed to prove his personal knowledge. Southtex 66 Pipeline Co. v. Spoor, 238 S.W.3d 538, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8352, 168 Oil & Gas Rep. 68 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

82. Attorney's affidavit concerning the status of a pipeline company with the Railroad Commission contained inadmissible hearsay, was conclusory, and failed to prove the attorney's personal knowledge; nothing in the affidavit showed that the attorney was qualified to explain the contents of a Railroad Commission document, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602 and the attorney's reference to unnamed employees did not correct the fatal flaws in the affidavit and was inadmissible as hearsay under Tex. R. Evid. 801. Southtex 66 Pipeline Co. v. Spoor, 238 S.W.3d 538, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8352, 168 Oil & Gas Rep. 68 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

83. In a juvenile delinquency proceeding arising from assaults committed against a former girlfriend, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding testimony regarding the former girlfriend's alleged assaults on specific individuals and her reputation for violence; moreover, Tex. R. Evid. 602 barred testimony from a witness who lacked personal knowledge of the former girlfriend's conduct. In re C.R.G., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7572 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 20 2007).

84. Evidence was sufficient to show that a rungu was a club and prohibited weapon for purposes of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 46.01(1) and thus the court affirmed defendant's conviction under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 46.02; the State presented testimony showing that the rungu was a throwing instrument used for hunting and killing and rendering animals unconscious, and from this, the trial court could have reasonably found that the rungu functioned as a weapon or club and was specially designed, made, or adapted for the purpose of inflicting serious injury; that the testimony showed that the rungu was used in Africa for hunting and killing animals and not humans was of no consequence because the trial court could have inferred that the 18-inch throwing rungu that could kill or injure animals was one also specially designed for the purpose of injuring or killing a person, and the court rejected defendant's claim that the witness's testimony on the rungu was insufficient because it was based on hearsay and not personal knowledge, as the court considered all evidence in its sufficiency review. Warr v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5675 (Tex. App. Dallas July 19 2007).

85. Other than citing generally to case law concerning the standard for reviewing rulings on the admissibility of evidence and Tex. R. Evid. 602 and Tex. R. Evid. 802 concerning lack of personal knowledge and hearsay, defendant, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h), provided no substantive legal analysis, argument, or authority to support his contention that the trial court erred in overruling his objections, and thus the point was inadequately briefed and presented nothing for review. Warr v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5675 (Tex. App. Dallas July 19 2007).

86. Where defendant was charged with aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child, defendant objected to testimony from an expert witness concerning whether the victim exhibited behaviors that were consistent which sexual abuse; the trial court overruled defendant's objection based on Tex. R. Evid. 602 for lack of personal knowledge; the expert spoke in generalities and never claimed that child complainants in sexual abuse cases always tell the truth. Ficarro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3166 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 26 2007).

87. Nurse failed to satisfy the personal knowledge requirement under Tex. R. Evid. 602 in defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child younger than 14 years of age, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021; the nurse had no personal knowledge of the facts of the case, she did not personally observe any events involving the trial, she was not present during an examination of the trial, and she did not offer any opinions specifically related to the child, and thus the nurse's testimony was not admissible as a lay opinion under Tex. R. Evid. 701. Flores v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2818 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 12 2007).

88. Court overruled defendant's claim that a witness was not competent for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, when the witness was asked what he thought defendant meant by the statement to "keep quiet;" the witness observed defendant's anger toward the victim and heard defendant state he had a gun, and the witness received many phone calls from defendant around the time of the murder, and thus the witness's opinion was rationally based on familiarity with defendant and the witness's perception of events, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 701; the witness's opinion also met the second prong of Tex. R. Evid. 701 in that it was helpful to the jury's determination of a central fact at issue, whether defendant was guilty of murder, and even if the trial court erred in admitting this testimony, it was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2 because the record contained substantial evidence inculpating defendant in the murder. Jones v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2853 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 12 2007).

89. In a father's termination case, the mother and father had a relationship and the mother had the requisite personal knowledge under Tex. R. Evid. 602 to testify as to whether the father was complying with his service plan; the issue was relevant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 401, as to whether his parental rights were to be terminated and the admission of the mother's testimony was not error. In re G.C.F., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2680 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 5 2007).

90. In a possession of a prohibited substance in a correctional facility case, defendant alleged that he gave false testimony at his cell mate's trial because he was coerced by gang members, but his cell mate did not testify that he had personal knowledge of the gang members at the correctional facility actually following the gang's rules to protect other gang members from prosecution; therefore, the cell mate's opinion testimony was not based on his perceptions; rather, the cell mate's opinion testimony was based on his speculative conclusions regarding what the gang members would have done to protect him from prosecution; accordingly, Tex. R. Evid. 701 was not met by the cell mate's testimony, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining the State's objection to that testimony. Haggerty v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2130 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 20 2007).

91. In temporary injunction proceedings in a trade secrets case, evidence supporting an unclean hands affirmative defense was properly excluded because the witness lacked personal knowledge of bribery. Sharma v. Vinmar Int'l, Ltd., 231 S.W.3d 405, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8027 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

92. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, the State established that a witness learned of defendant's previous conviction from a detective, the witness did not testify to facts that were not within her personal knowledge, and while the witness stated that she was "thinking" she knew who the victim was, the witness did not state that she knew that fact; the witness's testimony about the details of the offense was admissible under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(a), and trial counsel did not render ineffective assistance by failing to object. McMullin v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11077 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 28 2006).

93. Except for the assertions that trust and estate assets had been commingled and that assets had not been safeguarded, the remaining assertions and conclusions in a sister's affidavit were not supported by underlying facts, for purposes of Tex. R. Civ. P. 166a and Tex. R. Evid. 602, and the record did not contain any documents, based on personal knowledge, that would have allowed the court to infer that certain transfers were in furtherance of a conspiracy against the sister; although the evidence indicated that two transactions occurred almost 10 months after the mother died, the court found no authority permitting the court to elevate the situation to an intentional breach of fiduciary duty in furtherance of a conspiracy, and the brother's evidence showed that his actions involving the trusts were ministerial acts undertaken upon instruction from the co-executors in their discretionary authority as such under Tex. Prop. Code Ann. § 112.052. Wilcox v. Wilcox, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11106 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 28 2006).

94. In a trial for driving while intoxicated, a trooper demonstrated that he had personal knowledge of the statements to which he testified, as required by Tex. R. Evid. 602, even though he could not remember the exact words in his conversation with defendant because he recalled overhearing defendant tell another trooper where she was coming from and he recalled having a conversation with defendant. Farmer v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 11132 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 28 2006).

95. Customer's subjective beliefs about a puddle's origin and its temporal longevity were not supported by any evidence and amounted to nothing more than speculation, insufficient to negate the summary judgment motion the restaurant filed; the court noted that under Tex. R. Evid. 602, personal knowledge was required for witness testimony. Sova v. Bill Miller Bar-B-Q Enters., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5673 (Tex. App. Austin June 30 2006).

96. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, regarding evidence of estimates of future medical care, a doctor based an opinion on information supplied by a person in the office, and this statement addressed the reasonable reliance requirement of Tex. R. Evid. 703 for the doctor's expert opinion on the cost of services for future surgeries; to the extent the admission of the evidence might have been error, because it was cumulative, it was harmless, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44.1. Nat'l Freight, Inc. v. Snyder, 191 S.W.3d 416, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2833 (Tex. App. Eastland 2006).

97. Defendant's convictions for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, possession of cocaine in an amount of less than one gram, and robbery, were appropriate because a police officer's testimony was admissible as the officer's opinion or inferences on impressions derived from perceptions with his contact with defendant; it was evident that the officer's testimony was his opinions or inferences based on impressions and conclusions derived from perceptions of what he saw, heard, and observed during his encounter with defendant. Williams v. State, 191 S.W.3d 242, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1687 (Tex. App. Austin 2006).

98. In a murder case, the prosecutor's affidavit regarding trial strategy was relevant and admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 401and Tex. R. Evid. 602 at a new trial hearing because it addressed the issue of effective assistance and included some statements made from personal knowledge; defendant did not seek to limit the scope of the affidavit pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 105(a). Shanklin v. State, 190 S.W.3d 154, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10675 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

99. Where a habitual marijuana user fell from a steel structure while working, he was permitted to give his lay opinion testimony that he had normal use of his mental and physical faculties at the time of his injury. The jury was entitled to believe the employee's testimony, together with the testimony about the work activities the employee successfully completed prior to his fall. Am. Interstate Ins. Co. v. Hinson, 172 S.W.3d 108, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6350 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

100. Given one witness's many years of experience as a probation officer working with sex offenders, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the witness, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 602, had sufficient personal knowledge of what was necessary to ensure that sex offenders generally did not re-offend; thus, the trial court did not err in admitting the witness's testimony, as contended by defendant on appeal from an indecency with a child conviction. Arizmendis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10567 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 22 2004).

101. In defendant's capital murder case, a court did not err by permitting a witness to speculate that defendant's accomplice could not have taken the money from the cash register where the witness based his testimony on his observations. He could see where both robbers were located in relationship to the complainant and the cash drawer, and based on those observations, the witness drew an inference that only defendant was in a position to reach the cash drawer and take the money. Webber v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3440 (Tex. App. El Paso Apr. 15 2004).

102. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 602, where a witness had no personal knowledge of debtors' motives with reference to a property transfer, a trial court did not err by excluding the witness testimony representing the debtors' motives. Nat'l Loan Investors, L.P. v. Robinson, 98 S.W.3d 781, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1648 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2003).

103. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 602, a witness may not testify to a matter unless he has personal knowledge of it. Nat'l Loan Investors, L.P. v. Robinson, 98 S.W.3d 781, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 1648 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2003).

104. As appellant's issue did not comport with his trial objection, error, if any, was not properly preserved; from the context of appellant's objection, one could have found that he was complaining of a Tex. R. Evid. 602 violation, instead of Tex. R. Evid. 701 as argued on appeal. Boyd v. State, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 8661 (Tex. App. Tyler Aug. 22 2001).

105. Court did not err in admitting the alleged victim's testimony that when she came home from work, defendant was hyper like he had used drugs, because the alleged victim had personal knowledge of the matter, both from her senses and her experience. Lewis v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1837, 2014 WL 644812 (Tex. App. El Paso Feb. 19 2014).

Real Property Law : Landlord & Tenant : Landlord's Remedies & Rights : Eviction Actions

106. County court erred by awarding lost rents to a premises owner under Tex. R. Civ. P. 752 in its two forcible detainer suits against the owner of two businesses where the evidence was legally insufficient to prove that the business owner occupied the premises during the pendency of his justice court appeal because: (1) the premises owner's proof that the business owner was sent, and signed for, letters at the premises before suit was filed in the justice court was insufficient, without more, to establish his occupation of the premises after judgment was rendered in the justice court; (2) an assertion by the premises owner's representative that the business owner did not vacate the premises was nothing but a bare conclusion without any factual basis and did not prove occupation, as the representative did not know whether either business had been open or whether anybody occupied the premises; and (3) statements made by the business owner's counsel during trial were not so clear and unequivocal as to constitute judicial admissions of occupancy, and the statements did not relieve the premises owner of its burden to prove occupancy to recover lost rents. Salaymeh v. Plaza Centro, LLC, 264 S.W.3d 431, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7174 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

Real Property Law : Landlord & Tenant : Landlord's Remedies & Rights : Rent Recovery

107. County court erred by awarding lost rents to a premises owner under Tex. R. Civ. P. 752 in its two forcible detainer suits against the owner of two businesses where the evidence was legally insufficient to prove that the business owner occupied the premises during the pendency of his justice court appeal because: (1) the premises owner's proof that the business owner was sent, and signed for, letters at the premises before suit was filed in the justice court was insufficient, without more, to establish his occupation of the premises after judgment was rendered in the justice court; (2) an assertion by the premises owner's representative that the business owner did not vacate the premises was nothing but a bare conclusion without any factual basis and did not prove occupation, as the representative did not know whether either business had been open or whether anybody occupied the premises; and (3) statements made by the business owner's counsel during trial were not so clear and unequivocal as to constitute judicial admissions of occupancy, and the statements did not relieve the premises owner of its burden to prove occupancy to recover lost rents. Salaymeh v. Plaza Centro, LLC, 264 S.W.3d 431, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 7174 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2008).

Real Property Law : Purchase & Sale : Contracts of Sale : Enforceability : Fraud & Misrepresentation

108. With respect to the case underlying a legal malpractice action, former clients failed to prove that a real estate agent made any misrepresentation or omission in connection with the sale of a home as required by Tex. Bus. & Com. Code. Ann. § 27.01(1) as the seller's disclosure notice was not admitted into evidence and was not completed by the agent, the attorney had no personal knowledge of the facts necessary to prove the clients' claims, and a statement by one of the clients that she felt the agent made a false representation to her was merely conclusory. Webb v. Stockford, 331 S.W.3d 169, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 109 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 10 2011).

Torts : Business Torts : Commercial Interference : Contracts : General Overview

109. In an action arising from breach of an agreement to purchase a residence, and in which the buyers' then attorney filed a lis pendens on the residence, the seller failed to show as a matter of law that the constructive lien language in a letter by the buyers' then attorney was a cause in fact of a third party's termination of its contract with the seller, where the testimonies of the seller and his real estate agent could not serve as basis for the seller's tortious interference with contract cause of action against the buyers because both the seller and his real estate agent testified that they had no personal knowledge of the reason the third party cancelled its contract with the seller. The third party's termination letter conclusively established that it cancelled the contract because the seller failed to remove the lis pendens, and the third party's actions were a natural and logical result of a lis pendens filing. Glenn v. Pack, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 390, 2011 WL 167254 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 13 2011).

Workers' Compensation & SSDI : Compensability : Injuries : Intoxication

1. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by failing to exclude the patient's depositions under Tex. R. Evid. 603 because appellants attached the entirety of the two depositions and each reflected that the patient was sworn prior to testifying. Stone v. Coronado, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4573, 2012 WL 2076831 (Tex. App. Austin June 6 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

2. Petitioner waived his complaints about the alleged unsworn testimony when he did not object during the hearing, because the record did not reflect that the witnesses were sworn prior to the hearing, and a party waived the right to have a witness sworn when he failed to object to unsworn testimony before the close of the trial. Dellatorre v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1823, 2012 WL 759051 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 7 2012).

3. In a custody modification proceeding, the court did not err in excluding the child's recorded statement because the transcription of the statement reflected that the father's attorney began questioning the child without any oath or admonishments being given; nothing in the transcription demonstrated that any of the attorneys impressed upon the child the duty to be truthful. Nichol v. Nichol, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 492, 2014 WL 199652 (Tex. App. Amarillo Jan. 15 2014).

4. Trial court did not err by admitting the testimony of a witness because, although he expressed confusion and stated he was not prepared to tell the truth when he was sworn in, after speaking to appointed counsel the witness affirmatively stated that he would tell the truth to the best of his knowledge and throughout his testimony expressed concern about the consequences of lying, Nash v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10452 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 20 2013).

5. Complainant understood the oath because it was signed to her through the interpreter and was administered in a form calculated to awaken her conscience and impress her mind with the duty to do so, Tex. R. Evid. 603, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in determining that complainant was properly sworn in, in accordance with Tex. R. Evid. 603; prior to any actual testimony by the complainant, the interpreter received an oath in accordance with Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.31(e) and Tex. R. Evid. 604. Martinez v. Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Motions for New Trial

1. New trial could not be granted based on the trial court's recollection of an informal postverdict chat with jurors. The reviewing court was not prepared to hold that Tex. R. Evid. 605 barred a trial judge from testifying at a subsequent new trial hearing but observed without deciding that an attempt to tender a trial judge's affidavit or testimony at a new trial hearing could result in the State raising any number of objections, including violation of Tex. R. Evid. 605. State v. Krueger, 179 S.W.3d 663, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8899 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Briefs

2. Under Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(h), defendant waived a complaint that the trial court testified as a witness in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 605; although defendant cited the rule, defendant failed to identify a specific statement of fact and to show how it was the functional equivalent of witness testimony. Mudili v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6514 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 13 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

3. Even though the trial court erred by admitting into evidence a temporary injunction the trial court judge had signed during defendant's civil trial, the error was harmless because the evidence against defendant was overwhelming and no mention was made that the judge had signed the indictment or was any way involved in the civil trial; there was nothing in the record to indicate that the injunction was published to the jury or that it was taken into the jury room during deliberations. Marriott v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5804, 2010 WL 2869781 (Tex. App. Waco July 21 2010).

Evidence : Competency : Judges

4. Trial court did not err in admitting testimony that the court had temporarily modified a divorce decree to give a father custody because, inter alia, admitting the testimony was not tantamount to admitting the temporary orders, and the jury's finding that the father should have permanent custody did not turn on any evidence indicating the trial court had temporarily modified custody prior to trial. In the Interest of A.D., 474 S.W.3d 715, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4860, 2014 WL 1800082 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 6 2014).

5. Trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 605 by instructing the jury that there would be no alternatives other than termination of parental rights before the jury as the statement did not convey factual information not in evidence or seek to rebut any evidence adduced at trial. Nor did the statement violate Tex. R. Civ. P. 277 as it did not indicate the judge's opinion concerning a matter to be determined by the jury and it did not tell the jurors that they were required to terminate but rather that termination was the only alternative that was being tried. In the Interest of C.C.K., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1240, 2013 WL 452163 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 7 2013).

6. Even if a trial court erred in a termination of parental rights proceeding in admitting the trial court's previous emergency order for protection, the error was harmless; the record contained sufficient evidence from which the jury could have found endangerment by the parents to support the termination findings. In re S.J.T.B., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9445, 2012 WL 5519208 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 15 2012).

7. Admission of a court order with specific negative findings towards the mother from the trial judge did not constitute testimony of the judge as a witness in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 605 because the mother failed to show that she was prejudiced by the admission of the order, as the jury's findings were supported by other ample evidence in the record, the Department of Family and Protective Services did not point out the findings to the jury, and it did not base any of its arguments on the trial court's findings. In re A.T.K., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8162, 2012 WL 4450361 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 27 2012).

8. Trial judge did not improperly testify in support of the authenticity of a compact disc during defendant's sentencing hearing because the judge merely recounted what the judge had heard on the recording without injecting any new facts into the proceeding. Lawrence v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2971, 2011 WL 1494035 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 20 2011).

9. Under Tex. R. Evid. 605, the trial court correctly sustained the State's objection to the judge testifying during the trial with regard to his prior representation of a defendant in a case involving the same victim. Teczar v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2919, 2011 WL 1743756 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 15 2011).

10. There is a significant distinction between a trial judge testifying as a fact witness during a trial and a trial judge recalling, at a motion for new trial hearing, his own internal thought processes; under the circumstances in this case, the court did not construe the trial judge's remarks at the new trial hearing to be testimony prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 605, given that the remarks did not seek to rebut any evidence adduced at the hearing by the State and the accuracy of the judge's account of how he had arrived at the initial punishment decision was undisputed. State v. Stewart, 282 S.W.3d 729, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 2597 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 15 2009).

11. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child case, the trial judge did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 605 when he questioned the child as the complained-of questioning served a judicial function in that it allowed the trial court to determine the competency of the child and it was not a situation where the judge stepped down to testify. Bradshaw v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7879 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2006).

12. Tex. R. Evid. 605 was not violated because a party's application for turnover of interpleaded funds and an unsigned order prepared by the party for the trial judge's signature were not the functional equivalent of testimony by the judge. Triumph Trucking, Inc. v. Southern Corporate Ins. Managers, Inc., 226 S.W.3d 466, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7033 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

13. The language in trial court orders and the admission thereof, which the mother claimed violated Tex. R. Evid. 605, did not amount to harmful error requiring reversal under Tex. R. App. P. 44.1(a); the jury found that the mother's rights were to be terminated under Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 161.001, and that the foster family was to be appointed permanent managing conservator, the findings in the exhibits were supported by other evidence and were not pointed out to the jury, and the court found that the error did not result in an improper judgment. In re P.D.A., 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2179 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 23 2006).

14. Trial judge did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 605 in the mother's child custody modification proceeding because the judge did not testify as a witness at the trial. The mother failed to preserve her claims of error as she did not object at trial as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 and Tex. R. Evid. 103, and asking witnesses questions directly from the bench is appropriate, especially in family law cases and bench trials. Kogel v. Robertson, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6684 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 19 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10028 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 2, 2005).

15. No violation of Tex. R. Evid. 605 or Tex. Const. art. V, § 11, was shown because defendant did not contend that the trial judge had any personal interest in his case, that he was related to any of the parties or attorneys in the case, or that he had previously served as counsel in the case, and the trial judge did not "step down from the bench" and testify from the witness stand. Roberts v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 107 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 5 2005).

16. Because defendant did not contend at trial that the admission of the judgment violated Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.05, he had not preserved the issue for appellate review; however, defendant's claims under Tex. R. Evid. 605 and Tex. Const. art. V, § 11 were reviewed on appeal because they could be raised for the first time on appeal. Roberts v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 107 (Tex. App. Waco Jan. 5 2005).

17. Trial court properly denied an inmate habeas corpus relief; subsequent orders were intended to supplement, not supersede, the first order extending community supervision under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 42.12, and the court rejected the inmate's claim that the trial court violated Tex. R. Evid. 605 because the trial court was entitled to take judicial notice of its own orders in the case and thus the trial court's statements were not improper. Ex parte Streater, 154 S.W.3d 216, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11373 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2004).

18. It was error for a trial court to admit his factual findings that children were in physical danger in a later hearing to terminate parental rights to the children. The factual findings should have been redacted so that the jury could draw its own conclusions. In re M.S., 115 S.W.3d 534, 2003 Tex. LEXIS 108, 46 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 999 (Tex. 2003).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutor

19. Under Tex. R. Evid. 605, a judge's testimony from a recusal hearing should not have been admitted into evidence, but defendant could not complain on appeal regarding its admission because defendant not only failed to object to the testimony but also requested its admission twice. Franks v. State, 90 S.W.3d 771, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 5119 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Judicial Intervention in Trials : Comments by Judges

20. Defendant's brief cited no authority to support the claim that the failure to include an instruction that a person was a party/co-conspirator or an accomplice was a comment on the weight of the evidence, and it is not apparent how a trial court's failure to submit an instruction can express anything to the jury, let alone an opinion on the weight of the evidence, and thus this issue afforded no basis for relief. Burton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5000 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 28 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Weight & Sufficiency

21. Trial court did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 605 by instructing the jury that there would be no alternatives other than termination of parental rights before the jury as the statement did not convey factual information not in evidence or seek to rebut any evidence adduced at trial. Nor did the statement violate Tex. R. Civ. P. 277 as it did not indicate the judge's opinion concerning a matter to be determined by the jury and it did not tell the jurors that they were required to terminate but rather that termination was the only alternative that was being tried. In the Interest of C.C.K., 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1240, 2013 WL 452163 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 7 2013).

Evidence : Testimony : General Overview

22. Trial judge's statement was not testimony because he did not testify as to disputed facts but rather commented on the mother's behavior during the trial. In re A.L.W., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9290 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 8 2012).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Judicial Interrogation

23. In child custody and support enforcement proceedings, the mother's failure to object to the trial court's questioning waived the issue under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 and Tex. R. Evid. 103; also, the questioning did not deny the mother her federal or state constitutional rights to a fair trial or violate Tex. R. Evid. 605 because the judge did not testify as a witness at the trial and the questions were reasonable and fact-based. Kogel v. Robertson, 2005

Tex. App. LEXIS 10028 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 2 2005).

24. Trial judge did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 605 in the mother's child custody modification proceeding because the judge did not testify as a witness at the trial. The mother failed to preserve her claims of error as she did not object at trial as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1 and Tex. R. Evid. 103, and asking witnesses questions directly from the bench is appropriate, especially in family law cases and bench trials. Kogel v. Robertson, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6684 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 19 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10028 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 2, 2005).

Family Law : Child Custody : Procedures

25. Trial court did not err in admitting testimony that the court had temporarily modified a divorce decree to give a father custody because, inter alia, admitting the testimony was not tantamount to admitting the temporary orders, and the jury's finding that the father should have permanent custody did not turn on any evidence indicating the trial court had temporarily modified custody prior to trial. In the Interest of A.D., 474 S.W.3d 715, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4860, 2014 WL 1800082 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 6 2014).

Family Law : Parental Duties & Rights : Termination of Rights : Involuntary Termination : Procedure

26. Admission of a court order with specific negative findings towards the mother from the trial judge did not constitute testimony of the judge as a witness in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 605 because the mother failed to show that she was prejudiced by the admission of the order, as the jury's findings were supported by other ample evidence in the record, the Department of Family and Protective Services did not point out the findings to the jury, and it did not base any of its arguments on the trial court's findings. In re A.T.K., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8162, 2012 WL 4450361 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 27 2012).

Legal Ethics : Judicial Conduct

27. Trial judge's statement was not testimony because he did not testify as to disputed facts but rather commented on the mother's behavior during the trial. In re A.L.W., 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9290 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 8 2012).

Tex. Evid. R. 606

THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH August 16, 2020

Rule 606 Juror's Competency as a Witness

(a) At the Trial.--A juror may not testify as a witness before the other jurors at the trial. If a juror is called to testify, the court must give a party an opportunity to object outside the jury's presence.

(b) During an Inquiry into the Validity of a Verdict or Indictment.

(1) Prohibited Testimony or Other Evidence.--During an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment, a juror may not testify about any statement made or incident that occurred during the jury's deliberations; the effect of anything on that juror's or another juror's vote; or any juror's mental processes concerning the verdict or indictment. The court may not receive a juror's affidavit or evidence of a juror's statement on these matters.

(2) Exceptions.--A juror may testify:

(A)about whether an outside influence was improperly brought to bear on any juror; or

(B)to rebut a claim that the juror was not qualified to serve.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Discovery : Relevance

1. Trial court abused its discretion by entirely depriving a manufacturer the opportunity to conduct discovery on an injured party's claim for breach of a settlement agreement where the manufacturer contended that jurors were subjected to outside influence; discovery should be conformed to involve only those matters permitted by Tex. R. Civ. P. 327 and Tex. R. Evid. 606. Ford Motor Co. v. Castillo, 279 S.W.3d 656, 2009 Tex. LEXIS 121, 52 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 570 (Tex. 2009).

Civil Procedure : Trials : Jury Trials : Jurors : Misconduct

2. Debtor failed to present competent, admissible evidence of jury misconduct where the appellate court could not conclude that the juror's alleged analysis of the debtor's properly admitted credit report, based on the juror's own experience or expertise, was misconduct resulting from an outside influence. Barnes v. Univ. Fed. Credit Union, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4871, 80 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. 2d (CBC) 636 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 18 2013).

3. Competent, admissible evidence of jury misconduct was not provided by affidavits from two dissenting jurors, stating that (1) a juror switched her vote to conclude deliberations more quickly after being informed of a death in the family; (2) another juror admitted that he read on the internet the appellate decision concerning a previous trial in the same matter; and (3) a third juror stated that he knew a party had a lot of money. These matters could be viewed as describing only matters on the minds of the individual jurors during deliberations. Editorial Caballero, S.A. de C.V. v. Playboy Enters., 359 S.W.3d 318, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 298 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 12 2012).

4. No evidentiary hearing was required where affidavits from dissenting jurors did not aver admissible evidence of jury misconduct. Editorial Caballero, S.A. de C.V. v. Playboy Enters., 359 S.W.3d 318, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 298 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 12 2012).

5. Juror's affidavit filed in a case where the juvenile was found delinquent for committing an aggravated assault could not support the juvenile's motion for a new trial based on juror misconduct and, thus, the trial court was not required to hold a hearing on that motion. The affidavit involved matters that occurred during jury deliberations and did not involve the required allegation of outside influence or a juror's qualification, which meant that the affidavit was not competent to support a motion for a new trial under Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). In re A.C., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7340, 2011 WL 3925516 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 8 2011).

6. Evidence presented in a medical malpractice action about discussions by certain jurors prior to formal deliberations did not establish jury misconduct under Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) where, ultimately, the trial court found that the evidence failed to establish that, if any misconduct occurred, (1) it had any material effect on the jury verdict and (2) it resulted in injury to plaintiffs; because the trial court did not make a specific finding that jury misconduct occurred prior to deliberations, the appellate court assumed that the trial court made an implied finding in that regard, and while there was conflicting testimony, there was ample evidence of record to support the trial court's findings, both express and implied. Knight v. E. Tex. Med. Ctr., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 981 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 9 2007).

Civil Procedure : Trials : Jury Trials : Jury Deliberations

7. Where the juror affidavits stated that the trial judge entered the jurors' room right after lunch before they had restarted deliberations and again in the afternoon, stopping their deliberations, the trial court's communications to the jury did not occur during deliberations, and a reviewing court could consider the jurors' testimony on the trial court's statements at those times. In re Taylor Morrison of Tex., Inc., 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1416 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 6 2014).

8. Trial court's judgment granting a partial mistrial was a clear abuse of discretion because there was no jury verdict on any claims, as the communications from the trial judge that the jury should skip a question and the communications stopping their deliberations before they had concluded resulted in an incomplete verdict; the instruction to skip the question did not conform to the jury charge instructions, and the harm was that the jurors did not complete their deliberations, vote on some questions, or render a verdict on all questions. In re Taylor Morrison of Tex., Inc., 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1416 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 6 2014).

9. Finding that the individual should take nothing in her action against the company alleging that the company caused her injuries from chemical exposure was appropriate where she failed to prove the existence of actual "outside influence" in regard to the jury as required by Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). House v. Ethyl Corp., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3859 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 19 2005).

10. In a manufacturing defect case brought against a tire company, the court rejected the tire company's contention that it was entitled to a new trial because of material jury misconduct and that the trial court erred in sustaining the plaintiffs' objection to juror affidavits concerning a juror who consulted a dictionary to define negligence; the juror's conduct of copying a dictionary definition and sharing it with other jurors did not constitute an outside influence. While the tire company characterized the juror's act of copying the definition as occurring outside formal jury deliberations, the alleged jury misconduct was in reality the act of sharing that definition with other jurors and its consideration during the course of their deliberations; therefore, the proffered affidavits clearly involved juror statements about matters occurring during their deliberations, which was precluded under Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Cooper Tire & Rubber Co. v. Mendez, 155 S.W.3d 382, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9112 (Tex. App. El Paso 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 204 S.W.3d 797, 2006 Tex. LEXIS 555 (Tex. 2006).

Civil Procedure : Trials : Jury Trials : Jury Instructions : General Overview

11. Trial court did not misdirect a jury as a matter of law and did not commit a material error calculated to injure defendant's rights by failing to give a defensive jury instruction. State v. Garcia, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 5750 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 24 2000).

12. Trial court's grant of defendant's motion for a new trial on the grounds that a jury rendered its verdict by a manner other than the fair expression of the jurors was vacated because the State's appeal to the community, that merely encouraged moral responsibility to consider the evidence, was not improper. State v. Garcia, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 5750 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 24 2000).

Civil Procedure : Trials : Jury Trials : Polling of Jury

13. No abuse of discretion occurred when the trial court sent the jury back to the jury room after it had reached a verdict that was signed by the jury foreman only but, during polling, two of the jurors answered, "No," when asked whether the verdict was theirs. There was no merit to the argument under Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) that the trial court should have granted a new trial based on evidence obtained after the verdict was received and accepted; the argument was that the jury was confused during deliberations, not that there was any outside influence. Lincoln v. Clark Freight Lines, Inc., 285 S.W.3d 79, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1037 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 12 2009).

Civil Procedure : Judgments : Relief From Judgment : Motions for New Trials

14. Juror's affidavit filed in a case where the juvenile was found delinquent for committing an aggravated assault could not support the juvenile's motion for a new trial based on juror misconduct and, thus, the trial court was not required to hold a hearing on that motion. The affidavit involved matters that occurred during jury deliberations and did not involve the required allegation of outside influence or a juror's qualification, which meant that the affidavit was not competent to support a motion for a new trial under Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). In re A.C., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7340, 2011 WL 3925516 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 8 2011).

15. Trial court's grant of defendant's motion for a new trial on the grounds that a jury rendered its verdict by a manner other than the fair expression of the jurors was vacated because the State's appeal to the community, that merely encouraged moral responsibility to consider the evidence, was not improper. State v. Garcia, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 5750 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 24 2000).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review

16. In a case where a mother was seeking to regain property from her daughter, a claim that Tex. R. Civ. P. 327b and Tex. R. Evid. 606 violated due process and equal protection due to a limitation on juror questioning was waived because it was not presented to a trial court. Delahoussaye v. Kana, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 13 2008).

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : General Overview

17. Evidence presented in a medical malpractice action about discussions by certain jurors prior to formal deliberations did not establish jury misconduct under Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) where, ultimately, the trial court found that the evidence failed to establish that, if any misconduct occurred, (1) it had any material effect on the jury verdict and (2) it resulted in injury to plaintiffs; because the trial court did not make a specific finding that jury misconduct occurred prior to deliberations, the appellate court assumed that the trial court made an implied finding in that regard, and while there was conflicting testimony, there was ample evidence of record to support the trial court's findings, both express and implied. Constitutional Law : Congressional Duties & Powers : Ex Post Facto Clause & Bills of Attainder

19. In denying defendant's motion for a new murder trial based on a juror's affidavit indicating he was bothered by defendant's failure to testify, the trial court did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause of Tex. Const. art. I, § 16 because it applied the current version of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) which precluded the juror's testimony about deliberations. Procedural rules controlled pending litigation from their effective date, and defendant did not have a vested right to a new trial based on former Tex. R. Crim. Evid. 606(b), which allowed a juror to testify about internal and external influences on the verdict. Deleon v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6105 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 16 2013).

Constitutional Law : The Judiciary : Case or Controversy : Constitutionality of Legislation : General Overview

20. Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) was not unconstitutional as applied to defendant because although she was prohibited from using juror affidavits to show significant harm as the result of the alleged failure of jurors to disclose bias, she was entitled to use non-juror testimony to show misconduct; therefore, defendant was not prevented from presenting evidence that might otherwise have shown she suffered significant harm as the result of the service of the suspect jurors. White v. State, 181 S.W.3d 514, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10449 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005), aff'd, 225 S.W.3d 571, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 693 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

21. In a case where a mother was seeking to regain property from her daughter, a claim that Tex. R. Civ. P. 327b and Tex. R. App. LEXIS 8561 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 13 2008).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Jury Trial

22. Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), which limits juror testimony in post-trial proceedings, is constitutional under both the state and federal constitutions guaranteeing a fair and impartial trial. Rule 606(b) strikes an appropriate balance and is intended to encourage open discussion among jurors during deliberations and to promote the finality of judgments while protecting jurors from harassment by unhappy litigants seeking grounds for a new trial. Hicks v. State, 15 S.W.3d 626, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 2245 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2000).

23. Juror's affidavit attached to defendant's motion for new trial that attacked jury deliberations and stated that she still had reasonable doubt as to defendant's guilt was properly ruled inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). While Rule 606(b) makes proving jury misconduct in criminal trials more difficult, it does not conflict or otherwise deprive an appellant of a substantive right under Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(f), (g), which allows proof of jury misdirection and jury misconduct as grounds for a new trial. Hicks v. State, 15 S.W.3d 626, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 2245 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2000).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : General Overview

24. Following a trial for driving while intoxicated, defendant was not entitled to a new trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21, even though there was a discussion during jury deliberations in which one juror, a bartender, described the contents of a "Long Island Ice Tea"; there was no evidence that defendant drank a "Long Island Ice Tea," and it appeared that the jurors were curious about the drink and that the juror-bartender's statement was a passing remark; although a juror did briefly testify that the remark was persuasive with regard to the guilty verdict, that testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Subpoenas : General Overview

25. Trial court did not err in refusing defendant's request to present jurors as live witnesses at a hearing on his motion for new trial, and thus did not deny him an adequate record on appeal, because the trial court recognized defendant's right to have a hearing on his motion for new trial, but determined the issue could be decided by affidavits pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 21.7. Because the trial court began a second hearing on defendant's motion for new trial by asking if defense counsel had subpoenaed the jurors, whom defendant claimed had been prejudiced and had been uncooperative with defense counsel's investigation, it appeared that defense counsel missed an opportunity to present jurors as witnesses if any could support defendant's claims, and it also appeared that counsel did nothing further in the 10 days that the trial court gave him to secure further evidence supporting his motion for rehearing. Young v. State, 177 S.W.3d 136, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 660 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : General Overview

26. Juror was prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) from providing any evidence on the impact of the trial court's Allen charge on the juror's deliberation; it did not constitute evidence of an outside influence because the charge occurred during a normal courtroom proceeding and was part of the jury's deliberative process. Franks v. State, 90 S.W.3d 771, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 5119 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Disqualification & Removal of Jurors : General Overview

27. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground that an unqualified juror served on his jury, as she had pleaded guilty to tampering with physical evidence and was on deferred adjudication community supervision in violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 35.16(a)(3), because defendant presented no evidence that he suffered significant harm directly attributable to the juror's service on the jury and her presence did not constitute an outside influence under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Sanchez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9984 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 16 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Jury Deliberations : General Overview

28. Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) was not unconstitutional as applied to defendant because although she was prohibited from using juror affidavits to show significant harm as the result of the alleged failure of jurors to disclose bias, she was entitled to use non-juror testimony to show misconduct; therefore, defendant was not prevented from presenting evidence that might otherwise have shown she suffered significant harm as the result of the service of the suspect jurors. White v. State, 181 S.W.3d 514, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10449 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005), aff'd, 225 S.W.3d 571, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 693 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

29. While failure to disclose bias is a form of juror misconduct that justifies a new trial under the appropriate circumstances, Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) required that proof of a juror's failure to disclose bias must come from some source other than a fellow juror's testimony about deliberations. White v. State, 181 S.W.3d 514, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10449 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005), aff'd, 225 S.W.3d 571, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 693 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

30. State habeas court's application of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) to bar testimony by the jurors concerning their internal discussion of parole law during deliberations was not contrary to, or an unreasonable application of, clearly established federal law, and therefore the inmate was properly denied habeas corpus relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254, because no clearly established United States Supreme Court authority held that a defendant was entitled to a new trial when one juror misstates the law of parole to other jurors during deliberations, nor did any Court precedent obligate a state court to admit testimony from jurors concerning their internal discussions about parole law during deliberations. In fact, the existing clearly established Court case law suggested the opposite. Salazar v. Dretke, 419 F.3d 384, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 15610 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1467, 164 L. Ed. 2d 252, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2081, 74 U.S.L.W. 3503 (U.S. 2006).

31. State habeas trial court effectively adjudicated an inmate's federal claim on the merits for federal habeas corpus purposes when it concluded that the state's invocation of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) left the inmate with no admissible evidence to support his due process claim and that the application of Rule 606(b) was constitutional under United States Supreme Court precedent. Salazar v. Dretke, 419 F.3d 384, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 15610 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1467, 164 L. Ed. 2d 252, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2081, 74 U.S.L.W. 3503 (U.S. 2006).

32. In a case in which there was no Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) objection, defendant was not entitled to a new trial because the jury did not improperly consider how the parole law would apply to defendant's situation. The jury discussed parole during deliberations of punishment. Two jurors' affidavits did not reveal any outside influence that was improperly brought to bear on any juror, and did not establish a misstatement of the law that was asserted as a fact by one professing to know the law that was relied upon by other jurors, who for that reason changed a vote to a harsher punishment. Further, defendant did not rebut the presumption that jurors followed the trial court's instructions on parole, and the charge given to the jury substantially followed the language in Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 4. Mata v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3679 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 12 2005).

33. Even if defendant had properly presented his motion for a new trial to the trial court, the motion was properly denied as defendant had included a juror affidavit in the motion that went to the issue of jury's deliberation that was prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Kerr v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1081 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 10 2005).

34. Bailiff made a statement to jurors during their deliberations explaining some of the laws involved in defendant's case in violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.22, but the jurors testified either that they had not heard the bailiff's statements or that his statements did not influence them in reaching their verdict. In considering the juror's testimony, which was permissible because defendant failed to object to the admission of their testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for new trial because the presumption of harm and injury to defendant was rebutted. Robinson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 759 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2005).

35. Trial court properly quashed a juror affidavit and denied a criminal defendant's motion for a new trial, where the affidavit asserted that some of the jurors convicted defendant for reasons other than guilt. The affidavit addressed only matters which the juror learned during jury deliberations; these matters clearly came from the other jurors and, as such, did not constitute the outside influences required for a motion under Tex. R. Evid. 606. Tinker v. State, 148 S.W.3d 666, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9406 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2004).

36. Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) does not conflict with Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(f); public policy demands that jury deliberations be kept private. Garcia v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7610 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 25 2004).

37. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's motion for new trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(f) because the affidavits and live testimony indicated that an "outside influence" was not brought to bear upon the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Even if a juror's explanation of anoxic brain injury had an impact on three other jurors in a capital murder trial, a juror's injection of his own personal experiences, knowledge, or expertise emanates from inside the jury. Garcia v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7610 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 25 2004).

38. Determining the juror's full effect on the outcome of the trial was precluded by Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), which prohibited jurors from testifying as to any matter or statement occurring during the jury's deliberations, or to the effect of anything on any juror's mind or emotions or mental processes, as influencing any juror's assent to or dissent from the verdict. State v. Garza, 143 S.W.3d 144, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4892 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

39. To constitute outside influence under Tex. R. Evid. 606, the influence must emanate from outside the jury and its deliberation; the coercive influence of one juror upon the rest of the panel does not constitute outside influence. Franks v. State, 90 S.W.3d 771, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 5119 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

40. Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), which limits juror testimony in post-trial proceedings, is constitutional under both the state and federal constitutions guaranteeing a fair and impartial trial. Rule 606(b) strikes an appropriate balance and is intended to encourage open discussion among jurors during deliberations and to promote the finality of judgments while protecting jurors from harassment by unhappy litigants seeking grounds for a new trial. Hicks v. State, 15 S.W.3d 626, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 2245 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2000).

41. Juror's affidavit attached to defendant's motion for new trial that attacked jury deliberations and stated that she still had reasonable doubt as to defendant's guilt was properly ruled inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). While Rule 606(b) makes proving jury misconduct in criminal trials more difficult, it does not conflict or otherwise deprive an appellant of a substantive right under Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(f), (g), which allows proof of jury misdirection and jury misconduct as grounds for a new trial. Hicks v. State, 15 S.W.3d 626, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 2245 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2000).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Jury Deliberations : Alternates

42. Although defendant argued that a trial court erred by permitting the two alternate jurors in his case to be present during deliberations, no violation of Tex. Const. art. V, § 13 or Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 33.01(a) could be found because there was no indication in the record that the alternate jurors voted on the verdict. Moreover, even if the trial court's practice could be found to have violated Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.22, defendant failed to show that he was harmed by the violation, and, contrary to his suggestion, requiring him to obtain information from jurors regarding whether the alternates participated in deliberations did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 606(b)'s prohibition against inquiring into jurors' mental processes during deliberations. Castillo v. State, 319 S.W.3d 966, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7473 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 10 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Jury Deliberations : Juror Misconduct

43. There was no jury misconduct when during voir dire a juror searched a website and found defendant's previous conviction for aggravated rape because the record did not contain any evidence or allegation that the juror's knowledge affected the jury's decision;the juror, who was the foreman, was not on the jury at the time he conducted the Internet search but was still a member of the venire; Tate v. State, 414 S.W.3d 260, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9603 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 1 2013).

44. Defendant was not entitled to have juror affidavits considered as evidence of juror misconduct under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) because the affidavits provided no evidence that the juror asking another how to vote asked anyone other than a fellow juror, and therefore, the trial court did not err by failing to consider them as evidence. Cox v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1858, 2009 WL 692606 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 18 2009).

45. Trial court correctly denied defendant's motion for new trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21, alleging juror misconduct, because the trial court followed the provisions of Tex. R. Evid. 606; there was no conflict between those two provisions. Sirois v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 24 2008).

46. In an aggravated assault of a peace officer case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for new trial as defendant presented no admissible evidence to support his allegation of juror misconduct during deliberations; defendant's affidavit in support of his motion in which a juror discussed the deliberations was exactly the type of information that was excluded by Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Dunklin v. State, 194 S.W.3d 14, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3596 (Tex. App. Tyler 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Jury Deliberations : Materials Allowed in Jury Room

47. It was unnecessary to decide whether a jury foreman's Bible reading was an outside influence under Tex. R. Evid. 606 because the record presented no reasonable grounds that the Bible reading affected the jury's verdict; the brief reading of Biblical scripture, which was essentially an admonishment to follow the law, occurred near the beginning of jury deliberations, and the jurors' affidavits clearly indicated that the scripture had no effect on their verdict rendered some hours later. Lucero v. State, 246 S.W.3d 86, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 219 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Jury Deliberations : Outside Influences

48. There was no jury misconduct when during voir dire a juror searched a website and found defendant's previous conviction for aggravated rape because the record did not contain any evidence or allegation that the juror's knowledge affected the jury's decision;the juror, who was the foreman, was not on the jury at the time he conducted the Internet search but was still a member of the venire; Tate v. State, 414 S.W.3d 260, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9603 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 1 2013).

49. Trial court abused its discretion by denying defendant's motion for new trial where the jury foreman in defendant's trial testified without objection, with no cross-examination, and against no controverting evidence that outside influences caused him to change his verdict to guilty despite his belief that the State had not proven its case beyond a reasonable doubt, in order to allow him to leave the jury room immediately. The jury foreman's testimony established without dispute that an outside influence caused him to vote differently than he otherwise would have, and the record showed that once he changed his vote, the verdict was unanimous, which raised a reasonable inference that he was the lone holdout for acquittal. Colyer v. State, 395 S.W.3d 277, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 436, 2013 WL 173772 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 17 2013).

50. Court did not abuse its discretion by failing to hold a hearing on the motion for new trial based upon newly discovered evidence or allegations of jury misconduct, because the motion did not establish that the failure to discover the evidence was not owing to a want of due diligence by defendant juvenile, and the juror's affidavit involved matters that occurred during jury deliberations and did not involve an outside influence or a juror's qualification to serve. In re A.C., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2580, 2011 WL 1326275 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 7 2011).

51. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's request for a hearing on his motion for new trial due to juror misconduct, because defendant's argument that he be afforded the opportunity to discover admissible evidence to impeach a jury verdict was a fishing expedition and an improper purpose of a new trial hearing, when the juror's affidavit or testimony would have been inadmissible at a new trial hearing since such evidence did not show an outside influence. Lee v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3526 (Tex. App. Tyler May 12 2010).

52. Where defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child, he was not entitled to a mistrial because defense counsel overheard one of the jurors talking on a cell phone in the men's restroom; the Court of Appeals of Texas erred by reversing his conviction. Both the court of appeals and defendant misinterpret the State's burden to rebut, specifically with regard to the issue of juror questioning; the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas held that the party alleging juror misconduct, not the State nor the court, should initiate juror questioning under Tex. R. Evid. 606. Ocon v. State, 284 S.W.3d 880, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 732 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

53. Defendant presented evidence that the jury did consider the application of parole law, and while ordinarily a juror's testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) because this did not amount to an outside influence, the State did not object to the admission of this evidence, making it admitted for all purposes; because there was evidence that the jury was inaccurately informed and misled by the charge that omitted Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, 4(a), the error caused some harm. Loun v. State, 273 S.W.3d 406, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8748 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2008).

54. Manslaughter defendant was not entitled to a new trial after a juror volunteered that the jurors experimented with the gun in evidence and tested the gun's operation, resulting in one juror's change of mind; the juror's statement was permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606, but, as relayed by defense counsel, it was too vague to demonstrate that any outside influence affected the juror or that the jurors did anything more than examine an admitted exhibit more closely so as to apply information learned at trial. Gahagan v. State, 242 S.W.3d 80, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7842 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

55. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant waived any error regarding an assault by a bystander because he failed to request from the trial court an instruction for the jury to disregard the assault; there was no evidence that the jury's verdict was influenced by the assault; defendant did not present any juror's affidavit as to how the incident may have affected the verdict, as would have been admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606. Alfaro v. State, 224 S.W.3d 426, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10463 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

56. Trial court did not err in overruling defendant's motion for new trial without a hearing where the affidavit signed by defendant's counsel was insufficient to raise the issue of jury misconduct under Tex. R. App. P. 21 because it did not contain averments constituting outside influence; furthermore, because the source of any allegedly improper information was a juror, the trial court could have determined there were no reasonable grounds to believe outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 606. Lawrence v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9344 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 26 2006).

57. Following a trial for driving while intoxicated, defendant was not entitled to a new trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21, even though there was a discussion during jury deliberations in which one juror, a bartender, described the contents of a "Long Island Ice Tea"; there was no evidence that defendant drank a "Long Island Ice Tea," and it appeared that the jurors were curious about the drink and that the juror-bartender's statement was a passing remark; although a juror did briefly testify that the remark was persuasive with regard to the guilty verdict, that testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606. Taylor v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5148 (Tex. App. Austin June 16 2006).

58. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a new trial on his claim that a juror brought with her into the jury room materials that constituted an improper "outside influence" under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) where defendant failed to show that "other evidence" was "received" by the jury because the jurors who testified agreed that none of the jurors looked at or considered any printed material allegedly offered by the juror at issue; furthermore, defendant had not cited any evidence from the record to make the showing required by Tex. R. App. P. 21 that other testimony or other evidence was actually received by the jury, and even had the jury received the printed material from the juror and considered it, the information would not constitute an outside influence under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) because it was gathered and shared by a juror. Mathis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4645 (Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Jury Deliberations : Privacy of Deliberations

59. Juror's affidavit that another juror stated during deliberations in defendant's sexual assault of a child punishment trial that she was a victim of child sexual assault by her father was not admissible to show that counsel was ineffective in failing to uncover this fact during voir dire. Ex Parte Parra, 420 S.W.3d 821, 2013 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1316 (Tex. Crim. App. Sept. 18 2013).

60. Court did not abuse its discretion by failing to hold a hearing on the motion for new trial based upon newly discovered evidence or allegations of jury misconduct, because the motion did not establish that the failure to discover the evidence was not owing to a want of due diligence by defendant juvenile, and the juror's affidavit involved matters that occurred during jury deliberations and did not involve an outside influence or a juror's qualification to serve. In re A.C., 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2580, 2011 WL 1326275 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 7 2011).

61. Although defendant argued that a trial court erred by permitting the two alternate jurors in his case to be present during deliberations, no violation of Tex. Const. art. V, § 13 or Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 33.01(a) could be found because there was no indication in the record that the alternate jurors voted on the verdict. Moreover, even if the trial court's practice could be found to have violated Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.22, defendant failed to show that he was harmed by the violation, and, contrary to his suggestion, requiring him to obtain information from jurors regarding whether the alternates participated in deliberations did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 606(b)'s prohibition against inquiring into jurors' mental processes during deliberations. Castillo v. State, 319 S.W.3d 966, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7473 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 10 2010).

62. State death row inmate's Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were not violated when the jury considered evidence that he might be paroled during sentencing deliberations, even though an investigator hired during state postconviction proceedings interviewed jury members and found that some jurors' erroneous belief that he might be paroled after a short period of time and be a danger to the community influenced their death verdict; state habeas court's refusal to consider this evidence and its conclusion that Tex. R. of Evid. 606 prohibited it from considering juror testimony except to show an improper outside influence did not violate clearly established federal law or deny the inmate a fair trial and, therefore, federal habeas corpus relief was properly denied. Parr v. Quarterman, 472 F.3d 245, 2006 U.S. App. LEXIS 29998 (5th Cir. Tex. 2006).

63. Testimony from jurors could be considered under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) because the State failed to raise an objection in the trial court that a juror could not testify about deliberations. Latham v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6521 (Tex. App. Tyler July 26 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Voir Dire : Questions to Venire Panel

64. Defendant was not entitled to a new trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21, even though she presented affidavits showing that a juror's son and the victim's half-brother were friends and that defendant did not know of the relationship; defense counsel did not ask whether the juror knew the half-brother, and therefore the juror did not fail to disclose that information. Marks v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10007 (Tex. App. Beaumont Nov. 15 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Closing Arguments : Inflammatory Statements

65. On a defendant's claim regarding a prosecutor's improper closing argument, the court considered testimony provided by a juror and referred to by defendant regarding the effect, if any, the prosecutor's comment had upon her mental processes since no one argued that the court could not consider it. Vasquez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 5164 (Tex. App. Amarillo June 10 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Fair Trial

66. In a case of indecency with a child, defendant's right to a fair trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(g) and the state and federal constitutions was not violated by a ruling that, under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), a juror could not testify about alleged misconduct in jury deliberations. McGehee v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10127 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 10 2004).

67. Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), which limits juror testimony in post-trial proceedings, is constitutional under both the state and federal constitutions guaranteeing a fair and impartial trial. Rule 606(b) strikes an appropriate balance and is intended to encourage open discussion among jurors during deliberations and to promote the finality of judgments while protecting jurors from harassment by unhappy litigants seeking grounds for a new trial. Hicks v. State, 15 S.W.3d 626, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 2245 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2000).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Limiting Instructions

68. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant waived any error regarding an assault by a bystander because he failed to request from the trial court an instruction for the jury to disregard the assault; there was no evidence that the jury's verdict was influenced by the assault; defendant did not present any juror's affidavit as to how the incident may have affected the verdict, as would have been admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606. Alfaro v. State, 224 S.W.3d 426, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10463 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Verdicts : Impeachment of Verdicts

69. In defendant's capital murder case, a juror's affidavit failed to establish that an outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror or that a juror was not qualified to serve; as such, the juror was barred from testifying about what happened during jury deliberations; the affidavit stated only that the juror felt "pressured" by other jurors to change her vote to guilty. Villegas v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1899 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 13 2008).

70. In a case of indecency with a child, defendant's right to a fair trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(g) and the state and federal constitutions was not violated by a ruling that, under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), a juror could not testify about alleged misconduct in jury deliberations. McGehee v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10127 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 10 2004).

71. Defendant could not challenge the validity of a guilty verdict with the affidavit of a juror that she voted not guilty and never changed her vote to guilty; a juror generally could not impeach her own verdict, and the content of the affidavit did not fall within either exception to Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) regarding matters of outside influence or claims that a juror was not qualified to serve. Washington v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1082 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 5 2004).

72. Defendant was convicted of murder; a juror's comments could not serve to impeach the verdict under Tex. R. Evid. 606, and the trial court had not improperly communicated with the juror in violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.27. Wood v. State, 87 S.W.3d 735, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 6091 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Corrections, Modifications & Reductions : General Overview

73. In a trial for child sexual assault, a probated sentence imposed by the jury was not subject to reform, even though 11 jurors averred that their intent was to impose a prison term followed by probation; the court declined to apply authority for changing a verdict where the expressed verdict was not the jury's agreed upon verdict, in part because the prior case was decided before the 1998 revision to Tex. R. Evid. 606; following revision, the rule prohibited inquiry into any matter or statement occurring during deliberations. State v. Dudley, 223 S.W.3d 717, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3328 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Postconviction Proceedings : Motions for New Trial

74. Court did not err by denying a new trial due to a juror's exit from the jury room and "agitated" outburst about supposed bullying because the jurors could not be queried about any matter or exchange that gave rise to the emotional outburst of the juror or the alleged misconduct during the jury's deliberations. Uballe v. State, 439 S.W.3d 380, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4874, 2014 WL 1829849 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 6 2014).

75. Trial court abused its discretion by denying defendant's motion for new trial where the jury foreman in defendant's trial testified without objection, with no cross-examination, and against no controverting evidence that outside influences caused him to change his verdict to guilty despite his belief that the State had not proven its case beyond a reasonable doubt, in order to allow him to leave the jury room immediately. The jury foreman's testimony established without dispute that an outside influence caused him to vote differently than he otherwise would have, and the record showed that once he changed his vote, the verdict was unanimous, which raised a reasonable inference that he was the lone holdout for acquittal. Colyer v. State, 395 S.W.3d 277, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 436, 2013 WL 173772 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 17 2013).

76. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a new trial because he presented no evidence to establish proof of a juror's failure to disclose bias from a source other than a fellow juror's testimony and therefore he could not prove that misconduct occurred. The only evidence presented was an affidavit and a letter, neither of which identified which juror failed to disclose material information. Mcmorris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10545, 2012 WL 6629770 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 19 2012).

77. Trial court correctly denied defendant's motion for new trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21, alleging juror misconduct, because the trial court followed the provisions of Tex. R. Evid. 606; there was no conflict between those two provisions. Sirois v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 3053 (Tex. App. Eastland Apr. 24 2008).

78. Defendant was not entitled to a new trial based on a juror's affidavit stating that the jury considered defendant's failure to testify and the effect of parole on defendant's sentence; because the affidavit presented no evidence of any outside influence, the trial court could have properly disregarded it without an oral hearing under Tex. R. Evid. 606. Clark v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1430 (Tex. App. Beaumont Feb. 27 2008).

79. Manslaughter defendant was not entitled to a new trial after a juror volunteered that the jurors experimented with the gun in evidence and tested the gun's operation, resulting in one juror's change of mind; the juror's statement was permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606, but, as relayed by defense counsel, it was too vague to demonstrate that any outside influence affected the juror or that the jurors did anything more than examine an admitted exhibit more closely so as to apply information learned at trial. Gahagan v. State, 242 S.W.3d 80, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7842 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

80. Trial court properly denied defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of jury misconduct because none of the statements in the juror's affidavit regarding the jury's deliberations fell within the exceptions of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). The affidavit did not assert that information came from a source outside the jury or that a juror lacked the qualifications to serve; thus, the affidavit offered no competent evidence for the trial court's consideration. Boone v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4424 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 6 2007).

81. Under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), the trial court properly excluded juror affidavits from a hearing on a new trial motion. The affidavits, stating that the jurors agreed to change their votes from not guilty to guilty in exchange for a promise that defendant would be sentenced to probation, were not a proper basis for proof of juror misconduct because the testimony related solely to matters occurring during deliberations and did not fall within either of the rule's exceptions. Britt v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3148 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 26 2007).

82. Trial court properly denied defendant's motion for a new trial; because the affidavit upon which defendant relied contained testimony related to the jury's deliberations, jurors' mental processes, and jurors' assent to or dissent from the verdict, and such evidence was prohibited under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). East v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 502 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 24 2007).

83. Trial court did not err by entering judgment on the jury's verdict because defendant did not and could not prove that jury misconduct via outside influence occurred; a juror's discussion of the jury's deliberations and their negotiation of a guilty verdict established the same type of juror conduct that was at issue in the Dunklin case, which could not be proved by affidavit, and therefore defendant could not have presented evidence in support of his claim, as the type of conduct at issue was not admissible as evidence of misconduct. Bailey v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 208 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 11 2007).

84. Trial court did not err in overruling defendant's motion for new trial without a hearing where the affidavit signed by defendant's counsel was insufficient to raise the issue of jury misconduct under Tex. R. App. P. 21 because it did not contain averments constituting outside influence; furthermore, because the source of any allegedly improper information was a juror, the trial court could have determined there were no reasonable grounds to believe outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 606. Lawrence v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9344 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 26 2006).

85. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a new trial on his claim that a juror brought with her into the jury room materials that constituted an improper "outside influence" under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) where defendant failed to show that "other evidence" was "received" by the jury because the jurors who testified agreed that none of the jurors looked at or considered any printed material allegedly offered by the juror at issue; furthermore, defendant had not cited any evidence from the record to make the showing required by Tex. R. App. P. 21 that other testimony or other evidence was actually received by the jury, and even had the jury received the printed material from the juror and considered it, the information would not constitute an outside influence under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) because it was gathered and shared by a juror. Mathis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4645 (Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2006).

86. Trial court did not err when it failed to hold an evidentiary hearing as requested in defendant's motion for new trial because, under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), the validity of a verdict could not be disputed based on a juror's testimony or affidavit about matters occurring in deliberation or the juror's mental processes which influenced any of the juror's decisions regarding the verdict. Therefore, the affidavit by a private investigator hired by defendant provided no reasonable grounds for the requested relief. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

87. New trial could not be granted based on the trial court's recollection of an informal postverdict chat in which two jurors commented that they might have gone outside the properly introduced evidence in reaching their verdict. That evidence was not competent under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). State v. Krueger, 179 S.W.3d 663, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 8899 (Tex. App. Beaumont 2005).

88. Where defendant's allegation that parole information influenced the jurors' decision about his punishment was based upon indirect testimony from jurors, Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) prohibited a juror from testifying about any matter or statement occurring during the jury's deliberations; thus, the evidence offered by defendant was incompetent to support the granting of a motion for new trial. Easly v. State, 163 S.W.3d 839, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4144 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

89. In a case in which there was no Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) objection, defendant was not entitled to a new trial because the jury did not improperly consider how the parole law would apply to defendant's situation. The jury discussed parole during deliberations of punishment. Two jurors' affidavits did not reveal any outside influence that was improperly brought to bear on any juror, and did not establish a misstatement of the law that was asserted as a fact by one professing to know the law that was relied upon by other jurors, who for that reason changed a vote to a harsher punishment. Further, defendant did not rebut the presumption that jurors followed the trial court's instructions on parole, and the charge given to the jury substantially followed the language in Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 4. Mata v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3679 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 12 2005).

90. Even if defendant had properly presented his motion for a new trial to the trial court, the motion was properly denied as defendant had included a juror affidavit in the motion that went to the issue of jury's deliberation that was prohibited by Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Kerr v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1081 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 10 2005).

91. Bailiff made a statement to jurors during their deliberations explaining some of the laws involved in defendant's case in violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.22, but the jurors testified either that they had not heard the bailiff's statements or that his statements did not influence them in reaching their verdict. In considering the juror's testimony, which was permissible because defendant failed to object to the admission of their testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for new trial because the presumption of harm and injury to defendant was rebutted. Robinson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 759 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2005).

92. Trial court did not err in refusing defendant's request to present jurors as live witnesses at a hearing on his motion for new trial, and thus did not deny him an adequate record on appeal, because the trial court recognized defendant's right to have a hearing on his motion for new trial, but determined the issue could be decided by affidavits pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 21.7. Because the trial court began a second hearing on defendant's motion for new trial by asking if defense counsel had subpoenaed the jurors, whom defendant claimed had been prejudiced and had been uncooperative with defense counsel's investigation, it appeared that defense counsel missed an opportunity to present jurors as witnesses if any could support defendant's claims, and it also appeared that counsel did nothing further in the 10 days that the trial court gave him to secure further evidence supporting his motion for rehearing. Young v. State, 177 S.W.3d 136, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 660 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

93. Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) does not conflict with Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(f); public policy demands that jury deliberations be kept private. Garcia v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7610 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 25 2004).

94. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by overruling defendant's motion for new trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(f) because the affidavits and live testimony indicated that an "outside influence" was not brought to bear upon the jury under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Even if a juror's explanation of anoxic brain injury had an impact on three other jurors in a capital murder trial, a juror's injection of his own personal experiences, knowledge, or expertise emanates from inside the jury. Garcia v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7610 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 25 2004).

95. In support of defendant's motion for a new trial on the basis for jury misconduct, an affidavit merely stating that a juror had discussed misconduct with defense counsel after the trial, failed to demonstrate personal knowledge; thus, the affidavit was prohibited under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Enriquez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6480 (Tex. App. El Paso July 21 2004).

96. Juror's affidavit attached to defendant's motion for new trial that attacked jury deliberations and stated that she still had reasonable doubt as to defendant's guilt was properly ruled inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). While Rule 606(b) makes proving jury misconduct in criminal trials more difficult, it does not conflict or otherwise deprive an appellant of a substantive right under Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(f), (g), which allows proof of jury misdirection and jury misconduct as grounds for a new trial. Hicks v. State, 15 S.W.3d 626, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 2245 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2000).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Procedures : Records on Appeal

97. In the State's appeal relating to a criminal sentence, juror affidavits as to the intended sentence were properly within the appellate record under Tex. R. App. P. 34 because they were filed along with a postjudgment motion; the court therefore rejected the argument that they should be struck from the record as mental processes of jurors under Tex. R. Evid. 606. State v. Dudley, 223 S.W.3d 717, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3328 (Tex. App. Tyler 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : New Trial

98. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a new trial, and therefore the appellate court erred by reversing its decision, because the juror's testimony about bad weather and a telephone call from a doctor about his child's illness were not improper outside influences as they were unrelated to any factual or legal issue during defendant's driving while intoxicated trial, and therefore the trial court correctly refused to consider the juror's testimony or affidavit because they were inadmissible under this rule. Colyer v. State, 428 S.W.3d 117, 2014 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 636 (Tex. Crim. App. Apr. 30 2014).

99. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for new trial based on jury misconduct because the only documents supporting defendant's claim that the verdict was not unanimous concerned jury deliberations and were inadmissible under this rule. Adair v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14923, 2013 WL

6665033 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 12 2013).

100. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a new trial because neither the juror's affidavit, nor any in-court testimony, established the requisite outside influence to support a claim of juror misconduct, and therefore defendant's complaint did not fall within the exception to Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), because the statements about the jurors' concerns that defendant might be paroled or released from prison early were statements made by jurors to fellow jurors during deliberations, and all of the events and processes described in the affidavit emanated from inside the jury. Cervera v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8460, 2012 WL 4810318 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 10 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Jury Instructions

101. Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) makes it uncertain whether a defendant could, as suggested in prior case law, prove harm from the trial court's failure to read the jury charge aloud by proving at the hearing on a motion for new trial that the jury did not in fact read the charge after they retired. However, the inability to demonstrated harm does not render the error, a fortiori, egregiously harmful. Casanova v. State, 383 S.W.3d 530, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1602 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Cognizable Issues : Sentences

102. State death row inmate's Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were not violated when the jury considered evidence that he might be paroled during sentencing deliberations, even though an investigator hired during state postconviction proceedings interviewed jury members and found that some jurors' erroneous belief that he might be paroled after a short period of time and be a danger to the community influenced their death verdict; state habeas court's refusal to consider this evidence and its conclusion that Tex. R. of Evid. 606 prohibited it from considering juror testimony except to show an improper outside influence did not violate clearly established federal law or deny the inmate a fair trial and, therefore, federal habeas corpus relief was properly denied. Parr v. Quarterman, 472 F.3d 245, 2006 U.S. App. LEXIS 29998 (5th Cir. Tex. 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Review : Standards of Review : General Overview

103. State habeas court's application of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) to bar testimony by the jurors concerning their internal discussion of parole law during deliberations was not contrary to, or an unreasonable application of, clearly established federal law, and therefore the inmate was properly denied habeas corpus relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254, because no clearly established United States Supreme Court authority held that a defendant was entitled to a new trial when one juror misstates the law of parole to other jurors during deliberations, nor did any Court precedent obligate a state court to admit testimony from jurors concerning their internal discussions about parole law during deliberations. In fact, the existing clearly established Court case law suggested the opposite. Salazar v. Dretke, 419 F.3d 384, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 15610 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1467, 164 L. Ed. 2d 252, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2081, 74 U.S.L.W. 3503 (U.S. 2006).

104. State habeas trial court effectively adjudicated an inmate's federal claim on the merits for federal habeas corpus purposes when it concluded that the state's invocation of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) left the inmate with no admissible evidence to support his due process claim and that the application of Rule 606(b) was constitutional under United States Supreme Court precedent. Salazar v. Dretke, 419 F.3d 384, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 15610 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1467, 164 L. Ed. 2d 252, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2081, 74 U.S.L.W. 3503 (U.S. 2006).

Evidence : Competency : Judges

105. Trial court did not err when it failed to hold an evidentiary hearing as requested in defendant's motion for new trial because, under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), the validity of a verdict could not be disputed based on a juror's testimony or affidavit about matters occurring in deliberation or the juror's mental processes which influenced any of the juror's decisions regarding the verdict. Therefore, the affidavit by a private investigator hired by defendant provided no reasonable grounds for the requested relief. Moody v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1762 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 8 2006).

106. There was no evidence that the jurors heard the judge's allegedly improper comments against the corporation's counsel, and in light of this, the court refused to hold that the comments merited a new trial; contrary to the corporation's assertion, nothing in Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) would have prohibited a juror from testifying that he heard the comments, which came about halfway through the trial and not during deliberations. Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Kinder Morgan Operating L.P., 192 S.W.3d 120, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1404 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

107. Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) was not unconstitutional as applied to defendant because although she was prohibited from using juror affidavits to show significant harm as the result of the alleged failure of jurors to disclose bias, she was entitled to use non-juror testimony to show misconduct; therefore, defendant was not prevented from presenting evidence that might otherwise have shown she suffered significant harm as the result of the service of the suspect jurors. White v. State, 181 S.W.3d 514, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10449 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005), aff'd, 225 S.W.3d 571, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 693 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

108. While failure to disclose bias is a form of juror misconduct that justifies a new trial under the appropriate circumstances, Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) required that proof of a juror's failure to disclose bias must come from some source other than a fellow juror's testimony about deliberations. White v. State, 181 S.W.3d 514, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 10449 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005), aff'd, 225 S.W.3d 571, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 693 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

109. Defense counsel introduced a personal affidavit and another lawyer's affidavit into evidence at the motion for a new trial hearing without objection and thus, the applicability of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) was not raised before the trial court, even though the trial court apparently based its ruling on the rule. Perez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7097 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 30 2005).

110. State habeas court's application of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) to bar testimony by the jurors concerning their internal discussion of parole law during deliberations was not contrary to, or an unreasonable application of, clearly established federal law, and therefore the inmate was properly denied habeas corpus relief under 28 U.S.C.S. § 2254, because no clearly established United States Supreme Court authority held that a defendant was entitled to a new trial when one juror misstates the law of parole to other jurors during deliberations, nor did any Court precedent obligate a state court to admit testimony from jurors concerning their internal discussions about parole law during deliberations. In fact, the existing clearly established Court case law suggested the opposite. Salazar v. Dretke, 419 F.3d 384, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 15610 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1467, 164 L. Ed. 2d 252, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2081, 74 U.S.L.W. 3503 (U.S. 2006).

111. State habeas trial court effectively adjudicated an inmate's federal claim on the merits for federal habeas corpus purposes when it concluded that the state's invocation of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) left the inmate with no admissible evidence to support his due process claim and that the application of Rule 606(b) was constitutional under United States Supreme Court precedent. Salazar v. Dretke, 419 F.3d 384, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 15610 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 1467, 164 L. Ed. 2d 252, 2006 U.S. LEXIS 2081, 74 U.S.L.W. 3503 (U.S. 2006).

112. Where defendant's allegation that parole information influenced the jurors' decision about his punishment was based upon indirect testimony from jurors, Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) prohibited a juror from testifying about any matter or statement occurring during the jury's deliberations; thus, the evidence offered by defendant was incompetent to support the granting of a motion for new trial. Easly v. State, 163 S.W.3d 839, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4144 (Tex. App. Dallas 2005).

113. Finding that the individual should take nothing in her action against the company alleging that the company caused her injuries from chemical exposure was appropriate where she failed to prove the existence of actual "outside influence" in regard to the jury as required by Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). House v. Ethyl Corp., 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3859 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. May 19 2005).

114. In a case in which there was no Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) objection, defendant was not entitled to a new trial because the jury did not improperly consider how the parole law would apply to defendant's situation. The jury discussed parole during deliberations of punishment. Two jurors' affidavits did not reveal any outside influence that was improperly brought to bear on any juror, and did not establish a misstatement of the law that was asserted as a fact by one professing to know the law that was relied upon by other jurors, who for that reason changed a vote to a harsher punishment. Further, defendant did not rebut the presumption that jurors followed the trial court's instructions on parole, and the charge given to the jury substantially followed the language in Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 4. Mata v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3679 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi May 12 2005).

115. Bailiff made a statement to jurors during their deliberations explaining some of the laws involved in defendant's case in violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.22, but the jurors testified either that they had not heard the bailiff's statements or that his statements did not influence them in reaching their verdict. In considering the juror's testimony, which was permissible because defendant failed to object to the admission of their testimony pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for new trial because the presumption of harm and injury to defendant was rebutted. Robinson v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 759 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 31 2005).

116. Trial court did not err in refusing defendant's request to present jurors as live witnesses at a hearing on his motion for new trial, and thus did not deny him an adequate record on appeal, because the trial court recognized defendant's right to have a hearing on his motion for new trial, but determined the issue could be decided by affidavits pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 21.7. Because the trial court began a second hearing on defendant's motion for new trial by asking if defense counsel had subpoenaed the jurors, whom defendant claimed had been prejudiced and had been uncooperative with defense counsel's investigation, it appeared that defense counsel missed an opportunity to present jurors as witnesses if any could support defendant's claims, and it also appeared that counsel did nothing further in the 10 days that the trial court gave him to secure further evidence supporting his motion for rehearing. Young v. State, 177 S.W.3d 136, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 660 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2005).

117. In an aggravated theft case, the trial court's order granting defendant's motion for new trial was reversed as testimony and evidence of a juror who considered defendant's failure to testify was improperly considered. State v. Ordonez, 156 S.W.3d 850, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 298 (Tex. App. El Paso 2005).

118. Neither the record nor the bill of exceptions indicated that an outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon a juror or that a juror was not qualified to serve, and thus, Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) precluded juror testimony and the trial court did not err in refusing to hear the evidence of jury misconduct in connection with defendant's murder trial. The court agreed with other case law that Rule 606(b) was constitutional. Rivera v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8400 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 22 2004).

119. In support of defendant's motion for a new trial on the basis for jury misconduct, an affidavit merely stating that a juror had discussed misconduct with defense counsel after the trial, failed to demonstrate personal knowledge; thus, the affidavit was prohibited under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Enriquez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6480 (Tex. App. El Paso July 21 2004).

120. Determining the juror's full effect on the outcome of the trial was precluded by Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), which prohibited jurors from testifying as to any matter or statement occurring during the jury's deliberations, or to the effect of anything on any juror's mind or emotions or mental processes, as influencing any juror's assent to or dissent from the verdict. State v. Garza, 143 S.W.3d 144, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4892 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

121. Defendant's argument that he should have been granted a new trial because of jury misconduct was overruled because the testimony did not reveal any outside influence that was improperly brought to bear on any juror, and the statements were all made during deliberations and emanated from inside the jury; the evidence was that one juror thought maybe another unnamed juror was influenced by the other juror's prior experiences, and that the juror expressed an opinion that rehabilitation was not possible. Graham v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3449 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 16 2004).

122. Because there was no evidence of any outside influence on the jury, just an attorney's affidavit opining that the jurors discussed and considered parole, which Tex. Evid. R. 606(b) prohibited a juror from testifying about, the trial court could not have appropriately granted defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of jury misconduct. State v. Lewis, 151 S.W.3d 213, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2858 (Tex. App. Tyler 2004).

Evidence : Competency : Jurors : General Overview

123. Court did not err during defendant's trial for sexual assault in denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the basis that a juror conducted independent research on date rape drugs during an overnight recess and conveyed that information to the other jurors during deliberations the following morning; the trial court properly declined to consider the jurors' affidavits based on the fact that they did not fall within any exception listed in Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Mcquarrie v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2859, 2011 WL 1442335 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 14 2011).

124. Defendant was not entitled to have juror affidavits considered as evidence of juror misconduct under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) because the affidavits provided no evidence that the juror asking another how to vote asked anyone other than a fellow juror, and therefore, the trial court did not err by failing to consider them as evidence. Cox v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1858, 2009 WL 692606 (Tex. App. Tyler Mar. 18 2009).

125. Because Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) detailed when a juror could testify regarding the validity of a verdict or indictment, and the statements in question were not made with regard to the indictment or verdict, the rule was irrelevant in connection with defendant's claim of error due to the denial of a motion for a mistrial. Jones v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 394 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 23 2007).

Evidence : Competency : Jurors : Deliberations

126. Court did not err by denying a new trial due to a juror's exit from the jury room and "agitated" outburst about supposed bullying because the jurors could not be queried about any matter or exchange that gave rise to the emotional outburst of the juror or the alleged misconduct during the jury's deliberations. Uballe v. State, 439 S.W.3d 380, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 4874, 2014 WL 1829849 (Tex. App. Amarillo May 6 2014).

127. Where the juror affidavits stated that the trial judge entered the jurors' room right after lunch before they had restarted deliberations and again in the afternoon, stopping their deliberations, the trial court's communications to the jury did not occur during deliberations, and a reviewing court could consider the jurors' testimony on the trial court's statements at those times. In re Taylor Morrison of Tex., Inc., 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1416 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 6 2014).

128. Trial court's judgment granting a partial mistrial was a clear abuse of discretion because there was no jury verdict on any claims, as the communications from the trial judge that the jury should skip a question and the communications stopping their deliberations before they had concluded resulted in an incomplete verdict; the instruction to skip the question did not conform to the jury charge instructions, and the harm was that the jurors did not complete their deliberations, vote on some questions, or render a verdict on all questions. In re Taylor Morrison of Tex., Inc., 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1416 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 6 2014).

129. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for new trial based on jury misconduct because the only documents supporting defendant's claim that the verdict was not unanimous concerned jury deliberations and were inadmissible under this rule. Adair v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 14923, 2013 WL 6665033 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 12 2013).

130. Juror's affidavit that another juror stated during deliberations in defendant's sexual assault of a child punishment trial that she was a victim of child sexual assault by her father was not admissible to show that counsel was ineffective in failing to uncover this fact during voir dire. Ex Parte Parra, 420 S.W.3d 821, 2013 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1316 (Tex. Crim. App. Sept. 18 2013).

131. Because a juror's alleged statements concerned the jury's deliberations and her own mental processes and did not show that an outside influence was improperly brought to bear on any juror, the statements were inadmissible under this rule. Mcmaster v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10541 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 21 2013).

132. Because a juror's alleged statements concerned the jury's deliberations and her own mental processes and did not show that an outside influence was improperly brought to bear on any juror, the statements were inadmissible under this rule. Mcmaster v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10538, 2013 WL 4506403 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 21 2013).

133. In denying defendant's motion for a new murder trial based on a juror's affidavit indicating he was bothered by defendant's failure to testify, the trial court did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause of Tex. Const. art. I, § 16 because it applied the current version of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) which precluded the juror's testimony about deliberations. Procedural rules controlled pending litigation from their effective date, and defendant did not have a vested right to a new trial based on former Tex. R. Crim. Evid. 606(b), which allowed a juror to testify about internal and external influences on the verdict. Deleon v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6105 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 16 2013).

134. Appellant's allegation that during deliberations a juror was intimidated to a point that she became stressed out was insufficient to show good cause in order to unseal personal juror information under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 35.29; appellant did not point to anything showing a firm foundation that there was misconduct, and even assuming other jurors intimidated the juror in question based on her vote, the testimony appellant sought did not meet admissibility requirements under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) because it concerned statements taking place during deliberations and their effect on the juror instead of an outside influence. Romero v. State, 396 S.W.3d 136, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 715, 2013 WL 266248 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 24 2013).

135. Trial court's denial of appellant's request to unseal juror records to be used to get information about jury deliberations did not violate due process as appellant claimed. Romero v. State, 396 S.W.3d 136, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 715, 2013 WL 266248 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 24 2013).

136. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a new trial because he presented no evidence to establish proof of a juror's failure to disclose bias from a source other than a fellow juror's testimony and therefore he could not prove that misconduct occurred. The only evidence presented was an affidavit and a letter, neither of which identified which juror failed to disclose material information. Mcmorris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10545, 2012 WL 6629770 (Tex. App. El Paso Dec. 19 2012).

137. Trial court abused its discretion in excluding, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), the jurors' testimony and affidavits offered by defendant at the hearing on his motion for new trial, and the court of appeals erred to hold otherwise; the internet research conducted by a juror about the effects of date rape drugs constituted an "outside influence." Mcquarrie v. State, 380 S.W.3d 145, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1328 (Tex. Crim. App. Oct. 10 2012).

138. Juror's testimony and affidavit did not establish the required outside influence to support a juror misconduct claim, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), as the statements were made by jurors to fellow jurors during deliberations, and the events the juror described came from inside the jury; thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying appellant's new trial motion under Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(g). Mcburnett v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5300, 2012 WL 2583407 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 5 2012).

139. In a design defect and negligence suit, jurors' testimony that they traded answers was not evidence of an outside influence; thus, Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) prohibited the trial court from receiving juror affidavits or other juror testimony concerning alleged traded answers. Moreover, these rules did not violate due process under the Fourteenth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XIV, or the due process, jury trial, and open courts provisions of the Texas Constitution set forth in Tex. Const. art. I, §§ 13, 15, 19. De Damian v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., 352 S.W.3d 124, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7316 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2011).

140. Although the affidavit upon which appellant based his motion for new trial raised issues outside the record, the evidence attempted to explore the impact of certain things on jurors' minds, which influenced them in reaching a verdict; this was not competent evidence, barred by Tex. R. Evid. 606, and the trial court was within its discretion to deny a hearing on the motion. Rogers v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6565, 2011 WL 3612248 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 18 2011).

141. Discussion of parole law under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 4(a) did not constitute an outside influence, and appellant did not argue any other outside influence; Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) precluded the trial court's consideration of a juror's affidavit, and because appellant did not present other proof, the trial court did not err in denying his new trial motion. Mccall v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3986, 2011 WL 2119740 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 25 2011).

142. When defendant was convicted of aggravated robbery, the trial court granted a mistrial as to punishment. When defendant filed a motion for new trial, the trial court refused to permit testimony of alleged juror misconduct during the deliberations under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). George v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3231, 2011 WL 1529670 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 24 2011).

143. Trial court did not err by quashing the jurors' subpoenas because defendant intended to show through affidavits and juror testimony the effect of the State's argument had on the applicable of the parole laws during their deliberations and jury deliberations considering the effects of parole were not an outside influence and therefore any testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Somers v. State, 333 S.W.3d 747, 2010 Tex. App.

LEXIS 9384 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 24 2010).

144. Evidence relied upon by defendant to support his assertion that he was entitled to a new trial, other than the clearly inadmissible testimony of the juror, was the affidavit and testimony of his attorney; however, that evidence, though admitted by the trial court at the hearing, was nothing more than the attorney's restatement of statements by jurors as to what went on during deliberations. Neither the attorney's affidavit nor her testimony provided any evidence of an outside influence that resulted in an improper verdict; because such evidence was clearly improper under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), it did not compel the trial court to grant a new trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21.3. Orozco v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7885, 2010 WL 3782198 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 29 2010).

145. Denial of defendant's motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence was proper, because the juror's affidavit that the cell phone records would have led her and two other jurors to have decided the case differently was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), and defendant presented no evidence in his motion for new trial that the evidence was unknown to him at the time of trial or that the failure to discover the new evidence was not due to his lack of due diligence. Kelly v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7439, 2010 WL 3503884 (Tex. App. Waco Sept. 8 2010).

146. Court noted that certain case law regarding when a jury's discussion of parole constituted reversible error was no longer viable in light of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Melvin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2973, 2010 WL 1611072 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 21 2010).

147. Because defendant had not shown that any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the juror's testimony and denying his motion for new trial; even if case law remained viable, defendant's claim failed because he had not shown that there was a misstatement of the law asserted as a fact by one professing to know the law. Melvin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2973, 2010 WL 1611072 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 21 2010).

148. Texas case law does not establish juror questioning as a mandatory remedy for jury misconduct, nor do the Texas Rules of Evidence. If jurors are questioned under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), it should be at the behest of the movant; it is incumbent upon the party moving for a mistrial to request an inquiry of the jurors. Ocon v. State, 284 S.W.3d 880, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 732 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

149. Defendant presented evidence that the jury did consider the application of parole law, and while ordinarily a juror's testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) because this did not amount to an outside influence, the State did not object to the admission of this evidence, making it admitted for all purposes; because there was evidence that the jury was inaccurately informed and misled by the charge that omitted Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, 4(a), the error caused some harm. Loun v. State, 273 S.W.3d 406, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8748 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2008).

150. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground that the jury violated the trial court's mandatory instructions not to consider how parole might apply to defendant and that during the jury's deliberations, a juror discussed personal knowledge of the parole process where the juror's answers to defense counsel's questionnaire clearly related to the jury's deliberation and not to any outside influence, as defined in Tex. R. Evid. 606. Fenoglio v. State, 252 S.W.3d 468, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1335 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

151. Tex. R. Evid. 606 did not bar juror testimony from defendant's parent about a conversation by jurors during a trial break. Noland v. State, 264 S.W.3d 144, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 10049 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

152. Trial court properly denied defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of jury misconduct because none of the statements in the juror's affidavit regarding the jury's deliberations fell within the exceptions of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). The affidavit did not assert that information came from a source outside the jury or that a juror lacked the qualifications to serve; thus, the affidavit offered no competent evidence for the trial court's consideration. Boone v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4424 (Tex. App. Beaumont June 6 2007).

153. As the United States Supreme Court had held that while juror testimony was barred under Fed. R. Evid. 606(b), a party could seek to impeach the verdict by non-juror evidence of misconduct, likewise, Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) does not prevent an appellant from demonstrating "significant harm" by use of non-juror evidence. White v. State, 225 S.W.3d 571, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 693 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

154. Court overruled the issue that the trial court erred in failing to hold a hearing on defendant's motions for a new trial and to arrest judgment; Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) barred the trial court from considering the contents of the affidavit because the affiant described the collective thought of the jurors in deliberations, and without those contents, nothing remained in the affidavit to support the allegation of the pending motions. Bjorgaard v. State, 220 S.W.3d 555, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2514 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

155. Describing the collective thought of the jurors is nothing more than imparting their deliberative processes. Bjorgaard v. State, 220 S.W.3d 555, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2514 (Tex. App. Amarillo 2007).

156. In a product liability case, a father's motion for a new trial based on juror misconduct under Tex. R. Civ. P. 327 was properly denied since some statements were inadmissible under Tex. R. Civ. P. 327 and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), lunch discussions and juror conversations did not affect the decision, the jury was not affected by outside influences, and supplemental jury instructions after a deadlock did not constitute an outside influence as a matter of law. Hutton v. AER Mfg. II, Inc., 224 S.W.3d 459, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 627 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

157. Trial court did not err by entering judgment on the jury's verdict because defendant did not and could not prove that jury misconduct via outside influence occurred; a juror's discussion of the jury's deliberations and their negotiation of a guilty verdict established the same type of juror conduct that was at issue in the Dunklin case, which could not be proved by affidavit, and therefore defendant could not have presented evidence in support of his claim, as the type of conduct at issue was not admissible as evidence of misconduct. Bailey v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 208 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 11 2007).

158. Affidavit in support of a new trial motion contained two levels of hearsay, it did not state who heard certain juror statements or how counsel learned of the statements, and no one had personal knowledge of any jury misconduct; furthermore, a juror would have been unable to testify to the content of jury deliberations under Tex. R. Evid. 606, and thus the trial court was not required to hold a hearing on the motion and the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it overruled the motion by operation of law under Tex. R. App. P. 21. Lingo-Perkins v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4877 (Tex. App. Tyler June 7 2006).

159. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a new trial on his claim that a juror brought with her into the jury room materials that constituted an improper "outside influence" under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) where defendant failed to show that "other evidence" was "received" by the jury because the jurors who testified agreed that none of the jurors looked at or considered any printed material allegedly offered by the juror at issue; furthermore, defendant had not cited any evidence from the record to make the showing required by Tex. R. App. P. 21 that other testimony or other evidence was actually received by the jury, and even had the jury received the printed material from the juror and considered it, the information would not constitute an outside influence under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) because it was gathered and shared by a juror. Mathis v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4645

(Tex. App. Dallas May 31 2006).

160. In an aggravated assault of a peace officer case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for new trial as defendant presented no admissible evidence to support his allegation of juror misconduct during deliberations; defendant's affidavit in support of his motion in which a juror discussed the deliberations was exactly the type of information that was excluded by Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Dunklin v. State, 194 S.W.3d 14, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3596 (Tex. App. Tyler 2006).

Evidence : Competency : Jurors : External Influences

161. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a new trial, and therefore the appellate court erred by reversing its decision, because the juror's testimony about bad weather and a telephone call from a doctor about his child's illness were not improper outside influences as they were unrelated to any factual or legal issue during defendant's driving while intoxicated trial, and therefore the trial court correctly refused to consider the juror's testimony or affidavit because they were inadmissible under this rule. Colyer v. State, 428 S.W.3d 117, 2014 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 636 (Tex. Crim. App. Apr. 30 2014).

162. Debtor failed to present competent, admissible evidence of jury misconduct where the appellate court could not conclude that the juror's alleged analysis of the debtor's properly admitted credit report, based on the juror's own experience or expertise, was misconduct resulting from an outside influence. Barnes v. Univ. Fed. Credit Union, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4871, 80 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. 2d (CBC) 636 (Tex. App. Austin Apr. 18 2013).

163. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a new trial because neither the juror's affidavit, nor any in-court testimony, established the requisite outside influence to support a claim of juror misconduct, and therefore defendant's complaint did not fall within the exception to Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), because the statements about the jurors' concerns that defendant might be paroled or released from prison early were statements made by jurors to fellow jurors during deliberations, and all of the events and processes described in the affidavit emanated from inside the jury. Cervera v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8460, 2012 WL 4810318 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 10 2012).

164. Trial court abused its discretion in excluding, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), the jurors' testimony and affidavits offered by defendant at the hearing on his motion for new trial, and the court of appeals erred to hold otherwise; the internet research conducted by a juror about the effects of date rape drugs constituted an "outside influence." Mcquarrie v. State, 380 S.W.3d 145, 2012 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1328 (Tex. Crim. App. Oct. 10 2012).

165. Where defendant was convicted by a jury of manslaughter and aggravated assault by a public servant, he was not permitted to admit affidavits from jurors to support his motion for new trial because the affidavits were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) as defendant did not bring forth evidence of an outside influence. Seaton v. State, 385 S.W.3d 85, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6775 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 15 2012).

166. In a design defect and negligence suit, jurors' testimony that they traded answers was not evidence of an outside influence; thus, Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b) and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) prohibited the trial court from receiving juror affidavits or other juror testimony concerning alleged traded answers. Moreover, these rules did not violate due process under the Fourteenth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XIV, or the due process, jury trial, and open courts provisions of the Texas Constitution set forth in Tex. Const. art. I, §§ 13, 15, 19. De Damian v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., 352 S.W.3d 124, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7316 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 31 2011).

167. Discussion of parole law under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 4(a) did not constitute an outside influence, and appellant did not argue any other outside influence; Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) precluded the trial court's consideration of a juror's affidavit, and because appellant did not present other proof, the trial court did not err in denying his new trial motion. Mccall v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3986, 2011 WL 2119740 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 25 2011).

168. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground that an unqualified juror served on his jury, as she had pleaded guilty to tampering with physical evidence and was on deferred adjudication community supervision in violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 35.16(a)(3), because defendant presented no evidence that he suffered significant harm directly attributable to the juror's service on the jury and her presence did not constitute an outside influence under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Sanchez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9984 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 16 2010).

169. Trial court did not err in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial under Tex. R. App. P. 21.3(f) based on juror misconduct, given that (1) appellant did not attach the required affidavits from the jurors he claimed had information regarding the alleged misconduct, and (2) appellant did not allege any outside influence, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), that was improperly brought to bear upon the jurors, and instead, he appeared to complain that the jurors reached erroneous conclusions from the evidence. Salazar v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9405, 2010 WL 4840491 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 24 2010).

170. Trial court did not err by quashing the jurors' subpoenas because defendant intended to show through affidavits and juror testimony the effect of the State's argument had on the applicable of the parole laws during their deliberations and jury deliberations considering the effects of parole were not an outside influence and therefore any testimony was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). Somers v. State, 333 S.W.3d 747, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9384 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 24 2010).

171. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's request for a hearing on his motion for new trial due to juror misconduct, because defendant's argument that he be afforded the opportunity to discover admissible evidence to impeach a jury verdict was a fishing expedition and an improper purpose of a new trial hearing, when the juror's affidavit or testimony would have been inadmissible at a new trial hearing since such evidence did not show an outside influence. Lee v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3526 (Tex. App. Tyler May 12 2010).

172. It had been held that the plain language of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) indicated that an outside influence was something outside of both the jury room and the juror; the court declines to depart from the plain language of this rule. Melvin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2973, 2010 WL 1611072 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 21 2010).

173. Because defendant had not shown that any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the juror's testimony and denying his motion for new trial; even if case law remained viable, defendant's claim failed because he had not shown that there was a misstatement of the law asserted as a fact by one professing to know the law. Melvin v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2973, 2010 WL 1611072 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 21 2010).

174. In defendant's indecency with a child case, no outside influence was brought to bear upon the jury because, under questioning by the attorneys and the trial court, the juror said she could remain impartial and decide defendant's case on the evidence adduced and set aside her personal history. There was nothing in the record to conclusively establish that the juror who addressed the court following voir dire was the same one referred to in the affidavit. Orange v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8934, 2009 WL 3851068 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 19 2009).

175. Where defendant was convicted of aggravated sexual assault of a child, he was not entitled to a mistrial because defense counsel overheard one of the jurors talking on a cell phone in the men's restroom; the Court of Appeals of Texas erred by reversing his conviction. Both the court of appeals and defendant misinterpret the State's burden to rebut, specifically with regard to the issue of juror questioning; the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas held that the party alleging juror misconduct, not the State nor the court, should initiate juror questioning under Tex. R. Evid. 606. Ocon v. State, 284 S.W.3d 880, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 732 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

176. Trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground that the jury violated the trial court's mandatory instructions not to consider how parole might apply to defendant and that during the jury's deliberations, a juror discussed personal knowledge of the parole process where the juror's answers to defense counsel's questionnaire clearly related to the jury's deliberation and not to any outside influence, as defined in Tex. R. Evid. 606. Fenoglio v. State, 252 S.W.3d 468, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1335 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2008).

177. Affidavits concerning the jurors' use of the notes they had taken during defendant's trial for harassment of a hunter were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 606 at the hearing on defendant's motion for new trial because an outside influence is something outside of both the jury room and the juror. Morris v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6980 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 29 2007).

178. Plain language of Tex. R. Evid. 606 indicates that an outside influence is something outside of both the jury room and the juror. White v. State, 225 S.W.3d 571, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 693 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

179. Defendant claimed that two jurors were "absolutely disqualified" under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 35.19 by virtue of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 35.16, and defendant argued that the participation of these jurors in deliberations amounted to an outside influence for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), but the court did not agree, as the plain language of Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) indicated that an outside influence was something outside of both the jury room and the juror. White v. State, 225 S.W.3d 571, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 693 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

180. Court disagreed with defendant's assertion that the mere presence of certain jurors, claimed as absolutely disqualified under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 35.19 by virtue of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 35.16, amounted to significant harm; Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) did not prevent defendant from demonstrating such "significant harm" by use of non-juror evidence, and defendant failed to carry her burden under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 44.46(2). White v. State, 225 S.W.3d 571, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 693 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

181. In a product liability case, a father's motion for a new trial based on juror misconduct under Tex. R. Civ. P. 327 was properly denied since some statements were inadmissible under Tex. R. Civ. P. 327 and Tex. R. Evid. 606(b), lunch discussions and juror conversations did not affect the decision, the jury was not affected by outside influences, and supplemental jury instructions after a deadlock did not constitute an outside influence as a matter of law. Hutton v. AER Mfg. II, Inc., 224 S.W.3d 459, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 627 (Tex. App. Dallas 2007).

Evidence : Competency : Jurors : Verdict Accuracy

182. In defendant's capital murder case, a juror's affidavit failed to establish that an outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror or that a juror was not qualified to serve; as such, the juror was barred from testifying about what happened during jury deliberations; the affidavit stated only that the juror felt "pressured" by other jurors to change her vote to guilty. Villegas v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1899 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 13 2008).

183. Trial court properly denied defendant's motion for a new trial; because the affidavit upon which defendant relied contained testimony related to the jury's deliberations, jurors' mental processes, and jurors' assent to or dissent from the verdict, and such evidence was prohibited under Tex. R. Evid. 606(b). East v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 502 (Tex. App. Beaumont Jan. 24 2007).

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Confrontation

1. Officer testified as to statements of defendant's wife and stepdaughter, the complainants, made in an alleged family violence situation; however, the admission of the hearsay statements did not violate the Confrontation Clause because both complainants testified; even if the State called the complainants to testify so that otherwise inadmissible prior inconsistent statements could be admitted, there was no harm committed. Villarreal v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6304 (Tex. App. Austin July 21 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Robbery : General Overview

2. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant was properly denied the opportunity to impeach a victim regarding the amount of her paycheck because it was not relevant to the offense charged. Moore v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4982, 2009 WL 1886450 (Tex. App. Waco July 1 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

3. Defendant was entitled to a new trial on two counts of aggravated sexual abuse of a child where the trial court reversibly erred by admitting the testimony of the officer and a child protective services investigator regarding the victim's prior statements because it was inadmissible impeachment evidence of the victim's trial testimony, during which she recanted her allegations against defendant; the error was not harmless because without the investigator's testimony, the State would not have proven penetration. Klein v. State, 191 S.W.3d 766, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2790 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

4. In trial for a grandfather's indecent touching of his granddaughter, the State was properly allowed to impeach the grandmother, who testified at trial that child complained of touching on her leg, with a caseworker's testimony about the grandmother's prior statement. Green v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8523 (Tex. App. Eastland Sept. 23 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : Elements

5. Under Tex. R. Evid. 107, the State was properly allowed to present testimony of a driving while intoxicated defendant's videotaped statements about his drinking, even though the trial court had previously suppressed the audio portion of the tape because of its poor quality, because defendant attempted to impeach the officer's credibility as to the basis for his opinion that defendant had been drinking, as permitted by Tex. R. Evid 607. Cadena v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8622 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 5 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

6. Defense counsel's failure to object to the prosecutor's questions to a reluctant child witness did not constitute ineffective assistance in defendant's trial for aggravated assault of the child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021; questions regarding previous accusations elicited cumulative evidence that included defendant's videotaped confession, and the State was permitted to ask leading questions and to impeach the child with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c) and 607. Brambila v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5959, 2009 WL 2356674 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 28 2009).

7. In a murder case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to a witness' impeachment with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 607 because defendant did not show that the State called the witness with the primary intent of placing inadmissible substantive evidence in front of the jury. Torres v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10181 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Confrontation

8. Officer testified as to statements of defendant's wife and stepdaughter, the complainants, made in an alleged family violence situation; however, the admission of the hearsay statements did not violate the Confrontation Clause because both complainants testified; even if the State called the complainants to testify so that otherwise inadmissible prior inconsistent statements could be admitted, there was no harm committed. Villarreal v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6304 (Tex. App. Austin July 21 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Credibility

9. Trial judge did not err by permitting a witness to testify about a prior consistent statement because the testimony of the prior consistent statement was not offered for impeachment purposes; rather the testimony was offered to show that he initially lied out of fear but later "came clean" and ultimately told the truth. Taylor v. State, 190 S.W.3d 758, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 684 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

10. Where a State's witness surprised the State by testifying at defendant's murder trial that the witness had lied when inculpating defendant in two prior statements, under Tex. R. Evid. 607, the State was entitled to attack the witness's credibility. Salto v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2306 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 11 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Impeachment

11. In defendant's trial for arson under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 28.02, no reversible error occurred in the admission of impeachment evidence of prior inconsistent statements of a State rebuttal witness because under Tex. R. Evid. 607 and 403 the witness had made two prior sworn statements that were consistent and the State did not have knowledge that her testimony at trial would be inconsistent with those statements that defendant returned to the house after leaving on the night of the fire; defendant's substantial rights were not harmed under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because other evidence supported the State's theory and the jury was provided a limiting instruction as to the impeachment evidence. Rodriguez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4854, 2010 WL 2540667 (Tex. App. Austin June 23 2010).

12. In defendant's retaliation case, the error in sustaining the State's objection to defendant's impeachment of the State's character witness was harmless; three defense witnesses testified that the victim had a poor character for truthfulness and defendant further impeached the victim with a prior inconsistent statement, but the victim's testimony regarding the elements of the offense was corroborated by several other witnesses, and was contradicted only by defendant's bald denials. Moore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3017 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Waco July 21, 2004), substituted opinion at 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

13. Where a State's witness surprised the State by testifying at defendant's murder trial that the witness had lied when inculpating defendant in two prior statements, under Tex. R. Evid. 607, the State was entitled to attack the witness's credibility. Salto v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 2306 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 11 2004).

14. Tex. R. Evid. 607 permits the credibility of a witness to be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness. The rule abandons the traditional "voucher" rule, which prohibited a party from impeaching its own witness. The plain language of Rule 607 also dispenses with the surprise and injury exception to the "voucher" rule which served as a prerequisite to impeaching one's own witness. Hughes v. State, 4 S.W.3d 1, 1999 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 82 (Tex. Crim. App. 1999).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : General Overview

15. In a murder case, a court did not err in admitting four photographs depicting gang-related graffiti on defendant's bedroom walls where the photos were primarily offered not as prior acts evidence, but to impeach a witness's credibility because her testimony at trial conflicted with her prior statements to the police. In addition, because the gang symbols depicted in the photos were also before the jury through other evidence of defendant's gang affiliation, which was admitted without objection, any error in admitting the photos for purposes of showing gang affiliation and intent or motive was not reversible. Garza v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6843 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 24 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Requirements

16. In a trial for indecency with and sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve an argument under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 607 to the State's calling a witness who the State knew would testify adversely to its case, solely so that it could impeach its own witness with defendant's extraneous offense. Defendant raised only a general objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404 and thus was not specific, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Starnes v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3144 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 26 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

17. Defendant was entitled to a new trial on two counts of aggravated sexual abuse of a child where the trial court reversibly erred by admitting the testimony of the officer and a child protective services investigator regarding the victim's prior statements because it was inadmissible impeachment evidence of the victim's trial testimony, during which she recanted her allegations against defendant; the error was not harmless because without the investigator's testimony, the State would not have proven penetration. Klein v. State, 191 S.W.3d 766, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2790 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

18. In defendant's retaliation case, the error in sustaining the State's objection to defendant's impeachment of the State's character witness was harmless; three defense witnesses testified that the victim had a poor character for truthfulness and defendant further impeached the victim with a prior inconsistent statement, but the victim's testimony regarding the elements of the offense was corroborated by several other witnesses, and was contradicted only by defendant's bald denials. Moore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3017 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Waco July 21, 2004), substituted opinion at 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Evidence : Hearsay : General Overview

19. Officer testified as to statements of defendant's wife and stepdaughter, the complainants, made in an alleged family violence situation; however, the admission of the hearsay statements did not violate the Confrontation Clause because both complainants testified; even if the State called the complainants to testify so that otherwise inadmissible prior inconsistent statements could be admitted, there was no harm committed. Villarreal v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6304 (Tex. App. Austin July 21 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exceptions : Recorded Recollection : Criminal Trials

20. In an aggravated assault case, a trial court erred by allowing the admission of a statement because the State merely wanted to impeach a witness with otherwise inadmissible hearsay since it was shown that the State had learned that the witness did not remember making the statement, and the witness was not going to give favorable testimony for the state; moreover, the statement was not admissible as a past recorded recollection under Tex. R. Evid. 803(5) because the witness did not vouch for the accuracy of the statement. However, the error was harmless because evidence that defendant shot a victim was admitted through other sources. Aguilar v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8921 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 2 2008).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Prior Statements by Witnesses : General Overview

21. In a child sexual abuse case, the admission of the testimony of an investigator and a police officer regarding the complainant's prior statements was reversible error because any legitimate probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 607 was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403; the State had ample notice that the complainant would recant, and conflicting evidence alone did not trigger Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(1)(B). Klein v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 950 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 2 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at, modified by 191 S.W.3d 766, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2790 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

22. Trial judge did not err by permitting a witness to testify about a prior consistent statement because the testimony of the prior consistent statement was not offered for impeachment purposes; rather the testimony was offered to show that he initially lied out of fear but later "came clean" and ultimately told the truth. Taylor v. State, 190 S.W.3d 758, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 684 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

Evidence : Hearsay : Exemptions : Prior Statements by Witnesses : Inconsistent Statements

23. In a murder case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 403 to a witness' impeachment with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 607 because defendant did not show that the State called the witness with the primary intent of placing inadmissible substantive evidence in front of the jury. Torres v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10181 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 29 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Curative Admissibility

24. In a case alleging aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, defendant was not allowed to question witnesses regarding a previous child abuse complaint against the same child since it was not relevant or material to the offense, and a mother could not have been questioned about specific instances of conduct; moreover, the mother's testimony during direct examination did not leave a misleading impression with the jury which needed clarification under Tex. R. Evid. 107; the focus of the prior investigation was a grandmother, who was not a witness in the case. Hernandez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6815 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 23 2007).

25. Under Tex. R. Evid. 107, the State was properly allowed to present testimony of a driving while intoxicated defendant's videotaped statements about his drinking, even though the trial court had previously suppressed the audio portion of the tape because of its poor quality, because defendant attempted to impeach the officer's credibility as to the basis for his opinion that defendant had been drinking, as permitted by Tex. R. Evid 607. Cadena v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8622 (Tex. App. El Paso Oct. 5 2006).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Objections & Offers of Proof : Objections

26. Defense counsel's failure to object to the prosecutor's questions to a reluctant child witness did not constitute ineffective assistance in defendant's trial for aggravated assault of the child in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021; questions regarding previous accusations elicited cumulative evidence that included defendant's videotaped confession, and the State was permitted to ask leading questions and to impeach the child with a prior inconsistent statement under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c) and 607. Brambila v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 5959, 2009 WL 2356674 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 28 2009).

Evidence : Relevance : Character Evidence

27. In defendant's retaliation case, the error in sustaining the State's objection to defendant's impeachment of the State's character witness was harmless; three defense witnesses testified that the victim had a poor character for truthfulness and defendant further impeached the victim with a prior inconsistent statement, but the victim's testimony regarding the elements of the offense was corroborated by several other witnesses, and was contradicted only by defendant's bald denials. Moore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3017 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Waco July 21, 2004), substituted opinion at 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

28. Appellate court found that it would not be outside the zone of reasonable disagreement for the trial court to resolve the Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis in favor of allowing the State to elicit the prior inconsistent statements, because the witness was one of the two alleged victims in the case, the issue of the witness's credibility was crucial to both the State and defendant, the State was surprised by the witness's unfavorable testimony, and the elicited favorable testimony, although limited, would support a finding that the State did not call the witness for the primary purpose of eliciting otherwise inadmissible evidence. Polston v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6126, 2011 WL 3435389 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 5 2011).

29. Evidence of defendant's membership in the same gang as a witness was admissible to show that the witness was biased to testify in favor of defendant. The probative value of the impeachment evidence was high because the State wanted to show why the witness testified that he had lied to police about the statements defendant had made to him. Mccuin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5031, 2011 WL 2611234 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 30 2011).

30. In a case in which defendant was convicted of theft from a person, there was no merit in defendant's claim that the trial court did not require the State to follow the proper procedure in admitting his accomplice's prior inconsistent statement for impeachment purposes where the trial court did not permit the predicate requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) to be violated because extrinsic evidence of the accomplice's statement to a detective was not offered before the jury, and, furthermore, the trial court took the extra step of instructing the jury that it could only consider the prior statements for impeachment purposes. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the accomplice's version of the events was critical to defendant's prosecution, because the probative value of impeaching the accomplice's potentially untrue testimony was not substantially outweighed by the potential misuse by the jury of his previous statement to the detective, and because the trial court expressly determined that there was no evidence that the State anticipated that the accomplice's trial testimony would be inconsistent with his statements to the detective or that the State called the accomplice as a witness in bad faith. Cervantes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1149, 2010 WL 548503 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 18 2010).

31. In a child abandonment case, defendant failed to preserve for review her allegation that the State improperly called her child for the primary purpose of eliciting otherwise inadmissible evidence because, when the State began questioning the child about the statements she made to a detective, defendant objected based on hearsay and relevance, but she lodged only a hearsay objection, rather than an objection based on Tex. R. Evid. 403, when the detective testified about the prior inconsistent statements; the objection did not preserve a complaint that the State called the child as a subterfuge for eliciting otherwise inadmissible evidence. Castillo v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5342 (Tex. App. El Paso June 22 2006).

32. In a child sexual abuse case, the admission of the testimony of an investigator and a police officer regarding the complainant's prior statements was reversible error because any legitimate probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 607 was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403; the State had ample notice that the complainant would recant, and conflicting evidence alone did not trigger Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(1)(B). Klein v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 950 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 2 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at, modified by 191 S.W.3d 766, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2790 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

33. Analyzing lack of surprise or injury in terms of Tex. R. Evid. 403 is preferable to the traditional "voucher" rule, which prohibited a party from impeaching its own witness, because it comports with the plain language of Tex. R. Evid. 607 and because it will lead to the conclusion that a trial court abuses its discretion under Rule 403 when it allows the State to admit impeachment evidence for the primary purpose of placing evidence before the jury that was otherwise inadmissible. Hughes v. State, 4 S.W.3d 1, 1999 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 82 (Tex. Crim. App. 1999).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

34. Evidence of defendant's membership in the same gang as a witness was admissible to show that the witness was biased to testify in favor of defendant. The probative value of the impeachment evidence was high because the State wanted to show why the witness testified that he had lied to police about the statements defendant had made to him. Mccuin v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5031, 2011 WL 2611234 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 30 2011).

35. In a trial for indecency with and sexual assault of a child, defendant failed to preserve an argument under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 607 to the State's calling a witness who the State knew would testify adversely to its case, solely so that it could impeach its own witness with defendant's extraneous offense. Defendant raised only a general objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 and 404 and thus was not specific, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Starnes v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3144 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 26 2007).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

36. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant was properly denied the opportunity to impeach a victim regarding the amount of her paycheck because it was not relevant to the offense charged. Moore v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4982, 2009 WL 1886450 (Tex. App. Waco July 1 2009).

37. In a case alleging aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, defendant was not allowed to question witnesses regarding a previous child abuse complaint against the same child since it was not relevant or material to the offense, and a mother could not have been questioned about specific instances of conduct; moreover, the mother's testimony during direct examination did not leave a misleading impression with the jury which needed clarification under Tex. R. Evid. 107; the focus of the prior investigation was a grandmother, who was not a witness in the case. Hernandez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6815 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 23 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : General Overview

38. Award of damages to the son in his action against his parents after he fell and broke his elbow at their home was proper because his argument that the trial court should have granted him a new trial since defense counsel improperly argued during closing argument that the jury could disbelieve the father's testimony was without merit. Defense counsel's comments were proper statements of the law, and at worst, assuming for the sake of argument only that the comments were improper, any harm was curable. Perez v. Perez, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 962, 2013 WL 398932 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Jan. 31 2013).

39. Debtor testified without objection that statements shown to him were his statements, and he answered questions about the documents before his counsel objected; the objection was not timely for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 103 and Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a), plus the records were offered to refresh the debtor's recollection and impeach his credibility for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 612, credibility could be attacked by any party under Tex. R. Evid. 607, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the debtor's testimony in this regard. Ainsworth v. Cach, Llc, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2798 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 10 2012).

40. Defendant was entitled to a new trial on two counts of aggravated sexual abuse of a child where the trial court reversibly erred by admitting the testimony of the officer and a child protective services investigator regarding the victim's prior statements because it was inadmissible impeachment evidence of the victim's trial testimony, during which she recanted her allegations against defendant; the error was not harmless because without the investigator's testimony, the State would not have proven penetration. Klein v. State, 191 S.W.3d 766, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2790 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

41. In a child sexual abuse case, the admission of the testimony of an investigator and a police officer regarding the complainant's prior statements was reversible error because any legitimate probative value under Tex. R. Evid. 607 was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect under Tex. R. Evid. 403; the State had ample notice that the complainant would recant, and conflicting evidence alone did not trigger Tex. R. Evid. 801(e)(1)(B). Klein v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 950 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 2 2006), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at, modified by 191 S.W.3d 766, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2790 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

42. State's cross-examination of defendant could have been construed two ways, and the record supported the state's assertion that the line of questioning was an attempt to connect defendant to the handgun used in the crime, which represented an appropriate line of inquiry relevant to the issue of whether the handgun belonged to defendant, which was relevant to the issue of whether her husband first threatened her with the handgun and whether she was the first to employ deadly force. Johnson v. State, 181 S.W.3d 760, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9441 (Tex. App. Waco 2005).

43. Evidence of subsequent remedial measures should not have been admitted to impeach the maintenance supervisor for the Texas Department of Transportation since the survivors tendered his testimony, however, the error in admitting other evidence of the subsequent remedial measures was rendered harmless because the survivors' exhibits, both in evidence after the Department's utterance of "no objection" to them, showed the trees, their location, and the sight lines before and after the trees were cut. While the two exhibits did not explicitly demonstrate that the Department cut the trees, a logical deduction was, and the jury could have properly concluded that, the trees, on the Department right-of-way, had been removed by the Department, and any error was rendered harmless if the objecting party subsequently permitted the same or similar evidence to be introduced without objection. Tex. DOT v. Pate, 170 S.W.3d 840, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6484 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2005).

44. Party is permitted to question a witness on collateral matters in order to impeach the witnesses's credibility by contradicting the substance of his testimony; however, a witness may not be impeached through cross-examination on a collateral matter raised by that cross-examination. Hernandez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8448 (Tex. App. Austin Sept. 23 2004).

45. In a murder case, as the prosecutor's comment was an argument about the evidence and the relationship between defendant and his father, not about extraneous offenses involving the father, the State was properly allowed to impeach the father based on his inconsistent statements regarding the extraneous offenses. Brasher v. State, 139 S.W.3d 369, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4460 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2004).

46. Analyzing lack of surprise or injury in terms of Tex. R. Evid. 403 is preferable to the traditional "voucher" rule, which prohibited a party from impeaching its own witness, because it comports with the plain language of Tex. R. Evid. 607 and because it will lead to the conclusion that a trial court abuses its discretion under Rule 403 when it allows the State to admit impeachment evidence for the primary purpose of placing evidence before the jury that was otherwise inadmissible. Hughes v. State, 4 S.W.3d 1, 1999 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 82 (Tex. Crim. App. 1999).

47. Tex. R. Evid. 607 permits the credibility of a witness to be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness. The rule abandons the traditional "voucher" rule, which prohibited a party from impeaching its own witness. The plain language of Rule 607 also dispenses with the surprise and injury exception to the "voucher" rule which served as a prerequisite to impeaching one's own witness. Hughes v. State, 4 S.W.3d 1, 1999 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 82 (Tex. Crim. App. 1999).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : General Overview

48. Court read the State's cross-examination about the lack of corroborating evidence as an attack on defendant's credibility, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 607, not as an attempt to shift the burden of proof at trial; defendant admitted that his credibility was critical to his defense and the State's questioning was not improper, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 607, 611(b). Rogers v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6571 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 28, 2008).

49. Trial court's decision denying defendant's request to impeach the victim, his wife, with evidence of a remote assault by her of her former husband was not an abuse of discretion; the trial court could have found that the probative value of the evidence was mostly outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, and whether the court would have reached a different conclusion than the trial court was not the standard of appellate review. Winegarner v. State, 235 S.W.3d 787, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1383 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

50. Because defendant did not argue at trial that a certain statement opened the door to impeachment evidence, that argument was not preserved for appellate review and the court of appeals erred in considering it, under Tex. R. App. P. 33. Winegarner v. State, 235 S.W.3d 787, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1383 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

51. Defendant's complaint on appeal regarding a witness did not comport with the trial court objection, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a); furthermore, defendant's objection regarding impeachment with a prior inconsistent statement and then a later general objection of improper impeachment was not specific enough within the context to have informed the trial court that defendant was actually objecting to the State's failure to lay a proper predicate, such that the issue was not preserved for review. Douglas v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10903 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 21 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : General Overview

52. Given that the victim's narration of the assault was corroborated, counsel could have found that trying to impeach the victim's credibility by her deferred adjudication for theft would not have been effective, plus counsel said he did not discuss this matter because of appellant's own criminal record and because there was a risk of alienating the jury; thus, the trial court could have found that counsel's actions amounted to reasonable trial strategy, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying appellant's motion for a new trial. Sims v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5912, 2012 WL 2989252 (Tex. App. Austin July 18 2012).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Conduct

53. On a charge of unlawful possession of a firearm, the trial court properly did not allow defendant to impeach the State's witness by explaining that the witness testified to the same effect in an earlier trial arising from the same events and that the prior jury found that defendant did assault the witness. Macias v. State, 136 S.W.3d 702, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4193 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Inconsistent Statements

54. In an arson of a habitation case, counsel's failure to object to the witnesses' prior inconsistent statements under Tex. R. Evid. 607 did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel because there was no reasonable probability that the trial's result would have been any different as there was sufficient circumstantial evidence that defendant started the fire. Thompson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3374, 2012 WL 1514776 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 30 2012).

55. Because it was apparent that the State's primary purpose, if not its only purpose, in calling the two witnesses they knew to be hostile was to introduce the two prior inconsistent statements in evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 607, trial counsel should have requested a jury instruction limiting the jury's consideration of the impeachment evidence. Thompson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3374, 2012 WL 1514776 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 30 2012).

56. State acted within its prerogative to choose its witnesses when it called the victim to testify, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence, specifically State's Exhibit 8, that impeached the victim's testimony concerning her relationship with defendant. Taylor v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9993 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 20 2011).

57. Appellate court found that it would not be outside the zone of reasonable disagreement for the trial court to resolve the Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis in favor of allowing the State to elicit the prior inconsistent statements, because the witness was one of the two alleged victims in the case, the issue of the witness's credibility was crucial to both the State and defendant, the State was surprised by the witness's unfavorable testimony, and the elicited favorable testimony, although limited, would support a finding that the State did not call the witness for the primary purpose of eliciting otherwise inadmissible evidence. Polston v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6126, 2011 WL 3435389 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 5 2011).

58. In defendant's trial for arson under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 28.02, no reversible error occurred in the admission of impeachment evidence of prior inconsistent statements of a State rebuttal witness because under Tex. R. Evid. 607 and 403 the witness had made two prior sworn statements that were consistent and the State did not have knowledge that her testimony at trial would be inconsistent with those statements that defendant returned to the house after leaving on the night of the fire; defendant's substantial rights were not harmed under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because other evidence supported the State's theory and the jury was provided a limiting instruction as to the impeachment evidence. Rodriguez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4854, 2010 WL 2540667 (Tex. App. Austin June 23 2010).

59. In a case in which defendant was convicted of theft from a person, there was no merit in defendant's claim that the trial court did not require the State to follow the proper procedure in admitting his accomplice's prior inconsistent statement for impeachment purposes where the trial court did not permit the predicate requirements of Tex. R. Evid. 613(a) to be violated because extrinsic evidence of the accomplice's statement to a detective was not offered before the jury, and, furthermore, the trial court took the extra step of instructing the jury that it could only consider the prior statements for impeachment purposes. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in overruling defendant's objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 because the accomplice's version of the events was critical to defendant's prosecution, because the probative value of impeaching the accomplice's potentially untrue testimony was not substantially outweighed by the potential misuse by the jury of his previous statement to the detective, and because the trial court expressly determined that there was no evidence that the State anticipated that the accomplice's trial testimony would be inconsistent with his statements to the detective or that the State called the accomplice as a witness in bad faith. Cervantes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1149, 2010 WL 548503 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 18 2010).

60. Court did not abuse its discretion by admitting an audiotape of a State's witness's conversation into evidence because, even though the prosecutor did not specifically ask the witness if she had made the contradictory statement at a certain place and time, she denied having made the statement, and she equivocated about making the prior inconsistent statement. Perez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1437, 2009 WL 1607811 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 26 2009).

61. In an aggravated assault case, a trial court erred by allowing the admission of a statement because the State merely wanted to impeach a witness with otherwise inadmissible hearsay since it was shown that the State had learned that the witness did not remember making the statement, and the witness was not going to give favorable testimony for the state; moreover, the statement was not admissible as a past recorded recollection under Tex. R. Evid. 803(5) because the witness did not vouch for the accuracy of the statement. However, the error was harmless because evidence that defendant shot a victim was admitted through other sources. Aguilar v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 8921 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 2 2008).

62. In a criminal prosecution for aggravated robbery, Tex. R. Evid. 607 permitted the State to impeach its own witness with his prior sworn testimony when he made a last-minute recantation. The prosecutor was entitled to confront him with that statement that formed the basis of his own guilty plea so the jury could evaluate the witness's truthfulness. Baird v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4945 (Tex. App. Dallas June 26 2007).

63. Record did not reflect that defendant objected at any time that the State had called a witness to testify for the sole purpose of impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 607, as defendant contended on appeal, and thus defendant failed to preserve error under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; even if the court found that error was preserved, defendant's complaint was without merit, as the State had reasons for calling the witness, who provided important testimony that went beyond the prior statement to police, and furthermore, the witness's stated reluctance to testify at the beginning of direct examination did not, as defendant argued, indicate that the witness planned to recant the prior police statement. Scott v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2896 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 12 2007).

64. Under Tex. R. Evid. 607, no showing of surprise or injury was required before impeaching witnesses with their out-of-court statements. Blanton v. State, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2210 (Tex. Crim. App. June 30, 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : One's Own Witnesses : General Overview

65. Trial court did not err in allowing the State to call a witness and impeach her testimony that she did not hear anyone yell "police" because, although the State knew that the witness would testify unfavorably regarding whether she had heard the officers announce their presence, she was the only civilian witness to the events other than defendant, and also provided substantial evidence regarding defendant's links to narcotics, firearms, and the sequence of events once the complainants entered the apartment. Flores v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1809 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 26 2013).

66. Court did not abuse its discretion by admitting an audiotape of a State's witness's conversation into evidence because, even though the prosecutor did not specifically ask the witness if she had made the contradictory statement at a certain place and time, she denied having made the statement, and she equivocated about making the prior inconsistent statement. Perez v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1437, 2009 WL 1607811 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Feb. 26 2009).

67. In a child abandonment case, defendant failed to preserve for review her allegation that the State improperly called her child for the primary purpose of eliciting otherwise inadmissible evidence because, when the State began questioning the child about the statements she made to a detective, defendant objected based on hearsay and relevance, but she lodged only a hearsay objection, rather than an objection based on Tex. R. Evid. 403, when the detective testified about the prior inconsistent statements; the objection did not preserve a complaint that the State called the child as a subterfuge for eliciting otherwise inadmissible evidence. Castillo v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 5342 (Tex. App. El Paso June 22 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : One's Own Witnesses : Application : General Overview

68. Record was silent as to trial counsel's reasons for not objecting to the State's request to treat a witness as a hostile witness under Tex. R. Evid. 611(a), (c), but counsel might have had reasons for not doing so, and any of these reasons might explain a strategic motive behind this claimed instance of ineffective assistance and the court could not sustain defendant's point of error on this issue; to the extent that defendant's complaint might have encompassed a claim that counsel was ineffective by not objection to the State's attempt to impeach its own witness under Tex. R. Evid. 607, such was expressly permitted under the Rules and would not support a finding of ineffectiveness. Bryant v. State, 282 S.W.3d 156, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1737 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 13 2009).

69. Defendant complained that trial counsel failed to request a limiting instruction regarding the admission of an exhibit, admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 607, but because the court could imagine a reasonable, strategic reason to explain the complained-of conduct, the record did not support defendant's contention of ineffective assistance. Bryant v. State, 282 S.W.3d 156, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1737 (Tex. App. Texarkana Mar. 13 2009).

70. Court evaluated defendant's claim of error regarding the admission of testimony of prior bad acts under case law addressing the State's misuse of its ability under Tex. R. Evid. 607 to impeach its own witness, and defendant's trial objection under Tex. R. Evid. 403 provided the proper framework for analysis of any error in the trial court's ruling permitting the line of questioning, and the trial court did not err in permitting the State to question the victim, defendant's mother, about her prior statements to police; there was little risk of prejudice, as the dispute was over the use of a firearm, and none of the extraneous offenses involved a firearm, and the line of questioning sought to serve the State's case by providing the jury with a reason to discount the victim's testimonial effort to mitigate her son's offense, not by giving the jury evidence of guilt that was not otherwise admissible. Mendoza v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7679 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 24 2007).

71. Defendant's wife's statements were made when she was still dominated by her emotions and fear, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 803(2), and thus the trial court did not err in admitting the statements as excited utterances and the State's purpose in calling the witness was not solely to introduce into evidence otherwise inadmissible hearsay, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 607; the statements had been previously admitted. White v. State, 201 S.W.3d 233, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7057 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : One's Own Witnesses : Application : Hostility

72. Trial court did not err in permitting the State to treat a witness in punishment as hostile, ask him leading questions, and impeach him with a prior statement because: (1) under Tex. R. Evid. 607, a witness's credibility could be attacked by any party; (2) Tex. R. Evid. 611 allowed a hostile witness to be interrogated by leading questions; and (3) there was no showing that the primary purpose of the use of the prior statement was to admit evidence otherwise inadmissible, or that the trial court misused the evidence in assessing punishment. Huggins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9550 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 5 2007).

73. Where the State's witness, who had previously worked for defendant and who testified under a grant of immunity, expressed difficulty recalling relevant facts and answered several questions with gestures rather than spoken responses, the trial court did not err in allowing the State to attack the credibility of its witness because under Tex. R. Evid. 607, the witness could be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness; also, because the witness was a hostile witness, under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c), the trial court properly allowed the State to interrogate the witness using leading questions. Huggins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7495 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 12 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : One's Own Witnesses : Limitations

74. In an arson of a habitation case, counsel's failure to object to the witnesses' prior inconsistent statements under Tex. R. Evid. 607 did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel because there was no reasonable probability that the trial's result would have been any different as there was sufficient circumstantial evidence that defendant started the fire. Thompson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3374, 2012 WL 1514776 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 30 2012).

75. Because it was apparent that the State's primary purpose, if not its only purpose, in calling the two witnesses they knew to be hostile was to introduce the two prior inconsistent statements in evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 607, trial counsel should have requested a jury instruction limiting the jury's consideration of the impeachment evidence. Thompson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3374, 2012 WL 1514776 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 30 2012).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Leading Questions

76. Trial court did not err in permitting the State to treat a witness in punishment as hostile, ask him leading questions, and impeach him with a prior statement because: (1) under Tex. R. Evid. 607, a witness's credibility could be attacked by any party; (2) Tex. R. Evid. 611 allowed a hostile witness to be interrogated by leading questions; and (3) there was no showing that the primary purpose of the use of the prior statement was to admit evidence otherwise inadmissible, or that the trial court misused the evidence in assessing punishment. Huggins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9550 (Tex. App. Beaumont Dec. 5 2007).

77. Where the State's witness, who had previously worked for defendant and who testified under a grant of immunity, expressed difficulty recalling relevant facts and answered several questions with gestures rather than spoken responses, the trial court did not err in allowing the State to attack the credibility of its witness because under Tex. R. Evid. 607, the witness could be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness; also, because the witness was a hostile witness, under Tex. R. Evid. 611(c), the trial court properly allowed the State to interrogate the witness using leading questions. Huggins v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7495 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 12 2007).

Rule 608 A Witness's Character for Truthfulness or Untruthfulness

(a) Reputation or Opinion Evidence.--A witness's credibility may be attacked or supported by testimony about the witness's reputation for having a character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or by testimony in the form of an opinion about that character. But evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the witness's character for truthfulness has been attacked.

(b) Specific Instances of Conduct.--Except for a criminal conviction under Rule 609, a party may not inquire into or offer extrinsic evidence to prove specific instances of the witness's conduct in order to attack or support the witness's character for truthfulness.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Civil Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Harmless Error Rule

1. In a personal injury case arising from an auto-pedestrian accident, any error under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), 107 in excluding evidence of a driver's subsequent automobile accidents was harmless because it was unlikely that, if the jury heard that evidence, it would apportioned more fault to the driver, given the admitted evidence that he consumed a pint of vodka on the day in question, was arrested for driving while intoxicated at the scene of the accident, and failed a breathalyzer test with a blood alcohol content that was nearly twice the legal limit. Muhs v. Whataburger, Inc., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9229, 2010 WL 4657955 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 18 2010).

Civil Rights Law : Section 1983 Actions : Law Enforcement Officials : Excessive Force

2. In an action alleging excessive force by police officers, any error was harmless when the trial court admitted evidence of plaintiff arrestee's prior drug use for impeachment purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 608. It was unlikely that plaintiff was harmed by the impeachment because the findings on liability did not hinge on plaintiff's credibility. Aguilera v. Nava, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5722, 2010 WL 2842900 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 21 2010).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Confrontation

3. In defendant's trial for two counts of aggravated assault on a public servant, the trial court did not violate defendant's right of confrontation under U.S. Const. amend. VI and Tex. Const. art. I, § 10 when the trial court refused to allow defendant to impeach the credibility of a State's witness by cross-examining the witness about a violent poem the witness had written to show that the inmate had contemplated shooting at other people contrary to the witness' answer to defendant's question. Defendant's use of the poem as a specific instance of conduct to attack the witness' credibility was barred by Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Hole v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Tyler June 29 2007).

4. In a trial for delivery of marihuana, the trial court properly excluded, under Tex. R. Evid. 608, impeachment evidence that an undercover officer was fired for lying to his superiors about his involvement in a high speed chase and that he incorrectly identified two other defendants. The Confrontation Clause did not require the admission because that evidence was not probative of a misidentification of defendant. Iglehart v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4273 (Tex. App. El Paso June 2 2005).

5. In an insurance fraud case, the trial court did not violate defendant's right to confront witnesses when it limited cross-examination of a State's witness about whether she lied to the State when she told the State that she had no criminal record during its preparation of the case as the witness's testimony did not show that she directly lied to the State concerning her criminal record, but rather showed her mistaken belief about the status of that record. Further, this evidence was not permissible to attack the witness's credibility because Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) bared impeachment of the witness's general character for truthfulness through specific acts of conduct other than evidence of conviction of a crime. Wycough v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4608 (Tex. App. El Paso May 20 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : General Overview

6. In a drug trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), Rule 608(a) in excluding evidence, offered to show bias, that an officer was investigated for planting drugs on a defendant in an unrelated case because the allegations were determined to be unfounded. Brown v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5432, 2010 WL 2772488 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 14 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Delivery, Distribution & Sale

7. In a trial for delivery of crack cocaine, evidence that a confidential informant was arrested for impersonating a peace officer was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 609. There was no evidence that the informant was convicted. Garrett v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 340, 2011 WL 193476 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 19 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Aggravated Offenses

8. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by limiting the cross-examination of the victim as to the irrelevant and potentially prejudicial matter of her alleged drug use after the assault because Tex. R. Evid. 608 barred defendant from cross-examining the victim regarding her drug use for the purpose of attacking her credibility, and testimony regarding her drug use after the assault was not relevant to prove any other material issue in the case related to the convicted offense. Defendant was not entitled to rely on evidence of the victim's drug use after the assault to rebut the State's claim that defendant's use or intended use of the weapon threatened deadly force or serious bodily injury. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2250, 2013 WL 857252 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 7 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Children : General Overview

9. In a trial for injury to a child, it did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 608, or the Confrontation Clause to exclude evidence related to the victim's prior accusation; there was no proof in the record that the prior accusation was false or that it was similar in nature to the offenses for which defendant was charged, and the excluded evidence did not involve a pending criminal charge against the victim. Fierro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2160 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 22 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Kidnapping : General Overview

10. In a case charging that defendant kidnapped a car salesperson to collect a debt, defendant should have been permitted to introduce testimony from five business associates that defendant was an honest, non-violent businessperson, whom they trusted; the court rejected the State's argument under Tex. R. Evid. 608, which the court noted was an impeachment rule; defendant was not seeking to admit the testimony in response to being impeached but to show that, in light of his character for truthfulness, honesty, and non-violence, it was unlikely that defendant committed the charged offense. Melgar v. State, 236 S.W.3d 302, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2207 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Stalking : General Overview

11. In a retaliation case, a court properly refused to permit defendant to present witnesses to testify about his character for truthfulness where the State's cross-examination did nothing more than illuminate the inconsistencies between defendant's version of the events and the State's, and this did not constitute an attack on defendant's character for truthfulness. Moore v. State, 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : General Overview

12. It would have been proper for defense counsel in a murder trial to object under Tex. R. Evid. 702, 608(a)(1) when an officer opined that defendant was deceptive and lying, but failing to object did not render counsel ineffective because defendant did not show prejudice, given that the case did not hinge on a single witness's credibility. Salinas v. State, 368 S.W.3d 550, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1923 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 17 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Indecent Exposure : General Overview

13. In an indecency with a child by contact and indecency with a child by exposure case, because the child-complainant's character for truthfulness was attacked in defendant's opening statements, Tex. R. Evid. 608(a)(2) allowed rebuttal evidence of the witness's good character. Conti v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8758, 2011 WL 5248348 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 3 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

14. Because defendant's cross-examination asked the foster mother to testify with respect to the child complainant's truthfulness to the specific allegations of aggravated sexual abuse and invited the State to remedy any misconception it might have caused to the jury, the trial court did not err by allowing the foster mother's testimony into evidence pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 608. Gomez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9593, 2011 WL 6142735 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 8 2011).

15. In a trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child, defendant was not entitled to cross-examine a witness, the complainant's sister, about a similar outcry she made years before her outcry against defendant. There was no showing that the prior allegation of abuse was a false accusation, such evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) for the purpose of attacking the witness's general credibility, and the exclusion did not violate the Confrontation Clause. Palmer v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3156 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 29 2010).

16. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, defendant was entitled under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 613(b) to impeach the complainant by presenting evidence that the complainant threatened to falsely accuse neighbors of molestation, even though the threats occurred after the charged offense. The complainant testified to becoming angry when defendant took back a gift, and, the very next day, the complainant accused defendant of molestation. Billodeau v. State, 277 S.W.3d 34, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 232 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : Elements

17. In a trial for child sexual assault, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) in precluding defendant from questioning the complainant about prior false allegations of sexual abuse because that evidence was of negligible probative value, given that defendant admitted to every element of the aggravated sexual assault offense but the complainant's age. Moreover, the prejudicial effect of the evidence against the complainant could have been extreme, portraying the complainant as a troubled girl with more sexual sophistication than even the charged offense revealed. Pintor v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 267, 2009 WL 92443 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 15 2009).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : General Overview

18. In a trial for defendant's aggravated assault of a former romantic partner, the trial court properly excluded evidence of the victim's prior inconsistent statement regarding a pending driving while intoxicated charge because specific instances of a witness's conduct could not be used to bolster or attack their credibility under Tex. R. Evid. 608. Padilla v. State, 254 S.W.3d 585, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2719 (Tex. App. Eastland 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Weapons : Possession : General Overview

19. At defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it refused to allow the defense to cross examine a witness regarding his criminal history and his violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 46.04. Under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and 609, the details of a conviction were generally inadmissible for the purpose of impeachment; because there was no evidence that the witness was convicted of the firearms offense under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 46.04, it was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Henson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 974, 2013 WL 396015 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 31 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Brady Materials : General Overview

20. In a driving while intoxicated prosecution, a new trial should not have been granted on the basis that the State failed to disclose that at the time of trial, there was an ongoing investigation by the Texas Attorney General into a detaining officer's alleged possession and promotion of child pornography; the existence of the investigation was not impeachment evidence, absent any basis for inferring that the officer was aware of the investigation. State v. Moore, 240 S.W.3d 324, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6153 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Brady Materials : Brady Claims

21. Defendant was not entitled to attack the arresting officer's credibility by showing that he was under investigation for violating the Occupations Code, a specific instance of misconduct, and therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that defendant did not establish a Brady violation. Smith v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9194 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 25 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

22. Defendant failed to prove that counsel was deficient in failing to object to the detective's opinion regarding the child victim's truthfulness because her character for truthfulness was attacked in defendant's opening statements, and therefore Tex. R. Evid. 608 allowed for rebuttal evidence of her good character. Because the record was silent, the court presumed that this logic drove counsel's failure to object. Aranda v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1882 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 28 2013).

23. Defendant did not show that counsel was ineffective in failing to object when a detective testified, in a singular question and response, regarding the truthfulness of the complainant, in violation of Tex. R. Evid. 702, 608(a), because there was nothing in the record to indicate why counsel did not object. McGuire v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 673, 2010 WL 322988 (Tex. App. Texarkana Jan. 29 2010).

24. In defendant's indecency with a child case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the rebuttal testimony regarding the victim's reputation for truthfulness, as well as testimony specifically rebutting the defensive theory that the victim was coached because it appeared that the defensive strategy was to suggest that the victim was coached by adults to fabricate and lie about an incident that did not occur. A reasonable juror might have interpreted defense counsel's questioning and comments as attacks on the victim's credibility. Alberts v. State, 302 S.W.3d 495, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9427 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 11 2009).

25. In a case in which defendant was convicted of murder, defendant did not prove by a preponderance of the evidence that his trial counsel's representation was deficient where, although he claimed that trial counsel did not call witnesses who would have supported his contention that his cousin killed the victim, it could not be said that counsel was ineffective for failing to attempt to introduce evidence that was inadmissible because: (1) neither the witnesses nor the proffered testimony attacked the cousin's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, nor did their testimony establish he had been convicted of a crime within the parameters of Tex. R. Evid. 609; and (2) as to testimony by defendant's grandmother and uncle about what the cousin's father told them, that evidence was clearly hearsay, and defendant did not demonstrate on the record any exception that would have permitted the admission of those statements. Moreover, defendant did not establish that, but for his counsel's failure to call the witnesses, there was a reasonable probability the result of the proceeding would have been different because there were three eyewitnesses to the murder, one of whom had no relationship to anyone other than the victim, and therefore no motive to lie, and his testimony was corroborated by the other two eyewitnesses. Aquino v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7391, 2009 WL 3030749 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 23 2009).

26. In a plea case, defense counsel was not rendered ineffective by failing to object under Tex. R. Evid. 608 to the State's questions about a specific instance of misconduct--a marijuana lab in defendant's home--because unadjudicated extraneous offenses and prior bad acts were admissible in punishment under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07 § 3(a)(1). Barry v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 1151, 2009 WL 400641 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 19 2009).

27. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's application for writ of habeas corpus where counsel's reliance on an investigator and failure to discover and present suggested impeachment evidence was not unreasonable or falling below an objective standard of reasonableness because trial counsel relied exclusively on the investigator to discover evidence for only one factual aspect of his case--impeachment evidence--and otherwise demonstrated adequate knowledge of the facts, and because counsel attempted to impeach the complainant during trial in various ways and gave strategic reasons for not calling two of defendant's suggested witnesses; moreover, defendant had not established prejudice because counsel's actions or omissions did not preclude defendant's only viable defense, and, because most of the suggested evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608, defendant failed to show that such evidence would have benefitted his defense. Cano v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7881 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 4 2007).

28. Defense counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to inadmissible impeachment evidence consisting of defendant's prior convictions because on direct examination, defendant preemptively admitted to numerous prior convictions in an attempt to minimize any damage. Andrews v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7217 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 5 2007).

29. Appellant's application for a writ of habeas corpus was properly denied because trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to object, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), to evidence of appellant's dismissal from the police for filing a false report, because, even though counsel offered no strategic reason for failing to object, the record showed that the State did not thereafter significantly pursue the evidence and counsel gave appellant the opportunity on redirect to explain the false report. Cano v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5538 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 17 2007).

30. In a trial for child sexual abuse, counsel was rendered ineffective by not objecting to the State's bolstering of the complainant's truthfulness and credibility through both experts and lay witnesses; testimony from the child's teacher and a parent was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608 to the extent that it went to the complainant's truthfulness in the particular allegations and was admitted before the complainant's credibility was attacked. Fuller v. State, 224 S.W.3d 823, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3686 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Compulsory Process

31. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that releasing a sergeant from further testimony did not violate defendant's right to compulsory process because evidence that the sergeant believed the arresting police officer was untruthful during a prior unrelated incident was inadmissible under this rule. Freeman v. State, 413 S.W.3d 198, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11959, 2013 WL 5324000 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 24 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Confrontation

32. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in limiting defendant's cross-examination of a child sexual assault complainant regarding his threats to falsely accuse a neighbor and her adult son of molestation where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and that the Confrontation Clause did not mandate its admission because the alleged threats, which the complainant denied having made, took place over a year after the instant offense by defendant, there was no evidence at trial that the complainant had a propensity to lie or a vengeful temper toward adults prior to or upon the complainant's allegation toward defendant, and the complainant's threats against the neighbor and her son were not identical, as defendant urged, to the complainant's accusation against defendant. Billodeau v. State, 263 S.W.3d 318, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6404 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

33. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by limiting defendant's cross-examination of the child victim by prohibiting questions about prior molestation accusations and threats made by the victim to impeach his credibility because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and that the Confrontation Clause did not mandate its admission; the alleged false accusations the victim made towards others occurred over a year after the instant offense by defendant, there was no evidence at trial that the victim had a propensity to lie, and the victim denied making any threats or accusations; the victim's testimony concerning false accusations was likely to unduly prejudice and confuse the jury because the record indicated that his threats were not identical to his accusation against defendant. Billodeau v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4462 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 7 2007).

34. In a drug case, the trial court's exclusion of evidence that defendant sought to admit for the purpose of attacking the truthfulness of a police officer did not violate defendant's right to confrontation because the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608. Sandoval v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10208 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 30 2006).

35. Defendant's right to confrontation was not violated where the record in an aggravated sexual assault of a child case did not support defendant's contention that he offered conclusive proof that an allegation the victim made against her brother was false. This allegation was reported by the victim after the incident with defendant, and without conclusive proof that it was false, it had little probative value, but a high risk of undue prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Macias v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1856 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 10 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Child Witnesses

36. Defendant was not entitled to impeach a sexual assault victim's credibility by asking questions about specific conduct regarding a prior allegation of sexual assault against another man, where there was no evidence to support that the prior allegation was false. Valdez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7208 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 12 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Cross-Examination

37. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to allow him to cross-examine the officer about specific acts of misconduct allegedly showing he was violent and not credible with citizens in the community because no charges were brought against the officer for any of the alleged misconduct and it was not shown that those events were connected to the officer defendant was tried for, namely shooting the officer. Castillo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2034, 2013 WL 781776 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 1 2013).

38. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant the right to cross-examine the victim regarding her plan to deceive her parents as to where she would be on the night in question because it was primarily an attack on her general credibility and was not relevant as proof of bias, prejudice, or ulterior motive for her to accuse defendant of sexually assaulting her. Clay v. State, 390 S.W.3d 1, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10757, 2012 WL 6721012 (Tex. App.

Texarkana Dec. 28 2012).

39. In a driving while intoxicated case, even if defendant should have been allowed to ask the arresting officer about his own driving record, refusing to allow the question was harmless because defendant had already successfully cross-examined the officer about some of the details of his two prior traffic accidents. Bridges v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9104, 2011 WL 5557534 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 16 2011).

40. Trial court did not abuse its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 404(a)(3), 608(a), 613 by denying defendant the opportunity to cross-examine a witness about whether the witness was untruthful to the judge that presided over the witness's guilty plea to an assault charge. Reyes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2359, 2010 WL 1254543 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 1 2010).

41. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in limiting defendant's cross-examination of a child sexual assault complainant regarding his threats to falsely accuse a neighbor and her adult son of molestation where the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and that the Confrontation Clause did not mandate its admission because the alleged threats, which the complainant denied having made, took place over a year after the instant offense by defendant, there was no evidence at trial that the complainant had a propensity to lie or a vengeful temper toward adults prior to or upon the complainant's allegation toward defendant, and the complainant's threats against the neighbor and her son were not identical, as defendant urged, to the complainant's accusation against defendant. Billodeau v. State, 263 S.W.3d 318, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6404 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

42. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by limiting defendant's cross-examination of the child victim by prohibiting questions about prior molestation accusations and threats made by the victim to impeach his credibility because the trial court could have reasonably concluded that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and that the Confrontation Clause did not mandate its admission; the alleged false accusations the victim made towards others occurred over a year after the instant offense by defendant, there was no evidence at trial that the victim had a propensity to lie, and the victim denied making any threats or accusations; the victim's testimony concerning false accusations was likely to unduly prejudice and confuse the jury because the record indicated that his threats were not identical to his accusation against defendant. Billodeau v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4462 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. June 7 2007).

43. In an indecency with a child case, a court properly restricted defendant's cross-examination of the victim's mother regarding benefits from a crime victims' compensation fund intended to show that she sought financial gain as a consequence of the incident because the proffered evidence was only marginally probative on the issue of bias or motive, and the mother was effectively impeached because she was incarcerated at the time of trial serving a sentence for forgery and had given custody of her children to a relative. Hoover v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1549 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 27 2007).

44. In a criminal trial for driving while intoxicated, the court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias. The specific instances of conduct defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hasty or jump to conclusions at the crime scene. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

45. In a criminal trial for driving while intoxicated, the court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias. The specific instances of conduct defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hastily or jump to conclusions at the crime scene. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

46. During defendant's trial for indecent exposure, the trial court properly excluded evidence that the victim called the police regarding various disturbances at her residence on several occasions following the report of exposure because the decision was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; the trial court maintained broad discretion to impose reasonable limits on cross-examination to avoid harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, endangering the witness, and the injection of cumulative and collateral evidence, and, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), specific instances of conduct, other than conviction of a crime, when offered to attack the witness's credibility could not be explored on cross-examination. Tennison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2120 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 16 2006).

47. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not err by limiting cross-examination of the state's witnesses as to an extraneous robbery offense; naked allegations about the witnesses were insufficient to raise an inference that they had a motive to testify falsely for the state concerning the capital murder defense, and after the witnesses denied the allegations, Tex. R. Evid. 608 precluded counsel from introducing extrinsic evidence of the offense. Crenshaw v. State, 125 S.W.3d 651, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10196 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Credibility

48. Court acted within its discretion in concluding that the complainant's alleged prior use of alcohol with her mom was not relevant to whether the complainant could accurately recollect events that took place when she was not staying in her mother's home, because such testimony would not be relevant to the complainant's ability to recollect the events of the crimes alleged, which occurred when the complainant was staying with defendant, not her mother, during spring break. Vega v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1852, 2011 WL 882329 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 15 2011).

49. In defendant's sexual assault case, evidence was improperly excluded because it was admissible to impeach the complainant's credibility. The evidence in the records not only addressed the complainant's mental state but directly addressed her inability to separate fantasy from reality; the therapist's notes raised the possibility that the complainant had not been abused by defendant but had created the event in her mind or confused an actual event with fantasy. State v. Moreno, 297 S.W.3d 512, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7642 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

50. Court properly limited cross-examination of a witness because defendant's attempt to use an instance during an officer's career in which he wrote "phantom" warning citations was nothing more than an instance of wrongdoing in his life and was not shown to bear on his general reputation for truthfulness. There was nothing which revealed that the act of wrongdoing created a bias on the part of the officer against defendant or caused the officer to have a motive to testify untruthfully. McMillon v. State, 294 S.W.3d 198, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

51. Where defendant was charged with sexual assault of a child based on statements by the 14-year-old victim that she had a sexual relationship with defendant, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by prohibiting defendant from cross-examining the victim concerning an alleged mental impairment under Tex. R. Evid. 608; defendant's voir dire examination of the victim failed to show any condition that altered her perception of the offense; the testimony reflected nothing to show bias, prejudice, motive, or any factors which would tend to affect the victim's credibility. Rivera v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2992 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 24 2008).

52. In a trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, the court properly excluded testimony from the victim's daughter tendered to show that the victim had a tendency to exaggerate and was not being truthful. The daughter's statements during voir dire did not show that she could qualify that the victim's general reputation for truthfulness was bad. Licon v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1402 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 18 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Impeachment

53. In a case in which defendant was convicted of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by limiting the cross-examination of the victim as to the irrelevant and potentially prejudicial matter of her alleged drug use after the assault because Tex. R. Evid. 608 barred defendant from cross-examining the victim regarding her drug use for the purpose of attacking her credibility, and testimony regarding her drug use after the assault was not relevant to prove any other material issue in the case related to the convicted offense. Defendant was not entitled to rely on evidence of the victim's drug use after the assault to rebut the State's claim that defendant's use or intended use of the weapon threatened deadly force or serious bodily injury. Brown v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2250, 2013 WL 857252 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 7 2013).

54. Where defendant was charged with sexual assault of a child based on statements by the 14-year-old victim that she had a sexual relationship with defendant, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by prohibiting defendant from cross-examining the victim concerning an alleged mental impairment under Tex. R. Evid. 608; defendant's voir dire examination of the victim failed to show any condition that altered her perception of the offense; the testimony reflected nothing to show bias, prejudice, motive, or any factors which would tend to affect the victim's credibility. Rivera v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2992 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Apr. 24 2008).

55. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's application for writ of habeas corpus where counsel's reliance on an investigator and failure to discover and present suggested impeachment evidence was not unreasonable or falling below an objective standard of reasonableness because trial counsel relied exclusively on the investigator to discover evidence for only one factual aspect of his case--impeachment evidence--and otherwise demonstrated adequate knowledge of the facts, and because counsel attempted to impeach the complainant during trial in various ways and gave strategic reasons for not calling two of defendant's suggested witnesses; moreover, defendant had not established prejudice because counsel's actions or omissions did not preclude defendant's only viable defense, and, because most of the suggested evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608, defendant failed to show that such evidence would have benefitted his defense. Cano v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7881 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 4 2007).

56. Because a witness's testimony was admissible only to rebut defendant's statement of good conduct with minors, a court should have given an instruction to use the testimony only in assessing defendant's credibility, not as proof that he committed the offense or as proof of a plan to have a sexual relationship with the victim. Daggett v. State, 187 S.W.3d 444, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2127 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

57. Tex. R. Evid. 608 did not require that a murder defendant be allowed to impeach the State's eyewitness with testimony that an eyewitness's house was known in the neighborhood as a "bootleg" because defendant elicited the alleged false impression from the witness on cross-examination. Olivarez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 3716 (Tex. App. Dallas May 16 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reversible Errors : General Overview

58. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault where the 12-year-old-victim testified against defendant, the trial court committed reversible error by excluding testimony from the child's fifth grade teacher that the victim was not an honest child. Sanchez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6314 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 15 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : General Overview

59. When defendant's wife testified for him at the sentencing phase of his trial, the trial court erred in allowing the State to question her with regard to her drug use. The error was not preserved for review, however, because defendant failed to object to each question regarding the wife's drug use. Holden v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 9875 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 4 2004).

60. Where defendant failed to object to the admission of his statement to authorities regarding the credibility of his victim that he claimed violated Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) by admitting his statement because it bolstered the complainant's credibility when the complainant's credibility had not been impeached, he failed to preserve the issue for appellate review since none of the fundamental error categories included the admission or exclusion of evidence. Apolinar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6025 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 7 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Evidence

61. Defendant failed to preserve for review his claim that the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the covers of commercial pornography video recording that were found in his home because the argument that the covers were more prejudicial than probative was preserved at trial, it was not argued on appeal. Although the argument that the covers improperly impeached the witness with other acts was argued on appeal, it was not preserved for review. Fletcher v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5429, 2012 WL 2783298 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 10 2012).

62. Defendant preserved the issue of the denial of his right to test the credibility of a witness based on Tex. R. Evid. 608 by proffering the cross-examination of the witness for the purpose of testing the witness's credibility and by discussing that rule in argument to the trial court, which based its decision to exclude the testimony on the conclusion that it violated Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Perry v. State, 236 S.W.3d 859, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7942 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

63. Defendant failed to preserve for review his claims that he was denied a fair trial and due process by the prosecutor's repeated elicitation of inadmissible lay opinion testimony from two witnesses that one victim was truthful and that the witnesses believed that defendant had assaulted the victim because he failed to timely object to the admission of the witnesses' testimony and failed to raise prosecutorial misconduct or due process claims with the trial court. Lopez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6174 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 1 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Reviewability : Preservation for Review : Failure to Object

64. Even if error were properly preserved, Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) prohibited the purpose for which defendant now purported to have attempted to elicit the testimony from the victim's mother; because defendant did not contend that Rule 608(b), as applied in this case, violated his Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment rights to confrontation and cross-examination, he waived these rights with regard to impeaching the mother for bias by failing to preserve error. Quiroz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8939, 2010 WL 4492939 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 10 2010).

65. In a sexual assault case, defendant's bolstering argument under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) based on an officer's testimony that a victim seemed truthful and believable was not preserved for review because no objection was made before a trial court. Zuniga v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6905 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 10 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : General Overview

66. Trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) and 702 by allowing a detective to testify to the victim's truthfulness in defendant's sexual assault trial where the detective's comment regarding the victim's truthfulness came when defendant had not attacked the victim's truthfulness, but the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). McDonald v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1988 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2004).

67. Trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) and 702 by allowing a detective to testify to the victim's truthfulness in defendant's sexual assault trial where the detective's comment regarding the victim's truthfulness came when defendant had not attacked the victim's truthfulness, but the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). McDonald v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1988 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : Evidence

68. Trial court's decision to deny defendant the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses about the victim's accusation of sexual assault against another person was not an abuse of discretion because specific instances could not be inquired into under this rule, defendant never made a showing that the victim's allegation was false, and defendant was allowed to cross-examine witnesses regarding the victim's recantation of her accusation against her brother. Odom v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5009, 2014 WL 1882754 (Tex. App. Waco May 8 2014).

69. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding impeachment evidence consisting of a photograph of one of the co-defendant's aiming a handgun because the co-defendant's negative response to the question of whether he ever held a gun in his hand and pointed it at someone was not untruthful. Herrera v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5594, 2012 WL 2861673 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 12 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Abuse of Discretion : New Trial

70. In a driving while intoxicated prosecution, a new trial should not have been granted on the basis that the State failed to disclose that at the time of trial, there was an ongoing investigation by the Texas Attorney General into a detaining officer's alleged possession and promotion of child pornography; the existence of the investigation was not impeachment evidence, absent any basis for inferring that the officer was aware of the investigation. State v. Moore, 240 S.W.3d 324, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6153 (Tex. App. Austin 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : General Overview

71. In a trial for defendant's sexual assault of his daughter, any error was harmless when the trial court excluded testimony from the complainant's mother regarding disciplinary problems defendant had with the complainant, through which defendant sought to show the complainant's motive for the allegation. Any such motive was established by the complainant's testimony on cross-examination. Pruitt v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1669 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Mar. 2 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Appeals : Standards of Review : Harmless & Invited Errors : Evidence

72. Where defendant was convicted of DWI, he was not harmed by the trial court's refusal to allow him to impeach an officer with a specific act of dishonesty or his reputation for truthfulness. Evidence that the officer intentionally withheld testimony about his failing to report a weapon discharge would not have achieved defendant's specific goal of proving that the officer lied about defendant's reckless driving; a video of defendant's stop strongly supported a finding that he was intoxicated. Tollett v. State, 422 S.W.3d 886, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1216, 2014 WL 462275 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 4 2014).

73. In a driving while intoxicated case, even if defendant should have been allowed to ask the arresting officer about his own driving record, refusing to allow the question was harmless because defendant had already successfully cross-examined the officer about some of the details of his two prior traffic accidents. Bridges v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9104, 2011 WL 5557534 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 16 2011).

74. Because a witness testified about the mother's motive to fabricate the story that defendant sexually assaulted his child, the exclusion of another witness's testimony about the mother's truthfulness under Tex. R. Evid. 608 was not erroneous and, even if erroneous, it was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Stoker v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7698, 2011 WL 4414605 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2011).

75. Victim's uncle's testimony about the victim's truthfulness was properly admitted, Tex. R. Evid. 608(a), as it had no more than a slight influence or effect on the jury; any error was harmless, Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Diaz-gomez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4399, 2011 WL 2279185 (Tex. App. Dallas June 10 2011).

76. Under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) a murder defendant should have been allowed to cross-examine a witness, who was also a co-defendant, regarding the witness's history of visions and hallucinations; however, excluding the cross-examination was harmless error. Perry v. State, 236 S.W.3d 859, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7942 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

77. Where a witness had already been asked about the reputation of a seven-year-old sexual assault complainant for telling the truth, it was permissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608 to ask whether "it" was such that the complainant should be believed under oath because "it" referred to the complainant's reputation and did not require the witness to opine as to whether the complainant lied under oath; however, error in excluding the testimony was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because there was other testimony that the complainant had a bad reputation for truthfulness and significant evidence that the incident occurred as described by the complainant. Scott v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 473 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 25 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Habeas Corpus : Appeals : Standards of Review : General Overview

78. Appellant's application for a writ of habeas corpus was properly denied because trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to object, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), to evidence of appellant's dismissal from the police for filing a false report, because, even though counsel offered no strategic reason for failing to object, the record showed that the State did not thereafter significantly pursue the evidence and counsel gave appellant the opportunity on redirect to explain the false report. Cano v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5538 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 17 2007).

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Curative Admissibility

79. In a trial for serious bodily injury under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02, a 30-year-old prior assault conviction was properly admitted to impeach defendant's claim not to be a violent person because defendant opened the door for impeachment for purposes of exceptions to both Tex. R. Evid. 609 and Tex. R. Evid. 608. Grant v. State, 247 S.W.3d 360, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1135 (Tex. App. Austin 2008).

80. In a case alleging aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, defendant was not allowed to question witnesses regarding a previous child abuse complaint against the same child since it was not relevant or material to the offense, and a mother could not have been questioned about specific instances of conduct; moreover, the mother's testimony during direct examination did not leave a misleading impression with the jury which needed clarification under Tex. R. Evid. 107; the focus of the prior investigation was a grandmother, who was not a witness in the case. Hernandez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6815 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 23 2007).

Evidence : Relevance : Character Evidence

81. In appellant's prosecution for indecency with a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence that an outcry witness's parental rights to her three children had been terminated as she had admitted to two felony convictions and to not having custody of her children; any false impression that might have been created was thus corrected. Tippett v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6256, 2010 WL 3036480 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 4 2010).

82. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing defendant from cross-examining the complainant about her previous false allegations of sexual assault. The evidence barred by Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show the complainant's bias against defendant and her possible motive to testify falsely against him. Hammer v. State, 296 S.W.3d 555, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 513 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

83. In an action against the owner of a corporation for breach of an employment contract and breach of a stock option agreement, a trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting testimony as to the owner's dishonest character because the owner himself was a witness and thus his credibility was at issue. Simplified Dev. Corp. v. Garfield, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8840 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 6 2007).

84. Because defendant testified to now knowing who was breaking into his car, the victim's prior criminal history and general reputation would have had no bearing on the reasonableness of defendant's actions, in defendant's murder trial, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion by not admitting this evidence; in any event, given that defendant was allowed to testify that the victim was a drug addict and had tried to sell him stolen car stereos, the exclusion of this evidence would have been harmless in any event. Freeman v. State, 230 S.W.3d 392, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3965 (Tex. App. Eastland 2007).

85. In a case charging that defendant kidnapped a car salesperson to collect a debt, defendant should have been permitted to introduce testimony from five business associates that defendant was an honest, non-violent businessperson, whom they trusted; the court rejected the State's argument under Tex. R. Evid. 608, which the court noted was an impeachment rule; defendant was not seeking to admit the testimony in response to being impeached but to show that, in light of his character for truthfulness, honesty, and non-violence, it was unlikely that defendant committed the charged offense. Melgar v. State, 236 S.W.3d 302, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2207 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

86. The State's objections to defendant's offer of evidence of his good character for being truthful were properly sustained where the cross-examination of defendant was unexceptional, and not particularly vigorous, while the State pointed out contradictions within defendant's testimony and between his testimony and that of other witnesses, and the State did not directly attack defendant's character for truthfulness. Moore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3017 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Waco July 21, 2004), substituted opinion at 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

87. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying him permission to cross-examine the complainant on the reasons for her 1991 military discharge because there was no authority explaining how a suicide attempt 20 years ago would affect the complainant's credibility during trial. Duff v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4662 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 11 2013).

88. Defendant failed to preserve for review his claim that the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the covers of commercial pornography video recording that were found in his home because the argument that the covers were more prejudicial than probative was preserved at trial, it was not argued on appeal. Although the argument that the covers improperly impeached the witness with other acts was argued on appeal, it was not preserved for review. Fletcher v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5429, 2012 WL 2783298 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 10 2012).

89. Under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and 609, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the State to ask defendant about his prior arrests after he opened the door with his testimony or in determining that the probative value of such evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

90. In a child sexual abuse case, the trial court did not err when it excluded evidence of the complainant's prior bad conduct as too remote; such evidence is subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 608, and although remoteness in time is not a concept generally considered under Tex. R. Evid. 608, it was pertinent to a Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis. Blanchard v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8403 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 25 2007).

91. Because a witness's testimony was admissible only to rebut defendant's statement of good conduct with minors, a court should have given an instruction to use the testimony only in assessing defendant's credibility, not as proof that he committed the offense or as proof of a plan to have a sexual relationship with the victim. Daggett v. State, 187 S.W.3d 444, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2127 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

92. In a drug possession trial, the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the admission of evidence that defendant possessed fictitious driver's licenses and credit cards. The error was harmless, however, because the State did not spend much time during the guilt-innocence phase of the trial developing testimony concerning defendant's possession of the fictitious credit cards and driver's licenses. Moreover, the record contained ample evidence supporting defendant's guilt. Owen v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4144 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 6 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Prior Acts, Crimes & Wrongs

93. Defendant did not establish a basis in the trial court for admission of this evidence as an exception to the rules by relating his attorney's past bar grievance history as relevant in a way that might overcome the precepts of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b)-like motive, intent, plan, or pattern; in addition, defendant did not present any evidence that knowing his attorney's history with other clients would have factored into his decision to take a plea, where he made no inquiry into the attorney's history prior to taking the plea, and pointed to no affirmative misrepresentation by the attorney made in connection with the information relevant to the plea. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding such evidence from defendant's motion for a new trial hearing. Starz v. State, 309 S.W.3d 110, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7711 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 30 2009).

94. Court did not err by not allowing defendant to cross-examine the victim about her prior sexual experience because the evidence that defendant sought to introduce through the declarant relating to the victim's sexual activity with her boyfriend did not relate to the charged sexual contact offenses, but was offered to impeach the victim's credibility relating to her accusation two years later that defendant also sexually assaulted her. The declarant's forensic interview contained inadmissible hearsay and, as the trial court noted, the victim's conduct discussed in that interview was not at all similar to the charged offenses. Fugate v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6266 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18, 2008).

95. Because a witness's testimony was admissible only to rebut defendant's statement of good conduct with minors, a court should have given an instruction to use the testimony only in assessing defendant's credibility, not as proof that he committed the offense or as proof of a plan to have a sexual relationship with the victim. Daggett v. State, 187 S.W.3d 444, 2005 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2127 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005).

96. In a drug possession trial, the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the admission of evidence that defendant possessed fictitious driver's licenses and credit cards. The error was harmless, however, because the State did not spend much time during the guilt-innocence phase of the trial developing testimony concerning defendant's possession of the fictitious credit cards and driver's licenses. Moreover, the record contained ample evidence supporting defendant's guilt. Owen v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4144 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 6 2004).

Evidence : Relevance : Relevant Evidence

97. Defendant did not point to any evidence that the victim's mother hit the victim order to get the victim to lie about being sexually assaulted; evidence that the mother had allegedly hit the victim, without more, was irrelevant to the mother's veracity. Coleman v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6691, 2014 WL 2809064 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 19 2014).

98. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of two witnesses concerning the victim's prior sexual history because it did not make it more or less probable that defendant touched the victim's breast and therefore was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. In addition, the evidence was properly excluded because it was an attempt to impeach the victim through the inquiry of specific instance of conduct, which was improper under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8246, 2012 WL 4497999 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 28 2012).

99. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for the Class A misdemeanor offense of assault causing bodily injury in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant regarding past accusations of spousal abuse where the complainant's character for truthfulness was not attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise as required by Tex. R. Evid. 608; instead, during cross-examination, defendant attempted to inquire into prior accusations of abuse that the complainant made against her ex-husband for the purpose of attacking the complainant's credibility, and, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, Tex. R. Evid. 402, Tex. R. Evid. 608, the probative value of the evidence sought to be admitted was extremely low, particularly because defense counsel admitted during trial that he had no evidence that the complainant lied about the abuse and that the accusations occurred a long time ago. Sullivan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1394 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2008).

100. In a case alleging aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, defendant was not allowed to question witnesses regarding a previous child abuse complaint against the same child since it was not relevant or material to the offense, and a mother could not have been questioned about specific instances of conduct; moreover, the mother's testimony during direct examination did not leave a misleading impression with the jury which needed clarification under Tex. R. Evid. 107; the focus of the prior investigation was a grandmother, who was not a witness in the case. Hernandez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6815 (Tex. App. Amarillo Aug. 23 2007).

101. In defendant's trial on charges of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence concerning the victim's emotional stability because although defendant sought to introduce evidence for the stated purpose of showing that the victim was a troubled teen falsifying the charge to get attention from her mother, the evidence was not relevant in that it did not show a motive to lie, or show bias or prejudice; further, Tex. R. Evid. 608 prohibited inquiring into a witness' past behavior, other than behavior based on which there has been a criminal conviction, to attack or support a witness' credibility. Baker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4308 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 18 2006).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : General Overview

102. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault and solicitation of a minor, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit evidence showing that the complainant had knowledge of sexual matters before these alleged events occurred because the evidence was hearsay and subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 609 and 613. Landers v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2982, 2011 WL 1496154 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 19 2011).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Rape Shield Laws

103. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to allow defendant to bring up the victim's purported statement to her friend about an alleged rape by defendant based on Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) because it had substantial discretion to limit cross-examination and avoid allowing the proceeding to devolve into a trial of multiple sub-issues on collateral matters and there were other allegedly inconsistent or incredible statements by the victim that were before the jury that militated against her credibility. Gentry v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9404 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 18 2008).

Evidence : Relevance : Sex Offenses : Similar Acts

104. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing defendant from cross-examining the complainant about her previous false allegations of sexual assault. The evidence barred by Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show the complainant's bias against defendant and her possible motive to testify falsely against him. Hammer v. State, 296 S.W.3d 555, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 513 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : General Overview

105. In an indecency with a child by contact and indecency with a child by exposure case, because the child-complainant's character for truthfulness was attacked in defendant's opening statements, Tex. R. Evid. 608(a)(2) allowed rebuttal evidence of the witness's good character. Conti v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8758, 2011 WL 5248348 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 3 2011).

106. Court acted within its discretion in concluding that the complainant's alleged prior use of alcohol with her mom was not relevant to whether the complainant could accurately recollect events that took place when she was not staying in her mother's home, because such testimony would not be relevant to the complainant's ability to recollect the events of the crimes alleged, which occurred when the complainant was staying with defendant, not her mother, during spring break. Vega v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1852, 2011 WL 882329 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 15 2011).

107. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault on a child, a witness could give her opinion as to a complainant's truthfulness, and she could also testify as to whether the complainant had a reputation for truthfulness; the trial court erred in ruling otherwise, but the error did not adversely affect the jury. Scott v. State, 222 S.W.3d 820, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2848 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

108. In an action in which appellant appealed from his convictions of three counts of indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the case was remanded to the trial court for a new trial where the exclusion of the psychologist's testimony regarding false memories had a substantial and injurious effect or influence on the jury's verdict and affected a substantial right of appellant's; the psychologist's false-memory testimony was general evidence that directly attacked the complainants' credibility and was, therefore, relevant and admissible during appellant's case-in-chief. Delong v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10031 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 16 2006).

109. No specific connection existed between the witness' testimony and the animus alleged that disclosed an actual bias or motive; accordingly, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit the testimony. Whitmill v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4610 (Tex. App. Beaumont May 19 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : General Overview

110. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding evidence concerning the victim's alleged recantation because due to the dissimilarity of the sexual abuse and the physical abuse that she allegedly recanted, the evidence could be deemed a collateral matter which was not permitted to be used to impeach and defendant failed to show an exception to that rule. Hosey v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7876, 2014 WL 3621796 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 23 2014).

111. In appellant's prosecution for indecency with a child, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence that an outcry witness's parental rights to her three children had been terminated as she had admitted to two felony convictions and to not having custody of her children; any false impression that might have been created was thus corrected. Tippett v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6256, 2010 WL 3036480 (Tex. App. Waco Aug. 4 2010).

112. Testimony did not address even the victim's general capacity of disposition to tell the truth, such that defendant's reliance on cases addressing Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) was misplaced. Verdun v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 360, 2010 WL 183523 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 21 2010).

113. Crime at issue was aggravated assault, and possession of or conviction of possession of a controlled substance by the victim was a collateral issue, and the simple fact that the victim had been convicted of, and was still on probation for, a felony bore on his credibility such that the specifics of any particular crime were duplicative and irrelevant; evidence of items seized under a 1998 search warrant had little, if any, bearing on the victim's credibility, and thus was inadmissible and the court overruled defendant's claim that the trial court erred in not applying the Confrontation clause exception to Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Aguilar v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6369, 2009 WL 2476628 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 14 2009).

114. In a sexual assault case, defendant's bolstering argument under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) based on an officer's testimony that a victim seemed truthful and believable was not preserved for review because no objection was made before a trial court. Zuniga v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6905 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 10 2008).

115. Tex. R. Evid. 608 and Tex. R. Evid. 609 prohibit inquiry by the prosecution into witness' pending criminal charges. Tenny v. Cockrell, 420 F. Supp. 2d 617, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29750 (W.D. Tex. 2004), aff'd 416 F.3d 404, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 13470 (5th Cir. Tex. 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : General Overview

116. No err by admitting the State's exhibit, which was a redacted plea of guilty and judicial confession for giving a false and fictitious name to police, because lying to a police officer involved moral turpitude (dishonesty); defendant did not object to the judicial confession, but only the other plea papers, the jury heard, without objection, that defendant had confessed to committing an offense. Harris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10620, 2012 WL 6674479 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 21 2012).

117. Given that the victim's narration of the assault was corroborated, counsel could have found that trying to impeach the victim's credibility by her deferred adjudication for theft would not have been effective, plus counsel said he did not discuss this matter because of appellant's own criminal record and because there was a risk of alienating the jury; thus, the trial court could have found that counsel's actions amounted to reasonable trial strategy, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying appellant's motion for a new trial. Sims v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5912, 2012 WL 2989252 (Tex. App. Austin July 18 2012).

118. Appellant claimed that the victim was lying in his case, and the previous crimes did not increase the victim's credibility, and it was not evidence that rehabilitated her truthfulness character under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b); the extraneous offenses did not rebut any defensive theory. Castle v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5570, 2012 WL 2862270 (Tex. App. Eastland July 12 2012).

119. Because a witness testified about the mother's motive to fabricate the story that defendant sexually assaulted his child, the exclusion of another witness's testimony about the mother's truthfulness under Tex. R. Evid. 608 was not erroneous and, even if erroneous, it was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Stoker v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7698, 2011 WL 4414605 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 22 2011).

120. Complaint on appeal was not preserved because appellant did not make a contemporaneous objection based on Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Munsinger v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7318, 2011 WL 3915671 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 7 2011).

121. In defendant's indecency with a child case, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the rebuttal testimony regarding the victim's reputation for truthfulness, as well as testimony specifically rebutting the defensive theory that the victim was coached because it appeared that the defensive strategy was to suggest that the victim was coached by adults to fabricate and lie about an incident that did not occur. A reasonable juror might have interpreted defense counsel's questioning and comments as attacks on the victim's credibility. Alberts v. State, 302 S.W.3d 495, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 9427 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 11 2009).

122. In defendant's sexual assault case, evidence was improperly excluded because it was admissible to impeach the complainant's credibility. The evidence in the records not only addressed the complainant's mental state but directly addressed her inability to separate fantasy from reality; the therapist's notes raised the possibility that the complainant had not been abused by defendant but had created the event in her mind or confused an actual event with fantasy. State v. Moreno, 297 S.W.3d 512, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7642 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

123. In a case in which defendant was convicted of murder, defendant did not prove by a preponderance of the evidence that his trial counsel's representation was deficient where, although he claimed that trial counsel did not call witnesses who would have supported his contention that his cousin killed the victim, it could not be said that counsel was ineffective for failing to attempt to introduce evidence that was inadmissible because: (1) neither the witnesses nor the proffered testimony attacked the cousin's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, nor did their testimony establish he had been convicted of a crime within the parameters of Tex. R. Evid. 609; and (2) as to testimony by defendant's grandmother and uncle about what the cousin's father told them, that evidence was clearly hearsay, and defendant did not demonstrate on the record any exception that would have permitted the admission of those statements. Moreover, defendant did not establish that, but for his counsel's failure to call the witnesses, there was a reasonable probability the result of the proceeding would have been different because there were three eyewitnesses to the murder, one of whom had no relationship to anyone other than the victim, and therefore no motive to lie, and his testimony was corroborated by the other two eyewitnesses. Aquino v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7391, 2009 WL 3030749 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 23 2009).

124. Court properly limited cross-examination of a witness because defendant's attempt to use an instance during an officer's career in which he wrote "phantom" warning citations was nothing more than an instance of wrongdoing in his life and was not shown to bear on his general reputation for truthfulness. There was nothing which revealed that the act of wrongdoing created a bias on the part of the officer against defendant or caused the officer to have a motive to testify untruthfully. McMillon v. State, 294 S.W.3d 198, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

125. Defendant's only objection was on the basis of relevance, plus he failed to object to certain questions and testimony on recross-examination, such that defendant, under Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1)(A), failed to preserve error on his claim that the State improperly impeached defendant's witness under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a), (b), 609(f). Scott v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 131, 2009 WL 51035 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 8 2009).

126. Because the only predicate established for the testimony of a reputation witness in a case of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon consisted of two specific acts by the complainant and the personal knowledge of the reputation witness, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the testimony. Lopez v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2303 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 2 2008).

127. In a domestic assault case arising in 2004, a trial court did not err by limiting the cross-examination of a victim regarding a pending assault against her from 2006 because there was no showing of bias due to that prosecution since the victim's story regarding the 2004 incident had not changed, and it was corroborated by an officer at the scene; moreover, it was improper to show the victim's bad character for untruthfulness under Tex. R. Evid. 609. McCrory v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4200 (Tex. App. Dallas May 30 2007).

128. Although defendant contended that three instances taken together constituted ineffective representation, (1) defendant did not show that counsel failed to make a sustainable objection to certain evidence, (2) an email was not in the record and defendant did not contend that another course of action by counsel would have rendered the evidence admissible, and (3) defendant did not contend that an evidentiary ruling on improper character evidence was erroneous or how counsel could have successfully introduced this evidence. Stepp v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1439 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 1 2007).

129. In an indecency with a child case, a court properly restricted defendant's cross-examination of the victim's mother regarding benefits from a crime victims' compensation fund intended to show that she sought financial gain as a consequence of the incident because the proffered evidence was only marginally probative on the issue of bias or motive, and the mother was effectively impeached because she was incarcerated at the time of trial serving a sentence for forgery and had given custody of her children to a relative. Hoover v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1549 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 27 2007).

130. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the child victim's mother's testimony about the child's character for truthfulness, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 608(a), given that defense counsel impeached the child's testimony with prior inconsistent statements and accused her of lying. Cervantes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3164 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 19 2006).

131. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the child victim's mother's testimony about the child's character for truthfulness, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 608(a), given that defense counsel impeached the child's testimony with prior inconsistent statements and accused her of lying. Cervantes v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3164 (Tex. App. Waco Apr. 19 2006).

132. In connection with defendant's capital murder trial under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.03, the trial court judge ruled the evidence of possible homosexual favors as admissible on the basis of impeachment, and even if that was not a correct ruling, the evidence could have come in to show the relationship between defendant and the victim, pursuant to Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 38.36(a). Whitmire v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 9593 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 17 2005), opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at 183 S.W.3d 522, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 170 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2006).

133. Defendant's conviction for murder was proper pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1) where the district court did not err by admitting evidence of specific instances of conduct regarding defendant's character for truthfulness because she did not complain at trial that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608. Pierce v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6229 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 3 2005).

134. Trial court did not err in refusing inquiry into defendant's reputation for truthfulness because the prosecutor's cross-examination of defendant did not constitute an attack on defendant's truthful character under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a)(2). In fact, it did not elicit any disagreement from defendant, and the cross-examination did not reveal any discrepancies between the State's evidence and defendant's testimony Jaurrieta v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4634 (Tex. App. El Paso June 16 2005).

135. In a murder case, the trial court did not reversibly err by denying defendant the opportunity to introduce evidence that his codefendant, the State's primary witness, was not a truth teller capable of belief under oath as the witness in question had no reasonable basis upon which to form an opinion as to the codefendant's truthfulness or upon which to testify as to his reputation. The witness's testimony was based solely on specific instances of misconduct that were of such a nature that they could not form the basis of an opinion that the codefendant was not worthy of belief because he generally did not tell the truth nor the basis of testimony as to the codefendant's poor reputation in the community for telling the truth. Dennis v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10377 (Tex. App. El Paso Nov. 18 2004).

136. In a retaliation case, a court properly refused to permit defendant to present witnesses to testify about his character for truthfulness where the State's cross-examination did nothing more than illuminate the inconsistencies between defendant's version of the events and the State's, and this did not constitute an attack on defendant's character for truthfulness. Moore v. State, 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

137. In a criminal prosecution for indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault where the 12-year-old-victim testified against defendant, the trial court committed reversible error by excluding testimony from the child's fifth grade teacher that the victim was not an honest child. Sanchez v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6314 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 15 2004).

138. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, limiting defendant's cross-examination of the complainant's mother, who testified as the outcry witness, and the complainant's best friend, who testified that defendant had touched her inappropriately, was not an abuse of discretion. Defendant sought to impeach the credibility of the complainant and her friend by introducing evidence of a specific instance of conduct, the false accusation of a third party, which was exactly what Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) proscribed. Kirk v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 710 (Tex. App. Dallas Jan. 26 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : Opinion & Reputation

139. Because defendant's voir dire and cross-examination would cause a reasonable juror to believe a sexual assault complainant's character for truthfulness had been attacked, a trial court did not err in admitting the testimony of character witnesses. Wall v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8784, 2014 WL 4180233 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 11 2014).

140. Defendant failed to prove that counsel was deficient in failing to object to the detective's opinion regarding the child victim's truthfulness because her character for truthfulness was attacked in defendant's opening statements, and therefore Tex. R. Evid. 608 allowed for rebuttal evidence of her good character. Because the record was silent, the court presumed that this logic drove counsel's failure to object. Aranda v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1882 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 28 2013).

141. Appellant did not say what bolstering theory was asserted at trial, and the court found the complainant's essay was not introduced as reputation evidence, such that appellant's objection did not appear to implicate Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) restrictions; the objection appeared to invoke Tex. R. Evid. 613(c), but that would not have excluded the essay either. Conteh v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8440, 2012 WL 4788386 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 9 2012).

142. Even if defendant had preserved his claim that a trial court erred in allowing a child sexual assault victim's mother to testify that she believed her daughter and that her daughter would not lie, the trial court's decision to admit the evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a)(2) was supported by the record because the defense had attacked the victim's character for truthfulness. Fitzgerald v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1570, 2012 WL 683400 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 29 2012).

143. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by permitting the State to ask defendant's wife "did you know" questions under Tex. R. Evid. 608 because defendant's theory was that the victim had falsely accused defendant. Johnson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7151, 2011 WL 3848985 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 31 2011).

144. Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the Internet social site exhibit, because the exhibit did not come within the parameters of Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) concerning opinion and reputation evidence, and it fell within the prohibition of Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Edwards v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6908, 2011 WL 3795696 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 29 2011).

145. Victim's uncle's testimony about the victim's truthfulness was properly admitted, Tex. R. Evid. 608(a), as it had no more than a slight influence or effect on the jury; any error was harmless, Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Diaz-gomez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4399, 2011 WL 2279185 (Tex. App. Dallas June 10 2011).

146. During defendant's trial for attempted murder and burglary of a habitation, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow a witness to testify as a reputation witness for the defense under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) because the witness denied being familiar with the victim's reputation in the community for truthfulness and admitted to never hearing anyone say that the victim was untruthful. Covarrubias v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1472, 2010 WL 705929 (Tex. App. El Paso Mar. 2 2010).

147. Certain testimony specifically impeached the accuracy of the victim's testimony, and to the extent that a witness's testimony presented evidence of the child victim's veracity, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 608(a), the court agreed with the State that the testimony did not constitute hearsay; however, much of the witness's testimony seemed to go beyond merely rehabilitating the child's character for truthfulness, and therefore arguably constituted hearsay, but even if failing to object to hearsay was not a viable trial strategy, defendant failed to meet the second prong of the test for ineffective assistance, as the testimony was cumulative and its introduction arguably harmless and defendant failed to show prejudice. Mitchell v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4137, 2009 WL 1623422 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 11 2009).

148. While petitioner state inmate argued his counsel was ineffective for not presenting additional witnesses to show the 9-year-old victim of his sexual assault was motivated to lie in retaliation for the inmate having disciplined the victim, nothing showed such testimony would have been admissible since, consistent with Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and a pre-trial order, defense counsel and defense witnesses were precluded from mentioning, directly or indirectly, any specific instance of conduct by the victim without first approaching the bench; under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), specific instances of conduct could be used to establish that a witness had specific bias, self-interest, or motive for testifying, and under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), specific acts of misconduct could also be used to establish a person's motive for performing an act, such as making a false allegation, but where credibility was concerned, a witness's general character for truthfulness could be shown only through reputation or opinion testimony under Rule 608(a). Mendez v. Quarterman, 625 F. Supp. 2d 415, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47543 (S.D. Tex. June 4 2009).

149. In a case involving assault against a public servant, the State did not err in recalling a deputy to the stand because defendant made no bolstering objection under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) or Tex. R. Evid. 613(c); moreover, there was no violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.02. At any rate, the deputy's testimony on recall did not duplicate that which was previously given. Reaves v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 28 2008).

150. Although an employer and owner claimed that testimony of the owner's character for untruthfulness violated Tex. R. Evid. 404, they ignored the plain language of Tex. R. Evid. 404; the court looked to Tex. R. Evid. 608 to determine if the opinion testimony complied with the Rules of Evidence, and the court found that the owner was a witness in the trial and thus his credibility was at issue and was subject to attack in the form of an opinion regarding his character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and thus the trial court did not err in admitting this testimony. Simplified Dev. Corp. v. Garfield, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1127 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 14 2008).

151. Defense counsel failed to establish that the witness's opinion of the victim was based on more than his personal knowledge; the witness did not testify that he was familiar with her reputation in the community or that his opinion was based upon observations and discussions; thus, under Tex. R. Evid. 608, the trial court acted within its discretion in denying defendant the opportunity to impeach the victim's testimony through evidence of her untruthfulness. Clark v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9452 (Tex. App. Dallas Dec. 4 2007).

152. Tex. R. Evid. 608 provides that, subject to some limitations, the credibility of a witness may be attacked by evidence in the form of an opinion or reputation. Garcia v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8373 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 24 2007).

153. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 608, witness testimony was neither an opinion nor evidence of reputation, and thus the trial court did not err in excluding the testimony. Garcia v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8373 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 24 2007).

154. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in failing to grant defendant's motion for a mistrial, raised when the victim's mother was permitted to give her personal opinion about the victim's character for being truthful; any error from the testimony occurred only one time, the jury was specifically instructed to disregard the testimony, which did not contribute to the mother's prior testimony, and the court did not perceive the testimony to be highly prejudicial and incurable. Montgomery v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5682 (Tex. App. Dallas July 19 2007).

155. Trial court did not err in admitting expert testimony in defendant's trial for attempted sexual assault; the expert was asked to describe in general, hypothetical terms behaviors that might be exhibited by a child who had been subjected to sexual abuse trauma, and the fact that the jury could have drawn a comparison between the expert's hypothetical child and the victim did not mean that the expert's testimony amounted to a direct comment on the victim's credibility; the expert's testimony was circumstantial evidence that something traumatic happened to the victim, and the fact that the evidence in some measure corroborated the victim's testimony did not make it any less relevant. Sanchez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5691 (Tex. App. Austin July 19 2007).

156. Defendant's complaint regarding opinion testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 608 was waived under Tex. R. App. P. 33 for failure to make a contemporaneous objection in the trial court. Denby v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5200 (Tex. App. Tyler June 29 2007).

157. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault on a child, a witness could give her opinion as to a complainant's truthfulness, and she could also testify as to whether the complainant had a reputation for truthfulness; the trial court erred in ruling otherwise, but the error did not adversely affect the jury. Scott v. State, 222 S.W.3d 820, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2848 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2007).

158. Without deciding whether it was error for the trial court to have excluded opinion testimony about the victim's bad reputation for being peaceful, the court held that the exclusion was harmless because similar evidence was admitted through various witnesses, and any error in the exclusion was cured by later testimony. Alvarez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 386 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 18 2007).

159. In a murder trial court, it was error to exclude a defense witness's opinion of a State witness's truthfulness because the opinion was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a), regardless of whether the defense witness was familiar with the reputation of the State witness or with the underlying facts or information upon which the opinion was based; the error was not reversible under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), however, because the testimony that the State witness had bad reputation for truthfulness, rather than that the State witness did not tell the truth, did not affect defendant's substantial rights. Peterson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10431 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2006).

160. Court had a silent record as to counsel's reasons, but it was plausible that counsel could have sought to avoid drawing any further attention to certain alleged extraneous offenses, and the lay witness testimony concerning the victim's veracity would have been admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) and the expert testimony complained of was elicited by defendant on cross-examination, such that defendant failed to show ineffective assistance of counsel. Najar v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8499 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 28 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bad Character for Truthfulness : Specific Instances

161. Defendant did not point to any evidence that the victim's mother hit the victim order to get the victim to lie about being sexually assaulted; evidence that the mother had allegedly hit the victim, without more, was irrelevant to the mother's veracity. Coleman v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6691, 2014 WL 2809064 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 19 2014).

162. During defendant's trial for sexual assault of a child, the court did not err in excluding evidence of the victim's prior hospitalizations and her mental state because defendant did not explain how her mental health issues affected her ability to recall events or were relevant to impeach her credibility. Cowell v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6278, 2014 WL 2583675 (Tex. App. Dallas June 10 2014).

163. Trial court's decision to deny defendant the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses about the victim's accusation of sexual assault against another person was not an abuse of discretion because specific instances could not be inquired into under this rule, defendant never made a showing that the victim's allegation was false, and defendant was allowed to cross-examine witnesses regarding the victim's recantation of her accusation against her brother. Odom v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5009, 2014 WL 1882754 (Tex. App. Waco May 8 2014).

164. Where defendant was convicted of DWI, he was not harmed by the trial court's refusal to allow him to impeach an officer with a specific act of dishonesty or his reputation for truthfulness. Evidence that the officer intentionally withheld testimony about his failing to report a weapon discharge would not have achieved defendant's specific goal of proving that the officer lied about defendant's reckless driving; a video of defendant's stop strongly supported a finding that he was intoxicated. Tollett v. State, 422 S.W.3d 886, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1216, 2014 WL 462275 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 4 2014).

165. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that releasing a sergeant from further testimony did not violate defendant's right to compulsory process because evidence that the sergeant believed the arresting police officer was untruthful during a prior unrelated incident was inadmissible under this rule. Freeman v. State, 413 S.W.3d 198, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 11959, 2013 WL 5324000 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 24 2013).

166. For purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding proffered testimony by a witness of the victim's alcohol use, given that (1) the witness testified she did not see or talk to the victim on the night in question, (2) the witness had no knowledge that the victim was impaired at the time of the offense, and (3) the alleged misrepresentation made by the victim was made during her cross-examination, not her direct examination. Carrion v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 5673 (Tex. App. Eastland May 9 2013).

167. Where defendant was convicted of indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, he failed to prove that the trial court erred by ruling that a question concerning the witness' prior false allegation of abuse was improper under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b); the record failed to establish what the child victim alleged that was false or that her allegation would demonstrate bias. Pierson v. State, 398 S.W.3d 406, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4868 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 19 2013).

168. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to allow him to cross-examine the officer about specific acts of misconduct allegedly showing he was violent and not credible with citizens in the community because no charges were brought against the officer for any of the alleged misconduct and it was not shown that those events were connected to the officer defendant was tried for, namely shooting the officer. Castillo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2034, 2013 WL 781776 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 1 2013).

169. Court did not find a Brady violation in this case, given that the record did not show that an officer's disciplinary report was withheld from appellant, and in any event, evidence of the disciplinary proceeding was not admissible for impeachment purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), and the prosecution did not have a duty to turn the report over; as (1) the officer had probable cause to stop appellant for driving without lights at night, and (2) there was evidence of appellant's intoxication, appellant could not show how impeaching the officer would have produced a different outcome, and he had no grounds on which to demand a new trial in his driving while intoxicated case. Baldez v. State, 386 S.W.3d 324, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5466, 2012 WL 2834043 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 11 2012).

170. Appellant sought to introduce a disciplinary report to show an officer's lack of credibility, but appellant did not argue that the officer was untrustworthy based on bias, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), and Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) expressly prohibits the introduction of specific instances of conduct to attack a witness's credibility; given that appellant tried to impeach the officer's credibility with the report, the trial court did not err in limiting the cross-examination, and even though the trial court limited cross-examination because the report was not a public record, the court could affirm if the ruling was correct on any applicable theory. Baldez v. State, 386 S.W.3d 324, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5466, 2012 WL 2834043 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 11 2012).

171. Sergeant's administrative adjudication of guilt for giving false testimony and information was more than 10 years old and unrelated to the assault at issue; the court could not find any exception to the general prohibition of this type of evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) should apply. Guillory v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 241, 2012 WL 113073 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 12 2012).

172. Prior unrelated acts of lying generally are inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Guillory v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 241, 2012 WL 113073 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 12 2012).

173. Because defendant's cross-examination asked the foster mother to testify with respect to the child complainant's truthfulness to the specific allegations of aggravated sexual abuse and invited the State to remedy any misconception it might have caused to the jury, the trial court did not err by allowing the foster mother's testimony into evidence pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 608. Gomez v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9593, 2011 WL 6142735 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Dec. 8 2011).

174. It was proper for the trial court to exclude evidence because under Tex. R. Evid. 608, a witness's credibility could not be attacked by offering extrinsic evidence concerning specific prior instances of conduct, other than a conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609, which was not applicable, and thus there was no abuse of discretion. Gonzales v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4783, 2010 WL 2543908 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi June 24 2010).

175. Defendant's conviction for engaging in organized criminal activity, with the two predicate offenses being aggravated sexual assault of a child, was improper because the State's argument that allegations were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) were without merit. Defendant was not attempting to attack or impeach the children's foster parent with information that he had been accused of sexually molesting foster children under his care in the past; he was attempting to establish his defense that if the children were abused, the foster parent was responsible and the foster parents coached the children into making the allegations to cast the blame on others and divert attention from the California allegations. Kelly v. State, 321 S.W.3d 583, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4506 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. June 17 2010).

176. Defendant sought to impeach the credibility of the victim and another by introducing evidence of specific instances in which they had engaged in improper conduct, but Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) prohibited such inquiry. Hiatt v. State, 319 S.W.3d 115, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3076 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 28 2010).

177. Witness's testimony did not rebut any affirmative misrepresentation made by defendant, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Schoff v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1350, 2010 WL 668904 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 23 2010).

178. Under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), the trial court correctly sustained the State's objection to testimony regarding a specific instance of the victim's untruthfulness. Love v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8952, 2009 WL 3930900 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 19 2009).

179. State did not request a limiting instruction after its objection to certain testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and the trial court sustained no objection to another's testimony about the victim's truthfulness, such that defendant failed to present any error for the court's review as to certain witnesses. Love v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8952, 2009 WL 3930900 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 19 2009).

180. Although the State was correct in that a witness could be cross-examined on any matter relevant to any issue in the case, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 611(b), defendant's possession of cocaine was a specific act and was inadmissible for the purpose of impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and the trial court erred by admitting this evidence; at the time of trial, defendant had not been convicted of any crime arising out of his possession of cocaine, and therefore Tex. R. Evid. 609 did not apply. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

181. Introduction of evidence contrary to Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) did not rise to the level of constitutional error for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 44. Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

182. Because the court found error in the trial court admitting evidence that was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), the court had to assess whether the error was harmful under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

183. Chief concern of improperly admitted evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) was the potential of the evidence to cause the jury to convict defendant for character conformity, but the overwhelming evidence of guilt, regardless of the improperly admitted evidence, would have resulted in a guilty verdict, and thus the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). Teal v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7247, 2009 WL 2933723 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 15 2009).

184. While petitioner state inmate argued his counsel was ineffective for not presenting additional witnesses to show the 9-year-old victim of his sexual assault was motivated to lie in retaliation for the inmate having disciplined the victim, nothing showed such testimony would have been admissible since, consistent with Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and a pre trial order, defense counsel and defense witnesses were precluded from mentioning, directly or indirectly, any specific instance of conduct by the victim without first approaching the bench; under Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), specific instances of conduct could be used to establish that a witness had specific bias, self-interest, or motive for testifying, and under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b), specific acts of misconduct could also be used to establish a person's motive for performing an act, such as making a false allegation, but where credibility was concerned, a witness's general character for truthfulness could be shown only through reputation or opinion testimony under Rule 608(a). Mendez v. Quarterman, 625 F. Supp. 2d 415, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47543 (S.D. Tex. June 4 2009).

185. Defendant failed to show compliance with any part of the three-part test necessary to show that the prosecutor's conduct violated due process under U.S. Const. amend. XIV and Tex. Const. art. I, § 19, given that (1) there was no showing that the State failed to disclose evidence, (2) the State had no knowledge of certain accusations until after defendant's trial, (3) if the allegation that defendant and his roommate had sexually assaulted the accuser was true, defendant obviously knew of the crime before the State, (4) the accuser's bare accusations could not have been used to impeach the roommate, as Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) limited the introduction of character evidence, (5) even if the evidence was allowed, it was difficult to imagine how an allegation that defendant participated in other sexual assaults could have helped him, and (6) even if the evidence of the accusations had been discovered, disclosed, and admissible, it would not have altered the outcome of defendant's sexual assault of a child trial, as the victim identified defendant as her attacker and DNA evidence confirmed the assault. Thus, the State did not violate defendant's right to due process. Parchman v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 3745, 2009 WL 998683 (Tex. App. Tyler Apr. 15 2009).

186. Defendant acknowledged that she intended to cross-examine the victim regarding specific instances of conduct in an attempt to attack the victim's credibility, which was precisely what Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) prohibited; even if the exception in Rule 608(b) applied, defendant provided no evidence that any allegations the victim made against a third party were false, other than defense counsel's argument, and thus the trial court did not err in denying defendant's request to cross-examine the victim regarding the allegations. Jones v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5819 (Tex. App. Austin July 30, 2008).

187. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for the Class A misdemeanor offense of assault causing bodily injury in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the complainant regarding past accusations of spousal abuse where the complainant's character for truthfulness was not attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise as required by Tex. R. Evid. 608; instead, during cross-examination, defendant attempted to inquire into prior accusations of abuse that the complainant made against her ex-husband for the purpose of attacking the complainant's credibility, and, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 401, Tex. R. Evid. 402, Tex. R. Evid. 608, the probative value of the evidence sought to be admitted was extremely low, particularly because defense counsel admitted during trial that he had no evidence that the complainant lied about the abuse and that the accusations occurred a long time ago. Sullivan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1394 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2008).

188. Trial court did not err during defendant's trial for the Class A misdemeanor offense of assault causing bodily injury in excluding evidence of a prior criminal mischief charge against the complainant at a hearing on a motion in limine where defendant's attorney admitted not only that the criminal mischief case against the complainant was "obviously quite old," but also that the case had been dismissed. Sullivan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1394 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2008).

189. Defendant failed to preserve for review his claims that he was denied a fair trial and due process by the prosecutor's repeated elicitation of inadmissible lay opinion testimony from two witnesses that one victim was truthful and that the witnesses believed that defendant had assaulted the victim because he failed to timely object to the admission of the witnesses' testimony and failed to raise prosecutorial misconduct or due process claims with the trial court. Lopez v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6174 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 1 2007).

190. In a sexual assault case, when defendant offered expert testimony as an offer of proof regarding the victim's alleged bipolar disease, he did not demonstrate how the mental illness affected her perception of the pertinent events, and therefore, the specific instance of conduct was inadmissible to attack the victim's credibility as a witness. Silva v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10594 (Tex. App. San Antonio Dec. 13 2006).

191. In a murder trial court, it was error to exclude a defense witness's opinion of a State witness's truthfulness because the opinion was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a), regardless of whether the defense witness was familiar with the reputation of the State witness or with the underlying facts or information upon which the opinion was based; the error was not reversible under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b), however, because the testimony that the State witness had bad reputation for truthfulness, rather than that the State witness did not tell the truth, did not affect defendant's substantial rights. Peterson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10431 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 7 2006).

192. In a drug case, the trial court's exclusion of evidence that defendant sought to admit for the purpose of attacking the truthfulness of a police officer did not violate defendant's right to confrontation because the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608. Sandoval v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10208 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Nov. 30 2006).

193. In a criminal trial for driving while intoxicated, the court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias. The specific instances of conduct defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hasty or jump to conclusions at the crime scene. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

194. In a criminal trial for driving while intoxicated, the court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias. The specific instances of conduct defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hastily or jump to conclusions at the crime scene. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

195. While the trial court's ruling accurately reflected the general limits placed on impeachment, the court found that defendant's wife, the victim, opened the door to impeachment evidence concerning her earlier plea in a domestic violence case because her testimony left a false impression concerning her past criminal history, and thus, the trial court's reliance on the general rule concerning remote evidence was misplaced in this case, and the trial court abused its discretion; the wife's denial was directly relevant to the offense charged of family violence and the defense raised to that charge, and the State was free to offer extrinsic evidence rebutting her statement. Winegarner v. State, 188 S.W.3d 379, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2163 (Tex. App. Dallas 2006).

196. Defendant's conviction for murder was proper pursuant to Tex. R. App. P. 33.1(a)(1) where the district court did not err by admitting evidence of specific instances of conduct regarding defendant's character for truthfulness because she did not complain at trial that the evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608. Pierce v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6229 (Tex. App. Austin Aug. 3 2005).

197. Defendant's cross-examination of the victim by use of prior inconsistent statements aimed at impeaching her testimony amounted to an attack on her character for truthfulness under the "otherwise" provision of Tex. R. Evid. 608(a)(2), opening the door for rebuttal evidence as to the victim's character for truthfulness because where a witness was placed in the position of testifying differently from that which she previously testified, evidence of her veracity character was admissible in rebuttal. Michael v. State, 173 S.W.3d 829, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 5548 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

198. Court disagreed with defendant's characterization of a witness as an expert for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 702 because the State called the witness as a lay witness to testify about the victim's statements about the alleged sexual abuse; defendant had previously impeached the victim with prior inconsistent statements, and thus the State properly sought to rehabilitate the victim with testimony regarding the victim's character for truthfulness under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a)(2). Bronaugh v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4455 (Tex. App. Waco June 8 2005).

199. Counselor who treated the victim properly testified that the victim exhibited characteristics similar to those of children who had been sexually abused; the counselor's testimony of not observing any behavior that would have caused the witness to question the victim's truthfulness was not a direct comment on the victim's truthfulness for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 608(a)(2). Bronaugh v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4455 (Tex. App. Waco June 8 2005).

200. In a trial for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, the court properly excluded testimony from the victim's daughter tendered to show that the victim had a tendency to exaggerate and was not being truthful. The daughter's statements during voir dire did not show that she could qualify that the victim's general reputation for truthfulness was bad. Licon v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1402 (Tex. App. Amarillo Feb. 18 2005).

201. Where defendant failed to object to the admission of his statement to authorities regarding the credibility of his victim that he claimed violated Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) by admitting his statement because it bolstered the complainant's credibility when the complainant's credibility had not been impeached, he failed to preserve the issue for appellate review since none of the fundamental error categories included the admission or exclusion of evidence. Apolinar v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6025 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 7 2004).

202. In an insurance fraud case, the trial court did not err in limiting cross-examination of a State's witness about whether she lied to the State when she told the State that she had no criminal record during its preparation of the case as the witness's testimony did not show that she directly lied to the State concerning her criminal record, but rather showed her mistaken belief about the status of that record. Further, this evidence was not permissible to attack the witness's credibility because Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) bared impeachment of the witness's general character for truthfulness through specific acts of conduct other than evidence of conviction of a crime. Wycough v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4608 (Tex. App. El Paso May 20 2004).

203. In an insurance fraud case, the trial court did not violate defendant's right to confront witnesses when it limited cross-examination of a State's witness about whether she lied to the State when she told the State that she had no criminal record during its preparation of the case as the witness's testimony did not show that she directly lied to the State concerning her criminal record, but rather showed her mistaken belief about the status of that record. Further, this evidence was not permissible to attack the witness's credibility because Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) bared impeachment of the witness's general character for truthfulness through specific acts of conduct other than evidence of conviction of a crime. Wycough v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4608 (Tex. App. El Paso May 20 2004).

204. Trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) and 702 by allowing a detective to testify to the victim's truthfulness in defendant's sexual assault trial where the detective's comment regarding the victim's truthfulness came when defendant had not attacked the victim's truthfulness, but the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). McDonald v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1988 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2004).

205. Trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) and 702 by allowing a detective to testify to the victim's truthfulness in defendant's sexual assault trial where the detective's comment regarding the victim's truthfulness came when defendant had not attacked the victim's truthfulness, but the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). McDonald v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1988 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2004).

206. In a sexual assault case, the trial court did not err by refusing to admit entries from the victim's diary to show that the victim's character for truth-telling was poor because the diary entry involved a specific instance of conduct, i.e., writing false things in a diary; it was therefore not admissible to impeach the victim's credibility or truthfulness. West v. State, 121 S.W.3d 95, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 8506 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2003).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Bias, Motive & Prejudice

207. At defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, he was not harmed by the trial court's exclusion of evidence of the victim's prior drug use or debt owed to his accomplice; as defendant did not explain how the victim's drug use translated into ill will, bias, or animus toward defendant, it was improper impeachment evidence. Richardson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1723, 2014 WL 645801 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 14 2014).

208. Where defendant was convicted of indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, he failed to prove that the trial court erred by ruling that a question concerning the witness' prior false allegation of abuse was improper under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b); the record failed to establish what the child victim alleged that was false or that her allegation would demonstrate bias. Pierson v. State, 398 S.W.3d 406, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4868 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 19 2013).

209. Evidence was properly excluded that a State witness was subject to influence by his arrest for family violence because defendant failed to show the required relationship between the family violence charge and the testimony. The witness testified on voir dire that the prosecutors on the two cases were not the same and that he did not have a deal with the State to give favorable testimony. Turner v. State, 413 S.W.3d 442, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 6619 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Aug. 9 2012).

210. Trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) in overruling defendant's objection to evidence that defendant was on parole at the time of trial for a prior felony conviction; in eliciting the testimony, the State sought to show that defendant was biased as a witness and had a motive to testify falsely to avoid being convicted for a parole violation. Mcgough v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 776, 2012 WL 273885 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 31 2012).

211. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and 613, the trial court did not err in limiting defendant's cross-examination of the witness because defendant did not make a connection between defendant's pending felony case and status as a probationer that would have prompted the witness to falsely identify defendant in a photographic line-up. Oliva

v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8940, 2011 WL 5428965 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2011).

212. No violation of Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), 608(b) occurred where defense counsel was not prevented from impeaching a witness by use of extrinsic evidence to show bias or interest and counsel was allowed to cross-examine the witness concerning whether she entered into a plea agreement in exchange for her testimony. Reyna v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6062, 2011 WL 3366383 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 4 2011).

213. In defendant's trial for four counts of sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by refusing to admit evidence of specific instances of conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) to show that the victim had previously lied and committed theft. Defendant failed to show how this conduct showed a bias or interest on the part of the witness against defendant; also, two witnesses testified that the victim was not an honest person. Harris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9999 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 16 2010).

214. In defendant's trial for four counts of sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by refusing to admit evidence of specific instances of conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) to show that the victim's father had also been indicted for aggravated sexual assault of a child. Defendant failed to show how the offense made more probable the existence of any motive, bias, or interest on the part of the witness; in fact, the evidence posed a risk of confusing or misleading the jury. Harris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9999 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 16 2010).

215. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's prior dismissed theft charge and his mother's involvement in obtaining that dismissal because the State did not offer the testimony as extraneous offense evidence to impeach defendant's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), but rather to show the mother's own bias in favor defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Mares v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6844, 2010 WL 3294244 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 19 2010).

216. Defendant failed to preserve for review his assertion that the trial court erred by not allowing evidence that the complainant had alleged, and testified about, virtually identical sexual abuse committed by her previous step-father, because defendant's arguments on appeal did not comport with his arguments at trial, and the alleged error did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict; defendant testified regarding his defensive theory that his disputes with the complainant's mother influenced the complainant to fabricate the allegations against him. Bullock v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8872, 2009 WL 3838861 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 18 2009).

217. No due process or confrontation violation was shown when defendant was not allowed to question a witness regarding his citizenship status, because defendant did not show and did not allege that the witness had been convicted of entering the United States unlawfully, the assertion that the witness's immigration status gave him a motive to testify falsely was not raised below and was not supported by the record, and counsel did not take the witness on voir dire or otherwise make a record as to whether the witness was or was not in the country lawfully. Shrader v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8777, 2009 WL 3806147 (Tex. App. Austin Nov. 10 2009).

218. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, defendant was entitled under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 613(b) to impeach the complainant by presenting evidence that the complainant threatened to falsely accuse neighbors of molestation, even though the threats occurred after the charged offense. The complainant testified to becoming angry when defendant took back a gift, and, the very next day, the complainant accused defendant of molestation. Billodeau v. State, 277 S.W.3d 34, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 232 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

219. Defendant acknowledged that she intended to cross-examine the victim regarding specific instances of conduct in an attempt to attack the victim's credibility, which was precisely what Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) prohibited; even if the exception in Rule 608(b) applied, defendant provided no evidence that any allegations the victim made against a third party were false, other than defense counsel's argument, and thus the trial court did not err in denying defendant's request to cross-examine the victim regarding the allegations. Jones v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5819 (Tex. App. Austin July 30, 2008).

220. In a domestic assault case arising in 2004, a trial court did not err by limiting the cross-examination of a victim regarding a pending assault against her from 2006 because there was no showing of bias due to that prosecution since the victim's story regarding the 2004 incident had not changed, and it was corroborated by an officer at the scene; moreover, it was improper to show the victim's bad character for untruthfulness under Tex. R. Evid. 609. McCrory v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4200 (Tex. App. Dallas May 30 2007).

221. In an aggravated sexual assault of a child case, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the victim regarding a totally separate allegation of sexual abuse that the victim had made against his stepfather as it would not have explained any animus, bias, or ill motive on the part of the victim to fabricate the details of his assault. Lopez v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 7510 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 24 2006).

222. In a criminal trial for driving while intoxicated, the court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias. The specific instances of conduct defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hasty or jump to conclusions at the crime scene. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

223. In a criminal trial for driving while intoxicated, the court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine the officer with his prior employment and disciplinary record to show bias. The specific instances of conduct defendant sought to explore had no relevance to the defense theory that the officer tended to act hastily or jump to conclusions at the crime scene. DeLeon v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3215 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 24 2006).

224. In a criminal prosecution for capital murder, the trial court did not err by limiting cross-examination of the state's witnesses as to an extraneous robbery offense; naked allegations about the witnesses were insufficient to raise an inference that they had a motive to testify falsely for the state concerning the capital murder defense, and after the witnesses denied the allegations, Tex. R. Evid. 608 precluded counsel from introducing extrinsic evidence of the offense. Crenshaw v. State, 125 S.W.3d 651, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10196 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Contradiction

225. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by preventing a defense witness from testifying regarding the victim's prior cocaine use and her prior visits to the alleged crime scene because the victim's statement of good conduct dealt with her unfamiliarity with cocaine lines which was not directly relevant to the charged offense of sexual assault, and therefore defendant was not entitled to correct the alleged false impression by calling other witnesses or offering extrinsic evidence. Clay v. State, 390 S.W.3d 1, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10757, 2012 WL 6721012 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 28 2012).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : General Overview

226. It was proper not to admit a complainant's indictment for impeachment purposes because only evidence of the conviction itself is admissible under this rule to impeach a witness; the details of the conviction are generally inadmissible for the purpose of impeachment. Pena v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 6487 (Tex. App. Houston 14th

Dist. June 17 2014).

227. During defendant's trial for indecent exposure, the trial court properly excluded evidence that the victim called the police regarding various disturbances at her residence on several occasions following the report of exposure because the decision was within the zone of reasonable disagreement; the trial court maintained broad discretion to impose reasonable limits on cross-examination to avoid harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, endangering the witness, and the injection of cumulative and collateral evidence, and, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), specific instances of conduct, other than conviction of a crime, when offered to attack the witness's credibility could not be explored on cross-examination. Tennison v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2120 (Tex. App. Amarillo Mar. 16 2006).

228. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by disallowing, as irrelevant, defendant's stepdaughter's testimony that she was abused by another man some seven years before defendant began abusing her in an attempt to challenge her credibility and motive on the basis that her sexual acts with defendant were consensual, and defendant made no argument how the excluded testimony was relevant to or affected the sexual offenses involving his biological daughter. Regalado v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 2322 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 28 2005).

229. When the trial court sustained the State's objection that certain punishment evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), defendant did not inform the trial court of any alternative theories of admissibility; because defendant did not expressly offer the evidence for its limited admissible purpose pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 105(b), defendant was not free to complain of its exclusion on appeal and defendant failed to preserve error. Hatcher v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 884 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 3 2005).

230. In an indecency with a child by contact case, the trial court did not improperly grant the State's motion in limine and required defense counsel to approach the bench before asking the victim whether she had ever lied to a police officer or school officer as whether the child victim had ever been in trouble for marijuana possession was the type of evidence which was not allowed by the evidentiary rules. Dinsmore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11624 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Dec. 23 2004).

231. Trial court did not err in allowing prosecution to cross examine murder suspect at the guilt/innocence phase with specific instances of his unadjudicated misconduct for impeachment purposes because defendant opened the door to it with his prior testimony that "most of his problems were concentration type problems related to his psychiatric disorders, and defendant did not object to this cross examination. Perry v. State, 158 S.W.3d 438, 2004 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 2147 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004), writ of certiorari denied by 126 S. Ct. 416, 163 L. Ed. 2d 317, 2005 U.S. LEXIS 7289, 74 U.S.L.W. 3228 (U.S. 2005).

232. There was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the victim threatened to falsely accuse her uncle because, given the corroborating evidence, the instant case did not involve a "heightened need" to impeach the victim's credibility with her threat to falsely accuse the uncle, and it was not entirely clear from the uncle's testimony that the victim threatened to accuse him of sexual assault as opposed to some other allegation; even if the trial court erred by not admitting the evidence, any error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt because the uncle's testimony would have been cumulative of the evidence rejected by the jury, as its exclusion did not move the jury from a state of non-persuasion to one of persuasion on the issue of the victim's credibility. Hamrick v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 4418 (Tex. App. El Paso May 13 2004).

233. Tex. R. Evid. 608 permits general credibility impeachment of a witness; a specific instance, in this case a single statement, meant to show animus on the victim's part toward the defendant, was not admissible under this rule. Felan v. State, 44 S.W.3d 249, 2001 Tex. App. LEXIS 2406 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2001).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : Admissibility

234. Court did not err by admitting only the judgment and sentence against a witness and not allowing defendant to question him on the details of a theft conviction because the jury heard testimony to rebut the witness's testimony that the theft conviction "was a business deal gone bad," and defendant did not show how the additional information was necessary to correct any false impression. Smith v. State, 436 S.W.3d 353, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 5717 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 29 2014).

235. No err by admitting the State's exhibit, which was a redacted plea of guilty and judicial confession for giving a false and fictitious name to police, because lying to a police officer involved moral turpitude (dishonesty); defendant did not object to the judicial confession, but only the other plea papers, the jury heard, without objection, that defendant had confessed to committing an offense. Harris v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10620, 2012 WL 6674479 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 21 2012).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Convictions : Inadmissibility

236. At defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it refused to allow the defense to cross examine a witness regarding his criminal history and his violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 46.04. Under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and 609, the details of a conviction were generally inadmissible for the purpose of impeachment; because there was no evidence that the witness was convicted of the firearms offense under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 46.04, it was not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Henson v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 974, 2013 WL 396015 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 31 2013).

237. Defendant was not prevented from showing that the victim and other family members were biased and had a motive to testify against him because there was animosity between the victim's family and defendant, but, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and 609, the trial court did not err in not admitting evidence indicating that the victim's mother had been arrested for possession of marihuana and had been placed on deferred adjudication community supervision. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

238. Trial court did not err during defendant's trial for the Class A misdemeanor offense of assault causing bodily injury in excluding evidence of a prior criminal mischief charge against the complainant at a hearing on a motion in limine where defendant's attorney admitted not only that the criminal mischief case against the complainant was "obviously quite old," but also that the case had been dismissed. Sullivan v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1394 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 27 2008).

239. In a murder trial, defendant was not entitled to impeach a witness by asking whether the witness signed certain checks drawn on defendant's checking account; the evidence was not admissible as impeachment for a crime under Tex. R. Evid. 608, because there was no evidence that the witness had ever been convicted or even arrested for an offense involving the checks. Perry v. State, 236 S.W.3d 859, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7942 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

240. Defense counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to inadmissible impeachment evidence consisting of defendant's prior convictions because on direct examination, defendant preemptively admitted to numerous prior convictions in an attempt to minimize any damage. Andrews v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7217 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 5 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Mental Incapacity

241. Under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) a murder defendant should have been allowed to cross-examine a witness, who was also a co-defendant, regarding the witness's history of visions and hallucinations; however, excluding the cross-examination was harmless error. Perry v. State, 236 S.W.3d 859, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7942 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Conduct

242. Trial court did not abuse its discretion during defendant's trial for attempted sexual performance by a child in excluding testimony regarding the complainant's alleged character trait of lying to law enforcement where defendant had explained to the court that he sought to introduce the testimony because it showed again in the instant case that the complainant acted in conformity with that pertinent character trait and again made a false report to law enforcement about alleged law violations, which was precisely the inferential chain of logic barred by this rule. Clark v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1765, 2014 WL 708910 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 19 2014).

243. At defendant's trial for aggravated robbery, he was not harmed by the trial court's exclusion of evidence of the victim's prior drug use or debt owed to his accomplice; as defendant did not explain how the victim's drug use translated into ill will, bias, or animus toward defendant, it was improper impeachment evidence. Richardson v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 1723, 2014 WL 645801 (Tex. App. Eastland Feb. 14 2014).

244. Defendant was not entitled to attack the arresting officer's credibility by showing that he was under investigation for violating the Occupations Code, a specific instance of misconduct, and therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that defendant did not establish a Brady violation. Smith v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9194 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 25 2013).

245. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to cross-examine an accomplice on whether he committed offenses and did so as a member of a gang with defendant and the co-defendant because the accomplice was not charged with the offenses and there was no evidence presented to create a nexus between the other offenses and the accomplice's testimony. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9291 (Tex. App. Waco July 25 2013).

246. Trial court did not err by refusing to allow defendant to question the complainant about fleeing or not appearing in court or about her profile on a social media website because specific instances of her conduct to attack her credibility was not admissible. Duckworth v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9062 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 24 2013).

247. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying him permission to cross-examine the complainant on the reasons for her 1991 military discharge because there was no authority explaining how a suicide attempt 20 years ago would affect the complainant's credibility during trial. Duff v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 4662 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Apr. 11 2013).

248. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying defendant the right to cross-examine the victim regarding her plan to deceive her parents as to where she would be on the night in question because it was primarily an attack on her general credibility and was not relevant as proof of bias, prejudice, or ulterior motive for her to accuse defendant of sexually assaulting her. Clay v. State, 390 S.W.3d 1, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10757, 2012 WL 6721012 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 28 2012).

249. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by preventing a defense witness from testifying regarding the victim's prior cocaine use and her prior visits to the alleged crime scene because the victim's statement of good conduct dealt with her unfamiliarity with cocaine lines which was not directly relevant to the charged offense of sexual assault, and therefore defendant was not entitled to correct the alleged false impression by calling other witnesses or offering extrinsic evidence. Clay v. State, 390 S.W.3d 1, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10757, 2012 WL 6721012 (Tex.

App. Texarkana Dec. 28 2012).

250. Defendant's convictions for continuous sexual abuse of a young child and indecency with a child by exposure were proper because the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence of the victim's mother's purported prior false accusations of sexual abuse, Tex. R. Evid. 613(b), 608(b). Contrary to defendant's assertion, the proffered testimony did not show a bias against him or a motive to falsely accuse him; rather, it constituted an impermissible attack on the mother's credibility using specific instances of conduct. Lubojasky v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8760, 2012 WL 5192919 (Tex. App. Austin Oct. 19 2012).

251. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of two witnesses concerning the victim's prior sexual history because it did not make it more or less probable that defendant touched the victim's breast and therefore was not relevant under Tex. R. Evid. 401. In addition, the evidence was properly excluded because it was an attempt to impeach the victim through the inquiry of specific instance of conduct, which was improper under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Gonzalez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8246, 2012 WL 4497999 (Tex. App. Tyler Sept. 28 2012).

252. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding impeachment evidence consisting of a photograph of one of the co-defendant's aiming a handgun because the co-defendant's negative response to the question of whether he ever held a gun in his hand and pointed it at someone was not untruthful. Herrera v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5594, 2012 WL 2861673 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi July 12 2012).

253. Trial court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) in overruling defendant's objection to evidence that defendant was on parole at the time of trial for a prior felony conviction; in eliciting the testimony, the State sought to show that defendant was biased as a witness and had a motive to testify falsely to avoid being convicted for a parole violation. Mcgough v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 776, 2012 WL 273885 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Jan. 31 2012).

254. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and 613, the trial court did not err in limiting defendant's cross-examination of the witness because defendant did not make a connection between defendant's pending felony case and status as a probationer that would have prompted the witness to falsely identify defendant in a photographic line-up. Oliva v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8940, 2011 WL 5428965 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 10 2011).

255. Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the Internet social site exhibit, because the exhibit did not come within the parameters of Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) concerning opinion and reputation evidence, and it fell within the prohibition of Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Edwards v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 6908, 2011 WL 3795696 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 29 2011).

256. Defendant was not prevented from showing that the victim and other family members were biased and had a motive to testify against him because there was animosity between the victim's family and defendant, but, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) and 609, the trial court did not err in not admitting evidence indicating that the victim's mother had been arrested for possession of marihuana and had been placed on deferred adjudication community supervision. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

257. Under Tex. R. Evid. 608 and 609, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the State to ask defendant about his prior arrests after he opened the door with his testimony or in determining that the probative value of such evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2011 WL 2112809 (Tex. App. Eastland May 27 2011).

258. During defendant's trial for capital murder, the court did not err under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) in admitting a photograph of defendant and a third person holding guns pointed at the head of another individual because on direct examination, defendant stated that defendant had never pointed a gun at someone. Lemon v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3473, 2011 WL 1837680 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 10 2011).

259. During defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault and solicitation of a minor, the trial court did not err in refusing to admit evidence showing that the complainant had knowledge of sexual matters before these alleged events occurred because the evidence was hearsay and subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 609 and 613. Landers v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2982, 2011 WL 1496154 (Tex. App. Amarillo Apr. 19 2011).

260. Evidence of a worker's prior use of pain medication was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) for general impeachment purposes, the insurer did not raise intoxication as a defense under Tex. Lab. Code Ann. § 406.032(a)(1) in the worker's compensation administrative proceeding, and the insurer's suggestion that the worker might have fabricated his claim to obtain prescription drugs was speculative. Thus, the evidence was properly excluded as prejudicial under Tex. R. Evid. 403. Commerce & Indus. Ins. Co. v. Ferguson-Stewart, 339 S.W.3d 744, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2446 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Mar. 31 2011).

261. In defendant's trial for four counts of sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by refusing to admit evidence of specific instances of conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) to show that the victim had previously lied and committed theft. Defendant failed to show how this conduct showed a bias or interest on the part of the witness against defendant; also, two witnesses testified that the victim was not an honest person. Harris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9999 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 16 2010).

262. In defendant's trial for four counts of sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err by refusing to admit evidence of specific instances of conduct under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) to show that the victim's father had also been indicted for aggravated sexual assault of a child. Defendant failed to show how the offense made more probable the existence of any motive, bias, or interest on the part of the witness; in fact, the evidence posed a risk of confusing or misleading the jury. Harris v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9999 (Tex. App. Eastland Dec. 16 2010).

263. Even if error were properly preserved, Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) prohibited the purpose for which defendant now purported to have attempted to elicit the testimony from the victim's mother; because defendant did not contend that Rule 608(b), as applied in this case, violated his Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment rights to confrontation and cross-examination, he waived these rights with regard to impeaching the mother for bias by failing to preserve error. Quiroz v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8939, 2010 WL 4492939 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 10 2010).

264. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the testimony of an officer that during a fight with his brother, the victim used extreme profanity towards his parents and threatened to kill his brother, because it was an impermissible attempt to cast an unfavorable light on the victim under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). The officer did not have a basis of fact to testify as to the victim's character for truthfulness. Soto v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8709, 2010 WL 4273173 (Tex. App. San Antonio Oct. 29 2010).

265. During a civil commitment hearing, the trial court did not err in sustaining the State's objection to a question to a psychiatrist concerning whether the psychiatrist's expert testimony had been "stricken" by appellate courts at least three times; under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), specific instances of conduct of a witness could not be inquired into on cross-examination for the purpose of attacking the witness's credibility. In re Commitment of Robertson, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 7421 (Tex. App. Beaumont Sept. 9 2010).

266. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence of defendant's prior dismissed theft charge and his mother's involvement in obtaining that dismissal because the State did not offer the testimony as extraneous offense evidence to impeach defendant's testimony under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), but rather to show the mother's own bias in favor defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 613. Mares v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6844, 2010 WL 3294244 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 19 2010).

267. Defendant's conviction for indecency with a child by contact was proper because, although the record indicated that defendant sought to question the State's expert on two Child Protective Services' reports involving physical abuse of the complainant, a prior report of physical abuse was not sufficiently similar to an allegation of sexual abuse to have any probative value, particularly given the risk that such evidence would unduly prejudice and confuse the jury, Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Furthermore, the record contained no evidence of the circumstances surrounding the making of the reports, including whether they were made by the complainant or someone else; because defendant made no offer of proof regarding the reports, there was nothing for the appellate court to review, Tex. R. Evid. 103(a)(2) Sosa v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4428, 2010 WL 2330304 (Tex. App. Austin June 10 2010).

268. Defendant failed to preserve for review his assertion that the trial court erred by not allowing evidence that the complainant had alleged, and testified about, virtually identical sexual abuse committed by her previous step-father, because defendant's arguments on appeal did not comport with his arguments at trial, and the alleged error did not have a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict; defendant testified regarding his defensive theory that his disputes with the complainant's mother influenced the complainant to fabricate the allegations against him. Bullock v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 8872, 2009 WL 3838861 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 18 2009).

269. Defendant did not establish a basis in the trial court for admission of this evidence as an exception to the rules by relating his attorney's past bar grievance history as relevant in a way that might overcome the precepts of Tex. R. Evid. 404(b)-like motive, intent, plan, or pattern; in addition, defendant did not present any evidence that knowing his attorney's history with other clients would have factored into his decision to take a plea, where he made no inquiry into the attorney's history prior to taking the plea, and pointed to no affirmative misrepresentation by the attorney made in connection with the information relevant to the plea. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding such evidence from defendant's motion for a new trial hearing. Starz v. State, 309 S.W.3d 110, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7711 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Sept. 30 2009).

270. Court did not err by not allowing defendant to cross-examine the victim about her prior sexual experience because the evidence that defendant sought to introduce through the declarant relating to the victim's sexual activity with her boyfriend did not relate to the charged sexual contact offenses, but was offered to impeach the victim's credibility relating to her accusation two years later that defendant also sexually assaulted her. The declarant's forensic interview contained inadmissible hearsay and, as the trial court noted, the victim's conduct discussed in that interview was not at all similar to the charged offenses. Fugate v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6266 (Tex. App. Dallas Aug. 18, 2008).

271. Evidence that the complainant in a child sexual abuse case previously had made accusations of unwanted sexual contact against other persons was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608. Hammer v. State, 256 S.W.3d 391, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1381 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2008).

272. Because defendant's recordings of his estranged wife's conversations involved adults, not children, the vicarious consent doctrine was inapplicable, and there was no interspousal consent exception; thus, the court rejected defendant's argument that the rationale and holding in case law presented a defensive theory or an exception to Tex. R. Evid. 608, in defendant's trial for unlawful interception, use, and disclosure of a wire communication. Green v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1193 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 20 2008).

273. Court disagreed that the cross-examination of defendant's estranged wife about her extramarital affair would have been proper to impeach her credibility under Tex. R. Evid. 608; as to her motive to lie in an effort to gain custody of the minor child, this was at best only relevant to a collateral matter, and whether the wife had sexual relations while the child was in an adjacent room or asleep was relevant neither to the crime for which defendant was indicted -- unlawful interception, use, and disclosure of a wire communication -- nor to any defense, and thus the trial court did not err in limiting defendant's cross-examination of the wife. Green v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1193 (Tex. App. San Antonio Feb. 20 2008).

274. In a child sexual abuse case, the trial court did not err when it excluded evidence of the complainant's prior bad conduct as too remote; such evidence is subject to exclusion under Tex. R. Evid. 608, and although remoteness in time is not a concept generally considered under Tex. R. Evid. 608, it was pertinent to a Tex. R. Evid. 403 analysis. Blanchard v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8403 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 25 2007).

275. In a juvenile delinquency proceeding arising from assaults committed against a former girlfriend, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding testimony regarding the former girlfriend's alleged assaults on specific individuals and her reputation for violence; moreover, Tex. R. Evid. 602 barred testimony from a witness who lacked personal knowledge of the former girlfriend's conduct. In re C.R.G., 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7572 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Sept. 20 2007).

276. To the extent that defendant's desired line of punishment-phase cross-examination of a witness was an effort to establish that she purportedly had affairs with married men, that line of questioning was prohibited under Tex. R. Evid. 608. Brazelton v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5687 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 12 2007).

277. In defendant's trial for two counts of aggravated assault on a public servant, the trial court did not violate defendant's right of confrontation under U.S. Const. amend. VI and Tex. Const. art. I, § 10 when the trial court refused to allow defendant to impeach the credibility of a State's witness by cross-examining the witness about a violent poem the witness had written to show that the inmate had contemplated shooting at other people contrary to the witness' answer to defendant's question. Defendant's use of the poem as a specific instance of conduct to attack the witness' credibility was barred by Tex. R. Evid. 608(b). Hole v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 5107 (Tex. App. Tyler June 29 2007).

278. In defendant's trial for aggravated sexual assault of a child younger than 14 years of age, in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.021, for purposes of Tex. R. Evid. 613, defendant did not show that a prior statement was inconsistent with anything the witness testified to at trial, and defendant sought to use the prior statement as a means of introducing evidence of specific instances of misconduct, including drug possession and lying, and that evidence was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608 for purposes of attacking the witness's credibility; even if error was committed, defendant suffered no harm under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b) because defendant attacked the witness's credibility through extensive cross-examination and the State did not depend on the witness or her credibility, as the case depended on the child victim's testimony. Wagner v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4480 (Tex. App. Eastland June 7 2007).

279. In defendant's trial for possession of more than 200 grams but less than 400 grams of a prohibited substance, methamphetamine, no objection was lodged to extraneous evidence concerning a prior search of defendant's home and error was thus waived, for purposes of Tex. R. App. P. 33.1; even if an objection had been made, there was ample reason to permit the testimony because the State was free to rebut by impeachment defendant's claim of not knowing how to manufacture methamphetamine. Duck v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2587 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 3 2007).

280. In defendant's trial on charges of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the trial court did not err in excluding evidence concerning the victim's emotional stability because although defendant sought to introduce evidence for the stated purpose of showing that the victim was a troubled teen falsifying the charge to get attention from her mother, the evidence was not relevant in that it did not show a motive to lie, or show bias or prejudice; further, Tex. R. Evid. 608 prohibited inquiring into a witness' past behavior, other than behavior based on which there has been a criminal conviction, to attack or support a witness' credibility. Baker v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4308 (Tex. App. Texarkana May 18 2006).

281. In a murder case, the false statements exception to Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) did not apply because a witness' assertion that he was "doing great" referred to his successful drug rehabilitation and did not create a false impression that he had no criminal history; hence, the trial court did not err in excluding impeachment evidence of an uncharged allegation of a sex offense. Parchman v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3161 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 20 2006).

282. In a murder case, the false statements exception to Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) did not apply because a witness' assertion that he was "doing great" referred to his successful drug rehabilitation and did not create a false impression that he had no criminal history; hence, the trial court did not err in excluding impeachment evidence of an uncharged allegation of a sex offense. Parchman v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 3161 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 20 2006).

283. In a trial for delivery of marihuana, the trial court properly excluded, under Tex. R. Evid. 608, impeachment evidence that an undercover officer was fired for lying to his superiors about his involvement in a high speed chase and that he incorrectly identified two other defendants. The Confrontation Clause did not require the admission because that evidence was not probative of a misidentification of defendant. Iglehart v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4273 (Tex. App. El Paso June 2 2005).

284. In a driving while intoxicated case, the trial court did not err in preventing defendant from questioning the arresting officer about the officer's dismissal for misconduct because Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) precludes the use of specific instances of conduct to attack the credibility of a witness, other than conviction of a crime. Vargas v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4173 (Tex. App. San Antonio June 1 2005).

285. Trial court's error in permitting the State to ask defendant whether he had been arrested more than twenty times was harmless because it did not have a substantial or injurious effect on the jury's verdict and did not affect defendant's substantial rights, as the State reminded the jury that defendant had a prior conviction for felony driving while intoxicated and theft, but it did not address defendant's other prior arrests, and the jury was instructed that all persons were presumed to be innocent and the fact that defendant had been arrested, confined, or indicted for or otherwise charged gave rise to no inference of guilt. West v. State, 169 S.W.3d 275, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4114 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2005).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Impeachment : Prior Inconsistent Statements

286. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to allow defendant to bring up the victim's purported statement to her friend about an alleged rape by defendant based on Tex. R. Evid. 608(b) because it had substantial discretion to limit cross-examination and avoid allowing the proceeding to devolve into a trial of multiple sub-issues on collateral matters and there were other allegedly inconsistent or incredible statements by the victim that were before the jury that militated against her credibility. Gentry v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 9404 (Tex. App. Texarkana Dec. 18 2008).

287. On appeal from a conviction for aggravated sexual assault and indecency with a child, it was error to find that the State could bolster the credibility of the complainant after the admission of prior inconsistent statements based on the reasoning that impeachment of a witness with prior inconsistent statements was always an attack on the character of the witness; the question for the trial judge in determining whether rehabilitation is warranted under Tex. R. Evid. 608 is whether a reasonable juror would believe that the witness's character for truthfulness has been attacked by cross-examination, evidence from other witnesses, or statements of counsel (e.g., during voir dire or opening statements). Michael v. State, 235 S.W.3d 723, 2007 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1267 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Credibility : Rehabilitation

288. Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding witness testimony as to defendant's reputation for truthfulness, because these instances referred to by defendant did not constitute attacks on his general character for truthfulness; two instances constituted testimony by other witnesses as to the charges and as to direct or implied attacks concerning that testimony, and the third instance constituted impeachment of defendant's theory of the case by another witness. De La Garza v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1617, 2011 WL 768872 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 7 2011).

289. Defendant failed to show that defense counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to object to bolstering of the store owner's testimony by the investigating officer, because a witness could testify as to the truthfulness of another witness after the latter's credibility has been attacked, and the appellate court was unable to find that defense counsel's failure to object to the testimony was outrageous or unreasonable. Elliott v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 984 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 11 2010).

290. In a case involving assault against a public servant, the State did not err in recalling a deputy to the stand because defendant made no bolstering objection under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) or Tex. R. Evid. 613(c); moreover, there was no violation of Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 36.02. At any rate, the deputy's testimony on recall did not duplicate that which was previously given. Reaves v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 6866 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 28 2008).

291. In a trial for child sexual abuse, counsel was rendered ineffective by not objecting to the State's bolstering of the complainant's truthfulness and credibility through both experts and lay witnesses; testimony from the child's teacher and a parent was inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608 to the extent that it went to the complainant's truthfulness in the particular allegations and was admitted before the complainant's credibility was attacked. Fuller v. State, 224 S.W.3d 823, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 3686 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2007).

292. Although defendant objected to the prosecutor's question concerning a school counselor's familiarity with the child sexual assault complainant's character for truthfulness, the trial court did not err in overruling defendant's objection because the question occurred only after defendant attacked the complainant's credibility; if a witness's credibility was attacked, opinion or reputation testimony regarding the witness's character for truthfulness was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 608. Romero v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 9835 (Tex. App. Dallas Nov. 14 2006).

Evidence : Testimony : Examination : Cross-Examination : Scope

293. In a drug trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 608 in limiting defendant's cross-examination of a detective as to (1) payments made to an informant who was admittedly in the country illegally, (2) whether or not those payments were reported to the Internal Revenue Service, and (3) whether or not the detective sought or received permission from federal authorities to have the informant in the country working as an agent of law enforcement. Perez-gonzalez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3045, 2010 WL 1645062 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 26 2010).

294. In a murder case, the trial court did not err in limiting defendant's cross-examination of a prosecution witness; although defendant complained that he was not allowed to question the witness about what could be characterized as the physical symptoms of the witness's mental illness, defendant was allowed to question the witness about the extent of his mental illness and its effect on the witness's ability to perceive reality. Treybig v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7180 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 29 2007).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : General Overview

295. Trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) and 702 by allowing a detective to testify to the victim's truthfulness in defendant's sexual assault trial where the detective's comment regarding the victim's truthfulness came when defendant had not attacked the victim's truthfulness, but the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). McDonald v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1988 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2004).

296. Trial court abused its discretion under Tex. R. Evid. 608(a) and 702 by allowing a detective to testify to the victim's truthfulness in defendant's sexual assault trial where the detective's comment regarding the victim's truthfulness came when defendant had not attacked the victim's truthfulness, but the error was harmless under Tex. R. App. P. 44.2(b). McDonald v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1988 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 3 2004).

Evidence : Testimony : Experts : Criminal Trials

297. In an action in which appellant appealed from his convictions of three counts of indecency with a child and one count of aggravated sexual assault of a child, the case was remanded to the trial court for a new trial where the exclusion of the psychologist's testimony regarding false memories had a substantial and injurious effect or influence on the jury's verdict and affected a substantial right of appellant's; the psychologist's false-memory testimony was general evidence that directly attacked the complainants' credibility and was, therefore, relevant and admissible during appellant's case-in-chief. Delong v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10031 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Nov. 16 2006).

Governments : Local Governments : Employees & Officials

298. In a drug trial, there was no error under Tex. R. Evid. 403, 404(b), Rule 608(a) in excluding evidence, offered to show bias, that an officer was investigated for planting drugs on a defendant in an unrelated case because the allegations were determined to be unfounded. Brown v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 5432, 2010 WL 2772488 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 14 2010).

299. Illegal immigrant status of defendant driver should not have been admitted, under Tex. R. 300. In a personal injury case arising from an auto-pedestrian accident, any error under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), 107 in excluding evidence of a driver's subsequent automobile accidents was harmless because it was unlikely that, if the jury heard that evidence, it would apportioned more fault to the driver, given the admitted evidence that he consumed a pint of vodka on the day in question, was arrested for driving while intoxicated at the scene of the accident, and failed a breathalyzer test with a blood alcohol content that was nearly twice the legal limit. Muhs v. Whataburger, Inc., 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9229, 2010 WL 4657955 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Nov. 18 2010).

301. Illegal immigrant status of defendant driver should not have been admitted, under Tex. R. Evid. 608(b), 404, in a wrongful death and survival action stemming from a multi-fatality vehicular accident. TXI Transp. Co. v. Hughes, 306 S.W.3d 230, 2010 Tex. LEXIS 212, 53 Tex. Sup. Ct. THIS DOCUMENT IS CURRENT THROUGH August 16, 2020

Rule 609 Impeachment by Evidence of a Criminal Conviction

(a) In General.--Evidence of a criminal conviction offered to attack a witness's character for truthfulness must be admitted if:

(1)the crime was a felony or involved moral turpitude, regardless of punishment;

(2)the probative value of the evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect to a party; and

(3)it is elicited from the witness or established by public record.

(b) Limit on Using the Evidence After 10 Years.--This subdivision (b) applies if more than 10 years have passed since the witness's conviction or release from confinement for it, whichever is later. Evidence of the conviction is admissible only if its probative value, supported by specific facts and circumstances, substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect.

(c) Effect of a Pardon, Annulment, or Certificate of Rehabilitation.--Evidence of a conviction is not admissible if:

(1)the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, certificate of rehabilitation, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding that the person has been rehabilitated, and the person has not been convicted of a later crime that was classified as a felony or involved moral turpitude, regardless of punishment;

(2)probation has been satisfactorily completed for the conviction, and the person has not been convicted of a later crime that was classified as a felony or involved moral turpitude, regardless of punishment; or

(3)the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of innocence.

(d) Juvenile Adjudications.--Evidence of a juvenile adjudication is admissible under this rule only if:

(1)the witness is a party in a proceeding conducted under title 3 of the Texas Family Code; or

(2)the United States or Texas Constitution requires that it be admitted.

(e) Pendency of an Appeal.--A conviction for which an appeal is pending is not admissible under this rule.

(f) Notice.--Evidence of a witness's conviction is not admissible under this rule if, after receiving from the adverse party a timely written request specifying the witness, the proponent of the conviction fails to provide sufficient written notice of intent to use the conviction. Notice is sufficient if it provides a fair opportunity to contest the use of such evidence.

LexisNexis (R) Notes

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Confrontation

1. In a sexual assault case, the court did not violate defendant's rights under the Confrontation Clause by denying his request to cross-examine the juvenile victim regarding his status on deferred adjudication probation because there was no indication that a motion to revoke the victim's probation was pending either when he made the allegations against defendant or at the time of trial; thus, defendant did not show that the victim's deferred adjudication status placed him in a "vulnerable relationship" with the State. Irby v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 4544 (Tex. App. Dallas June 20 2008).

Constitutional Law : Bill of Rights : Fundamental Rights : Criminal Process : Right to Jury Trial

2. Comments or questions by prospective jurors, made in the presence of the entire panel, may be harmful to the defendant, and to be prejudicial, the remark must be reasonably calculated to prejudice other members of the panel. Making a jury panel--and thus, the jury selected from that panel--aware of a defendant's prior criminal record is inherently prejudicial because of the jury's natural inclination to infer guilt of the charged offense from that record. Russell v. State, 146 S.W.3d 705, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8038 (Tex. App. Texarkana 2004).

3. Defendant's claim that the trial court erred by denying his motion to exclude evidence of his prior lengthy criminal history lacked merit, as he suggested no reason that such cross-examination would have been improper under Tex. R. Evid. 609, and his argument that allowing such impeachment deprived him of a fair and impartial trial pursuant to Tex. Const. art. I, § 10 also was not supported. Cochran v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1916 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 27 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Delivery, Distribution & Sale

4. In a trial for delivery of crack cocaine, evidence that a confidential informant was arrested for impersonating a peace officer was properly excluded under Tex. R. Evid. 608, 609. There was no evidence that the informant was convicted. Garrett v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 340, 2011 WL 193476 (Tex. App. Tyler Jan. 19 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : General Overview

5. It was proper, based in part on the reasons underlying Tex. R. Evid. 609, to exclude from a drug possession trial evidence tending to show that a detective did not immediately file charges against defendant for all of the drugs found in his possession during an earlier search. Defendant argued that the evidence should be admitted to show illegal police conduct as well as bias and lack of credibility. Perez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3407, 2010 WL 1818944 (Tex. App. Austin May 5 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Controlled Substances : Possession : Simple Possession : Elements

6. In defendant's trial on for possession of methamphetamine in the amount of one gram or more but less than four grams under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. §§ 481.102(6) and 481.115(a), the trial court committed reversible error in allowing the State to introduce evidence of defendant's prior drug offense convictions because the convictions occurred more than 10 years earlier and were remote under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) and because the State failed to prove that the probative value of the evidence substantially outweighed its prejudicial effect; further, the error affected defendant's substantial rights. Because the convictions were almost identical to defendant's present charge, a clear danger existed that the improper admission of similar offenses led the jury to convict based on past conduct rather than the facts of the charged offense; in addition, the jury received no limiting instructions regarding the evidence, and rather than instructing the jury on this evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609, the trial court erroneously instructed the jury on prior crimes evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b). Thus, the jury was never properly instructed on how to use the evidence of defendant's prior convictions. Roberts v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5517, 2011 WL 2860106 (Tex. App. Dallas July 20 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : General Overview

7. Evidence was legally and factually sufficient to support defendant's conviction for harassment of a public servant in violation of Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.11(a)(2) where the jury could rationally have believed the police officer truthfully stated that defendant spit directly in his face and could rationally have inferred from defendant's belligerence that he intended to cause his saliva to come into contact with the officer, and where the jury could rationally have rejected the contrary testimony, none of which proved that the incident could not have happened the way the officers testified it did. Moreover, in addition to having a relationship with defendant, defendant's girlfriend had a felony conviction for assault on a public servant and had also previously been arrested for assault with family violence, and the jury could have taken her felony conviction into account in assessing her credibility, and the jury also could have given more weight to the officers' testimony after determining that the girlfriend and a neighbor were not in as good a position to notice defendant if he did spit. Smith v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2287, 2010 WL 1236410 (Tex. App. Beaumont Mar. 31 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Assault & Battery : Aggravated Offenses

8. Aggravated assault that occurred five years before defendant's burglary trial was admissible for impeachment purposes. The offenses were not similar, and defendant's credibility was vital because his testimony conflicted with that of the only witness to the crime, with regard to whether they had a prior relationship. Livingston v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9054, 2011 WL 5535332 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 15 2011).

9. In an aggravated assault trial, there was no error in admitting, for impeachment purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 609, defendant's prior convictions for theft, burglary, and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, in part because the State's need to impeach defendant was great, given that he was the only person testifying that he was not the aggressor. Luna v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 3316, 2010 WL 1782237 (Tex. App. Dallas May 5 2010).

10. During defendant's trial for aggravated assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02, the trial court did not err in denying his Theus motion and admitting evidence of his prior convictions pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609 where the specific facts and circumstances supported a finding that the probative value of defendant's prior convictions substantially outweighed their prejudicial effect; all of the Theus factors favored admission of defendant's theft convictions, and, in regard to his robbery convictions, the first Theus factor regarding the impeachment value of the prior crime was the only factor that might have favored exclusion, but defendant had testified that he was not a violent man, and his robbery convictions might have been probative not simply to assess his credibility but also to respond to his testimony. Davis v. State, 259 S.W.3d 778, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8749 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

11. During defendant's trial for aggravated assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02, the State's argument that the jury could consider defendant's prior convictions in assessing his credibility was permissible argument because the State did not ask the jurors to consider defendant's prior convictions in determining his guilt, but, rather, it simply urged them to use those convictions in evaluating defendant's credibility. Davis v. State, 259 S.W.3d 778, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8749 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

12. After defendant testified on direct examination that although he had previously been convicted of three charges of aggravated assault, he had "never pulled a gun in his life" when, in fact, he had been convicted of three gun-related offenses, the trial court properly allowed the State to impeach him with the underlying facts of previous convictions. Campos v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4627 (Tex. App. Dallas May 30 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Domestic Offenses : Children : General Overview

13. In a trial for injury to a child, it did not violate Tex. R. Evid. 609, or the Confrontation Clause to exclude evidence related to the victim's prior accusation; there was no proof in the record that the prior accusation was false or that it was similar in nature to the offenses for which defendant was charged, and the excluded evidence did not involve a pending criminal charge against the victim. Fierro v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 2160 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 22 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Kidnapping : General Overview

14. In a kidnapping trial, the court properly determined that the impeachment value under Tex. R. Evid. 609 of remote driving while intoxicated (DWI) convictions did not outweigh their potential prejudice because DWI was not a crime of deception and the complainant admitted she had a drinking problem that included a long history of DWI convictions. Further, the importance of the complainant's testimony and credibility were mitigated because another defendant's girlfriend corroborated her testimony. Celis v. State, 369 S.W.3d 691, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4187, 2012 WL 1868627 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 24 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Robbery : General Overview

15. Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence of the witness's prior theft convictions because the convictions occurred twenty-one and nineteen years prior to trial and the witness's credibility was not critical. Enriquez v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 2898, 2014 WL 1010174 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 13 2014).

16. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's prior robbery conviction during his robbery trial because: (1) although the conviction was several years old, it was not remote and demonstrated a propensity for running afoul of the law; and (2) defendant's testimony and credibility were of enormous significance, as his entire defense that he was an innocent bystander to the robbery depended on his testimony. Medina v. State, 367 S.W.3d 470, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2932, 2012 WL 1293035 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 17 2012).

17. In a robbery trial, the admission of prior robbery convictions for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609 fell within the zone of reasonable disagreement; although the similarity of the past and current crimes weighed against admission, the prior convictions were less than ten years old and the State had a significant need to impeach defendant's testimony, given that credibility was important to his defense. Berry v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 2863 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Apr. 11 2006).

18. In a robbery trial, the court did not have to admit evidence of the complainant's prior conviction for misdemeanor assault against defendant's nephew; contrary to defendant's argument, the two-year-old conviction was not relevant to show that the complainant ran from his apartment because he feared a physical confrontation. The court noted that the evidence would properly have been excluded for impeachment purposes because it was not a felony or a crime involving moral turpitude. Allison v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 4055 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 24 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Crimes Against Persons : Stalking : General Overview

19. In a retaliation case, a court properly refused to allow impeachment of the victim with his prior theft convictions where they were more than 10 years old, the victim had no further diffculties with the law, and the probative value did not outweigh the danger of prejudice. Moore v. State, 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

20. Two citations for petty theft 13 or 14 years before trial, viewed alone, without any intervening convictions, had little bearing on the victim's present credibility; moreover, at least five other witnesses testified to defendant's threats against the victim, and thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the danger of unfair prejudice outweighed the probative value of the convictions. Moore v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 3017 (Tex. App. Waco Mar. 31 2004), opinion withdrawn by 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6584 (Tex. App. Waco July 21, 2004), substituted opinion at 143 S.W.3d 305, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 6612 (Tex. App. Waco 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Murder : General Overview

21. Pursuant to Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02(c), defendant was convicted of murdering the victim, defendant's infant son, and trial counsel's decision to elicit testimony regarding defendant's prior juvenile adjudication could not be considered reasonable trial strategy, as it was otherwise inadmissible as impeachment evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609 and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(i), and constituted deficient representation; however, because defendant failed to affirmatively show that the jury's consideration of a juvenile drug possession charge led the jury to assess the maximum punishment under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.32(a), in defendant's murder case, defendant could not establish that defendant was prejudiced, and thus, trial counsel's representation was not ineffective. Chapa v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 2091 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 12 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Homicide : Voluntary Manslaughter : General Overview

22. In defendant's murder case, a court abused its discretion by admitting evidence of defendant's prior voluntary manslaughter conviction under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because voluntary manslaughter was an offense involving violence, and did not involve deception, the prior offense and the charged offense were similar, defendant's testimony was critical to his claim of self-defense, and the State also had impeachment evidence of a prior conviction of forgery, which was a crime involving deception and moral turpitude and was better suited for impeachment purposes. High v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 877 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Feb. 2 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : General Overview

23. Trial court did not err by excluding impeachment evidence that the victim had been convicted of the misdemeanor offense of interference with an emergency telephone call under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 42.062 because it did not represent a crime of moral turpitude as required by Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). Urtado v. State, 333 S.W.3d 418, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 1251 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 16 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Obstruction of Justice : General Overview

24. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the prosecuting attorney to impeach defendant with a prior conviction for failing to identify by giving false or fictitious information where the record reflected that, when cross-examined, defendant admitted to having the prior conviction. Defendant argued that the trial court erred in allowing examination regarding the conviction because he explained on re-direct that he was simply slow in providing his identification, but defendant's explanation did not change the nature of his conviction. Mozeke v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 7986, 2013 WL 3326828 (Tex. App. Dallas June 27 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Miscellaneous Offenses : Resisting Arrest : General Overview

25. In a resisting arrest case, although defendant's previous conviction for interference with the duties of a public servant was neither a felony nor a crime of moral turpitude and was thus not admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), a court properly admitted the conviction to correct a false impression left by defendant where defendant's self-serving remarks about respect for police placed his attitude toward public servants into issue and were thus properly subject to impeachment to refute that false representation with contrary evidence. Paita v. State, 125 S.W.3d 708, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 10432 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Burglary & Criminal Trespass : Burglary

26. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's prior burglary convictions into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b) because: (1) burglary had been found to be a crime of deception; (2) although the record did not establish what year the first two convictions occurred, the third burglary conviction occurred on August 20, 2008; and (3) defendant's testimony and credibility were of significance, as his entire defense that he was an innocent bystander to the robbery depended on his testimony. Medina v. State, 367 S.W.3d 470, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2932, 2012 WL 1293035 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 17 2012).

27. Aggravated assault that occurred five years before defendant's burglary trial was admissible for impeachment purposes. The offenses were not similar, and defendant's credibility was vital because his testimony conflicted with that of the only witness to the crime, with regard to whether they had a prior relationship. Livingston v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9054, 2011 WL 5535332 (Tex. App. Texarkana Nov. 15 2011).

28. In a case involving burglary of a building, a trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting convictions for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, burglary of a building, and credit card abuse for impeachment purposes where the burglary conviction satisfied four of the five elements in a test to determine admissibility, and the other convictions satisfied all five elements; inter alia, the convictions were for deception or moral turpitude offenses, they were within the 10-year period, defendant was the only witness to testify on his behalf, and one of the offenses was similar. Mixon v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 4310 (Tex. App. El Paso May 31 2007).

29. Despite an initial misidentification of a driver who fled the scene of a residential burglary, there was sufficient evidence to convict defendant of burglary of a habitation where an officer later positively identified defendant due to a tattoo, an owner stated that he loaned defendant a truck, and the truck was later abandoned with items inside; moreover, the trial court was not permitted to consider the fact that the owner, the first person mistakenly identified, had previous convictions for burglary of a habitation. Britt v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4982 (Tex. App. Fort Worth June 8 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Larceny & Theft : General Overview

30. In a trial for aggravated robbery, it was proper for the State to cross-examine defendant during the guilt-innocence phase of trial with evidence of three felony theft convictions that were more than ten years old because the convictions had a high impeachment value and defendant's credibility was important, as he was the only defense witness. Meadows v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 289, 2014 WL 84207 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Jan. 9 2014).

31. Contention of defendant upon being convicted of felony theft, that the trial court erred in allowing the State to impeach him with proof of prior convictions when he had not been given notice pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(f), could not be entered on appeal, because defendant failed to object when the prosecutor inquired into his prior convictions and, thus, he failed to preserve error as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33.1. Geuder v. State, 76 S.W.3d 133, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 2312 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. 2002), vacated by 115 S.W.3d 11, 2003 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 305 (Tex. Crim. App. 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Obscenity : Elements

32. Because the conduct underlying defendant's public lewdness conviction, deviate sexual intercourse, violated accepted social behavior and offended society at large, public lewdness, as defined by the Texas Penal Code, constituted a crime of moral turpitude and could be used to impeach defendant's credibility. Escobedo v. State, 202 S.W.3d 844, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6535 (Tex. App. Waco 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : General Overview

33. In a sexual assault case, a court properly allowed evidence of defendant's prior convictions to impeach his out-of-court statement that he was not responsible for the crime where, during the recross-examination of an officer, defense counsel elicited, without objection, defendant's out-of-court statement that he was not responsible for what he was being accused. By eliciting the statement during his cross-examination of a State's witness, defendant opened the door to the issue of his credibility. Flores v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7207 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 12 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Sex Crimes : Sexual Assault : Abuse of Children : General Overview

34. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of appellant's two prior felony convictions under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because there was no similarity between convictions for possession of a controlled substance and aggravated sexual assault of a child, and because the State had an escalated need to impeach appellant's credibility as he was the only witness capable of denying the allegations of sexual assault. Mireles v. State, 413 S.W.3d 98, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 3730 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 27 2013).

35. In a trial for sexual assault of a child, the State was properly allowed to impeach defendant with a conviction for felony driving while intoxicated with a child passenger. Pearson v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 5690, 2012 WL 2899766 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. July 17 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : General Overview

36. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting defendant's prior unauthorized use of a motor vehicle conviction during his robbery trial because: (1) the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle had been found to be a crime of deception; (2) although the prior conviction was several years old, it was not too remote to be considered and demonstrated a propensity for running afoul of the law; and (3) defendant's testimony and the credibility of that testimony were of significance, as his entire defense that he was an innocent bystander to the robbery depended on his testimony. Medina v. State, 367 S.W.3d 470, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 2932, 2012 WL 1293035 (Tex. App. Texarkana Apr. 17 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Vehicular Crimes : Driving Under the Influence : General Overview

37. In a kidnapping trial, the court properly determined that the impeachment value under Tex. R. Evid. 609 of remote driving while intoxicated (DWI) convictions did not outweigh their potential prejudice because DWI was not a crime of deception and the complainant admitted she had a drinking problem that included a long history of DWI convictions. Further, the importance of the complainant's testimony and credibility were mitigated because another defendant's girlfriend corroborated her testimony. Celis v. State, 369 S.W.3d 691, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 4187, 2012 WL 1868627 (Tex. App. Fort Worth May 24 2012).

38. In a trial for defendant's aggravated assault of a former romantic partner, the trial court properly excluded evidence of the victim's prior inconsistent statement regarding a pending driving while intoxicated charge because it was not a final conviction as required by Tex. R. Evid. 609. Padilla v. State, 254 S.W.3d 585, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 2719 (Tex. App. Eastland 2008).

39. Theft convictions were properly admitted under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because four out of the five factors enumerated in the case of Theus v. State, 845 S.W.2d 874, 880 (Tex. Crim. App. 1992), were satisfied; the theft convictions were crimes of moral turpitude, they were dissimilar to the charged offense of driving while intoxicated, and defendant's credibility was important since he was the only defense witness. Roach v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 6764 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 23 2007).

40. Where defendant objected to the admission of the prior DWI convictions alleged in the indictment for felony driving while intoxicated, because they occurred more than 10 years before the instant offense, Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.04 and Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.09 together defined the offense of felony driving while intoxicated; a prior intoxication-related conviction used to raise the offense to a felony under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.09, is not an element of that offense, as Tex. Penal Code Ann § 49.09 does not describe the forbidden conduct, the required culpability, any required result, nor does it create an exception to the offense, as described in Tex. Penal Code § 1.07; Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 49.09 is more akin to a rule of admissibility, pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), as opposed to an element of the offense. Weaver v. State, 87 S.W.3d 557, 2002 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 151 (Tex. Crim. App. 2002), cert denied, 538 U.S. 911, 123 S. Ct. 1491, 155 L. Ed. 2d 234, 2003 U.S. LEXIS 2056 (2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Weapons : Possession : General Overview

41. In a murder trial, it was error to admit evidence of defendant's prior misdemeanor conviction for weapons possession. The error was harmless because it was clear from other properly admitted evidence that defendant was familiar with handguns and had handled them in the past. Hines v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9262, 2012 WL 5458424 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Nov. 8 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juvenile Offenders : Juvenile Proceedings : Records

42. Where defendant did not challenge the trial court's ruling that the probative value of evidence of witness's juvenile adjudication of attempted capital murder was substantially outweighed by the danger of undue prejudice under Tex. R. Evid. 403, the court upheld the trial court's ruling excluding the evidence on that ground. Marsh v. State, 343 S.W.3d 158, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 4390 (Tex. App. Texarkana June 10 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Brady Materials : Brady Claims

43. Defendant was not entitled to attack the arresting officer's credibility by showing that he was under investigation for violating the Occupations Code, a specific instance of misconduct, and therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion by determining that defendant did not establish a Brady violation. Smith v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 9194 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. July 25 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Discovery & Inspection : Witness Lists : Government Witnesses

44. Defendant was not entitled to a new trial on the basis that the State failed to disclose that its witness had been arrested for felony deadly conduct and misdemeanor assault causing bodily injury-family violence. The evidence would not have been admissible for impeachment because the witness did not create a false impression that he had no other arrests than that involved in his old felony conviction. Caldwell v. State, 356 S.W.3d 42, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8437 (Tex. App. Texarkana Oct. 21 2011).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Preliminary Proceedings : Preliminary Hearings : Evidence

45. Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) requires that the trial court determine whether the probative value of admitting evidence of prior convictions outweighs its prejudicial effect to a party, and Tex. R. Evid. 609(f) requires timely notice of the State's intended use of evidence of prior convictions to provide the defendant a fair opportunity to contest the use of such evidence, but the phrase "fair opportunity" does not specify at what point in the proceedings the decision as to admissibility is to be made; there is not authority holding that a "fair opportunity" means an opportunity exclusively during a pretrial hearing and not during a hearing outside the presence of the jury during a trial on the merits; thus, the trial court's denial of defendant's motion for a pretrial hearing on his Tex. R. Evid. 609 motion was neither an abuse of discretion nor reversible error. Yanez v. State, 199 S.W.3d 293, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 10540 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Preliminary Proceedings : Pretrial Diversion : General Overview

46. Denying defendant the right to impeach a witness at his trial for the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle with a remote and successfully completed deferred adjudication probation did not deny defendant his right of confrontation, because the witness's testimony did not create a false impression and he was not convicted of any offense to allow for impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a). Parker v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 7992, 2012 WL 4121133 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Sept. 20 2012).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Pretrial Motions & Procedures : Motions in Limine

47. No error was preserved for review where defendant complained that a question regarding a prior conviction violated a ruling on a motion in limine, rather that that the admission of the evidence violated Tex. R. Evid. 609. Smith v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8182, 2010 WL 3928485 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Oct. 7 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Sentencing

48. Where defendant plead guilty to forgery and was sentenced to 19 years incarceration, the trial court had not acted improperly in considering convictions more than 10 years old to enhance his punishment where Tex. Pen. Code Ann. § 12.42 (Vernon 2003) did not impose a time limit on the use of prior convictions for the purpose of enhancing a defendant's punishment and counsel was not ineffective for having failed to object to the use of the prior convictions for enhancement purposes. Austin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8114 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 2 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Tests

49. Even if trial counsel's failure to raise a more specific objection under Tex. R. Evid. 609 was deficient performance, defendant did not establish that but for trial counsel's failure to raise such an objection, the result of the proceeding would have been different; given the overwhelming evidence supporting defendant's guilt, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for new trial. Hargrove v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2517 (Tex. App. San Antonio Apr. 6 2011).

50. Trial counsel was not rendered ineffective even though, during examination of defendant concerning prior convictions, counsel included misdemeanors that did not involve moral turpitude and that were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because defendant failed to show prejudice. Robinson v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 9809 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Dec. 13 2007).

51. Appellate court affirmed defendant's conviction possession of a controlled substance, namely cocaine, weighing more than four grams and less than 200 grams, with intent to deliver as defendant failed to show that prior convictions used to impeach him that his attorney failed to object to would have been inadmissible due to remoteness. Pittman v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 653 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 27 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Counsel : Effective Assistance : Trials

52. Defendant did not show that counsel was ineffective in failing to request a hearing to exclude evidence of prior convictions because defendant was the proponent of the prior conviction. Mars v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 7342 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 9 2014).

53. Even if counsel's performance was deficient in opening the door to evidence of defendant's remote prior convictions, there was no prejudice because the trial court would still have had the discretion to allow such evidence to be introduced by the State for impeachment purposes and the evidence of guilty was substantial. Howard v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 3051, 2014 WL 2619087 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Mar. 20 2014).

54. Because defendant presented no evidence that the victim's prior conviction involved deception, he did not show that his trial counsel erred in the objection he offered to the trial court regarding impeachment. Charles v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10545 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 22 2013).

55. Defendant's counsel was ineffective for opening the door to allow the State to introduce evidence of his prior convictions of sexual assault and sexual assault of a child by asking defendant's ex-girlfriend whether defendant was a violent person and she responded that he was not; therefore, on cross-examination the State was permitted to ask the ex-girlfriend whether she knew that defendant had pleaded guilty to two prior sexual assaults, allowing prejudicial and otherwise inadmissible evidence to be presented before the jury, which could not be considered sound trial strategy. The court held that defendant was prejudiced because the credibility of defendant's testimony was a key component of his defense strategy, given that he claimed he was trying to get away from the victim and had no intention of hurting anyone; although the trial court gave the jury a limiting instruction as to how it could consider the prior convictions, the instruction specifically allowed the jury to consider the convictions for the sole purpose of determining defendant's character for violence. Hernandez v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 6365, 2013 WL 2301989 (Tex. App. Eastland May 23 2013).

56. Defendant's forgery conviction was a felony conviction admissible for impeachment purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), and he conceded the admissibility of his four prior convictions for burglary of a vehicle; therefore trial counsel was not ineffective for introducing those convictions to the jury in an effort to appear open. Rahe v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1025, 2013 WL 440557 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 5 2013).

57. Counsel was constitutionally deficient in eliciting from defendant during his testimony four prior misdemeanor convictions--for possession of marijuana, carrying a deadly weapon, and two for driving with a suspended license--that were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Chavis v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 9975 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Dec. 4 2012).

58. Because defendant's two prior felony convictions were inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609, but defense counsel opened the door for the State to cross-examine defendant's about those convictions by questioning defendant about his convictions, defense counsel was ineffective under U.S. Const. amend. VI; Tex. Const. art. I, § 10. Vasquez v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 8496, 2012 WL 4826966 (Tex. App. Eastland Oct. 11 2012).

59. Record was silent as to the reasons behind trial counsel's strategy for not obtaining a ruling on the motion to permit defendant to testify free from impeachment by prior criminal convictions; defendant did not meet his burden of demonstrating that his counsel was deficient. West v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 3612, 2012 WL 1606239 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. May 8 2012).

60. Trial counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the State's use defendant's prior convictions for impeachment purposes under Tex. R. Evid. 609 because the convictions were listed in the county jail book-in, book-out record that defendant introduced into evidence while acting as his own counsel, and therefore he opened the door to an inquiry by the State. Matlock v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 1120, 2012 WL 426613 (Tex. App. Tyler Feb. 8 2012).

61. Defendant failed to prove that defense counsel was ineffective during a trial for robbery by eliciting testimony about his prior theft case, because the trial court would have acted within its discretion to admit the prior conviction for purposes of impeachment under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Theft was a crime of moral turpitude involving elements of deception; therefore, it had a high impeachment value and it fell within the ten-year restriction of Tex. R. Evid. 609. Huerta v. State, 359 S.W.3d 887, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 852, 2012 WL 311677 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Feb. 2 2012).

62. Defendant did not show that counsel rendered ineffective assistance of counsel when he did not object to the admission of his prior convictions used for impeachment where trial counsel was not ineffective for not making a meritless objection and he failed to show that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different. Matlock v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 8496, 2011 WL 5115877 (Tex. App. Tyler Oct. 26 2011).

63. In a case where defendant was convicted of two counts of aggravated sexual assault, based on the trial strategy of arguing that the sex was consensual, counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to the evidence of extraneous offenses during the State's case and in eliciting testimony from defendant regarding previous convictions for burglary of a habitation under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 30.02, delivery of a simulated drug under Tex. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 482.002, failure to identify to a police officer, and assaults causing bodily injury upon female victims because that evidence would have been brought out during cross-examination of defendant. Douglas v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 9086, 2010 WL 4638778 (Tex. App. San Antonio Nov. 17 2010).

64. Appellant failed to establish ineffective assistance of counsel based on his trial counsel's questioning of appellant about prior convictions for possession of a controlled substance and for theft because the State would not have been precluded from introducing the convictions into evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609 as, inter alia, the theft conviction involved a crime of moral turpitude and the past crimes were recently committed. Scope v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 6824, 2010 WL 3220627 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 12 2010).

65. In a case in which defendant was convicted of murder, defendant did not prove by a preponderance of the evidence that his trial counsel's representation was deficient where, although he claimed that trial counsel did not call witnesses who would have supported his contention that his cousin killed the victim, it could not be said that counsel was ineffective for failing to attempt to introduce evidence that was inadmissible because: (1) neither the witnesses nor the proffered testimony attacked the cousin's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, nor did their testimony establish he had been convicted of a crime within the parameters of Tex. R. Evid. 609; and (2) as to testimony by defendant's grandmother and uncle about what the cousin's father told them, that evidence was clearly hearsay, and defendant did not demonstrate on the record any exception that would have permitted the admission of those statements. Moreover, defendant did not establish that, but for his counsel's failure to call the witnesses, there was a reasonable probability the result of the proceeding would have been different because there were three eyewitnesses to the murder, one of whom had no relationship to anyone other than the victim, and therefore no motive to lie, and his testimony was corroborated by the other two eyewitnesses. Aquino v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7391, 2009 WL 3030749 (Tex. App. San Antonio Sept. 23 2009).

66. Defendant failed to preserve a complaint that impeachment with a prior burglary conviction violated Tex. R. Evid. 609 because defendant did not timely object and did not object on the grounds urged appeal, as required by Tex. R. App. P. 33; counsel was not ineffective in failing to object because the record was not clear as to whether defendant satisfactorily completed probation or even what type of punishment was actually assessed. Campbell v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1707 (Tex. App. Eastland Mar. 6 2008).

67. Counsel was not ineffective for permitting the jury to hear evidence of defendant's prior convictions that were inadmissible under Theus because defendant's prior theft convictions, prior felony drug convictions, and his conviction for lying to the police were likely admissible; because it also appeared that defendant's candor before the jury concerning his prior convictions was a strategic attempt to appear open and honest, and to lessen the impact of any impeachment on the issue, it could not be concluded that counsel provided ineffective assistance with regard to the introduction of those convictions. Martin v. State, 265 S.W.3d 435, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7652 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

68. Defense counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to inadmissible impeachment evidence consisting of defendant's prior convictions because on direct examination, defendant preemptively admitted to numerous prior convictions in an attempt to minimize any damage. Andrews v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 7217 (Tex. App. Texarkana Sept. 5 2007).

69. Trial counsel was not ineffective for introducing defendant's four remote felony convictions and one remote misdemeanor convictions into evidence during his sexual assault trial; in introducing the prior convictions counsel may have been attempting to convince the jury that, despite defendant's criminal history, he had never been convicted of a crime that was sexual in nature or involved a child. Smith v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 254 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Jan. 11 2007).

70. Defendant did not establish that that he received ineffective assistance of counsel when his attorney elicited testimony from him about an assault after the prosecutor failed to raise the assault during cross-examination; there was no record establishing whether defendant was convicted; therefore, the court could not determine if his counsel opened the door to evidence that would have been inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609. Williams v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1797 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Mar. 2 2006).

71. In a resisting arrest case, counsel was ineffective where, inter alia, counsel failed to investigate or interview defendant in detail about his criminal history or his prior contacts with the arresting officer; failed to seek discovery from the State; failed to file and obtain rulings on a motion in limine to require the State to raise extraneous matters outside the presence of the jury; failed to prepare defendant to testify; failed to object to evidence of inadmissible extraneous matters during the guilt phase; invited evidence of unadjudicated arrests during the punishment phase; and failed to object to failure of the punishment-phase charge to include a reasonable doubt instruction. Walker v. State, 195 S.W.3d 250, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 1381 (Tex. App. San Antonio 2006).

72. In an aggravated robbery case, defendant failed to show that his trial counsel was ineffective in eliciting testimony from him concerning extraneous offenses; defendant was unable to rebut the presumption that counsel made a reasonable strategic decision, the extraneous offenses were arguably admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609, and defendant did not show a reasonable probability that the result would otherwise have been different. Perez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 1918 (Tex. App. Dallas Mar. 14 2005).

73. In an aggravated assault case, defense counsel was not ineffective for eliciting testimony from defendant regarding two non-final prior convictions, evidence of which would have been inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(e), because counsel could reasonably have thought the testimony would make a self-defense claim more believable. Robertson v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 10130 (Tex. App. Waco Nov. 10 2004), reversed by 187 S.W.3d 475, 2006 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 576 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

74. In an aggravated robbery case, defense counsel was not ineffective in failing to object to the state's use of defendant's juvenile record for impeachment; although Tex. R. Evid. 609(d) provides that evidence of a juvenile adjudication generally is not admissible to impeach a witness, defendant opened the door to the admission of such evidence when he volunteered during cross-examination that he had never been in trouble before. Andrews v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 9955 (Tex. App. Eastland Nov. 20 2003).

75. Pursuant to Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 19.02(c), defendant was convicted of murdering the victim, defendant's infant son, and trial counsel's decision to elicit testimony regarding defendant's prior juvenile adjudication could not be considered reasonable trial strategy, as it was otherwise inadmissible as impeachment evidence under Tex. R. Evid. 609 and Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07, § 3(i), and constituted deficient representation; however, because defendant failed to affirmatively show that the jury's consideration of a juvenile drug possession charge led the jury to assess the maximum punishment under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.32(a), in defendant's murder case, defendant could not establish that defendant was prejudiced, and thus, trial counsel's representation was not ineffective. Chapa v. State, 2003 Tex. App. LEXIS 2091 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 12 2003).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Voir Dire : General Overview

76. During voir dire in defendant's trial for possession of methamphetamine enhanced by two prior felonies, the court abused its discretion by prohibiting defense counsel from asking a potential juror if he would automatically disbelieve a convicted felon; counsel's question was a proper commitment question; under the rules of evidence, a juror has a right to disbelieve a convicted felon. Tijerina v. State, 202 S.W.3d 299, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6073 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

77. If a potential juror states that he would automatically disbelieve a witness who has not yet testified based solely on the witness's status as a felon, that potential juror cannot impartially judge the credibility of the convicted felon witness just as a potential juror who would automatically believe a police officer cannot impartially judge the credibility of a police officer. Tijerina v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 853 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 2 2006), *opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at*202 S.W.3d 299, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6073 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 13, 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Juries & Jurors : Voir Dire : Questions to Venire Panel

78. Reversible error occurred when criminal defense counsel was prevented from asking a proper commitment question as to whether jurors would automatically disbelieve a witness with a prior felony conviction. Although a juror could disbelieve any witness once the witness testified, a potential juror could not impartially judge the credibility of a convicted felon witness if the potential juror stated that he or she would automatically disbelieve a witness who had not yet testified, based solely on the witness's status as a felon. Vann v. State, 216 S.W.3d 881, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1001 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Closing Arguments : Fair Comment & Fair Response

79. During defendant's trial for aggravated assault under Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.02, the State's argument that the jury could consider defendant's prior convictions in assessing his credibility was permissible argument because the State did not ask the jurors to consider defendant's prior convictions in determining his guilt, but, rather, it simply urged them to use those convictions in evaluating defendant's credibility. Davis v. State, 259 S.W.3d 778, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 8749 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 2007).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Counsel : Effective Assistance

80. Although defense counsel's introduction of impeaching testimony ahead of the State might have supported defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel where impeachment by the State would have been improper under Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) and (b), it was possible that it was important for the jury to know that the witness did not otherwise have a criminal record of any sort, that her single arrest was more than 11 years ago, and that the arrest was for possession of an item her then-boyfriend had in their house. Counsel therefore had a valid tactical reason for introducing the impeaching evidence, thereby defeating the ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Owen v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 1556 (Tex. App. Texarkana Feb. 18 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Due Process

81. At defendant's trial for aggravated assault on a public servant and evading arrest with a motor vehicle, the trial court's refusal to guarantee that he could testify free from impeachment of prior convictions did not deprive him of his rights to due process and to present a complete defense as he did not have a constitutional right to testify free from impeachment. Since defendant never testified and was never impeached, a conclusion of harmful error was speculative. Aguilar v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 10897 (Tex. App. El Paso Aug. 28 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Defendant's Rights : Right to Testify

82. Counsel's advise that defendant not testify was reasonable trial strategy, in part because defendant had prior convictions. Although they were generally inadmissible under Tex. R. Evid. 609(b), it would have been possible for defendant to open the door to their admission through his testimony. Henriquez v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 1759 (Tex. App. Austin Mar. 10 2010).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Examination of Witnesses : Cross-Examination

83. There was no abuse of discretion in a trial court's keeping defendant from cross-examining one of the State's witnesses about the circumstances of the crime that resulted in her being placed on community supervision because while defendant was permitted to establish that the witness had been convicted of a felony offense, he could not inquire as to the circumstances surrounding the offense. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in precluding defendant from pursuing inadmissible evidence. Griffith v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 8942 (Tex. App. Texarkana July 19 2013).

84. Trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to allow him to cross-examine the officer about specific acts of misconduct allegedly showing he was violent and not credible with citizens in the community because no charges were brought against the officer for any of the alleged misconduct and it was not shown that those events were connected to the officer defendant was tried for, namely shooting the officer. Castillo v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 2034, 2013 WL 781776 (Tex. App. San Antonio Mar. 1 2013).

85. There was no error in denying defendant the opportunity to cross-examine a witness about whether the witness was untruthful to the judge that presided over the witness's guilty plea to an assault charge. Tex. R. Evid. 609 did not apply because nothing in the appellate record showed that the witness had either been charged with or convicted of any crime. Reyes v. State, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 2359, 2010 WL 1254543 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Apr. 1 2010).

86. During defendant's trial for indecency with a child, the trial court abused its discretion in preventing defendant from cross-examining the complainant under Tex. R. Evid. 609 about her previous false allegations of sexual assault. The evidence was admissible under Tex. R. Evid. 404(b) to show the complainant's bias against defendant and her possible motive to testify falsely against him. Hammer v. State, 296 S.W.3d 555, 2009 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 513 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009).

87. In an indecency with a child case, a court properly restricted defendant's cross-examination of the victim's mother regarding benefits from a crime victims' compensation fund intended to show that she sought financial gain as a consequence of the incident because the proffered evidence was only marginally probative on the issue of bias or motive, and the mother was effectively impeached because she was incarcerated at the time of trial serving a sentence for forgery and had given custody of her children to a relative. Hoover v. State, 2007 Tex. App. LEXIS 1549 (Tex. App. Austin Feb. 27 2007).

88. Pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(a), the State was entitled to cross-examine defendant on his prior arrests and convictions for impeachment purposes because he opened the door to his criminal history when he gave misleading responses to his counsel's inquiry into his problems with the law in that he implied that his criminal history consisted only of minor traffic offenses and a justifiable assault on an animal control officer. The trial court could have reasonably concluded that defendant left a false impression with the jury with respect to the extent of his trouble with the law. Martinez v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 7748 (Tex. App. El Paso Sept. 22 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Judicial Discretion

89. Whether or not to admit remote convictions is within the trial courts' discretion and depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. Woodall v. State, 77 S.W.3d 388, 2002 Tex. App. LEXIS 3087 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2002).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Trials : Motions for Mistrial

90. Court did not err in denying a mistrial where the State inquired into defendant's mother's criminal history where the trial court issued a definitive instruction to disregard both the question and the answer, and also advised the jury that the charge had been dismissed in 1986. In addition, given that the improper question arose during the punishment phase, the question was not so inflammatory or so likely to prejudice the jury's view of the defendant that the jury would have been unable to follow the trial court's instruction to disregard. Garza v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6843 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 24 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Credibility

91. In defendant's sexual assault case, evidence was improperly excluded because it was admissible to impeach the complainant's credibility. The evidence in the records not only addressed the complainant's mental state but directly addressed her inability to separate fantasy from reality; the therapist's notes raised the possibility that the complainant had not been abused by defendant but had created the event in her mind or confused an actual event with fantasy. State v. Moreno, 297 S.W.3d 512, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 7642 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist. Oct. 1 2009).

92. Court properly limited cross-examination of a witness because defendant's attempt to use an instance during an officer's career in which he wrote "phantom" warning citations was nothing more than an instance of wrongdoing in his life and was not shown to bear on his general reputation for truthfulness. There was nothing which revealed that the act of wrongdoing created a bias on the part of the officer against defendant or caused the officer to have a motive to testify untruthfully. McMillon v. State, 294 S.W.3d 198, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 6238 (Tex. App. Texarkana Aug. 12 2009).

93. During voir dire in defendant's trial for possession of methamphetamine enhanced by two prior felonies, the court abused its discretion by prohibiting defense counsel from asking a potential juror if he would automatically disbelieve a convicted felon; counsel's question was a proper commitment question; under the rules of evidence, a juror has a right to disbelieve a convicted felon. Tijerina v. State, 202 S.W.3d 299, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6073 (Tex. App. Fort Worth 2006).

94. If a potential juror states that he would automatically disbelieve a witness who has not yet testified based solely on the witness's status as a felon, that potential juror cannot impartially judge the credibility of the convicted felon witness just as a potential juror who would automatically believe a police officer cannot impartially judge the credibility of a police officer. Tijerina v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 853 (Tex. App. Fort Worth Feb. 2 2006), *opinion withdrawn by, substituted opinion at*202 S.W.3d 299, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6073 (Tex. App. Fort Worth July 13, 2006).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Criminal Records

95. Court did not err by prohibiting defense counsel from asking a witness about his earlier convictions because the witness responded truthfully and responsively, and in accordance with the parties' prior agreement, to the State's questioning regarding his prior criminal history; the witness followed the court's explicit instructions to answer questions only about the three specified prior convictions. Turner v. State, 443 S.W.3d 328, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8641 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. Aug. 7 2014).

96. Trial court did not err in allowing the State of Texas to impeach defendant, who was being tried for robbery and evading arrest, evidence of defendant's nearly 30-year-old prior convictions for robbery pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609, as three of the five factors for determining the admissibility of the evidence weighed in favor of admissibility. Therefore, the court's decision did not lie outside the zone of reasonable disagreement. Bradden v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 11142 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 8 2004).

97. Trial court abused its discretion in allowing the State to impeach defendant, who was charged with murder, with his 16-year-old convictions for aggravated rape and a crime against nature because crimes of violence had a higher prejudicial potential than impeachment value, defendant's testimony was critical to his claim of self-defense, the State's ability to use defendant's recent theft convictions to impeach him drastically lessened its need to use the aggravated rape and crime against nature convictions and defendant did not open the door to the admission of these convictions by claiming that he had not been in trouble before. Jackson v. State, 11 S.W.3d 336, 1999 Tex. App. LEXIS 9471 (Tex. App. Houston 1st Dist. 1999).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Witnesses : Impeachment

98. Court erred by admitting defendant's prior felony conviction for possession of MDMA because it was for possession of cocaine, which had little impeachment value, and it happened 9 years before the instant case. However, the error was harmless because defendant admitted to knowingly possessing steroids for personal use and MDMA with the intent to deliver it. Flores v. State, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 1809 (Tex. App. Dallas Feb. 26 2013).

99. Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence concerning the officer's prior drug arrest because, at no time during direct examination did the officer make any statements concerning his past conduct that suggested he had never been arrested, charged, or convicted of any offense nor did he create a false impression of law abiding behavior. Sheppard v. State, 2012 Tex. App. LEXIS 10638, 2012 WL 6698963 (Tex. App. Austin Dec. 21 2012).

100. In a case in which defendant was convicted of two counts of theft less than $ 1,500, the trial court had not abused its discretion in permitting the State to impeach defendant with nine prior convictions pursuant to Tex. R. Evid. 609(a) where: (1) defendant's five prior convictions for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, two prior theft convictions, and one prior burglary of a motor vehicle conviction all had strong impeachment value because they were crimes that involved deception; (2) although only one of defendant's prior convictions was relatively recent, the number of prior convictions demonstrated his propensity for lawlessness; and (3) defendant was the only witness in his defense, and because of his testimony, the State needed the opportunity to impeach his credibility. Parker v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 9612, 2011 WL 6091248 (Tex. App. Waco Dec. 7 2011).

101. In a murder trial, defendant was properly precluded from inquiring about a witness's juvenile probation because there was not a causal connection between the probation and the allegations against defendant. Patterson v. State, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 6141 (Tex. App. Dallas July 18 2006).

102. Court did not err in denying a mistrial where the State inquired into defendant's mother's criminal history where the trial court issued a definitive instruction to disregard both the question and the answer, and also advised the jury that the charge had been dismissed in 1986. In addition, given that the improper question arose during the punishment phase, the question was not so inflammatory or so likely to prejudice the jury's view of the defendant that the jury would have been unable to follow the trial court's instruction to disregard. Garza v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6843 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 24 2005).

103. In a sexual assault case, a court properly allowed evidence of defendant's prior convictions to impeach his out-of-court statement that he was not responsible for the crime where, during the recross-examination of an officer, defense counsel elicited, without objection, defendant's out-of-court statement that he was not responsible for what he was being accused. By eliciting the statement during his cross-examination of a State's witness, defendant opened the door to the issue of his credibility. Flores v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 7207 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 12 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Curative Instructions

104. Although it was error under Tex. R. Evid. 609 for the prosecution to ask whether a defense witness was on deferred adjudication for indecency with a child at the time of the charged assault, the error was rendered harmless by an instruction to disregard the unanswered question. Dotson v. State, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 5255, 2011 WL 2714058 (Tex. App. San Antonio July 13 2011).

105. Court did not err in denying a mistrial where the State inquired into defendant's mother's criminal history where the trial court issued a definitive instruction to disregard both the question and the answer, and also advised the jury that the charge had been dismissed in 1986. In addition, given that the improper question arose during the punishment phase, the question was not so inflammatory or so likely to prejudice the jury's view of the defendant that the jury would have been unable to follow the trial court's instruction to disregard. Garza v. State, 2005 Tex. App. LEXIS 6843 (Tex. App. San Antonio Aug. 24 2005).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Jury Instructions : Limiting Instructions

106. At defendant's trial for burglary of a habitation, the trial court was not required to give an instruction in the jury charge limiting the use of defendant's prior convictions for impeachment purposes only because defendant never requested a limiting instruction at the time the evidence was introduced. Reyes v. State, 422 S.W.3d 18, 2013 Tex. App. LEXIS 13573, 2013 WL 5872738 (Tex. App. Waco Oct. 31 2013).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Guidelines : Adjustments & Enhancements : Criminal History

107. Defendant's objections to the admission of his juvenile adjudications based on the lack of a judicial signature, the reliability of the adjudications, and their remoteness, based on Tex. R. Evid. 609, were misplaced because Rule 609 only applied to convictions admitted for impeachment, not convictions admitted during the punishment phase of a trial. His juvenile adjudications were properly admitted under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. Ann. art. 37.07. Avendano v. State, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 5832 (Tex. App. El Paso July 31, 2008).

108. For there to be a conviction, there must ordinarily be a judgment of guilt for the crime in question; therefore, a trial court should not have allowed the State to impeach defendant under Tex. R. Evid. 609 with offenses that had been dismissed after being admitted and applied during sentencing in a prior case, pursuant to Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 12.45. Lopez v. State, 253 S.W.3d 680, 2008 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 642 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Guidelines : Adjustments & Enhancements : Criminal History : Prior Felonies

109. In a case involving possession of heroin, a trial court did not err by overruling objections made to prior felony convictions from 1978 and 1988 because prior convictions introduced during the punishment phase of a trial were not subject to the remoteness limitation in Tex. R. Evid. 609(b). Therefore, defendant's sentence was properly enhanced, and a sentence of 16 years and 7 months was proper. Eisenmenger v. State, 2009 Tex. App. LEXIS 4042, 2009 WL 988658 (Tex. App. Dallas Apr. 14 2009).

110. Where defendant plead guilty to forgery and was sentenced to 19 years incarceration, the trial court had not acted improperly in considering convictions more than 10 years old to enhance his punishment where Tex. Pen. Code Ann. § 12.42 (Vernon 2003) did not impose a time limit on the use of prior convictions for the purpose of enhancing a defendant's punishment and counsel was not ineffective for having failed to object to the use of the prior convictions for enhancement purposes. Austin v. State, 2004 Tex. App. LEXIS 8114 (Tex. App. Amarillo Sept. 2 2004).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Sentencing : Imposition : Evidence

111. Trial court did not err by admitting evidence during sentencing of defendant's nonadjudicated conduct under this rule. Winstead v. State, 2014 Tex. App. LEXIS 8577 (Tex. App. Corpus Christi Aug. 7 2014).
